CHAPTER 1

Four Fields of Craving

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this profound dharma talk from the 1988 Three Month Retreat, Carol Wilson offers an in-depth exploration of grasping (upādāna) and craving (taṇhā) as the origin of suffering—the Second Noble Truth. She illuminates how grasping, a stronger form of craving, blinds us to reality and perpetuates the cycle of dukkha, drawing from the Buddha's first teaching in the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta.
> Wilson examines the four classical fields of grasping: sense pleasures (kāmupādāna), views (diṭṭhupādāna), rites and rituals (sīlabbatupādāna), and self-doctrine (attavādupādāna). Through vivid examples—from retreat experiences of "vipassanā romance" to a memorable journey to Gatwick Airport—she demonstrates how grasping distorts perception, creates separation, and prevents us from appreciating what is actually present. She emphasizes that the danger lies not in pleasant sensations themselves, but in our inability to see the clinging that arises with contact.
> The practical heart of this teaching lies in using the controlled retreat environment to investigate grasping directly. Rather than condemning ourselves when caught in attachment, Wilson encourages welcoming these moments as opportunities to learn. Through patient, equanimous observation of the grasping process itself, wisdom naturally arises, the bondage weakens, and moments of genuine peace become increasingly accessible. As she beautifully conveys, understanding our sense activity leads to stillness and delight—the realization of total calm.

About a specific quality of mind, a specific mental factor that arises—and that's the quality of grasping.

It also happens to be, along with its sister quality of craving which is slightly weaker, the second noble truth, or the origin of suffering. So it's not a slight quality, and it's one which I imagine we're all somewhat familiar with as we sit here through the days.

Grasping is a stronger form of craving.

When the Buddha was first enlightened, as you know, his mind was not especially inclined to go out and teach. With his capacity to survey the world and see what was going on anywhere he looked, he thought, "This truth that I have discovered is very profound and hard to see. You can't discover it by just thinking about it. The wise person has to experience it for themself."

But what he saw when he looked around, and what he thought to himself—at least as tradition hands it down to us—is that the people in this generation (and I don't think it's changed much) rely so much on attachment, in fact delight in attachment, that it would be too hard for them to see the truth. Because basically, attachment is blinding. And so his mind favored inaction, as they put it.

Now, one of the characteristics of a Buddha is that he has discovered the truth for himself and didn't have a teacher who said, "This is what you do and this is the understanding you will come to." He discovered it by himself. And that was the case because at that time the teaching was not alive in the world. So had he decided not to teach, it could have been a serious decision for all of us, because Buddhas don't come along all that often.

As you've heard the story, a being from a Brahma world came down and begged him to look around and see that while there were beings with much dust on their eyes, there were also a lot of creatures with just a little dust on their eyes. Those people would be able to hear the teaching and learn. And the Buddha saw that, and in seeing that, decided to teach.

I relate the dust on our eyes to this grasping, the tendency of the mind to grasp and thus blind us.

When the Buddha did start teaching, the first sermon that he gave was on these four noble truths. The first one being the truth of unsatisfactoriness or dukkha, which we've talked a lot about—all the various levels of it: grief, birth, death, sickness, old age, lamentation, despair, on and on, the whole list.

The second truth is that of the origin of this dissatisfaction. One can look at it on a moment-to-moment level. And that's this quality of craving in the mind, which produces renewal of being. It's suffering because we're craving what is elusive, what's insubstantial, what can never bring satisfaction. Also, when craving is present in the mind, it blinds one to a clear perception of truth, to a clear perception of reality in that moment. This is suffering. And it leads to a perpetuation of more of the same.

The other two truths—I don't really want to talk about them, but I hate to just mention the first two without adding the second two because it sounds too pessimistic. The third one, of course, is that there is a cessation, an ending to the suffering. And the fourth truth is the path to that ending, this eightfold path that all of us here are on at this moment.

To focus on the second truth: the difference between craving and clinging or grasping can be thought of this way. Craving is similar to someone who's groping in the dark to steal an object—the mind is inclining towards that object. But grasping corresponds to actually reaching out and grabbing it. You're really stealing that object at that time. And that goes on to give rise to concepts of "I" and "mine," of self.

Classically there are spoken of the sixfold realms of grasping, the sixfold realms of clinging. As Joseph spoke of the other night, there are only six types of sense objects that ever arise in our field of experience: eye objects, hearing, smelling, tasting, bodily feeling, and mind objects. They're just changing, one after the other, one after the other, coming and going with incredible rapidity.

Whenever there's contact between any sense object, sense base—such as a sight, the eye, and the knowing of that—when there is that contact of those three coming together, at any contact, that is when grasping can arise. And that is why mindfulness is so important.

When we're mindful of the process, we can see it unfold: there's contact, a smell arises, consciousness of a smell. The feeling arises that it's pleasant. And there's craving—the mind just kind of inclines towards that smell. Recognizes it as bread baking.

With mindfulness, that can be seen, and it doesn't have to turn into any big story. It's a pleasant smell. The mind inclines towards it. And that's all. Wisdom arises, can arise, from that seeing, from seeing the process. And in that moment of mindfulness...

The grasping does not arrive, does not arise, and this is the purification. In that moment of seeing the process, the clinging fades, the craving fades, and the mind is in that moment purified. Suffering then does not proceed to follow from that pleasant sensation.

But when it's not seen, when we don't see that moment so clearly, the craving would tend to strengthen into grasping. "Oh, that bread smells so good. I would really like to have a piece. I'm really hungry. I don't know how I'm going to make it through this sitting." And it can go on and on. The mind becomes really fixated on that particular experience. As one moment conditions the next, the grasping can grow stronger and stronger. We become less and less present. And that, to me, is what the Buddha meant by having dust on our eyes. We don't know what's happening when we're blinded by grasping like that.

The Buddha said, "For some people, contact—the point where sense and object meet—is enthralling. And so they are washed by the tides of being, drifting along an empty, pointless road. Nowhere is there any sign of broken chains. But other people can come to understand their sense activity, and because they understand it, stillness fills them with delight. They see just what contact does. And so their craving ends, and they realize total calm."

That sounds quite lovely. But a lot of the time it's not so neat and tidy. We don't simply notice, "Oh, I see the contact, I notice craving, no problem, it's gone." A lot of the time we wake up way far down the road, lost in some dream of eating a gourmet meal in a Parisian restaurant, and we have to really think back to figure out how we got there. "Oh yes, there was that smell of bread baking ten minutes ago, and I didn't notice it." Grasping can be very compelling.

What can happen from waking up from a fantasy like that is you go to lunch and bread isn't served. You're having millet and some kind of vegetable stew, and there's incredible aversion in the mind—whereas perhaps yesterday you were craving millet. It does a flip. Not only was one lost and blinded by the grasping, missing what was present during the sitting, but one is unable to appreciate what is actually present at lunch because the grasping to that idea, that smell, is still going on. When grasping is in the mind, we can't appreciate what is present.

It's like the story of the pickpocket in the time of the Buddha. The Buddha was giving a discourse and all these people were sitting there—this was during the time when many of the suttas end with all five hundred people becoming enlightened. It was worthwhile listening to one of his discourses. But the pickpocket could see only people's pockets, because that's what the grasping mind was focused on: wanting the money, wanting people's valuables, totally blinded to anything else going on.

Our practice here, knowing how blinding grasping can be, is not to judge it or fear it or condemn it or condemn ourselves for getting caught in it, but simply to see it, to understand it when it arises. Krishnamurti says, "Unless the ways of desire are understood, illusion is inevitable." The Buddha also encourages us to understand how grasping works. He says, "There are many kinds of suffering in the world, and all of them grow from the same source: grasping. When a person knows no better, she or he gives way to this grasping and, slow and dulled, goes through one misery after another. So do not create this for yourselves. Use your knowledge to see how suffering begins and develops in attachment."

How can we begin to use our knowledge to see this, except by investigating grasping itself when it's arising? Not hating it, not trying to shut it out, not trying to pretend it's not happening and that we're really equanimous, but by really looking at it. The experiential nature of desire, of grasping, is the only way we'll truly come to understand it.

One way to begin experiencing it is very simply, on a physical level, just imagining what it's like. You're sitting calmly. Objects are arising. There's a thought. There's a sensation. There's the in and the out, the rising, the falling, an image, a sound.

You're kind of noticing and noting, nothing very much. And suddenly one arises and then—aha, this one. What does that feel like in that moment? I personally experience it almost as if the body were lurching forward. A tightening, a sense of being off balance. It's not comfortable. The experience of grasping itself is actually unpleasant. It's unbalanced.

And what's happening in that moment when grasping has arisen? Out of that flow of rapidly changing objects of awareness—perceptions, sounds, images, thoughts—one particular one has been isolated and grasped onto. Through that identification with it comes a whole flow of constructions. A whole self-image gets created, a whole sense of separation between me and other. Our perception becomes distorted in that moment. The mind becomes unbalanced, wavering and unsteady. It can't really see so clearly what's going on, never mind appreciating what's going on.

We can't really experience or know the interrelatedness of things—of the world, of life, of our experience—when there's grasping in the mind. Because when something has been isolated and grasped onto, whether a thought, a memory, a sound, or a self-idea, in that moment there's an immediate separation between me and other, me and the world. There's no real sense of interconnectedness. There's just me, the object grasped after, and everything else is in the way.

Two examples. The first uses a very common retreat experience: the VR, or vipassana romance—that person you're just so fascinated by, even though you may never have spoken. Say you're in your usual walking space, walking very mindfully, quite connected with the sensations of lifting, moving, placing. The mind is fairly calm, and this person just walks across your field of vision and walks away.

There's not really an awareness of seeing, but there's an awareness of pleasant experience. And suddenly: Wow, that person. Maybe they're going to come walk here right next to me. Wouldn't that be far out? Or maybe I'll be able to sit next to them at lunch. Gee, I wonder if they even notice that I'm here. I wonder if I should leave a note on their zafu. And on and on.

In that moment, what's happened to the clarity of seeing? Are you aware of anyone else in the room? You might be—you might wish they'd leave so that person would have room to come walk next to you. The same when you go into the dining room. Are you aware of the environment? Are you aware even of your own feet touching the floor?

Perception has become very distorted by this grasping after. And it's not even grasping after the reality of a person being there. It was just a pleasant sight that walked by and has been gone for ten minutes, but the grasping mind continues to build on it. When you really tune into that, it's actually quite unpleasant—very out of touch, very separative.

Contrast this with a time when you're walking, perhaps in the same place, but with a very calm mind, very tuned in to just the perception of lifting the foot. Perhaps there's tension and pressure, there's awareness of some thoughts coming and going, and there's that sense of real pristine beauty. You just look up and see the sunlight and there's a sense of how beautiful that is, and then that's let go and on with the walking. There can be this feeling of real calm and perfection just in that moment. Nothing much happening. Very ordinary.

So what's the difference? The only difference can be that there's no grasping in the mind. When there's no grasping, it's possible for perception to be very clear and undistorted. There's no isolating, no sense of having to separate me from there, from other. It's possible to know very clearly what's present and really appreciate it because the mind is free from grasping in that moment. This is a taste of the peace of mind of non-grasping—that sense of completeness in the moment, of nowhere to go, nothing to want, just a sense of wholeness and completeness.

As we continue to investigate, to develop our mindfulness, to see and understand the nature of this attachment, those moments become less rare as our practice continues.

I want to give one other, slightly less subtle example of how blinding and distorting grasping can be—one that's not from retreat, just so we're all clear that grasping also arises when we're not on retreat, although we might not see it in quite such a subtle way.

This was an experience that happened to me when I was in England a couple of years ago, visiting an American friend of mine. I only had a week, and I had to be back here. I had one of those tickets you can't change or you lose all your money. And I had to be back for work, so I felt the pressure to return.

My friend lived in the south of England, and we drove up to London, staying in a friend's apartment for the night. I was going to take the train to the airport the next morning. The friend wasn't there, and our other friends in London were all away as well.

So the next morning I had called a cab. I was getting ready to go when my friend became struck with the idea that he really had to drive me to the airport. It wasn't just a casual suggestion—I mean, he was on his knees begging. Could he take me to the airport?

I said, "It's really fine. It's easy to get the cab. I'll take the subway. It goes right to the airport. No problem."

We had this discussion about five times in an hour, with increasing franticness on his part, until finally I couldn't stand it anymore. I said, "Okay, okay. I'll cancel the cab. You can take me to the airport."

Now, this was his grasping. He wanted to spend a little more time with me. So already this last hour together had been miserable because we'd been arguing about it the whole time. By this point I had about two hours before the flight.

The thing is, he had no idea how to get to the airport, and neither did I. Our friends were all out of London, and the only map we had was one of these London A to Zs, which are great if you know where you are. But they're just little squares—about a hundred pages with only a few blocks on each page. You can find where you are, and then it says to go to page 47. You flip to 47, find where you are, and you're already off it again. It's not like you can just turn page after page; it's scattered all through the book. Plus you have to know which direction you're going—and we didn't.

So we called around. He thought of someone, finally got directions. The person said, "But it'll probably take you a good hour and a half." By this time I had an hour and forty-five minutes. It'll take an hour and a half to get there.

We got in the car. Now he was fine—he got what he wanted at this point. I went crazy. I was just a bundle of tension and nerves, and all I had in my mind was: I've got to get that plane. I've got to get that plane. I could hardly talk to my friend. He was just in the way. Any car on the road was in the way. Anything that happened was in the way of just this grasping in my mind: I've got to get that plane.

We managed to zip down through the instructions, and we got onto the motorway. As soon as we had gone about a mile, we came to a total dead-stop traffic jam. There was absolutely no movement. Since we didn't know where we were, we couldn't really get off at an exit because we would have been completely lost. So we were just stuck there.

My grasping came to a total head at that point—and burst. I thought, "Right. I'm going to miss the plane. Well, that's okay. I've never missed a transatlantic plane before. It'll be interesting."

And the fact that the grasping ended, I really settled back. I started enjoying the ride.

I started looking around and saw how the only difference in that situation was the presence or absence of grasping in my mind. And I started enjoying myself. Unfortunately, my friend at this point went into grasping mode, and he was miserable.

Anyway, the traffic moved. We got to the airport with about ten minutes before the plane was supposed to leave. So that got my grasping going again. And everyone in the airport was seriously in my way at this point. I mean seriously—to the point where I was butting in ahead of people, stepping to the head of huge long lines at Gatwick, asking people if I could get in front of them. But not with a sense of genuine interaction with that person. I mean, I said to them, "Excuse me, could I get in front of you?" But it wasn't a sense of real communication. This was an object out there in my world, in the way.

It was a very illuminating experience. I did make the plane. Of course, in the moment I wasn't thinking, "Isn't this interesting, grasping arising in the mind." But on reflecting back, I saw how divisive it is and how compelling that force of grasping was. And it really showed me that when the mind is filled with grasping, no clear discernment is possible. You can't really judge what is appropriate or suitable action. My friend couldn't really judge that it wasn't so appropriate or suitable to drive me to the airport. It was fine for me to take the tube, and a lot easier. The grasping blinded him to that, and my basic grasping at wanting him to be happy and to please him also blinded me. I went along with the whole thing. You just can't see clearly when it's going on.

As we continue to observe day by day here, we see not only is it incredibly strong, but how often does the tendency of grasping arise in a day, in just one sitting? How often does it come up? I think it's really important for all of us to appreciate just how deep this underlying tendency of grasping is, how quick it is to arise, and how really awesome the journey of discovery is that we're on. The importance of patience and equanimity in this process can't be overstressed. It's not that we'll just see grasping arise a few times and be free of it. It's a very, very deep underlying tendency, and we need to have respect for the work that we're doing here and a lot of patience.

It may not seem like a lot when you're sitting there and you become aware that the mind is grasping—say, at a thought of what a good sitting you wish you were having. And on noting the grasping, it fades and you go back to rising, falling. That may seem like no big deal. But really, that is an important moment because it's a movement in that moment from blindness and distortion of mind towards clarity, towards freedom. And in that moment of mindfulness, it's strengthening succeeding moments of mindfulness. So don't underrate these little moments of seeing clearly. They're very valuable.

Classically, there's talked about fourfold grasping—four large areas in our lives where grasping takes place. The first one is the area of sense desire, which is rather obvious and rather huge. I like this definition of grasping to sense desire: "laying a firm hold on." It implies the inability to shake off a thing even after experiencing great pain due to it and perceiving its many harmful consequences.

I can really see how often I do that. How often do any of us do that? Continue to hold on to, go after something that we've experienced pain from over and over. Just a simple—maybe not so simple—area of eating. How often do I sit and keep eating something when I know I'm full, when I know in half an hour I'm going to not only feel physically uncomfortable but be mentally berating myself, if not a lot worse? And then the next day do the same thing. Or two hours later do the same thing. All the while knowing that that's what's going to happen. But the grasping in that moment is just too strong, and I just don't see it. We all do that very often.

The Buddha spoke a great deal, in very graphic terms sometimes, about the perils of sense pleasures, the dangers that there are in them. He likened them—these are some of the less graphic similes—to something borrowed, because the owner takes it back. Or sense pleasures are like a dream, because when you wake up, they're gone. I want to say a little bit about this: it's not so much to see sense pleasures or pleasant sensation as something bad, or that when one enjoys sense pleasures there should be a sense of guilt or sin, or a lot of our Western conditioning around it. Not that at all.

Or even necessarily that in order to understand, one has to renounce all sense pleasures and go live in a cave in the Himalayas.

I think it's really important to see that the danger is not that pleasant sensation is inherently bad. But when there is contact with the pleasant, with sense pleasure, that underlying tendency of mind to grasp is so strong—it's just so strong—and we're so unused to being mindful of it, it can be so hard to see. It can be so overwhelming that we're so easily cast into blindness from it. It's so easy to get lost in the cycle of grasping and becoming and wanting more and suffering from it. And in doing that, we're unable to see what's really going on. That's the danger.

Just last night, for example, I was driving back home in the evening and it was a lovely clear night. The full moon was just rising in front of me, really big. It was really beautiful—if I had been noticing it. But I was playing a tape on the cassette, and I really only wanted to hear about a one-minute portion on this tape, and I didn't know where it was. So I was going back and forth, back and forth, trying to find this one minute. And I wasn't noticing the moon. I wasn't noticing how I felt. I wasn't noticing the music.

Then I decided to quit going back and forth. I said, well, it must be around here, and I just left it playing. But every time a new section would start, I'd think, "Oh, that's it." "Oh no, it's not." Then I'd sit back, and I didn't enjoy the music that was playing. I would look and go, "Oh yeah, the moon's pretty." And it was a reflex. I wasn't able to appreciate the moon. I wasn't able to appreciate anything because I was grasping after this one little piece of music—one little minute of music. I mean, who cares? But I spent the whole ride doing that. I never heard the piece of music. And I never really appreciated the moon. And this is one little tiny incident in a day of many incidents like that. We like to think that we're a bit more aware, that we're paying attention.

So that's how easily we can get lost in sense pleasures. That wasn't even a pleasure—it was the anticipation of a sense pleasure that I never had. Grasping at sense pleasures just doesn't work. It's like trying to quench thirst with salt water. You just need more and need more and you never get to where you feel satisfied. The danger in sense pleasures is not in the objects themselves, but in not seeing the clinging.

This is a quote from Lama Yeshe: "Most of us do not know what renunciation means. We are disturbed when we hear about giving up attachment to sensual pleasures, which we take to mean having to suffer in order to achieve inner liberation. But renunciation does not mean that we must give up happiness or that it is desirable to suffer. On the contrary, our aim is to achieve a state beyond suffering. The aim of most of our daily lives is to try to satisfy each desire as it arises, day after day, month after month, year after year. We try to achieve happiness by perpetuating something that is essentially transitory. This expectation, stemming from a misconception, can never be fulfilled and is therefore totally irrational."

And so it's also not to fall into the other extreme of fearing contact with something pleasant. "Oh my God, if I experience a pleasant sensation I'm going to be lost in craving and grasping. I have to go and hide." That's just the flip side. That's just as unbalanced as being lost in craving. Rather, our practice is to develop through mindfulness and clear seeing a balance of mind. A mind that is equanimous, that doesn't need to move toward the pleasant and try to perpetuate it. That doesn't need to flinch back in fear from the unpleasant and try to get away from it. A mind that is steady and not needing to spend its life running back and forth—towards the pleasant and away from the unpleasant.

Suzuki Roshi said that renunciation does not consist in giving up the things of the world, but in accepting that they go away. And that's a mind of balance, a mind that's calm.

In our daily life—not when we're on retreat, but in our daily life, in this culture—we are subjected to such a bombardment of sensual input.

And so much of it is potentially pleasant. It's so easy in our lives to move from one pleasant sensation to the next, to the next. If there's something unpleasant, we can usually find something pleasant to move to, to avoid it. It's such a whirlwind. And we can get so lost in this whirlwind of constantly shifting pleasant sensations that it becomes very difficult in our daily life to be aware and see the process of grasping as it arises, to see how it's bringing on suffering. Because it's very easy to skip from one object when we aren't satisfied by it, to skip on to another object, and to not really stop long enough to see that it's the search itself that's bringing us the suffering.

So here, one of the real benefits of being here is that this environment is so controlled. The sense input is so much more restricted than in our ordinary daily lives. True, the mind can find plenty to grasp at. It just kind of moves from something big like wanting to go to the movies to something little like what time shall I have my cup of tea and how many shall I have today? But it's so much more restricted that it becomes easier to see the process. And this is really valuable.

In our daily lives, it's a rare experience when strong craving arises and turns into grasping, that we say, "Well, I'll just sit here and see what this feels like." We're so conditioned—grasping, right, go for it, do something to get away from it. But if you're sitting here, true, many times grasping comes up in the day and you're halfway through a walking period and suddenly find you're halfway out the door and over to the tea urn before you've noticed it. But many other times you might be sitting in here and a strong thought arises: "Gee, I'd really like to go have that snack I stashed away at lunchtime." But you're not really going to bound up in the middle of the sitting, hopefully, and go out and get the little pack of raisins that you saved for three and a half days and suddenly have to have right now. If nothing else, peer pressure will keep you sitting there.

And so that is a great opportunity to actually experience what grasping feels like—to see that whole process, to sit there and be mindful and feel what grasping is like. You might find that it's unpleasant. You might find that it's really unbalancing. And also that it's okay. It's really not all that terrible. It's quite possible to sit and experience the physical and mental processes of grasping. And from doing that, we learn that we can be with grasping. We don't have to run to a new experience each time grasping arises just in order not to feel the grasping.

And we start to see that a lot of the reason we're driven by grasping is just to get out of that state of grasping itself. What's so pleasant about achieving the desired result? The grasping stops—until the next moment it arises again and then we have to go get something else. So the chance to sit here and be with it, without doing anything about it but just experiencing it with bare attention and mindfulness, is a great opportunity. When it arises, there's no need to curse it but to welcome it as a chance to learn. As we continue to do this over and over, to see this process with mindfulness, understanding begins to grow from this clarity of seeing. And with it also grows equanimity of mind. We begin quite naturally to be able to greet sense objects with detachment.

Now by detachment is not meant a negative quality of aversion or denial, or even a detachment of "Right, I see that object over there and I'm detached from it, equanimous." But detachment meaning really a dissolving of the attachment—that sense of equanimity, of peace. The Buddha said, "Through dispassion one is freed."

The second area of grasping—the first one being sense desire, sense pleasures—is grasping at views. And this also is a huge area. By views is meant the tendency of mind that leads one to think, "This alone is true; everything else is false." And this, again, is blinding. We do it a lot. To hold to any one view, any view at all, limits our world. It limits the possibilities of what we can see, what we can understand, what we can experience and know. Because we tend to accept only the facts that corroborate our already held view. The stronger we're grasping onto the view, the harder it is for us to accept any evidence that goes against it.

It's easy to see how this works in the world of politics. I thought of it a lot watching the presidential debates, where the two men would just sit there spouting out their views, with no sense of a meeting, of really listening—"Oh, well, maybe what you say might be true."

And you'd sit there watching, and they couldn't both be true. One doubted if either of it was true. And there was certainly no sense of trying to open up the views of either person to let in what the other was saying. Just a very rigidly defined world. The whole effort seemed to be to get everyone who was listening to buy into one person's view or the other, without any sense of real questioning. It was scary, actually. I found it scary.

The Buddha told a story about how views can so blind us that we can't see the truth when it confronts us directly. There was a man who was a widower with a young son, about five years old. Once when the man was out and the son was home, some robbers came and burned down his house and the whole village, and kidnapped his son. The man came back and saw this whole ruin, and he found a little charred corpse. He assumed it was his son and was incredibly upset—wailing and moaning, really beside himself. He had the little corpse cremated and had a very nice bag made for the ashes, which he took with him everywhere. He couldn't get over it. He carried the grief and lamenting with him everywhere he went. It felt as though his life were ruined. Eventually he rebuilt his house and continued living, but in total misery.

One night, some months later, his son, who had escaped from the robbers, found his way back to his father's new house and was knocking on the door about midnight. The man was yelling, "Who's out there?" The boy said, "Father, it's I, your son." The man said, "Impossible, my son's dead." "No, father, really, it's I, your son. I've escaped, I've come back." But the man was so locked in his view of what had happened that he said, "No way are you my son. I have my son's ashes here. Go away." He wouldn't come down. He wouldn't open the door. He drove his son away and never saw him again.

This story shows how strongly we can be caught in views that we create ourselves, unable to open to what is true if it doesn't corroborate our view. And we do this all the time in sitting. How often are you sitting here and have a certain kind of experience, and you think, "Oh, so that's what a good sitting is. That's what good concentration means." In that moment, there's a view. All those experiences in that sitting come to mean "good concentration." And if that is grasped onto, adhered to, then all other experiences are going to be judged by that view.

Now, that sitting might have had nothing to do with good concentration—it might have just been pleasant. Or even if it did have to do with good concentration, holding onto that sense of it, that view of it, is going to blind one to any further or different experience, because one is trying to recreate what one views as good concentration. And how often do we do that, just in a single sitting?

There are many stories in the suttas about people coming to the Buddha and questioning him about all the different teachers around at the time, who all professed different views and different explanations of the universe and of teaching and of Dharma. They always wanted him to say which one was right, which one was wrong, which one he agreed with. And he would never get involved in any of them. He would never associate himself with any view. He'd say it's because holding to any opinion, any belief, brings conflict. It brings contention. It brings conflict both with others and within our own self.

One thing he said is that people with views just go around annoying one another. Because when you have a view, then you have to prove it to somebody who doesn't agree with you, or you have to uphold it, or you have to convince them, or they have to convince you. And it just leads to conflict. At its ultimate level, we can see it leads to wars. It's really scary, the power of grasping at views.

It leads to conflict within ourselves, within our own mind, too. Just again, back to the examples of sitting and how easily we can form a view from something that happens and grasp onto it.

It can be the view, "I'm not having many emotions arising, I must be suppressing, I'm doing something wrong." It can also be the view, "I'm having too many emotions arising, I'm not mindful enough, I'm doing something wrong." Or, "Oh, finally, here's bliss. This is what it's supposed to be like." And then the whole rest of one's retreat is spent trying to recreate that state of bliss.

As soon as one has formulated a view and grasped at it—and it's the grasping that brings the suffering—one is in conflict with oneself. The view that "this is what my experience is like, I'm suppressing emotions, I'm not doing it right" is in conflict with other views that we hold of how it should be done. They don't go together, and we suffer. We're in conflict. We do this all the time.

As soon as we can see a view and let go of it, the tendency is very strong to adopt another one in its place. I watch this in my practice all the time, on just real subtle levels. I'll be sitting, noting, watching things happen, and I'll hit a certain point where the noting is going very fluidly and it feels good. It usually feels good for a view to arise that "this is how it's supposed to be"—so that's always a good one to watch out for. I think, "Oh, that's it. Okay, now I've got it." And then it won't go that way anymore. It'll start to be more difficult. I'll start to suffer. And in that suffering, I'll look a little closer and I'll see, "Oh yeah, I had grasped onto that as a view." I let it go, and in the next moment: "But now, this is how it really is." I've watched that over and over and over again.

As Thich Nhat Hanh writes: "Sometimes somewhere you take something to be the truth. If you cling to it so much, when the truth comes in person and knocks at your door, you will not open it. Guarding knowledge is not a good way to understand. Understanding means to throw away your knowledge. You have to be able to transcend your knowledge the way people climb a ladder. If you are on the fifth step of a ladder and think that you are very high, there is no hope for you to climb to the sixth. The technique is to release. The Buddhist way of understanding is always letting go of our views and knowledge in order to transcend. This is the most important teaching."

So again, it's not that views in themselves are inherently harmful or inherently cause suffering. It's just important to recognize them when they arise as views, and not to grasp at them as manifestations of the truth. To see when there's a view in the mind, and to see when grasping arises to that view. When we don't see the grasping, suddenly we have a new truth that we're guiding our life by. This is not a rejection of knowledge, not a rejection of methods of practice. They can certainly serve, and we are certainly using them, as skillful means. But we must see them for what they are and not grasp onto them and get lost in that.

The Buddha said, "One who is freed does not concur, does not dispute with anyone. She or he employs the speech currently used in the world without misapprehending it." So it's not that we say, "Well, I don't have anything to do with views. I don't have anything to do with a sense of 'I'"—and so we can't even relate to people. There's no other way to relate than by using our common speech. But we don't misunderstand and misapprehend a view to be the truth.

In our practice here, it's simply to know when a view has arisen, to see it as a view, to know if there's grasping in the mind to that view or if there's no grasping in the mind. This applies to views about everything—about truth, about practice, about enlightenment. As the Third Zen Patriarch said, "Do not search for the truth, only cease to cherish opinions."

The other two fields of grasping I don't really have time to talk about much; I'll just mention them. The third one is grasping at rites and rituals, which can be explained as having the idea that one can make oneself perfect, and then grasping at external, outward behaviors—rituals, rites—in order to become perfect.

And that's different from a committed investigation of the actual nature of mind and body to come to know the truth. It's simply looking at what's actually going on rather than grasping at a particular ritual to make oneself perfect. This is not obviously to discard method and technique—they're clearly valuable tools—but also not to mistake, in the Zen parable, the finger pointing at the moon for the moon itself.

The fourth field of grasping is a huge one: grasping at the self-idea, the idea of "I," which could be several whole talks in itself. This is defined as considering the ever-changing world in the light of a permanent, unchanging essence—as if there's some permanent, unchanging self that's considering the world. It can also be seen as the latent, underlying tendency to identify with any experience whatsoever that comes up. It's not as if there's a solid self-idea sitting there, but rather this latent tendency that arises very frequently—to grasp onto something, identify with it, and make a self.

For example, just an easy example in your sitting: there's an unpleasant sound. There's contact—a sound. It's unpleasant. Aversion arises. And that aversion is grasped onto. In that grasping, that feeding of it, the aversion turns into anger. It gets really full-blown. More grasping, and it becomes "my anger." "I'm really angry at that person for moving and destroying my concentration in this sitting." And it can go on and on—either building up to self-justification about what a jerk that person is and how right I am, or the other side, self-condemnation: "They're doing the best they can, I have no right to be angry, I'm such a horrible person after all."

Either way, moving from that grasping, isolating out that particular experience of unpleasantness and aversion, and through that grasping comes all the construction and buildup. How solid has the sense of "me," of self, become in that moment of self-justification or self-condemnation? The "I" is very solid in that moment, constructed through the process of grasping and identifying with a particular experience. This tendency of grasping and identification with experience is so strong. This is the grasping at the "I" idea, the self-idea. As I said, this is a huge topic, and I just want to mention it quickly here.

If that aversion is not grasped at—even if it is grasped a little and moves to anger, but then the grasping is seen and let go—the anger will be there for a while as experience, and then it just kind of dissolves or floats away or turns into something else. And the sense of self is not nearly so strong. It fades out with the identification, perhaps to arise again in the next moment with the next grasping and identification.

Again, I just want to emphasize that this is not about condemning the quality of grasping or judging ourselves when we find that we're really caught in grasping. Actually, at that moment, that would itself be identification with the grasping. What we're doing here is simply using this opportunity that we have—a rare opportunity for most of us—to begin to be able to see this process. To see how powerful it is and to respect that. To see its arising, and through that seeing, and through the times that we get caught, to begin to understand how blinding it is. Through the mindfulness of it, when it arises, through that seeing, wisdom also arises. And the bondage of grasping can begin to weaken. It can begin to arise less strongly.

This is Krishnamurti: "We are forever craving something, and having tasted many things which were mostly unsatisfactory, we now want the ultimate thing—God, truth, or what you will. We want a result, a new experience, a new sensation that will endure in spite of everything. We never see the futility of result, but only of a particular result. So we wander from one result to another, hoping always to find the one that will end the search."

And so it's possible, through this practice of mindfulness, through seeing the process of the search and the suffering that comes from the grasping, to end the search. Through this investigation, through this practice of mindfulness that we're all engaged in.

"Because when they understand their sense activity, the stillness fills them with delight. They see just what contact does. And so their craving ends. They realize the total calm."

It really inspires me to feel that this is a possibility for all of us—to really understand through our clear seeing and mindfulness this process. The process of contact. The process of grasping. And to begin to realize calm and peace.

CHAPTER 2

Morality (Sīla)

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this foundational talk from the 1989 Three Month Retreat, Carol Wilson offers a rich exploration of sīla (morality) as one of the three essential trainings in the Buddha's path, alongside samādhi and paññā. Rather than presenting the precepts as mere rules or outer constraints, she reveals how working with morality becomes a fascinating and increasingly subtle practice of investigating our intentions and motivations.
> Wilson emphasizes that Buddhist morality is fundamentally about intention—the mental states that accompany and motivate our actions. The same external action can be skillful or unskillful depending entirely on the volition behind it. Drawing from the Mahāparinibbāna Sutta, she highlights how the Buddha repeatedly stressed that concentration imbued with morality brings great fruit, and wisdom imbued with concentration leads to complete freedom from mental corruptions.
> Through personal examples and reflections on each of the five precepts, Wilson demonstrates how this practice moves from acquiescence to outer authority toward an inner expression of harmony. She explores the precept of non-harming beyond simply not killing, examining how our choices—from dealing with insects to consuming media violence—ripple outward. The precept against stealing becomes an investigation of inner contentment versus the gaining mind. Right speech reveals itself as surprisingly difficult, with subtle colorations of truth, gossip, and harsh words requiring ongoing attention. Throughout, Wilson invites practitioners to use each action as a field of learning rather than judgment, cultivating the peace and clarity that become the ground for deeper insight.

So it looks like you all survived the first day.

I know something about when we went last night from the orientation period to the period of the intensive retreat. Some staff people were telling me they could just feel the whole energy of the place change in quite a wonderful way. And I'm actually quite jealous of all of you beginning in this amazing endeavor. Whether you've never done it before or you've done it six times before, it doesn't matter, because it's new and exciting and insightful. I really think it's the most wonderful thing one could do with three months of one's life. And it's a pleasure to be here.

Last night, when we opened the retreat, Steve and Sharon offered the refuges and the precepts. We did that not just because it's tradition and a nice thing to do. Regarding the precepts, as Steve said, it's much more than tradition or something to pay a little bit of attention to in order to get on with the real practice. Working with morality—which is a translation we can come up with for sīla, the Pali word—is really a very integral, very important part of the path, part of our practice.

In the Buddha's teachings, there are three major areas of training: sīla, or morality; samādhi, often translated as concentration; and paññā, or wisdom. And in the Eightfold Path, three of those steps are concerned with sīla. So it's not something to be seen as inferior or not as interesting or lesser. For one thing, it's the actual foundation on which our practice is built. And for another thing, I find working with morality, working with sīla, to be a very fascinating, incredibly insightful, and increasingly subtle form of practice.

Often in the beginnings of my own practice—and maybe for a lot of us here in the West—we have tended to want to skip over the morality part of things, the sīla part. Give it more cursory attention and get on to the really interesting stuff: working with concentration, working with wisdom.

One of our Asian teachers has often used an analogy: it's as if we get in a rowboat and really work hard, row really hard to get somewhere, but we forget to untie it from the dock. Working with meditation without giving due attention to our actions, the ground from which we move, is like doing that. It's the ground from which samādhi and wisdom can grow.

In the discourse that's considered his last discourse, called the Mahāparinibbāna Sutta—it's actually a series of discourses that he made as he was going around on his farewell tour—in about eleven out of the fourteen places that he spoke, the Buddha gave a little brief synopsis saying: such and such is morality, such and such is concentration, such and such is wisdom. And he really emphasized that concentration, when it is imbued with morality, brings great fruit and profit. And wisdom, when it's imbued with concentration, brings great fruit and profit. The mind imbued with wisdom becomes completely free from the corruptions of mind—of sense desire, becoming, false views, and ignorance. So let us not miss the significance of the fact that the ground, the root, of this is morality. No part of the path can exist in isolation. It's a very holistic, integrated path.

I want to share some thoughts and reflections about the practice of morality, the practice of sīla, mostly from my own experience. Because I think in itself, it's not a practice we do just to get concentrated—well, if I follow the precepts then when I sit my mind will be calm, I can get concentrated. It's a very powerful and vital and fascinating practice in itself.

My experience of it has been that it's a real practice of the heart. It's moved from perhaps a sense of acquiescence to an outer authority—a sense of the rules that we're told to follow, that makes sense rationally, but is an outer acquiescence—to what becomes an inner expression of greater harmony. Harmony both with the external environment, with other people, and also a sense of harmony in our own being.

As we continue to work with harmonizing our actions outwardly, it leads to a much deeper understanding in our own heart of the interrelatedness of all of us—of me with the world. It comes to be a really deep, inward, personal experience when we begin to move from being out of harmony.

For example, in the beginning one might know: okay, one of the precepts is not to speak harshly to other people. And one tries not to do it out of memory, out of remembering this isn't a good thing to do, conforming to a sense of outer authority. Over time, what's begun to happen for me is that if I'm not paying attention and I speak harshly or thoughtlessly in a way that's difficult or unpleasant, the pain that it causes the other person doesn't exist in isolation. I almost immediately feel, almost cellularly, a sense of something being off—that I've moved out of harmony. That sense of interrelatedness grows stronger because how can one isolate the pain? I spoke harshly. It hurt that person. But it also hurt me. There's not really a separation anymore.

And that sense of inner, visceral understanding comes to get stronger and stronger, so that the power and subtlety of our experience of harmony, of interrelatedness, also strengthens as we work with the precepts. We just naturally find ourselves becoming more harmonized with each other, with the environment, with ourselves.

The Buddhist concept of sila, morality, is not a sense of working with sin or working with judgment. It's not that there's a set of actions labeled as bad—if you do them you're wrong, if you don't do them you're right, and if you do them you should really judge yourself as being a bad person. This is what I love about Buddhism. It's much more straightforward than that and really nonjudgmental, but clearly observable. It's a morality of intention.

What's really important in working with our actions, working with our speech, is the intention, the volition that motivates our actions, that informs our actions. Actions are considered, in Buddhist psychology, either skillful or unskillful—which is a little less judgmental sounding than good or bad, good or evil. The skillfulness or unskillfulness depends purely on the motivation, the mental states that accompany the intention that leads to the action. This is the area where I find it so subtle and so fascinating.

All thought, speech, and action comes from a volitional force. It's moved by a volitional force. And as the volitional force gets stronger, we move from thought to speech to deed. For example, the last time I was on retreat, for some reason the idea of wanting a pair of pink shoes came up and decided to hang around for several days. That's one level of volition—there was some wanting, some greed informing that thought when it would arise. The next strongest level would be coming out of retreat, going home, and telling my mother I wanted a pink pair of shoes. That's a stronger movement of volition, still motivated by greed. And then the third and strongest is when I get in the car and drive half an hour to some store to look around specifically for a pink pair of shoes.

Again, it's not a question of it being bad or wrong to want shoes, but simply to notice: what is the intention? What are the mental factors in the mind that are leading to this series of actions? In this case, the mental factor would be one of greed.

Now, it's also possible to perform the same series of actions without it being an unskillful action at all. If, for example, it's simply clear that your shoes are run down and you need to get a pair of shoes to walk, and it's done very simply, very straightforwardly as the obvious thing to do without a lot of wanting or greed in it, then that's fine. That's just an action of taking care of your needs.

This is what's so interesting about working with morality in this sense. The same action could be a very skillful, wholesome action, or it could be motivated by very unskillful, unwholesome qualities of mind. From the outside, someone else wouldn't necessarily be able to tell the difference. And that's where it becomes such an interesting and powerful practice for us—to begin paying attention to what we're doing in this way, to what's motivating our actions.

Another example of this: there is a sutta where a monk who was supposedly an arhat—which means completely enlightened and therefore incapable of acting out of hatred or avarice—was blind. Doing walking meditation back and forth in the forest, he was stepping on ants and killing them. Some monks were quite puzzled, upset about it, and went to the Buddha saying, "He's supposed to be an arhat and he's killing all these ants. It doesn't jive."

The Buddha said, "Yes, but his intention is completely pure. He has no way of knowing that there are ants there, and there's nothing in his intention that has anything to do with anger or hatred or wanting to kill." Whereas when we're walking, sometimes there's no way to avoid stepping on ants, or we simply can't see them. But there's also a time when one could be walking and there's a line of ants, and you could choose to go around it or just choose to go through it out of frustration or whatever. That's a completely different act. It's an act that has concomitance in the mind—the intention is motivated by some form of aversion. And so the same act can have quite different moral implications.

Another way of looking at it is when there's not actually any intent of aversion, but we might find ourselves conforming to rules of behavior—even the precepts, for example. Perhaps one takes them on here because it's what's expected, because it's what one is said to do, and the motive of taking them on could be out of a sense of wanting to be accepted. It could be out of a sense of deceit—that we do something, any kind of action, in order to fit in with society or to gain respect, when our actual feelings are that it's foolish, or we're actually looking down on that kind of behavior. There are all kinds of ways one can act where the outward behavior doesn't jive with the inner motivation. And so then the intention isn't skillful even though the acts might seem to be so.

But the good news about this is that we're very trainable. Human beings in this realm are very trainable. We're not just stuck with these confusing intentions in our mind that we can't always see. So even if we begin practicing sila, if we begin working with the precepts purely from an intention of wanting to belong, and there's not an inner sense of working with harmony or of wanting to train our minds, and we're using them totally as an outer reference—

I really feel like that's okay, because even at that level of bringing some sense of control, of non-harming to our actions, we begin to develop a great sense of power and control over our body and speech just by deliberately refraining from certain harmful actions and speech. And this sense of power leads to a calmness, a quietness of the mind and heart.

Think, for example, of the difference between when you've just had a big blowout with somebody—you've completely lost it and vented your frustration up and down—and then you come to sit. The mind is whirling with remorse, or if not remorse, with all the things you wish you'd said that you didn't think of at the time. Either way, you're whirling in anger. Having a cool and steady mind isn't very possible at that time.

When we've been working with the precepts, even just as an outer reference point, and we come to sit, that level of remorse and whirling mind simply isn't going to be as present, especially over time. That's actually one of the real values of a retreat situation, the way we have it set up here. Just by default, there are many things you can't do or say that you might have more temptation to do or say at another time. And so it's very helpful for developing calmness and steadiness of mind.

As we develop more calmness, as we continue to act in a way that shows great respect, a great sense of oneness with others—which is really what acting in accord with the precepts is, acting from a sense of our oneness with all beings—we actually begin to have enough quietness of mind to see and experience for ourselves that this is actually true. We experience more the effects of our actions. We experience more that sense of oneness with others, and the clarity and serenity that develops in us as we're not acting so much from rampant anger or greed or delusion.

Even starting out with a motivation that one might not think is so skillful will still lead to a development of the heart and a sense of power and purity. Then it becomes much easier to continue developing right action, because it begins to spring from our inner reference point, from our own experience. Little bells begin to go off when we're doing something out of harmony. And this in turn strengthens a sense of loving-kindness and compassion for others, and it's a powerful ground for the arising of wisdom.

So from dead conforming to an outer authority, it can become a very active participation in learning to live in inner and outer harmony. Very powerful.

What I want to do now is share some of my own thoughts and reflections, and those of others, on working specifically with some of these areas of morality, using the basic five precepts as a reference point. I find it so subtle that as the years go on, it's not nearly as straightforward as it sounded at first. But it's become fascinating, a very rich field of investigation.

In working with not killing, both here on retreat and in our daily life, I've had many experiences over the years of seeing that this isn't nearly as cut and dry as it sounds. Generally, most of us here figure that we're not into killing—human beings, we're not even talking about that, or larger animals. Even with insects, we can agree in principle that killing is not a good idea. We wouldn't want to do it.

But it's much more than just restraining from an aggressive act, a kind of passive sense of action. It expands from not killing to the whole field of non-harming, of including all beings in an active sense, an active understanding of moving from a place of non-harming, which is actively wishing other beings well. It comes around to the cultivation of loving-kindness.

As Robert Aitken says, "The practice of peace and harmony is peace and harmony, not some technique designed to induce them." So the way we work with it is simply in being in a situation: How can I relate to this being, to this situation, to myself, in a way that comes from peace and harmony, that will contribute to peace and harmony?

Even at the level of not killing, this can get much more complicated than it would seem. What about when one is working in gardens and bugs have decimated the garden? There are many inner decisions one has to make about how to work with that. Or cockroaches—we've had over the years varying degrees of infestations here, and hours and hours of discussions in board meetings about what to do. There's no sense of a right or wrong answer. I'm not trying to say what I think is right or wrong, because ultimately there's no one out there who can say, "This is the right thing to do." It's much more of a vital practice when we're connected inwardly with the external situation, the whole situation, seeing what motivates our decisions, what motivates our desires, how we want to act in that situation.

There's the story of a Zen center in Minneapolis, I think it was, that was becoming infested with cockroaches. The students went to the Roshi and said, "The cockroaches are so bad they're crawling all over people when they come into the Zendo to sit. People are stopping coming because it's too disgusting. What should we do? If we don't do something to kill the cockroaches, people will stop coming. But on the other hand, we don't want to kill."

And he said, "I'm not going to tell you what to do. You wouldn't be learning that way."

The real power of sila comes when we're acting from our own connection and understanding.

Similar here, once when I was manager at the center, we owned the house across the street but at the time we were renting it to a couple who had gone away for a while. They had cats, which I guess they'd given away or something. And the place became completely infested with fleas—to where I walked over to check it out, was there really no more than thirty seconds, walked out, and my legs were just covered with fleas. Clearly unlivable. And clearly we had the responsibility to make the house livable.

What do you do? What I did was call the exterminators. And I don't know if that was right or not. I just know that I had to really examine my motivation. There was certainly a sense of aversion to the fleas. There was also a sense of these people can't live here with it like that—so there was some compassion for the people living there. A lot of mix of motivations, and the need to make some kind of decision.

The other thing I find so interesting and helpful about this form of morality, the way it's passed down to us in Buddhism and the way I relate to it, is that each action becomes a field of learning. It's not as if, "Oh, I've broken the precept and that's it for my life, now I'm damned." Rather, if I'm willing to bring real care and attention to investigating the situation—my motivations and intentions, the results of my actions both outwardly and inwardly—then the whole thing becomes an opportunity. Is there a lot of remorse? Did I act too hastily? Do other possibilities suggest themselves later? We can use it as fodder for growth, for the development of compassion and insight and wisdom, rather than, "Well, that situation's done, I broke the precept, okay, forget it, on to the next." It's not separate like that.

And so there's also no necessity for self-blame, or for blaming someone else. Blame just doesn't have anything to do with it. It's much more about investigation, working with a sense of connectedness of the heart. What I've found is there's often no outside answer. No one else in that situation could have told me what was the right thing to do. It was clear that whatever anyone said was just their opinion. And then there was my opinion, and I was the one who had to act.

Some other questions come to my mind in working with this area of non-harming in our lives. Again, these are just questions—I'm not pretending to have any answers.

What are the implications in our minds, in our lives, of the violence in our culture? Of the violence in the movies that we watch? In the things that we choose to put into our minds, or the minds of our children? Is that an aspect of non-harming? Is it harmful to support the making of movies like that? I don't know. These are just questions that arise.

On the other hand, can we ignore that this is the kind of thing that goes on in the world—the degree of violence, the degree of drugs and crime—and just watch movies about Bambi so we don't have to put it in? Even Bambi has some harsh sequences in it. I don't know. These are things that I wrestle with.

What are the implications of living in a culture such as ours, that's so rich, that is using so much of the world's resources? I consider myself a part of that culture—I'm using so much of the world's resources. And is that at the expense of some of the countries where there's starvation and people are dying? Is that an area where I need to look at working with non-harming? And how far do we take it? Who can say where one draws the lines?

But I've found for myself, as the sense of non-harming becomes more and more imbued in me, so to speak—and certainly I have a long way to go—the implications of my actions seem to ripple out more and more in my awareness. I'm just aware of implications that I never would have even considered some years ago.

And how about killing through indifference? An example I've often used for myself: if I get in a bathtub or take a shower, if I don't have my glasses on and there's a little black dot on the floor, I can't tell if it's a piece of fuzz or if it's an ant or a roach or whatever. And if I just don't feel like bending down—then it's 50-50. It could be a bug, especially in some of the bathrooms around here. And there are times that I've turned the water on and seen this squiggle and seen that out of a basic laziness and indifference I've allowed something to be killed. And then I wonder, well, does my indifference to certain aspects of the environment help to kill the planet that we're living on? These are questions—I'm not saying this is true—but they're questions that come up in my mind.

So those are some of the things that come up for me around working with non-harm and the precept of not killing. And you can see that to really give attention to our actions in this way, it's much more than a blind kind of dead practice. We become very alive. In whatever we're doing, we're actually bringing mindfulness to our intentions, to our actions, in anything that we're doing. And our life becomes much more vital, much more connected, much more alive.

The second precept is working with not stealing. Again, as with all of them, it's much more than the passive act of not taking something that belongs to someone else. That's a good place to start, but it's much more than that. Again, it's intention. It's moving from an understanding of the oneness of all of us, beginning with understanding that that person likes that article, so I won't take it because I wouldn't like it if someone took what belonged to me.

But it's also cultivating a sense of inner contentment, of really seeing that the self and the world are just as they are in this moment. And in this moment, that's enough. This is a very powerful, very peaceful and connected way to live—much more than just a passive abstention from unskillful action.

And so it becomes not just about stealing objects. When we're working with this understanding of inner contentment, we see how much a sense of gaining, a gaining idea, permeates our experience. Stealing comes from a sense of inner poverty, of "I need something else in this moment to make things okay"—a sense of gaining, a sense of wanting. And in the moment that we're moving from that sense of gaining, we're actually stealing from ourselves the possibility of experiencing contentment in that moment. Stealing from ourselves the possibility of being able to appreciate what's here in this moment. Being able to even see the truth in this moment and appreciate that, because the mind is so busy moving out trying to gain something else.

I'll read this from the Tao Te Ching that expresses this very beautifully to me:

Fill your bowl to the brim and it will spill.
Keep sharpening your knife and it will blunt.
Chase after money and security and your heart will never unclench.
Care about people's approval and you will be their prisoner.
Do your work, then step back.
The only path to serenity.

This expresses very beautifully what the precept of not stealing, not gaining, is about.

So then again the possible ramifications of working in this way begin to come up into the mind. In our culture—we have a great culture for talking about these kinds of things, but I don't mean to imply that it's only in our culture—it seems though, how does advertising work? The whole point of it is to get our greed activated. If we happen to be feeling content, to do whatever possible to pull us out of that sense of contentment and make us want something else. Just read a magazine, look at the ads, go for a walk in a mall. And if you're just going to CVS to buy a toothbrush, on the way you pass racks and racks of clothes and shoes and records, all displayed so that you can hardly walk by without just being drawn in.

I've taken friends from India who hadn't been to this country before to a mall. And it's fascinating, also painful, to watch. Because to me it was like they were just manifesting what my mind does all the time. But we've been trained at least to restrain it a little because we're so bombarded. But it's like just a kid let loose in a candy store—oh my God, look at all this stuff! And hours and hours in stores.

Literally, one friend of mine spent five hours in a store like Kmart or something. Five hours just going around, looking at things. And it's stuff we're so glutted with that we could pass by now. But if we were taken into some really fancy store, we might do the same thing. It's just enacting the way our minds work. And so much of our culture is built on this. Is it stealing? Is it taking what is not given? Is it conducive to non-harming?

If our growing perception of our needs or our wants leads big corporations—that we support through buying from them—to take land and resources from other poorer countries and not really pay back what it's worth in a meaningful way... I don't know. And how far does one go in working in this way?

This is what Gandhi said about not stealing: "We are not always aware of our real needs, and most of us improperly multiply our wants and thus unconsciously make thieves of ourselves. If we devote some thought to the subject, we shall find that we can get rid of quite a number of our wants. One who follows the observance of non-stealing will bring about a progressive reduction of their own wants. Much of the distressing poverty in this world has arisen out of the breaches of the principle of non-stealing."

Again, it's certainly not my intention to make us guilty or wrong, or to suggest we should all throw up what we're doing, turn off the heat, and just wear a lot more clothes until it's sub-freezing. I'm not saying that. I'm simply bringing up areas for our own internal investigation—how much of what I want is actually necessary.

And again, it's not about coming down as an outer authority with a club and saying, "Right, you don't need this, you don't need this," and then just sitting there a mass of craving because you're not letting yourself have something. That's not it. That's not where wisdom is going to come from. It's much more about examining that movement of craving, that movement of wanting, and seeing how that movement itself is what takes us away from the experience of inner contentment, from the experience of peace and the ability to see clearly.

So in working with our outer actions through abiding by the precepts, we might actually begin to find—if we do it with awareness, paying attention to the results and our own inner experience—that we do begin to cultivate a much deeper sense of inner contentment and harmony. And that gives us the clarity, the space, the peace to actually begin to see and appreciate the truth of the moment. It's only when we're able to appreciate and even be with the truth of the moment that any kind of liberating insight can arise. As long as we're busy trying to get something else, that's impossible.

Just a little about the other three precepts, for the sake of time. The third one, not misusing sex—of course here for the course of a retreat one is celibate. I just want to say that this is not out of a sense of rejecting sexual energy or looking on it with aversion. But in working with sexual energy outside of a retreat, it comes back again to intention. What is the intention of our acts? Are we moving out of a sense of non-harming, of caring and connection? Are we respecting and honoring our own commitments and other people's commitments? Are we using our sexual energy for a sense of personal power, or to feed a loneliness, or just for fun?

This is not to say this is right and this is wrong, but to use the area of relationship—the area of sexuality—as a very powerful, very important area of learning and understanding. And again, coming back to the motivation, to the intentions in our action.

Here, when we're just sitting, not acting in that way at all, we have the opportunity to simply see what arises in the mind and appreciate the power of that energy. It can be very powerful. As our mindfulness develops and strengthens, we might begin to see aspects of our intention, our desire, that maybe we wouldn't see if we had the opportunity to act. Because it's such a strong energy that—God knows—it's really easy to get involved without seeing everything we're doing clearly. In fact, I don't know too many people who've ever gotten involved with someone else who did see everything about their intentions clearly. It would amaze me if someone told me they had. But here we just get to sit and look at it. A lot can be learned about our motivations and intentions in this area—again, not as a judgment, not as "I'm such a bad person," but just to see the power of the mental factors that drive us, both skillful and unskillful ones.

And again, in working with the precepts, the baseline is not bringing harm to anyone. Often I feel that in working in the area of sexuality, we sometimes forget that in not bringing harm to anyone involved, that also includes ourselves—we're one of the people involved.

The fourth precept, right speech, has several factors to it, several areas. Very, very interesting. And I find in some ways one of the most difficult areas to work with, because we talk so much. I personally find it so hard to be aware of the intention of my speech before it's out of my mouth. I often don't know what I'm going to say until it's out of my mouth. So I find a lot of the practice of right speech is in the actual investigation—sometimes prior to what I say, or during what I say, or after what I say. But again, not as a way to make yourself wrong or bad.

If we can begin to look at these areas as interesting, as investigations, rather than as another way to prove what a rotten person we are, then it becomes much more workable. When we're working with wrong speech and we say, "Oh no, I blew it again," and that becomes another way to beat ourselves up, it's very hard to continue to investigate with any kind of clarity.

The first part and perhaps the most powerful aspect of right speech is of course not lying. Just recently I was part of a retreat that we did in the city—a non-residential nine-day retreat where people would come and sit all weekend but go home at night. Then during the week they would work all day and come to the center to sit every night from six-thirty to ten. As a daily life practice, while people were working during the week, we were all working on the area of right speech.

And we took a different part of it to look at in our day each day, and then we would discuss it when we came together in the evening. Really interesting discussions.

And this one of not lying—I think all of us were a little cocky. "I don't lie. I mean, I don't go around lying to people. I know that." I think we all, no one said it, but I just have a feeling we all thought that. And when we came together to talk about it that first evening, it was amazing. It was so interesting because on some level, in some way, I don't think there was one of us there who hadn't lied. And many levels of subtlety to lying were brought out in the discussion.

First, a couple of people knew that they had lied very consciously because they felt it was required in their job. They were salespeople for a computer firm, and they felt that their job required them to color what they were trying to sell so people would buy it. And they really felt that they were telling outright lies, and that was just the way that the job went. Really interesting, and a lot of nods around the room. "Yeah, that's what it's like. That's what the job is like." That, I have to say, surprised me because I've been living in this environment for so long. But I imagine that's not so unusual.

Other people brought out how they felt they lied through their actions—that they were sitting at work pretending to be really busy so no one would bother them, and actually they weren't doing a thing.

This one I strongly related to. I myself had been in a situation where I knew something about a friend that I was not allowed to tell—he didn't want anyone else to know it. And another friend asked me a point-blank question that specifically spoke to what I knew. It required a yes or no answer. And to say, "Well, I know but I can't disclose it" would have also given the answer. So I told an outright lie. And what was interesting was I didn't really quite get it at that moment that I was telling a lie. I didn't really quite get it until we were talking about it that night. Really, it was quite humbling.

And then, of course, all the gradations of colorations of truth—whether in the way we describe a conversation that we had with someone else to a third party. How strong is the temptation to just slightly exaggerate what one said? Just subtly shift it so that you come off sounding much more wise and balanced than one really was. Or if your tendency is to put yourself down, you come off sounding like more of a jerk than you really were. Just these subtle gradations. Or a slight exaggeration of something for effect, to make a better story.

And what's the motivation behind these subtle colorations of the truth? It seems really minor and passes by unnoticed quite often. When I start really paying attention to it, sometimes it's appalling actually how easily these subtle colorations can slip out of my mouth. But it's really interesting to just stop—for me to just stop and examine, well, what was the point of that? And often I can see there was some need to protect an image I hold of myself, or wanting to project a certain image onto somebody else of what I want them to think I am. Sometimes it's got nothing to do with me and it just makes a better story. And in telling a better story, it might be at the expense of some other person who's in the story.

Or even if it doesn't involve a person at all, when I watch the tendency to just subtly color or exaggerate, I find that the effect it has on my mind is of slightly less respect for the power of truth. It's like in that moment somehow I'm not quite willing to be fully present with the truth just as it is in this moment. And that willingness to be present with the truth is in some ways the base root of the practice. I mean, the practice is about seeing the truth, accepting it just as it is in this moment, however it is. And I can see how the tendency of my mind to want to just change it a little bit so it's a little more comfortable or a little more interesting—I can see that tendency of mine working in my meditation practice. When one gets really still and is noting, there's a subtle "I don't really want to note that one, I'd much rather note this one." Which things does the mind choose to pay attention to? And why? And really important, looking at the why.

Other areas of speech—harsh speech. Again, a very tricky area, because it's not to deny that anger arises.

But again, it's the motivation. Moving from a sense of oneness. How do we speak to other people? Is our intention one of making ourselves right? Making someone else wrong? What's the effect when we talk in a harsh way, a sarcastic way? I tend to use sarcasm a lot, and when I really look, the intention might be to get a cheap laugh at the expense of somebody else. It's subtle, but it's there.

The same applies to other aspects of speech: divisive speech, fault-finding, gossip. Obviously we would agree we don't want to put people down. We're not here to find fault with people—that's obviously some unskillful motivation. But even gossip, which can be rampant... it's so frequent that I find myself in conversations that are about other people. And often not putting other people down, not with any intention of saying we're right and they're wrong. But it's entertainment. It starts from genuine interest, and I'm working in the area now of watching when the genuine interest moves into an area of entertainment. If I pay attention inwardly, the whole feeling of my relationship to the conversation shifts at that moment. And it doesn't feel wholesome. It's just a feeling of kind of tightness, of dullness, a slight unpleasantness. It doesn't feel wholesome.

If I continue in that vein, when I come out of the conversation, I'm feeling much heavier, much less clear. And every once in a while I can not only notice this but actually stop having the conversation—which is really nice to know that that's possible.

I've also noticed several times in conversations with close friends where it somehow drifted into subtly saying slight negative things about someone. They were true but not really necessary. And I noticed it and just came in and said something positive that was also true. I was amazed because I found that what that did was just end the conversation absolutely. Oh right, it was over. It was kind of strange—really seeing how that negative energy was kind of feeding on itself in a way that was of no benefit to anyone, especially to me and the person in the conversation.

Again, the sense of oneness, the sense of non-harming. There's no way to put down other people and not have that affect oneself. The person that one's harming the most, the one bringing the most pain and the most confusion to, is really oneself.

This is a contemporary way of talking about the precept of right speech. I want to share these Tiep Hien precepts, which came from a group of social workers in Vietnam who were working with Thich Nhat Hanh during the Vietnam War. They formed a kind of lay order—not monks, but a lay order of engaged Buddhism. These precepts are based on the Buddhist precepts, but they also include other aspects of working with the mind, of working with morality in an engaged way. I'm not going to read them all, just these two that have to do with right speech. I really appreciate them because they offer a contemporary way of grappling with these aspects in the world.

Number eight: Do not utter words that can create discord and cause the community to break. All efforts should be made to reconcile and resolve all conflicts, however small they may be.

Number nine: Do not say untruthful things for the sake of personal interest or to impress people. Do not utter words that cause division and hatred. Do not spread news that you do not know to be certain. Do not criticize and condemn things that you are unsure of. Always speak truthfully and constructively. Have the courage to speak out about situations of injustice, even when it may threaten your own safety.

So it's what is true and what is useful.

The fifth precept I won't really go into, but obviously in taking intoxicants that cloud the mind, it becomes very difficult to pay attention to these subtleties of our intention and motivation in the other areas of morality. It's just so much easier to do things that are unskillful, that are harmful to ourselves and others, when our mind is clouded.

We just become heedless.

As we continue to perform wholesome deeds, our actions begin to flow more and more from our own inner understanding. They come less from a motive of personal gain—"if I do this, then I'll have a better rebirth, then I'll get enlightened, then people will like me," whatever it might be. They come less and less from any personal motive, and more and more from a sense of loving-kindness, compassion, and connectedness between all beings. And then the actual purpose does become leading to freedom, to emancipation.

The practice of sila in this way becomes a very powerful purification of our mind and body. It prepares the groundwork for the deeper purifications that come through the practice of concentration and the development of wisdom.

What we call defilements are actually these powerful mental forces of greed and anger, confusion, envy. The really strong forces—the ones that lead us to what are called the defilements of transgression, to perform truly harmful acts like killing someone—these are overcome through our work with morality, with sila. We can become purified to the extent that we won't do these anymore.

But as you sit here, you'll see that these mental forces can come up in another way. The forces of greed, the forces of anger—they'll come up over and over and over as you sit here, in what is called the obsessive defilements. And that's where the power of concentration comes in, because the power of concentration overcomes these obsessive defilements. And that allows us to begin to see what's happening in this moment. And that can lead to the arising of wisdom, which can uproot these forces altogether.

So this practice of sila will lay the groundwork for the practice of our meditation, and hopefully for our further purification, growth, and understanding.

Let's sit for a couple of minutes.

CHAPTER 3

The Power of Mindfulness

Carol Wilson · 49 min

> In this talk from the 1989 Three Month Retreat, Carol Wilson begins by reflecting on the Dalai Lama receiving the Nobel Peace Prize, using it as an entry point to explore what genuine peace means and how our meditation practice moves us toward that embodiment. She then examines the profound power of mental conditioning—how our minds filter and distort perception on unconscious levels, screening out anxiety-provoking stimuli before they even reach awareness.
> Wilson draws on psychological research to illustrate how greed creates tunnel vision, aversion leads to denial and avoidance, and delusion maintains our identification with constructed self-images. She explains how mindfulness (sati) serves as the antidote to these filters, describing it as "observing power" that springs forward to meet each arising experience without hesitation, anticipation, or manipulation.
> The talk details specific qualities of mindfulness: seeing objects as they arise without choice or clinging; perceiving bare experience rather than concepts and interpretations; meeting all phenomena with non-violence and loving acceptance; and penetrating deeply rather than superficially observing. Wilson emphasizes four key protections mindfulness offers: freedom from heedlessness, protection from the distortions of the kilesas, direct access to truth through personal experience, and the natural extension of this protection to all beings we encounter. She concludes with Solzhenitsyn's insight that true liberation must begin within one's own soul.

This morning there was a most inspiring piece of news, a rare event: this year the Nobel Peace Prize has been awarded to the Dalai Lama.

It was really so moving. I still get chills just talking about it. What it said to me was that, not just for his peace efforts in Tibet, but that somehow he is the embodiment of what it really means to be at peace, as far as I can tell—which is kind of what our work here is all about. And it felt like somehow this is a recognition that the world is in some way coming to recognize the value and the power of this. It's kind of hard for me to talk about, but it moved me a lot and I wanted to share it with you.

So, in talking about the level of peace that someone like the Dalai Lama, at least from our projections of watching him, has attained, and knowing that our intentions and our firm commitment is also working in this direction, and yet still seeing how much our minds continue to be caught in distortions of perception—even though we may have had very clear insights into the painful and distorting natures of greed, hatred, and delusion. We really know it. And then we turn around and we're acting from that again. The mind is caught in that mode again.

So I want to talk a little bit about the power of conditioning. We need to really respect this—not to look at it as though there's some problem with us that we haven't understood, but to recognize that the power of this is immense, and we'll be touching on it throughout the whole retreat. I'm just introducing it a little now. And then I want to explore how the power of mindfulness works to begin to help us see through these distortions, how we can actually use specific ways of employing mindfulness in our practice, and what mindfulness actually means.

A book I read not long ago I found fascinating as regards the power of conditioning, of distorting perceptions in our mind. So often it's not as if we have a conscious choice; the perceptions are distorted on an unconscious level. Certain things never even reach our consciousness—they've been filtered out way before. This book comes from a scientific, psychological perspective, and the author gives a few examples of experiments that have been conducted to show this.

The first, not an experiment but a story, shows how on a physical level we can block the perception sometimes of great pain in a situation where to actually feel that amount of pain would possibly mean the difference between surviving and not surviving. He tells a story of Livingstone—Stanley or Livingstone, one of the two—who wrote this himself. He was being mauled by a lion, conscious, and he lived through it. In recounting it later, he said he just did not feel pain at that time.

Probably most of you have times in your own life you can think of—I know I can—when I've been in accidents and at the moment of impact felt no pain at all, to the point where I could bounce up and be on the side of the road in a tenth of a second, out of harm's way, and within two minutes was unable to move an arm and a leg. Somehow it's like a survival mechanism. The perception of the pain doesn't get through to consciousness.

The author takes this a step further, talking about how the mind seems to be able to screen perceptions so that certain stimuli—now more in the psychological realm—perceived as threatening, anxiety-provoking, or really in some cases maybe literally life-threatening, are also screened out. They never reach consciousness.

Here are a couple of examples. One deals more with the quality of mind of grasping, of one-pointedness on something. Some people were asked to watch about four minutes of a video of a very fast basketball game and were given the assignment to count how many times the ball was passed back and forth. It was very active, and they did that. In the middle of this video, through the court, a woman strolled dressed in white with a white parasol. She just kind of strolled in one side and out the other. At the end, people reported how many times the ball had been passed. No one commented on this woman. In fact, when told about it, they couldn't believe it had happened. They just hadn't seen it. They had to watch it again. Amazing.

The second experiment deals more with stimuli that would provoke anxiety.

And so they showed the subjects different pictures. The pictures had different things in them, but the one that I remember had about half of the picture showing something innocuous—a man reading a newspaper. And then the other half was something sexually suggestive and obviously not fitting with the other part of the picture.

The people were asked to look at the pictures—there were several of them—and then later describe what the pictures were of, what they could remember. But the second trick that the investigators had was some kind of device that could measure where the eyeball looked when viewing the pictures. So they could know not only if someone later said they forgot, but they could also see where their eyes had actually traveled.

People for whom the sexual images were anxiety-provoking or upsetting, when they reported on the pictures, would often just say, "Well, there's a picture of a man reading a newspaper." But what they could measure was that the eyeball had never even looked at the part of the picture that was anxiety-provoking.

How? God knows. But somehow there is a way of pre-screening ahead of time. If this is taken in, it's going to provoke anxiety, so we won't even take it in.

So we wonder why we're living with distorted perceptions, why we feel out of touch and disconnected. We don't know what's going on half the time. We're living with these filters, these distortions on our conscious perception—blind spots in our experience. Certain things we have selective memory for; we just don't remember. Selective perception. We just don't allow the perception into consciousness. And when I say we don't allow it, I don't mean to imply that this is some kind of conscious, willful decision. This is operating on very subtle levels. But it's no wonder that we feel out of touch and wonder why things don't quite work.

These filters—these are the afflictions, the kilesas, whatever word we want to use. The most predominant, strongest ones are greed and hatred or aversion, fear, the forms of that. And identification, the confusion, delusion.

When aversion is the operant filter, the way we relate can take many forms: avoidance, outright denial, not even letting it in like I was describing. Just blocking what our experience is. I've seen it done in a way where a person is outright denying that they're perceiving what they're perceiving in front of their eyes.

Once when I was in a hospital, I'd been there a few days and they'd been doing a lot of tests. I was kind of at the end of whatever equanimity I had. They were trying to do some procedure that, had they done it the first time, wouldn't have been that painful, but for some reason they couldn't do it. So about the fourth time, the nurse couldn't handle it anymore and called in a doctor. I knew I was in trouble then, because nurses can usually do these things better than doctors. And so he was digging in my arm, and I started crying. He looked at me and said, "What's your problem? This doesn't hurt."

I thought, whoa. That's the most blatant form of denial. And I understood—he couldn't handle that he was hurting me.

Or how often I've seen in relationships where some part of that relationship is so important to me, or perceived as so important, that there is complete denial in my mind of many aspects that are painful, difficult, not working. Only when the relationship actually breaks up and I have nothing to protect anymore do I wake up and say, "My God, I thought it was a perfect relationship, and look at all this stuff. We couldn't even talk." And that's true. It's hard to believe that one could have been so blind—until the next time it happens again.

Greed works differently. It's that tunnel vision, like the people watching the basketballs pass back and forth. When greed is operant, we see the object of what we want. Everything else is either ignored or in the way.

And then identification—and each of these is topics and topics in itself. Identification is identifying any facet of our experience as solid me, unchanging I, something core, a root part of our existence. This is delusion. When we're operating from these skewed perceptions, we're operating from delusion. We're out of touch with our experience, and we continue to suffer, not really quite knowing why.

So this is where mindfulness comes in, luckily for us. As I was reading this book, I kept thinking, "Oh, mindfulness is definitely the cure for this." Because the key to wisdom is being able to see, to experience the actuality of what's happening here and now, just as it is in this moment—not being hindered by our defenses, by our wants, by our anxieties, our expectations.

And the key tool for seeing what's happening here and now is the quality of mindfulness, as we practice and develop it—because it does take a great deal of practice and development.

As mindfulness grows, its light shines equally on each arising aspect of our experience, without discrimination. After a while, as each thing simply arises, we begin to perceive previously submerged aspects of our experience, because there's no discrimination going on. We're not heading toward one thing and keeping away something else, but just meeting whatever arises with a fullness of attention. We begin to see the filters themselves. And when we see them, they become simply another object to pay attention to, rather than some dark force driving our life.

This develops a wonderful spaciousness of mind, great equanimity, great acceptance. The Buddha said that there is no higher happiness than peace. And as we continue to work in this way, we start to get a taste of what that means—a real peace that's not dependent on having our environment be a certain way. We begin to stop trying to control things so busily, trying to order our experience so that the unpleasant stays away and the pleasant comes. We begin to greet all things equally, really learning that peace is not dependent on what experience we're having, but completely dependent on our relationship to that experience.

This is something I feel I can't say enough. I'm saying it to myself as well as to you. It doesn't matter what object is arising in consciousness. It's the relationship to it, the quality of meeting it with mindfulness—with spacious, open, active attention. That's what's important. And that's where understanding will arise from.

I want to discuss some of the qualities of mindfulness as we work with it here in this meditation retreat. The Buddha said that mindfulness is the greatest protection we have in life, and it's also the only protection we need. It protects us in many ways. One of them is that it protects us from being heedless—that way we drift through life as if asleep, not really quite aware of what's happening.

So often, when I'm sitting and my mind finally gets quiet, there arises this sense of loss from so many things that have gone by that I wasn't really present for. Almost every time I visit my family, I go with these great commitments about how present I'm going to be, how loving. And then when I leave, this always happens—I have this sense of remorse for just being heedless in many ways, just not being present.

Outside of retreat, it so often takes a major event to wake us up from this heedlessness. Hearing of Dipa Ma's death this year—actually, that was the strongest effect it had on me. A sense of this wonderful, loving being, and now she's just not here, in the snap of a finger. It woke me up to all the little moments of my life, to simply being present for what's happening now. I know we all have moments like this, over and over.

Mindfulness also has the power to wake us up in this way, very strongly. And it doesn't always take the death of a loved one or something equally traumatic. You know those moments when you walk outside and see a leaf turning red, and it's so exquisite, so beautiful. Or you're drinking a cup of tea, and somehow you're really drinking that cup of tea. You've never tasted a cup of tea—one sip of tea—that was so wonderful. Later you think, "Well, it's just old chamomile. I've had that a million times." This is the quality of heedfulness—being able to be with what's happening in the moment and really appreciate it for what it is. The power of mindfulness, simplicity, slowing down, and the very deliberate practice of attention.

In those moments when experience is so vivid and so exquisite, what's happening is that we're seeing without the filters. We're able to appreciate the moment for just what it is—not needing it to be something else, not trying to get away from it, not spacing out because it's not interesting enough, but just settling in and being there, the way it is.

So that's one way mindfulness protects us. It protects us from heedlessness by bringing clarity of vision, simplicity of mind to our experience—the ability to appreciate what's happening just for what it is.

Often when we talk about mindfulness in conversation, there can be a tendency to think of the actual experience as kind of generic awareness. "I'm aware of this, I'm aware of that. When I walk down the street, I'm aware that I'm walking. I'm aware that I'm going to the lunch line. I'm aware that I'm hungry." We use awareness quite loosely, often interchangeably with mindfulness. But mindfulness is really much more specific and has very particular qualities. The translation we've been using a lot for mindfulness is "observing power." To me, that gives a kind of gestalt feeling.

of what the energy of mindfulness is really like. It's an observing power.

I want to list a few of the qualities of mindfulness, and if you could, when I'm talking about them, also try to listen in an experiential way. See if you can get in touch with how these energies manifest in yourself, because while I'm putting this into words, it's really an active experience. Each moment that observing power meets an object, there's a very concrete experiential phenomenon occurring. I'm trying to use a lot of words to explain that.

The first quality of mindfulness—and I'm speaking now in terms of working in the retreat format—is this seeing of the object that's arising into consciousness just as it arises, as it is. In other words, it's as if you're sitting and a sense of tingling arises. In that moment, it's as if the noting mind, the consciousness, springs up to meet that object without hesitation and without anticipation, either one. There's this very active sense of object and observing power, mindfulness, coming together.

If there's hesitation—a slight sense of, even though it's not time to put it into words, "Well, I don't want to go to that tingling now, maybe it'll wait, maybe I'll go back to the breath"—usually that hesitation is the movement of the distortions, of the afflictions, some sense of choice. Either it's nice and I want to pay attention to that, or I'll wait until something better comes along, or there's that real subtle, unconscious wanting to avoid certain things that might cause anxiety. Springing up to meet the object without hesitation means there's no choice involved, no thinking involved. It's just an active but non-judging movement. Object and noting mind come together. There's an active, energetic quality.

There's also no sense of clinging to whatever sensation or experience is happening. Not "Well, this is kind of interesting, I should see it through to the end even though something else has arisen and is more predominant." Something else arises, and the noting mind rises up to meet it. There's no clinging to the first object. Also no sense of anticipating—"Let's hurry up and get through this one so we can get to one that might be more interesting." There's a full, active participation in whatever experience is arising, and an equal ability to just let it go and move just as fully to the next experience.

That's one reason using the breath as a primary object can be so helpful. If you ever find yourself in a state where you're not sure which object is predominant, or where to go, or you're starting to get confused—rather than trying to figure it out, which unless you're in a very clear state is almost certainly going to lead into some greed or some anger, almost certainly going to be colored a little bit by that—just go back to the breath so that there's not a sense of really having to choose at all. Confusion? Note confusion, back to the breath.

Sometimes, perhaps many of us have experienced, there are times when working with noting, with mindfulness in general, with this quality of not hesitating but springing up to meet the object, it's almost as if we experience a fear and hold back just a little bit. Almost as if we're afraid to put that level of commitment, that level of surrender, into the observing power. There could be many reasons why we're holding back. Fear that I can't do it. Fear of what might happen if we really surrender into the process. Fear of what we might see. Lots of different reasons.

I just want to bring this up because in the slight holding back, that little bit of space gives room for doubt, gives room for the thinking mind to expand, gives room for proliferation. And again, it tends to lead toward more confusion. Whereas when we work —and it takes practice; it's not that you just sit down and immediately you're going to see everything arising the moment it's arising; I'm not implying that—but our willingness to continue that active engagement, as we do that object after object and we miss fewer and fewer objects, the mindfulness becomes very sharp and powerful. We really begin to see at much deeper levels what's going on.

The second aspect of mindfulness, which we've talked about a lot, is that it enables us to see the bare experience—what's actually going on—as opposed to taking the concept, the interpretations of the experience, to be the truth. It's about seeing directly, without the veil of interpretation.

We all know this. We all know the difference between noting "hearing" when you hear the bell ring, and thinking, "Oh, that's the bell ringing. It's time for the sitting to end." And even though we all know it, the concepts can be so subtle or so insidious, or we're so identified with them, so used to seeing them, that it can sometimes be very hard to separate out the concept from the bare experience.

Just to give a very common example: if you're following the breath, rising and falling, and the experience of it is very tight, very tense, very unpleasant and pressured—

And each breath, the thoughts that are going on: "Oh, this is because I'm such a rigid, controlling, ungenerous person. This is just the proof of it." Each falling: "God, I can't believe how rigid I am." And it's so hard sometimes to just know tightness, tension. Each breath becomes proof of how unworthy we are to be in a meditation environment, to live on the planet, to have friends—it just goes on and on.

And when it's not seen clearly, which it often isn't, that movement of aversion to the tension leads into that concept of what a rotten person we are. And that judgment, that aversion unseen, leads into a world of proliferation, so that by the end of the sitting you've gone over every ungenerous, unkind thing you ever did in your life and expanded on it and pretty much got an image set in concrete of what you are.

We all do this over and over. And when you finally say, "Oh, this is just tension, and this is aversion, and this is interpreting," it's so freeing. But it's so tricky, because we turn around and it happens again. So not to put ourselves down for it, but the power of mindfulness—this being able to cut through and be with the bare sensation—noting is really helpful in situations like this. We're able to note the sensation as it is: tightness. And the fact that there's aversion to it: aversion. And the fact that there's a concept forming about who we are. It doesn't necessarily need to go any further. And even if it does, we're not so lost in delusion. We're knowing that this is sensation, this is aversion, this is interpretation and image building. We're connected with what's happening.

So it's not to discard the use of concepts, but to tell the difference. And the more we work with developing the power of mindfulness, the more we find that it's much easier to get in touch with the actual experience in a moment. It's much easier to see how much of the suffering we're undergoing is coming about from an interpretation that might or might not have anything to do with what our experience actually is.

In this way, observing power mindfulness protects us from getting lost in the delusions and confusions created by the mind, by interpretation. We begin to actually relate in our lives to what's actually happening. It's quite a unique event sometimes, and things become so much simpler, so much less troublesome. We're back to being able to appreciate much more when we're relating to what's actually happening and not lost in the veils of interpretation.

Mindfulness protects us in this way because when we're really mindful of what's happening—whether it's tension, whether it's aversion, whether it's the breath—when that power of the observing mind springs forward to meet the object, in that moment there's no room for overwhelming greed or hatred or confusion to arise and overpower the mind. The mind and the object are coming together so completely that there's no space for the defilements, the afflictions, to arise and to overpower as they do.

So that's why we're always going on about really connecting with the object. That's also why continuity is so important, because each moment that we let up the mindfulness, there is room for the distortions of wanting, the distortions of aversion, the distortions of identification to arise. And they're so powerful. They're such habitual reactions of mind that, basically, given an opportunity to arise, these things do arise. They're just so strongly conditioned.

But it's also important, I feel, not to underestimate the power of those moments when the mindfulness is clear, when you feel there's a real connection, there's just the experiencing of an object directly as it is. A clear experience of the breath. A time when you walk outside and the tree is just so vivid—there's nothing in that moment but the experience of seeing, of tree-ness. In those moments of close connection, the distortions, the filters aren't there.

Those moments are important because in the moment of mindfulness, it's a moment of purification, for just that reason. The distortions of greed, hatred, and delusion aren't arising in that moment. It's breaking the conditioning, the power of the afflictions arising. And that's really important. It kind of breaks the chain, even if just for a moment. But each moment that we're deconditioning or reconditioning the responses of the mind is really valuable. So I just like to put it out that it might seem like no big deal, but it is an important part of the practice. Those moments really count.

This sense of purification comes about, this sense of having no space for the greedy mind, for the hating mind to arise—it's not from an energy of repression. It's not from a violent pushing away of these energies. So the next quality of observing power is that it's totally non-violent, non-manipulative, non-controlling. It's a quality of mind that, although quite active, is not trying to change the experience in any way whatsoever—only trying to be there, meet it, accept it very fully and very actively, but accepting it just as it is.

It's been said that spiritual practice consists in reaching out and embracing all life fearlessly with an open heart. And this is the quality that we bring to connecting with each object in our experience, no matter what it is—embracing it fearlessly with an open heart. So observing power has this spirit of kindness, of metta even, to each thing that arises, to oneself. A quality of great spaciousness of mind, a quality like

Like last night, just as it was getting dark, I was walking outside and in the darkening sky—I know some of you saw it—there was a really beautiful crescent moon and the evening star. Exquisite. It was so beautiful.

As I was standing there, I realized I was kind of focusing on the crescent moon and the star, and suddenly my mind just did a flip and I became aware of all the space around them, the whole space of the sky. That's the quality of mind that goes with observing power—the space that is present for anything that comes into it. It doesn't try to change it. It doesn't manipulate. It doesn't push away. It has no choice. But it cradles, it holds whatever arises into the space. And then it lets it go when it's time for it to go.

This is the quality of mind that we can bring to mindfulness, to observing. It allows the whole range of experience to come and go without a problem. Real sweetness and openness.

Sometimes a specific concept—there are a hundred million, but I just want to talk about this one—gets in our way of being able to meet whatever arises with this non-manipulative, loving quality. That concept is our ideas about what good practice looks like. If we think we know what good practice looks like—whether it's from another sitting we've had, whether it's from anything any of us say, whether it's from the person you've picked out who walks so incredibly mindfully that you've decided that's good practice, you make up what's going on in their mind and then know that's good practice—whatever it's from, once that idea is ingrained and not seen, it makes it really hard to embrace our experiences that don't come anywhere close to meeting our ideas of good practice. And so then we're in conflict.

I mention this because it's one that we all get trapped in a lot. Just notice if that's operating. Notice that—another concept. Embrace that concept and then don't let it undermine the ability to meet whatever's happening with real openness, real non-violence, a loving quality.

Another quality of mindfulness is that it's not superficial. It's very penetrating. When we're talking about aiming at the object and sustaining the attention, this non-superficiality means that the mind springs forward, meets the object, and then completely immerses itself in it. It's not a sense of holding back, not a sense of jumping over to the next. Sayadaw U Pandita uses the example of when you pour water into a glass—it doesn't just stay in one part of the glass, it covers the whole glass. That's the quality of mindfulness, just really sinking into whatever's happening. Not a casual glance and on to the next. And this develops as we work.

To work with all of these qualities that I've been talking about, it's very important to develop the quality of right balance of effort. The quality of learning to aim at whatever is arising in the mind and then springing forward to meet it with an appropriate amount of energy. It takes a lot of experimentation to learn, and it changes all the time—how to modulate the amount of energy we use. We talk about shooting an arrow at a target: you have to aim it, and you also have to shoot it with the proper amount of force.

It's possible often not to have enough energy, and we just kind of note an object, kind of observe it, and things get vaguer and vaguer. The other possibility is that we're using so much force and so much effort—and most of the way I've been talking tonight, I keep talking about springing up, really springing forward, meeting the object—it's possible to do that with so much force and energy that you get really knotted up, rigid and tight, and you're not really meeting the object. You're more trying to club it to death.

It's working with a balance between the active meeting and, when that's too forceful, a quality of alert receptivity. In that space, if you find you're using too much force, it can be helpful to move back into the analogy of the mind being like space—open, receptive, yet very alert. But rather than pushing forward to meet the experience, in that alert receptivity the experience rises up to meet the consciousness. As soon as it rises up, the alert part is to acknowledge it, note it, be with it. But it's not such a striving, pushing quality.

And for all of this, of course, patience is absolutely necessary. Patience and patience and endless patience. Because how many objects arise into our experience in one sitting? And how many times do we space out in one sitting—never mind going through the whole day? And that's okay. That's fine.

It's just this quality of working with continuity, especially this quality of patience. It doesn't matter what's happening. But as soon as we're aware that we've been gone for ten minutes and we wake up, there's something to come back to—whether it's the breath, whether it's your hand feeling the fork in your hand, whether you're bringing a cup to your lips, whether you're flushing the toilet. It doesn't matter what. There's something to come back to: the actual, concrete experience.

And the patience is just the willingness to come back a hundred million times, over and over. That very willingness to come back is strengthening the power of mindfulness, the power of concentration. It actually is part of the practice, not something we have to endure in order to get somewhere. We can look at those moments as equally important as any other moment.

Let me run through the four protections I've named that I feel are very valuable, very powerful—what mindfulness offers us.

One is that when we're working with mindfulness, we're protected from heedlessness, from walking through life in a daze, from not knowing what we're doing.

A moment of mindfulness protects us from being lost in the distortions of greed, hatred, and delusion.

It enables us to see the truth for ourselves. In some ways, I feel this is the most powerful one, because what we've seen, what we've understood for ourselves, nobody can take away from us. No one can say it's not true. Mindfulness enables us to connect with, to experience the actuality of just this moment and just this moment. That's what sets the conditions for liberating insight to arise.

And the final protection is that, as is often said, in protecting ourselves we protect all others. We're not doing this in isolation. As these protections grow, as we begin to grow in wisdom and understanding—as Thich Nhat Hanh says, without understanding we are unable to love—so as we grow in understanding through the power of mindfulness, it's just spontaneous that the power of mettā and compassion grow as well. This protection that's growing in ourselves flows out, affects how we relate to the world, to other beings. It affects ourselves and everyone else we come in contact with. We're not separate from society. And so it's really a very powerful protection.

Just as once we've experienced and understood the truth for ourselves no one can take it away, also no one can give it to us. We have to come to these understandings for ourselves. We have to do the work for ourselves, in whatever form we're doing it. No one else can do it for us.

We can take the Dharma as our refuge, and also take your own practice, take yourself, your experience as a refuge. No one else can give you freedom, just as no one can take it away. What we're doing here is really powerful, very important.

Alexander Solzhenitsyn wrote in The Gulag Archipelago, talking about the day of liberation when people who had been in the prison camps under Stalin were released. He says: "The day of liberation—as if it were possible to liberate anyone who has not first become liberated in their own soul."

And I would add that it's also impossible to take away the freedom of anyone who's been liberated in their own soul.

So hopefully, that's what we're working on here.

CHAPTER 4

Delusion and Ignorance

Carol Wilson · 54 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines the nature of ignorance (avijjā) and delusion (moha) as the root causes of suffering. She explains how papañca—the mind's tendency toward proliferation—transforms simple experiences into elaborate constructions that obscure reality, and how the kilesas (afflictions of greed, hatred, and delusion) distort even our most basic perceptions. Drawing on the teaching that all difficulties stem from mistaken perception, she explores how we habitually misperceive ourselves as permanent, separate, and autonomous beings.
> Wilson offers practical guidance for recognizing when ignorance is present in the mind—manifesting as heaviness, confusion, and rigidity—versus when clarity prevails. She addresses the common tendency to identify with these afflictions rather than observing them, which can make practice feel discouraging. Using vivid examples like mistaking a rope for a snake, she illustrates how misperception shapes our entire relationship to experience.
> The talk emphasizes that these afflictions, though deeply habitual, are not our intrinsic nature—they merely obscure the clarity and peace available to us, like clouds hiding the sun. Through sustained mindfulness practice, we can learn to recognize these obscurations, understand their impermanent nature, and gradually allow them to thin, revealing what Kalu Rinpoche calls 'the sun of wisdom and joy shining in the clear sky of your mind.' Wilson concludes with a passage from the Tao Te Ching, pointing toward the natural tolerance and serenity that arise when we realize our true source.

Tonight I want to talk about the humble topic of the nature of ignorance. Hopefully we'll clear it up in half an hour.

I said the last time I spoke that the Dalai Lama had said all of our difficulties stem from mistaken perception, and that's why there's so much emphasis on direct experience and true knowledge. So what brings about this mistaken perception? And what exactly are we even talking about when we discuss perception and mistaken perception?

Stephen spoke the other night of papañca—that quality, that process where a simple experience like a sound becomes so quickly hidden in all the proliferation that follows it through the agile activities of our mind. We end up relating to something that isn't happening at all. This is one way that misperception takes place.

In our complex psychology, sitting here, somebody makes a sound. Even simpler than that, there's just the hearing of a sound. And the papañca immediately starts. It's unpleasant. We associate it with lack of respect. It reminds us of how in our childhood we were treated as not being worthwhile, leading to all the times we are now treated as not being worthwhile, the immensity of the pain that comes with that, the anger. You see what I mean? By this time, the next time that sound arises, it's almost impossible to relate to a sound. We're relating to a whole conglomerate of things that isn't happening except in the thinking process.

This is one way of misperception, and it's fueled, as we've spoken of so often, by what we call the kilesas—greed, hatred, ignorance, delusion. These are sometimes translated as afflictions of the mind, or torments of the mind, or defilements. I don't really like the word defilements, so I'll prefer to use afflictions.

Now this misperception can happen on an even more basic level, and this actually fascinates me. Let me define perception first. Perception is that quality of mind present in every mind moment. It's one of the five aggregates. So with consciousness, feeling, volition, perception, and rupa—material form—it's going to be part of our experience in every mind moment. Perception means simply the quality of recognition or discernment of something.

When the kilesas are present, when they're afflicting the mind, often even this very basic first perception is distorted. That leads to all kinds of confusion, all kinds of reactions based on having perceived something that isn't actually true in the first place. When that sound comes again, the perception could be so distorted you couldn't even recognize it as a sound, as somebody coughing. It might take a whole different discernment in the mind.

Thich Nhat Hanh says, "When you look at a pencil, you perceive it"—meaning you recognize it, you discern it. "But the pencil itself may be different from the pencil in your mind." This is the root of our problem: these afflictions that bring about this basic mistake in the way we perceive our experience. I feel that to understand the nature of these afflictions, of these delusions, is really the key to our practice.

These afflictions—greed, hatred, and the root one of all of them, ignorance—these are the tormenting aspects of consciousness that our whole practice addresses. The practice of morality, of concentration, the development of wisdom—these are working together to clarify these aspects of mind, to purify the mind from these tormenting delusions. Purifying means seeing through them, no longer being in bondage to these afflictions, and eventually uprooting them altogether. It doesn't mean hating them or hating ourselves because they arise in the mind.

I used to have a huge resistance to hearing the kilesas talked about, and one hears them talked about a lot. It's really one of the key points of the Buddha's teaching. But I would hear about kilesas, hear them translated as defilements, and I didn't even want to think about it, much less hear talk about it. Even the word defilement—I'd come away thinking, "Oh, I'm so defiled, it's so disgusting." Buddhism sounds so negative when you look at it from this aspect.

The more I would look in practice, of course, the more I would see greed, hatred, and delusion arising. And the more negative a turn of mind I could come to have, so that I would come away from a talk about it feeling like the nature of my disgusting tendencies of mind was just being hammered into me. One comes to wonder sometimes: in Buddhism, is this what we're saying our intrinsic nature is? This continual arising over and over of greed, hatred, and delusion? Obviously not, or we wouldn't be here. But it made me not want to look.

Over the years, I've actually come to flip about it completely. Far from being negative, I find the teaching about working with afflictions and seeing them is incredibly positive. It offers us the possibility to understand and move out of the suffering that we're in.

The reason it was so negative for me—and it's back to delusion again, of course—is that rather than hearing about these as something to learn about, to observe, to come to be familiar with and thus see through, I was identifying with them. So when greed would arise, very often it would be "my greed, I'm a greedy person, I'm disgusting." And that's really different.

The more we come to look, the more we see that these afflictions are actually not our intrinsic nature. They only hide the clarity, the light, the peace that's available in the mind. But we're so used to having these afflictions be the way that we move and react to situations. They're so pervasive, they arise so frequently, that we come to think that's who we are and how we normally relate to situations. It's really easy to identify with them, and sometimes it can seem overwhelming. It can seem really discouraging, because the more we look, the more we see this, the more it reinforces our idea that we're really hopeless—whenever we identify with them.

But we need to know what we're dealing with. We need to investigate and understand the nature of these forces in the mind, learn to recognize when they're present and when they're not present. From this comes the power to see through them, to not be in bondage to them. The mind begins to purify. And this is what we're doing with our mindfulness practice.

Again, as Thich Nhat Hanh says, to understand something we need to have a direct encounter. If we're resistant to or afraid to look at these qualities in our mind, we never can have a direct encounter with them. We'll keep on being led by them, being lost in them.

So, for example, when ignorance is present, when delusion is present in the mind—you're having a sitting where your mind is dull and heavy and vague. You know you're trying. You're really trying to note things, you're trying to come back to the breath, and it's just all this fuzzy, amorphous heaviness. Now, it's probably rare to note, "Oh, there's delusion present in the mind." Much more common to think, "I am really incapable of doing this practice. I blew it. I did something wrong. It was the apple I ate. It was the extra hour of sleep. It was that moment of greed three and a half hours ago. This is it—I blew it." Or to project it outward: "This whole thing is a waste of time."

But when we can say, "Oh right, at this moment I'm heavy, there's cloudiness, there's dullness, confusion—delusion is present in the mind," it's very powerful. From moments of doing this, we begin to see that ignorance is not some monolithic, unchanging, ever-present experience driving our lives. It arises and passes moment to moment, due to conditions, just like anything else.

I find this a very positive understanding. It's a very helpful thing for me to see: "Oh yes, it's not hopeless. It's impermanent."

In this way, meditation is a very healing process—healing the mind of the afflictions, purifying the mind. Often the body comes to healing as well. But in order to heal, we must look at the nature of the disease. We can't hide from it. We can't pretend it's not present and wish it would go away.

So what are some general characteristics of the afflictions, ways that can possibly help us recognize when they're present in the mind? The first is that when there's affliction—when there's ignorance or greed or hatred—it introduces a distortion, a misperception. In other words, it's called an affliction to the extent that we see things not the way that they are. We see them one way and they really are another way, and we just don't know this.

So we end up with this distorted sense of reality. Our perception is out of sync with what's really going on—it doesn't correspond to what's actually happening. And then we build from this foundation and just get further and further away from what is. We wonder why we're confused.

The root of this, the root misperception of ignorance, stems from our fundamental misperception of ourselves, of who we are. This is really the root wrong seeing, wrong view, that gives rise to all the other confusion. Nisargadatta Maharaj says, "The obstacles to clear perception of one's true being are desire for pleasure and fear of pain. The very freedom from this is the natural state."

Now, the desire for pleasure and the fear of pain—here you have basic greed and hatred—stem again from the basic distortion in our perception of ourselves: from seeing ourselves as some permanent, unchanging entity, autonomous, separate from each other, separate from nature. And once this mistaken way of looking at things has entered into our perception, once it has kind of gelled into how we think we're seeing things, all of our emotional responses, our reactions to situations, the constructions and formulations that get built in our mind—they're all built upon this initial mistaken way of seeing.

So the further we go with our constructions, the further we get away from what's really going on, from what we really are. And we end up feeling confused, alienated, wondering why we feel separate and not quite connected with our experience. We don't quite see—even though we might know it in our mind on a thinking level—that this sense of perception is taking place moment to moment on a very basic, immediate level, not through the process of thought so much.

And so we expect things to be one way, even though in our mind we know they're not. We expect them to be permanent. We keep thinking we're going to find something solid out there, or in here, to give us satisfaction. We think we're some unchanging, abiding self that can be satisfied. And because that's what we think we perceive, our experience is never going to quite work. It's never going to quite jive—because we're in conflict with reality.

It's like a simple example: if we look up at the sky and see some beautiful star, astronomers can tell us that actually that star died ten million years ago and we're just looking at light. It's not there anymore. Or even watching a sunset—they can tell us that just as it's going down behind the hill, actually that happened eight minutes ago. We're just seeing the light because it takes eight minutes to get from the sun to here. We're not quite perceiving things exactly as they are. We're not living in the world we think we're living in. The pencil you perceive may be different from the pencil in your mind.

And so the second quality is this: misperception introduces a quality of disturbance, obviously, because we're in a sense of conflict with what's going on. It's like a friend of mine gave this example: our life is continually spent as if we're trying to pound a square peg into a round hole. Our mind is the square peg and reality is the round hole. And we just spend our life pounding and pounding and pounding, wondering why it doesn't work—never really stopping to investigate that these two don't match.

And so we keep on having expectations based on something that isn't true. Those expectations aren't met. We don't quite understand what's wrong. And we end up with this pervasive sense of disturbance. It really can be quite deep—not just when there's something obvious creating a lot of suffering, but in little day-to-day routine things. An underlying tone of uneasiness. Something doesn't quite jibe. And it's easy to internalize that as "there's something wrong with me," or "there's something wrong with life," or "there's something wrong with"—you name it, whatever happens to be going on at the time.

Here's an example, just a simple everyday event, showing how not quite seeing things the way they are leads to a sense of being out of touch. This is all too common, unfortunately. A couple of years ago, some of the staff and teachers here belonged to a health club where we could go swimming and exercise. So during the three-month course, after a long, hard day, a friend and I were really tired and in a rather negative frame of mind. He said, "Let's go swimming—we'll really feel good. That'll really help." So we looked forward to it all day, got ready, went swimming, and got there. Now, the way I'm describing it, I was not observing it with this clarity at the time. This is more in retrospect.

It's chilly down there. They don't keep it very warm, and I'm quite sensitive to cold. So there I was getting on my swimsuit and freezing, thinking, "I can't wait to get in the water. This is really unpleasant." I jumped in the water, which was even colder, and just started swimming really fast to warm up. After a couple of laps I warmed up, and then I was just moving through the laps, moving through the laps, thinking, "This is really boring. If I hurry up, I can get into the sauna."

So I did my laps, just kind of dragging through it. "Phew, that's done. Now I can go get in the sauna." The sauna was really nice—for about three minutes. Then the board I was lying on started to get hard. Then I started to sweat. Then I started to get really hot and dizzy. "I've got to get out of here. This is really unpleasant." I went out—it was really cold, which was unpleasant—and stayed out until I'd cooled off. Then I thought, "Let me jump back in the sauna," which was nice for one and a half minutes this time. I could stand it for maybe five minutes. I got out, took a shower, went up, and met my friend. He was in the other locker room. And we both said, "Wow, that was really great."

Then we started talking about it. Had I not gone back and examined it, I would have come away with the perception that it was really great. So how come I didn't actually, deep down, feel really great from this experience? This is, as I said, all too common. We're just out of sync, not looking at what's actually going on. I thought there was some permanent "me" that was going to be made happy and fulfilled, that there was some experience out there that was going to do it, and that being happy was about having all pleasant things around me to begin with. When we don't question our perceptions, we're going to get this underlying sense of dissatisfaction and wonder why.

The third quality of these afflictions is that they are so habitual. They have incredibly addictive qualities of mind. We're so used to seeing in this way. We're so used to the basic one—seeing ourselves as abiding, as permanent, as separate, autonomous. We're so used to acting out of desire and aversion on very subtle levels that it's very hard to break out of it. It's hard to even see that it's happening. It becomes our habitual mode of response when we're not working with mindfulness. When we are working with mindfulness, that's the power, that's the tool that enables us to break out of this habitual nature.

For myself, I've found it very important to respect the power of this conditioning. By conditioning and habit, I'm really using them somewhat interchangeably. What I mean is that the more a particular mode of responding, or state of mind, is maintained or sustained in our experience, it's just that much easier, that much more likely for that particular mode or way of responding to arise again.

Now, of course, this also works for positive qualities—cultivating a sense of mettā, cultivating equanimity. It's also easier for those to arise. Cultivating mindfulness. That's why every moment of mindfulness, the continuity, has such power. Because it's making it that much easier for mindfulness to arise in the next moment. And when we're not cultivating mindfulness—as most of our lives we haven't been—without knowing it, we've been cultivating the afflictions.

The Buddha wouldn't, at least from what I've read, ever talk very much about the beginnings of things. It used to drive me crazy. How did we all get into this predicament? Why, if our intrinsic nature is so light and peaceful, are we tormented by these qualities of mind? Why are we so easily prey to these afflictions? He never gave an answer. He would say things like, "The mind has been afflicted since beginningless time." And he would also say, "What I'm teaching you is all you need to know to come out of suffering."

I'm teaching suffering and the end of suffering. And so if you take what he says and put it into practice, we can come to the end of suffering. He was basically saying it's no use trying to figure out the beginnings of things. In fact, there were four things that would drive a person mad to think about them. I can't recall all four, so don't ask. But one of them was the beginnings of things. It hasn't stopped me from thinking about it, but...

Anyway, that the mind has been afflicted since beginningless time—you can take it, as I do, as a symbol of the depth and power of these habits of mind. Not in a negative or pessimistic way, but in a way that invites us to respect it, so that we understand something important: in the moments when we've really seen clearly and we really are free from delusion or greed or hatred, but then it comes back again so strongly later on, we need not be discouraged. It's just been so habitual, so pervasive for so long that it's not going to simply vanish like that.

That's why it's so important to learn to recognize these qualities, to understand these deeply ingrained habits. Because when we don't see them, we're assenting to this view of reality without even knowing it. And the whole society assents to this mistaken view of reality. It becomes the agreed-upon assumption.

A couple of examples from just reading the newspaper the other day—a most instructive way to discover some of the assumptions we're all living with. One was an article about a television advertisement where some attractive woman appeared in close-up. I don't remember what she was advertising, but she said, "I've had it with reality. I want illusion." And this is meant to sell something, so it's designed to appeal to us.

The second one isn't funny; it's quite upsetting. It was a headline in the Globe about a proposal to Congress to ease the assassination ban. This was a serious headline—like easing the milk tax or something. Ease the ban on assassinations, mostly regarding foreign governments. This represents a warped view of reality, of what's real, of what's wholesome and what isn't—that it's acceptable to assassinate in the name of peace.

When we don't take the time or the energy or the care to investigate our perceptions and our assumptions, we're all assenting to this. It's so close that we can't even see it's there, but it's affecting us. We're so accustomed to seeing things this way that even when we begin to look, it's very difficult not to perceive through these afflictions.

Someone told me about a science fiction movie—I didn't see it—where some creatures glommed onto people's faces, and you could see through them. People would see through as if the creature weren't there, but it's right on you, infiltrating and taking over. It's kind of like that. These afflictions aren't our nature. They're not necessarily part of us, but we're so used to them just sitting there that we think that's what the world looks like.

Sometimes it seems like one of the most difficult things on this path is learning how to step out of seeing in this mistaken way. It's hard, for just the reason I mentioned: it's first hard simply to discern that we are seeing in a mistaken way. And there's another reason—as we begin to move toward a different understanding, a different perception, it meets with great resistance, both internally and externally.

Internally, a simple example: say you're caught in some difficult process—an emotional state, a memory, a whole conglomeration of things—something very painful and difficult, with a lot of suffering. And you're really bringing mindfulness to it, and suddenly there's a moment where you see so clearly: "Oh, it's thoughts and emotions and sensations," with a real sense that there's nothing solid here. In that moment, there's no problem. It's a moment of perceiving impermanence—impermanence of the mind-body process—on a really deep level, perceiving things as they actually are, rather than the solid sense of "me" and "this concept" and "the suffering."

In that moment there's no problem. But so often—not always, but often—the next reaction is one of tremendous threat. The mind will skitter off, back into the problem, even though it means much more suffering, back to the old way of seeing things. It feels safer. It feels solid. It feels like there's something here.

Often it seems as though the tendency to misperceive is so strong, we've gotten so comfortable with it, that there's almost a preference to see things that way rather than to move out into the truth: yes, there's nothing here but changing sensations and thoughts and feelings. Even though the accurate perception is much more freeing, internally, it's scary.

It's often threatening. It means changing one's whole view of the world.

And I've often found externally, when you start to change your habitual ways of responding to situations—your habitual modes of behavior—you find that the people who are your friends become uncomfortable with the new ways you're acting, the new ways you're behaving.

When I first got into practice, for instance, not out of a sense of moralism but just for some reason, I didn't want to drink anymore. So I just stopped. I never said anything about it. I didn't have a sense that it was bad—I was just seeing that it wasn't helpful. And this was very threatening to others. I actually ended up going in a different direction from my friends. This is different from moral railing at someone that makes them feel like you're on their case. It's just that you're beginning to see through the societal assumed perceptions. Just as it's scary internally when you sit here, it's scary to other people externally sometimes.

So we often don't get a lot of support for this change if we're not with sangha or other people who are working in a similar way. And this again is hard. It makes it tempting or easier to fall back into the old ways of seeing, because they're so deeply ingrained anyway.

That's the habitual, pervasive nature of these afflictions of mind—they arise so strongly and so frequently.

But the fourth quality, and this is really the important one to remember, is that they are not our intrinsic nature. They only obscure it, like clouds obscuring the sun. This is from Kalu Rinpoche: "When you practice the Dharma, the clouds of sorrow will drift away and the sun of wisdom and joy will be shining in the clear sky of your mind."

That's what it's like. The clouds of sorrow will drift away and the sun of wisdom and joy will be shining in the clear light of your mind. It's just that sometimes we take the clouds to be all there is. We take them to be unchanging.

In each moment of our experience, there are certain qualities—these five aggregates—that are intrinsic to the nature of our existence in that moment, to the structure of consciousness: feeling, perception, consciousness, volition, rupa. Those are there. You're not going to have a moment as a human being where one of those isn't happening. But these afflictions—greed, hatred, ignorance—these are not intrinsic. They do not have to be there in every moment of our existence.

It's very important to know this: that they can disappear. They can drift away like clouds. We can transcend and overcome them. Otherwise, practice doesn't make any sense.

When you're discouraged, it can be helpful to reflect on this and also to realize that often it's discouraging because we're beginning to see these afflictions more clearly. Before, these afflictions were so comfortable that we didn't even know they were here. When we begin to pay attention, to work with mindfulness, we see them more and more. This is really the beginning of the healing process. But it's also a very painful part of the healing process—like sometimes taking a very painful medicine.

I have a friend who was in chemotherapy for a while, and she'd say she knew it was good for her, but it made her so sick she'd just sit and look at the pill for half an hour or an hour before she could get herself to take it, because she knew she was going to be in the bathroom sick the whole night. Sometimes it almost feels that bad, turning around and looking at these things in our mind. But it's the only way to come to understand and be free of them.

So that's the path of our practice: to learn to tell the difference between these obscuring, obstructive qualities of mind and the real pure nature of our mind and heart.

I want to talk a little bit specifically about the quality of ignorance, the affliction of ignorance, because that really is the root one—the root misperception.

First, just to begin to get a feel for it, let's get familiar with what it feels like when our mind is filled with ignorance. It's dark, heavy, confused, foggy, sluggish. I have this description from Nyanaponika that I really like, of a mind strongly under the influence of delusion:

"There's a general heaviness and unwieldiness of the mental processes. Force of habit predominates. Changes and adaptations are undertaken slowly and unwillingly and to the smallest degree possible."

Thought is rigid, inclined to dogma. It takes long to learn from experience or advice. Affections and aversions are fixed and biased. In general, the character proves more or less inaccessible.

I love that description.

So if you ever have a moment—a rare moment—when you recognize any of those qualities, instead of saying, "Oh, I'm a rigid, fixed, biased person," you could say, "Oh, ignorance is present in this moment." Just see if that makes a difference in your relationship to it.

Also helpful is learning to recognize when ignorance is present and when it's absent. When it's absent, the mind is facile, flexible. You can really see what's happening clearly. You can note it clearly—it comes and it goes. Helpful not to say, "Wow, I'm such a good yogi," but rather to recognize that there's not delusion in the mind now. There are other positive qualities present—mindfulness, concentration, energy.

So that's one aspect of ignorance. The other is this wrong view, this distortion. Because of the fogginess, because of the darkness and the cloudiness, we see wrongly.

The classic example given is of someone walking in the woods at twilight. It's not completely dark. You can make out the trees, you can make out bigger shapes, you can sort of see the path. But you can't see little things very clearly. You can't quite tell what's going on over there in the shadows. And you see a vine or a rope hanging from a tree, and the mind mistakes it for a snake because of the obscuring quality present in that moment.

In that moment of mistaking the vine for a snake, that mistaken recognition leads to a strong reaction of mind—of fear. "I know there's poisonous snakes in this area." You whirl around and see other vines, and they're all snakes, and there's a sense of panic. The whole way we perceive the woods changes based on this initial mistaken perception. It's dangerous. One is scared. The woods are unfriendly. They're dark. They're evil. On and on.

If we think that we perceive a snake due to this cloudiness, we're unable to see clearly. That mistaken perception will inform all our actions. We will behave as though we saw a snake. We'll never know the difference.

But if one, even though filled with fear, kept on going and got closer—or suddenly the moon came up and you could see that that vine is actually a vine—the whole problem goes away. It's like, "Oh, no problem, that's a vine." Now nothing in the situation has actually changed except that our perception has become accurate. Our relationship to the situation is all that's changed. Recognizing it wrong affects everything. It affects our entire relationship to the experience.

There's an addendum that works the other way. When I was in Thailand staying in one forest monastery where there were a lot of poisonous snakes, one would be on the lookout for them. I was walking in the woods one day and there was this big green vine. I didn't pay any attention to it, walked up close, and it actually was a snake. So it works both ways.

This is what we're doing all the time in our perception of our mind and body, of who we are. We're continually mistaking it to be something it isn't. This is basic wrong view. We take the input that we get on a moment-to-moment basis of who we are, what we are, and we organize it in a way that's not correct. And then we act on that incorrect perception and build our life on it.

This changing mind-body process—constantly arising sensations, images, sounds, thoughts—is always in a transitional stage, never in stasis, always becoming.

We somehow reorganize it and perceive it as solid, unchanging, permanent, separate from everything else, autonomous—you know, "I can do whatever I want, nothing affects me and I affect no one else."

Now, while some misperceptions are easier to see through—you get close to the rope and you can see it's not a snake—this one is how we've always viewed the world, and it's not so easy to see through. It's also being recreated, this misperception, on a moment-to-moment level. So just seeing through it once isn't enough. We see through it deeper and deeper, on more and more powerful levels. But since this is how we've organized the world, it is very hard to see through.

Take an example of a time when you've misperceived something. Say you're misperceiving the rope as a snake. Reflect on how real that misperception was. I mean, the mind was absolutely convinced that's the way things are.

Two other examples—and you can probably think of times in your own life. One is from James Thurber, whom I used to read a lot when I was a kid. He had this whole essay—I can't remember most of the details—but he was almost blind, and it was about how he broke his glasses once and didn't have glasses for three days and all the wonderful things he was seeing in the world because he couldn't perceive accurately. The one I remember is he would look out of his apartment in New York, up on the fifth floor or the tenth floor, and this magnificent dog just kept lying on the ledge on the same side of the apartment next door. He kept wondering, what's it doing out on the ledge on the tenth floor? It was so magnificent and it just held its pose, very regal. After three days when he got his glasses, he found out it was made out of stone. Now, for those three days, that dog was absolutely a real living dog in his mind.

Another one is from a friend of mine. He was walking in England with his wife at twilight—good time for misperception. The twilight is like the ignorance in our mind. They were out in the country, and at the far end of a field by some bushes, he saw a whole flock of big white geese walking across the field. They were kind of big and their necks were twisted funny, but he said, "Look at those funny white geese walking across the field." And she said, "Those aren't geese, those are cows." She went on to explain how they're the kind of cows—I don't remember what kind—but they're black on either end and white in the middle. It was dark and they were up against some dark bushes, and so all he saw was the white, and it formed into something that was geese in his mind. They were geese, absolutely geese. And then you know how once you see it as cows, they can never really be geese again. They're cows.

So we do that a lot. When you notice that happening, reflect on it. Notice how the process of misperception happens. It's not that different from how we take this thing to be solid and permanent. Reflect on how real everything was when we were in the misperception, because it's that same way—it's that real that we think we're this separate, solid, eternal being.

Another thing that makes it hard to see through is that often we tend to reject or deny input that's coming in that doesn't fit with our mistaken perception. We've gotten so used to that perception that we just block out or deny or don't trust our perception when we perceive something else.

A simple example: often people have said in interviews, "Objects are coming and I just can't stay with one object very long. I just don't have enough mindfulness. My mind's just too scattered. I just can't stay with objects." And often it's because, yeah, you can't stay with objects long because the objects are changing constantly. It's the absolute bare experience of impermanence.

Nothing is staying long—neither the object, nor the attention, nor the mindfulness, nor the consciousness. It's all changing moment to moment. But we actually deny that experience by making a permanent "I can't stay with the object, there's something wrong with me," instead of opening to the fact that it's all constantly coming and going.

We do that a lot. What's important in these moments is to notice when you tend to reject a certain experience or perception, and to see where that rejection is coming from. It's important to let in these experiences. Often if it's some kind of psychic experience or some sense of interconnectedness, we put it down as weird or far out or kind of a fringe thing—as if, again, thinking that we're really separate, that we're autonomous. It's important to take in, to notice the times when this perception is belied, when you see the other way.

When I was sitting here this summer, one really hot afternoon, I was doing my walking meditation in the Hall of the Catskills. It was one of these days just before a huge thunderstorm, where it's incredibly hot and sultry. You feel like you're walking through a swamp, just walking. It was all I could do just to move. There was this sense of heaviness and something impending. Absolute stillness. Usually people were walking somewhere up and down the hall, coming to their rooms or passing through, very mindfully, but there was always some activity. During this period of about twenty minutes, absolutely nothing. It was like the whole world was dead still. It was all I could do just to keep myself walking. I felt like I was moving against the energy.

And suddenly the thunderstorm just hit. A wild storm. Within ten seconds it was pouring rain, thundering. Within a minute, people were tearing through the hall. Doors were slamming. People that I hadn't seen move faster than a snail's pace for three weeks were running at top speed down the hall, throwing open doors, checking the windows. I myself was filled with energy and having to hold myself back.

I thought, wow—it's not like there's a thunderstorm and there's me and those are two separate things happening. It was so clearly one happening, one experience, and not a sense of separation or inner or outer or different people, or "there's nature and it happens to have an effect on me." It was so clear that I was nature. So was everyone else. We were all part of the same process. It was a very powerful moment for me. And then it all just kind of died down back to normal—"lifting, moving, placing, separate from this other person who's walking in my way."

So the more that we see these things, the more that we notice, pay attention, come to understand the nature of ignorance, the nature of these afflictions—know when they're present and when they're not—the less we identify with them, the less we move out of a space of confused perception. And then the clouds really do begin to thin out. It really does happen.

And what's so beautiful is that, in a way, nothing really changes. We're always afraid we'll lose something, you know. But it's like when you see that the geese are cows, nothing's any different. The cows were always cows, and they're still cows. The only thing that's lost is a mistaken image of what was happening. Nothing changes, but everything changes.

Because there's a really crucial difference. The way we perceive ourselves as separate, autonomous, unchanging—it feels secure, but actually it's really painful. When we're coming from perceiving ourselves this way, and then relating to life from this place, it makes everyone else, everything else separate. Things become so difficult, so unsatisfying. There's conflict. It hurts. Life is hard.

When we're seeing without that, when we're seeing the changing nature, and there's nowhere to take hold, and there's no solid core—it's like a huge burden has been lifted off. And things are just how they are. It's really so simple.

It's just how things always were. And life can even be enjoyable. Thich Nhat Hanh says that practicing Buddhism is a clever way to enjoy life. That doesn't mean every moment you're sitting here you should be enjoying—sorry to say. But the relationship to life can actually become one of deep appreciation and joy, rather than this niggling, ongoing conflict of pounding the square peg into the round hole.

And so when we're seeing without these misperceptions, even the difficult times are okay.

I want to end with this little quotation from the Tao Te Ching:

Empty your mind of all thoughts. Let your heart be at peace. Watch the turmoil of beings, but contemplate their return. Each separate being in the universe returns to the common source. Returning to the source is serenity. If you don't realize the source, you stumble in confusion and sorrow. When you realize where you come from, you naturally become tolerant, disinterested, amused, kind-hearted as a grandmother, dignified as a king. Immersed in the wonder of the Tao, you can deal with whatever life brings you. And when death comes, you are ready.

So we're learning to deal with whatever life brings us.

Let's sit for a few minutes.

CHAPTER 5

Non-Greed: Dāna

Carol Wilson · 54 min

> In this profound talk from the 1989 Three Month Retreat, Carol Wilson addresses one of the great paradoxes of spiritual practice: how mindfulness opens us simultaneously to immense suffering and immense beauty. She invites practitioners to recognize that greed, hatred, and delusion are not the intrinsic nature of mind, but rather coverings that obscure its pure qualities.
> Wilson focuses on non-greed (alobha), which manifests not as passive neutrality but as the active, outpouring quality of generosity (dāna). Drawing from her year as a nun in Thailand, she shares how dāna functions as a complete practice path alongside sīla (morality) and bhāvanā (meditation). She explains that generous action naturally drives away unwholesome mind states while strengthening qualities of non-attachment, mettā, and interconnectedness. The key lies in mindful attention to intention—before, during, and after giving.
> Practical guidance includes giving hand-to-hand when possible, receiving with equal presence and openness, and understanding service as humble acts done with pure motivation rather than grand gestures. Wilson emphasizes that even meditation practice itself becomes an expression of dāna when undertaken with the understanding that we practice for the benefit of all sentient beings. This reframing transforms difficult moments into opportunities for cultivating non-attachment and generosity, giving tremendous strength and richness to practice.

You know those moments Sharon spoke of in her talk on delusion where you suddenly are sitting there and you go, "Where am I? What am I doing here?" I just had one.

Something that I've been reflecting on a lot lately, something that just seems to be coming up in my experience and to my attention, is what I see as one of the great paradoxes of our lives and of this practice. It's how, as we open, as we become more mindful, we open so deeply to such an immensity of suffering. And at the same time, we're opening to such an immensity of beauty, of love, of joy, of appreciation. The paradox is somehow how to hold both of them—not to let one experience deny the other, and yet continue to be open for both.

I've been seeing this come up a lot. Two small examples came to my mind when I was writing this, and you can see it yourself all through the day.

The first: one of these beautiful golden days we've been having, I went out to a reservoir near here and was walking in the woods by myself. It was so exquisitely beautiful—the golden leaves, the light filtering down, the water. Such a sense of sublime peace and rightness with the universe. It was very inspirational, a sense of surrendering completely into that moment, to the rightness of the Dharma, a willingness to surrender my life to whatever service of the Dharma was appropriate. All those feelings arose, and it was a real experience.

And then the next memory in that moment was of a friend's remarking that the leaves are reaching this height of beauty as their dying gesture. All this beauty is the preparation for death of the leaves, of many of the plants in the forest. And that's not necessarily a depressing thought, but both aspects are inherent in the same situation.

The second example comes from the other side. A couple days ago, a friend on staff told me that Terry Anderson—the man who's been a prisoner in Beirut—it's five years now. She'd heard that he was celebrating his fifth anniversary in captivity, and that he spends most of his time in a cave chained to the wall. Just to imagine that, and the thought of trying to open one's heart to what he might be going through, to send some mettā. In the doing of that, feeling the compassion beginning to flow, the sense of unbelievability at what this person's enduring—but out of that came the beauty of compassion and the sense of all of our connectedness. In a way, that isn't happening separate from us. And at the same time, knowing that the same mettā and compassion must also encompass his captors. That they're also suffering. And that's also a part of our existence.

So you see what I mean—it's as if both extremes are encompassed in many of our experiences, even the most simple.

Because the suffering, both our own and others', can so often seem so unbearable, and we spend so much of our lives guarding against feeling the depth of it. Of necessity, we spend a lot of our practice learning to open to suffering, to face it, to acknowledge it, to see the nature of the afflictions in the mind, how they create more suffering when they're not seen and are identified with. And this is necessary. It leads to this opening of the heart, a great depth of wisdom and compassion.

But at times, it seems like we can get almost unbalanced in our focus on looking at the negative qualities, for use of a better word. We see greed, hatred, and delusion so much that we forget that's not actually the intrinsic nature of our mind. It's easy to identify when we come and think about how much grasping we've seen in a day. It's easy to think, "My God, it's hopeless. This is the nature of the mind and my existence." We forget that these qualities are covering, that they're hiding the intrinsic pure nature of our mind and heart.

And so that's what I want to talk about tonight—just a reminder to us that our practice, yes, it's about opening to the unpleasant, to the difficult, to seeing its nature with mindfulness, with equanimity. But it's also about acknowledging the beauty, the other qualities of mind, the nature of the mind when it's not dulled by confusion or grasping or anger. Can we learn to equally acknowledge and experience both aspects—the unbearably painful and also the unbearably sublime?

I want to talk about some of the pure, positive aspects of mind tonight. Classically these are described in rather negative terms: non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion. But they're really much more than this kind of passive, neutral quality. They're really very active, growing, outpouring qualities of mind.

Non-greed can also be described as generosity, thoughts and actions of sharing, even of sacrifice. It's also non-attachment, renunciation, simplicity.

Non-hatred—again, it's not just this passive sitting still like a rock where nothing's going to incite my anger. It's also the very positive outpourings of the heart: mettā, loving-kindness, compassion, forgiveness, patience.

And non-delusion is that brightness of mind that we all experience on retreat when the perception is so bright, so clear. And this leads to growth of great insight, equanimity, and understanding.

I'll talk more about these later.

What's important, I think, for us to continue to recognize as we go through our practice here and also in our life is not to see these qualities as some goal out there, but to recognize that on a moment-to-moment basis they are present in our experience. In moments when the unwholesome states of mind aren't present—when we're not clouded by greed or anger or confusion—these positive qualities, various ones of them, are present. And as our mind purifies more through our mindfulness practice, these qualities shine out even more strongly and more often. I think it's important for us to also recognize and acknowledge them when they're present—not just to acknowledge the difficult. And to know that there are ways to cultivate these qualities, of which of course mindfulness is the most powerful. I'll mention a little about that, but I also want to talk about some broader ways to cultivate these qualities.

First I want to say that often I've found, in my own experience and in talking to other people, that when we discuss the really uplifting qualities of mind—whether it be the possibility of freedom, enlightenment, or the development of a sense of real boundless loving-kindness, of a state of non-attachment—even though it's meant to be inspiring, it often has quite the opposite effect. People will say, "God, just hearing about enlightenment turns me off completely. I mean, that's for somebody else out there. It's not for me." Rather than bringing inspiration and energy to investigate, it brings a sense of, "Well, I can never do it, so what's the point?" A kind of heaviness and listlessness can result. There's always someone better, always someone to compare ourselves to. And so it can serve the opposite purpose. Hopefully that's not my intention.

I want to share an experience that helped me see how this actually could be inspiring. I think one of the reasons that hearing about—I don't want to say goal, I don't even mean goal—but just the possibility in this moment of living with these powerful qualities of heart and mind, one of the reasons it can seem discouraging is this tendency to accent the negative. When we hear about, say, the possibility of cultivating boundless metta, all we see is our boundless anger and hatred. That's all we know. We don't notice the moments when it isn't there.

Think about if you've done something that put yourself out there, and you get feedback from people about something you're unsure about. Ten people tell you it was really nice, it was great. And two people give you really negative feedback. Which ones do you remember? Which ones do you give the most weight to and believe? I know for myself, there are times I'll completely discount the positive feedback. They're crazy, or they're just being nice—anything one wants to say. The negative one believes. It's often like that with our moment-to-moment experiences.

So often when I'd hear about enlightenment, or hear people talk about it—Sayadaw U Pandita mentions it a lot in his talks, he'll often talk about Nibbana—sometimes it's inspiring and sometimes I think, "If he mentions that one more time, I'm going to lose it." Because it's just somewhere else. Somebody else can do it, not me.

This winter I was in Bodh Gaya in India for a few weeks. That's the small village where the Buddha sat under the Bodhi tree and came to his full understanding and enlightenment before he started teaching. There's quite a beautiful temple, a big stupa there, and a descendant of the tree that you can go and sit near. People circumambulate the temple, and it's in a little park right in the middle of this village.

I'm not usually very moved or inspired by shrines or temples. It just isn't what moves my heart usually. But we went and sat down in the midst of all the craziness there, started to sit, and I was so moved I started to cry. As I reflected or just kept sitting,

I saw that what it was—it brought what seemed like a myth of this person, the Buddha, some special, unbelievably special person who achieved this miraculous thing—it brought it down to earth. We were sitting in just this place, in this little dirty Indian village, under a tree. And it made the whole thing really human to me, really much more possible. Like, oh yeah, this Buddha—he was a human being with suffering, trying, just like I am, just like all of us are. And maybe it's not some esoteric myth so far away that it has no relationship to my life. Maybe it's something that is really possible.

It was deeply inspiring to me, just in the sense of bringing the whole thing down to earth. And it gave a sense of energy, a sense of real commitment—commitment not to have to go somewhere else and achieve some kind of other state separate from life. Because the other factor of this experience is that this temple is in the middle of the whole show. When you're sitting there, there are hordes of tourists coming through in droves, guides with their microphones, Hindus chattering really loudly, Japanese Zen groups. There were about twenty-five Tibetan monks sitting on the hillside for days, chanting.

Blowing horns. A very mentally disturbed woman who would come running up and scream the whole time you were there, then go away. Starving dogs. Rows of beggars you have to walk through just to get up to the temple in the first place. It's not like you're out in some sublime place.

And I kind of got it. Oh.

The inspiration wasn't a sense of denying or aversion to life, but of being able to embrace the whole without getting lost in it. The inspiration was to be fully present, but to devote one's energy to the development of wisdom—so that one is fully present knowing that it's impermanent, that it's insubstantial, that none of the things that happen are going to bring lasting happiness. But for that very reason, one can be even more fully present and participating.

That inspiration comes and goes, but it has stayed with me quite deeply since that time. And since then, I've understood more how talking about the possibility of developing non-greed isn't something to dismiss. It's like—right, this is something that happens in this world. There are many moments of it in my experience right now, if I'm just willing to open and pay attention to those equally.

Sometimes I also feel as if we're almost afraid to open to the power of these positive qualities of our experience. A moment of what feels like really pure love, or forgiveness, or compassion. Generosity—a sense of selfless generosity. Or an upliftment of joy just at the way the foot feels when it lifts off the floor. It doesn't have to be about something sublime.

And sometimes it almost seems harder to open to that fully than to the pain. Some people have said things as if they don't trust that it's real. Again, it's back to the self-negative: "Well, I'm just such a blind, dumb person. I couldn't experience this level of joy or this level of peace. So it must not be a valid experience." We find ways to discount it. So be aware of that. Trust your experience.

The thing I find in myself strongly is that sometimes it seems hard to fully take in these moments of non-greed or non-hatred, of clarity, because there's such a poignancy in them. They're so deep and powerful, but there's also a knowing right away of their impermanence. And that even grasping at this—you know, as soon as the grasping comes in, it's gone. In fact, the grasping actually destroys it. And sometimes it's as if, "Well, if I really open, it's just going to go away. I'm going to grasp, I'm going to suffer more, so forget it."

Let's just be aware of this when it happens. Learn to trust our experience. Really open. Experiment with opening to it, and so grasping comes along—fine. That's the next experience. But we don't have to shrink away from opening to the power and beauty of these experiences.

And in fact, the more we do this, we find that we don't have to be so afraid of grasping. It comes or it doesn't. It's another experience. But in the moment, when we learn to say—in an experience of joy or appreciation—to open to it even more fully, we appreciate it even more deeply because we know that it's impermanent, that clinging and grasping is beside the point. And so there's a huge energy, a total vitality of presence, just to experience it as it is. And when it goes, it's gone. That's okay.

So what are these qualities of heart and mind that I'm talking about, more specifically? My intention had been to talk about all three, but I see I'm not going to get past non-greed tonight. So we'll talk about that.

As I said, non-greed is a state of non-attachment, of generosity. It's not at all a neutral, passive state. It's more the state of generosity. It begins with non-attachment—the dissolving of attachments, small attachments in the moment, larger attachments. But it turns into something more like a giving out, a spilling out of that energy into the world, out to other people, other situations. It's no longer just being enclosed in on ourselves.

One way of thinking about the state of attachment is as a state of mind where we compulsively refer everything back to ourselves. What do I want? What don't I want? This is in my way. This is nice. What do people think about me?

How do I look? We refer everything back to ourselves—a state of attachment.

As detachment grows, as non-attachment develops, not only are we free of this exhausting pattern, but the energy that was going into that clinging, into that constant referring back, becomes accessible. It can move outward into a much more generous, open quality of energy, a movement of the heart. Naturally generous impulses, expressions of love, of sharing, of service—these come to be the natural expression of the force of non-attachment or non-greed in the mind.

Now this force arises often and strengthens naturally through our mindfulness practice, which works on quite a subtle level—the level of moment-to-moment arising and passing of our experience. In this level of seeing things arise, seeing the attachment arise and turning our mindfulness to it, often in that very moment the mindfulness itself helps to dissolve the attachment. At any rate, in the moment that we're mindful, the attachment is not being strengthened; the mind is being purified. So mindfulness itself is a very powerful force for the further cultivation of non-greed, for the strengthening of the outflowing of unselfishness, of service. Mindfulness is one way, and maybe the most powerful way, to cultivate this.

I'd also like to talk about another way to strengthen this quality of mind. And again, it's important to notice it when it's present. But by the actual practice of generosity itself, as a practice, it strengthens even more this quality of non-greed in the mind. The practice of generosity is a very powerful practice. In Pali, the word for generosity is dāna, which we tend to use a lot, throw around a lot. It encompasses more, in a way, than just the word generosity. It's a practice in itself that can actually be used as a path to freedom from suffering if we're working with it in that way. It can be used as a path to purify the mind, and it's a very powerful adjunct to our mindfulness practice.

In the scriptures, the three trainings of the mind often talked about are dāna, the practice of generosity; sīla, the practice of morality; and bhāvanā, the practice of mental development or meditation. Dāna is given a very important place in our path to freedom. It has many aspects, of course—any thought of giving, plus actual giving of resources or money or time, energy, a sense of unselfishness, working with renunciation, simplicity of life and desires. Even our meditation practice itself can be a form of dāna.

When we're working with it as a path, it's very important to recognize, as with all our actions, that it's not just the outer action itself that's purifying, that strengthens the non-attachment, but it's our inner intention—the motivation that engenders the action and that follows through with it, the attention we give it. This is a very important point, and of course our mindfulness practice is what enables us to really tune in so well to the intention.

I learned an immense amount about the practice of dāna as a practice when I was in Thailand. Somehow my own perception is that in our culture, generosity as a path isn't given as much weight or thought about so much. I mean, generosity is a good thing, and we all kind of applaud it, but to really use it as a way to develop one's mind and heart, to come to freedom—that isn't so much looked at.

In Thailand, it's a very powerful part of the culture. I was there for a year as a nun, and from the moment—even before I ordained—from the moment I set foot in a temple and started to stay there, this outpouring of generosity and support was just overwhelming. And it never stopped. I have endless examples. What struck me the most about all of it is that it was done with such a spirit of joy, of appreciation. I was literally made to feel that I was doing all these people a favor by letting them give me food, or give me robes, or give me a place to stay, or take me to the train station—just an endless series of little things.

And it wasn't just for me. Being a foreign nun, you do get special attention, that's true. But it wasn't just for me. I was staying at a small temple in the north. There were only about five kutis, little huts, for the nuns, and it was a practice situation, so all the nuns were practicing. In temples, you never know who's going to come. People just show up. And if twenty people show up, they'll find places to stay for twenty people—joyfully—and food to eat.

Very often a group of nuns would just arrive, and the head nun there, who had been there for some years and was the main teaching nun, would with great joy—and I'm not exaggerating—move out of her hut up into this little cave high above the rocks so that the visitors could have her hut. And because I was a special foreigner, they would never discomfort me by putting someone else in my hut or asking me to move. They would all move out of their huts, all clumped together.

And I would sit there and think, "Gosh, I had just come from—well, no, it had been a few years, but I had been on staff here before that—and boy, find one of us moving out of our room for a yogi!" You know? "We think we're going to double up for a night? Forget it."

And when we're doing real service – it's not like we weren't serving at all. But I thought, whoa, we don't know the first thing about real generosity of heart.

And again, I want to emphasize, it's really the working with it as a path that gives it so much power. It wasn't personal. People weren't being nice because they liked me or they liked these nuns. It was a path for these people – a path of growth in their spiritual life, of opening the heart, growth in non-attachment, and also an expression of their pure love of the Dharma. And it was the rule, not the exception. Very rare to meet with anything else.

In observing this over and over, I really came to see how, as a practice, you can't act with this generous spirit repeatedly and do it out of resentment or anger. You just can't keep doing it that way. You can do it a few times, but as you continue to act from generosity – even if sometimes it's a little forced – and you're really paying attention to your motivations, you find that you just can't keep the resentment and the anger or sense of being put out going. Because generosity, the actual action of it, works to help drive away the unwholesome qualities of mind, the afflictions. As you continue to act in a more generous way, the unwholesome mind states arise less frequently. They're simply not so present.

And this is true even without what we might consider perfectly pure motivation. It doesn't always have to be, "I must have incredibly pure motivation of giving or else it's no good, I'm just pretending." We can observe this in ourselves even with what they call beggarly giving. They describe three categories of giving, and the first one is beggarly giving – where you give something but you don't really want it anyway, and maybe this person could use it, and then maybe they'll like me. The motives are mixed. But there is a force in that giving. The attachment to that item has been dissolved somewhat, or you couldn't give it. There's some sense of kindness, some sense of affection. We start where we are.

And in doing that, we see that not only can you not really give with a lot of unwholesome qualities in the mind, but the act of giving also drives away the unwholesome while serving to strengthen the wholesome qualities – the qualities of non-attachment, of interrelatedness. To give something, you do have to let go, and to some extent the attachment to that object isn't strong; it has been dissolved, or you couldn't really give it. In the moment of giving, the clinging releases. It might come back later and you'd wish you hadn't given it, but that's another thing. In the moment of giving, it's been dissolved somewhat.

And it's hard to give without some affectionate, loving, caring feeling. You can't just go and throw something at someone – that hardly counts. But with any kind of sincere looking at our motivation, doing it as a practice, being really honest with yourself, if you're feeling, "I hate this person's guts, I do not want them to be happy, forget it, I'm not giving them this" – no, you can't really do it if you're paying attention. So when you give something, even if it's something you don't want much, there's some affectionate, caring, connected feeling going with it. Some non-attachment in the mind.

The act of giving itself strengthens our understanding, our experience of the sense of unity between one another. It's a very connecting act. It also possibly gives rise to metta, to compassion. Often we're giving out of a sense of compassion for somebody else's need. And so we find that giving does, as a practice, help to cultivate these positive, wholesome qualities of mind. You might find that they arise more easily when you're giving in some way, working with generosity, even if they seem difficult or not so accessible at other times.

The very act of generosity, when we're giving with as clear an intention as possible, engenders a happy feeling in the mind, a sense of lightness. It engenders non-attachment and non-hatred, a sense of connectedness, a sense of caring, a sense of clarity. So it's really a lovely practice.

I want to emphasize again that the act of generosity truly strengthens and brings a great sense of unity between individuals, or between people in general. It takes one out of one's self-absorbed, cut-off, little sense of the world – me, me, me. That referring back to me at that moment isn't happening. The energy is pouring out, connecting with another.

I could see this effect that working with generosity over time has in some of my Thai friends. I think of one woman in particular who once, when I was sick, took me into her apartment for a month. She would get up at five and cook me breakfast. She'd come home from work and cook me lunch because I couldn't eat in the afternoon. We spent a lot of time together, and she was just giving, giving with this huge joy. And it wasn't because we had known each other before. She didn't know me from anyone.

She was giving to the Dharma, to support the Dharma. And you could see in her a growing real strength and peacefulness, an easy willingness to give—not just giving things you don't need, but giving where it's appropriate, where there's genuine need. Such a lovely presence, such strength and peace there was about this woman. And her main practice was this.

So in using generosity, dāna, as a path, I want to emphasize again that attention to our volition, to our intentions in the giving, is a very important part of this. Because it's possible, as we all know, to be outwardly very generous while inwardly doing it for some totally self-serving motivation—like some really rich person who gives a huge amount of money to something but just wants their name all over it because it will help their business. This isn't what we're talking about in working with generosity as a practice.

But paying attention to our motivation, it won't always be pure. This is where the mindfulness practice is so helpful. We're not looking at the intention to judge ourselves, but just to notice. And in bringing mindfulness to it continually, we'll find that our intentions will purify of themselves.

So some things to work with in an actual act of giving—and when I talk about giving, I also include the sense of service, giving one's energy, giving one's time. The first, as I said, is mindfulness to the volition. Really paying attention to it, allowing it to purify as much as possible before actually giving.

This way of thinking about it inspires me a lot: a way of describing the generous act of the bodhisattvas, who have dedicated their lives to serving all beings. In the giving, to have the understanding that with this act, may all beings be free from suffering—including myself. That gives huge power to the act of giving, whether you're giving a cookie or a year of your life. Doing it with the pure intention: may all beings, including myself, be freed from suffering with the purity of this act.

The next is to see the clinging that we might have to the object, to our time, to whatever it is that we're giving—to see that clinging. And in the seeing, as much as possible, to abandon it. Again, not by forcing or judgment, but just through the power of mindfulness, through the power of seeing.

If it's possible to do so, it is sometimes advised—if it's an object—to actually give it hand to hand. When I first heard this, I thought, well, that's kind of nice. But I had an experience after I sat for two months this summer with Sayadaw U Pandita. Actually, it was from the translator, U Nyanapannika, who said this: you should give hand to hand.

I had given Sayadaw a book while I was sitting, and he asked me to sign it. So I signed it and just kind of put it down. And he said, "No, come over here. Hand it to me." He made me hand it to him. The power of that giving—it was as if it increased twenty times, because there was this real, direct person-to-person contact. Looking in his eyes, it actually made me acknowledge with my whole being that I was giving this to him as an act of generosity, as a movement of appreciation. It was like taking full responsibility for the act.

Very powerful, much more than just giving and putting something down. Having real confidence, real faith in the power of the motivation, the intention of generosity. It's not about saying, "Oh, this book is so wonderful"—it's the actual intention, and really being fully present in it, not doing it half-heartedly. And the mettā that flowed between us, back and forth, was very powerful. It was very interesting and very instructive.

So I understand now why giving hand to hand, or in a way that really acknowledges what you're doing—not because you want something back from the person, but for your own being to be acknowledging fully: yes, this is what I'm doing as an expression of generosity.

But please, while you're on retreat here, forget this one. I don't want you knocking on each other's doors saying, "I want to give you this cookie hand to hand!" There's appropriateness to the situation.

Give with your mind totally focused on the giving. Again, this is just pure mindfulness—doing what we're doing with full attention. Afterwards, being aware of our intention again, of any changes in it, as often it will change. Just being aware of that. The whole working with the purification of our mind and heart through intention is not over as soon as the gift is given. It's really being carefully observant after that.

I'd also like to add that another very important part of dāna, generosity, which I've been learning, is to apply these same concepts, these same ways of working, if you're the recipient. Because sometimes allowing generosity to flow, being a really fully present, open recipient, is just as much an act of honor or generosity as the giving. And sometimes it's much harder.

So back to even just taking a compliment. How hard is it to really open and just say, "Thank you very much. I appreciate that." To really let that in. And when we can't—when someone tries to give us something and we say, "Oh no, no, I don't deserve that. You shouldn't give it to me"—

On and on it goes. And what's the effect of that? In that moment, in our own heart, what's the effect? We're blocking off a sense of connectedness. We're shutting the door on that outflowing unity of a heart of generosity, just saying, "No, no," actually referring everything back to me—I'm not good enough, I don't deserve it. Separation.

So I've been finding that working with learning to receive—with the same sense of non-attachment and the same full power of presence—is a very wonderful and difficult practice. And it also engenders a power of non-attachment and connectedness in the mind.

One other aspect I want to mention of working with generosity or dāna is the aspect of service. Again, it's the same motivation, the same outpouring of the heart, the same non-attachment. What comes to my mind when I'm contemplating a sense of service as a practice of non-attachment, of growth and compassion—some of the aspects are joy, but also a great simplicity, a humbleness.

Again, coming back to the key: it's our motivation. It's not what we do. Often we tend to think that if we're really going to be doing service and have it count as a practice, it's got to be something really special. When I was a kid, somehow I got into reading these books by Dr. Tom Dooley, who ran these hospitals in Vietnam in the fifties. And I would be incredibly inspired—that's what I've got to do! I've got to go off into the jungle somewhere and run a hospital in these really extreme conditions. We tend to think it has to be something that makes a difference, that really makes an impact. But that's not what it's about at all. As a path, it's about our intention, our motivation. And it can be very simple, very humble.

A great inspiration to me in this way is the Dalai Lama. A few weeks ago I was out in California for a couple of days to attend a two-day teaching he was giving. And even though he's such a great man—he just won the Nobel Prize, incredibly developed, very learned—when he speaks, the overwhelming sense one gets is of such simplicity and down-to-earthness, just basic kindness. Nothing so special. One of the things he said when he won the Nobel Prize, when people were heaping up all these praises, was, "You know, I'm just a simple Buddhist monk, no more and no less." And the thing about him is you know that he really means that. It's not just posturing to look that way.

Even though the idea of who he is might suggest someone who has this incredible life and is so special, the reality of being in his presence brings the whole thing down to earth again. Here's a person who lives a life that seems, from what one can tell from the outside, to be completely dedicated to service—the service of all beings, without exception. And the qualities one encounters are just this simplicity, kindness, and down-to-earthness. Nothing so special. Nothing so out of our experience or out of our reach.

We don't have to be Mother Teresa to work with using service as a path of generosity. It's just little acts in the moment.

One story I heard when I was in India really struck me—just somebody off on their own that no one ever heard of, devoting their life to service, even if it's something that seems crazy to us. It was a person who was a devotee of Neem Karoli Baba. He had a house somewhere, and he was just devoting his life to feeding anybody who came by. Now, in India that could be a lot of people. But they said—the person telling the story said—when he sees cows coming, he calls for chapatis. Chapatis are these flat pancakes. And he has twelve people cleaning his house, when two could quite easily clean it. But he'd say, "Well, then I could only feed two. This way I get to feed twelve." Nothing so special, but really inspiring to me. It can be quite simple.

This is from Robert Aitken: "Our task, too, is to respond generously to others. We can take as our models not only Shakyamuni the hermit and our other great Dharma ancestors, but also such humble beings as bushes and grasses. With every fiber, beings of the plant world are guiding others, conveying their vitality to the soil, water, air, insects, animals, and people. This is the harmony of universal symbiosis, and it is also our own way of realizing and actualizing that unity. How do we actualize the oneness of all beings? Through responsibility, meaning the ability to respond, like that of the clover. When clover is cut, its roots die and release their nitrogen, and the soil is enriched."

New seeds fall, take root, mature, and feed other organisms. Clover doesn't think about responsibility. And neither did Shakyamuni. He simply arose from his seat and went looking for his friends to teach them. The clover simply puts down its roots and puts up its leaves and flowers.

And so sometimes I feel like that's one of the aspects of what our path of mindfulness, of generosity, is about. It's not to change into something grand, something special, something else. In some ways we become more ourselves than ever. It's much more about allowing the peace, the truth that's already here in our experience, to emerge.

As Aitken writes, the human being does not become an angel, but rather finds affinity with the silent clover.

So it really can be very simple. We don't have to make it into something grand and unattainable to work with these positive qualities of mind, this state of generosity as a path to our own opening and understanding.

Even our practice itself can become an aspect of service when we're working with intention, with our motivation. Even though often it seems like in practice we're sitting here completely self-centered, just wanting the next pleasant state to come, or wanting please God to be free from this particular suffering that's happening right now—meditation practice can also become a very powerful expression of the sense of dana, and also a great cultivation of it. Because the more we practice, our intention purifies of itself when we're practicing mindfulness with sincerity. We can't help but begin to see that we're not separate from society. As Thich Nhat Hanh puts it, when we come in here to sit, we're bringing all of society with us.

And as the Dalai Lama says—I'm paraphrasing—to bring peace, real peace, into the world, it's about finding what real peace is. And that's about developing it in ourselves and from there bringing it out into the world.

When we're practicing with this understanding, which comes and goes but which we're developing, being aware when it is there, our practice itself can become one of the most powerful expressions of interconnectedness, of non-attachment, of generosity that there is. As the Dalai Lama expressed it, talking about the development of the heart and mind of wisdom, one practices for the benefit of all, saying to oneself: "For the benefit of all sentient beings, I will aspire to achieve complete enlightenment."

And that's really powerful—when we feel that we're practicing for all sentient beings, and that includes ourselves. I find it gives such strength, such power to our practice. We become so much more able to be with whatever comes. Because it's not about getting rid of this state so I can have some other state. But yes, even in this moment, as difficult as this moment is, as much as it's not what I would wish to be happening, I'm cultivating a sense of non-attachment, a sense of service, of generosity. And this understanding contributes to the release of suffering of all sentient beings.

It's a very powerful way to practice. It makes it much more rich—as if it could be more rich.

Let's sit for a little bit.

Right Attitude

Carol Wilson · 58 min

> In this talk from the 1989 Three Month Retreat, Carol Wilson offers a comprehensive exploration of sammā saṅkappa—right attitude, right intention, or right thought—the second factor of the Noble Eightfold Path. She begins by showing how right view (sammā diṭṭhi) serves as both the beginning and culmination of the path, with intellectual understanding of the Four Noble Truths evolving into direct liberating insight.
> Wilson presents a fascinating framework from Sayadaw U Paṇḍita demonstrating how all eight path factors are present in a single moment of noting. In this context, right intention manifests as 'right aim'—the precise, unhesitating willingness to connect directly with whatever arises, without preference or resistance. She emphasizes that this same quality of mind applies equally to subtle meditation experiences and challenging life situations, revealing that meditation and daily life are not separate endeavors.
> The talk then examines the Buddha's threefold right intention: renunciation (nekkhamma), goodwill (mettā), and harmlessness (avihiṃsā). Wilson offers practical guidance on working with each, drawing from her experiences as a nun in Thailand and in India. She explains how renunciation isn't about suffering through deprivation but about discovering the profound contentment and clarity that arise when craving diminishes. She explores how intentions of goodwill transform difficult situations from obstacles into opportunities for growth, and how compassion develops through deeply experiencing the universal nature of suffering. Throughout, she emphasizes that cultivating these wholesome intentions is a gradual practice—what we frequently think about shapes the inclination of mind.

What I want to talk about tonight is the second stage of the Eightfold Path. The first stage being right view or right understanding. And what's interesting about right view is that it's both the first stage of the path and also the culmination of the path. So right view in the beginning stages is somewhat of an intellectual understanding of the Four Noble Truths, some seeing that impels us into being willing to practice. And the culmination of the path, liberation, is the direct intuitive seeing into, understanding, experiencing of the Four Noble Truths. So in that way, right view is both the beginning and the end.

The second stage of the path has various translations: right attitude, right thought, right intention. Sometimes I've seen it translated as right aspiration. It's an interesting one to me because it has so many different levels of application, from looking at what right intention and right attitude mean in one single noting moment, just in the arising of one moment of noting, all the way to its broad applications in our everyday life. I find it, especially in relating to our broader life, a very powerful aid, a message in how we relate to our experience. A message that meditation and our life aren't separate. That it's the same—the way the mind relates in one noting moment and the way it relates in some confusing situation in our life. It's the same inclinations, the same mind. And so working with right attitude on these different levels I find very helpful.

So what does right attitude, right intention, mean in one noting moment? One of the things that I've liked a lot that Sayadaw U Pandita often speaks of is how in one noting moment the whole Eightfold Path is actively present. For some reason I find this quite a fascinating way of looking at it. And it's present in that the three parts of the path that have to do with action—right speech, right action, right livelihood—are assumed by our yogi status. In other words, we're observing right speech. Basically, if you're not speaking at all, you definitely are. Right action is also assumed, that we are observing the precepts. And right livelihood, he also says that in the moment, devoting your energy and attention to meditation, to understanding, is considered right livelihood. It's talking about what you're doing right now. So that's the moral part of the Eightfold Path.

And then in a moment when you're actually able to connect with the object and note, the factors of right effort are present—the effort to move the attention to the object. Right mindfulness, the observing power, the ability to connect with the object, to focus on it, to see it as rising if it's arising. And of course, right concentration—that there's enough focus of mind to see clearly what's happening. That's all in that moment.

And then we come to right attitude, right intention. And that's considered, in this very narrow sense, to be right aim. It's that precise aiming not to slip from the object, the willingness to aim very precisely and directly at whatever is arising in a moment. That's considered right aim, right thought. And of course this leads to right understanding, which is knowing what's arising in the moment for what it is, very simply. Knowing the rising as pressure, as tension. It's just that bare experience that's right understanding.

So in one noting, right attitude can be seen as right aim. And what this implies is actually quite broad, because it implies no hesitation, no preferences, a sense of constancy, a sense of willingness to aim and connect immediately and directly with whatever is happening. To give everything that arises full energy. Not picking and choosing, not paying full attention to some and kind of half-heartedly aiming at others, not letting the inclinations of the mind rule what's happening, but a constant, ongoing, unpreferential sense of aim.

And expanding that to our life, what it implies to me is that same willingness to greet every situation in our life, whatever is arising, as our practice. That each situation can be met with this full openness of mind and used as an opportunity to learn and to grow. And in a broader sense, this is what I mean when I talk about right attitude.

We're having a lot of chance to learn that here. Learning that happiness is not dependent on having the perfect situation. I can think of many times that I've been staying somewhere, living somewhere that should have been idyllic, that by all external ways of looking at it I should have been ecstatically happy, and I was miserable. Because it's all in the attitude of mind. And times that we've all had here where you've been in a very difficult situation—even if it seemed like a little thing from outside, internally the situation is quite difficult. And at some point, the attitude shifts and you're able to use it as a teacher. Whether it's someone sitting next to you that's driving you crazy, or certain noises late at night in the bathroom or the library, the wrong kind of food, indigestion every day after lunch. Little things looked at from the outside, but internally it's really quite difficult. It's a painful situation.

And so many times people have said to me, and I know I've experienced the same thing myself, that there's a time when you actually become thankful for that situation because of the learning and the sense of freedom from attachment to the pleasant that comes out of looking at it. So that's one manifestation of right attitude.

Right attitude is also a process through which we gradually become more and more clear about what our real values are in life, what our life's about—moving more clearly from that understanding rather than drifting from reaction to reaction without any sense of what's really important to us.

As this develops through meeting situations with a willingness to learn and grow, that sense of clarity, that commitment to really being in our life, to using it, that understanding—it starts to shine through in your being. It starts to shine through just in the way that you relate to life, the way you relate to little situations. It doesn't matter whether it's a subtle experience happening in your sitting that no one else even knows about, or a really frantic experience at work, or an unexpected and painful interaction with another yogi. They're no different. It's the same mind. And we have the possibility of using any situation that arises as manure—to learn, to grow. Or conversely, there's always the possibility that we'll drown in our reactions.

Without working with our attitude, with our intentions in this way, it's true that difficult situations easily drag us down. The reactions of greed and hatred and delusion in the mind are so strong that they just take over. We identify with them—with anger at the person who wrote us a nasty note, with anger at ourselves for being angry, with anger at ourselves because we wrote a nasty note. It just goes on and on. We spend all our energy then in resistance or in denial, trying to rework the memory so it comes out better and it's not so uncomfortable to think about.

When our attitude switches, when we're working with right attitude, we use that energy to meet the situation constructively. It's that same energy of right aim. We meet both the situation and our reaction to it just as they are—without hesitation, without resistance, without trying to make it different. It's an attitude of interested investigation, no matter what's happening. And from this is where we begin to see where the hooks are, why the particular situation is bringing up so much suffering, why it's so difficult. That's when we really start to break free, to learn.

Right attitude is also translated as right intention. I want to say a little about that. Intention—that subtle aim of the mind, the inclination of the mind—is seen as the link between understanding, the degree of understanding, and the next part of the path, which is action. The understanding can only manifest in action through the intentions of mind that make the action happen. So it's a crucial link, because thought or intention is the necessary forerunner of action.

Now, as understanding deepens, it informs the intention, it forms the intention, and this leads to clearer, more wholesome actions—actions that aren't causing pain and suffering to ourselves or to others.

In the mind without understanding of the Four Truths, the intentions that arise—and intentions often arise as thought—are basically manifestations of the three roots of suffering: greed, hatred, and delusion. They manifest as painful thoughts, angry thoughts, greedy thoughts, thoughts of wanting. And they will obviously lead to confused and painful actions, leading to a lot of suffering in ourselves and in the world around us.

As understanding deepens, this will naturally be reflected in a change in the intentions of mind, a change in the thoughts. As there's more understanding—say, of the nature of suffering—giving rise to compassion, it will naturally happen that the thoughts and intentions will be more reflective of this. Thoughts of harming won't come up so much. When they do come up, they'll be counteracted more quickly by a sense of the pain that that would bring.

But the Buddha also recognized—this is one of his pragmatic approaches again—that while only understanding will uproot completely these three roots of suffering and their manifestation as thought, we can also work with them on the level of their manifestation in thought. We can work with greed and hatred especially on the level of intention, how it manifests in our experience as thought.

The roots of greed and hatred surface in our experience as thought, as intention, leading to action of some kind—thoughts of anger, thoughts of harming, thoughts of wanting. At the same time that we're meeting that experience with mindfulness, a clear seeing that allows for wisdom that can uproot these altogether, we can also tackle the thoughts on another level. That's working with the intention itself.

And how the Buddha suggests to do that is through redirecting the intention—not with aversion, but by cultivating actually the wholesome counterpart to these unwholesome intentions of mind.

To do this, he has quite a specific way. He talks about threefold right intention, which we can work at cultivating. The first of these is to cultivate intentions of renunciation. Now, renunciation springs from the wholesome root of non-greed, and this works on the principle that when thoughts of renunciation are aroused in the mind, they basically replace, dislodge thoughts of desire, intentions of greed. So what's happening is, in that moment, non-greed—the wholesome root—is replacing greed, the unwholesome root. It's kind of like a thought substitution.

And this often we actually have the choice to do this. It's very practical because it's based on the premise that contrary thoughts, contrary roots, cannot exist in the mind at the same time. And it's also based on the premise that whatever one reflects upon very frequently, whatever you think about frequently, that tends to become the inclination of mind. So it's giving some attention to what the mind is dwelling on, and when we have the choice, making the choice toward a wholesome intention rather than an unwholesome one—unwholesome meaning simply that it leads us to more suffering.

So working with developing the intention of renunciation serves to strengthen non-greed and to weaken the intentions of greed. The other two parts of right intention are cultivating intentions of goodwill, or mettā, and cultivating intentions of harmlessness, or compassion. Both of those work as an antidote to aversion, the root factor of aversion. And delusion is really seen through more by understanding.

I want to talk a little about each of these three right intentions and some practical ways that we can work at cultivating them.

Intentions of renunciation—now this doesn't mean enforced asceticism, that everyone needs to give everything up and become a monk or a nun. It also includes, positively, the sense of inner contentment that arises when we're not wanting so much, when we're not needing so much, when we're less caught up in acquiring. A great sense of ease and happiness can come with this kind of simplicity.

I noticed this when I was in India this year. After I'd been there a while, I realized I was really happy. On the surface things were nice, but everything is a real hassle there. You can't do very much in a day. You can go to the post office and sit, you can go to the chai shop a couple of times, and it takes up the whole day. Even taking a bath takes quite a lot of time. I realized actually that at first it's a kind of enforced simplicity—I didn't really have a choice. It wasn't like I had gone with a sense of renunciation. But the simplicity, the renunciation that was happening of itself, led to a great sense of contentment, of appreciation of what was happening. And there being not so many things to want, the mind just wasn't wanting very much. Of course also, what it did want were things it could get, so I wasn't caught up in longing in some ways.

That sense of simplicity reminded me of what renunciation can really bring about in the mind. It's a lovely sense of appreciation and inner contentment.

Our culture in general, at least the way I experience it, is not really supportive of renunciation. It's not really the driving value, shall we say. And I guess this is no different from when the Buddha was alive, because he describes his teaching as running contrary to the way of the world, and that the way of the world is desire. My experience of our culture is that it's organized to enhance desire.

Just anywhere I look—for example, the first thing that comes to mind is looking at the Sunday New York Times Magazine, and about the first twenty pages are full-color ads for all kinds of expensive clothes and expensive perfume and expensive coats, with people in seductive poses to advertise socks, say. By the end of looking at it, either I'm really disgusted if I'm in a moralistic mood, or else I'm thinking that I look like a slob and I have to go into New York and really fix up my wardrobe. Either way, it's cultivating aversion or it's cultivating greed. That's just how our desires run, how our culture is run.

I had a friend whom I met when I was a nun. He was a layman at the temple I was at in Thailand, from Australia. His job before he left had been being in charge of Revlon's advertising for all of Southeast Asia. He was a great artist. He described to me very specifically the psychological tricks they use in an ad to draw people in and make them want what's being advertised. It's very calculated. I had no idea—the setting, the colors. Certain colors will make people want things; certain colors will turn them off. The angles, how big something is. Very interesting. I didn't realize how conscious the advertising industry is about how to activate wanting in our minds. And it works.

So in our culture, we tend to think of renunciation as having to give stuff up, as hard, as suffering. Here is a quotation from Lama Yeshe, a Tibetan Lama who died several years ago:

"Most of us do not know what renunciation means. We're disturbed when we hear about giving up attachment to sensual pleasures, which we take to mean having to suffer in order to achieve inner liberation. But renunciation does not mean that we must give up happiness or that it is desirable to suffer. On the contrary, our aim is to achieve a state beyond suffering. The aim of most of our daily lives is to try to satisfy each physical desire as it arises, day after day, month after month, year after year. We try to achieve happiness by perpetuating something that is essentially transitory. This expectation, stemming from a misconception, can never be fulfilled and is therefore totally irrational."

So renunciation isn't about giving up things so we'll suffer. It's actually a turning away from the craving—

Renunciation is a turning away from this desire for gratification, and it's very powerful. It's true that it can be tremendously aided by an outer simplification in our life. This retreat format, for instance, is a great form of renunciation. You've had to renounce a great deal of outer gratification and sense pleasure in order to come and stay here for three months. And you've done it voluntarily—so that's a true renunciation, not one that's forced. You voluntarily choose to stay here, and you can see the power that comes from simplifying your life in that way.

I learned a lot about that also when I was a nun in Thailand. It was voluntary, but the first couple of months were really hell—adapting to the culture, adapting to what it meant to live in robes, to all the things that one can't have or be involved with or talk about or do. At first there's a lot of wanting. But after a while, when you see that there's no way to get what one wants, the energy turns around into looking at the wanting and seeing how much suffering comes from that. It's much easier then to turn away from the craving, from the wanting altogether, rather than spending one's time running around trying to achieve it.

It amazed me that by the end of the time I was there, although the situation was similar, it stays in my mind as one of the happiest, most contented, and vital times of my life. This simplicity gives such a space for appreciation in the mind and for looking at what's happening and understanding. I'm much happier than times when I have a lot but I'm caught in a space of need. No matter how much I have, then I need something else. And it's stultifying.

So I'm not talking about achieving, or expecting to achieve immediately, a state where we're desireless—looking at renunciation as expecting that we need to be desireless. It's not that at all. It's having a commitment to the attitude with which we greet this mind of wanting, this mind of greed. A commitment to watch and see how desire affects our actions, how it affects our attitude to the world, to use the situation to learn from.

This watching—the nature of desire, and how in our own life dukkha, unsatisfactoriness, is inherent in desire, can't really be separated from it—this seeing of this, this watching it, is one of the things that helps our mind incline toward renunciation in a natural way. It's one of the ways to work with developing this part of right intention. So just watching it. Notice how when your mind is in a desire, how it affects our attitude to the world.

You know how when you're hungry and you're walking down the street and all of a sudden all you see are the restaurants, whereas before you never noticed that at all. Or times here when I've been on a retreat and I'm in a space that's really painful, and my mind is just grasping onto the painful aspect of things. I remember this one moment really clearly. I walked into the room I was sitting in—and I love the room. I had a little plant hanging from the window. But I was in this space of negative, negative. All I was seeing was the pain. And I walked in. The first hit was, "Oh, this is a really nice room." Right after that, "Ah, it's just going to be gone in another month." "Oh, that plant's really pretty." "Ah, it's just going to die." Really seeing things from that attitude—the way that wanting shapes our experience.

Working with renunciation helps us sort through the maze of things that we desire. It helps us know what's really important in our lives. And it lends us the strength not to be so sidetracked into running after this and that. That's why I think sometimes making a clear sense of renunciation to oneself can be helpful. Because then we don't have to spend a lot of time waffling, thinking, "Well, should I have this? Shouldn't I have this?" It's not that there's any one particular thing to renounce that's better than another. But I find it a very helpful and interesting practice.

For example, the eight precepts. And I'm not saying that everyone should go on eight precepts—it's just an example. The times I've been on it as a real vow, say the times I was a nun, it was clear there was no way that I was going to eat anything after noon. There was no discussion, there was no waffling, and it left so much more energy to go into the seeing—to see what not eating did, to see how much energy I actually had for other things when I wasn't trying to decide, "Should I eat? Shouldn't I eat?"

Now there have been times that I was on retreat here and I couldn't decide: should I do eight precepts, shouldn't I do eight precepts? And so every day at tea time, every day, I would go through this whole thing. Whether I ate or whether I didn't eat, there was a lot of energy being expended in working with this desire. Having made the renunciation made a lot of space for looking at things in a clearer way.

And this could go on with anything. It could be a renunciation for three days—just to experiment with the space and the clarity that can bring into the mind.

Another thing I've found helpful in working with renunciation is that I'm not as liable to stay immersed in habit. Habit is a very strong thing. Often we stay in habit because it's comfortable, it's easier, because we're just kind of dull—the mind inclined in the same way, we just do the same thing every time because we're not paying much attention. The force of habit is strong.

I want to read this little cartoon I found quite fortuitously. It's a quiz: "What's your philosophical outlook?" It's kind of like a right attitude quiz.

The first little box says: "You wander down a crowded city street, jostled in the bustle, solitary yet surrounded. You think, 'These people are...' A: my brothers, my sisters. B: perverts, probably pickaxe murderers. C: I sure could go for a chili dog."

And the second: "Amid the crowd, a stranger slowly turns. As his eyes meet yours, you muse..." A: I know what he feels. He feels hope. He feels fear. B: Why is that pervert looking at me? C: Maybe a pepperoni pizza with olives.

And the last is: "Further down, construction workers are tearing the street to rubble. How symbolic, you marvel. It reminds me of..." A: the path of life. B: the highway to hell. C: rocky road, my favorite flavor.

So that's what I mean by habit. The inclinations of our mind are really strong, and they surface whenever we're not paying attention. Working with renunciation gives us more of a chance to see these inclinations when they arise. Because, for example, take the food one—if you're not eating, they can't be satisfied, and there's nothing to think about whether it's satisfying. So you can see the inclinations arising.

We're more aware of that moment of choice, that really interesting moment when you see, say, an inclination to greed arising and you know you have the choice whether to act on it or not. And it's interesting because so much of the time we act on it anyway, even when we know from previous experience that it's going to bring suffering—either that we eat too much, or we didn't eat too much but we're going to berate ourselves for the rest of the day for giving in to greed. Or whatever.

Either way, though, that moment of choice comes over and over. And either way we move with it, when we're working with renunciation and can see it clearly, that's where we have a chance to learn. That's where we have a chance to work with this right attitude. It's not so much about expectations of perfection as about willingness to look and learn.

True renunciation is not from an outer force. Renunciation isn't repression. It's not driving away desire from the mind by filling the mind with aversion and loathing for the desire. You're just substituting aversion for desire—it's not helpful. It's much more about changing our perspective so that the things we inwardly cling to now, when we change our perspective, no longer bind us. We're no longer suffering from that.

As Suzuki Roshi says, "Renunciation does not consist in giving up the things of this world but in accepting that they go away." And that's very profound, because when we really accept that something's going away, that clinging that binds us isn't there, and there's true renunciation in that moment.

Inclining the mind towards renunciation is also helped, as I said, from seeing the pain inherent in desire and from a willingness to keep ourselves open to seeing that, to looking, to seeing that the world around us is full of inspiration—to see the Four Noble Truths, to see the truth of suffering and of clinging and of the freedom from that.

When our minds are open, when we're willing to look in this way, we can see it everywhere. And I know you've all had moments like this—where you walk outside and can just see so much in the season changing from fall to winter. Or taking a walk and seeing a dead snake crushed in the road. Or hearing children crying. Or a really painful memory, a beautiful sunset. It doesn't matter what. It can be the most mundane things. And holding ourselves open to see the depths of the Four Noble Truths in these is a great inspiration to working with right attitude, to being willing.

It gives us a sense of urgency. It renews our sense of commitment to investigation, to really use what comes our way as our practice.

It's said that when we work with renunciation in this way, it's so powerful—it purifies our conduct. As I mentioned, that clarity of intention leads to more pure conduct. It aids in concentration and also nourishes wisdom. So it's very powerful.

One line I recently read struck me in a new way. It suggested that we could look at the whole course of practice as a process of renunciation—beginning from the first time we sit down and start practicing, and culminating in Nibbana being the ultimate renunciation, the relinquishment of everything.

The second area of right intention is the intention of freedom from ill-will, the intention of good-heartedness. This is metta. It's also cultivating a sense of openness to whatever situation presents itself in our lives—that attitude of being willing to learn from situations, both internal and external, rather than meeting them with resentment, ill-will, self-pity, and the whole chain of possibilities.

From Thich Nhat Hanh: "I have to deal with my anger with care, with love, with tenderness, with nonviolence. We do not need to consider anger and hatred as enemies we have to fight or destroy, to annihilate. Dealing with anger in that way would be like transforming yourself into a battlefield, tearing yourself into parts. If you struggle in that way, you do violence to yourself. If you cannot be compassionate to yourself, you will not be able to be compassionate towards others."

So that sense of self-acceptance is really a sense of metta toward whatever is happening in the moment. That's this aspect of right attitude. And we develop it even in one moment with that quality of right aim—that quality of not hesitating, of not preferring, of constantly moving toward and opening to whatever arises. That's cultivating this right intention, the intention of goodwill, a quality of metta toward whatever arises.

When we're working with cultivating this intention of goodwill, difficult situations are no longer in the way, intruding on our practice. They actually become stepping stones, opportunities for growth. Namkhai Norbu, a Tibetan Lama, says that whatever arises as one's karmic vision is used as the path.

And again, this is powerful. Whatever arises—no exceptions—means anything that happens, anything that comes up in our experience, can be used to foster understanding, to foster wisdom. This brings about a great change in our attitude toward things that come up. It's really powerful.

We've all had experiences of this, where we've been really closed, really resistant to something going on continually—the person in the room next to us keeps slamming the door and the resistance is palpable. What are we learning in that state but aversion and closedness? And when we can actually open to the situation as it is, a great sense of learning and growth can come from that.

Here's an example I like very much. I cut it out of the newspaper last year. It's about a woman named Marie Balter, who was seventeen and clinically depressed when she was misdiagnosed as schizophrenic and placed in a state mental hospital. She remained inside for another seventeen years. The article describes how, fittingly for a woman whose antidotes to adversity are perseverance and forgiveness, Balter has returned as a full-time administrator in the same hospital.

"I wouldn't have grown one bit if I didn't learn to forgive," she said in a recent interview. "If you don't forgive your parents or your children or yourself, you don't get beyond that anger. Forgiving is a way of reaching out from a bad past and heading to a more positive future."

This is really powerful to me—someone who has suffered immensely in her life, seventeen painful years in that institution, coming out and putting herself back together, going back to school, getting a graduate degree. She got married. Her husband died. She's had a ten-year bout with cancer. The list of what this woman has gone through is amazing. And her strength lies in her willingness to use these situations to grow and to learn forgiveness. This is what good-heartedness, what non-ill-will, is all about.

One can spend one's time lost in recriminations, in self-pity—and we'll all get caught there sometimes. But it's the willingness to make the intention not to stay there forever, to remember that we can wake up and use what comes.

This reminds me of Don Juan's distinction between a warrior and an ordinary person: a warrior sees everything as a challenge, while an ordinary person sees everything as a blessing or a curse. It's really a strong way to look at life.

Just recently, a few months ago, I was in a situation that ostensibly was fine, but somehow it was pushing a lot of my buttons. I was going through emotional difficulty and was basically unhappy. I found myself thinking about how I could reorganize things, what I should change, because the situation wasn't working—and generally getting tighter and tighter. Then one day it just hit me.

Do I just want to organize my life to be comfortable, or do I want to be free? When that question arose, there wasn't really any confusion as to what the answer was. And I realized if I wanted to be free, then this situation was just the way to learn about that. Arranging my life so I didn't have to face it was only going to lead to more needing of comfort and more fear of similar situations. This helped me a lot.

I do also want to mention that clear seeing, without aversion, enables us to recognize that there are situations that are harmful, that are bad for us—physically, emotionally, mentally harmful. Through wise attention and clear seeing, we know: yes, I need to get out of this situation. That's not necessarily done with fear and aversion. It can also be done out of intentions of non-harming and caring. Non-harming also means taking care of oneself, but from clarity, not from fear.

This leads into the third right intention, which is intentions of non-harming, intentions of compassion—as opposed to the second, which is intentions of metta. Partly the way that our intention of non-harming can be developed is through—and again, it always comes back to this—our own experience of suffering. It's actually another reason that helps me incline my mind towards openness when I'm in a difficult or suffering situation.

The Dalai Lama, when I was out there, said that for the development of compassion—and he's like Mr. Compassion, if anybody is—it's necessary to have deep seeing into the pervasive suffering nature of existence and to feel the unbearableness of it. Now this surprised me a lot because he wasn't kidding. He said otherwise compassion is somewhat hypocritical. So we can begin by contemplating how all beings wish to be free from suffering and yet they still suffer. This is a very powerful contemplation. And it deepens through our own experience of suffering and how unbearable that can be sometimes. This gives rise to intentions of non-harming, to intentions of compassion.

The Dalai Lama also said that what aids this is a sense of the ability to exchange oneself for others—that sense of interrelatedness, that sense of someone else being as important or more important than I am. One way we can work with that is simply beginning to pay attention to the different ways we can relate to a difficult situation that arises here and now. There's a way we can relate to a situation that actually increases a sense of separation, a sense of me and you, without much feeling of compassion. And there's also a way we can relate that evokes a sense of oneness, the sense of being able to replace ourselves with others.

Take a simple example. Say you have a vipassana vendetta here—someone who's driving you up the wall. Now all you have to do is think about them and you're angry or resentful. If you're near that person and they're actually making some sound... it's remarkable right now how sounds are becoming so painful to people. Someone's making a sound, and there are different ways we can relate.

One way brings on a strong sense of separation: that sound should go away, that person should go away, I shouldn't have to be experiencing this—and all the self-righteousness, or all the self-blame for feeling so angry. But it's basically about wanting to make the unpleasant thing go away. The sense of me and other gets really strong. The sense of separation becomes really strong.

And we've all had times here when that suddenly changed around. When we stopped resisting the situation, whatever the situation was. When we just had to give up. Sometimes you can really feel a sense of exchanging for the other person. You suddenly feel their pain. You have a sense of where that action is coming from. And in that, there's not a sense of two separate beings, of that person causing me to feel like this. Just a sense of their pain, and the pain over here, and how it's a mutual situation working together. It's not so personal.

Often people say this leads into a sense of communion with the suffering of the world. The personal suffering becomes a key into knowing that we're all sharing in universal suffering. So sometimes these seemingly silly little incidents can open up our heart and understanding so that we key into the suffering of the world. It's the same suffering, whatever the object. Those times when we can drop the resistance and feel that sense of oneness—that's a real gateway to compassion, which allows these intentions of non-harming to become stronger.

I want to read this one thing from Thich Nhat Hanh about that. I love the way he says things because it's so simple and down to earth. He's talking about wildlife shows on TV, where you'll often see tigers chasing things and snakes eating things. He says: "We long for the well-being of the frog and the antelope, but rarely do we consider that the tiger and the snake must also eat in order to live. We humans eat chickens, pigs, shrimp, fish, and cows. Yet because it is painful to watch, we will take the side of the prey and hope it will escape. In these situations as meditators, we must remain very clear. We cannot take either side because we exist in both."

Some people can remain unmoved or even enjoy the sight of a tiger tearing apart its prey. But most of us, feeling its agony, take the side of the victim. If a scene like this were occurring in front of us, we would try to find a way to save the antelope and the frog. But we have to be careful not to do this just to avoid our own anguish. We must also feel the pain of the tiger or snake deprived of food and have compassion for them. All beings have to struggle to survive. The more deeply we penetrate into life, the more we see its miracles and the more we see its heartbreaking and terrifying events.

We're all developing. We all have the potential for cruelty and the potential for great mettā and great compassion. True gentleness, non-harming, compassion—they need to manifest even in the most difficult, challenging situations. And for that reason, I feel like we need these difficult situations, because it's through them that we see where we're still getting stuck, what is more of a challenge than we're able to meet right now. And that's okay. We have compassion for ourselves and our suffering. But we also can't fool ourselves that we're living in great compassion. There are times that we are, and there are times that it's just too much for us. These difficult situations are a gift to us because we learn where we still need to grow, and we also learn to have compassion for ourselves.

Working with developing these right intentions, right attitude—intentions of renunciation, of goodwill, of harmlessness—like everything else, it's a practice. It's not going to happen overnight. The habits of greed, hatred, and delusion are not too easily dislodged. But as the Buddha said, what we think about frequently, that's what the mind inclines towards.

You'll start to notice—I'm sure you've noticed already at times—if you can really stand back objectively and be honest in this retreat, that the more often we do make the choice to work with right intentions, they do more and more become inclinations of mind. You will find there'll be a time when you're in a painful or angry situation and suddenly the inclination towards harmlessness, towards goodwill, will just arise, seemingly of itself. You weren't sitting there trying to make it happen. It really does happen. Or the inclination to renunciation will just arise spontaneously. You'll see that the mind is beginning to purify, to incline more towards these wholesome roots.

Living in Three Dimensions

Carol Wilson · 52 min

> In this profound retreat talk, Carol Wilson examines one of the deepest patterns that shapes our suffering: our attachment to views, opinions, and mental constructs. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching that clinging to views is even more insidious than clinging to sense objects, she reveals how our need for definitive knowledge and explanations actually imprisons us in what she calls a "two-dimensional" existence—running along the surface of life while missing its depth and mystery.
> Wilson illuminates how this pattern operates at multiple levels: from obvious attachments to opinions about food or meditation practice, to the subtler realm of perception itself, where our mental states color and distort how we recognize experience. Most profoundly, she examines how we construct and cling to our self-stories—the continuous narrative of "me" that we weave from momentary sense impressions, selected memories, and thoughts, mistaking this fabrication for a solid, permanent self.
> The talk offers a liberating alternative: meeting each moment with beginner's mind and wonder, like Suzuki Rōshi's teaching that "in the beginner's mind there are many possibilities, in the expert's mind there are few." Wilson suggests that true wisdom isn't acquiring a body of knowledge but rather opening into mystery—what Joseph Goldstein calls his favorite mantra: "Who knows?" Through vivid examples and gentle humor, she invites practitioners to discover that putting down our burden of self-description reveals the vastness, compassion, and interconnection that is always already present.

A theme that comes up often through retreat, and I noticed it some in the group today, could be phrased various ways. One is this issue—this seeming issue—of control, or letting go of control. It's only a seeming issue, since it's really not our choice, but it seems like an issue. Or the sense of opening into the unknown, the sense of life as a mystery, and the alternative ways of meeting that as either wonderful or petrifying, and sometimes both at once.

I know when I began my meditation practice, and for the first twenty years—I'm kidding, I'm kidding. Only the first fifteen—I was really practicing from this deep motivation of understanding, really wanting to understand life and suffering and what things were about. But it took me quite some time to realize that my idea of understanding was basically acquiring a body of knowledge, that I would somehow get the explanation, or the right way to think about things, or the perfect description, and then I would know what things were about. I'd come to some resting place of, "I don't have to think about this anymore, now I know, I got the final explanation."

Or if it was not a series of thoughts or descriptions, I was looking for the definitive experience. Once had, everything is explained, everything is understood, and you just cruise from then on. Or in the practice itself, trying to figure out the right way to meet every situation that arises so that you're doing the practice correctly. You find out, well, what do I do if this happens? What do I do if that happens? And we're acquiring a list, a manual, of the correct response to each situation, which is impossible to ever have.

There's something that seems quite common, quite deep in us, this yearning for a sense of definitive knowledge, understanding. We often—at least I did—equated wisdom with this type of knowledge. And the more we practice, the more we find out that it's not that way at all. As we move more deeply into meeting our experience moment to moment, rather than coming closer to the nugget of how to look at things that's going to just clear everything up, we find that we're moving more deeply into—as our friend and teacher Joseph Goldstein says, his favorite mantra now is, "Who knows?" You ask about something, he goes, "Well, who knows?" We're moving more deeply into the mystery. And sometimes that's scary.

But if we look in our experience, when we are trying to control with knowledge, this sense of explanation, description, having the right knowledge actually creates in us a sense of limitation. We think we've got it covered. But we're covering ourselves in a nice little square box, and that's it. It creates separation, limitation. It solidifies and limits our world to what we can know and describe. And we try to know more and more and describe more and more, but it leaves out everything else that we don't know. We feel as though this is giving us security, but in a way, it's imprisoning us. You know Krishnamurti's book, Freedom from the Known? We're imprisoning ourselves in a cage of the known, of what we can know and describe, and really who we are and what we are—the world is so vast.

This is probably my favorite newspaper article of all time. I see it as a metaphor for what I'm talking about now: our thirst for knowledge and discovering the vastness. It's a science article from the New York Times of a few years ago, talking about astronomers. At this point—and I'm sure it's out of date because it's a few years old—they had just discovered the largest galaxy ever detected. That galaxy includes more than 100 trillion stars. The galaxy is 6 million light years in diameter. We know we can understand this, right? And this galaxy, with 100 trillion stars, the newest one, is 60 times bigger than our galaxy, the Milky Way. That's our galaxy, in case you didn't know—we personally, Earth, own the galaxy of the Milky Way. This new galaxy of 100 trillion stars is located in the middle of a larger clump of galaxies, a thousand galaxies. So this galaxy is in a clump of a thousand galaxies.

Okay, that's just a lead-in. Now, the astronomers in this article are puzzled. I don't even get what they're puzzled about. They're puzzled because there doesn't appear to be enough matter, measurable matter, in the universe to account for all this clumping together of galaxies. And so since they can't account for it with measurable matter, the scientists proposed the existence of vast amounts of invisible matter that eludes detection because it emits no radiation. According to the prevailing wisdom, 99% of the universe consists of this missing matter.

That's a true article. That's exactly what it's like when we start to turn our attention to our moment-to-moment experience in meditation. The more we look, the less we can explain everything.

And that's only a problem if we need to explain everything. If we don't, then we're open to discover moment to moment that who and what we think we are, the way we've been living, has been so much less, so much more limited than what is actually available to us.

Our practice is a moment-to-moment exploration of how to meet our experience with this freshness, with this sense of wonder, rather than bringing our preconceived notions of "this is matter, and this is how matter behaves, and if something doesn't fit into that, then we've got to make something up." Couldn't we just leave it open to discovery?

When we meet our experience that way, anything becomes so amazing. You know Thich Nhat Hanh's description—it's kind of classic now—that the real miracle is walking on this earth or taking a breath. Anything, when you bring this beginner's mind... Suzuki Roshi, the great Zen master, used to say, "In the beginner's mind there are many possibilities. In the expert's mind, there are few." We bring beginner's mind to everything, and whatever you look at becomes so filled with wonder. A plant. Our bodies. Falling in love—what's going on there? What's going on with birth, with death? A strawberry. Whoever figured out that the inside of kapok trees could be used to stuff a zafu—that's amazing.

When we bring a freshness to our experience, we move out of what Einstein called an optical delusion of consciousness that limits us to a sense of feeling we're just this mind, this body, these thoughts, these emotions. Really, when we can move out of the expert's mind and meet things fresh... I was actually feeling it today. It's as if when we're caught in our descriptions, our opinions, our viewpoints of things, we're living in two dimensions, just running along on the surface. And there's this whole third dimension that's available to us to move and breathe in. But we have to let go of our opinions about things and really meet experience with an open heart and mind.

That's what our practice is about. That's what we're learning how to do. And we can learn how to do it. Sometimes it's fearful to the mind that likes to know everything, that likes to have all the descriptions. But that's okay. A little fear is okay.

So I want to talk a bit tonight about some of the ways we—starting very simply with how we use thought, this thinking process, which we will begin including in the instructions tomorrow—how we use thought, and even prior to thought, to construct these limiting descriptions of others, of ourselves, of our life, without even realizing that we're doing it. And once we recognize the way that we're limited by seeking for answers, just the recognition helps us open and move beyond that.

The Buddha, when he spoke about the second noble truth—that clinging, craving is the real cause of our confusion, our isolation, our anguish—mostly we might tend to think of clinging as being to sense objects, with states of mind being a sense object. Actually, he included a second field of clinging, and this, I think, is even more insidious and imprisoning: our attachment to our opinions, to our views, basically to our mental constructs of things.

I think it's insidious because if we're really attached to our opinions, we don't think it's an opinion. It's the truth of how things are. Everyone else is just a little too dull to pick it up, or too stubborn.

So I want to start with the obvious, but build up, because this has huge implications for how we relate to our lives, for whether we really can perceive our basic goodness or not.

Of course we use descriptions, explanations, opinions. Nothing wrong with that. We need them. How else are we going to vote? How are we going to decide what to do when you go home on Friday night, Saturday night? We need concepts to show your passport at the border. We need things like that. It's the attachment that causes the difficulty—this sense of "this is true, everything else is false."

When we realize we're feeling that way about something, is it possible just to let in the possibility that maybe it could be only my personal opinion, and someone else's opinion could also be valid? It's hard.

A good place to look at this, at least in the States—maybe it's not as strong here—is around opinions about what is healthy and proper food to eat, on or off a retreat. I think it's much mellower here. It's fairly intense in the States.

Why is that funny? It really is. People come with strong opinions about what's healthy, and the cooks often have to accommodate a lot of special needs. We have a whole table we call the special needs table. I was teaching one retreat with some environmentalists who didn't usually sit, and at the end of it this rancher said, "Special needs? I think special needs should be bacon and eggs." He had trouble with the vegetarian food.

At the meditation center where I live in Massachusetts, every summer there's a retreat for young adults, teenagers between thirteen and eighteen. Last year there were about fifty teenagers on this retreat, and Michelle McDonald, one of the teachers, told me this story. They had two or three kids, teenagers from the inner city in New York, really from the ghetto. They came, and the food was much like here—very healthy, vegetarian, not much refined sugar—and these kids literally, physically couldn't adjust to the diet. When you come from sugar, fast food, and grease to beans and lettuce, their systems were going into withdrawal. They were literally ill—diarrhea, sick to their stomach.

Michelle went to the cooks and said, "These kids need some sugar." The cooks would not put any sugar out. They would not do it. "All these kids don't need sugar, and all the other kids would eat it," and so on. After much negotiating, she got the cooks to agree to give these three or four kids who were having a problem their own little private stash of sugar, but they had to keep it hidden.

I thought, these kids are from the streets. They must think we're so weird. They come from where cocaine and heroin are out in the open, and here they have to hide their white sugar.

But it's really about seeing. A firmly held belief about what's good could be true for many people. It could be true for you. But when we are locked in, attached to our description, our belief, it's so scary in a way, so uncomfortable to think it might not be true, that there's a way we actually block perceptions that don't fit our beliefs. Has anybody ever noticed that? It's really quite interesting.

The first step is even to be able to recognize some of the beliefs, some of the descriptions we hold. We won't recognize all of them. But just for a moment, reflect. In your practice here, which is a good place to look. In your life. In your description of yourself.

Who you think you are—now that's a loaded one. How you think other people see you. Just hold the possibility it might be a momentary description that in another minute is completely not true. That can be scary.

Our opinions about other people. Just as a daily life example, if you live with somebody else—your opinions about how things should be done in the house, how clean the house should be, who should do which chores—to even hold the possibility that the way I know it should be is only my opinion.

My partner and I went through years of this. He moved into the house after I was already living there, so you know how that is already. It's my house, and he's moving in and changing things around. And I have, I guess I would have to say, a slight neurosis about the white counters, which I wanted to keep white. We both drink a lot of tea. If you don't clean the tea up immediately, it stains the white counters, which of course we can't have. And that is just so obvious that one would think it's simply the facts of life. It's like the first noble truth: when you spill the tea, you wipe it up. You don't sit down and drink the tea.

Now, my partner has another relationship to life, which is to enjoy it. So he's a real tea meister. He makes a lovely pot of tea and says, "Why don't we sit down and drink it with some relaxation while it's warm, instead of cleaning the counter like a fiend?"

I'm a little embarrassed to say this, except that I know it's not me. It's just conditions.

Four years it took before it really entered my heart with some space. Oh, it's an opinion I'm holding. It's possible that his way is just as right as mine. I'm not saying I let go of the opinion, but noticing it makes some space. It really does. I could meet him with some kindness. I could actually meet him.

That's a small example, but actually a small example like that can lead to a lot of suffering. The Buddha said, in one of my favorite quotations, "For one who is free from views, there are no ties. For one who is delivered by understanding, there are no follies. But those who grasp after views and philosophical opinions, they wander about in the world annoying people." Not only other people—we actually annoy ourselves. It's a lot of suffering.

Notice throughout the rest of this retreat how we relate to our meditation practice. It's a wonderful place to observe how we take specific perceptions—not the whole range, but specific perceptions—and construct an explanation or view out of them. This is good practice, or this is rotten practice, and we simply don't hear or see the balancing views and perceptions.

We get to see this in interviews. It's a real privilege and honor to talk to so many people. We get to see, in a string of conversations with different practitioners, the exact opposite experiences happening—and how we don't let that in. Sharda's teachings about emotions last night and this morning offer a great example. Someone who's having really strong emotions will come and say, "I'm swept away by emotions. I have no mindfulness. I hardly feel a breath. I'm doing it wrong," despite whatever we say up here. The next person comes in and says, "You know, I'm just not having very strong emotions. I'm with the breath a lot of the time, and when emotion comes I notice it and it goes away. I must be suppressing. I'm just not doing it right."

And as much as we talk about choiceless awareness and using the breath as a tool, I've had people come to me after years of practice saying, "Oh, you mean I don't have to be with the breath every moment? It's okay to open up and feel sensations?" I'm serious. After years. We all give the same instructions, more or less. Do you remember Sharda or myself on either of the days talking about continuity? Does anyone remember us mentioning that? Some do, some don't. That's how it is.

On the long three-month course we teach, we go on and on about continuity. I had a good friend—it was maybe his fourth three-month course—and he came up to me one year and said, "You know, it's really great, all this talk about continuity. How come you're mentioning it this year? I don't remember you talking about it before." We didn't just bring it up that year.

Watch how we do this. I'll have a sitting where the breath is really open and free, the attention feels like it's within the breath, and without realizing it, the thoughts come: "Oh, this is what mindfulness feels like." And when it changes, then it's wrong—I have to get back to how mindfulness is supposed to feel. And then it moves to something we like even better, and we think, "Oh, that other one wasn't really it, but this is really it."

Watch how we do that. As soon as the thought can come and we don't have to cling to it, we're not imprisoned. But when we don't see it, it's as if our awareness has snapped shut, and any perception outside of what we've decided is the way things are somehow doesn't register for a while.

She came to me after the fifth day. It was her first retreat. And she said she had just been in agony, sitting cross-legged on the floor the whole time in pain. But the agony was more that she was giving herself a terribly hard time, completely beating herself up, because she couldn't just sit in peace and bliss on the floor cross-legged. And that's what you have to do, obviously, to do the practice correctly. Despite everything we said.

She told me it was the fifth day, and I was talking about something, and she was looking at me and it registered. Oh, she's sitting on a chair. She's been sitting on a chair the whole time. It must be possible to meditate and sit on a chair.

When she really let it in, she let it in. And when she was telling me this, she wasn't really checking with me. But just to see what the mind can do, how locked in we get to our opinions and descriptions. And what's really scary is as soon as we see through it, the mind goes on to the next one. Well, I can sit on a chair, but it always has to be clear and vibrant and alert, or I have to go back to the floor, or whatever. It's just what our minds do.

As long as we see it, it's not a problem. When we don't see it, what's happening? We're freezing experience, as if everything's always going to be the way this particular set of conditions can be described. And of course, it's never really going to be exactly this way again.

So when we are attached to an opinion, a description, an explanation—when we're really attached to it—in that moment, it's like a complete denial of impermanence, of conditionality. Especially in practice: this is the right way to do it. The whole way of working with skillful means, with wise effort, is being able to be open and unbiased to conditions as they are right now. And how they were five minutes ago is already different.

That's why when we say stay with the breath, get really focused, notice the beginning and the middle and really be precise—that's helpful if the conditions are such that your energy is low, you're really spaced out, you don't have a clue where you are. But if you're really tight, if you're holding onto the breath for dear life, if you're hitting each breath with a whip saying get concentrated, get focused, then the instruction to really be precise and notice every feeling in the breath is not helpful. It would be much more helpful to let go of the breath completely and open to hearing, for example.

It's always in flux. It's always opening into a mystery. The last minute might give us some information, but it can never tell us what's going to happen in the next minute. When we can live in this way, it isn't scary. It's wonderful. Life is so alive. We're so present in it.

But the mind doesn't like that too much—the mind that thinks it can know everything. By mind, I mean our thought processes, our emotions, a little mind. It really thinks that by having everything explained and all possible conditions accounted for, we can rest secure. We can rest at ease. And we keep on trying. We keep on trying to do that.

So that's sort of the obvious level of opinions, descriptions, views, and how we get attached. We'll often recognize it after we're attached, when we feel like we're bumping up against a stone wall somewhere. When you're halfway through the retreat and you start feeling really disappointed and frustrated, rather than looking at what's wrong, back up and think: What did I think was supposed to happen? What was my idea? And once you see that, you can just get bigger than it.

On a level down—a more subtle level—a place that our opinions, our descriptions, our views can form and be inaccurate, incorrect, and we still get attached without knowing it, is on the level of perception, just prior to thinking about something.

In the Buddhist terminology, perception is a very specific function of the mind. Our experience consists of our six sense experience: seeing, hearing, tasting, smelling, feeling with the body, and mental experience—a thought and emotion arising. Those six experiences just happening over and over and over, about which we then expand on and think about and describe. And we think our description is the experience. But the description is the description, and the experience is the experience. It's really helpful not to confuse the two.

So there's a basic sense experience. For example, hearing.

Hearing is an easier one to see this with. You notice how when you're in the hearing meditation and you hear a sound, almost right away the mind goes, "Oh, bird." But once in a while, it might not go "bird." It's just the sound. The perception is that moment of mental recognition immediately following on the bare sense experience. So there's hearing, "Oh, bird call." Hearing, "Oh, that's the bell." Seeing, without even thinking the thought, you know—I know that's a rug, that's a zafu. That's perception. It's really a thought process, and it's based on memory and our prior experience.

So sometimes we might hear a sound, and we really don't know what it is. What's fun, if that happens, is if you can just stay on that level of bare hearing—just play with staying there—so that we can see the perception is the next stage of the experience, but it's not necessarily the same as the sense experience. Do you get a sense of what I mean? Hearing is fun to play with because sometimes you can just hear the bird call and not get off into, "Is that a crow? Is that a pigeon?" It's just the sound.

In that moment of the sense impression—the seeing, the hearing, the emotion—and then the recognition, often in that moment there happens to be some emotion, some mental state that's present. And we perceive the experience as if through the glasses, the colored glasses of that mental state. It can completely color and distort the way we perceive or recognize what's happening.

A simple example: ignorance or delusion would be the baseline state of heart or mind that would distort our perception. A simple example is if I don't have my glasses on, I really don't see too clearly. So if I walk on back to my neurotic house again—and the house isn't neurotic—but if I'm walking around my house and I don't have my glasses on, everything looks really clean, and I feel very happy. We have wood floors. "Oh, the floors are clean. The rugs are clean. Isn't it nice?" Then I'm reading. I walk through the house with my glasses on half an hour later. "Oh my God. Look at that in the corner. Look at this." And I'm not very happy. I get kind of dissatisfied. The perception is distorted. That's one example.

Take it if in your mind is the coloring of the mood or the emotion of worthlessness, self-hatred. I don't know if that's familiar to anybody here, but it's one that I have a lot. It can just color everything. I've learned, actually, to recognize when worthlessness or self-judgment is present. I can feel it physically. I've learned to recognize how it feels, and I know that I then cannot trust my perceptions of experience.

So for example, you're feeling like that at work, or even here. Someone walks in the room, and as they walk in they really frown, and immediately you think, "Oh God, what did I do wrong? They don't like me." You know, here you can project like crazy. A woman was telling me this at the last retreat—at work she'd see some guy really frowning, looking at her, and she went off and did a whole story, realizing later the guy wasn't even seeing her. He was just thinking about a fight he had with his wife that morning. It had nothing to do with her.

You know how we can do that? We can build, can't we? If you don't check it out with the person or with yourself, you could go through the whole day building a whole reality about why that person doesn't like me. And depending on our particular tendencies, go into self-hatred or anger or fear or whatever. And actually, we're making it all up. The perception was inaccurate. We do that all the time.

Sometimes really visibly—like when you're really angry at somebody, or just angry, and someone comes in, they can really look ugly. When you're really in love with somebody, or maybe you just have a crush on someone, everything about them is fascinating, beautiful. You love the way they look. Six months later, when the whole thing's passed, you look at that person and you think, "How could they have changed so?"

It's really great—extremely scary to me sometimes, but immensely liberating—to begin to see the power of our perceptions and to learn that we can't always trust them. It's scary, too, to the mind that wants security, that wants to know how it is. Because here we come to really the most subtle and powerful unrecognized misperception and constructed wrong explanation of all. And that's the sense—the often unthought, unspoken sense that we carry so frequently, if it's not examined—of who and what we actually are.

Unexamined, it certainly feels to me as though I'm Carol and that's Sharda and I know the difference. I end with this body, and for all the talk of not identifying with the body, when something goes wrong, it bothers us. It bothers me. I'd rather it didn't. It doesn't bother me as much when something goes wrong with Sharda's body as it does when something goes wrong with mine. I feel compassion, but it has a slightly different tinge than when it's mine. The same with our emotions. We feel limited to this frame of these thoughts, these emotions, and we don't know how to look beyond it. We don't question it. And it's really a basic misinterpretation of our perceptions, happening so quickly that it's hard to see through.

Let me give you an example, an analogy of sorts, for the way our perceptions seem impossible to see through—it just seems that's how they are. You know Oliver Sacks, the anthropological neurologist? One of his fascinating articles, perhaps some of you have read it, in An Anthropologist on Mars, describes a man who was blind for most of his life and then had an operation. He was blind from the time he was four or five until his fifties, had adjusted quite well, had a job as a masseur, and got along fine. His predominant way of defining and describing and controlling the world was touch. He was quite at home. Then they discovered an operation that could restore his sight.

Everyone was around him as they took off the bandages. They were all so excited—he's going to be so happy to be able to see his fiancée, see his doctor. And of course, when the bandages were taken off, he could see. But none of it made any sense. It was just a blur.

Oliver Sacks goes on from this to say that what we see is so clearly a person, a zabuton, a rug, a clock—we've learned to see by putting together memory and what we've been taught and descriptions of the world. We all assume we see the same way, but actually we don't know how other people see. And it's not that way at all. This man never really could adjust to the sighted world. At times it would get so stressful—like eating or shaving—he just couldn't take it anymore, and he'd close his eyes and eat like a blind person, shave like a blind person. And ah, he could relax again, because that was his way of naming and being in the world.

So just to take in the possibility that the way we see things is only one possible construct of seeing. What about the other ninety-nine percent of undetectable matter? Maybe there's all this stuff right here in this room we can't see or hear. Who knows? Just to let in that possibility.

Because it's really the same with our bodies, with our sense of ourselves as being emotion, as thought. One of the things that can get interesting in a retreat is that we begin to have physical perceptions that don't fit in with what we're used to of our body. Suddenly, some people in the group are talking about how the abdomen feels huge. Suddenly you feel fifty feet tall. Suddenly your hands feel like they're swollen. You feel like you're completely tilted over and you open your eyes and you're sitting quite straight. This stuff can happen. It's no big deal. It's not something to try for. It's got nothing to do with wisdom. I'm just saying sometimes it happens.

When we let it in, how often the mind gets frightened. No, what's happening to my body? Nothing. It's just not ever the way you thought it was. This is another way of experiencing it. Sometimes the sense of structure goes completely away and it's just sensations coming and going in space. It's just another way of experiencing it.

Technically, sensations, thoughts, emotions—all these six sense impressions—are just arising and being perceived so quickly that everything seems solid. But you know how when things are so close together it seems solid, but actually it's not.

Sometimes we begin to experience our body that way. Sometimes, as the Buddha said once, if you must identify with some part of your experience and think it's permanent, at least it makes more sense to do it with the body, because the mind is changing so much more quickly. But actually, I find I identify much more with my mind.

So begin to just question—not even think about what your view is and question it, but just hold, as you go through the day: Do you feel like you're the same person, the same you? All your experiences have changed, but sort of, I feel like I'm the same Carol I was yesterday, even though if I look, the thoughts are completely different, the emotions are completely different, my physical sensations are quite different from what they were yesterday. What exactly am I holding to as the description of the sense of Carol?

Watch your thoughts as you go through the days, assuming thoughts are still arising. Notice how many of your thoughts—and I'm sure this is different for different people—how many of your thoughts are a little self-description. I find I'm going through the day telling the Carol story. And by the end of the day, it feels like it's been one Carol, one story all day. But really, look, it's completely changing all the time. One sense impression will arise, out of which we construct a whole story, select memories, select certain perceptions, and say, "Yes, that's me." The next moment, we completely flip.

I remember one time I was teaching a retreat, and my mom was real sick at that time. She'd just been diagnosed with kidney cancer. I was walking in a beautiful place. A memory of my mother came up, a feeling of sadness, just noticing. And then I kind of clutched at the feeling of sadness. "Oh, I'm so sad." Memories came of all the different times in my life I was sad, how sad life is. I was walking in a beautiful place. The flowers are dying. Everything comes to an end. At this time you see the impermanence, but you don't see the beauty of it—just everything's sad, everything's awful, all the times I've been sick. Just this whole heaviness, this sense of Carol.

Five minutes later—not even—that thought had passed. The sadness had passed. I looked up. It was a lovely evening. There were some roses there. I smelled them. Ah, the beauty of life. I'm so fortunate to be able to be in these beautiful places, to have this blessed life where I get to share Dharma with people, to travel. Life is just one big blessing when you open into the beauty.

Totally different experiences. Both of which I embraced equally as being me. And without examining them, I would have said that was one continuous Carol—when it was just a sense impression, the emotion of sadness, the smell of the rose, and a whole construct of specially selected memories and perceptions that bolstered that particular story.

Once I was on a retreat, and I had just seen a movie prior to the retreat. I don't know if any of you did that or have had the experience that you then have to watch that movie a lot for the time that you're sitting, and it was a long retreat. But it hit me halfway through. It would be Harrison Ford doing his number running around. Then Carol would be doing her number running around. Then Harrison Ford. Then Carol. And absolutely no difference. The Carol story wasn't any more real. It was just more thoughts and emotions. The Harrison Ford story brought up thoughts and emotions too. In the moment, that's all that was happening. Thoughts, emotions, memories, sensations. That's it. And everything else we construct, and without looking, it feels continuous and solid.

Can we stand that? Can we stand to be without our self-stories? For some reason it's really scary. Now that's the real paradox of practice, because the source of our most anguish is the same self-story. So putting it down is actually such a relief.

It's this huge burden—all the things I think about Carol and what she does and how she feels. I can just put it down and feel sadness. Fine. Fear. Okay. I don't like it. Okay. Now there's real bliss. Fine. It's just what it is. But somehow we can't stand that. We want to make a story out of it.

We never know what's going to arise in the next moment, despite what we may think. This retreat gives us the illusion, as do our day planners and our lives, that we really have things under control. The schedule's pretty rigid, the bell rings, you all come here to sit—it's a miracle, you know, that it really happens. So we do have this illusion. I know where I'm supposed to be through the end of 1999. But it's an illusion. I don't really know. I don't really know where I'll be in the next moment. Anything could happen.

It's not that we give up plans—we do what we need to do—but we just know it's "as if." Who really knows? We think that's scary, but really this letting go into the unknown is an act of radical trust, of radical acceptance that truth is revealing itself in this moment if I can really just be here for it.

Some friends told me about being at Holy Mountain Arunachala in southern India, where Ramana Maharshi had his ashram. They had climbed up to the top of this mountain in the very early morning hours. Just as it was getting light—it's very rocky with some bushes and branches—there were these mountain monkeys. They were telling me these monkeys are kind of wild, not like the monkeys below that will come into your room if they think you have a banana. These ones are wild, and they said it was amazing to watch because they would be way up high and they would just let go of the rock or the tree and throw themselves into space as if they could fly, with either reckless abandon or total trust that they would come down to some rock or some branch that they could hold onto. And as far as my friends could see, they always did.

It's that sort of abandonment—okay, just dive into this moment. We have no idea what it will provide. But even if we try to hold back, it's still going to be here. It's still the same. We let go into it. We put down the burden and life becomes so alive. We move into that third dimension. We begin to be able to touch, to recognize the vastness—so much vaster, so much deeper, so much richer than all our descriptions and our self-explanations and our thoughts about what truth is. Because its vastness is beyond any thought, any description. Any description limits it, sets limits, and so immediately isn't true.

The only way we can recognize this, rest in this, touch it, is by just for that moment putting down all our descriptions, all our knowledge, all our explanations. You can't think about this. I mean, you can think about it endlessly, but it won't do any good. And it's not to try and stop thought—just to see that awareness is bigger than any thought or any explanation. Use the explanations, but don't try to hold them. Don't try to let them define our reality. Be open with wonder to meet this moment.

That's really all we can do, and that's what our practice is. The moment, the experience, the truth reveals itself. Not only do we not have to do anything, our very doing gets in the way. If we can just, like that monkey, dive with abandon into this knee pain, into this sound, into this fear, into this moment of peace—whatever it is. And when it changes, meet the next one with wonder and openness. That's when we begin to actualize our potential to live in a much deeper and richer and vaster way than we ever could imagine is possible from thinking about it.

Don't hate our thoughts. Use them.

But don't let ourselves be defined by them.

And then we'll see—as John Muir said... it's not that you come to some sense of nihilistic "who cares, nothing matters." It's just the reverse. We find—this is what John Muir said—he said, "I find when I touch anything, it's connected to everything else in the universe."

That's really what we find: that place of compassionate connection beyond, greater than, vaster than the world of knowledge and description.

It's like coming home.

It's not like coming home. It is coming home.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 8

The Facts of Life

Carol Wilson · 50 min

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson examines why we struggle to rest at ease in the present moment despite our deep longing for happiness. Drawing on the Buddha's foundational teachings of the Four Noble Truths, she illuminates how our habitual reactions to unpleasant experience and our constant craving for something other than what is present keeps us spinning in confusion and suffering.
> Wilson explores the First Noble Truth (dukkha) not as a pessimistic declaration that "life is suffering," but as an honest acknowledgment of the facts of human existence—that pain, change, loss, and unreliability are inherent aspects of life rather than personal failures or cosmic mistakes. She shares moving examples, including a passage from Jean-Dominique Bauby's 'The Diving Bell and the Butterfly,' to illustrate how genuine presence with difficulty can coexist with profound appreciation for life's beauty. The Second Noble Truth on craving (taṇhā) is explored through practical investigation: Wilson invites practitioners to examine the actual felt experience of desire and notice how the craving itself—not the lack of what we want—creates our dissatisfaction.
> Referencing teachings from Chögyam Trungpa on "basic goodness" and Ajahn Buddhadāsa's invitation to "get familiar with freedom," Wilson points toward the liberating recognition that peace is not something to be created or achieved but is already present in moments when the heart is free from clinging. The talk offers a compassionate reframing of meditation practice—not as self-improvement but as uncovering what has always been here.

I hope you all don't feel as grim as you look. I actually know that sometimes when I'm practicing and I'm incredibly happy inside, I catch a glimpse of myself in the mirror and I look like I'm at death's door or something. So I know the outside and the inside don't always look the same. It just struck me.

Last night Sharda ended her talk by mentioning that the Buddha said he taught suffering and the end of suffering. She also talked about the habits of mind that keep us from recognizing our loveliness, as she put it. So I thought I'd pick up on that theme tonight, talking about what are some of the habits of mind that keep us from recognizing what Chögyam Trungpa used to call our basic goodness. It's a phrase that I love.

It's easy to come to meditation practice—I certainly did—thinking that somehow if I learned what the truth was, and I learned how to meditate well enough to really live in the truth, I would find some kind of wonderland where I was always happy. I didn't really lay this all out clearly at first, but I came to see over the years that this was what I was expecting freedom to be. We use the word happiness, right? So we think of always being happy. But what do we really mean by happiness? And what was the Buddha talking about when he speaks of peace and happiness?

What I've come to see is that one of the real mysteries of our life, of freedom—one of the sadnesses, really, that I think prompted the Buddha to teach from what we read—is that while all of us deeply want to be happy in some way, even the people doing the most screwed up things, if you really look underneath, somehow it's motivated by some warped idea that it will make them happy. While we all want that, what the Buddha supposedly could see after his awakening was that the very things we do in order to promote our lasting happiness are the very things that keep us spinning in suffering and confusion.

It's said that this motivated him to teach, to spend the last forty-five years of his life sharing what he'd learned, what he'd awakened to, the truth of things. On the other hand, it's said that before he started teaching, when he saw this, he had a moment of discouragement, of thinking nobody is going to get it. "This generation," the translation says, "this generation so relies on attachment, is so wrapped up in attachment that they're not going to be able to hear." I don't think things have changed much in that we rely on attachment. But he did teach. He was luckily persuaded to share what he'd seen, because there are people who can hear.

So the conundrum is that in our deep drive to be happy—and in some ways it's our birthright—we keep doing the things that promote our confusion. Because on some deep level, most of us don't really understand the nature of freedom, the nature of happiness. So we set our sights on some imagined freedom. What else can we do until we know what it is? But we keep looking in the wrong direction. We keep looking for, as I was, some kind of steady mental state of bliss. I'd float on the clouds and I wouldn't have unpleasant experience for the rest of my life.

When you think of freedom, do you think about the people you love dying? Do you think about having relationships break up? Do you think about getting sick? Do you think about just waking up and feeling grumpy? Do you think about sitting here and falling asleep and having your knee hurt? Do you think about coming here for peace and instead having to deal with aversion all the time? Do we have to get rid of all that stuff in order to maybe get close to experiencing freedom?

The answer is no. Freedom, real happiness, real peace of mind, actually has nothing to do with what's arising in our experience. Do you believe that?

Mostly, the place we get hooked is in the reactions of heart and mind to what's arising in our experience. Because on some level, the habit of our mind tends to be that if things are the way we want them, or pleasant, or nice, then it's good, that's on the way to happiness. If it's confusing or painful or somebody's angry or things just aren't working out the way we think they should, internally or externally, the reaction is one of aversion or fear or pulling away. And we get caught in those reactions, the interpretations, the expectations of what Sharda was talking about last night. We get so involved in manipulating, controlling, trying to arrange our reactions that we miss the fact that absolute peace, happiness, ease of being, freedom from clinging—our birthright—is always immediately present. So immediate that we don't notice it, because we're so busy.

It's like we're in prison and we're rearranging the pictures on the walls and the furniture to make it more comfortable, but we don't notice the door is open and we can walk out. It's sort of like that. We're on a self-improvement project.

Enlightenment is not a self-improvement project. It's turning around and seeing that what we're looking for has always been who we are.

But we're so busy looking to fix things, to get what we want, to get rid of what we don't want, that we forget to turn around our awareness and notice the vastness of heart and mind when it's free from the limits of clinging and fear. And it's really hard for us—not just to believe this, but to actually live this way.

This is a poem from a Tibetan teaching:

Not knowing that this state is within oneself, how amazing that one searches for it elsewhere. Although it is clearly manifest like the radiance of the sun, how amazing that so few see it. No matter how much happiness and sorrow is experienced, how amazing that it is never impaired or improved in the slightest. This self-awareness is naturally free from the very first. How amazing that it is liberated by just resting at ease in whatever happens.

That's what's so hard for us to do—simply to rest at ease in whatever happens. Here, now, in this moment, in your sittings, in your walking, that knee pain, resting at ease in whatever happens. The restlessness, the self-criticism, resting at ease in whatever happens. Why is that so hard for us? Maybe it's not hard for you, but why is it hard to trust that? To trust that when there's the simplicity of complete presence and total intimacy, something other than this constant manipulating and fearing and clinging can reveal itself—really what Trungpa called our basic goodness. It's never gone anywhere. We're not here to create it or change ourselves.

As Nyoshul Khenpo, a wonderful Tibetan master, says: "All meditation practices work to uncover our innate wisdom and purity—uncovering our innate wisdom and purity by recognizing the obscurations for the changing, insubstantial appearances that they are, thus revealing what has always been present."

I think that's a great description of our mindfulness practice. We're not trying to become perfect mindfulness junkies here. And it's possible to take our sense of having to be better, having to be perfect, having to change ourselves, and apply that to how we do meditation practice—thinking we have to become the most perfectly mindful person.

I teach every year on the three-month retreat at IMS. It's just like this, but it lasts for three months, if you can imagine that. One time there was a man who was, at that point, a little caught in trying to be the most perfectly mindful. He could document, very proudly, fifty-two or fifty-six different sensations in the lifting of his foot during walking meditation. Something to try for. I'm kidding! We had a conversation about different cultural humor, so I have to remember I'm not English, and when I'm being sarcastic like that, you might think I'm being serious. It's not something to try for, recognizing fifty-six different sensations. It's fine if you do—great. So what? It's a matter of being present to one or fifty-six. It doesn't matter. It's the quality of presence. Not for an ulterior motive, but because when we're present, that's when we can recognize our basic goodness. It's so here that we can't be looking in any other direction. The slightest pushing away—"I don't like this"—the slightest reaching out—"I want something else"—completely hides the radiance of our true nature.

So just reflect: how much of our mental energy is spent pushing away and clinging to something else? Or the third option: dulled out, zoned out, bored, disconnected. How much? A fair amount.

The Buddha recognized this. Speaking about why it's so hard, why it's at times almost impossible to rest at ease in whatever is arising, why we keep missing the secret—when he gave his first teaching, and always after that, he spoke about what I call the facts of life from the Buddha: the Noble Truths. The first two are suffering and the cause of suffering. He's simply saying, "Folks, these are the facts of life." Now, I've mulled over why, out of all the things he could describe as useful for freeing our heart and mind from confusion, for allowing us to come home to where we've always been—why did he choose these as the first two things to teach?

suffering or unsatisfactoriness, pain, unreliability in the world. And the second truth is that the cause of our confusion is clinging. Why did he pick them out? In some ways they might seem obvious.

I just want to talk a little bit about, from my experience, how not really recognizing or living from these truths is what can keep our heart and mind spinning in this confusion.

The first one is often described as "life is suffering." That's really not quite right. It's a little crass. Not inaccurate exactly, but not the whole picture. As I understand it, the Buddha was simply laying out the fact, as a truth of life in a human body on this planet, that there are elements of pain—that there's birth, sickness, aging, disease, death, being separated from what we love, having to be together with what we don't love. These things happen.

And we think, well, that's not really new information. That's not a revelation I wasn't aware of. But is it really? How do we tend to relate in our experience here or in the world? Really, our experience on a retreat is a microcosm of our life. The patterns with which our heart and mind respond to situations here didn't just suddenly come up when we got into the silence. These are the patterns of our heart and mind in our life. It's just that the situations, instead of being incredibly complicated, come down to things like: Am I going to be the first person in line at tea? Or, am I making too much noise in the meditation hall? If you really look at it, you see that these aren't particularly significant events. And so that lets us notice the way the mind and heart react more clearly. It lets us shift our attention, and that's the place where understanding can come.

So notice what kind of responses or reactions come up here in life when something you don't like, or that's really painful or sorrowful or scary, arises. Do we say, "Well, of course, this is just a fact of life"? Sometimes. But also, it's so easy to view it as either a mistake—my mistake if we tend to turn it inwards, or somebody else's mistake if we turn it outwards. If we could get rid of that somebody else, then everything would be happy again. Or if we could just fix ourselves, then everything would be happy again. It's a basic level of denial of the simple fact that difficult, painful things happen, and that this is not bad or good. It's just a fact of life.

Often we might miss the fact that this denial shuts us out, shuts us off from a deep connectedness with all of life. It's like we can't shut down selectively. If we could, we'd all probably feel a lot happier. But when we're shutting down to something painful, we're just shut down.

And it's hard to be with pain. It is hard. It's hard to be with sorrow. It's hard to be with fear and anxiety. So we practice little bits to learn it.

I want to give you an example of the effect of being shut down and how common it is. Once I was in the hospital about ten years ago. I'd been there a few days, and they were having trouble getting the IV into my veins. Your veins kind of collapse sometimes after a few days. The nurse couldn't do it this particular time, so she got nervous after a few tries and went and called the doctor, who just happened to be passing. At which point my heart sank, because doctors aren't usually the ones who do IVs. Nurses are usually much more skilled at it than doctors are. And I wasn't, of course, in my most equanimous mental state anyway.

So this doctor comes in, and he was jabbing around, and he wasn't doing a great job either. I was just a little shaky, and a couple of tears came out. That's all. I didn't say anything. And he looked at me, looked at me straight on and said, "What's the matter with you? This doesn't hurt."

It's amazing, but I can understand it, because through being able to be in the truth of pain, of difficulty, we're awake to all of life. If he could let in that that was hurting me, it meant he had to let in that he was hurting me, even though his intentions were good.

He wasn't hurting me on purpose. But to let that in—that's got to be hard, to feel like you're doing something to another human being that's painful, when you don't want to.

So, "What's the matter with you?" I just watch. How much do I do that to myself? How much do we all do that to ourselves? And on the level of, if something goes wrong with your body, you're really sick, you're really sad, you're really depressed—is there often somewhere in the back of the mind, "Well, come on, snap out of it, get over it, pull yourself up by the bootstraps, what's the matter with you?" If I could just think the right thoughts, say the right affirmations, I wouldn't be sick. It's proof of spiritual failure that something's wrong with my body. As if we never get sick, we never die. There's some basic level of denial going on here, and it's pretty widespread.

So I think really that's why the Buddha talks about this—so that we can begin to open without feeling that it's a mistake, or that we need to be scared of it, or that we're going to drown in sorrow, in suffering. We don't need to be afraid of the sadness. We don't need to be afraid of the pain.

On the last retreat I was teaching, a man said on the second day—such a lovely insight. He said he'd been going through the usual second day of being caught in the hindrances, those strong emotional states of mind that can really cloud our perception, one of them being aversion. I don't know if any of you have recognized that in the last day or two. But aversion that just colors everything. And he was just feeling aversive to everything that was coming up in his experience—the people that walked by, the feelings that he had. He was labeling all these things as bad. This is unpleasant. I don't like it. Therefore, it's bad. It's wrong. It must be gotten rid of, out of existence.

And suddenly he stopped and saw what he was doing. And he said, "Wait a minute. If I'm making all these things bad, and it seems like my whole day is filled with these bad things, I'm making my life bad." He said, "I don't need to do that to myself. This is unpleasant. It's just part of life. Not good, not bad. It's just how it is."

And that's the suffering that drops away. It's extra. We can just be with the difficult, with the unpleasant, with the scary, without adding this extra—"It's bad, I'm bad, it's wrong, oh my God, what do I do about it?" It's just how it is.

I know many years ago, when I first heard this First Noble Truth, when I first started practice, I was only about nineteen, and I didn't have a particularly suffering childhood—just the normal confusion. There was nothing horribly wrong in my life. And I had bought into the suburban, American suburban, unspoken culture that really everything's happy, happy. You just keep the unpleasant things behind closed doors and pretend they don't happen. And you come out, and you go to college, and you get a job, and your life just gets happier and happier. I couldn't understand why that wasn't happening yet. In fact, why did I feel so unhappy and confused, and I couldn't really point to any big reason?

When I heard this, it was like, "All right, of course. Somebody's saying the truth." That's just how things are. Sometimes really beautiful, pleasant experiences happen, and then you know what happens? They go away. And something unpleasant or difficult that I don't like happens. And you know what happens? It goes away. That's the second aspect of this First Noble Truth—there's physical, emotional pain, and then everything changes.

When I heard this, it was like, "Oh, right, I can just relax." I don't have to keep pretending everything's great. And I don't have to feel like I'm some kind of freak because I keep seeing that everything isn't great. I can just be with things as they are.

This is the first step of resting at ease in whatever arises—the step that ultimately lets us recognize our true nature.

You know Robin Williams, the American comedian? Someone told me that he already has his tombstone bought and engraved, and it says, "I knew this was going to happen." If we could know that, if we could really know that, wouldn't we stop hassling about so much? We just don't know when it's going to happen.

Another aspect of this opening, this willingness to be with the unpleasant, is what I call not actual unpleasantness, but this underlying sense of the unreliability of things. It's really moving into the aspect of impermanence, which is also part of this First Noble Truth of unsatisfactoriness, of dukkha.

Unreliability in the sense that whenever we're looking to somebody, to something in life, to our own emotional state, to our job, to having gotten everything finally under control in a way we can handle it—it changes. It changes. So we can rely momentarily on ourselves, on people, on our bodies, on a relationship, but we can't rely ultimately on anything because everything is in constant flux.

This is another "duh, what else is new?" moment. But do we really live that way? Do we really live from that place of dancing in the change? The moments that we do, there's such a beauty, such an aliveness to life. Because being in tune with the fact that everything's changing isn't horrible. It really frees up our clinging to allow deep appreciation of the moment. It lets us be really alive.

But something in us seems geared to want some kind of security, some kind of reliability, some place to stand that we can depend on. As the Buddha said once, the search itself for some place to stand is burning. Being able to let go into the unknowing is cool and refreshing.

But it's hard.

Have you ever been in an earthquake where there are a lot of aftershocks going on for the next couple of days? It's very unsettling. I was in one in Yucca Valley in California—not a huge one, but fairly large. It was the desert, and I was just standing out in the desert. Nothing was really harmed. It was kind of cool, you know. The land is moving and everything. Wow, this is kind of far out. That was okay. That lasted for a minute.

It was the aftershocks that came every three or four minutes for the next three days that were unsettling. Because of course they always have to come on the radio and say, "Twenty-five percent chance of the big one in the next three days." It's awful. So it's a combination of just lying down to go to sleep, the radiator starts shaking, everything starts rattling. Is this the big one? Do I have to run? No, okay. Just settling down to sleep again, everything starts shaking. Is this the big one? Oh, no.

It wasn't just on a mental level. By the end of twenty-four hours, physically, cellularly, I could feel that the body had somehow been depending on this earth to hold me up. If nothing else, there's Mother Earth. Well, guess again. She's moving too.

Can't depend on anything for more than this moment. Let that in for a minute. It often brings up sadness, poignancy, fear. And I think one of the reasons we can also be in denial or hide from this is again not being comfortable—or it's our basic habit: it's fearful, it's unpleasant, it makes me sad, okay, it can't be true. We don't say it that obviously, but: okay, I'll think about that later. Yeah, sure, I know my relationship can't last forever, but right now it's going great. I know I'm not going to live forever, but who knows, it feels like it. And so we just don't let it in.

Now, by letting it in, I don't mean living like with those aftershocks in constant fear. That's not the point. The point is that as we begin slowly to let in this fact that everything changes—including us, including our moods, including everything—the clinging to things that can't be reliable begins to let go.

And what is it that allows us to rest again in the vastness of our true nature? The heart and mind flee from clinging. When that lets go, we're actually dancing at ease in the change. In fact, change is beautiful. Can you imagine if nothing ever changed? If those birds never shut up? Would we like that?

I read in the Guinness Book of World Records about the bizarre things people do. The one that stuck in my mind is the world's longest kiss. I think it was seventeen hours. Does that sound pleasant? A minute, okay. Seventeen hours—please, let's have some change.

So even pleasant things going away. Both of these: being willing to rest, at least a little bit, in unpleasant experience. Of course sometimes it's too much and we have to pull back. Of course. That's why we practice it. And being willing to dance in the changing flow. Rather than being dreary, oppressive, depressing, or fearful, it actually allows us to embrace, without clinging but with appreciation, what's here in this moment. Because on some level we begin to get it: all there ever is, is this moment. And in that immediacy of presence, again, something other than just the superficial reality can begin to reveal itself.

Just to begin that sense of appreciation—have you read Stephen Levine's latest book? It's called A Year to Live. I haven't actually read it; I just know the concept. And I have friends who meet every week with that premise. Imagine that starting from now, you know you have a year to live. Would that change how you're relating to this moment, to your life? And if so, how? Can it really help us come into, rather than just living in fear for the year, counting down the days, really living in this day?

And amazingly enough, this practice that seems so simple—just come back and feel the breath, just come back and feel your knee pain, just come back and feel the aversion, just come back and feel the joy, whatever is manifesting now—it's teaching us how to really be awake and immediate in this moment, how to open to what's true.

A friend of mine, a man who comes to retreats a lot in California, told me this story last year. He's older, and he's one of many people who are very committed to their spiritual life and practice. He comes to many meditation retreats, and it feels like his meditation is not really going anywhere. I don't know if you've ever had that feeling. "I'm not particularly concentrated. I'm not one of these good, incredible yogis. I don't have all these great experiences of oneness and selflessness. I'm just plodding along, thinking and coming back to the breath, spacing out and coming back to the feet, for years and years and years." But dedicated, doing it.

He told us last year that he had had a very serious heart operation in the meantime. He'd had to have a valve replaced. And after he came out of it and was in intensive care, something went wrong.

He didn't really know what, but there was a moment where all the lights were flashing, all the bells were going off, and they're running from all over, putting tubes in every orifice. Basically, he just felt: I think I'm about to die. And that was what was happening.

And his mind said, "Oh my God, this next breath could be my last breath because I'm about to die." And he said it just came in—he said, "If this is my last breath, I guess I ought to be here for it." And he just came in and was totally present with that breath. And then he passed out. And when he woke up—he did wake up, obviously.

That's beautiful. What else is there to do? And you can't think, "That'll be a good idea. I'll do that when the time comes, and in the meantime, let's just have fun." It doesn't work that way. Although we can have fun being present. That's actually the most fun of all—really being present for whatever's happening. Everything else starts to feel like running away.

I just finished reading a book that I found surprisingly moving, along these lines of really waking up in the present no matter how it is. It's called The Diving Bell and the Butterfly. I don't know if any of you have read it. It's exquisite.

A man had a massive stroke and woke up after some weeks of coma with what's called locked-in syndrome—completely paralyzed, but completely awake. The mind is intact, and in his case, the only thing he could move was his left eyelid. By moving his left eyelid, he dictated this whole book to someone who would go through the alphabet, and when it would get to the letter he meant, he would blink his eyelid.

It's a beautiful book because it's just describing his experience, and he's so vividly alive, lying in that room, blinking his eyelid. He can turn his head a little bit. It's not like a goody two-shoes, "Oh, isn't life beautiful?" He's really describing his experience, and it sounds like amazing suffering.

At the same time, the diving bell describes how he feels—this big invisible diving bell completely pressing on his body, so that he can't move, and he's in pain, and everything's heavy, and he's wrapped in this cocoon. And the butterfly is like butterflies of the beauty of life that just fly through, and he gets to catch them from time to time.

I don't think anything I can say will convey what this book is like, but let me share one paragraph to give you a sense. He's talking about the letters people write him:

"Other letters simply relate the small events that punctuate the passage of time. Roses picked at dusk, the laziness of a rainy Sunday, a child crying himself to sleep. Capturing the moment, these small slices of life, these small gusts of happiness, move me more deeply than all the rest."

The whole book is like that. He'll talk about something awful, and then this will be the next thing. And he's really present in both. It's a man who's really seeing the facts of life. He hates it. I mean, he's not saying, "Oh, I'm so glad I'm paralyzed so I can live vividly in my mind." Really, it's painful. It's awful. It's poignant. It's sad. He misses things vividly. But he's present in that, and so he really appreciates as well whatever's coming through. It's one of the most vividly alive books I've read in a really long time.

That's the quality of knowing the facts of life, so to speak—being able to accept them and really be awake in the midst of it. You really don't want him to have to... He died, actually, the next year after he wrote this.

That's one possibility. Let me read you this other passage. This is another way of not reading the facts of life—from a man who could have everything. This is Marlon Brando, from an interview in a German magazine that a friend translated for me.

I find that heartbreaking. Because it's that movement away from difficulty and into the pleasant. At that time, the only pleasant thing for him was eating. And the belief—we don't even know it's a belief—that happiness is going to come from moving away from unpleasant experience and holding on to pleasant is what keeps us locked in a cycle like that.

That brings us to the second truth: that the root of our suffering, of our confusion, is this very clinging. The clinging only arises because of our confusion in the first place. When we really, just for a moment—and we all experience these moments—when the heart is free from clinging, in that moment you're just resting at ease in what's here. A cup of tea. Looking at the pond outside. Sitting here and feeling your knee pain, but just at ease. There is no clinging. There is no pushing away. That's an intimation of real freedom from suffering. That's the direction that our mind and heart deepen into when we understand things the way they are.

So one way to understand is to investigate the unpleasant, the difficult, the changing, and how we react away from that. Another is to investigate the nature of this craving, this clinging, when it arises in our experience. That's more when we're going after the pleasant. And if we really tune into the clinging, the craving itself—which I find fascinating actually, it's just fascinating to tune into it—then we can also begin to discover how it is the clinging that's perpetuating our confusion and our dissatisfaction.

It's not that we don't have what we want. We think that's the problem. Like Marlon. He doesn't have a hot dog, so he's not happy. He gets the hot dog, he eats it with sauerkraut. Then he wants another one. It just keeps on going. It's not the getting what we want; it's the clinging, the craving itself that keeps us running in this cycle of suffering and confusion.

So our practice here isn't to condemn it, but to get interested in the experience of craving. I want to make a distinction here. When I talk about craving or clinging, in English we have the word "desire" that we use broadly, covering various subtleties of different mental states. In the Pali language, which is what the first Buddhist teachings were written in, they have different words. It's much more precise in regards to specific states of heart and mind. The state I'm talking about, this clinging, this craving—the more accurate translation of the word in Pali is thirst.

So when you're saying, "I'm tired, I want to go to bed," and it's just kind of seeing the body's tired, wanting to go to bed—we might say desire or "I want," but that's not clinging. It's just a neutral desire. But when you're sitting here at two o'clock, and your body's heavy, and you say, "I've got to get to bed, and I don't care, nothing is going to stop me, I've got to get to bed or I'm going to die"—that's the thirst. That's craving. And that is what blinds us. That's what keeps us looking away from the fact that we're already essentially complete.

What we're looking for in the nap, in the food, in the relationship, in the better mental state, in the body free from pain—what we're looking for is the essential completeness that's already here. And it's the desire, the craving itself, that keeps us from noticing that.

So don't believe me, because believing doesn't do any good. But experiment. Use this time here as a laboratory.

Just notice when you're walking or when you're sitting. Walking is particularly good for this because it's more likely you could actually do something about a desire that comes up. When you're sitting, there's less you can do. So you're walking.

Notice when you're walking and things are just relatively peaceful. Nothing much going on, but you're present. And the thought comes: I'd really like a cup of tea. Now, that thought could just come and go. It's just a thought. It could be the same as, Oh my, isn't that a nice bird? It doesn't have to be desire. And you just keep going, peaceful.

Then the thought comes back again with a little more oomph. I really need a cup of tea. Now. And it becomes compelling. Notice the difference. A minute ago, things were fine. Now—same body, same walking up and down, same nice day—things are not fine. And something has to be acquired in order to make things fine again, or so it seems.

Usually what we do is focus on the thing to be acquired. The thing could be a sense object like tea. It could also be a mental state. It could be another person. It could be an action like a phone call. It could be another really nice thought. It doesn't matter what the thing is. Instead of focusing on that, take your attention into exploring the experience of the desire itself. Feel it in your mind. Feel it in your body. See what it feels like.

For me, it's really as if I go from an open field to something clenched, limited. And not only does this sense of tightness and limitation come in—dissatisfaction—but also the sense of separation. The sense of Carol gets much stronger. And Carol is separated from her tea at this moment and needs to go do something about it. And you get there, and there's a line for the tea, and everybody else becomes the enemy because they're in the way of what I need to experience peace again. Or so we think.

There's something about desire, about craving, that when it's not looked at is almost sweet. Notice when you're in a pleasant fantasy—it's almost as if we really enjoy that wanting if we don't look at it. But look at it. The craving itself really is not very pleasant. And that's why we're so motivated to do something to make it go away.

So what I'd like you to experiment with doing is: don't do anything to make it go away. Just keep walking. If you simply explore it, at some point it will begin to dissipate. When it begins to go away and when it's really gone, keep paying attention. Because the revelation can be that the peace we were really looking for with that tea—it's already here. When the desire goes away and we're not blinded by that looking away, and we're here again, awake, resting with wakeful presence in this moment—ah, peace. There's nothing to want.

Wishlessness, as Thich Nhat Hanh says. The idea is we don't have to put something in front of ourselves and run after it because everything is already here in ourselves.

In that moment of the heart and mind free from clinging, free from aversion—just get familiar with it. Notice what it's like. Just for that moment, clinging doesn't arise, aversion doesn't arise. Not because we think, Oh, it's bad, it leads to suffering, I don't want to go down that path, it's really not Buddhist. No. It doesn't arise because it doesn't make sense. We're experiencing the intimation of our basic goodness. From that place, it doesn't matter. We don't need more, we don't need less.

It's just as it is. From that place we can act with intelligence, we can act appropriately. It doesn't mean we turn into some kind of blob, unable to distinguish right from wrong or what's appropriate. Rather, we act from compassion and intelligence rather than from fear and desire.

So the truth is this: freedom from clinging, the heart and mind that's free from clinging, free from aversion—a moment of that is an intimation of real freedom, the freedom the Buddha was talking about. We all have a lot of moments like that. There are no big fireworks going off. You might not be having some fantastic state of mind. It might just be a moment of pure presence in the sitting, in the walking, when you're eating your lunch. Just notice those moments. Begin to recognize the potential for real peace, for real ease in those moments.

The way Ajahn Buddhadasa, who was a wonderful Thai forest monk, used to say: get familiar with freedom, with nirvana. Get at ease with it. We're looking for something too flashy sometimes, and so we overlook the fact that peace is available. As Thich Nhat Hanh says: please help yourself.

CHAPTER 9

Opening of 3 Month Course

Carol Wilson · 1h13

> This talk marks the formal opening of the 27th annual three-month retreat at IMS, delivered by Joseph Goldstein and Carol Wilson. Joseph begins by acknowledging the accumulated energy of this practice space and the significance of gathering together during difficult times. He explores the foundations that support extended practice: a deep interest in knowing oneself completely, the quality of mettā (loving-kindness) as simple friendliness toward all experience, and a correct understanding of renunciation—not as grim endurance but as joyful lightening and letting go of clinging.
> Joseph offers practical guidance for the journey ahead, emphasizing that difficulties are part of the path, not mistakes. He warns against 'Vipassanā brilliance'—getting lost in fascinating thoughts rather than cultivating direct awareness—and reminds practitioners that insight arises intuitively through silence of mind, not through discursive thinking. The quality of patience as constancy, rather than mere endurance, serves as the foundation for practice through all the inevitable ups and downs.
> Carol Wilson then speaks deeply about the meaning of refuge in the Triple Gem: taking refuge in the Buddha as our own potential for awakening, in the Dhamma as both the teachings and the truth of each moment, and in the Saṅgha as the community of practitioners supporting one another. She emphasizes that refuge is not habitual routine but a conscious commitment renewed daily. The talk concludes with the formal taking of the three refuges and five precepts (pañcasīla), marking the entry into three months of noble silence and intensive practice.

Before we begin this evening, I'd like to introduce some people who will be helping to hold the energy of the retreat, the container of the retreat.

Of course, you've met all of the five teachers: Carol, Guy, Stephen, Michelle, and myself. In addition to us, I'd like to introduce Rebecca Bradshaw, who is sitting to the right of Carol. She is a teacher trainee who will be here throughout the retreat performing many supportive functions—sign-up interviews on days off, leading some sittings. You'll be seeing her around, and we're really grateful that she can be here. Tomorrow morning I'll introduce the two IMS resident teachers, Amy Schmidt and Annie Cohn, who will also be here in a supportive role during this retreat.

I'd like to introduce Alan Cooper, who is here all the way in the corner in the back. He is the night contact person in case of emergency. He's a trained nurse, has worked in hospice for many years, and is a longtime and very experienced practitioner of meditation. So again, we're very happy he's here.

I hope you get the sense that you're well supported. There are a lot of people holding this. And it didn't always used to be like that. This is the twenty-seventh three-month retreat, so you're coming into an accumulated energy in this hall and in this place which is really quite profound. You'll be adding to that stream of energy.

We've learned a little bit over these twenty-seven years about how to run these retreats. In the late seventies or early eighties, we came up with the idea of what we called Independence Week, and all the teachers just left. We thought it would be good for the yogis to be independent. It wasn't that helpful. We came back to disaster. So I think in all of these years of doing this we have learned, and I think you'll find the benefit and value of the support of all these people helping you to hold the practice.

Coming together on retreat is always a special time, and it's especially so when people come together for six weeks or three months. That's a significant commitment, and it reflects that deep commitment within yourselves. I could feel it starting Friday as you began gathering. It was like an in-gathering of people from so many different places. As we did the go-around this morning, it was quite amazing—from so many different parts of the world and of this continent and this country, gathering together to join in this, especially in these times, in this very difficult time. There's a tremendous power in the coming together, in the being together, and practicing the Dharma of freedom, the Dharma of liberation.

Joining together in this way is the beginning of an amazing and wonderful journey. Starting tonight as we ring the bell and enter into the silence—three months of silence—we're really entering into a whole new realm, very different than our ordinary lives. We're entering into a realm of silence, of depth, the kind of depth that in our ordinary lives we don't often touch. We enter into a realm of solitude, even amongst one hundred, one hundred twenty-five people. We create a space of solitude for each one of us. And most amazingly and profoundly, we enter a realm where we come face to face with ourselves, where we're no longer so caught up in the distractions of our lives, but we stop and we turn inward and we really see ourselves.

This is a very rare thing in the world, and as is obvious from the events of the last weeks, it's tremendously needed. We need to understand ourselves. In some way I see Dharma practice as being the master game of life, because it is an exploration of life itself. It asks the most fundamental questions. What is the nature of this mind and body? What is the nature of birth and death? What is the nature of consciousness, of awareness? A great mystery.

Dharma practice is the exploration of the nature of suffering and discontent, both in ourselves and in the world. As you all know very well, this is not a running away or avoiding of suffering. It's a looking into it, into its depth, so we can begin to understand it. And it's also the exploration of the possibility of a genuine and transforming happiness and freedom.

You all know that this journey is not always an easy one. Buddhist meditation practice is not a bliss trip. And so if you have that expectation, please leave a note for one of us, because that's not what these three months are about. We have such strong mental habits of judging and comparing and restlessness and agitation and sleepiness and dullness and doubt and living in the past and living in the future. All of these things are within our minds.

It takes a strong commitment—which obviously you all have, because you're here for this length of time—and it takes a certain fire, a certain passion to be awake, to be mindful, to be aware, because it's in the face of many other habits.

So the question as we start on this journey: Where does this commitment, where does this passion for awareness, for wakefulness, come from? How can we connect with its root, with its source within ourselves?

First, it comes from the quality of a deep and great interest. It's that interest in understanding ourselves, that willingness to know ourselves fully. Most people in the world do not have this. They're simply acting out all of the conditioning of family and education and culture. This is a rare thing in the world—to have the interest and the willingness to know oneself completely.

There's a poem from an eleventh-century Japanese woman poet, Izumi. She's talking about looking at the moon at dawn, solitary mid-sky: "I knew myself completely, no part left out." In a way, that's the challenge to us. As you're here on retreat for this extended time, can we foster that commitment?

It's possible because everything is workable. There's nothing in our experience that is outside the realm of dharma practice. Whatever arises—and many different things will arise in the course of this time—whatever arises within us is workable. We can be with it with that attitude of: let me see, let me understand, let me open to it.

For so many years in the beginning of my practice, I would get into these amazing struggles with myself about all the defilements of mind that I would see arising—the greed and the anger and the fear and the pride and the jealousy, whatever it was. My tendency would be to see it and then feel terrible about myself, or to judge myself, or to be reactive against my teachers for pointing it out to me.

At a certain point there was a major shift, and I recommend the shift to you early rather than later, if you can manage it. That shift happened when I deeply and truly wanted much more to see the defilements in my mind than not see them. It was almost like taking joy in seeing them, because in the seeing, that was a way of working with them. I could also see the transparency and the impermanence and the non-selfness of them.

We don't have to fight or struggle or judge ourselves for what's arising. If we have that attitude of interest and the joy of interest, of seeing it all—"I know myself completely, no part left out."

You are all experienced practitioners, and so you know very well that in the course of this retreat there will be many surprises. There will be many ups and downs, where you're feeling happy and inspired and full of energy, and at other times you feel bored and depressed or angry or fearful—and then it changes again and again. It's all part of this passing show.

The foundation for this interest, for this willingness to open, is a quality of heart that we will be talking about and practicing a lot. But it's helpful to connect with it right at the beginning of this long journey. What supports the interest in this exploration of our minds and our bodies, of suffering and freedom, is the quality of mettā, of loving-kindness. Loving-kindness towards ourselves, loving-kindness towards others.

And it's not some great, fantastic mind state of ecstatic bliss that we're looking for. This quality of mettā, loving-kindness that I'm speaking of, is really the very simple quality of friendliness. Just basic, easy, simple goodwill towards ourselves, towards our fellow yogis, towards the world, towards everything that arises.

There's a line from a Japanese samurai poem. One of the lines says, "I make my mind my friend." That is a wonderful line. If we did nothing in this whole retreat except that—except making our minds our friend—that would be a great accomplishment. We need to remember, we need to plant that seed within us, and know that it's this energy, this quality, which supports the immensity of the journey.

The second support for opening to every part of ourselves is something that Michelle talked about quite a bit last night, and that is the quality of renunciation. I'd just like to mention a few aspects of it that I think are particularly relevant as we move forward. Renunciation is so often misunderstood—even just the English word.

Who wants to renounce? It sounds so gloomy and heavy and burdensome. But that's really a misunderstanding of what it's all about. Renunciation is a lightening. It's a relaxing back into simplicity. It's not being so cluttered in our lives. It's letting go of addiction. When we hear that word, we really want to understand the joy of it, not see it in this heavy, burdensome way. It's about lightening. It's about lightening up on so many levels.

The implication of renunciation in understanding our meditative journey is enormous. Because when we understand it correctly, we see that the meditation practice is not the struggle to get something. It's not to get something that we don't have. It's to let go. It's settling back and letting go again and again and again on the deepest levels. It's about not clinging, not grasping.

Well, that's a huge relief. You can really relax. There's nothing to get. I can stop the struggle. Now it's a question of simply settling back and not holding on. It's a very different mental stance.

This understanding of renunciation really is the power of every great monastery. In some way the great monasteries have understood, in a way that most societies don't, the power of this letting go, the power of not grasping, of not clinging. For these three months it's as if we are creating this great meditation monastery together. And this is the understanding, this is the energy that is at the heart of it.

It's renunciation of pleasure as being the guiding principle in our lives. Mostly in our ordinary lives, that's a major influence. We keep going for what's pleasurable or what's pleasant. This is the normal conditioning of our lives. But on retreat, as we're looking deeply at ourselves, everyone will face at different times enormous challenges and difficulties. They are definitely going to come. The tendency or the temptation would be to pull back from the difficulties and to try to find some more agreeable way, some more pleasant way.

A couple of years ago I was at a conference with some academics who had constructed a study on contemplative experience, but they really had no experience or real understanding of contemplative experience. They had gotten a big grant from a foundation to do this study, and so they went around the country interviewing people about their contemplative experiences. The one that really struck in my mind and stood out for me was this whole report on the contemplation of snorkeling.

I thought, oh, that's the one for me! Snorkeling is great. But this ain't snorkeling. It's not just swimming along in the pleasantness of things. That's nice enough, but it's not really what this contemplative path is about. We want to go much deeper than that. And what that means is really facing the difficulties that will come.

A basic understanding that's necessary as you begin this journey is that difficulties are part of the path. They're not a mistake and it's not that you're doing something wrong. This is part of it. And this is true of any discipline. If you want to become a great athlete or musician or whatever, in any discipline we always come up against boundaries and edges. And it's not about simply trying to find the easiest way. It's trying to find balance. How can I be with what's arising? How can I extend myself?

In the last couple of years I've become a great mountain biking enthusiast. Of course I'm still in the very beginning stages of this, but it's been very instructive. At first, I'd be going with friends, and we'd be going up these hills, and they were all more experienced than I was, and they'd be at the top. Maybe ten minutes later, I'd get to the top, totally panting and out of breath and feeling like I was dying.

And I would only go up these hills if I was pulled along in their wake. When I was biking by myself, I would never think of going up them. But then, as I just kept going out more and more often, I found that my body was getting stronger. It was becoming easier. I could go up the hills with less effort. And it was really a pivotal moment for me in this whole endeavor when I would be out by myself and looking for a hill to go up. Being at that edge, playing the edge with balance.

A lot of what we'll do together is finding that balance. But that's how we get stronger. The difficulties are part of the path. We incorporate them and learn how to be with them skillfully. There might be times to back off a little in order to have the strength and balance to go forward.

So this is the first understanding of renunciation: the pleasantness of the moment is not always the measure of what's valuable.

This time is also a renunciation in a very immediate and real way of family and friends and your familiar life. It might be particularly striking in these times that are uncertain and unsettled. When you come here, it is a renunciation of that. And we begin to appreciate the great beauty and power of silence. This is such a rare event in the world—a hundred people coming together and being together in silence. There's a great power in that. There's a huge relief in not having to present ourselves to anyone. That's the beauty of the silence and the solitude. We can relax back into ourselves, into being just as we are, so that we can see ourselves clearly with no part left out.

It's a renunciation of pleasure as the main guiding principle in our lives. It's the renunciation of family, friends, our usual support system. It's the renunciation of fixed ideas of ourselves, of who we are. Renunciation of fixed ideas of the spiritual path. If you have any idea of how these next six weeks or three months are going to unfold—renounce. It's going into the unknown, going into a mystery. We can't possibly know, and the not-knowing becomes a source of tremendous energy. We don't imprison ourselves in these little boxes of preconception. Letting go of ideas of self-image, of who we are, of how our practice should be, of how the path unfolds. Just imagine for a moment letting go of all that—the relief and the ease. We just settle back right into the moment exactly as it is.

So a few suggestions as you begin this journey. These are really reminders of things you already know well. Given that it is completely natural to go through all of the ups and downs of practice—the easy times, the difficult times, feeling happy, feeling sad, feeling bored, feeling interested, all of it—given that this is part of it, a quality that serves us so well, and that the Buddha spoke of so often, is the quality of patience. The Buddha said it leads to nibbāna, leads to enlightenment.

But we need to be careful with that word in English, because sometimes we hear the word patience and it has a slight connotation of endurance. "Okay, I'll endure through this." That's not the quality the Buddha was talking about. It's not an enduring. Rather, as Suzuki Roshi used to speak of it, he said it's more the quality of constancy. We just stay with it. We have that kind of patience through all the ups and downs and cycles and rhythms of these days.

You really have one very simple job. You have a secondary yogi job, whatever the particular work assignment is, but your main yogi job is to sit and walk. When you finish sitting, walk. When you finish walking, sit. When you finish sitting, walk again. It's very simple. And if you just keep that constancy of practice, the whole dharma will unfold.

It's important to remember that all of your experience, the whole range of it, is really like the changing weather.

It's just appearances of changing conditions. There's a saying in New England: if you don't like the weather, wait five minutes. Because from hour to hour or day to day, it can change a lot. Well, that's so true of our dharma practice. There'll be some great thunder and lightning storms. Can we open to them? Can we enjoy those as well? Being patient, having that sense of constancy.

The second piece of advice that I'd like to offer you, if you take it, will serve you very well. It will be a wonderful strengthening of your practice. And that is the understanding that meditation is not thinking about things. There are some useful dharma reflections, and we will talk about these later, which can be a help. But what I mean when I say that meditation is not thinking about things—I'm meaning all of those endlessly meandering thoughts.

There's a meditative disease, a yogi disease, which I know very well. I'm a survivor. It's called Vipassana brilliance. It's like we sit and the mind gets a little quiet, and all of a sudden our minds become so brilliant. We have all of these wonderful ideas and we get lost in them. We have these creative ideas about our lives or some project. It could be wonderful new insights we have about ourselves.

At one point in my practice, I was so caught up in the fascination with my own mind and thought process. Because it was fascinating. It was completely interesting. But I was going through this period where I was just lost in it for such long periods of time. I remember saying to myself—it's like I got just disgusted with my mind—I said, "Joseph, do you want to think or do you want to get enlightened?" It jolted me a little bit out of the habit of simply going with it.

It needs a certain understanding and resoluteness from the beginning of the retreat, really the beginning of each sitting, the beginning of each walking, reminding oneself. Because the habit is so strong, so easy. We just get lost in thought meandering, and it's enjoyable, and the hour goes quickly, and we think that was a good sitting. It's not productive from the meditative perspective.

So we need to set a strong intention in our mind from the beginning. It doesn't mean that thoughts aren't going to come. They will come in vast numbers. But it's just to remind ourselves that the practice is really to let go of that meandering, to come back again to a moment of mindfulness, of awareness. And if we do that with some regularity and commitment, it's tremendously strengthening for our practice.

Just in support of that, I'll offer you the first of the many Vipassana mantras that will be suggested throughout the retreat. You can use this just as a reminder to yourself: Nothing is worth thinking about. Whatever you're thinking about, nothing is worth thinking about—from the perspective of this practice, now. There are times when thought is useful, but meandering, discursive thought? Now it's not. Because we begin to understand that insight and wisdom are not discursive; they're intuitive. They don't come through thinking. They come through silence of mind, where all of a sudden, quite intuitively, we simply drop into a new space—seeing in a different way, relating to experience in a different way. So this is a renunciation of our usual habit. And it opens us to an entirely different kind of space.

The Buddha said that the gift of dharma is the highest gift, the greatest gift. This is the gift that you have given yourselves for six weeks or three months. You're really giving yourself the highest gift in this world. It's the gift of coming back again and again to awareness, to mindfulness, to loving-kindness, to compassion. And out of the silence and awareness, comes a wisdom that can hold even the greatest suffering. And that's why what we're doing here is so relevant to the conditions in the world now. The Dharma of understanding, the Dharma of freedom, can hold it all. We create a context of meaning and understanding for everything that's happening. It's a wisdom that allows us to break through the cycle of fear, of violence, of hatred. The Buddha pointed this out 2,500 years ago, and it's what we need to find for ourselves, in ourselves, so that we're able to share that understanding and wisdom with the world.

I'd just like to close with a poem that was just published in the last issue of the New Yorker magazine, which dealt with everything that's been happening. It's by a Polish poet, Adam Zagajewski. It's really a beautiful poem. I think it sets the tone as we enter this retreat.

Try to praise the mutilated world.
Remember June's long days and wild strawberries, drops of wine, the dew, the nettles that methodically overgrow the abandoned homesteads of exiles.
You must praise the mutilated world.
You watched the stylish yachts and ships.
One of them had a long trip ahead of it, while salty oblivion awaited others.
You've seen the refugees heading nowhere.
You've heard the executioners sing joyfully.
You should praise the mutilated world.
Remember the moments when we were together in a white room and the curtain fluttered.
Return in thought to the concert where music flared.
You gathered acorns in the park in autumn and leaves eddied over the earth's scars.

Praise the mutilated world and the gray feather a thrush lost, and the gentle light that strays and vanishes and returns.

I wanted to make sure that you each had one of these sheets, because as you know, we always begin retreats by taking together the three refuges, the triple gem, and at least the five training rules—five precepts, guidelines of non-harming behavior. And I think it's really important, at least in my heart, that it's not just another habitual routine that we go through at the beginning of a retreat. "Oh yeah, the refuges and precepts, namo tassa, blah blah blah," and then into the retreat. Some of you have done it many, many times.

Because I actually, as I sit here, feel very deeply about refuge in particular. In times like now, when things are very confusing, enormously painful, both personally and globally, the sense of refuge, the importance of examining for each of us personally, quietly, in our minds and in our hearts—what really, truly, for me, is my refuge? Where do I go in my mind, in my heart, when things are really difficult? When I'm afraid, or when I'm cranky, or when I'm needy, or when I can't handle the pain that's in me and around me? Where do I look, both habitually—meaning unconsciously—and also consciously when we're awake? Where do I go for refuge?

We start our retreats this way. The Buddha began all his teachings this way. Everyone who came to the Buddha and, after hearing him, said, "Yes, I want to be your disciple. I want to practice this way of awakening"—that was formally begun by the taking of the refuges. So it's by no means an idle tradition. For me, I feel that it's a very deep setting of our conscious intention, our conscious commitment to what is most deeply true and important for us in our life. It's very personal, too.

So refuge, of course, in the English word, means a place of safety, a place we can rely on for peace, for protection—something trustworthy, that we can have confidence in. And so when we talk about taking the three refuges, using the terms that have come down to us from the Pali...

How do we, if that's true for you, that you really feel you can take refuge in this triple gem, how does that translate for you in your heart, in your actions, in your consciousness? How does that manifest in the way that we live, in the way that we take decisions, the things that we do?

I think it's at the core of our whole practice. For me personally, the taking of refuge is something that I do on a daily basis. And when I'm on a retreat, which as Joseph said is not always a walk in the park, during difficult times I might be taking refuge many times a day. I find that it reconnects me with the strength and the confidence and the courage to keep opening to whatever is happening, because of my deep trust in the refuge—that the Dharma is really the truth of this moment.

Let me offer my interpretation of the refuges, and I invite you to consider what they mean for you. This is a time when conscious reflection can be useful.

The first refuge is taking refuge in the Buddha, which can be a sense of encouragement, a sense of inspiration drawn from the historical Buddha. But knowing that Buddha means one who is awake, the essence of the inspiration of this refuge has nothing to do with him as a person anymore, because he's long gone. When we take refuge in the Buddha, we're also taking refuge in the living potential in each of us—that is, our living potential for awakening. Not in some other lifetime, but here and now, just as we are in this situation. It's immediate. It's real.

Taking refuge in one who is awake is recognizing, acknowledging, and establishing some conscious confidence in ourselves that this potential of awakening—and living from the wisdom of who we really are, that Joseph spoke of—this potential is alive in each of us. It's who we are. It's really what we hopefully come to retreat to touch and recognize and trust more and more. In taking refuge, we realize that's true now. You don't have to be a different person than you are for that to be true. It's about recognizing and going to this potential for refuge rather than to some idea or some other not so reliable source of momentary ease or comfort.

Taking refuge in the Dharma, or Dhamma in Pali, encompasses many meanings. It means the doctrine, the teachings of the Buddha, which can be conceptual and serve as a way to help us understand and guide our practice. Dharma also means truth, the way things are—the way things are right now, the laws of nature, which is us, which is the way the whole world is manifesting. When Joseph was speaking about the aspect of meditation in which everything's included, that we can open to whatever it is—to me, that's what taking refuge in the Dharma is about.

The truth of how things are is manifesting right now. How can it be otherwise? It's not about whether we like right now. It's not about intellectually getting some really far-out meaning from what's happening. Taking refuge in the Dharma on a moment-to-moment basis is simply this: Can I trust enough that if I just open into this moment, this experience, true nature of mind, of heart, sense of awareness, who we are—that can reveal itself? If I can just stop fighting the present moment long enough and be fully here and present.

For me personally, taking refuge in the Dharma is the refuge that gets me through the really naughty times in life or in retreat, because it reminds me that the potential for awakening is here, but I have to open into this moment to be able to recognize it.

Taking refuge in the Sangha, in community. Classically, the Sangha refers to the community of awakened beings, past and present, often the ordained Sangha. And of course we also use it here to include the community of those of us who are practicing this path of awakening with sincerity, with our full-hearted intention and commitment.

Many people in the go-round were saying already after two days that they feel the strength of support that comes from being here together. We catch the mindful effort, we catch the courage, we catch the strength to keep going from each other. It's luckily contagious. On the days when you get up and feel like you just can't put one foot in front of another in one more walking period—maybe that'll never happen to you, that might just be me—but on those days, when you see somebody out there just doing it again, it's contagious. You think, well, if they can do it, I can do it. And you just go do it. It's really wonderful. It stops being so personal.

When we take refuge in the Sangha, it's as if we're taking refuge in the enlightened mind stream that at different moments we all partake of. What would be wonderful is if we could all partake of it at the same moment—wouldn't that be an amazing world? So we're working towards it. Taking refuge in the enlightened mind stream, which we all manifest at times. Taking refuge in Sangha isn't taking refuge in each other's personalities. That's not much of a refuge, really. Can we even take refuge in our own personalities?

Not likely. And so, think of this broader sense of Sangha, of community, and how vital it is. Because imagine trying to do this all alone—three months of sitting, walking, silence. It's really hard. But sometimes, especially in these first days, it can be that after the glow of coming together wears off, there are little bits of thinking: "What's that person doing here? I can take refuge in the Sangha, but that person? Part of the Sangha? With that behavior? I don't think so."

Remember then, we're not taking refuge in personalities, but in our mutual intention, our mutual commitment. It's going to manifest in as many different ways as there are people here, which is beautiful. That's how it is. So just holding the bigger picture, remembering that community, Sangha, is one of the three jewels—we'd be lost without it, really, on this path.

I say this because I feel really quite deeply about it. Even though I talk about it a lot, in my heart I feel deeply committed. I know this to me is the true refuge. I find not only in really difficult times like now, but even in times when things seem to be going along okay, when I'm a little mindless and confronted with some sudden unpleasant or difficult situation—how easy it can be for the mind, the heart, to run back into habitual understandings or habitual behaviors, thinking that there will be refuge there.

We don't think it so consciously, do we? I'm making this almost too simple, but just to give you the idea: "If I would go out and get a pint of Häagen-Dazs now, everything would be okay." Or call up a friend, or initiate a new action, or get in a new relationship, or fix an old relationship, or get on the phone, or lash out in anger, or try and fix the world, or go for a drive—whatever it is we do. None of which is in itself necessarily a bad thing. But letting yourself discover, as part of this inward journey of a three-month retreat, where we have unconsciously been placing our trust, our reliance—this is essential. While each of these things might momentarily, or over some short period of time, really ease our life, give us happiness, give us a sense of safety, there's nothing temporal that's going to actually be completely reliable. No other person can be expected to conform always to what we need them and want them to do or be to keep us safe. It's impossible. No situation can.

And this is even in our normal day-to-day routine when everything seems okay. In these last weeks, when we in the United States have been thrust into a situation that many people in the world have been in for quite a long time already—which is certainly not something new in the history of the world—I find it both paradoxical. At times it's so obvious: what else could I look to for refuge than our true nature, than our connectedness, than the natural radiant purity of mind and heart that is who we all are? And at the same time, with each new wave of confusion that goes on, I often find my heart and mind really challenged. Do I really, totally have confidence in this? When so much of the energy and the people we might meet or hear or talk to clearly don't have confidence, when they come from another place, when a lot of the world—and it seems like it always has been that way—places confidence in other ways of understanding, it can be really challenging. Challenging both to stay honest with ourselves—do I really go to these things for refuge?—and also to be honest and okay with the times when we don't have that confidence.

Because I find for myself sometimes it's so clear—there's not one second, not one iota of doubt or confusion. And other times I'm kind of groping: "Oh yes, the potential for awakening—can I touch that again? Can I have confidence in that again?" And I always have been able to. The space of the quiet, the space of the interconnectedness, gives us a chance to recognize it.

So I think taking refuge is essential. Essential, over and over, just from a place as honest and sincere as we can be with ourselves. And I find it really gives the strength, the confidence, to open into whatever it is we need to open into—whatever experience might be presenting itself in our mind and body or in the so-called outside world. We can meet it. And we start not so grandiose, but simply where we are. When we touch our place of refuge, it gives us the strength and confidence to carry into our actions a sense of what's really true.

And so we talk about how to manifest our sense of connectedness, our understanding of non-harming, the oneness of all beings. We manifest that by our willingness to undertake as guidelines for training what we call the five precepts—five aspects of non-harming behavior. Again, we could look at those as just rules: you have to act in this way while you're here at IMS. And you could look at it that way; minimally, at least look at it that way. Please do undertake to live with these guidelines while you're here. But really, these guidelines are manifestations of our inner motivation, our inner intention.

As Sayadaw U Pandita described it once, living with the five precepts is an actualization of our oneness with all beings. In our commitment not to act from harming, not to act from taking what's not ours, not to act in ways that cause harm verbally, emotionally, or physically to others—in our commitment to that, we're actually manifesting our understanding of oneness. By not harming another, I'm not harming myself, actually. We can't separate the two. And this is what's such a fascinating aspect of practice with these precepts.

I'll just name them very briefly to remind you. The first is taking the guideline not to harm, not to kill, basically, other living beings. Other people, of course, but all living beings. Generally here that comes down to insects, which we occasionally have a problem with. It's easier on a three-month course than it is, for example, in May here, when we have these horrific black flies that bite and are little and swarm everywhere. Here it's easier, but it's something to pay attention to. We're taking the precept not to harm other living beings and watching our intention if we do harm another being. Watching it. And if we so-called break any of these precepts, it's not about getting out the whip and lashing yourself. It's keeping attention. In the mindfulness of how it is before, during, and after—in that mindfulness of after doing something harmful, we really can't help but notice how much pain that causes ourselves. And we see the interconnectedness immediately.

The second precept is not to take what is not freely given, which I imagine Michelle talks some about under renunciation. But again, it's the sense of whatever I have is enough. The mind space that allows to arise is really one of great happiness and contentment. I don't have this particular food, this particular shampoo, this particular thing I think I need. Oh, maybe I don't need it. There's such a sense of openness. It's lovely.

These two together give what the Buddha called the gift of fearlessness. It's a beautiful thing that we're giving each other here, this gift of fearlessness—a place where we can be, so many people, so close together, and you just don't have to worry that someone's going to take what's yours, that someone's going to harm you. It's really beautiful in this world to live like that for some time.

The third, in terms of lay life, would be not to harm ourselves or another with our sexual behavior. For the terms of the retreat, even though it's usually part of the eight precepts, even with five precepts, the guideline is not to engage in any intentional sexual activity while here on the retreat.

The fourth is not to lie, not to use harsh or abusive speech, not using speech to divide people. But here, obviously, we're in noble silence. That's a big help. Still, just watch what squirts out of our mouth when the occasion arises. Not with judgment. None of this stuff is about being self-judging. It's just about being open and seeing what causes suffering and what leads to happiness.

The fifth precept is not to drink or take any kind of drugs that cloud the mind, that cause confusion, that cause heedlessness. That's obvious—we've come here to cultivate clarity and wisdom. But that doesn't include, if you have a physical condition and you're on some form of medication, that's fine. This is about recreational substances and mind-changing activities. Believe me, you're having more than enough mind-changing activity going on here. You really don't need to stir the pot.

So these are the five precepts, five guidelines for mindful speech and action, for training, for cultivating and recognizing our connectedness. We like to begin each retreat with taking these refuges and precepts. Really think of this as a conscious commitment to yourself. It's almost like we're entering a doorway into these next three months—really appreciating a sense of commitment and dignity for yourself, appreciation for what you're doing.

Dutiyampi Buddhang Saranang Gacchami. Dutiyampi Dhammang Saranang Gacchami. Dutiyampi Sanghang Saranang Gacchami.

Tatiyampi Buddhang Saranang Gacchami. Tatiyampi Dhammang Saranang Gacchami. Tatiyampi Sanghang Saranang Gacchami.

Panatipata Veramani Sikkhapadang Samadiyami. Adinnadana Veramani Sikkhapadang Samadiyami. Abrahmacariya Veramani Sikkhapadang Samadiyami. Musavada Veramani Sikkhapadang Samadiyami. Suramerayamajjapamadatthana Veramani Sikkhapadang Samadiyami.

I thank you all for your deep commitment and dedication. We really wish you a marvelous journey these six weeks, these three months together. Thank you so much for the light you bring into the world.

Just to mention, you see there are eight precepts on the sheet. Sometime later, in a week or so, if you're interested, we'll give an opportunity to take the eight precepts, and we'll talk more about that then.

One other thing: every Wednesday and Saturday at the early morning sitting, there will be another chance at the beginning to take the refuges and precepts together. If there's a second chanting sheet up here and you don't have one, please come and get it at the end of this sitting.

So again, this is really the formal beginning of the retreat. We're in noble silence. Please enjoy.

Thank you so much.

CHAPTER 10

Brahmavihāra - Mettā

Carol Wilson · 29 min

> In this guided mettā retreat session, Carol Wilson continues mapping the loving-kindness practice by introducing how to work skillfully with different categories of beings. She emphasizes the fundamental principle of practicing with whoever is easiest—whether that's oneself, a benefactor, or a dear friend—rather than forcing connection where it doesn't naturally arise.
> Wilson addresses a common concern about mettā practice: the fear that focusing on someone's good qualities might be a form of delusion or blindness. She explains that mettā is actually inclusive—while we begin by appreciating the beautiful aspects of a person, as we maintain steady practice, we naturally come to accept the whole person, including their imperfections. This graduated approach, moving from easier to more challenging relationships, allows practitioners to discover that genuine loving-kindness brings clarity rather than obscuring reality.
> The talk includes practical guidance on what to do when the mind wanders into the "bugged zone" with someone, how to handle difficult emotions that arise during practice, and the liberating insight that mettā cannot ultimately be contained—even when directed toward oneself, it naturally extends outward, dissolving the sense of separation between self and other. Wilson guides a meditation moving through self, benefactor, and dear friend, offering the traditional phrases while encouraging practitioners to find their own rhythm and not worry about generating particular feelings.

We'll continue going through the map, the categories of the loving-kindness, the metta practice. Since Steve introduced the metta practice so beautifully last time, we won't be talking so much in these following weeks, but simply continuing to present the whole map.

As far as the structure, we'll begin with ourselves, and then tonight we'll spend a bit more time with the benefactor, and just briefly at the end of the sitting, introduce the next being, which is dear friend.

As we begin and continue to explore this loving-kindness, this metta practice, it's really important that we practice it in the way that's easiest. In other words, picking the being, the person that we are cultivating this connecting, loving, open heart with—picking the one that's the easiest to connect with.

If that's yourself, which oddly enough once in a while it is, then when we move to benefactor or dear friend, if you start to feel lost or there's no energy there, please don't force it. Come back to yourself. Stay with yourself. Stay with yourself all through the week. That's great.

If it's the reverse, and it's really difficult trying to send metta to yourself—either it's just like a stone, nothing, or worse than nothing, anger, hatred, all that stuff—well, that's interesting information, but you may not be the person you should start with. Then really spend time with the benefactor, who for many people is the easiest person.

The benefactor is the person who really opens that heart space of connection, who connects with our own goodness. Although classically it's taught as someone who has been a teacher or to whom we feel grateful or very respectful, that doesn't always work. Many people use their grandchild or a niece or a friend or a pet—a being that just easily opens up that space of well-wishing without a lot of complications. For many people, that's the easiest category. It's meant to be. For some people, it isn't.

For that reason, tonight we'll introduce the next category, which is dear friend. Classically, dear friend would be someone that you're a little closer to than the benefactor, although if you're using a child or a niece or a grandchild, you might be closer to them as benefactor. Dear friend is meant to be, again, someone with whom we can easily open our hearts in connection, someone whose beautiful qualities we can easily tune into, and for whom it is fairly easy to wish happiness.

Generally, a dear friend might be someone we know a little better. This means, of course, we also know all the sides of that person, which is great because so far I haven't met anyone who only has perfect good sides and doesn't have a few little warts here and there.

And that's what's so wonderful about the quality of the Brahma Vihara of metta—well, of all the Brahma Viharas. Even though we practice metta by picking the person it's easiest to feel it for, this connection, this friendliness, and we practice it by deliberately choosing to focus on the goodness of that person. For example, if you're sending metta to a benefactor, you don't think of all the things they did that drove you nuts in order to cultivate metta. You really focus on their beautiful aspects.

This can lead to an almost fearful feeling of being blind, of being deluded, that we're sending metta but we're kidding ourselves because we're not really looking at the whole person. And that's what's so beautiful about metta—it's inclusive. We start by looking at the beautiful, but as we stay connected, sending all the phrases to that person, the other sides come in. The loving-kindness is an acceptance of all of the person, including ourselves, including whoever.

So you can see why we start with easier ones. We get a sense that the friendliness, the connection of metta is not at all a deluded or blind connection. It's an acceptance that really allows us to see the whole person as we go on with the practice. To be honest, when I first started doing metta intensively, I didn't quite expect the degree of inclusion, the degree of acceptance, and the clarity of seeing of the heart and mind that comes from the steadiness of practicing in this way. I just put that out. Look and see for yourselves how it is for you.

So it's graduated. With a friend you might see a little bit more that bugs you. That's okay. If you notice the mind drifting into—not just noticing, but actively getting into the being-bugged zone—well, you'll notice, okay, this isn't metta. Fine. See if you can put it down and reconnect to the goodness of the person and start the metta again. This is true with anybody you're sending it to.

If you find you're just getting caught up in the bugged zone and you can't get back to the metta zone, that's when we say, okay, let me go to the person that it's easier for. Go back to benefactor, for example, or yourself or whoever it's easier for. This is the standard rule of how we practice.

Even though in these weeks we're taking you through all the categories, it's really more by way of showing you the possibilities and giving you the chance to see for yourself where you connect most easily. There's no sense at all of thinking you ought to get it right, make a success of each category and get on to the next. There's nowhere to go. If you just stayed with yourself for six weeks, that would be wonderful.

And you might find out at the end of that time what's another wonderful secret of loving-kindness practice: you can't just stay with one person. If you only do it to yourself, you find it sneaking out and connecting with other people anyway. You find that sense of separation of me and other goes away.

In a moment of metta, there is no sense of separation. So there's not any way you can really do this in a selfish way, and there's not any way you can do it in a wrong way. So play with it. And if it really doesn't connect with you, you also don't have to do it at all. You can stay with the Vipassana, which is also wonderful. There's no way to lose here. Don't get yourself all worried about it. Just see what happens.

With metta, sit as comfortably as you can while remaining awake. This is not a practice where you need to hold yourself in a strenuous position or where you need to be dealing with pain, if you're fortunate enough to have the choice not to deal with it. If partway through the sitting you're feeling some constriction, some pain in your body, and you know moving a little bit would help, please move. That's really helpful in this practice.

Find as comfortable a seat as you can. Classically, we'll start with ourselves before moving to a benefactor or friend. But within that, feel free to go where it feels the most flowing, the most easy. And if you feel nothing—which is often the case when we're doing metta—don't worry about it. Don't try to evoke a feeling that isn't there. Just be content to offer each phrase as a gift. That's enough. We don't have to get into wanting to feel good as well. We can just offer that to ourselves or to others. It takes a load off, I'll tell you, just to offer it without needing something back.

So please sit at ease. Take a couple of deep breaths so that you can connect with the sense of your physical presence here in this room. Let your attention gently come into your body. See if you can just relax into a kind acceptance, being here with your body, so to speak—coming home into this body, however it is in this moment, not needing it to change. Just appreciate that it's supporting us so far.

Take a moment to consciously reflect on some of your beautiful qualities, some aspect of your goodness. And don't listen to the voice that's uncomfortable with that. Really let it in. It's important. It's a very important practice that we often neglect. It can be small things—any aspect of your goodness. Receive it in your heart and mind. Appreciate it. Imagine how you'd appreciate that goodness in another. Appreciate it in yourself.

Then take that sense of appreciation of yourself, feeling a sense of your presence, connecting with yourself here and now—whether it's physically, a felt sense, holding an internal mental picture of yourself, or connecting with a memory of yourself, perhaps as a child, a memory when you can connect with your goodness, when you can honestly wish yourself happiness and let it in.

From this space, use the repetition of each phrase, one by one, very simply, as a way to carry this appreciation to yourself, to honor your deepest wish to be happy by expressing it through the phrase. Not to change anything. The phrase is simply a carrier to express your friendliness to yourself, your acceptance of yourself.

The classic phrases are: May I be safe and protected from inner and outer harm. May I be happy and peaceful. May I be healthy and strong. May I be able to care for myself joyfully in this world. Or, may I live with ease of well-being.

Some people find it helpful to keep it very simple, something like: I love and accept myself just as I am.

Very gently, one phrase from the heart, just feeling each word, offering that to yourself as a heartfelt gesture of friendliness.

That's all. Just settle in and find your own rhythm.

When you wander off in thought, take a moment when you wake up to reconnect with the sense of yourself—the image or the memory. When there's just that sense of appreciation for a moment, then offer the first phrase. Don't rush back to the phrases. Take a moment to regroup, to reconnect. There's no hurry.

May I be safe and protected.
May I be happy and peaceful.
May I be healthy.
May I care for myself joyfully.

Now, if you'd like, bring into your heart or mind a sense of the being you're using for the benefactor category. If it's the one you chose last week and it's been working great, wonderful. If you found you chose someone who rationally should have been a good benefactor but turned out not to be so easy, don't worry about that. Just pick someone else. That happens sometimes.

Bring this being into your heart. See if you can bring up an internal image, a memory if it's someone you know, some visual connection. Take a moment to reflect on their goodness—the qualities of this person, this being, that light up your heart, that naturally evoke this friendliness, this openness, this connection. Even if you don't feel it now, that's okay. Just reflect on these qualities.

When you're ready, offer each phrase as a gift of the heart—not to change the person's circumstances, not even to make us feel good, just a gift of friendliness, our deepest heart wish for this person.

May you be safe, protected from inner and outer harm.
May you be happy and peaceful.
May you be healthy and strong.
May you live with ease in this world.

When you notice you're distracted or caught up by other thoughts or moods, if it's possible to simply notice and come back to the image of your benefactor and the phrases, then do so. You don't need to fight with or investigate what else is happening. If you're really taken over by anger or fear—which sometimes happens in the metta practice—then you can switch to vipassana for some moments to really meet that emotion with a metta feeling. Acknowledge it, be with it, and then come back to the benefactor and the phrases.

Now, if you'd like, bring into the room, into your heart, a good friend—someone you easily wish well, someone whose goodness and good qualities you can focus on fairly easily. It's helpful to choose someone where there's not likely to be sexually involved energy, because that just makes it more complicated in the beginning.

Connect with an image or a felt sense of this friend. Let yourself appreciate their goodness, the parts of them that light you up. And again, when you're ready, offer each phrase.

May you be safe and protected.
May you be happy and peaceful.
May you be healthy and well.
May you be able to care for yourself joyfully in this world.

May the beneficial energies of our practice be shared with all beings everywhere, known and unknown, in all directions, in all realms. May all beings everywhere be happy and peaceful. May all beings be freed from suffering. May our practice serve for the awakening of all beings everywhere.

CHAPTER 11

What's The Breath Got To Do With Freedom?

Carol Wilson · 56 min

> In this opening night retreat talk, Carol Wilson addresses the fundamental question of how the simple practice of feeling breath sensations connects to the profound goal of freedom. She introduces the concept of sakkāya-diṭṭhi (personality view) — our deeply ingrained habit of relating to all experience as 'me' or 'mine' — as the root of suffering, explaining that vipassanā practice works directly on our wrong understanding of mental and physical experience.
>
> Wilson illuminates two primary ways we misunderstand experience: confusing our concepts, assumptions, and reactions with the experience itself, and constantly referring everything back to a sense of self. Through vivid examples — from tight breathing to birdsong to sounds in the meditation hall — she demonstrates how we layer interpretation upon bare sensation. The practice cultivates three essential qualities: samādhi (concentration and steadiness), sati (mindfulness as bare attention), and mettā (the friendliness that allows mindfulness to penetrate deeply).
> The talk's most transformative teaching concerns the shift from seeking refuge in pleasant experience to discovering refuge in awareness itself. Wilson shares Ajahn Sumedho's simple phrase — 'sleepiness is like this,' 'anger is like this' — as a doorway to this shift. Rather than battling experience or trying to manufacture ideal states, we learn that awareness can meet and hold anything. This recognition transforms practice from striving into devotion, from frustration into reverence for life as it actually is. As Wilson notes, quoting the suttas: 'The doors of the deathless are open for those who hear, for those who see.'

So we come to the evening of the first day. Generally, especially if it's your first retreat, this is a really peppy time. You're probably feeling so glad you chose to spend a week like this, filled with energy and enthusiasm. It's usually a great audience to give a talk to on the first night.

So it falls to my lot to try to explain what we're doing here—at least one explanation. Really, every night we try to explain in one way or another what we're doing here. And this retreat is wonderful because while there are a lot of old, familiar yogi faces, there are also quite a few people who are new to this form of retreat, this form of practice. And that's wonderful, really wonderful.

I'm not really joking when I say we want to try the first nights to explain what we're doing, because the first days can be—they don't have to be, but they can be—quite difficult at times, or just kind of plodding at best. And not having done it before, you can have no personal experience, no what we call verified faith of knowing that it's worthwhile. So that's one of the things we try to speak to: basically keep you here long enough until you have some verified faith, and then you're happy to be here on your own. One of my teachers called it the velvet-gloved iron fist of the Dhamma. So tonight will be the velvet glove.

What I want to talk about is how the simplicity of what we've been doing so far today—just feeling the sensations of the breathing, feeling the sensations in your walking, in your body as you move through the day, repeatedly coming out of whatever blissful or suffering train of thought may be going on to come back to the simplicity of yet another sensation of breathing—how does this contribute to the development of wisdom and compassion? How does this open us to freedom? You may well ask. And what do we mean by freedom anyway? Which is actually a vaster question.

This is a quotation from a Burmese teacher, Sayadaw U Janaka, that I was sitting with last year. He opened a retreat with this quotation, and I really like it because I feel like it encapsulates the heart of our practice. He says: We practice Vipassana in order to live in happiness, to be free from suffering. And our suffering arises due to our suffering mental states. Our suffering mental states arise due to our belief in—the word in Pali is sakkāya-diṭṭhi—it means personality view. Our belief in our personality view is what gives rise to our suffering mental states.

By personality view, we basically mean defining or relating to any experience as being me or mine—defining our view of ourselves as a separate personality through experience. And our belief in personality view, in sakkāya-diṭṭhi, arises because of our wrong understanding of the nature of mental and physical experience.

That's the key line I want to come in on: a wrong understanding of the nature of mental and physical experience. That's the level our Vipassana practice is coming in on, is working on. Our mistaken understanding of the nature of our moment-to-moment mental and physical experience is really a mistaken perception—a perception, basically, that any experience is me or mine. But I'll talk more about that.

The resultant misinterpretation we give to experience, because we perceive it incorrectly, is at the root of all of our confusion, our suffering, our ill will, our greed—all the suffering that the path of the Buddha, the path of meditation, offers us freedom from. It comes about through our wrong understanding of the nature of mental and physical experience.

So that's actually vast. But what our practice of moment-to-moment awareness is working on is to help us learn to perceive and understand our mental and physical experience accurately. That's all. Like Joseph said last night, it's really simple, but it's not easy.

There are many ways that we misunderstand the nature of mental and physical experience. I just want to mention two tonight. I don't want to get too technical.

The first is that we confuse our ideas, our concepts, our assumptions, our reactions about experience with the experience itself. What ends up happening is that we actually don't have a clue what's really going on. And that is really how we spend most of our lives, and we wonder why things don't work. Why do I feel out of sync? It's because —duh—I don't even know what's really happening here.

Just a simple example, very simple. Say there's a loud sound in the meditation hall. I'm making this up; this isn't anything I've noticed happening. Say there's a loud sound, somebody's rustling or making some repeated loud sound in the hall. It's bugging the heck out of you. The perception is the loud sound. What is that person doing?

Who let them in here? Don't they vet people for appropriate meditation hall behavior before they allow them in such a crowded retreat? I can't bear it. That sound is bad. That person is wrong. It's disturbing my practice. Basically, it's a bad, wrong sound. And that would be what our experience is—that sound is messing up my meditation practice, right? Or you get down on yourself for not being compassionate. But whatever it is, we think that's the experience.

The experience is sound vibration. It's pleasant or unpleasant. There are some thoughts arising. There are some emotions arising. We string it all together in this package, and we think that's what it is. We don't even know that we could just be with hearing, vibration, unpleasant, space.

Or that bird call just there—that's a more pleasant sound. That could also just be vibration, hearing, pleasant. But often, and this doesn't seem insidious or bad, it's a subtle way that we still confuse our ideas with reality. We think, "Oh, the chickadees in the morning, I just love that. Spring is coming, the beauty of nature, the chickadees." And what we think is our experience is, "I'm hearing a chickadee singing, sitting on the branch of a tree."

But what are you really experiencing here? In the hall, there's a sound, vibration. There may be a mental image in your mind, a picture of a chickadee. It's not the chickadee itself, is it? The chickadee's not sitting here in the hall in your hand. There's a sound, there's a vibration, there might be a pleasant feeling, a happy feeling, some thoughts, some mental images. You see what I mean?

I'm picking very simple examples. Another: your breathing. The breath is really tight. It's very shallow. You can hardly feel it down past your throat. And this is clear proof of what an uptight, repressed person you are. So each breath becomes another vast field of suffering, another proof of your essential worthlessness, your essential no-goodness—of how even this, such a simple task as feeling your breath, you of course can't do right. And that would be what you'd say is happening.

Instead of, "Oh, tightness." That's it. Tightness. Finished. Just tightness, you know? All the rest of that is extra made-up story. And mostly that's where we live—in the extra made-up story.

That's sakkāya-diṭṭhi. "My breath is tight. I'm repressed. I can't do it right. Why do they pick the breath anyway? In this other retreat I did, we did sweeping—it was a lot better. Don't they know what they're doing?" And on and on. But what's happening? Tightness.

The sakāya diṭṭhi—do you get a glimpse of how much suffering can be mixed up in that? And how when we simply feel tightness, it's gone?

Of course, part of our trip is that on some level we don't want it gone. "Yeah, I'm uptight, but at least it's me. Don't take my uptightness away from me. I want to be uptight and repressed. It's better than being nothing." We don't say that, of course, but there's a place of holding on.

So that's one way we misunderstand experience. We tend to not even know what's happening because we confuse our reactions, our assumptions, our simple ideas and images with the bare sense experience itself.

And then there's the common theme—with most but not all of us—of how does it relate to me? How does it affect me? What does this experience say about guess who? There's only one person: me, me, me. Even how nice the chickadee sounds often has something to do with me. "I really like how nice the chickadee sounds. It makes me feel so happy to be here in the springtime." The chickadee comes back to me, me, me—which is, of course, extra.

These are just the most basic ways we misunderstand the nature of mental and physical experience: an overlay of ideas and assumptions, and making it all either me or referring to me. And it creates a huge amount of struggle and suffering in our lives.

Part of what happens in a retreat is that because we pare away so many distractions, we get to see this up close, raw. That's part of why retreat is often so uncomfortable—not always, but at times—because we're running right up against that pattern, and there's nowhere to go to get away from it. So we're saying come back to that miserable tight breath and see if you can just feel tightness.

That's what our practice is doing. The moment-to-moment attention, coming back to feel the sensations of breath, coming back to feel the sensations of walking, pulling out of those trains of thought—it's cultivating many things, but three of the most basic deserve mention.

First, there's the discipline of coming back. Today we're returning to the same experience over and over, which we'll do for the first day or so before expanding out. This discipline of just coming back to sensations of breath, just coming back to sensations of walking, whenever you notice your thinking—this is the beginning of the cultivation of samādhi, of concentration. Concentration basically means not that your mind never moves, but that there's a unification, a coming together of all the mental energy at one point in one moment.

You may have noticed the opposite today, which is why we might appreciate this coming together. Has anybody noticed the tendency of the mind to go anywhere at any moment, maybe five different places at once? Have you noticed how exhausting it is? You wonder why we're so tired when we first come to a retreat. Is anybody tired today? Of course. And that's normal. If you're new, that's really normal.

Part of the tiredness is simply because our lives are so busy. We stop, and the mind thinks "okay, check out." But part of it is we start to see how truly fatiguing the distractibility and nervous energy and restless quality of our minds in daily life really is when we sit here and start looking at what the mind is doing.

The slightest little thing can make it go off for ten or fifteen minutes. You're just feeling your nice breath. Somebody walks by, and boom—you're on a train of association back to the third grade, into your job next week, the vacation you're going to take in 2005, just because somebody walked by and you caught the tail end of a blue jacket. It takes nothing to make the mind go off like that.

This is exhausting, actually, because the mind doesn't just go—we're reacting. We like it. We don't like it. We get caught up in an angry dialogue with the hotel person at this hotel we're going to stay at in Mexico in 2005, and we're all upset. Then we come back, and nothing ever happened, but we're completely upset about it. This is how we live our lives. It's no wonder we're not happy all the time.

I'm digressing here—which is itself an example of lack of samādhi. The samādhi, the unification of mind, the discipline of coming back, coming back, coming back gently without judgment but with persistence, begins to allow the mind to settle into more of a steadiness. And then the energy that's spent running all over the place becomes available for seeing clearly, for presence, for awareness, for peace, for stillness. It's actually lovely.

But the mind doesn't want to do it because it's in the habit of running all over the place, like a little kid. So the coming back, the discipline, is in the service of this steadiness, this unification, this greater peace—but also a greater observing power, seeing what's actually happening mentally and physically, more accurately, more clearly. It helps us start to cut through the barrage of assumptions, interpretations, and overlay.

And that brings us to mindfulness—which is distinct from concentration, the coming back over and over. Mindfulness is the quality of bare attention, of simply connecting your attention with what's happening and knowing it simply as it is, without confusing it with all the overlay.

So for example, with that tight breath, rather than "Oh, it's tight, I don't like it, it should be better"—just: "Oh, tightness." That's mindfulness. Just knowing what's what, bare attention without the extra.

A third quality is also being cultivated, and it's actually an aspect of mindfulness. In meeting each moment of attention, of awareness—whether it's sensations of breath or walking or a moment of sleepiness, it doesn't matter what—what allows for that bare attention, that clear seeing, is the attitude of metta, really, which we could translate as friendliness. Or patience. Or acceptance. Not the acceptance of resignation: "This is as good as it gets, so I'll try and be here." The acceptance of: "This is how it is in this moment. Let me be wholeheartedly, non-judgmentally present, just as it is." Tightness feels like this. Sound, hearing, is like this. Stepping feels like this. That quality of friendliness, of non-judging patience, is really what allows mindfulness to sink deeply into our experience moment to moment.

And so each moment that you're just noticing you're thinking or feeling the breath or sensations—each of these in itself seems so small. That's when you go, "What am I doing here? What good is this?" But each moment of that is cultivating these three things: steadiness, mindfulness, friendliness, patience, clear seeing. Each moment is counteracting at the same time the deeply ingrained habits of assessing, judging, misinterpreting.

And this we don't notice. We just notice we're feeling another sense of pressure in the breath. We don't also notice, "Oh, in this moment I am not interpreting. In this moment I am not misperceiving." We just go, "Oh, another rising, another falling, another lifting, another placing." But that's cutting through these habits that keep us in wrong understanding, that keep us suffering.

And in that moment of simple mindfulness, you'll notice it afterwards, you're not referring every experience back to me, me, me. You just feel: "Oh, just lifting. It's kind of tight." That's all. When you do refer it back to me, it's not really mindfulness anymore. It's like, "Oh no, the lifting's tight—no, no, I'm so tired." But just lifting. Simple. Lifting, space, silence.

That's really a powerful moment because it's cutting through all the misinterpretation, the misperception, the sakkāya-diṭṭhi. We're not confusing our concepts for reality in that moment. That's powerful.

And moment after moment after moment—the continuity through the day—that's why it's so important. If you just do that once for a moment in the sitting and then go out and play tennis the rest of the day without paying attention, it doesn't quite have the same power. That's why, as Steve said, we sit, we walk, we sit, we walk, we eat—and then we tell you to pay attention when you're eating, and when you're taking a shower—because it's cutting through those habits. We've spent our lifetime building up the habit of misperceiving, of referring everything back to what does it mean about me. So it takes some effort to cut through.

But the actuality is really stronger than our bad habits. We do need to learn to trust the seeing itself.

And this is the other thing that I think is happening—well, I know it's happening—in our continuity of willingness to be mindful, willingness to come back. Continuity doesn't mean that every moment of the day you're precisely, pristinely mindful. We know that. Sometimes when we say continuity, people think that's what it means, and they'll come in an interview and say, "I'm not continuous." We'll ask why, and they'll say, "Well, I had these few moments where I spaced out." No one thinks that every single moment of the day your mind doesn't wander. Continuity just means a willingness, when you notice you're off in la-la land, to come back and feel your body, whatever you're doing.

So the other thing that's happening with this—and I want to point it out because I also think we don't consciously notice it, at least not at first—is that we're beginning to shift our habit of evaluating ourselves, our life, others. Our habit of deriving meaning and worth for ourselves from experience.

Don't you mostly evaluate, even here, whether your meditation is going well or not, by how often you feel the breath or how good your walking is or how present you are or whether it was a pleasant sitting or whether you're filled with anger or whether you're feeling more happy? We tend to evaluate ourselves, take all of our meaning, our self-affirmation from what particular experiences we're going through. And then we tend to set our practice on a path of trying to achieve certain experiences and get rid of others.

But what mindfulness is subtly doing is undercutting that whole habit, that whole way of assessing our lives. It's saying, basically, on some level, what's happening isn't what's important. Where the value is being placed is on the awareness itself. So when we're saying, feel the sensations of breath, it's not so you'll have better sensations of breath. It's not like you're doing better if that tightness changes to a long, slow, smooth, deep breath. One might be more pleasant than the other, but you know what? Who cares? Awareness doesn't care. But what happens is, whatever kind of breath it is, the awareness is the point of awakening. Awareness is really the gateway to peace, the gateway to freedom. And what we are doing through our practice is more and more bringing in the conditions that allow us to notice the awareness itself.

Awareness is really the mystery. It's the most amazing—it's not a thing, but it's the most amazing aspect of our life. It's really what our practice is all about. So beginning and continuing and increasing our—first even our noticing—awareness, developing a confidence in awareness, really a love of awareness, so that what becomes the key in our whole practice isn't what's happening, but awareness of what's happening. That's actually so much easier to do than to try to make your inner or outer experience look or feel a certain way.

I know that's not going to stop anybody from trying to do that. And we all do. We keep finding more and more subtle ways. I'm here to tell you. You keep finding more and more subtle ways to try and manipulate your experience to match some ideal in your mind of what freedom is. And pretty much always it's going to be pleasant, no?

It's actually quite a useful exercise for you to contemplate, when I'm done talking, to contemplate for a short amount of time what assumptions or ideas you're carrying as to what freedom means to you, or what liberation means to you. Because of course we'll have ideas about that. We don't just come to practice with no ideas, no aspiration, no goals. We're not built like that. "Oh, what the heck, I've got nothing better to do." We come here with some yearning, some aspiration, and that's great. But it's helpful to know what it is.

Because until we're really trusting in the reality of awareness, in the potential of awareness to bring us to freedom, until we're really trusting that on a stronger and stronger basis, we're trying to manipulate our experience to meet our ideas of what either freedom is or what happiness is or just what feels good or comfortable, at the last lick.

But freedom—what do we mean by freedom? The other day, Steve mentioned that at the Forest Refuge there was an open house. But the few days before that, at the end of our month- or two-month-long teacher retreat, we had this blessing ceremony. Bhante Gunaratana was there, who's been a monk for about sixty years from Sri Lanka. He's a very inspiring guy, very sweet, down to earth. Quite a few monks and nuns were present. At one point he said—and it was very funny—you know, he's talking about how we have to take care of our bodies. And he said, "The Buddha was enlightened, but his body wasn't enlightened. It was his mind and heart that was enlightened. The body keeps on doing its thing."

So if you think awakening means you stop having body things—dukkha, you know—and you're going to feel good from now on, well, think again. And also, the Buddha's awakening didn't fix all the suffering and injustice and violence in the world. Enlightenment doesn't mean everything is hunky-dory, inside or outside.

So the freedom the Buddha is talking about—it's something other. It's something different. And it hinges on awareness itself.

But I know, and I'm pretty confident, that each of you has had one or two mental reactions throughout the day, right? One or two mental states have arisen for most people.

Notice how much—not all, but how much—of what might arise in these days in your mind, how much of the habit of our mind, which will lead to actions of body... First notice that: how habits of mind lead to actions of body. How much of it is in struggle or reaction to just what is in this moment? Whether what is is a personal, physical, or mental experience, or whether what is is external.

Say if you're really tired or sleepy—how much sense of struggle might there be with it? How much struggle with wanting a different room, or wanting different clothes, or wishing there were no black flies, or having a better seat, or thinking you should have come another week? Or when things are really good, the sense of struggle of wanting to keep it, or the fear of losing it, or how to get it back again, or how to hold on to it. "What did I do to get this good sitting, and how can I make it be exactly like this the next time?"

Just noticing that. And how in all of this, the focus of our attention, of our reaction, of our identification, of our sense of self—the focus is all on the experience that's happening. The sleepiness, the unpleasant pillow that's too hard, the unpleasant breath, the sense of restlessness, not liking the food or loving the food and wanting more, feeling too crowded, whatever. How much of our focus is on what's happening?

I'm sure we're telling you to pay attention to what's happening. It's good to pay attention to what's happening. But notice how we tend not to notice the awareness of what's happening. And they're both always right there together, aren't they? If you know what's happening, there's awareness. There's no way there's not. The awareness is always accessible, and you don't actually have to do anything to create it.

You heard that clap, right? You didn't have to think ahead of time, "I have to prepare myself to be aware in case she claps." It's just there. We tend to just focus on, "Why did she do that? That was kind of sharp. That didn't feel good. That kind of jarred my heart energy." Blah, blah, blah. Just awareness. Just awareness. It's always accessible. It's always available to us.

When we are present with full-hearted presence—that's what the collectedness of our mental energy is about—knowing what's happening. So we're using, of course, in our practice, experience to bring in our attention, to collect our mental energy. So we're consciously saying, "Pay attention to breathing, pay attention to walking, pay attention to your body, pay attention to your mental states." But it's not to make better experience. It's to allow us to notice with more and more confidence the awareness itself.

So that rather than looking for a refuge, looking for a home, looking for ease in having better experience, we can actually turn around and begin to feel that the awareness itself can be our refuge, can be our home. That the confidence, the place of safety, and actually the opening, the doorway into freedom, to ease, to compassion, to a different relationship altogether to life—isn't in fixing our experience. It's in trusting in the awareness itself.

Usually we're so blinded by our reactions to experience that we don't have time to notice awareness. I mean, it's like not even ephemeral. It's nothing, right? There's nothing you can see. Experience is so much more juicy.

But what's so great about beginning to trust, beginning to find a refuge in awareness, is that it really then doesn't matter what's happening. The refuge is always available. You don't have to wait till you're a better person. In some cases, personally, that could be a long time. Just how you are right now, awareness is available. With your lousy, crummy, tight breath, you can be aware of it. You don't have to wait till you have some wonderful yogic breath. With all your thoughts, with your incredible sleepiness—guess what? You can be aware of sleepiness.

Sally, I think, mentioned Ajahn Sumedho last night, the American man who's been a monk in the Thai tradition for many years.

He has a wonderful way of using very simple language that I have found personally very helpful in making that subtle shift in my experience—from being entranced or reactive to whatever's going on, to just falling into the awareness.

It works by saying, "Oh, anger—I don't like it. Oh, anger is like this." Or "Sleepiness—I can't bear it, another sitting, I'm so sleepy, it's so tight, I should stand up, why should I just..." Go: "Oh, sleepiness is like this."

It doesn't change the sleepiness, and that's not the point. But it shifts the whole dynamic to where the juice is—the freedom, the awakeness, the aliveness really is in the awareness. "Oh, sleepiness is like this." Then we forget, we're back in reaction. "Oh yeah, reaction is like this."

No matter what's going on, taking refuge in awareness is really this capacity to simply meet it, meet whatever's happening, with total presence and trust. The trust not that the thing itself is going to change or get better, but that awareness can meet and hold anything. Like instead of becoming the sleepiness, or instead of becoming the reaction to the sleepiness, it's as if we're the space and silence within which it happens. This is a metaphor—it's not actually like that—but it's more like that. So rather than getting so caught up in reactivity, it's like, "Oh yeah, sleepiness is like this. Hating myself is like this. Being completely spaced out, not even being able to find one breath in thirty-five minutes, is like this."

There's actually nothing in our experience that we can't be aware of, except unconsciousness, when we're awake.

And so what begins to happen is this: we come to our practice with an aspiration, some goal, a sense of what freedom or compassion or more happiness means to us. And this is important—or we wouldn't be here. Aspiration, a sense of inspiration, is very important. It's a way of collecting our dispersed energy, giving us confidence, giving us the energy and willingness to act, directing our energy in a specific direction. It helps us do things we might not do on our own, like get through a meditation retreat. That's hard to do. It is a hard thing. Without some aspiration, some goal, we wouldn't do it.

But because of our habits of defining and assessing ourselves by experience—it's really, for many of us, the only way we know how to evaluate—the aspiration can get subtly subverted. That's why I said to look at what your idea is of your aspiration of freedom. Because then the aspiration—"Yes, I want to practice, I want to wake up"—can shift from a useful motivation to clinging to an idea, an image of what should happen.

And so it becomes, rather than a useful, onward-leading motivation, a form of striving, a source of frustration. It means, "I came here for freedom. It means my practice should be good. It means I should be able to follow ten breaths in a row." And when I can't, I get lost in frustration, I get lost in comparing.

Thus what starts as a noble and useful aspiration turns to clinging, to failure, to self-judgment. And the motivation has shifted from a useful wanting to awaken, wanting to live with more compassion—whatever yours is, I'm not trying to put words in your heart—to clinging, to wanting, to comparing, to frustration. And then we wonder: Why is it so tight? Why am I suffering so much? This practice isn't working.

But what begins to shift, even by itself, simply through these three things I said—coming back with steadiness, with mindfulness, and with that friendly patience that simply accepts this moment as it is—is that we find our motivation of trying to make it be a certain way, that clinging, begins to dissolve. And our practice moves from trying to make experience confirm us—coming here to be a good meditator so I can go home and tell people what kind of far-out concentration experiences I had—to a love of awareness itself.

And this changes everything.

I've seen this happen in my practice over the years. Not every moment, God knows. But in the times when it doesn't matter what's happening, when there's simply the ability to be aware, to be present, to take refuge in that awareness—it actually becomes a kind of devotion almost. It's really a sense of reverence for awareness itself. And whatever the awareness is embracing, it becomes a reverence for life, however life is expressing itself in this moment, and the awareness with it.

So this sense of taking refuge in awareness actually manifests through a kind of friendliness or compassion for life, because nothing needs to be rejected, nothing needs to be shut out. It doesn't mean we don't act or respond or try to help if there's something wrong or suffering, but it's not out of a motive of hating or resenting or pushing away.

So really, we begin to see that our practice here requires enormous effort, yes. It requires an enormous commitment and perseverance, persistence to keep coming back, to keep coming back all day, all night, moment after moment. But when the motivation is not to make it better, not to get something to confirm me, but simply love of being present in this moment—all that sense of striving and frustration falls away, and enormous energy, courageous presence, effort becomes possible. Because you're not pushing to make it different. It's just to wholeheartedly be here.

There are many times in my practice, in my life, where I'll be going through some difficult phase, some difficult mental state, some reaction to something happening in my life. And when I finally go, "Oh, what's happening now? Sorrow, anger, reaction"—and I'm really aware of it—there's such a sense of... it's strange. It's like a happiness. A happiness to be fully present. To be falling into the refuge of awareness rather than battling with experience.

And it lets that experience be fully felt, fully experienced, without adding all this extra stuff on top of it. I can respond much more appropriately than when I'm just in knee-jerk reactivity.

So our motivation shifts from wanting something to just appreciation, or love of awareness itself. And that takes us deeper and deeper into the meditation practice, into the possibility of being here more fully for our life, no matter what's going on.

There's a passage soon after the Buddha was enlightened in the suttas where one of the higher beings came down and was trying to convince him to teach. One line he said that I really like: "The doors of the deathless are open for those who hear, for those who see." You could say they're somewhere else, but they're right here. Awareness is our door to the deathless. Awareness is always accessible. We just need to learn not to be so entranced with our reactions and interpretations, not so entranced with sense experience that we can't notice the awareness of it. That's all.

And it's just this subtle shift. "Oh, hearing is like this. Walking is like this. Mmm, nice tasting pasta. Enjoyment is like this." Just remembering that subtle shift is very, very powerful. The point that includes, as Ajahn Sumedho speaks of awareness—the point that includes.

What helps us develop a recognition and trust in this awareness is the quality of bare attention I was talking about with mindfulness—learning how to see just what's happening without all the hoopla we add to it. That's simply this quality of willingness to look directly. Normally, our interpretations and assumptions and preconceived notions so color experience that we just can't see clearly.

There's a Zen story I really like. In ancient Japan, a vicious, powerful samurai warrior came to a Zen master. This is a common theme in Zen stories. He was utterly uncouth, brandishing his sword, and he kept calling the Zen master a pig. "You're a pig, and all of these monks here are pigs, and you know what I do with pigs like you—I just run my sword through them." On and on he went.

The Zen master simply bowed and said, "And you, sir, are a Buddha."

This brought the samurai up short, because even as well as he thought of himself, he didn't think of himself as a Buddha. He said, "I, a Buddha?"

And the Zen master said, "Well, a pig sees a pig. A Buddha sees a Buddha."

Yes, it's like that. Until we learn how to meet moment after moment with bare attention, we don't know if we're a pig seeing a pig or a Buddha seeing a Buddha. We don't have a clue. We have to learn how to look. And that's this quality of just meeting one moment of experience freshly, without preconceptions.

Let me tell you another story, this one about Yo-Yo Ma. He's becoming one of my heroes—the cellist Yo-Yo Ma. I think he's a wonderful being. He travels to many different cultures musically, bringing them together, appreciating different musical traditions. It's beautiful what he does.

Once I was in Germany and I was watching a documentary about him on television. Friends were translating because I don't speak German. This was a few years ago. In this documentary, he was flying into somewhere in Central Africa. This was prearranged. He came in a helicopter to a small tribe of bush people. They showed him getting out of his helicopter with his million-dollar cello. Maybe he had a second-string cello, but I'm sure it was worth quite a lot. He was going to meet the senior members of the tribe—I think it was mostly men—the head storyteller, the head musician, who carried a lot of the tradition of that tribe musically.

What I remember of this documentary is them getting together. He was meeting with this chief musician and they were playing for each other. Here he was with his million-dollar cello. And the head musician had a stringed instrument that was basically a drum made from an oil can, with a long pole and a string attached. The man would plunk on that string—I think it was only one string—and sing. You could hear it and think, well, it sort of sounds like what it looked like, a plunk on a string in an oil can.

But Yo-Yo Ma was listening with completely fresh ears. He just said, "Wow, that's really great, the way you play that and sing." Then he said, "Let's trade instruments." He gives the man his cello, and he takes the oil drum string thing. And he's saying, "I can't play this nearly as well as you can. Show me how to." He's trying to learn how to play it with complete freshness, with this kind of interest, this kind of wonder, no overlay of "I have this great classical Western European music background." It was just, "Wow, you really can do this well, much better than I can, and it's beautiful."

I love that. That's stayed with me for years, and I take that as a quality of mindfulness—that ability to meet each sensation of breath with that freshness, each sensation of lifting your foot with that freshness. It's the only thing happening in this moment. It can't be different this moment than how it is. Can we be here for it?

When we're able to be here for it with that quality of totality of non-judging presence, that's when awareness reveals itself. That's when there's that doorway to open into awareness and take it as our refuge rather than reacting to experience. We can relax into what's happening rather than struggling with it. And that's the doorway to the deathless.

Over time, the continuity of this willingness to meet each moment fresh—without getting lost in our reactions, and when we do, meeting the reaction fresh, "Oh, reactivity is like this," without needing it to go anywhere—the continuity through the day matters. The labeling, if you use it, is simply a way of helping us come into experience. It's not a way to encapsulate it, to say, "This is like this, and I know it already. Lifting—I know it." Labeling isn't meant to do that. It's to bring our attention into the experience. "Oh, pressure feels like this."

This non-interfering yet total presence through the days begins to give space for the actual nature of our mental and physical experience to reveal itself. Not how we think it is, not how we say it is, but just beginning to see what's really happening. And I'm going to tell you things, but don't believe me. Keep meeting moment after moment as freshly as you can.

This changing, insubstantial nature of all of our mental and physical experience—it will begin to reveal itself. It can't help but. Just see if you have any physical experience that lasts very long, any mental experience that lasts very long, that really has much substantiality past the moment. Working with steadiness through the day, you'll see things coming and going, coming and going. Nothing we can really say is totally reliable in the world of sense experience or mind experience.

When that begins to reveal itself—not because we want to see it, but because we stop wanting to see anything other than just what's here—it reveals itself because that's what's happening. That's not depressing. What actually happens when we see that everything is changing?

There isn't any substance I can grab for my own happiness, for my own sense of self. The heart and mind gradually stop looking to this changing, insubstantial world of sense experience. They stop looking there for lasting happiness because they just get it—it's not possible.

And when we stop looking, we stop putting our trust in this constantly changing world of sense experience. Basically, that's where we go for refuge. We go to some physical comfort. We go to some nice mental state. We go to trying to arrange experience in a way that affirms us or makes us feel good. That's what we look to for refuge. And it may work, but not for long. Even if it works for a year—though I doubt anything works for more than a few moments—that's where we go for refuge, and then it falls apart.

When the mind sees that enough, it stops going there for refuge. It just settles into knowing: falling apart is like this. And surprise—when we stop looking where refuge can never be found, we might discover that there's a peace, a silence, a happiness, a freedom that's always been here, always been accessible. We're just too involved with our reactions to notice it.

And so this simple moment-after-moment practice is really opening us to a much more profound possibility for peace in our lives. A kind of happiness that isn't the personal "I'm so great" happiness. A kind of happiness of non-struggle and total wakefulness that is always accessible to us when we can turn around and notice it.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 12

Seclusion (Viveka)

Carol Wilson · 59 min

> In this profound talk from the Forest Refuge, Carol Wilson illuminates the Buddhist concept of viveka (seclusion) in its multiple dimensions: kāya viveka (seclusion of body), citta viveka (seclusion of mind), and ultimately viveka as a designation for Nibbāna itself—complete separation from suffering. Drawing parallels with contemplative traditions worldwide, including the Desert Fathers and Christian hermits like Saint Anthony and Thomas Merton, Wilson explores why physical withdrawal from the 'flood of sensuality' serves as the essential foundation for spiritual awakening.
> Wilson explains how retreat practice creates the conditions for our 'demons'—our deeply conditioned patterns of self-judgment, fear, pride, and craving—to emerge in the light of awareness. Citing Ajahn Chah's teaching on enslavement to the senses and Ajahn Buddhadāsa's concept of satipaññā (mindfulness-wisdom) at the sense doors, she describes how naming and recognizing these patterns breaks their power over us. The talk draws on two important suttas where the Buddha distinguishes mere physical solitude from 'perfected living alone'—freedom from craving as one's constant companion.
> The practical heart of this teaching addresses how practitioners can get caught in pleasant states of mental seclusion, mistaking tranquility for liberation. Wilson emphasizes that citta viveka, while refreshing and purifying, must be used as a platform for investigating subtler forms of clinging rather than becoming an end in itself. True viveka, she concludes, naturally flowers into compassion—the solitary standing at the intersection of awakening and suffering humanity.

Tonight I'd like to talk about the topic of seclusion, which is the translation of the Pali word viveka.

Many of you might be familiar with a particular book of Ajahn Sumedho's called Citta Viveka, subtitled "Teachings from the Quiet Mind," but which more literally translates as "the secluded mind." I want to talk about various aspects of viveka, not only citta viveka. There's kaya viveka, which is seclusion of body, and citta viveka, seclusion of mind, leading into more refined types of mental seclusion. But there's also at least one place where the Buddha, according to Bhikkhu Bodhi, uses viveka as another designation for Nibbana. The particular quotation is: someone asked, "Do you know, dear sir, emancipation, release, seclusion for beings?" Bhikkhu Bodhi points out that those are meant as three designations for Nibbana—in that particular reference, seclusion really meaning separation from suffering.

This topic just interests me, so I'd like to talk about different aspects of seclusion, of viveka.

Obviously, on the level of kaya viveka, seclusion of body, that's a huge part of our practice. It's also, as I'm sure you know, a very intrinsic and respected aspect of most spiritual traditions that I know of—this sense of going into seclusion, whether it's an intensive retreat or simply seclusion in nature, going off alone into the wilderness. Various traditions have this as a central part, at least for the role of the mystic, if not for every single person who's part of that tradition. So a big part of what we're doing when we come on a retreat such as this, whether it's for a day or for six months, is moving into this aspect of the mystical tradition of pretty much all traditions.

I want to read a little bit about the early Christian desert fathers, because it hits on several aspects of what I want to talk about in relation to seclusion tonight. It's from a book about hermits from all different traditions. The author is talking about the desert fathers:

"The desert is the uninhabitable place. It is the region of desolation and solitude that surrounds and threatens the fertile plain." This is in Egypt. "Along the Nile Valley, the desert is a silent presence, always visible to the dwellers in towns and villages as they live in comfort on the rich, dark soil. Its bare hills are the waste howling wilderness of the Old Testament, the haunts of demons. And yet men and women have always been drawn from the comfort and security of their homes in the valley to the barren caves above in search of solitude."

Then they talk about perhaps the most famous of the Desert Fathers, Saint Antony of Egypt, whose life inspired thousands to leave their homes and follow him. He was the son of rich Christian parents who died in his youth, leaving him well provided for with a life of ease. But one day when he was in church and he heard the words of Jesus to the rich young man—that he should sell all he had and give it to the poor—Antony inexplicably felt the words were spoken to him and actually did that, which is rare in this world. He gave everything he had. He went to a local hermit to learn how to live in solitude—went to a teacher. Then he went far, far into the desert until he finally ended up in a deserted fort in Pispyr on the east bank of the Nile. He lived alone without seeing a human face for over twenty years. His friends would bring him supplies of bread and water every six months. Sometimes the friends who brought these supplies would hear terrifying shrieks and groans from behind the locked doors. Eventually—twenty years eventually—they could stand this no longer and broke down the doors, expecting to release a wasted and emaciated maniac. Instead, Antony emerged healthy, sane, and balanced. He went to Alexandria to support the Christians who were being persecuted there and spent the rest of his life alternating between retreats into solitude and emerging to help and advise others.

I love that. It touches on so many aspects of what we're doing here. It's really a huge renunciation. Even just the kaya viveka, just the solitude of body. And it's not just for ourselves alone. And it requires meeting all of our demons.

So kaya viveka, solitude of body, is where we begin—simply by removing ourselves from the crowds, from so much busyness, from so much input of sense impression.

Why? How is this helpful?

Thomas Merton, who was one of the more famous relatively present-day Christian hermits, just wanted to be a hermit. He wasn't actually allowed to be a hermit that much; he was always yearning to be one. He said the search for solitude is a journey to discover the inner self. The monks fled to the desert to become ordinary. If they had gone there to be extraordinary, this would have meant taking the world with them as a standard of comparison. They lived among the rocks because they wanted to be themselves and to flee a world that divided them from themselves.

This isn't meaning fleeing the world with aversion because we hate everything and everybody, so we're going to go off into the rocks because they at least will leave us in peace—although I certainly, speaking for myself, on rare occasions have had that feeling: thank God I can escape into the silence.

But of course, that's not the ultimate reason. The true purpose is to become ordinary, to discover our inner self. And it's not simply to create some constructed state of inner or outer calm and quiet that we then hold on to for dear life. It's really so that, like St. Anthony, when we emerge, we're actually able to be more present—with compassion and less reactivity—in the world. It's not to leave the world out of hatred.

But just to even begin the inner journey, some seclusion on the physical level is really, really helpful. Seclusion from sense experience, first from all the input of people—of course we know that—and simply to stop feeding the craving for sense desire. Because there's so much overwhelming whirl of sense experience in our ordinary daily life, in our family life, in the flood of information, in the sense pleasures available to us. It's just so much that it's really difficult to even disengage enough to see what else might be possible without physically removing ourselves, just a little.

This is Ajahn Chah talking about the flood of sensuality, which is really what leads us into needing some seclusion. He says: "We are sunk in sights, in sounds, in smells, in tastes, in bodily sensations. We're sunk because we look outwardly at externals. We don't look inwardly. And it's like being a slave. Somebody else has control over you. It's as if they tell you to sit, you have to sit. When they say walk, you have to walk. Being enslaved by the senses is the same. No matter how hard you try, you can't shake it off."

And so really, just this first step of physical seclusion—coming to a retreat, just being quiet for an hour, coming here for six months, or fleeing into the desert for twenty years—is simply to begin to take our senses out of this flood of sensuality, to be able to begin to look inward. Instead of being so enslaved by sense pleasure and reaction to it that we don't even know how to disengage.

Thich Nhat Hanh writes: "We've lost our taste for silence. We don't know how to be ourselves without something else to accompany us. We need a book, telephone, TV. We've lost our taste for being alone. And the first thing for us to do is to return to ourselves in order to recover ourselves, to be our best. We need to reorganize our lives so that we do not allow society to colonize us." We don't allow sense experience to colonize us.

And so, you know, of course some of you have just been here a few days, so what I'm about to say is more familiar to you. The rest of you—of course this is so far distant you'll have to vaguely remember. But you know how it is when we first come on retreat, those first few days, and the beginning disengagement from the flood of sensuality is so difficult. The restlessness, the sleepiness, and the endless chattering of the mind—which I know some of you, as I said, are so far beyond. But the endless chattering of the mind in response to sense pleasure, and just as the sense experiences are taken away as you come here, for some days it's as if the endless chattering of the sixth sense, the mind, is brought into high relief. As the rest of the senses quiet down a little, the chattering in the mind can almost get unbearable, right? "Oh my God, if this starts with this story again, I'm going to have to kill myself. I just can't bear it."

And over time, when we stop fighting that, even the flood of the endless chatter begins to slow down. I'm not saying stop, but it begins to slow down. It gets less obsessive. And just in this kāya viveka, just in this physical seclusion—without at the moment really having done much else in terms of formal practice—there begins to be some space. The attention, the senses, aren't turned so slavishly outward, externally. We're not in so much reaction to the chatter inwardly, and so it begins to slow down. It begins to open up like a space, or silence, however you experience it—in the mind, in the heart. Okay, maybe itty-bitty at first. But it's the beginning of recognizing that there's another possibility, another way to be. Just the seclusion of body and senses allows us to begin to recognize the possibility of living more at home in this inner space, this mental space or silence of awareness, with more potential for peace.

Along with the physical seclusion, most retreats—certainly in this tradition, and often when you read about hermits in other traditions—nature plays a big part. Usually, given a choice, the Tibetan yogis go off to some remote, incredibly wild mountain cave. They don't usually pick a little basement apartment in Lhasa if they have a choice. I mean, it's not impossible, but there's something about nature that can be supremely supportive of deepening the kāya viveka, the seclusion of body. I find personally that nature tends to deepen in me something that reflects the inner silence, the inner spaciousness of mind and heart. It doesn't tend to feed the incessant chatter but just kind of leads into silence and space. It's as if nature reflects the inner silence and space of awareness, of the mind and heart.

And I think this can be very helpful, as often on retreats, when you're feeling really caught up or stressed or caught in judgment or a pattern or fear, we'll say: just cool out. Go walk in the woods.

Go sit. Go out tonight. Sit and look at the full moon. It's full moon night. It was clear when I came in. There's just something about it that, to me, just brings a stillness.

In fact, two nights ago, I was driving back from the airport, heading east, and the moon was just coming up over the horizon, really huge, right in front of the road. It brought this immediate stillness and silence to my mind—a little too much, actually, because I needed to be focusing on the highway. The moon would completely space me out, and then I'd get right back to driving. But it just has that capacity, and it's really useful to take us out of our chatter.

This is a familiar poem by Wendell Berry, but I want to read it because for me it evokes that inner sense of stillness that nature can help us to recognize:

When despair for the world grows in me and I awake in the night at the least sound in fear of what my life and my children's lives may be, I go and lie down where the wood drake rests in his beauty on the water and the great heron feeds. I come into the peace of wild things who do not tax their lives with forethought of grief. I come into the presence of still water and I feel above me the day-blind stars waiting with their light. For a time I rest in the grace of the world and am free.

That sense of freedom is really the freedom of total awareness and non-clinging. The ultimate viveka—seclusion, separation from suffering—is the peace, the spaciousness of the heart-mind of non-clinging. Just a touch of the silence, the spaciousness of awareness, makes it easier to cultivate more seclusion of body, leading to seclusion of mind, which leads us into the understanding and clear seeing that allows for an even deeper release of clinging, of suffering.

Of course, as we know, coming into the silence, the stillness, the aloneness of a retreat—or the desert, or wherever we're doing it, in our little basement apartment as well—isn't only that the chatter slows down, the heart and mind get expansive, we touch a moment of peace, the space of non-clinging, and that just keeps expanding and expanding until that's all there is. Smooth, smooth, easy. As we know, that isn't exactly the route all the time.

Remember what I read about the desert: "the region of desolation and solitude that surrounds and threatens the fertile plain, the waste howling wilderness." The shrieks and groans of St. Anthony are also part of what arises in the course of our spiritual journey—almost not in spite of the seclusion but because of it. By entering consciously, willingly, into this space where we are withdrawing from the world of the flood of sensuality, withdrawing from our usual interactions with other people, from our usual distractions and ways that we spend our time, it's almost as if this space and silence gives room—calls up, invites—what you could call our deeper personal demons to emerge.

In the first days of retreat, they're more generic in terms of the hindrances: the sleepiness, the restlessness, desire and aversion (which are more than just hindrances), and doubt. As a retreat goes on, or as a period of physical seclusion continues, the demons might turn into something more subtle—or maybe they feel less subtle but more personally tuned to whatever each of our particular life-pattern demons happen to be. As a function of the silence and spaciousness deepening, of the endless chatter beginning to slow down, of us not having our usual flood of sense experience to turn to, it's almost as if we've invited these demons to come up.

There are times in every retreat where we're going to feel like St. Anthony behind those doors in the cave, shrieking and groaning. It might be ways that we're caught that are clear to us—our pattern, our so-called inner demon, whether it's self-hatred, judgment, worthlessness, or lust, or strong desire, or conceit, comparing, pride, the need to be perfect.

Sometimes we don't quite recognize it because the content of the demons, the deeper we go in our practice, often takes the form of how we relate to the practice itself. So we don't recognize it's a demon when we take out the whip and beat ourselves up every time we wander from the breath. Or when we think, "I'm pretty focused on the breath, but by this time it should be a lot better than this. By this time in the retreat, I should have twenty-five percent fewer thoughts than I'm having now"—some kind of insane thing that we made up out of God knows where and totally believe. That thought can be accompanied by self-hatred or judgment, or it can go the other way: pride. "I'm really doing good. Now look at that person. I've been here a lot less time than they have, and they don't look nearly as mindful as I do." However we do it, the demons very easily take the form of how we're relating to practice—which isn't a bad thing, but just recognize it.

Here's one clue: when the demons are there, we're suffering. Generally it doesn't take a huge subtlety of consciousness or awareness to recognize that we're suffering. We may not quite recognize what the hook is, but you really can tell it's different from lying down in the space of nature, in the peace of wild things. You really know something's changed here. It's not quite so spacious.

Sometimes we start to enter into demons that are not so personal but quite deep: fear of impermanence, total discomfort with instability, discomfort with chaos, trying to control what's happening or what's going to happen or how our practice is. Or, as I've mentioned in other talks, you don't think you're trying to control—you simply think you're trying to have a clear explanation of everything that's happening, why and what it means and how it should be happening. That too is trying to fix chaos into some nice little box. It doesn't work, and we suffer. A form of the demons.

But it's not a mistake or wrong that these demons come up. It's part of it. I think I said this here before, but I love this line from one of my teachers: "In the light of awareness, all the snakes come out of their holes." That's really what it is. We go into the desert.

We really seclude ourselves from our usual distractions. And in the light of mindfulness—which is ultimately non-discriminating, simply heightening our awareness to notice whatever arises—it's as if these old friends appear. We have developed very subtle and useful defense mechanisms not to notice that they're there. But now these patterns seem to say, "Oh great, these mechanisms aren't quite operating," and whoosh, up they come.

This is wonderful, because until we see them in the light of awareness, in the light of day, until we turn around and recognize them—until that time, we're really the slaves, as Ajahn Chah says. We're the slaves of these demons, of these patterns of our mind. When self-judgment says, "Shut up and sit down," we do it. Or we do it in order not to recognize self-judgment. When pride says, "Do this so you look better," we do it, rather than turning around and recognizing the pride.

This is where learning to recognize these demons with mindfulness becomes the second aspect of kāya-viveka—not only being in physical seclusion, but using the attention to bring mindfulness, to have mindfulness-wisdom, satīpaññā as Ajahn Buddhadasa terms it, at the sense doors. In the moment of sense contact, in the moment of recognizing that a sense experience is happening—including the mental, which could include many of our demons: anger, worthlessness, inferiority, whatever—having mindfulness-wisdom at the sense door means recognizing its presence, connecting with mindfulness, recognizing it for what it is. Paññā. Satīpaññā. "Ah, that's mental experience—fear. That's mental experience—pride." Satīpaññā at the sense door is the second aspect of kāya-viveka, of seclusion of body. And this is really what gives us the power of seeing the demons for what they are.

There's a wonderful quotation in the book Vision of Dhamma, where the author talks about the power of naming. He discusses how primitive peoples believed that words exercised a magical power. He says that things that could be named had lost their secret power over humans, the horror of the unknown. To know the name of a force, a being, or an object was the same as mastery over it. This ancient belief in the magical potency of names also appears in fairy tales and myths, where the power of a demon is broken just by facing it courageously and pronouncing its name.

In some ways, this is exactly what goes on with observing power, mindfulness, satīpaññā, at the point of the sense doors' contact. There's a vast difference between being driven by self-judgment, by feelings of inferiority, by pride, and being able to turn around and say, "Ah, self-judgment feels like this." Maybe it's not as vast a difference as we would wish—we might wish it would all vanish as soon as we name it. But the power of being able to turn around with the courage of mindfulness and with the clear seeing of paññā and name the particular force—that is really what takes the sense of self out of that particular demon. That's what takes the identification out, and the fear of it.

Eventually that demon doesn't even have to go away. It stops being unknown. It stops being so horrible. It stops driving us. We stop being enslaved to it. And really, there can be moments: "Okay, fear can be here or not. It really doesn't make that much difference." Self-judgment: "Yeah, I recognize this. It feels like this. It'll come, it'll go. It's not who I am." That truly comes from kāya-viveka and the continuity of mindfulness, observing power, satīpaññā at the sense doors.

There's a Jewish saying I once read—I don't know where, but I like it. It says that to name something is to know why God cannot be named. As soon as we name something —"Oh, that's what it is"—it's taken out of the realm of mystery, out of the realm of the unknowable, of freedom, of peace, of awareness. It's just become this conditioned phenomenon that comes due to conditions, passes due to conditions, comes again—maybe all too soon—due to conditions, and passes again. It's really different from mystery, from God, which can't be named. And this takes the fear, the horror out of these things.

So in kāya-viveka, it's not only a matter of removing ourselves physically from other beings and from the flood of sensuality, but of using this seclusion to cultivate the steadiness of mindfulness. As Sayadaw U Pandita describes it: "At first we remove ourselves from the environment of sense pleasures, but this is not enough. We also become mindful of whatever object arises at the six sense doors, directing the mind towards the object." This is very much the Mahasi style of describing it. As you direct the mind towards the object, it really connects—for that moment only—becomes stable, engrossed with the object, notices, can name what is arising, sense experience of any of the six senses. In that moment, the mind is free from desire, sense desire or aversion or delusion—just for that moment. It's knowing what's what. And that's really what we call restraint at the sense doors.

Doesn't mean we have to hide from every sense experience, but restraint is meeting it with full awareness, with sati-pañña. Moment after moment of this sati-pañña, of just meeting with full awareness without judgment, without aversion, without clinging—this is what then leads to the more stable quality of attention that verges into samadhi, where the mind is more easily and continually meeting each object.

And that's then moving into what is referred to as citta-viveka, where the mind, the heart, is secluded really from the hindrances. In citta-viveka, the mind is free from kilesas that are arising in reaction to sense pleasures. And this is a very pleasant state. Just having a mind free from kilesas just for a moment is really pleasant. The kilesas are burning. They're tormenting. That's one of the translations—torments of the mind. And so the secluded mind, the mind where the kilesas are just kept away through steadiness of moment after moment mindfulness, that's a very peaceful and soothing and refreshing experience.

And when we're trying to get there because we think it'll be nice? Forget that. All we're doing then is cultivating wanting and self-sense. But by the moment after moment of just noticing what's present and naming it without getting involved in liking, disliking, making a story about it, then citta-viveka develops by itself.

So we get interested in noticing how the mind reacts to sense experience. This is from a disciple of Ramana Maharshi, describing how we can recognize all our patterns that we get caught in, our suffering demons. He says, "If you want to pay attention to a special area of danger, watch how the five senses operate"—although I would say six senses here. "It is the nature of the mind to seek stimulation through the senses. The mind catches hold of sense impressions and processes them in such a way that they produce long chains of uncontrolled thoughts. So learn to watch how your senses behave. Learn to watch how the mind reacts to sense impressions."

This is a whole very interesting aspect of our practice. When we get over hating the fact that as soon as we become aware of a tension in the neck, we go off into some whole long story about what it means. Or as soon as we smell some pleasant smell at 11:30 in the morning, we're off into the world of restaurants and dinner parties. As soon as we stop judging ourselves about that and can just get interested in noticing—oh, smell, pleasant, and the mind goes way out to lunch, literally and figuratively, on the smell—we say, oh, look at that. Come back to sati-pañña at the scent door. Smell, pleasant, really wanting to make something of this. Oh yeah, wanting feels like this—and it stops.

Unpleasant tightness in the neck, and the mind really goes into it: "Oh no, this again, it's how I'm sitting, if I could only find the right way to sit, maybe if I had a higher pillow, maybe if I could go to that good cranial sacral therapist I've heard about, he's only in Barry, I'm sure that would fix me up..." Oh, yeah. The mind is in a way just amusing itself rather than just noticing tension, tension, unpleasant.

But we don't judge this at all. We just get fascinated by watching this process. And in the fascination with it, we really see over and over, we get it viscerally, how these reactions, these habitual reactions of mind to every sense experience that happens, are just feeding our sense of self and the resultant suffering.

And really, it starts to get easier. It's more fulfilling. It makes us happier to meet the sense experience with sati-pañña. At first, it feels like we're really renouncing all the stories that make up the life story of me. And it feels like a real struggle. One of the reasons the discipline of samadhi practice can send our mind into tantrums, like a two-year-old: "I'm not coming back to the breath, and you can't make me. There's nothing you can do. I'm going to think about this, goddammit, and it's going to make me happy." And after about a million times, we get it: oh, this is really dukkha. It's much more pleasant, it's much more peaceful to just come back and feel fluttering, to just feel tension. Oh yeah, tension. There's peace, there's ease because there's no me, there's no story, there's nothing extra added.

And so in this way, the sati-pañña, the steadiness of mindfulness as attention meets each of the six sense experiences as they arise, leads us quite naturally into the peacefulness, the quietness, the calm and coolness of citta-viveka—the mind that's secluded from the hindrances. It's very pleasant.

And as we continue with practice, there can be times where the hindrances, or all the kilesas, fade to become really, really remote. With citta-viveka, we can be quite at peace. But something happens, and the hindrances, they're just lurking around there, waiting for a crack, and they come rushing back in. As the mind at times gets more and more peaceful, the kilesas become as if much more remote. There's a whole Pali word for this, which I'm sure you're dying to know, and I'm sure you want to remember, so I'll just tell you. It's vikambana-viveka. Way, way remote. And this is a place where the body feels light and energized. The mind is soft and buoyant.

And yes, it's nice. This is a place where people often get caught. We can often mistake it for something more than it is. What is it? It's a constructed state where the mind is peaceful, and it's very nourishing because the kilesas aren't there. But if all we do is hang with that, it's nice, but it's not liberating insight. The kilesas, the torments, our patterns, our demons are not being uprooted. They're simply far, far away.

So it's very important, even in this state where it all feels so remote, not to just—well, you can have a few moments of really enjoying it. But then at some point, not to just think, "Well, this is it. There's no more work to do. Time to go home." And we do this. As someone was saying to me the other day, it was quite insightful: they saw how they'd hit this really lovely place of sukha, and everything was really nice. And they saw their mind saying, "Okay, well, I guess it's time to leave now." But they had the insight to see that this is another conditioned state, and it changed—which of course it had changed by the time we were talking.

So there are ways we get attached, some quite subtly and some not so subtly. We can get attached to the subtle state I'm describing, where the kilesas are far away, that state of seclusion of mind and heart. We can also get attached on the level of kaya viveka to the conditions themselves.

Just on the level of conditions, when you find yourself—and it happens on retreats—no matter how quiet it is here, there's some noise that just bugs the heck out of you. "What's this doing here? I need my silence in order to progress in my practice." And we all go there. "There's too many people." I don't think you could really say that here—you'd have to really try. But if the mind is in enough of a snit, you can find something. Somebody's doing something that's annoying you. They're not respecting the stillness in some way. There's some noise. You didn't get it perfect, and something is intruding on the silence, which is upsetting your practice. That's when we're leaning into holding on to the conditions.

But the conditions are only there to help us recognize the silence, the seclusion, the spaciousness, the way into awareness and non-clinging in ourselves. And then to recognize that this is accessible all the time, not only in the deva realm of the forest refuge when nobody's doing anything to bother you.

So we can get attached to the conditions—and that's not so subtle. And we can get attached to the real stillness, the quietness of mind, where it just feels like there are no problems anymore. What's the need to keep practicing? We get caught there by that stopping. That's what Sayadaw U Pandita calls "stopping within." Or we can simply be there, and we don't really feel we're attached, we're not holding onto it, but we stop investigating. We kind of just ride on the tranquility or the coolness, and we don't quite have the energy of investigation—the enlightenment factors that Marcia talked about a couple of weeks ago. It's as if we get content.

I remember a friend who had been a forest monk in Thailand for eight or nine years. He said ultimately he got very happy there, very peaceful. And he ultimately left, came back to the West as a monk—which is really hard—and ended up disrobing. But he told me once that deep down, the reason he left is because it just got too easy. It got so peaceful and calm, but he could intuitively feel that a great deal of it—not all, of course, it's useful—but that it wasn't the end.

Ajahn Sumedho, in his book Citta Awake, tells a story about how after meditating for years in the forest up in northeastern Thailand, feeling totally cooled out and peaceful, he'd have to go to Bangkok to renew his visa. It would be as if I told you that you have to go to Gardner, to Walmart, and gave you a shopping list tomorrow. That would be a good test. How really equanimous and peaceful am I in the midst of...

I was in Walmart the other day, which is why I mentioned it. I was with my sister, and I said I call Walmart a vortex of suffering. You go in there to get one thing and you can't get out for hours. It's like a little minor hell realm. My sister, who doesn't really practice, was looking at me like, "What are you, crazy? What are you talking about, a vortex of evil?" But I lose it in Walmart, so I know I still have to keep going there from time to time to test myself.

Anyway, Ajahn Sumedho said he would find that not all of the peace would go, but some of it would. And so that's not liberation. That's not the full heart's release of non-clinging. There's still quite some conditioning: I'm peaceful, but only if nothing bothers me, or nothing new. I've gotten used to the bugs.

I've gotten used to these things. If something new comes in, I'm all shaken up." So that's when my friend said he left the monastery—in order to see that.

There's a quotation from the Buddha, which I'm summarizing rather than giving you exactly. But he said something to the effect that there were two things he never lost sight of. One was really putting out full effort. And the other was never getting content and thinking, "Well, this is good enough. I've put out enough effort, and this is good enough. I really don't need to keep practicing."

This doesn't mean staying in intensive practice forever. It doesn't mean you should never leave a retreat until you've finally achieved arahatship—we're not just trying to keep the place full here. But it does mean you don't leave retreat and think, "Well, that's it. I've done it. That was nice. Now I can cruise." Never thinking, as nice as this is, that it's good enough. But seeing if there are still tendencies to get lost in craving—that's then the use to which we put the seclusion of body and the seclusion of mind.

We're not cultivating citta-viveka only because it's refreshing and purifying and easeful. Those things are good—a pleasant abiding here and now, as the Buddha often said—but not an end in itself, not a place to say "okay" and come to rest. Rather, we use the subtlety of awareness, of mindfulness, of seeing, to then cultivate, to really begin to see and investigate the much more subtle arisings of clinging. The sense of "me" around experience, the sense of conceit, of comparing, of self-importance—to really viscerally experience these on the much more subtle levels. Which is really what's going on for many, many of you here.

You think, "I'm not in some huge demon experience." But then we start to see how much the sense of self arises just around subtle experience—the sense of comparing, the sense of judgment. Not to be discouraged by that. It's great that we start to see it. That's what we use the seclusion from the stronger kilesas for, the seclusion from the flood of sensuality—to be able to explore, as the Buddha talked about it, perfecting living alone.

A couple of suttas. There's one where he's talking to a venerable elder monk. And the Buddha says to him, "Is it true, elder, that you live alone and praise the virtues of living alone?" And he says, "Yes, Lord." The Buddha says, "But how do you live alone? And how do you praise the virtues of living alone?" The monk said, "Lord, alone I enter the village for alms. Alone I return. Alone I sit withdrawn in meditation. Alone I do walking meditation. That is how I live alone and praise living alone."

The Buddha says, "Yes, there is that way of living alone. I don't say there isn't. But listen well to how your living alone can be perfected in its details. Pay close attention." "As you say, Blessed One," the monk replied. "How is living alone perfected in its details?"

Just a minor detail here. "This is the case where whatever is past is abandoned, whatever is future is relinquished, and any passion and desire with regard to states of being in the present is not held to, is not fed." In other words, any clinging, any aversion, any reaction to states of being in the present is not held onto, is not fed. That is how living alone is perfected in its details.

A much vaster, a much deeper and more subtle sense of living alone—much more to do with freedom.

Another sutta where he's talking to another monk on a similar subject says it in a different way. The monk asks him, "What does 'lone dweller' mean? What way is one dwelling with a partner, and what way is one dwelling alone?" And the Buddha says, "There are, Migajala"—that's the name of the monk—"forms cognizable by the eye that are desirable, lovely, agreeable, pleasing, sensually enticing, tantalizing." And that could be the inner eye as well, right? "If a bhikkhu, a practitioner, seeks delight in them, welcomes them, and remains holding to these forms, delight arises."

When there is delight, there is infatuation. When there is infatuation, there is bondage. Bound by this fetter, a bhikkhu is called one dwelling with a partner.

And then he goes through all the senses—sounds cognizable by the ear, odors by the nose, tastes cognizable by the tongue, tactile objects cognizable by the body, mental phenomena cognizable by the mind that are desirable, lovely, agreeable, pleasing, tantalizing. And if we get lost in infatuation in relation to any of these, there is bondage.

Thus, he says, even though a bhikkhu who dwells thus resorts to forests and groves, to remote lodgings where there are few sounds and little noise, desolate, hidden from people, appropriate for seclusion, he is still called one dwelling with a partner. For what reason? Because craving is his partner, and he has not abandoned it. Therefore, he is called one dwelling with a partner.

And of course, the opposite holds true. If one does not seek delight, does not remain holding to any sense object, then the infatuation does not arise. When there's no infatuation, there is no bondage. And thus, released from this fetter, a bhikkhu is called a lone dweller.

And then, even though a bhikkhu who dwells thus lives in the vicinity of a village, associating with bhikkhus and bhikkhunis, with male and female lay followers, with kings and royal ministers, with sectarian teachers and their disciples, he is still called a lone dweller. For what reason? Because craving was his partner and he has abandoned it. Therefore, he is called a lone dweller.

This is really the point of viveka. This is the viveka of freedom—freedom from the bondage to clinging, to craving. And then, ostensibly, we could even spend the whole day in Walmart and be a lone dweller.

And that's the reason for the cultivation of seclusion of body, of the senses, and of the mind. To see that really, on a momentary level, to remember that that piece of non-clinging—the space in the heart and the mind that I personally find at times in nature—our koan really is to recognize that this is available, that non-clinging is what allows us to recognize and really live from this space, and that it's always available, only available here and now. In the silence and stillness and beauty of this retreat center, in the hubbub of our lives.

The retreat is simply to help us really understand how clinging is created in response to sense pleasures, in response to our stories, to experience the suffering of it and lose our fascination with it and let it go.

And here's a great poem by Lala, who was a woman mystic in northern India in the 1300s:

Some people abandon their homes.
Others abandon hermitages.
All this renunciation does nothing if you are not deeply conscious.
Day and night, be aware with each breath and live there.

That's our koan. Just seclusion and awakening from moment to moment. Deep awareness with each breath, and live there.

And then we really see, like St. Anthony, you know, we might go back and forth, but really we emerge—it's never just for ourselves, it quite naturally moves into a sense of compassion and kinship with all beings.

I want to read something from Thomas Merton. He's saying, the solitary is one who is aware of solitude in herself or himself as a basic and inevitable human reality, not just as something which affects him as an isolated individual. Hence, this solitude is the foundation of the deep, pure, and gentle sympathy with all other humans, whether or not they are realizing the tragedy of their plight. More, the solitude is the doorway by which he enters into the mystery of God and brings others into that mystery by the power of his love and his humility.

Or to just end with the words of an Anglican nun I read about who loved solitude so much that she spent eighteen years living in an abandoned cabin that she fixed up on the edge of some remote cliff somewhere. I don't even know where. But she was not really quite alone because people kept coming to her and bringing their troubles to her. And when she was asked, "Why do you keep being so available when really what you love is the solitude?" she said that she believes that the responsibility of the solitary person like her is to stand at the intersection between the love of God and suffering humanity.

Really, the culmination of our seclusion.

May the beneficial energies generated by our sincere practice today and in these last days—may these be shared with all beings everywhere, in all realms, in all conditions of existence. May our practice be the cause for the happiness, the freedom from suffering, the awakening of ourselves and all beings everywhere.

CHAPTER 13

Rightening The Mind And Heart

Carol Wilson · 1h05

> In this talk, Carol Wilson addresses a common challenge in meditation practice: those times when mindfulness feels contracted, energy is depleted, and the luminous nature of mind seems impossibly distant. Beginning with the Buddha's teaching that the mind is inherently luminous and brightly shining, merely colored by visiting attachments, she explores why understanding this truth is essential for sustained practice.
> Wilson emphasizes that bhāvanā (mental cultivation) doesn't stand alone but is embedded in the complete path the Buddha taught, including dāna (generosity) and sīla (ethical conduct). When mindfulness practice alone isn't providing the needed brightness and inspiration, we can skillfully call upon these other aspects of the path. She discusses the four aspects of right effort (sammā vāyāma), noting that two of them specifically address cultivating wholesome states—not as a form of spiritual bypassing, but as legitimate tools for expanding consciousness beyond contracted identification with difficult patterns.
> Drawing on her experiences in Burma, Wilson shares moving examples of how generosity brings immediate joy and connection, cutting through the sense of separation. She offers practical suggestions including actively recalling past wholesome actions, cultivating gratitude, practicing mettā even briefly, and framing our practice within the larger aspiration for the benefit of all beings. These practices, she explains, don't avoid suffering but rather restore access to the spacious, luminous awareness that allows us to meet difficulty without being overwhelmed by identification.

Luminous is this mind, brightly shining, but it is colored by the attachments that visit it. This unlearned people do not really understand, and so do not cultivate the mind. Luminous is this mind, brightly shining, and it is free of the attachments that visit it. This the noble follower of the way really understands. So for them, there is cultivation of the mind.

This luminous reality of the mind, how things are, is often in practice quite naturally accessible. It's not something foreign to us or hard to come by. In times when mindfulness is steady or strong, when concentration is quite steady, when practicing metta, this luminous quality, this luminous nature of mind may be quite readily known. We just know it as part of what we are. We may not even be thinking about it, may not be noting, "Oh yes, there's the luminous nature of mind." It's just so essentially true.

But the interesting part of this passage that I want to talk about tonight is the understanding that sometimes—often, actually—this luminous quality is colored over, hidden by the attachments, by the habits of mind that visit it. And when we don't understand that these are just passing conditioned experiences, habits of mind, that's when we tend to give up. "I lost it. I'm just slogging through. It's over. I can't get it back." And that's when cultivation ceases.

But knowing that the luminous nature of our mind cannot be truly touched—no matter what may be visiting, how long it may be staying, how completely identified we are with our visitor—knowing that the true nature, the luminosity, is not touched: that's what gives us the inspiration, the motivation to cultivate our mind, to develop our mind, to really purify the mind.

What I want to talk about tonight is this essential aspect of our path, what I've been calling in my own mind lately "purifying our inner landscape." Sometimes it may feel like we've been an awfully long time slogging through, trying to purify this inner landscape. A sense of the luminous nature, the freedom of mind and heart, may seem not even a remote memory but some unattainable, imagined experience.

In practice it happens that we can be visited quite strongly by aspects of our mental habits, the particular patterns of our inner psyche, our particular karmic knots. Sometimes we get so lost in them, or so familiar with them, that we get really bogged down. Sati, mindfulness practice, doesn't—for that moment, not forever, but for that moment or some little while—seem to be quite buoying us up enough. We can get really contracted, bogged down, lost, losing our motivation. This quality of brightness of heart and mind, brightness of citta—the same word means both heart and mind—can seem really far away. Even though we're practicing our meditation very sincerely and steadily, it's like we just get more and more contracted, farther and farther away, and it gets harder to practice.

So what I want to talk about tonight is really a reminder. This is nothing any of you don't know—stuff that we all know very well. But remember that cultivation of mind, bhavana, or meditation practices, whether mindfulness practice or samadhi practice or metta practice, is embedded in a whole path that the Buddha taught. It doesn't stand alone. It can't stand alone. And there are times, even deep in a meditation retreat as well as in our daily life, when it can be very useful to actively, consciously call in some other aspects of the path in the specific service of brightening our mind and heart, of lightening it, of bringing back the inspiration, the access to the luminous nature.

Sometimes in retreats particularly, we can get so focused—really sincerely—on our mindfulness that we get incredibly grim. "I missed three steps. I have to go back and do it again. I'm missing so much." It's like you're about to explode. And somehow the incandescent, luminous, empty nature is a little bit missing in that moment. In a very light way, we can consciously call in some of the other aspects of the path.

This purifying of our inner landscape, coming face to face with our psychic patterns and karmic knots, is a huge and very profound work of the path. Tsoknyi Rinpoche once wrote about our particular psychic patterns or knots: "It's the cage we have created for ourselves out of our emotions and our reaction habits, out of our sense of me and other. And in this cage here, we sit day in and day out."

On retreat, it can really feel like that, can't it? Just sitting in some cage of wanting, some cage of judging, some cage of fear. It can literally feel like here we sit, day in and day out—until sometimes you just want to go screaming down the driveway.

This is normal and an important aspect of practice. It may take the form of really particular habits of mind that you recognize from your life—patterns that may come together with memories, with recognizing that how you're relating to something happening here is very much a pattern you've carried with you through life and not seen so clearly before.

It may be something like self-judgment. It may be the reemergence of past traumas triggered by the silence or by something that happens here. It may be habits of anger. It may be something that isn't so obviously a story from your life, but a pattern we never quite recognize.

For example, fear is a very common experience to arise deep in retreat, and sometimes in very subtle ways. I mean, it doesn't feel subtle, and it's not like a huge panic, but it's fear arising at everything, at nothing. Fear to take a step, fear to take a bite, fear to do something wrong—just fear in relationship to nothing. That doesn't feel subtle, but actually it isn't a story from our life. It's just very, very deep patterns beginning to open up.

Sometimes it may be guilt and sorrow over past actions. Sometimes we don't even notice it arising as a psychic knot, we'd say, or a karmic pattern. But it's really expressing itself in the way we're relating to the practice. Striving, for example, is a good example of that—always trying to get things a little bit clearer, a little bit slower, trying to get concentration a little bit stiller, or clinging ever so subtly to pleasant states and just not noticing it.

You get the point. That these things arise is not a problem in the present moment. I know it may feel like a problem, but that arising is really arising as a present moment result of previous karma, of previous actions, of the previous habits—the ruts we've worn, the grooves we've worn in the mind.

Take self-judging, for example. If that's the way our mind has related to much of our experience in life, of course it's going to come up very strongly here. And of course it will come up when we're not so happy with what's happening. It doesn't come up when we're somehow feeling things are going great. Or maybe it can, because then you say, "Well, now I'm being proud. I shouldn't be proud." It can be endless.

That arising is due to past karma. What's purifying about it? That, of course, is all about how this pattern, this moment of mind, this moment of mental experience, is met in the present moment.

And this, again, is obvious. This isn't something new. But in our normal life, or even here, if we're not mindful—if we're kind of caught unawares by fear, by greed, by remorse over past actions, whatever—if we're caught unaware, then our response will tend to be whatever the habit pattern has been in our daily life.

So if you don't like what's happening and your usual response is self-judgment, aversion, and you don't notice that, you heap more aversion on top of it and you dig yourself into a really deep hole and then you get filled with aversion to everything. That could be our normal response. Or we ignore it altogether. We don't even know it's happening. Or we get really aversive to the pattern itself: "I'm sick of this fear. I refuse to be fearful anymore. I will stop being greedy. As of this moment, I am letting go of all desire." Have you tried that one?

In either of these—we don't see it, we run with it, or we're really aversive to it—well, we're still doing what Soknyi Rinpoche said: sitting in our cage. Basically, the pattern is driving the bus.

Once when I was doing some therapy, the therapist was talking about different patterns just like this. She said, "You have a pattern of really being negative to yourself. You need to recognize it with mindfulness. But you don't want to let the three-year-old drive the bus." And I thought, "Oh, yeah, that makes sense." You welcome the three-year-old in. You don't hit it in the face. But you don't let it run the show.

So of course, when we're being mindful—when you simply meet the arising of fear, the arising of aversion, the arising of clinging, for the ten millionth time or the first time—it doesn't matter. That moment of meeting it with mindfulness, with mettā attitude, or with concentration where you notice, say, the hindrance of wanting, don't give it energy, just come back to the breath and it goes. All of those are shifting the pattern. You could say purifying the inner landscape, purifying the intention of mind, changing the groove really, redirecting the habit.

And so in that way, if you can trust that, it doesn't matter if this habit comes up ten million times. Each time it arises and it's met with mindfulness—great. It's changing. It's purifying. It's not further inculcating the same habit, if you don't take it personally.

So mindfulness is really always our first strategy. And when it's accessible, no matter how painful the pattern may be, no matter how familiar or how new and shocking, when that attention is able to just meet the experience kindly, steadily, without judging, without taking it so personally—oh, yeah, fear is like this. Watch it arise. Feel how it manifests here and now. Notice that it passes. Just like the weather, conditions come together. Fear manifests. Greed manifests. Memories of the past and grief manifest. Kind, loving attention holds it in the present moment. The conditions change. It goes away again.

And then the wisdom of impermanence, of not-self, of the unreliable nature of all of this arises naturally. And with it, again, the accessibility of knowing the luminous, untouched nature of mind. The greed, the anger, the fear never touched that luminous nature. Never can. We never have to be afraid of losing that. And when mindfulness is accessible to us, when energy is accessible, we know that. That's what keeps us going.

But—and this is all the prelude; now the rest is the but—for most of us, there are times when this brightness, this energy, this inspiration doesn't seem so accessible. We may really be very sincerely calling up mindfulness moment after moment, but there's no brightness, there's no lightness in the mind, in the heart. And I don't mean just for a moment or two; of course that's going to happen. But there are times when we get so absorbed, really, so focused on the dukkha, the suffering aspect, the personal aspect—identified with it, really—that that's all we can see. We get caught in either the dukkha aspect or our reactivity to it.

And it can just feel like everything gets more and more compact, squeezed together. Energy gets drained. We become very unbalanced in our perceptions, to where we only see the dukkha, we only see the wanting, we only see the fear. Nothing else seems to ever be happening. And it wears us down. It wears us down to where we become like that unlearned person in the sutta I read, the one who doesn't know that the luminous nature of mind can't be touched by passing experience. We think it has been touched. We think all there is is this passing experience. And we kind of cave. We can't keep going.

This is when it's really important to—it might take a moment of thinking, if you can spare a moment of thought here—just remember that bhāvanā is embedded in a path, and consciously call on a few of the things I'll mention, whichever one is most accessible to you at a particular time, to consciously brighten and gladden the heart, to gladden the mind.

Because really, it's a bright, spacious mind and heart that again allows the touching of the way things are. It's not an avoidance of the patterns of mind or psychic knots. It's not an avoidance of suffering. It's more an expansion of consciousness, an infusion of energy and inspiration that allows us to be with whatever's been difficult—but without being so identified. To be with it more from the place of freedom than from the place of reactivity.

In some ways, to me—and I can't speak as a scholar, but from what I know about the Buddha's teachings and the various practices he offered on his path—

It's really a marvel how all aspects of the path are different ways of highlighting, different ways of cultivating the happiness of the luminous mind of non-clinging. And when mindfulness and concentration aren't doing it, there are other ways that all work together in the same path to work towards recognizing the peace of non-clinging that's always available.

So to brighten the mind—that's why there's cultivation. We know that this is possible. Ultimately, both mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom arise out of a relaxed and happy heart and mind.

It doesn't mean we're always happy. I definitely just have to say this. I know you know it, but I have to say it. It's not that if you're doing this right, you go around grinning all the time, happy, happy, happy, and suffering doesn't come. You know good and well that the first noble truth is dukkha. I don't have to go into that, right? You all know it. Sometimes we get a little bit so focused on the first truth being dukkha that we forget that the brightness of mind gives us the strength and the spaciousness at the same time to open more deeply.

This is where the Buddha, when he talked about right effort, the four aspects of right effort—half of it really speaks to this consciously cultivating happiness, brightness of mind. So I'll read you the four, in one of those complicated ways he says it. The first right effort is to awaken zeal for the non-arising of unwholesome states. The second is to have zeal for abandoning unwholesome states that are already arisen. Now that we're more familiar with. We're aware of greed and we have zeal to abandon it. That does not mean aversion—that's another unwholesome state. We often get lost there.

But the third and fourth: zeal for the arising of unarisen wholesome states, and zeal for the continuance and strengthening of arisen wholesome states. In other words, it's not a manifestation of greed or avoidance when we feel that our heart and mind is really contracted and we're lost in fear and we can't really be mindful. It's a right effort to consciously cultivate some inspiration, to consciously call up seeds of happiness, of purity, of generosity. These are really helpful tools in our practice. And so that's what I want to point to for the rest of the talk—just remind us of some of the things we can call up.

Now, in cultivating zeal for the arising and continuance of wholesome states, of happy states, of states that help us abandon identification, remember that the guiding principle is always that wholesome states are not states of clinging. Sometimes we can get a little confused because a wholesome state is a happy state. Wholesome states do bring brightness to the mind. They can be memories of generous deeds, memories or current experience of non-harming behavior. Wholesome states are states of concentration, meditative states, strong mindfulness states. All of those are helpful.

Sometimes we get confused, especially when strong, happy, blissful states arise in practice. They do feel very purifying, very wholesome, very enjoyable. And we'll tend to say, when you come into the interview, we'll tend to say, don't try to keep making that happen. In some way, don't hold on to it. But that doesn't mean the state isn't helpful, purifying, wholesome. Cultivating wholesome states does not mean clinging. It's not self-referential. It's not about having a pleasant experience. It's about cultivating wholesome qualities of heart and mind that are, as the Buddha said, onward leading. Onward leading towards wisdom, to the wisdom of non-clinging, to the wisdom of not identifying, of not creating a stronger sense of me experiencing this far-out state. That's not the point.

And I think you can tell the difference in yourself. Does the sense of me doing good get stronger? Then there's some clinging in there. Does the sense of just a happiness, a kind of brightness, more of an expansion, an opening of the heart and mind and inspiration get stronger? That's really helpful. That's really supportive. It's wholesome. And we don't need to shy away or be afraid of that.

And sometimes that happens. And that's not so helpful. So that's why I just want to highlight a few of these practices.

The first I want to mention is usually spoken about in the suttas when the Buddha talks about taking refuge. That might seem a little foreign or not so much the way we think about things. But if you think of it in terms of when you're having a really contracted time, actively bringing to mind – whether it's the Buddha, which in Asian countries is very inspirational for people. That may or may not be true for us. But there may be a being, a teacher, someone who manifests some of the beautiful, wholesome, inspiring qualities of the Buddha that you could bring to mind.

Someone mentioned today something that was a beautiful example of this – someone who calls to mind His Holiness the Dalai Lama. He really inspires this person, specifically mentioning the sense that, and I've read this often too, of how he seems to meet each person, to treat each person really equally, really kindly, totally present with each person that he talks to. Just contemplating that quality and what that would mean or what it would feel like inside to be that non-judgmental, to be that kind, to be that present, to be able to see the beauty or the emptiness in each person – that was really inspiring to that person. And that quality of inspiration gives us energy, gives us a brightness. It's really very helpful.

So at times, just reflect on the inspirational qualities, whether it's the Buddha or someone else. It's really about feeling it, not thinking about it so much. And knowing that when we're reflecting on it, it inspires us because it's touching those same qualities in ourselves. It's not some abstract thought, or it wouldn't have that inspirational quality. Very helpful.

And then more classically, to recognize that the classic formulation when the Buddha spoke about the breadth of his path, bhavana or mental cultivation, is always embedded in the trio of dana, sila, bhavana – generosity, moral non-harming conduct, and mental cultivation.

It's interesting – the more I practice, the deeper and deeper is my appreciation for both dana and sila. I'm not saying I've got it down or anything. But the subtlety and the power and the uplifting qualities that a real exploration, a commitment in my heart and mind to dana and sila bring about – it's gladdening the heart, these beautiful factors.

So I want to talk a little bit about dana, a little bit about sila, just pointing for yourself to see what really brings you this happiness, this gladdening, this brightness of heart.

Generosity, as I'm sure you're well aware, the Buddha talked about all the time. It's really essential as a beginning of the practice. And it's not just a should – you should be generous, it's a good thing to do, it helps us let go. All those things are true. But I didn't understand this so well until I spent more time in Asia, especially the last four years when I've been spending more time in Burma, in a country where for some people, dana and sila are really kind of deeply rooted.

Of course, with the government, that doesn't seem – it's a paradox, it's very confusing. But to spend time with people who've grown up and are really committed in a Buddhist culture, where it's more in the culture than here in this country – I mean, people are generous in this country, no question. There's huge generosity. But there's a way, at least how I experience it, the way the generosity is expressed as an expression of happiness. It's not that I should be generous in order to let go, but the act of generosity itself clearly brings and is accompanied with so much happiness of mind and heart, so much brightness of being, that it's absolutely contagious.

And it's a kind of teaching in the power of dana, of generosity, to really open the mind and heart beyond self-interest, to really open the mind and heart beyond the false sense of separation. There really isn't so much sense of me taking care of myself, but this really powerful sense of the joy of being able to give. It's quite beautiful. For me, when I just have to remember little acts of generosity that I've experienced either personally or that I've seen happen any time I go to Burma, the effect of the memory is that it brings real happiness to my heart. It really opens me past whatever particular concerns, self-interest concerns I may have, whether I'm on retreat, whether I'm off retreat. And it's not a thing of thinking it should feel that way. It's an absolute experience of it.

I'll just give you little examples – there are a million of them. There's a young woman Steve Smith talks about a lot. She's kind of a protégé of Steve Smith, and he started meeting her when she was sixteen or so.

She's in her early twenties now. Pretty poor, really quite poor. She got married a couple of years ago. When we went to see her this year, she had just had her first child, a baby that died right after it was born, about a month before we came. And she was heartbroken, really, really upset, kind of depressed. She and her husband live with his family. She doesn't get on very well with the mother-in-law. She's a really bright, lovely being, a happy being, but having a hard time.

We would spend some time and talk, and we would try and do little things for her. We didn't do any huge thing this year. We tried to bring little gifts, tried to just listen, tried to help in some way. At the end of the time when we were leaving, she came up to the monastery where we were staying. She took a day off from work and came up looking for me and Michelle McDonald, the other teacher, and another woman who was managing the retreat. The three of us had spent some time with Chesu. And she had gone out and bought us each a little beautifully hammered tin vase, one for each of us.

Now, for someone like her to go and buy three vases like that—it's huge. And then she took the day to come and look for us, to specifically find each one of us in our little huts, to give it to each of us. And she was so happy giving it to us. It's so beautiful.

And it's really learning that the other side of it is to receive with the same happiness, with the same non-separation. My first years in Thailand, I would say, "Well, I have so much. Don't waste your money on me. Save it for yourself." And that makes sense to us in our Western way of thinking. But in terms of the qualities of openheartedness, of freedom, of luminous mind, that is so churlish to say, "No, take that back and sell it, make yourself a nice meal." No, it just cuts the whole picture.

Another time, another year, I was with two friends, and we were riding in a pony cart back from another monastery to the monastery where we were staying. It was with Steve Smith and another friend who speaks Burmese, a Western guy. We got the pony cart, got in the cart, argued with the driver about how much to pay in the usual way because he wants twice as much. You argue him down, and we're driving back. Then he got to chatting with our friend who speaks Burmese.

At the time, there were two or three Western monks doing the retreat with us. One of them had been living in this area in Sagaing for several years. So the pony cart driver was asking, "Oh, do you know this monk?" "Oh, yes." And he said, "I see him all the time." This monk was doing an ascetic practice—he would never wear shoes, for three or four years. That is an ascetic practice. And the pony cart driver was saying to our friend, "I see him, and I feel so bad for him. He has no slippers, he has no shoes. I think I would like to buy him a pair of shoes. It really makes me feel so bad that he does not have shoes."

This is just an average person you run into on the street. Notice how it can kind of brighten the mind. It gives a space beyond whatever particular little problem the mind is caught up in. It reopens us again to the luminous nature that isn't touched by whatever happens to be visiting us.

So you see, just hearing about generosity—never mind practicing it ourselves—can have this effect. And it can be in our life. It can be here. It's not about going around and starting to find all kinds of things to do to be generous and driving each other crazy. Not that. But just to have the intention in small ways, here in life. And even more, you can actively call up the memory of times that you have thought, said, or done something generous and see how it brightens the mind, how it brings spaciousness into the heart.

It's really interesting, you know, how the Buddha set up his whole sasana, his whole teaching, around generosity. The whole relationship of the ordained sangha—the nuns and the monks—and the lay people, that they both were linked to each other through generosity. The lay people depended on the generosity of the monastics, and still today, the monks and nuns depend on the generosity of lay people for their food every day, for their robes. And that's not like lay people having to pay. It's a way of really cultivating and developing the mind and heart of non-clinging.

Remember that it's not a practice of renunciation that makes you miserable. It's a practice of happiness. The giving in itself is a source of huge happiness. And then as well, the lay people depend on the generosity of the nuns and monks to really share their Dharma understanding, to teach and share their being and what they've heard and what they've learned, really freely, with anyone who wants to hear it. So in both ways, this cultivation, this development of the heart of non-clinging, is really the central piece of the way of life that the Buddha taught and lived.

And it's so different from the kind of sense of neediness, the needing to have enough to take care of myself. A friend of mine a few years ago was writing a thesis for a master's or a PhD on economics. She was back in Burma, in the same village, because she knew Burma well. She could stay at the monastery and really explore. What she was exploring was dana as a second economic system in Burma.

And actually, the Burmese economy is a total, complete shambles. The government does not provide much of anything in the way of what we almost don't even think about—like roads, for example, building, whatever. And the dana, the generosity—a lot of money may be given to the monastery, may be given to the Sayadaw. And in my Western way, I think, "Oh, yeah, they really need another building. Somebody comes and gives money and says we want another building built." And we think, "That's not what we need. People need food. People need this." But then that money for the building, the Sayadaw hires the local people to do the building. And they hire local people to get the supplies and to bring in the food. And it really gets the whole economy going. It's all kept extremely local. Dana is really what runs the economy. The whole hospital there is run on dana. It has nothing to do with any kind of government support.

So just notice how in a moment of giving, even having the thought of giving, it brings a sense of unity. It cuts away that feeling of separation. It just seems to cut away the distance. I think that's one of the reasons it's said that if you're having difficulty with somebody, give them a gift. Because if we're really giving it, and in giving, the focus is of course on the intention, just that open-hearted sharing—if you really give something with that clear, focused intention, the sense of separation, the sense of holding them as a problem in that moment, just for that moment, is cut through. It's really a powerful force.

So intention is, of course, the key. And the other side I also want to mention is when we're on the receiving end—to really allow ourselves to consciously experience gratitude. That can be gratitude in the moment of actually receiving, as when Chesu gave us the little vases, to really not only say thank you but to really feel the gratitude, the being touched, the appreciation. Because in that way as well, the sense of limitation and separation is gone in that moment. It really is a whole act.

Something I've found really helpful on retreat, when we're not giving a lot of things and really staying with ourselves, is to call up the seeds of memories of times you've been generous, but also to consciously open to gratitude—either for specific acts of generosity or just for what we have. I found this enormously supportive when I'm on retreat and when I'm getting caught in some kind of negative pattern or dukkha, to consciously cultivate gratitude. Sometimes it's just hitting you in the face and it's beautiful and you don't have to cultivate it. But other times—and as some of you know, I tend to have an aversive type of mind, so I'm not bounding through the place filled with gratitude all the time. That's not the way my mind works.

But some years ago, at the end of the day, I was getting into bed on a long retreat. It was one of those moments when you're getting into bed going, "Thank God that day is over. That's a wipeout day. But maybe tomorrow mindfulness will be back." Have you ever had a moment like that? Just go to sleep and hopefully this will all be gone when I wake up. And it just kind of went through my mind: okay, gratitude.

And it started out, OK, great. I'm really grateful for a bed. I'm really grateful I had three meals today, or two meals, or one meal, whatever you had. And the first three or four, it was grumpy. It was cynical. It was, yeah, sure. But I just kept going. And it was like magic. It didn't take long at all to where that brightness, that spaciousness, that gladdening of heart was real. And then things just started pouring out of my mind that I was grateful for. There's so much. Not a should. Not, you know, you have so much you should be grateful. Not that at all. But just things like the moon, the snow, being at peace, other people practicing. It just goes on and on. I don't need to make a list for you. And the effect is, again, that luminous, spacious purity of mind and heart. It's here again. It's always here. But again, that's what's so obvious, that's what's so clear. It's really a wonderful thing.

In fact, since last March, a friend and I started a practice that we'd heard about through someone else—a daily gratitude practice where at some point, almost every day, we email each other what we're grateful for that day. For both of us, it's been an amazing practice. And we're very different temperaments. She's a person that is always much more effervescent and upbeat, someone you'd think is naturally grateful. Both of us will come to it and we'll write, and we're really honest. So we might start out writing, "I'm not feeling grateful for anything. I had a fight with my husband and this and this and that." She'll start out like that sometimes. But the intention in writing it is to say what we're grateful for. So we don't pretend. We just keep writing stream of consciousness, and it turns around. Sometimes we come and we already knew what we were grateful for. Sometimes we actively didn't know at all. But as we're writing, just that intention turns it around, and we always end really in a different state of mind—feeling grateful, feeling happy, touching again the infinite brightness, the infinite luminosity. It's really amazing. And we keep saying this to each other all the time.

Right now she's on retreat for a month, and I'll forget about it for a couple of weeks. Just yesterday, I was kind of mumping around the house and I thought, oh, I really miss the gratitude practice. Why do I need to have someone to email to? Why can't I just think about it without that? But, you know, our minds get in a habit.

So, gratitude—and that really goes together with generosity. I also want to mention sīla, non-harming conduct. Because here, of course, whatever you think, just coming here, taking the five precepts in a really committed way—even if it's just out of fear, you have to obey the precepts because otherwise people will see you and hate you—it doesn't matter. Just not acting in harming ways brings what the Buddha calls the bliss of blamelessness. And he says that, in terms of householders, the bliss of blamelessness is worth sixteen times the other happinesses that a householder can know. I don't know where he got sixteen times, but that's what it says. The other happinesses are from debtlessness, possessing things in a wholesome way, the enjoyment of what is rightful. And then the bliss of blamelessness. That's a huge happiness—freedom from remorse, the real purity, spaciousness in our heart, in our mind, the contentment that is possible.

You know how it is when you have one of those periods of practice, a kind of life review, where everything you ever did that was unskillful, that was unkind, that was thoughtless, that was cruel, starts to come up. Have you ever had a time like that in practice? Sometimes it's really...

Hard things that we did that anyone would say, yes, that was a little self-interested. Other times—it's happened to me and it happens to others—people will come in wracked with remorse, really feeling awful about some incredibly subtle, negligent thing they said or didn't say to somebody twenty-five years ago. And they're wracked with remorse for being unkind.

This is a sign, obviously, that our heart and mind is getting much purer. But to see how much remorse and suffering can come even from such a slight thing—then on the wholesome, supportive side, it's also true that a great deal of uplifting can come from non-harming thought, speech, and action.

Just in the not doing of it, sometimes we don't really notice that. It's another thing we may not tend to consciously reflect on or consciously bring into awareness. We do it, you know, in the beginning when we're teaching metta practice. We often say when you start practicing, begin with yourself, really direct the wishes of metta to yourself. It's often suggested as a way to connect with yourself in a wholesome way, to see the good in yourself. And it's often suggested to really contemplate the wholesome things you've done—contemplate your morality, contemplate your non-harming behavior.

I don't know about you, but that's not something I really sit down and do very often in my daily life. And it's often hard—maybe not for all of you, but I know many people I talk to in this culture, and myself included—it's so easy for us to focus on all the unskillful things we've done. I bet if I said make a list of unskillful thought, speech, and action, you could just start writing without any pause at all. You wouldn't have to think, "What have I done that's unskillful?" It's right there. But make a list of the really wholesome things you've done, refraining from harming thought, speech, and action—sometimes that's a little harder. And sometimes we think, well, that's just being egocentric.

But you know, it's not. It's a source of freedom from remorse. Actively contemplating our wholesome past actions can be a source of inspiration and gladdening of heart and mind in the present moment, so that in a way, the memory of past wholesome deeds is like the result of past kamma in the present moment. It's the fruition, the wholesome fruition of past wholesome deeds.

I'll give you a little spontaneous example. I remember it because it's so rare—and it's pathetic that it's so rare—when I spontaneously remembered a wholesome thing I had done many years ago. It's pathetic that that should be so rare, either the wholesome thing or the memory. I mean the memory. I hope the wholesome thing isn't that rare.

It was a day when I used to work, many years ago, in a sheltered workshop in North Carolina. In not very good conditions, with adults who were mentally handicapped. In a sheltered workshop we had very simple little tasks, like put two screws in a little plastic bag. These were really pretty severely handicapped adults, and it was difficult. But there was a lot of love, and I really felt a lot of love for them. And I remember one day I came in and there was just one after the other, a series of connections and expressions of appreciation and love going both ways.

This was a long time ago—I don't want to say how long ago. And one day, the memory of this day just came into my mind, and so much happiness just welled up. Again, the sense of the luminous nature of freedom—it's not self-referencing. It wasn't about "Oh, aren't I great." That doesn't feel luminous. That doesn't feel free. That feels more contracted. But it's the same as with generosity and gratitude—it just opens us up and gives the inspiration to then be with the difficult stuff, whatever it is that's happening. It gives the inspiration to keep going.

Freedom from remorse, our commitment to non-harming behavior—it's not just "I have to do this so I can get concentrated." It's really, as well as dana, as well as bhavana, a path of happiness, a path of non-clinging, a path of freedom. Here and now, in the past, in the present moment, it brightens our mind.

And there's a sutta from the Buddha—I won't read the whole sutta, but he starts with: What is the purpose of skillful virtues? And he says to Ananda that the purpose is freedom from remorse. Freedom from remorse is their reward. And it's one of those suttas that keeps going. What's the purpose of freedom from remorse? Freedom from remorse has joy as its purpose and reward. And the purpose of joy is rapture.

Purpose and reward of rapture is serenity. Purpose and reward of serenity is sukha, happiness. Purpose and reward of sukha, concentration. Concentration goes to knowledge and vision of things as they actually are. Knowledge and vision of things as they actually are goes to disenchantment. Disenchantment goes to dispassion. The purpose and reward of dispassion is knowledge and vision of release.

So in this way, Ananda, skillful virtues go all the way up. Skillful virtues lead step by step to the consummation of arhatship, to freedom. That's pretty powerful. And it's something that we can really appreciate, really call up in the present moment when we need to brighten the mind, to gladden the heart, to find the energy to keep going.

I don't have time to speak about this in depth, but I want to mention that the practice of metta or any of the Brahma Viharas is also a way to brighten the mind, gladden the heart. And it doesn't have to reach the point of absorption or jhana. Just some moments of metta can be very powerful in again expanding the perception beyond our limited, constricted self.

This is from the Buddha: "If just for the lasting of a finger snap, a bhikkhu indulges a thought of metta, cultivates a thought of metta, gives attention to a thought of metta, such a one is to be called a bhikkhu, someone who's practicing, carries out the master's teaching, responds to advice, he does not eat the country's alms food in vain. What then should I say of one who makes much of such a thought?"

So we can all do that. A finger snap of a thought of metta? No matter what's going on, we can manage that.

Calling up what you can be grateful for helps. Actually calling up good deeds of others, the generosity of others, like when I described the people in Burma—that also brings happiness. It's a way of seeing that we're not separate. So if you start spinning into "I never did a generous thing in my life, I never did a wholesome thing in my life," well then, tune into that of others. It brings us the same open-hearted happiness. It's wonderful.

The last thing I'll mention is the sense of just holding the thought of our practice being not for myself alone, but for other beings. You don't have to even feel it, but just holding that thought—like I quoted Sakyong the other night saying that if you just have the correct motivation, in your own experience it turns into bodhicitta, into this vastness of motivation, all by itself.

I've found this really helpful when I'm getting too self-involved in my practice, really spinning down—to just, at the beginning of each sitting, start by taking refuge. This is Tibetan. The Tibetans really advocate practicing like this all the time. Just start a sitting very consciously by taking refuge. And then just for a moment, hold the motivation of bodhicitta. "May my practice be for the benefit of all beings." That's all. Just saying it. You don't have to feel it. But just inclining the mind and heart in that direction—it really does something.

Then you forget about it. Just practice your session. And at the end of the session, they say to always complete it by dedicating the merit of the session, of your practice, to all beings. So again, we're ending our sitting, our walking, our period of practice with a conscious act of generosity, of connection to all beings. And that's quite beautiful.

Then, as well, this being a very generous act—sharing our practice with all sentient beings—make for yourself a pure aspiration. The Tibetans say that this is a really strong generous act, to share the merit of your practice with all beings. To then make an aspiration is focusing your own motivation. For example, we could all have a different aspiration. Say your aspiration is to awaken your mind and heart to liberation in this lifetime. You make that aspiration. It's very important, they say, because if you make the aspiration in combination with our wholesome actions of meditation and generosity, it helps to fuse the wholesome effects of our actions in terms of our aspiration. It's not "I did this good thing and that means I'm going to get chocolate cake for lunch." It's really focusing our intention and then sharing it with all beings. Just a very light way of taking refuge in the beginning and sharing at the end, and clarifying our motivation.

So I think that's enough. Just find whatever way helps you brighten and gladden your own mind and heart.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 14

Anicca: A Doorway To Awakening

Carol Wilson · 59 min

> In this profound exploration of anicca (impermanence), Carol Wilson investigates why the most seemingly obvious of the three characteristics remains so difficult to embody in our lived experience. Drawing from multiple suttas, she examines the Buddha's teaching that seeing impermanence leads directly to the abandonment of identity view (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) and the end of clinging. Wilson shares the Dalai Lama's insight that we often settle for "long-term impermanence"—accepting that things are born and die—while resisting the radical truth that change occurs moment to moment, with nothing existing unchanged even briefly.
> The talk weaves together canonical teachings with personal reflections on aging parents, practice challenges, and the subtle ways we assume permanence in daily life. Wilson explores how the sense of "I am" that arises with experience can feel deceptively permanent, creating suffering even when we intellectually understand impermanence. She references the Buddha's teaching to the monk Asaji about concentration not being the essence of practice, and the poignant exchange with Ānanda during the Buddha's final illness, where even this devoted attendant needed reminding that "all things that are pleasant and delightful are changeable."
> Through stories of Khemā's awakening upon witnessing impermanence, Kisā Gotamī's journey through grief, and Paṭācārā's transformation, Wilson illustrates how facing impermanence directly opens us to courage, responsiveness, and profound appreciation for life. She concludes with Dr. Ariyaratne's testimony that understanding moment-to-moment change brings freedom from fear, even in the face of death.

Tonight I thought I would talk a bit about the insight into anicca, impermanence. It's a natural following on what I talked about last week—clinging—because the Buddha stressed so often the power, the importance of really understanding, really seeing the impermanence of all phenomena, and also pointing to how that understanding can actually be liberating understanding.

There are many places where he quite explicitly states that seeing impermanence leads to the end of clinging. For example, in one of a million different places where he's talking about abandoning identity view, or sakkāya-diṭṭhi, someone says, "Venerable Sir, how should one know, how should one see, for the view of self to be abandoned?" And he says, "Bhikkhu, when one knows and sees the eye as impermanent, the view of self is abandoned. When one knows and sees forms as impermanent, eye consciousness as impermanent, eye contact as impermanent—when one knows and sees whatever feeling arises with eye contact as the condition as impermanent—then the view of self is abandoned." And he goes, of course, through the ear and all the relations with the ear, smell, taste, body, mind. Clearly, once identity view begins to be abandoned, clinging to all forms begins to be abandoned. Wrong view, he goes on in that same sutta to say, is abandoned under the same conditions.

I find contemplating and focusing on this insight into impermanence to be quite interesting. I like talking about it because, as much as the Buddha stressed it, when we think about it, it doesn't sound so esoteric. In terms of the three characteristics of existence—impermanence, the characteristic of dukkha or unreliability, and the characteristic of anattā, not-self, out of control—the most obvious of these, the least esoteric really, would seem to be anicca, impermanence. In some ways, at least to me, the concept of anicca isn't really that difficult to twist our conceptual mind around. Whereas as soon as we talk about anattā, something kind of seizes up in many people's minds. With anicca, it's like, "Yeah, sure. I understand that. That makes sense."

So why is it that it's actually so difficult—at least from my experience—to actively live moment to moment from the knowing of impermanence, within the knowing of impermanence? Both on the macro level—the level of world systems, of our own life, of people we know, of events in the world—even on that big level, we can say, "Sure, I know everything changes." But do we really live from that? All the way down to the more micro level, what I just read: Do you live every moment of your life recognizing that the contact which arises when the eye door and the form and consciousness come together is impermanent? On that level, we can say, "Well, yeah, I don't see it." But on the bigger level, what's fascinating to me about studying impermanence is that it should be obvious. And yet, is that really, cellularly, how we relate to our experience moment to moment?

The Buddha says over and over: whatever is impermanent is inherently unsatisfying and could not be seen as me or mine. That's often, in many of the suttas, the ultimate argument he gives. "Well, so you see that's impermanent. Obviously, it's unsatisfying, can't be seen as me or mine, right?" And they all go, "Yes, Bhante."

But I wonder. Does each of us actually believe that? One, do we believe that everything's impermanent? That's one thing. But the second is, do we really, on a cellular level, buy the fact that if something's impermanent, it's inherently unsatisfying? Or do we give it a nod, a conceptual nod? "Yeah, I know it's unsatisfying, but as long as it's here, I'm really going to go for it. I'm going to enjoy it while it's here. And I know it's impermanent—impermanent, impermanent, anicca." And we're living a complete delusion that we don't really notice.

If this is true, look and see for yourself. What would be the effect on my life, on my moment-to-moment stream of consciousness, on how I related to myself and life, if I truly—truly in my cells—knew that everything I experience is impermanent, including me? How would I relate, or would I relate, to things differently?

And not to take that as a should, or some conceptual answer. Not "I should come up with, 'Oh, if I were free of clinging, if I knew everything was impermanent, then I would be open and flowing and accepting'" or whatever. That's just a lot of baloney. It's just some story we're making up. But taking that as a pointing, an investigation in my moment-to-moment awareness—which is something you have the luxury to do here in this silence, in this beautiful white stillness. It's too cold to want to do anything else.

So that's great. It's going to get really cold tonight and tomorrow. Wonderful conditions to explore. How would I relate differently? Would I relate differently if I really knew that things were impermanent?

And I see in my own life how I know things change, but when something new goes wrong with my body, when someone like my parents or someone I love suddenly gets really sick, some conditions that have been together for many, many years fall apart—is my first response, "Oh, the conditions for supporting a healthy body have changed. That's how it is now"? Not usually. I'm only speaking for myself. Not usually. Sometimes I can get around to that, but it takes a little rubbing against the grain for a while.

I know I've mentioned this other times, but my parents in the last five years have really been declining. And in the last year, another whole kind of leap—both my parents in different ways—another whole leap, and also financial difficulties where they never had that. Not really difficulties, but just having to worry, which we never had before. And it's been really interesting to watch that place when each new shift happens, where my mind just starts—the first response is, "No, this isn't supposed to happen. What did I do wrong? Or what did they do wrong? Or what's wrong with the system?" There's definitely something wrong with the system that we all get old and cranky and die. I mean, definitely that wasn't figured out right.

I have to say I've been happy to see over the last five years that I roll with each new thing more easily. Like I really go, "Oh, it's not something I did wrong. It's not that I should be able to figure it all out so that nobody suffers." It's like, duh. What do I talk about all the time? But to see how that's the first place the mind goes when something goes wrong.

And that's in the big picture—which one really can't argue too hard that I'm never going to get old, one's parents won't get old, the people we love won't get sick, won't die, won't go away. Of course that's going to happen. Yet still there's such resistance to it. And that's fascinating to me, as much as I've been paying attention to my mind and body process and to the processes of many, many people and to the world around me. Still there's that tendency to hold. I think it's really fascinating.

Big picture, little picture. How do you relate to experience today? If you had a really pleasant or a really mellow or a really flowing mindful time and it changed, was your first response, "Well, the conditions that led to that flowing time have fallen apart and now it's like this"? Maybe that would be nice. It's nice when that happens, isn't it? How often, though, we just... "It's that person who walked too close to me. That's what did it." Or, "It's that I ate too many beans at lunch. I should have known better. I should have known better that if I ate the right things, I would have been able to keep my energy and my mindfulness and concentration in balance. It's my own fault for being selfish and greedy and weak, right?" And then you go on a whole downward spiral. It's a trip, isn't it?

The Buddha said, "The search for a resting place is burning. Not to need one is cool and peaceful." And I see in my mind that the times we really get it—that nothing is lasting for more than a moment, there is no resting place—that is somehow to the mind that likes to control and know what's going on, somehow deeply uncomfortable. And so I, in myself, see how there's a tendency of the mind stream just to want—this is where the clinging comes in—to want to hold on to something as steady. That sense of, even though I know it's not going to last long, at least it's here now. And it gives me, in my experience, this feeling of somewhere to rest, something to hold on to in this sense of being in the middle of an earthquake all the time. The mind doesn't like it, so it tries to hold on. But of course the poignancy is just that—that holding on creates the friction, creates the sense of fear, of being kind of out of sync with how things are.

It's actually what creates the problem. But holding on to a momentary sense of peace and ease seems like a natural response to the total unreliability of life. And yet it's this denial of impermanence that is the suffering.

I once attended a three-day teaching that His Holiness the Dalai Lama gave, and he said something that's obvious about anicca, but that struck me. It's been really helpful in my exploring of it.

Basically, in my words, cellularly we know intellectually that things change. We wouldn't argue about it. But cellularly, we don't really quite believe it. We're still holding, as I said.

And this is what His Holiness said. He said we think that we really understand impermanence, but the way we tend to understand it, or the way we tend to think we're experiencing it, it's kind of long-term impermanence. We know that whatever's born is going to die. We know that in the big picture, if I'm born, I'll die. This puppy's born, it will die. This cold evening is born, it will change. We know that.

But we may have the tendency to think, or not even to think, but to assume: this thing is born, it exists for a while, and then it goes away. And that's the place—"exists for a while"—that's the place we're holding on, where we're not seeing really the radical nature of anicca. It exists for a while, shorter or longer, unchanged, then conditions change and it goes away.

And His Holiness is saying, no way. Change is happening moment to moment. Nothing is existing for a while, stable, and then it goes away.

I find that really, really helpful because all experience is in constant flow, constant flux, constant change. The conditions are always changing. But some part of us really hates this. And so maybe our kind of compromise is: okay, I'll give you things are born and they die. I'll give you I know that mental states change. But in this state here, give me something to hold onto that's not changing.

So maybe the times of stability get shorter. Maybe it goes from the fifty years of my life to the last three years. Maybe it goes from the last three years to this retreat. Maybe it goes down to this day. Maybe it goes down to this sitting. Maybe it's down to just five minutes. But still, there's some way it can be so easy to hold out, to resist really seeing that change is completely momentary.

And when we don't see that, what we're often doing—and this I love to watch in my practice, in my life—is assuming permanence. Just this last month, in various groups and meetings, we've been figuring out schedules for 2006. I was in a meeting where we were saying, okay, on July 12th at 4:30 Eastern Standard Time, we're going to have a conference call. And someone says, I'll be in Hawaii, so that's okay for me, that's this time, and that's this time on the West Coast, and this time on the East Coast. Oh, okay, 4:30 July 12th, Wednesday. And it may really happen, which is amazing, totally amazing. But how much we do that, often without a second thought.

Or here on retreat, the practice has been going however it's been going, and you're calling it whatever you're calling it—good, bad, boring, slogging, fulfilling, whatever. Isn't it easy when it gets a certain way, we kind of think, well, that's how the last sitting was, and this is how the next sitting will be. I had this kind of experience, and this is how it's going to keep going. Bad or good, whether you like it or you don't, it doesn't matter. You're in a really difficult, judging, reactive mental state, and from that mental state, we project the whole rest of our life. We know it, and we do it anyway. It's amazing.

If you stopped for a second and thought, has this mental state been here for my whole life? You probably, hopefully, could say, no, I don't think so. It feels like it. But I do kind of remember that time three years ago when I had a happy moment—because you're in a depressive mental state.

But really deep down in that moment, there are times when we really believe that this is how it is. This is how it's going to feel.

And the same when the mind is concentrated or happy or blissful. I'm sure you've all heard Sharon's story—I've heard it so many times it's like I remember it better than my own stories—when she was in India back when she was young and she had a period of incredibly blissful, free practice. From that state, she projected that's how her whole life would be. She'd imagine herself floating down the streets of New York, filled with happiness and bliss.

Don't we do that? How many retreats have I done that? I always project how I'll be leaving—the bodhisattva of the world, just filled with light and love. And sometimes I am, and sometimes I'm not. And even if I am, it doesn't last.

Anyway, the sense of how easy it is to just say, "Oh, this is permanent." I want to tell a couple of stories from the Buddha, because it's not like we're the stupid ones and everyone else always got it. The Buddha was talking to people about the necessity to see impermanence all the time. I love reading the suttas, so I want to share a couple of examples.

One monk came to the Buddha. His name was Assaji, and he was troubled—he was sick and tormented by remorse and regret. The Buddha said, "Why are you troubled? Have you done something bad?"

He said, "No, but formerly, Venerable Sir, when I was ill, I could keep on tranquilizing the bodily formations, otherwise being concentrated. But now I cannot obtain concentration."

He was really upset about this, saying, "If I can't obtain concentration, it occurs to me, let me not fall away." In other words, he was afraid he was losing the path because he couldn't obtain concentration, and he used to be able to. He was sick. I can really relate to that.

The Buddha—I'm going to paraphrase because it's long—basically said that those who think concentration is the essence of this practice, and who believe that failing to obtain it means they're falling away, that's delusion. That is not the essence of this practice. Liberation is the essence of this practice.

And then he goes into the whole teaching: "What do you think? Is form permanent or impermanent?" He goes through everything—a pleasant feeling, is it permanent or impermanent? A neither-pleasant-nor-painful feeling. A painful feeling. And he basically says: when you see this is all impermanent, then you understand. "I have a feeling that ends when the body ends." That's how you understand it.

So basically, if you're sick and you can't obtain concentration, you understand: yes, conditions have changed. That's how it is. Essentially, haven't I told you a million times? Everything's impermanent.

And then, even more to the point—and I know you know this story, but I really like it—during the period when the Buddha was in his last illness, there's a whole long sutta covering those days. Ananda, his attendant who was beloved to him and had been with him for twenty-five years, was taking care of the Buddha. He knew the Buddha was dying; they'd had conversations about it.

At a certain point, when the Buddha announced that he had decided he was going to die, Ananda realized he had missed his opportunity. Some weeks prior, he could have asked the Buddha to extend his life, but he missed the hints and didn't do it. So when the Buddha was basically saying, "Yes, now I'm going to die," Ananda said, "No, don't." He asked him three times, and the Buddha said, "It's too late. You should have done it previously, and now I'm going to die."

They had a long talk, and then Ananda slipped away. The Venerable Ananda went into his lodging and stood lamenting, leaning on the doorpost: "Alas, I'm still a learner with much to do"—he wasn't completely enlightened—"and the teacher is passing away, who was so compassionate to me." He was basically sobbing and weeping.

Of course the Buddha knew, but he inquired of the monks where Ananda was, and they told him. So he said to a certain monk, "Go, monk, and say to Ananda from me: 'Friend Ananda, the teacher summons you.'"

Ananda came, and the Lord said, "Enough, Ananda. Do not weep and wail. Have I not already told you that all things that are pleasant and delightful are changeable?"

He's not being impatient, but just—how many times do I have to say this?

All things that are pleasant and delightful are changeable, subject to separation and becoming other. So how could it be, Ananda? Since whatever is born, become, compounded, is subject to decay—how could it be that it should not pass away? For a long time you have been in the Tathagata's presence."

And then the Buddha goes on and really praises Ananda. He says, "You have shown loving-kindness in act of body, speech, and mind, beneficially, blessedly, wholeheartedly and unstintingly. Make the effort, and in a short time you will be free of delusion."

But that is really his core teaching. How can it be that whatever is born, become, compounded, is subject to decay, subject to separation and becoming other? How can it be that it should not pass away?

I find it a little heartening—heartening in terms of recognizing that we're not so lost—that even Ananda is quite stricken with grief at the loss, the coming loss. It hasn't even happened yet, which is also interesting. But even this great disciple is grieving for his beloved teacher. The Buddha is constantly having to remind people of the radical, radical nature of impermanence, because we keep getting lost in that, not really seeing it. We keep assuming permanence.

I have a friend who is quite wise, and a few years ago he had gone through a very difficult period, and then at this particular time he was very happy. We were just talking somewhere, and he said, "I'm so happy. I wonder how it will change." Just very simply, because it's true. It will. It did. And then it changes again. We relate very differently, don't we, when we have that cellular understanding. "I'm really happy—I wonder how it will change." "I'm really having a hard time right now, there's a lot of suffering around in people I know—how's that going to change?"

It gives us a real flexibility when we're not holding to something that should be a certain way. We can actually respond to circumstances as they are, to see them clearly. And that's the point. Impermanence isn't fearful or scary. It's just how it is. When that's our experience, when that's what we see, what we know, then there's that living in harmony with how things are. We quit feeling like we're sandpaper going against the grain.

One friend said to me—I wrote down what she said, she's done many years of practice—this was on a retreat. She says, "Oh, all these years of practice. I always thought, 'I get it. Everything around is always changing.' But suddenly," she said, "I see—oh, I'm part of that. I'm also in constant change and constant ebb and flow."

That's quite significant. When we really, in a moment, can have just that cellular knowing, we let go of all ideas and shoulds and assuming permanence, and we're really right there for whatever's happening.

There's another friend—I think I've told this before, but maybe not here—a friend whom I haven't seen for quite some years. He used to come and sit with us in Yucca Valley. At that time, I thought of him as somewhat elderly, though I don't know, he was probably not that old. He was a farmer from the Midwest, had kind of a hard physical life. He would come every year and sit with us.

Then one year he didn't come for a couple of years. The next year he showed up, and he'd had very severe heart problems. I don't think he'd had a heart attack, but he'd had to have open heart surgery. He said he'd had to have one heart valve replaced. They replaced it, I guess, with the heart valve from a pig. This is what he said. And then he had a whole lot of jokes about stopping when he came to cornfields and oinking and stuff like that. But that was an aside—that's the kind of guy he was.

He was describing his experience. He was also someone who felt that, despite being very devoted to practice, he never had any concentration. He felt he was never getting anywhere, never had good states, was never continuous with mindfulness. These were what he thought. Certainly not someone who was like, "I'm an ace yogi," but totally dedicated.

When he came back, he was telling us about his surgery. He said after the surgery it seemed to go well. He woke up in intensive care, hooked up to machines from every orifice and his heart, all these machines going. It seemed fine at first, but then something started going wrong. The machines started beeping and making noise, and the little lines started—I don't know, they either go wild or they go flat, whichever was bad, something anyway. He got it that something really serious was going wrong.

At first, he said, his mind goes, "Oh my God, I don't want to die."

And then the next thought was: if this is your last breath, let's be here for it. And he just felt his breath, and passed out, and woke up—and obviously he was okay. But he said, "I know now something was happening in this meditation. That's really the fruit of it." What's really happening now? Let's be here for this breath. Quite lovely.

But how is it—and this is also interesting to me—that we keep getting, as if it were, fooled again? Pulled back in somehow to relating to, reacting to experience as if it's betrayed me by changing, or not understanding why I'm suffering.

This is the Buddha again. I quite like this sutta. He's talking about agitation:

How is there agitation due to clinging? An unawakened person who regards material form as self, or self as possessing material form, or material form as in self, or self as in material form—those are the four different ways that through clinging we grow personality view. The point is, we think we are form. This material form of his changes and becomes otherwise. With the change and becoming otherwise of that material form, his consciousness becomes preoccupied with the change of material form. Agitated mental states born of preoccupation with the change of material form arise and remain obsessing his mind. Because his mind is obsessed, he is anxious, distressed, and concerned. And due to clinging, he becomes agitated.

Can any of you relate to that? Due to change in material form—our own or others—our mind becomes preoccupied, consciousness becomes preoccupied, and the mind becomes agitated and obsessed.

And of course he doesn't stop with material form. Feelings—pleasant, unpleasant, neither pleasant nor unpleasant. Just a pleasant feeling changes. Does your consciousness ever become preoccupied with that change? Obsessed? Agitated? Perception, mental formations, emotions, states of mind, and consciousness—the five khandhas.

I love this sutta because I can relate it very immediately to my experience, all of it. An emotion we have changes, and we somehow thought it was me. We become obsessed, preoccupied with that change, and our mind gets agitated. We suffer. Feeling tone, consciousness, definitely form—we can't miss that one. And it doesn't even have to be sickness, does it? You could just be having a bad hair day and get obsessed with it, or a no-hair day for some of you. Why did I ever shave my head? That was insane.

Non-agitation through non-clinging is, of course, just the reverse. We don't get agitated when these things change.

These things are happening really often and very subtly. How often is there form, or a memory of form in the past, or a wishing form would be such and such a way in the future, or thinking about the possibility of a mental state now changing in the future—good or bad, either way? And the agitation, the obsession, the preoccupation—how much of our mental energy is spent that way? I'd wager a fair amount when we're not really mindful, when the mind isn't calm.

Something I also find very interesting in my own explorations: there are times when I know, say there's a sense of a mental formation, a sankhara, a particular state of mind, and it's changing. I really see it's changing, and I know it's not me. I know. I'm really aware. It's a compound experience, and it's going away, and it isn't me. And still, there's this real strong sense of clinging, sense of self, the agitation and the suffering. And my rational mind, my conscious mind, will be saying, "What's the clinging here? What's the sense of permanence?"

What is it that's the hook? This is personality view, sakkāya-diṭṭhi. Where is it coming from? I'm really clear that this mood is not me, or that this thing going on in the body—the body's not me. I'm really clear about that. But still, there's something about this sadness or this fear or this happiness that keeps sucking me in, kind of hooking me. And I can't quite get at it—what is the clinging to? What is it that's somehow being held, not in a thinking way, but subconsciously, as permanent?

Again, this is something to explore if you have a similar experience. I'll just tell you what I often see in myself. It's not so much the emotion at that time, or the thought, or the sense of body, but the subtle feeling of "I am" that comes together with the clinging to that. And that is so subtle. When we're not aware of it, we don't notice it at all, but when we become aware of it, it seems to be everywhere. When we're not aware of it, it can be quite subtle—so familiar, so comfortable, that unexamined it feels very permanent. That's the subtle sense of self that feels like it's always here.

Sometimes I see this in my meditation practice now; it's easier for me to notice there than when I'm busy. I remember one retreat where this image would come up in my mind. I'd notice it—I was pretty concentrated—I'd notice it as seeing. A feeling of real grief and sadness would come with it. I'd see that right away. There wasn't really any clinging to it. There weren't any more stories going on. And still, consciousness would keep getting into this real, real dukkha around it—real sadness. And part of my mind was sitting back, watching, going, "What's the hook here? This is nothing but dukkha. I can see it's just thinking. There's nothing else going on. What is the hook?" It was really a mystery. And it was really suffering, too.

I noticed that because I was so focused on the emotion, the thought—the object, so to speak—I didn't really turn around and notice that subtle clinging, that sense of "me" having that emotion, or being that emotion, or the emotion being in me—those ways that the Buddha describes personality view. Without examination, without investigation, that sense of "me," which is just arising in that moment, feels permanent. And that's really what the clinging is about—that sense of permanent "me." It's subtly pleasurable, even if it's arising in conjunction with something that's really unpleasurable, at least in my experience. That's what keeps the clinging and the sense of permanence going.

This is why, I think, because it can be so subtle, the steadiness of mindfulness—moment-to-moment mindfulness in retreat—is so helpful and important. We can really begin to see how lack of continuity of mindfulness actually hides impermanence. Impermanence can be quite subtle.

Here is a simile that was given by the monk Nandaka to some of the nuns. He says: "Sisters, suppose an oil lamp is burning. Its oil is impermanent and subject to change. The wick is impermanent and subject to change. The flame is impermanent and subject to change. And its radiance is impermanent and subject to change. Now, would anyone be speaking rightly who spoke thus: 'While this oil lamp is burning, its oil, wick, and flame are impermanent and subject to change, but its radiance is permanent, everlasting, eternal, not subject to change'?" And they say, "No." And he says, "Good, good, sisters. So it is with a noble disciple who sees this as it actually is with proper wisdom."

I love that simile because intellectually it seems obvious, but the subtlety of the radiance—you know, it's easy to feel that as permanent. The subtlety of the sense of self, not looked at, can feel permanent. It's so subtle we don't even know it's there. And so really, the moment-to-moment continuity that leads to steadiness of attention is what's going to help us see this.

The Buddha said again: "Develop concentration, monks. A concentrated monk discerns things as they actually are present. And what does he discern as it actually is present?" Can you guess what I'm going to say? "He discerns as it actually is present that the eye is impermanent and inconstant. Forms are inconstant. Eye consciousness is inconstant."

Eye contact is inconstant. Whatever arises in dependence on eye contact—experienced either as pleasure, as pain, or as neither pleasure nor pain—that too is inconstant. And so through, of course, all the senses.

Now, if your mind has gone to, "That's why I need concentration and I don't have it, and that's why I can never understand impermanence, and that's why I might as well give up"—please see that as a thought and put it aside. Notice that the continuity of mindfulness at times, everyone here... it doesn't have to be fifth jhāna. We can notice contact. You can notice seeing. We notice that it's impermanent. Just bring your attention to seeing. As you walk around, it's changing every second. Bring your attention to hearing. At the ear door, it's constantly changing. The mind door, it's always changing. The body, the sensations of breath, the sensations throughout the body. Just be content with the steadiness of attention that lets us notice that.

Don't try to grasp, thinking "Now I have the insight into anicca and I am free." Sometimes we want to overlay that. We want some sense of fulfillment. "Now I'm getting anicca." Instead, just be content to notice moment after moment after moment. And it starts to break down the perversion of perception that sees the permanent in what is impermanent. And it happens. You don't have to make it happen. Just trust. Just trust that with the steadiness of mindfulness, it does break down. Sometimes it's more dramatic. Sometimes it's like getting wet in a fog, the way Suzuki Roshi talks about. You never know when you got wet, but you're really drenched.

Sometimes we don't quite realize that we're making something permanent or seeing with incorrect perception. But the actual suffering, the grief, the sadness that comes with the ending of something—Ānanda's sadness when the Buddha got sick and was going to die—rather than berating ourselves for that, I really like to take that as a wake-up call, and actually not be afraid of or judge the poignancy, the sadness, even the grief that comes along on our path.

For me, the fear or the dislike of the grief, the loss and all, is one of those thoughts: "I don't want to feel the loss, so therefore I won't acknowledge that everything's changing." That kind of warped thinking keeps us in denial. But actually, if we're not afraid of that, we can be much more open to things as they are. And I find Ānanda's grief really quite touching and poignant. It humanizes him, but it also becomes the source for looking and seeing: yes, this grief is because I'm not really seeing things how they are. I can feel the grief, and I can use it to let me pay more attention.

There are also many stories where the Buddha used the perception of change or impermanence as a kind of shocking device to wake people up—either people who were already in grief or people who were so much in denial of impermanence that they had a perfect little life put together. And he would break them out of it.

My favorite story in that way is about a woman named Khemā, who at this point was not a nun. She was the truly beautiful chief consort of King Bimbisāra. He had many consorts, many wives, but she was very beautiful, very vain, really enjoyed pleasure, really enjoyed beauty. The Buddha would come around and teach—the king was a follower of the Buddha—but Khemā never wanted to go and hear him because she had heard that he kind of put down sensual pleasure and talked about renunciation. And she basically thought, "I'm not interested in that." So she wouldn't go hear the Buddha.

It's kind of like how we're afraid sometimes. We're afraid to hear how things are. "Don't take my suffering away from me. I think I'm happy."

So the king fooled her. He hired a wandering poet and singer to compose beautiful poems and songs about this particular pleasure grove where he was going to have the Buddha come teach. Khemā heard these poems, this song about this really beautiful pleasure grove, and loving pleasure as she did, she said, "Well, I guess I have to go see it—anything that beautiful."

So he tricked her. She went, and when she got there, the Buddha was teaching to a great crowd of people. And of course, with his omniscient vision, he saw her coming and knew exactly where she was at. As soon as she came in, before she even said anything or before she had a chance to run away, he created with his psychic powers, just for her, the image of an incredibly beautiful celestial female being—like a hundred times more beautiful than Kema.

She just loved beauty, so she was entranced. And as she was watching this, the Buddha made this image gradually, gradually decay and get old and withered—her teeth fall out, her skin get wrinkled, get sick and die. Kema watched all this, and he got her. She said, "Oh wow, if that can happen to such a beautiful being, it's going to happen to me."

And once he had her, of course, he gave her a little Dhamma discourse on how clinging to pleasure is just putting yourself in prison. She's an example—also a good feminist story—because she's an example of a rare lay person, man or female, who in hearing one Dhamma talk became completely awakened. She became an arahant right there, listening to that.

It's quite interesting, isn't it? "Don't talk to me about this stuff. I know how it is." But just by seeing the impermanence, it cut through all her delusion.

There are other stories—and I'm just using stories of women, but it's with men too—of women who came to the Buddha in so much grief. You know the one of Kisa Gotami, whose baby had died? She came to the Buddha, couldn't accept that her baby had died, and just couldn't get there. She was really in denial, carrying around the dead baby with her for days.

The Buddha said, "Okay, well, you bring me a small mustard seed from a house that has not had death, and I will help your baby." So she got all excited. And you know the story—she went from house to house to house to house, and there was no house where there hadn't been death. After a while, she got it. The mind lets go. She came back, put her baby down, was ready to hear the Buddha's teachings and practice.

And just one last one, my favorite, because it's the way the Buddha would so directly speak truth. I won't tell you the whole long story, but the woman Patachara had gone through enormous suffering. She had left her parents. Both her children and her husband died when she was giving birth to her second child. She picked up the baby and her other little baby, started home to her parents. Both her kids died in a raging flood. She got to her parents' home—there had just been a storm that had made the kids die—and the roof of the house had fallen in. Both her parents and her brother had died. All this in a twenty-four hour period. She went mad.

She was wandering around for months or years, naked and crazy, and people threw things at her. Finally she came around the Buddha, and the Buddha's disciples tried to drive her away. "Get away! Don't bother the Blessed One." They threw things. And he, of course, told them to stop. A man gave her a cloak, and the Buddha said, "Sister, recover your presence of mind." And she was sane again.

Then she told him the whole story. This is the translation, so I don't know if it's exactly word for word accurate, but it captures the sense. We might say, "Oh yeah, that's really hard, so much grief." He just said, "Don't think you've come to someone who can change that. Don't think you've come to someone who can help that." He said, "In all your lives, you've cried more tears for the deaths of loved ones than there are waters in the ocean."

Isn't that interesting? Is that what we tend to say to someone who comes in grief? And it's not just this grief—it's endless lifetimes of grief. That sobered her up. "Oh, okay, let me really understand this."

I don't know, just somehow I love it—the sense of not being afraid to really face the radical, uncompromising quality of impermanence.

It's moment to moment. It's always. It's every experience we have. And facing that doesn't take us into more dukkha. It doesn't take us into depression and an unbearable quality of life. We do need to face our grief and our holding on and our sadness. But really, we stop being sandpaper rubbing up against experience. And it gives us the potential to really open into the unknown.

I don't know what's really going to happen on Wednesday, July 12th at 4:30 Eastern Standard Time this summer. I really don't have a clue whether I'll actually be here on the East Coast. So we make our plans and then we're just open to whatever it is that might happen. And that leads, I think, to such a beauty and appreciation of life, of the moment, of the fragility and the beauty. It allows us to be really present in a tender, open way—as the Tibetans say, ceaselessly responsive to experience rather than needing to control it.

I want to end by reading from two different people who I think really speak to the power and flexibility and beauty, the responsive quality that's possible when we're open to impermanence.

The first comes from the biography of Issan Dorsey, a Zen teacher in San Francisco who opened the Maitri Hospice in the late 1980s for men dying of AIDS. He opened the hospice not really knowing how it was going to work—he was kind of flying by the seat of his pants. This is a quotation from another man who was doing it with him. They said:

"We've always dealt with whatever came to the door. We started the hospice because death came to the door"—a friend of theirs who was dying of AIDS. "You can deal with a complex changing situation because you don't have to control it. You don't have to force it into an ideal pattern. You actually allow it to be whatever it is, and thus you allow yourself to adapt to what it becomes. Because this is the way we proceed—we respond to the immediacy of the situation—therefore, we're very practical."

That's so different from having an idea: this is how it should be, this is how we are, this is what we can do. It's just all a big flow, and we're able to be so much more responsive—and also much more courageous.

I'll end with this, from an interview with Dr. Ariyaratne, the founder and leader of the Sarvodaya movement in Sri Lanka. He's a Buddhist, a peace activist, a social activist working with poor people. Sarvodaya means "the awakening of all," the awakening of the whole person. This is from an interview with him:

"In 1952, a gangster was asked to kill me. I was trying to serve the students in our communities who were in need, and some people's financial or other interests were threatened, so they gave a contract killer some money to kill me. I heard about it. So I went to him, and I told him, 'This is what I'm doing. If you want to kill me, do it now—not in my school or with my students, because then those places would have a bad name after them.' I don't want other people's blood to be shed. At that time, and even now, I have that courage. To let others live, if necessary, you sacrifice. You're not foolish to throw away your life like that. It is a spiritual motivation, because every moment we are born, we exist, and we pass away. Every moment. In our mind or our body, is there anything that is permanent for two seconds? Without our knowledge, it's changing. Impermanence is a law. And when you understand that, when you practice it, you get a lot of courage. And even in death, you see life."

Obviously the man didn't kill him. He was very impressed and didn't kill him.

So the power of impermanence—to free our heart and mind from suffering and to open us into a life that is so much more connected and responsive and flexible.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 15

Poems of the First Buddhist Nuns

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this heartfelt talk, Carol Wilson brings to life the stories and enlightenment poems of the Therīs—the first Buddhist nuns who practiced during the Buddha's time. Drawing from the Therīgāthā (Verses of the Elder Nuns), she shares accounts of women from all walks of life: queens, courtesans, grieving mothers, and elderly practitioners who found liberation through the Dhamma.
> The talk begins with Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī, the Buddha's foster mother and founder of the bhikkhunī order, whose perseverance led to women being permitted to ordain. Wilson then recounts the profound suffering of Paṭācārā, who lost her entire family before finding peace through the Buddha's teaching, and Dhammadinnā, whose Dhamma discourse in Majjhima Nikāya 44 (Cūḷavedalla Sutta) was praised by the Buddha himself as equivalent to his own words.
> Particularly moving are the "hard time practice" poems—verses from nuns who struggled for years before awakening. Samā practiced 25 years without peace; Sīhā nearly took her own life before finding freedom; Ambapālī, once the most beautiful courtesan in Vesālī, contemplated impermanence through her aging body. These accounts reveal that awakening often comes through sustained effort and honest confrontation with suffering, offering encouragement to practitioners facing their own difficulties on the path.

This month, for some reason, when I drive around at night and see the Christmas lights—or the holiday lights, to be PC—I've been appreciating them more than ever. More than I usually do, in terms of the symbolism of the solstice and how the dark time of day has been accumulating more and more. And then slowly, slowly, the light starts to come back in. It's really a symbol of awakening.

The last couple of days, this line has just been running through my mind. In a way, it just feels like a time when I personally need inspiration, and the world could use some inspiration. We all could use some inspiration. And this line that keeps coming to me is a fairly common phrase in many of the first Buddhist nuns' enlightenment poems. I'll just read this paragraph—it's a classic description in these poems of a woman's awakening:

Everywhere the love of pleasure is destroyed, the great dark is torn apart, and death, you too are destroyed.

That's just been running through my mind. "Everywhere the love of pleasure is destroyed"—I know some of us don't really want to destroy the love of pleasure. "The great dark is torn apart." That image I love.

Since it's been running through my mind, it made me start thinking more about the poems of the first nuns, and I decided that it makes me happy to talk about them, to tell their stories and read their poems. So that's what I'm going to do tonight.

If we read the suttas, we hear so much about the monks at the time of the Buddha. So many of his discourses begin, "Oh bhikkhus." Over the years, it's been very supportive and inspiring to me to read about and get in touch with the stories and poems of many of the women who were nuns at the time of the Buddha. A few I'll tell stories about were lay women who did not become nuns.

What I like about it is knowing the story of each woman and then having the translation of the poem that she wrote. It takes the whole thing, for me, out of the realm of mythology, of story, because it makes the women really real. They feel like my sisters. All of us—the men too—going through the same difficulties, coming from all different walks of life. Some very easily walking on the path of awakening, some really struggling for years and years. Of course, if we have a poem from them, that means they got enlightened. We don't really have a lot of poems from all the ones who struggled and didn't make it. But that's beside the point. It's more about hearing them and seeing the different qualities—the depth of faith and perseverance and commitment—and the inspiration that comes to me from their poems. It just makes me happy to talk about it, so I want to share it with you all again tonight.

The first woman I have to talk about is the one who's considered really the mother of the bhikkhuni order, the woman because of whom the Buddha actually agreed to ordain women in the first place. That's Mahapajapati Gotami, his stepmother—really his aunt. The Buddha's mother died when he was a week old, and his aunt, his mother's younger sister, was also married to the Buddha's father. Kings had many wives in those days. She raised the Buddha along with her own son and daughter.

The Buddha, as you know, went off and got enlightened and left his family. He came back and was teaching and preaching to his family, and they became followers. When Mahapajapati Gotami's husband, King Suddhodana, died, she faced a situation that was the situation of many Indian women in that time. Women's place in society was accorded to the man she was connected with. She was the daughter of someone when she lived with her father. She was the wife of someone when she lived with her husband. She was the mother of someone and lived with her son. Women were very connected to men.

So when her husband died, her son and her nephew—the Buddha—well, her son had gone off and become a monk. She didn't really have any man to protect her. In another way, she was also free then to do what she wanted. There were many other women at that same time in that kinship group who were also without husbands—partly because many men had gone off and become monks with the Buddha, leaving behind their wives and mothers and daughters. At this time as well, her family and King Suddhodana's family, their extended kin, had a war over water rights to a particular river.

They were so closely related, and yet they had a war, and many men were killed.

The Buddha was called in at that time to arbitrate. And he was so inspiring in calling people to peace that a whole lot of other men then went off and became bhikkhus as well.

So this left Mahapajapati and many, many women. They say 500 women. Andy Olenski, the head of BCBS, who's a Pali scholar, says that when they say 500 people, it basically means a big bunch of people, a lot of people. It's a kind of shorthand.

Mahapajapati was really inspired—just as inspired as her male kin—by the Buddha's teaching and by the possibility of awakening. She had great faith, and she went together with 500 women to the Buddha and asked him, saying that she also wanted to become a mendicant. She wanted to ordain, to become a nun.

And there were no nuns. It was just a wandering order of monks. At this time, it would have been very shocking. It simply wasn't done to make an equal order of nuns.

And the Buddha said no. When she asked him the requisite three times, after the third time—at which point he's supposed to say yes, if he's going to say yes—he still said no. He said, "Enough, Gautami. Don't set your heart on women being allowed to do this." This was a final no. And he took his robes and went wandering off to another town, to Vesali.

So Pajapati shaved her head and put on orange robes. In India, even now, wandering ascetics dress in orange, men and women both. She shaved her head, dressed in orange, and barefoot, accompanied by all these women, followed him to this next town.

Now remember, she was the wife of a king. For her, walking barefoot 200 miles—when she got there, her feet were swollen and bleeding. She was exhausted, and she stood outside the hall where the Buddha was, weeping.

But this wasn't some kind of challenge to the Buddha. She just felt so filled with faith and determination. That sense of urgency: "Yes, I want to really renounce the world and practice the Dhamma." She wasn't trying to push the Buddha; she just followed him because that's where her heart was.

She's standing outside crying when Ananda, the Buddha's attendant, came along. This is one of the many places in the suttas that has the effect of making one really love Ananda, because he was so kind. His motivation always seems to have been: what can I do to help people come closer to the Buddha, come closer to the Dhamma? Kind in a really impersonal way.

Of course he knew her, because Ananda was the Buddha's cousin. He said, "What's going on?" She told him, and he went to the Buddha and said, "Pajapati is standing outside with swollen feet, covered with dust, and crying because you do not permit women to renounce their homes and enter into the homeless state. It would be good, Lord, if women were to have permission to do this."

And the Buddha says, "Enough, Ananda. Don't set your heart on this."

Ananda asked the requisite three times, after which the Buddha still said no. But Ananda doesn't give up. He knows the way around the Buddha. He said, "Let me think about it a different way. Are women able, Lord, when they have entered into homelessness, to realize the fruits of stream entry, once-returning, non-returning, and arahantship?" In other words, can they have the same awakening as men?

And the Buddha said, "Yes, that is so."

So then Ananda said, "If women are able to realize perfection, and since Pajapati was of great service to you—she was your aunt, nurse, foster mother; when your mother died, she even suckled you at her own breast—it would be good if women could be allowed to enter into homelessness."

And he basically just wore the Buddha down.

So at this point, the Buddha said, "All right, okay, women can enter." And he made eight special rules which drive all contemporary women crazy. I don't want to go into the politics, because who knows the politics of that time. He made rules that basically were for women's protection, but also the first rule being that the most senior nun still had to bow to the most junior monk.

He doesn't explain why he does things, of course. But because he's made it clear that it has nothing to do with awakening—any woman, any man can awaken—my best guess is it had to do with how women are perceived in society, and just trying not to make a ruckus.

So Pajapati, at any rate, agreed with great gratitude and became a nun, as did the 500 women with her.

And Pajapati over time became a great teacher. She was clearly a very committed, courageous, and energetic person, filled with great faith and perseverance—not to be turned down. I could imagine if I had traveled really far after a revered teacher and he kept telling me no, how easy it would be to say, "Oh, okay, if you say so, I'll go somewhere else." And she said no. Of course, she did raise him—there is something to that. But she just wasn't taking no for an answer, really, but in a very loving way.

Something that's interesting, just to know that she had this kind of courage and faith in knowing that women are just as able to awaken as men, and she kept that—not sort of what we'd say trying to push the envelope, but really to the end. It's not talked about much, but at some point later she went back to the Buddha and asked him if he would revoke that first rule, the one that senior nuns have to bow to junior monks. And he said no. He said, "I can't do it. I can't allow it. Even those teachers of false dharma don't permit such conduct in relation to women. So then how can I do it?" We can't understand it. But it's cultural. Don't waste your time on it. But I'm bringing it up to show you the kind of courage and steadfastness of heart.

Also, it is said—and this is a little mythological—but she died very old. They say 120. But when she was very sick, she knew she was going to die. At that point, some of the monastic rules that had sprung up were that a sick nun could not be visited by a monk. All the rules just had sprung up in reaction. The Buddha would make a rule whenever something happened that caused harm to a monk or a nun, or that shook the faith of lay people. And that's really important to remember. A lot of the monks' rules—for instance, this would be one, that a monk couldn't visit a sick nun—it wouldn't be that there's something bad about a monk visiting a sick nun, but that lay people could get the wrong idea and talk and shake their faith. And that's really interesting. The Buddha put a lot of importance on that.

But anyway, Pajapati knew that it was against the rules, but she requested that the Buddha come to her. And he did. So in effect, that changed the rule again by his doing that. He came to her when she was dying.

So I just want to read to you her poem because it brings up some of her qualities:

Homage to you, Buddha, the best of all beings, who set me and many others free from pain. All pain is understood. The cause, the craving is dried up. The noble eightfold way unfolds. I have reached the state where everything stops. I have been mother, son, father, brother, grandmother, knowing nothing of the truth I journeyed on. But I have seen the Blessed One. This is my last body. And I will not go from birth to birth again. Look at the disciples all together, their energy, their sincere effort. This is homage to the Buddhas.

I love that. Because if you think about it, that last stanza—that's you. That's all of us, the disciples all together, their energy, their sincere effort. This is homage to the Buddhas.

That's part of what I find so inspiring, reading about and just connecting with the energy of these women. Because just as at that time, down through all these two and a half millennia, it's still so that there are women and men with their sincere effort and energy practicing, in that way giving homage to all the Buddhas. And I think, having spoken with each of you in the last couple days, I felt really inspired by the depth of commitment. For many of you, it's been years and years and years of your life commitment, with ups and downs. And I know a lot of times we really lose touch with what this is all about.

Why am I doing it? But just the being together with sincere effort, with your sincere energy—it is paying homage to the Buddhas and keeping the Buddhasasana alive.

We're really direct descendants of these women.

In fact, one of the things I've loved in the last three or four years that I've been teaching the retreat in northern Burma at Cha Shwa up in Sagaing—there are many monasteries and many nunneries. Right next door to the monastery where our retreat is, there are three nunneries. One of them has about forty nuns, one has thirty-five, the smaller one has ten or fourteen. Nuns ranging from little girls, five or six years old, in their little pink robes—so adorable—up through all ages to really older women. They're just doing it, living the life. It's a hard life, but with great dedication. And of course, a whole range of personalities, a whole range of ways that they are.

But the sense of radiance from some of these women, even as little as we can talk, because we can't talk very well—I don't speak Burmese—but the last couple of years, we've been inviting some of them to come over for our last sitting in the evening. It's at eight o'clock at night, it's dark. And it's work for them. They're studying. Most of them are studying very hard to pass these Pali exams that are given every year. They're really working hard, and they have to go out and get their food.

So they come over to do some chanting at the beginning of our sitting. There's something about that—I can just describe it, but I can't really give you the feeling. It's dark, they come filing in, in their order of ordination. They always walk in order. They come and sit down and start chanting, and it just feels like we could be sitting back there in Vesali twenty-six hundred years ago. They're just so... I don't know, I just get this feeling of timelessness and the power of the Buddhasasana, and the men and women who have kept it alive and are keeping it alive.

So even though we're not in robes, we're part of that.

You can see in reading about the different women, the different nuns at that time, how they came from all different stations of life. Mahapajapati Gotami came from a very privileged class. Some of the other women who became great teachers to the other nuns also came from privilege. But others became great teachers who had very different backgrounds, and still others, depending on their personality, found different expressions entirely.

Just like us—we each express our Dhamma, we each express our insights and our awakenings in the way that's unique to our particular personality, our particular life situation, our particular choices. And that's the same with these women.

Some became teachers. Some became inspirational, like Mahapajapati. She wasn't so much a teacher as a guide and inspiration. Others became very quiet ascetics, just living in quiet, renowned for their asceticism. Some became the women who ran the communities, made things comfortable, made it easy for the women to live together. Everyone found their own way of expressing.

And they all came from such different circumstances: rich backgrounds, enormous suffering, states of great happiness, destitution. There were queens, there were courtesans, there were really poor prostitutes, there were middle-class women, there were women who had been slaves.

What was radical in the Buddha's sasana, both the nuns and the monks, was that once someone became ordained—you know how in India the caste system was so strong, so rigidly applied. The caste you were born in determined your class, determined your life. Once one became ordained, that was done away with. It was all just in order of ordination. Someone could have been a really destitute prostitute and she would be senior to the wife of a king. It had nothing to do with where you came from.

I find that inspiring as well.

So I want to talk about one other example. I mentioned it the other night—one of the women who became the greatest teacher, who brought many other women into the nuns' sangha, was this woman Patachara. I told her story the other night, so I don't want to go into it too much, just to remind you. For those who weren't here: she was middle class, and her parents had arranged a marriage which she didn't want. She had fallen in love with a servant, which was not done. So she and the servant ran away and got married in another town.

But when she got pregnant, she wanted to go back to her parents, to her family, to have the baby. Understandably, her husband really didn't want to go. So they waited until too late. They started out, she had the baby on the way, and they thought, oh well, forget about it, and went back to their home again.

She got pregnant again. Same story. And this time—I'll just make it short—she starts to have the baby again on the way. You'd think they would have learned, but no. So she starts to have the baby again. A big storm starts coming. Her husband goes out to cut some brush to make a shelter. He's bitten by a poisonous snake and dies. She doesn't know what happens to him. She just has the baby. She doesn't know where he is, but gets up the next morning and starts to walk, and finds his body—grief-stricken.

And she keeps on going to her parents' home. She has to cross a really swollen river, and in the course of that crossing, both of her children get swept away and die. So she's almost crazed by now. She keeps going to her parents' home, gets to the edge of the town—and they've had this huge storm as well—and says to the first man she meets, "Where is the home of my family?" And he says, "Ask me anything, but don't ask me that." She says, "That's the only thing I want to know." And he says, "See that smoke? That's from the funeral pyre. The storm caved in the house, and both parents and your brother were killed."

So she loses it. She really goes insane. She wanders for years, and people just throw things at her. She wanders around crazed until she comes finally to the Buddha. And even there, not Ananda, but some of the other lay people around pick up things and throw them at her, trying to drive her away. "Don't bother the holy man." But of course, he says otherwise. He says, "Sister, recover your senses." And she does. She's naked also—she's lost her clothes—so a kind man gives her a cloak. She comes and sits in front of the Buddha.

Remember, this is where I said—I think it was last week—how I love the Buddha's response. She tells him her whole story. And this is where the power of speaking truth to suffering comes through. Not "Oh, too bad, you know, it happens," but: "Patachara, don't think you've come to someone who can help you. In your many lives, you have shed more tears for the dead than there is water in the four oceans."

And this helps her. And he then goes on to say that when you come to die, no one can help you. None of your kin can help you. Nobody else can help your suffering. You have to practice and understand for yourself.

And so she does. She ordains and becomes a nun.

Now, what I also love about her story is that it's not one of these—oh, okay, that's what you say, completely awaken, that's the end of it. No, she had to practice quite some time and have some struggles. But her poem is a lovely poem because she's describing in this poem the moment of her awakening. And I can really relate to it. It's just so precise. It could be any of us.

She's saying: "When they plow their fields and sow seeds in the earth, when they care for their wives and children, young Brahmins find riches. But I've done everything right and followed the rule of my teacher. I'm not lazy or proud. Why haven't I found peace?"

"Bathing my feet, I watched the bathwater spill down the slope."

This is a good poem about why being continuous, even when you're doing other things than sitting or walking, is really valuable.

"Bathing my feet, I watched the bathwater spill down the slope. I concentrated my mind the way you train a good horse. Then I took a lamp and went into my cell, checked the bed, and sat down on it. I took a needle and pushed the wick down."

When the lamp went out, my mind was freed.

That's also a kind of pun on the word nirvana, because nirvana means "going out" in a way. But isn't that lovely? You get the sense of the struggle. And that's something I love about these poems. There are many that reflect the struggle these women went through. It's not all, "Oh, the Buddha said this, and I'm enlightened," like Khema, that queen I told you about. That's a rarer story than the struggle.

But Patachara, because of the enormity of her suffering, what she went through, was able to really help others with great compassion. There are quite a few poems that refer to her without using her name, describing how she helped them. Maybe you can get a sense from this one of her compassion.

This poem is by a woman named Chanda, who had also lost all her family to some kind of plague or disease. Her parents, her husband, her children—everyone died but her. And because, as I said, a woman's livelihood really depended on the male members of her family, there was no one left. She had to wander from house to house begging for food for her subsistence. When she finally came to Patachara and encountered the Dhamma, she had really been suffering for a long time. So this is her poem:

I was in a bad way, a widow, no friends, no children, no relations to give me food and clothes. I was a beggar with a bowl and stick and wandered house to house in the heat and cold for seven years. But I met a nun who had food and drink, and I went up to her and said, "Take me into the homeless life." She was Patachara. Out of pity, she guided me in leaving home, encouraged me, and urged me to the highest goal. I took her advice. It wasn't wasted.

But do you notice? The first thing she says is, "I met a nun who had food and drink." In other words, what did this woman need first? She needed food. She needed sustenance. Just get a sense of that natural compassion.

Often—and I may be totally projecting onto you—but often when I would read some of the suttas, and they sound kind of formal, it can all sound very much like the Buddha or the monk is just preaching, and everyone says, "Oh yes, Reverend Sir," and that's it. You don't quite get the human quality. But of course there's this sense: this poor, emaciated beggar woman comes, and the first thing Patachara does isn't preach the Dhamma—it's give her some food. And then the woman becomes interested and wants to learn the Dhamma and asks for instruction. So I quite like that.

Now I want to talk about another woman who became a great teacher. Dhammadina—the Buddha referred to her as foremost in preaching. In other words, in giving Dhamma instruction, Dhamma talks, she was the foremost among the nuns. She came from a very privileged background. Her story is lighter, an easier story.

She was the wife of an important man in Rajagaha, and they had a very happy marriage. So she wasn't coming from suffering at all. But one day her husband had been out hearing the Buddha teach. Actually, it shows up in several of these stories that the wives of rich men or the wives of kings couldn't get around so much. The men could go hear teachings, and even women's servants often had more freedom to move about and hear the Buddha teaching than the rich women themselves.

So she was home, and her husband came back this day from hearing the Buddha preach. Usually he would come in and they'd sit and eat together and have a very friendly meal. Instead, he just walked by without noticing her. Right away, of course, she thought, "Is he angry? What did I do? What's wrong?" I really relate to that—right away thinking, "What did I do wrong? Why is he not nice to me?"

But then he called to her and explained. He had been so deeply inspired hearing the Buddha teach that he'd had a profound realization. He wanted to renounce the world and become a monk. He realized this left her in a difficult position, but he said he would give her all his wealth. She could do with it whatever she pleased and she'd be taken care of. He was going to go off. She could stay in the home, go back to her family, whatever she wished.

So she thought about it. And she said, "You know what?"

I also want to renounce.

The bhikkhuni order existed at this time. He said, okay, and he respected her wishes. He sent her off in great fanfare, being carried in a litter to the nuns, to the bhikkhuni sangha to ordain. And she did. She ordained and practiced very hard. She was one who didn't have to practice for such a long time to really achieve the highest awakening.

Later she was wandering with some other bhikkhunis and came back to Rajagaha, where she had lived. And lo and behold, her husband had changed his mind and had not become a monk. He was still hanging out in Rajagaha, doing his business, whatever. Just a little dig here—Sayadaw U Pandita often liked to say that women make the best yogis. I just thought I'd tell you that.

But her husband was still quite a devoted follower of the Buddha. When she came back, he went to her—not as his former wife, but as a respected nun—and sat at her feet and asked for teachings. Again, in India of this time, this was revolutionary.

So for Dhammadina, what we have is not a poem. What we have is a whole sutta in the Majjhima Nikaya. Sutta number 44 is basically the series of questions that her former husband asked Dhammadina and the answers that she gave. I'm not going to read the sutta—it's fairly long. The questions are very subtle and complex, addressing the nature of personality view, how to abandon it, the nature of consciousness, all kinds of things. A very subtle sutta. He asks her all these questions, and she answers.

The reason it's in the Majjhima is because afterwards he went and told the Buddha everything Dhammadina had said, which is commonly what happens after someone other than the Buddha has given a talk—it's always reported to the Buddha. And if it made it into the suttas, it's because the Buddha approved. As he said after this: "Dhammadina is a very wise woman. I would have answered exactly as she did. Just what she said, such is its meaning, and so you should remember it."

So he's basically saying that her words are buddhavacana—words of the Buddha. He's giving the stamp that her words are the equivalent of the words of the Buddha. That's really quite a powerful statement in terms of the realization and the power to communicate it of this woman, Dhammadina. And there were quite a few women for whom she was their teacher, their guide in coming into the sasana, into the sangha, and in their practice.

But I want to read a few of the hard-time practice poems, partly because I like them. They seem so real, and they're short. And just because they give us something we can really relate to. Some of them are really, I mean, hard-time practice.

The first one is from a woman known as Sama. She ordained in great sorrow at the death of one of her friends, and maybe I'll tell that story in a little bit. But this is her poem. She was struggling for twenty-five years after she ordained. Just so you know, it's not all like three months or so:

It was twenty-five years since I turned away from home, and I hadn't had a moment's peace.

Can you relate? Twenty-five years—we're not talking two weeks or two months.

I had no peace because I didn't know my own mind. Then suddenly I was shaken with dread, remembering the words of the Conqueror.

That means the Buddha.

Because of the pain of things, I love to be alert. I have finished with craving. The Buddha's teaching has been done. It is the seventh day since my craving died. Because of the pain of things, I love to be alert.

To me, that's a pith line, a pith teaching of the Buddha's Dhamma. Because how does delusion work? How does denial work? Because of the pain of things, I love to space out.

Because of the pain of things, I love to distract myself. That's how we live our lives in delusion and confusion. It's really a great heart, a great commitment, a great faith that says, "Because of the pain of things, I love to be alert." Really knowing that awakeness takes us right through the core of the pain, and from the pain out to freedom. But it's not by avoiding the pain. "Twenty-five years I didn't know peace."

Here's another one. This woman's name is Uttama, and this is another very specific poem. She came from a banker's family, so she came from a pretty easy background. She practiced hard, but this is another specific incident poem:

Four or five times I left my cell. I had no peace of mind, no control over my mind. I went to a nun I thought I could trust.

And they say this is Patachara here again.

She taught me the Dhamma—the elements of body and mind, the nature of perception, and earth, water, fire, and wind, the elements. I heard what she said and sat cross-legged seven days full of joy. When on the eighth I stretched my feet out, the great dark was torn apart.

We can really relate. She kept going in and out of her cell, in and out of her cell. She had no peace of mind, no control over her mind. We all have sittings like that. We may not all sit for seven days cross-legged, full of joy. But that quality of willingness to persevere—that's really lovely.

This is one of my favorites. Sometimes I don't read it. My friend said I shouldn't read it because it's too depressing, but I like it. This is just not to give you any ideas, though. This is about Sihah. Sihah means lioness—that's her name. She was the niece of a very famous general of the Licchavi sect who would show up from time to time in different suttas. So you can imagine being the daughter of a general, she might have a little bit of striving and a little bit of needing to excel going on.

She heard the Buddha preach, Gautama preach, and then she decided to enter the nun's order. She very sincerely practiced for seven years. Nothing happened. And she got so distressed, so filled with despair, that she couldn't take it anymore and decided to kill herself. This is what I mean about not giving you any ideas. But just notice—it's a mind state. She just had this mind state of deciding to kill herself. She acted on that mind state. Now, this is what we have the wisdom not to do. But she acted on it. She went to hang herself, and obviously, just at the moment she was putting the rope about her neck and about to hang herself, she woke up.

I don't advocate relying on that happening. It's just like trying to pay attention to pain but really paying attention so you know it'll go away—knowing it doesn't work. This is the same. Anyway, this is her poem:

Obsessed by sensuality, I never got to the origin, but was agitated, my mind beyond control. I dreamed of a great happiness. I was passionate but had no peace. Pale and thin, I wandered seven years, unhappy day and night. Then I took a rope into the forest and thought I'd rather hang than go back to that narrow life. I tied a strong noose to the branch of a tree and put it around my neck. Just then my heart was set free.

"Obsessed by sensuality, I dreamed of a great happiness. I was passionate but had no peace." That really rings true, doesn't it? It doesn't sound like just some kind of stock statement. You know that sense we have of hitting ourselves against the wall, against the wall—we don't know how to let go until finally we get to the point where we just totally give up, and it happens by itself. That's why we can't fool it, because it happens by itself.

So that's Sihah, the lioness.

This next one is Mita Kali. She entered the order when she heard the Buddha give the Maha Satipatthana Sutta. Can you imagine actually hearing the Buddha give the discourse on the Foundations of Mindfulness? I mean, can you imagine that? No, not really, but that would be something. Anyway, that inspired her to become a nun, but it's said that up until then she had the reputation of being a very difficult person—very angry, unpleasant, very self-centered. So she really worked on herself as a nun, but she had some work to do, and it was hard for a while. Again, this is her story, her poem:

Although I left home for no home and wandered full of faith, I was still greedy for possessions and praise. I lost my way. My passions used me, and I forgot the real point of my wandering life. Then as I sat in my little cell, there was only terror. I thought, this is the wrong way. A fever of longing controls me. Life is short. Age and sickness gnaw away. I have no time for carelessness before this body breaks. And as I watched the elements of mind and body rise and fall away, I saw them as they really are. I stood up. My mind was completely free. The Buddha's teaching has been done.

That particular image she gives—life is short, watching the elements of the body kind of decay—that's used often. And it brings me to mention that there are quite a few poems of nuns, of women who became nuns when they were quite old in their life. Sometimes people come to practice rather late in life. We run into it often. And it's not uncommon for them to say, "Oh, I wasted so much of my life. I could have been practicing all those years." And that could be whether you start at twenty or thirty or forty. It's easy to get into that: "I wasted my life. I could have been." But that's just not relevant. It doesn't matter.

There are stories of women who became nuns really quite late in life, but through their great dedication and faith and practice, they were also able to really come to some understanding, come to some freedom. In fact, I was a nun for a little while in Thailand quite a few years ago. In Thailand, I didn't run into the same support for nuns, or the same number of nuns and dedication of nuns and nunneries, that I see in Burma. I think there's starting to be a resurgence in Thailand, but the places I was—which was admittedly only two or three places—there were only very few nuns, and many of them were really quite elderly. I really have no way of knowing how they related to practice, but I was told that in some cases, old women would become nuns just sort of like going to an old age home. They didn't have somewhere else to go. And that's kind of sad, but it doesn't have to be that way.

So I wanted to read one poem from a woman who was simply called Dhamma. She was a very good wife, very obedient wife. She wanted to ordain younger in her life, and her husband said no. She had a respectable middle-class marriage. She was very devoted to the Buddha, but her husband said no. And so in the way of a devoted and honorable Indian wife, she respected her husband's wishes, stayed home, and was quite devoted until he died. When he died, she ordained. Her realization experience—again, it's described from one example—happened because of her aging body and the problems with it. She said:

I wandered for alms. I leaned on a stick. My whole body was weak and trembled. Suddenly I fell down and could see clearly the misery of this body. My heart was freed.

I find that quite inspiring. "I could see clearly the misery of this body. My heart was freed."

It's really a different way to go with it than "I can't handle it, it's just all falling apart," bitching and groaning. To really see it—it frees the heart from clinging, from false identification.

Here's another one from a woman named Chitta, the same kind of thing: "Though I am thin, sick, and lean on a stick, I have climbed up Vulture Peak. Robe thrown down, bowl turned over, leaned on a rock, then great darkness opened."

One thing these women possessed for sure, besides faith, was a real strong commitment—perseverance, energy. It may not be the energy of a young person who can go all day, but the energy of steady perseverance. That's quite inspiring. We all have that capacity. It doesn't matter if we're not as strong as we used to be or can't remember what we used to remember. We can still be present with that faith and perseverance, moment after moment.

I want to mention a couple of laywomen who didn't ordain as nuns, but whose stories make it into this context. One is the woman Samavati. She was the queen of King Udena, one of his queens. She's the woman because of whose death Sama became a nun. Now Samavati was very generous and loving, and she was a great devoted follower of the Buddha. She was said by the Buddha to be the laywoman most skilled in spreading metta. She was a very powerful metta being.

But because she was a queen, the wife of a king, she didn't have the freedom to follow the Buddha and hear his teachings. But—and this I find very interesting—her servant woman, whose name was Khujjuttara, could go about. The servants could go to the market, buy things. They could get around where the higher women couldn't. And so Samavati used to send Khujjuttara every day to the market with money to buy flowers to put in front of her altar.

Khujjuttara was doing this thing of keeping half of the money, only buying half as many flowers as she was supposed to and keeping the rest of the money. She had been doing this for so long, and Samavati just didn't suspect her. But then one day Khujjuttara heard the Buddha teach and was so inspired—in fact, it's said that she had a little awakening. She came back and confessed it all to Samavati, who, because she was so skilled in loving-kindness, readily forgave her and said, "But you have to tell me what this teacher said."

Khujjuttara had this prodigious memory. She would actually go and hear the Buddha talk and come back and share it with Samavati and all of her women friends, to the point that one of the smaller books in the Pali Canon, the book called the Itivuttaka, is said to be poems and prose that was remembered and related by Khujjuttara—the whole book. So both of these women had very profound understanding.

What happened is that one of Samavati's co-queens was very jealous of her because she was so beloved of the king, beloved of everybody. Why was she beloved? Because she was filled with metta. To make a long story short, this other queen got so jealous that she locked Samavati and all of her women in a building and set fire to it, and they were all killed in the fire. So it wasn't all peaches and cream back then either.

But the Buddha said—because with his psychic mind he could tell the destination of people in their next life—he said that all of those women had to some degree awakened. And that was really thanks to the teachings that Khujjuttara was able to share. I find that quite lovely.

I'll just end with one other story and poem of a different kind of woman, and this is a woman who was a courtesan, basically a really high-class prostitute. They had both, you know—poor low-class prostitutes and courtesans. In this society, if you were a very rich courtesan, you were the courtesan for kings and the high-class men of the culture.

This woman's name is Ambapali. She was considered the most beautiful woman in Vesali. In fact, she was so beautiful that she was found under a mango tree. Ambapali kind of means "mango guardian woman." As she grew up, she was so beautiful that all the different rich men and kings were fighting over her. They resolved this by making her the official courtesan of the whole town of Vesali. And somehow that wasn't a shameful thing—it gave her great prestige and great wealth. She was very well respected, this beautiful Ambapali. She actually had a son by a king of the time, King Bimbisara. And there are stories about her in the suttas where she would come to visit the Buddha and invite him and all his bhikkhus to come for a meal with her.

And he would accept and go. There was no shame in it, but he would tell his bhikkhus, "Keep your eyes down. She's very beautiful. Don't let yourself get distracted by her beauty. But it's totally appropriate to appreciate her generosity and her support of the Sangha."

At some point, her son—the one she had by King Bimbisara—became a monk also. And eventually, he talked his mother into becoming a nun. It's said that she came to her really deep understanding by studying impermanence in her own aging body. Now, this is someone who had been very beautiful, whose whole life was centered around how beautiful she was.

Her poem is quite long, so I will only read part of it. I particularly love it because it has a sense of humor—at least to me it does.

My hair was black and curly, the color of black bees.
Now that I am old, it is like the hemp of trees.
This is the teaching of one who speaks truth.

Fragrant as a scented oak, I wore flowers in my hair.
Now because of old age, it smells like dog's hair.
This is the teaching of one who speaks truth.

It was thick as a grove, and I parted it with comb and pin.
Now because of old age, it is thin, very thin.
This is the teaching of one who speaks truth.

My eyes flashed like jewels, long, black—
Now they don't make anyone look back.
This is the teaching of one who speaks truth.

My teeth were beautiful, the color of plantain buds.
Now because of old age they are broken and yellow.
This is the teaching of one who speaks truth.

She goes on through all different parts of her body. And she ends with: This is how my body was. Now it is dilapidated, the place of pain, an old house with the plaster falling off.

But that's not coming from a place of complaining. It's coming from a place of awakening—a place of recognizing, "How can I be attached to this?"

I will end with this one poem from Uttama:

The Buddha taught seven factors of enlightenment.
They are ways to find peace, and I have developed them all.
I have found what is vast and empty, the unborn.
It is what I've longed for.
I am a true daughter of the Buddha, always finding joy in peace.
I have ended the hunger of gods and humans,
and I will not wander from birth to birth.
I have no thought of becoming.

May we all have no thought of becoming.

CHAPTER 16

Practicing Muditā

Carol Wilson · 54 min

In this talk from a Vipassanā intensive, Carol Wilson offers a comprehensive exploration of muditā (appreciative joy) and its place within the four brahmavihāras (boundless states). She begins by addressing a common misconception—that cultivating joy might be a peripheral aspect of practice—and establishes through teachings from the Dalai Lama and the Buddha that fulfilling our aspiration for happiness is central to the spiritual path.

Wilson draws on the Buddha's teaching that the mind is naturally luminous and brightly shining, but becomes covered by visiting afflictive emotions. She explains that muditā practice helps us recognize and trust this natural state of openness, where appreciative joy arises spontaneously when we perceive another's happiness without self-referencing or comparison. The talk addresses common obstacles including the comparing mind (māna), the near enemies of attached joy and exuberant energy that leads to crashing, and the far enemies of envy and jealousy.

Practical guidance is offered for working with the phrases "may your happiness continue" as a way of inclining the heart rather than magical wishing. Wilson emphasizes starting with easy subjects and trusting the gradual nature of the practice, noting that much transformation happens below conscious observation. She concludes with Thich Nhat Hanh's teaching on consciously bringing up seeds of joy to balance overwhelming suffering, illustrating how muditā strengthens our capacity to be present with all aspects of life.

And why are we doing this? Really, essentially, how does this practice of muditā, of appreciative joy, fit into the whole mandala of our spiritual path, of our spiritual practice?

His Holiness the Dalai Lama, in his book called The Good Heart, wrote that the purpose, in his view, of our spiritual practice is to fulfill our desire for happiness. He goes on to say that all of us humans are equal in this—that we all desire happiness and to abandon suffering, and that we all share equally in the right to fulfill this aspiration. An aspiration, not incredibly greedy desire. An aspiration for happiness.

I say that because it's one way of looking at the point of our spiritual path, and to try to move out of any lingering sense someone might have had that somehow this cultivation of joy, of happiness, is a little bit dubious side aspect to practice. Maybe it's nice when you hit into some good feeling, but it's not really part of the big picture. There's something a little off with looking for happiness. That's why I chose this particular quotation.

Of course, the big point of our understanding and what we come to understand through our whole lifetime of practice is what exactly that word happiness is really referring to, and that's the subject of many talks. But the Dalai Lama, again in The Good Heart, goes on to say that in terms of fulfilling our desire for happiness, when we first think of happiness, often we think of sense pleasure—happiness of pleasant sense experience—which is certainly a kind of happiness that comes and goes. It's not what we're talking about in terms of spiritual aspiration.

He goes on, though, to point out in his very simple and down-to-earth way that while the happiness of sense pleasures can fleetingly bring us happiness, mental happiness and mental unhappiness is generally so much stronger, has such a stronger effect on us than physical sense pleasure. Just giving the simple example: if you're in a really beautiful, lovely place—say it's a holiday you've planned for months, for years—and when you're there, you're in a really upset frame of mind. You and your partner have a giant fight, or you're grief-stricken over something that happened, or you're just anxious about your children the whole time. You could be in the best place in the world and not be able to enjoy it at all because of the mental states that we're experiencing and caught in.

Conversely, when our inner heart, our mind, is in a balanced frame—when we're happy, when we're content, when we're at ease, when we're not afflicted by these suffering mental states—then even when we're in a difficult situation, we're much more able to flow with the difficulties with ease. We still know it's difficult, but there's much more spaciousness, much more ease, much more balance within that difficult situation when our heart and mind is in a calm, contented, happy place.

These difficult states of heart and mind—what the Tibetans call afflictive emotions, that when they're present we feel afflicted—such as greed, anger, jealousy, pride, hatred, violence. You can run down the list. There's nothing too esoteric, and we're familiar with all of them. As strong as they are, and as much discomfort, as caught as we get when these afflictive emotions are present in our heart and mind, we can be so caught—as in that example I gave of being in some beautiful place and being completely miserable. It seems often as if we're the victims, as if there's nothing we can do but just be assaulted by these afflictive emotions, these states of heart.

But what all spiritual paths, and this one too, show us—and hope to help us open to, to really learn to trust—is that as strong as these afflictive emotions are, they are not the purest or strongest or most natural state of our heart and mind. So many of us—I don't mean to speak for you, so if it doesn't apply, let it go—but we give so much credence, so much energy, so much belief to the power of these afflictive emotions. It just seems like that's how things are.

I don't know how it is for you, but how do you feel when you hear me, or you read someone say, that actually the natural state of our heart and mind is one of peace that manifests as compassion or appreciative joy? That this is more our natural state, and these afflictive emotions are more like visitors—yeah, like visitors that never went away, visitors that live here.

The Dalai Lama says the more we accommodate these afflictive emotions, the stronger they grow. Really, a lot of our practice—our muditā practice here, but all our spiritual practices—is seeing for ourselves that this is not the natural state of our heart and mind, and we don't have to just give up and feel like victims. Learning to really trust that because we know it for ourselves, not because anybody else said it.

Pema Chödrön, an American nun in the Tibetan tradition who writes very pithy, helpful books, says: "Pointing directly at your own heart, you find Buddha. Maybe the reason there are dharma talks and books is just to encourage us to understand this simple teaching. All the wisdom about how we cause ourselves to suffer, and all the wisdom about how joyful and vast and uncomplicated our minds-hearts are"—mind-heart being the same word—"these two things, the understanding of what we might call neurosis and the wisdom of unconditioned, unbiased truth, can only be found in our own experience."

In a nutshell, that's how I look at what our spiritual practice is about. This cultivation of joy, of appreciative joy, of connected joy, is one way of accessing, learning to more deeply experience and trust the fact that vastness, that openness, that potential for connected joy is a more natural aspect of our experience than envy and jealousy.

I'll say the same thing in another way. This is a very famous quotation from the Buddha. He said: "Luminous is this mind-heart, brightly shining..."

but it is covered, it is hidden, by the attachments that visit it. This the uninstructed people do not understand, and so for them there is no cultivation of the mind, of the heart. Uninstructed people don't understand that the brightly luminous mind is covered by these visiting attachments.

Luminous is this mind, heart, brightly shining, and it is untouched, unstained by the visiting states of mind. This the noble follower of the way really understands. And so for them there is cultivation of the heart, of the mind.

That's what our practices are, whether it's empathetic joy or metta or vipassana—cultivation of the heart, cultivation of the mind, really learning to see through, not to be so diverted by the visiting afflictive emotions, to be able to trust and recognize the luminous, vast quality of heart and mind. Sometimes all we get is a teeny, teeny little glimmer. Sometimes not even that. But what's amazing, in my experience—take for example being on a retreat, since that's where we are—I could slog through a day, a day and a half, we'll just keep it short like that, it could be longer. Slog, nothing, my mind just saying the phrases, nothing's happening. And then there's a little glimmer, say, of touching joy. It may be when I'm sitting saying the phrases, maybe outside, it may be drinking tea. It just comes unexpected, because you can't make it happen. It may not last long, but the effect it has in the mind stream, in the heart, in the sense of trust—as a teacher of mine said, a spark of truth burns up a mountain of lies. There's some way we know in our heart when we're touching the truth, and it keeps us going. It's lucky that it's that ratio. It keeps us going through the hard stuff.

Let me say the same thing another way. This is from Dan Goleman's book Social Intelligence. He's quoting a scientist from Harvard, Jerome Kagan, who makes a simple point about human nature: that the sum total of goodness vastly outweighs that of meanness. It's a quotation now: "Although humans inherit a biological bias that permits them to feel anger, jealousy, selfishness and envy and to be rude, aggressive or violent," Kagan notes, "humans also inherit an even stronger biological bias for kindness, compassion, love, cooperation, and nurture, especially toward those in need." This built-in ethical sense, he adds, is a biological feature of our species. So that's a more scientific way of looking at it—two ways of coming at the same thing.

Now, how mudita, or the four Brahma Viharas, which are states of mind, states of heart—like I mentioned last night—loving-kindness or friendliness, compassion, sympathetic appreciative joy, equanimity... These four are called boundless or limitless states because they have the potential, when we're really experiencing them, to include all beings. A real moment, say, of loving-kindness, friendliness, is the sense of simply connecting with another person without judgment, without bias, without saying, "I like this, that can go, you're okay, you're not." It's just a moment of open connectedness, non-separation. And it's not some unusual esoteric thing. It's a natural thing that we all experience.

We've used the example of just seeing a small, happy child—you naturally feel connected. You naturally feel, if they're happy, appreciative joy. Metta turned towards happiness or joy takes the tone of appreciative joy. That same connectedness turned towards the suffering aspect takes the tone of compassion, which is connectedness with suffering. Equanimity is the wisdom, a kind of radiant calm of heart and mind that really can be with things as they are, knowing we can't always control the results. It gives the vastness. It's what allows us to really appreciate joy while knowing there's also suffering in the world. How do we hold both? That's kind of a tricky thing sometimes. Equanimity gives us that vastness.

I'm mentioning the four because from the state of the luminous nature of mind and heart, or the vastness that Pema Chödrön speaks of, the simplicity—when in any particular moment our heart and mind isn't all caught up, identified, fighting with these afflictive emotions, when those don't happen to be covering—the natural, unpremeditated response, the way we would respond in a situation, would really come out of probably one of these four Brahma Viharas. If we see someone in need or someone in danger, the natural response of the open heart and mind is to do something, just to respond. If we see someone here and they're crying and we know the space is okay, you leave them alone in their silence. But compassion still feels. Compassionate response could be to leave someone alone, but it's done out of that sense of connectedness. You see what I mean? It's not how it looks, it's the intention inside.

So these states of heart and mind are really natural when we're not all caught up with afflictive emotions. And the formal practice, in this case of appreciative joy, is actually a way to help us stabilize, to recognize more frequently the different ways that state of heart and mind can manifest, to notice what in our particular psyche gets in the way—because I'm sure you've noticed what gets in the way today—to see that still we can come back and connect with that joy, to really strengthen that habit of mind, to actually see that more than we realize, we have a choice where we might let our heart and mind dwell.

Remember what Guy said last night? It's one of my favorite quotations too, from the Buddha: "Whatever a person frequently thinks and ponders upon, that will become the inclination of her mind." So I don't know about you, but when I watch my mind in my daily life,

Where does it go? What is it frequently thinking and pondering upon? Well, just look and see for yourself. And then it's no big surprise what the habits of my mind are.

So here we're really making a conscious choice to come more into the true home of our heart, to learn to recognize, to learn to come back, to learn to trust, to have faith from your own experience—not from what I said.

Someone said today in one of the groups, which I'd have to agree, that culturally, the messages we get consciously and subliminally don't necessarily always support appreciative joy or compassion or kindness. I mean, some do, but there's a lot that don't. It's really incumbent on us. I feel that part of our path is learning with honesty, with clarity, without judgment: What is the inclination of my mind? Where do I go for refuge in my mind and heart, just left to my own devices? Really look and see. And then see, is that the choice I want to make? Then we learn that we do have a choice.

I read this on the BBC online in August from Nanjing, China. It's called "About the Rising Sun Anger Release Bar"—a bar that lets customers smash glasses, rant, and even hit specially trained workers. The owner, Mr. Wu, was inspired to open the bar by his experiences as a migrant worker. Most of his customers, he said, were women working in the service or entertainment industries. The bar employs twenty men who have been given protective gear and physical training to prepare them for the job. The clients can ask the men to dress as the character they wish to attack.

Now, this is a true story. They interviewed people on the street, and very much as it would be here, there were mixed opinions. One woman said, "The idea of beating someone dressed as my boss seems attractive. We get no place to vent anger." Then another man said, no, violence is not the answer—you need to adjust your lifestyle or seek psychological treatment. Just that, you know, places like that could even come into being, and some of us could think, well, that's a good thing to do. That's one of the ways the culture does not support us to really have this deep trust, this deep knowing. As Thich Nhat Hanh says, happiness is available—please help yourself. That's what we're learning here, how to help ourselves.

What we start to see, hopefully, through these practices—today, specifically through the appreciative joy practice, and similarly through all the four Brahmaviharas—is that how in our heart and mind we respond to a particular situation is what allows for the possibility of ease, contentment, and happiness, or for the kind of suffering that comes from being really caught up and divided in our mind.

In terms of the perception of suffering—if somebody's in pain or suffering—how in our heart and mind we respond to that matters deeply. If we respond with fear, with "it's too much, I can't take it in," with pity, with blame, or any of the understandable reactions, that is a distancing response. It really creates a sense of separation. We can either get angry or feel isolated or in despair, overwhelmed with the suffering. But compassion, which is just the connectedness of heart with the suffering, just seeing it as it is, takes away that sense of division, of separation. Compassion is one of the beautiful states of heart and mind because there's a connectedness in the suffering.

Similarly, with mudita, how our heart and mind respond in a moment to the perception of another being's happiness, joy, or success can create either a sense of separation, of isolation, of actual affliction in our heart and mind—or it can open us to the happiness of non-separation, of connectedness. Obviously, envy and jealousy on one side, or appreciative joy on the other.

This is an interview I heard on NPR a couple of years ago. I imagine those of you from Massachusetts might remember when the Red Sox won the World Series. We were here in the fall. Even though I've lived here a long time, it's not really the high point of my life, I have to say. But I got it—that it was the high point of many people's lives that fall.

After the World Series was over, they interviewed this Red Sox fan, and this is what he said: "This was the best moment of my life." And the joy—this is a quotation—"was not in the winning. It was in the sorrow and misery in the Yankee fans' eyes." This was said with full-hearted joy, I have to say.

Then they interviewed a Yankee fan who said, "This was the worst moment of my life." And the interviewer said, "Come on, the Yankees win a lot. Don't the Red Sox deserve to win sometime?" And the guy said, "Sure, when I'm dead."

So that's one way of responding. We laugh—it's funny, and it can kind of pump you up. But if you really look at how that guy feels, saying "I'm so happy at the misery in their eyes"—that's not really appreciative joy. It's going to, at some point, bring in some suffering.

When we're doing this formal practice of sympathetic joy, appreciative joy—bringing up a sense or an image of a person, repeating the simple phrase "may your happiness continue"—it's very simple, almost simplistic, actually. And just to say a couple of things: it's not a magic wish. It's not that somehow magically, if I say often enough "may your happiness never leave you," your happiness will never leave you.

This is where equanimity comes in. We actually know your happiness will leave you, because nobody gets nothing but happiness, just like nobody gets nothing but suffering. This is really why they're boundless. Appreciative joy is boundless because it is said that all beings experience some aspect of happiness, of joy, however small. Compassion also is boundless because all beings experience some aspects of suffering.

So we're not saying "may your happiness continue" as a magical wish. It's not a clinging. What it really is, is a way of expressing our inner climate, of inclining our heart and mind toward "Oh, I'm so happy that you're happy." That's another way of saying it. The one we're using—"may your happiness continue"—is more classical. But if that one leads your inner climate into wanting, if when you say that phrase what you feel arising in your heart and mind is some kind of clinging or wanting or pushing, then switch the phrase.

Because the phrase is really just to keep strengthening, or coming back to, that possibility that when I see someone else light up with happiness, my first thought won't be "why them and not me?" There's actually the potential for "Wow, they look happy," and I don't have to self-reference at all. It doesn't have anything to do with how I am. They're just happy. It's a possibility. It's a lovely possibility when it happens. You go, "Oh, wow, where did that come from?"

So each moment we're saying the phrase, it doesn't necessarily mean we feel that joy, but we're inclining the heart, inclining the mind in that direction. And even the saying of it is an expression of intention—the intention to have a thought, intention to say something, intention to act. So just to say the thought "may your happiness continue" is shifting the inner climate.

And every time that we do it during these days, it's like Sharon likes to say: it's like planting a seed. We're not in control of what conditions come or how soon that seed will sprout. The more that we can just leave it alone—plant the seed and leave it alone, plant the seed and leave it alone—the inner climate really does start to shift in its intention and in its habit. And that's really what we're doing in this practice, how it works.

As some people said in one of the groups, it works a lot below the level of our conscious observation. Our tendency—many of us who are kind of scientifically brought up—is to want to say it and get the result right away. "Okay, I've been here for 24 hours. Where's this joy? Where's this gratitude? How many times have I said that phrase? Come on!" We have such a small view, and such a short attention span. "Okay, now or never, I'm on to the next thing."

But there's stuff happening beneath the surface. Like someone said at another retreat they had done—I think it was a loving-kindness retreat—where it didn't really feel like much was going on during the retreat at all. They went home and really noticed something had shifted. That's been my personal experience often. We like to know. We like to be able to chart it, to write it down, to have something to measure against. But that needing to know just gets in our way. Just plant the seed.

May your happiness continue, and let it be. Do it again, and let it be. It's a challenge for some of us. It's a challenge for me—I'm a very impatient person. But as we begin to experience that maybe joy is more of a potential than we realized, it becomes a little easier to trust.

So, just to say a few other things about the practice of mudita. I guess you know by now, though I don't know if we've said it explicitly, that appreciative joy—when we're wishing someone happiness—first involves appreciation of a happiness or success they're experiencing that's wholesome. It's not as though they're doing something that's harming other beings and they're happy about it, and we feel happy for their happiness. That's not really what we're talking about. It doesn't feel good. It's interesting because if you do pick something like that with someone and you start to try and feel happy, it doesn't have that pureness, the simplicity of our vastness of heart and mind. It has some kind of... it doesn't quite feel right.

It's also a kind of joy that has this purity because it doesn't have clinging in it. All of these Brahma Viharas—the beautiful quality of them and the vastness of them, the limitlessness—is possible because there's no clinging, there's no wanting. Ultimately it's not about what am I getting from this. It's not about me at all. Even though we start with "may I, may you, may I feel joy at your happiness," as I think we've said, it moves in the direction of being less about me and you, and the joy is just there. There's no separation. That not-clinging is what moves into the wisdom of the freedom of heart and mind altogether in practice. The true liberation of heart, the Buddha said, is this liberation of mind through non-clinging. Mudita and the other Brahma Viharas are all expressions of the heart, the mind of non-clinging.

If there's really some clinging in it—and a lot of times there will be; this is why we're practicing, this is what we're learning to purify—you'll start to see that it feels different. It doesn't have that purity of appreciation, of contentment, of ease. There's a little too much "me needing something" going on in it. And while at first that can feel like happiness, when you really look closely, it isn't.

So in terms of appreciative joy, what is called the—they use all this warlike language in the commentaries from the Buddhist texts—a state of heart and mind that's close to and sometimes confused with appreciative joy: you could say it's joy with clinging. So it may be that you're happy at someone's happiness. Say a partner—my partner, thank God, finally they're happy. I don't have to listen to their whining anymore. I'm so happy that you're happy. There's some real joy in that, and there's a little bit of something else.

At first it can be hard to tease out the difference. But just here, sitting here over and over and over, you'll feel when you hit that pure appreciative joy. Oh, I'm really just so happy for you. It's very different.

Another so-called near enemy of appreciative joy—and this I did not understand until I had practiced it intensively myself—is a kind of exuberant, really high energy. I don't know if any of you have experienced that today. It hasn't maybe been enough time, but I think as Sally was saying when she was practicing mudita and she just felt like skipping around, that's an example of how the energy gets really... oh, wow! You know, like I said, when I was walking and doing mudita, I felt like I was walking like this up and down the path. I was a little curious what people were thinking because everyone else was schlumping around being mindful, and I'm like, "Oh yeah, may your happiness continue!" That kind of energy comes up.

And when it's not really connected, it starts to feel good. Then instead of funneling the energy back into connecting with the person and the expression of joy, we just kind of get into liking the joy. Wow, this is good. I could sing. I could go out in the woods and just sing to the birds. I could just go out... and you're dancing and singing around. And suddenly that high energy—what goes up must come down. You crash. You drag back into the hall. You're depressed. "I was so happy, and now I have no energy. What I need is a good nap." So that's just a way we get caught. It's also a kind of attached joy.

We're attached to the feeling, but it's all about me feeling gratified by the feeling. Again, it has a different flavor. So just experiment. Notice that.

The so-called far enemy—well, that's obvious: the opposite, envy and jealousy. If we're feeling envy, we don't feel appreciative joy. They're opposites because they don't exist in the same mind moment.

Part of how this practice works is that it brings up the habits of our mind that get in the way. This is one reason we try to start with someone easy—someone whose happiness you can easily see, but also someone you can genuinely be glad is happy. As I said, you don't start with the place where you're going to be most envious, because that makes it too hard. We need to learn what it feels like, learn how to incline and direct our heart and mind to appreciating someone's happiness where it's easy. Then we can tackle the big ones that are really causing us a lot of suffering. It may not seem like we're doing the real work, but it really, really helps to start with little things.

I use different examples a lot. When I think of a friend who is often quite happy—I have a good friend who loves to sing and play the guitar. In fact, you have to sit on him to stop him from singing and playing the guitar at any opportunity. Old James Taylor songs, old Beatles songs—kumbaya if you're not watching out. Obviously, I don't love to sing and play the guitar myself. But I don't have to. I just have to tune in to his happiness, and I feel really happy. It doesn't threaten me that he sings and plays the guitar. Now, if my life revolved around trying to be a good guitar player and I really stunk at it, then every time he played, it might bring up envy. That might not be the easy one. But if you look, it's really not that hard to find lots of little things about almost anyone you know that makes them happy, and then use that.

This same friend loves to watch Pete Sampras play tennis—well, he used to, since Sampras retired, but he has old tapes. Just last night he said, "I have this old Pete Sampras tape we could watch." He gets really happy. So that's accessible.

Back to the Red Sox game. That guy who was gloating over the sorrow of the others—he could have just been simply happy at winning. The Yankee fan who lost and said, "They only deserve to win when I'm dead"—if he could have looked and thought, wow, look how happy those Red Sox fans are, and actually felt happy for them. That's an option. It's an option. It changes the whole landscape of how we live our life. And we can start in really little ways. It transforms our suffering reactions to experience. That's really what it's about—not having to be victims of these afflictive states of mind and heart.

I imagine if that Yankee fan heard me say, "Why don't you just look in the Red Sox fans' eyes and see how happy they are, and you could be happy too," he would not respond, "Oh yeah, why didn't I think of that? Thank you for your suggestion." Probably not. But we can do that.

How much does it increase our chances of contentment? It opens us to a vastness that actually lets us be more present with all aspects of life. It's not that we're ignoring suffering, but sometimes there's so much suffering in our own lives, in those we're close to, in the world. Just listen to the news—it's easy to feel like you're drowning in it, just overwhelmed. Learning how to open our heart, to actually gladden the heart and mind, to turn to the channel of joy as a way of strengthening and opening—it allows us to be present for all aspects of life.

If we shut down to pain, we shut down to joy. But vice versa too: if we shut down to joy, we also shut down to connection with suffering. We can't shut down selectively, and we can't open selectively.

So you might find, as we really cultivate this avenue, strengthen this intention of connectedness, of openness to other people's happiness, that openness starts to transfer. You might see someone who's looking sad, and instead of thinking, "Oh, I'm only doing mudita now, I can't look at you," the openness will naturally extend to them. You might be quite surprised.

Another thing that can be very subtle or very gross, and is pretty common to all of us—in fact, it's one of the habits of mind that the Buddha said was among the last to go before you're completely awakened—the Pali word is mana. It's often translated as conceit, but it manifests as this simple comparing of ourselves with others. Have any of you noticed your mind doing that at all today? Just that constant assessment: they're better than me, they're worse than me, or we're the same.

If you start to look at it, just notice without any judgment, because it's simply what our minds do. Notice when it's happening. And it can be about really big things. Somebody's happy and right away, "Oh, they're happy"—and it goes right back to "they're happier than me." Appreciative joy is going to be hard to come by because they're happier than me, and right away we're back to "poor me, what's the matter with me?"

Or when you see someone unhappy and you think, "Well, I'm doing better than they are"—that's definitely not compassion. That's separation. Or, "Well, we're about the same. I guess it's okay. I guess I'm all right." It's all of it very me-centered, isn't it? It's all about me from that point of view. And it's endless—this constant assessing and reassessing.

My friend Sharon, who teaches retreats, once mentioned that she noticed how her mind, sitting a retreat, couldn't help but suss out everybody she saw, as if making a kind of list of who was better than her, who wasn't as good as her, and who was about even with her—about whatever particular quality your mind picks. Pick anything. Pick how somebody's dressed. Pick what their hair's like. Pick how they sit in the hall. Pick the kind of car they drive. Pick the job they have. Pick how they eat, how much they eat, what socks they wear. I mean, it gets really insane on a long retreat. You should see this stuff.

But the energy that the mind puts into it is just the same whether it's about socks or about what you're doing with your life. And she said, so you do that—you make this whole arrangement: they sit better than me, I sit better than them. You have it all figured out. You know where everybody is. Then somebody new comes in and you have to reshuffle the whole thing because you've got to figure out where they go, and it shifts everything around.

Just play with it. Just notice. Can you walk through the dining room at lunch and see if any comparison happens to arise in your mind? And if you can laugh at it, that's great, because that puts some space around it.

But you see how this leads to restlessness, a kind of real unsettledness, a fear, a sense that there's only so much happiness available in the world, and if you have more, I have less. That's the big thing that gets in the way of appreciative joy. And it's so strange because it's exactly the reverse. What's so great about appreciative joy is this: you're happy now, and I can be happy too. I don't even have to have something good happening in my own life.

I can be happy about something happening in your life. It really does increase our chances of happiness.

So you might just notice—I just drop it in there—the sense of comparing, the sense of scarcity, versus the limitless nature of joy. Just notice when your mind throws that up: "Oh, I don't have to believe that." Reconnect with the sense of someone's happiness and offer that wish and see what happens in the climate, in your inner climate, in your mind and heart.

This mudita is one of various ways to consciously bring up what Thich Nhat Hanh calls seeds of joy. And it's really an essential aspect of the whole mandala of our spiritual practice. It's true, the Buddha talked a lot about aspects of suffering and freeing our heart and mind from suffering, and the need to understand how we suffer in order to be free from it. We need to see that. A lot of our path is opening to that. But it's just as important to open to the beauty, to the joy, because otherwise we drown in the suffering and it's an imbalanced perception.

You get into what I call a dukkha phase—dukkha is the Pali word often translated as suffering—where all you see is difficult endings of things, dying, everything's wrong. I remember it would be like that. I'd walk in a room and there's a beautiful plant, and I'd go, "Oh, what's the difference? It's just going to die, you know?" A couple gets together and I'd think, "May they be happy, because you know it's not going to last."

That's a little imbalanced, right? It's not so helpful. Yes, everything will die. The plant will die. But right now it's not dead. Right now it's beautiful. Can I appreciate that even more, knowing it will die?

Sometimes, as Thich Nhat Hanh says, we have to consciously bring up into our hearts and minds seeds of joy. And it can be a very little seed of joy to balance this overwhelming feeling when you're drowning in suffering—of the world, of your own, in a really difficult time in your life.

I've noticed for myself this tendency of the mind to go all one way or all the other. If I'm hearing about suffering or I'm in a hard place, the mind just gets consumed by that, as if you can't enjoy anything. Or if it's someone else's suffering and I actually have a moment of joy, I'm cheating. I'm abandoning them. I'm not helping them. I should just be really dismal. But it's not like that. Actually, the opening to these seeds of joy gives our heart and mind the courage, the strength, the vastness to be more present with ourselves and with others when things are difficult.

Thich Nhat Hanh talks about this from his experience during the Vietnamese War. He went back and forth between the two sides, trying to be a reconciler, which of course meant both sides didn't trust him. And when he was out of Vietnam giving some talks during the war, he wasn't allowed to go back again. For him, that was a lot of suffering. He describes one time when a good friend of his died of a heart attack. He couldn't sleep for a few nights. There was so much pain in his heart, and he just couldn't get around it. He had to get up the next day and give a speech, and he just couldn't deal. So what he did was to consciously bring up seeds of joy, just simple things. And that helped to balance his perception and balance his heart.

These are examples he gives. He says, "Most of us ask the question, 'What is wrong?' We forget to ask, 'What is right?' There are many things that are not wrong. When you focus your attention only on what is wrong, you can make the situation worse. So it is wise to meditate on your capacity to enjoy peace, happiness, and joy, your capacity to be in touch with what is not wrong, what is refreshing, healing, and wonderful in the present moment. During the war, we were so busy helping the wounded that we sometimes forgot to smell the flowers. Night has a very pleasant smell, especially in the country, but we would forget to pay attention to the smells of mint, coriander, thyme, and sage. I would mention these herbs to the social workers and peace workers so they would be in touch with them."

Just something that simple can help to open us out of the kind of funnel we can get into of despair. Each of us has moments of difficulty. When we're not able to deal with them, we ask our seeds of joy to come up. In this way, we counterbalance the suffering.

So this formal mudita practice is just one way to help us begin to look into that possibility.

And as Ajahn Sumedho said, you can also think of mudita as the importance of being able to appreciate beauty and goodness in the things around us. So that's what Thich Nhat Hanh was calling up as seeds of joy—just the beauty of nature. You can call it forth for yourself. It's something we don't do that much: a conscious memory of wholesome, good things that you've done. Just simple, kind or generous or moral, ethical actions from your past.

We think of that as egotistical, but actually just bringing up a past goodness is like a present moment experience of that past goodness, and it's a kind of joy. It's a kind of happiness. It can really have quite an effect on us—especially when we can't think of anything good we've ever done—to really bring that up. Pay attention to goodness that others do.

I have a whole bunch of stories, but I just want to end with one example of this—from someone in a place of great, really great mental suffering, who was able to reach out to little things to help balance it.

This is from Good Morning America. The woman telling the story is named Lisa Beamer. She was the wife of Todd Beamer—I don't know if you remember his name, but he was on one of the planes on 9/11. He was on the plane that they brought down in Pennsylvania. His name became kind of well known. They said he's one of the guys who said, "Let's roll," and helped to bring down that plane.

So this was after 9/11, and she was on Good Morning America talking about missing her husband and their daughter. And then she told this story:

"I had a very special teacher in high school many years ago whose husband suddenly died of a heart attack. About a week after his death, this teacher shared some of her insight with a classroom of students. As the late afternoon sunlight came streaming in through the classroom windows, the class was nearly over. She sat down on her desk, and with a gentle look on her face, she paused and said, 'Class is over. I would like to share with all of you a thought that is unrelated to class, but which I feel is very important.

'Each of us is put here on earth to learn, share, love, appreciate, and give of ourselves. None of us knows when this fantastic experience will end. It can be taken away at any moment. Perhaps this is the power's way of telling us that we must make the most out of every single day.'

She went on, speaking to the students—and Lisa Beamer was one of those students:

'So I would like you all to make me a promise. On your way to school or on your way home, find something beautiful to notice. It doesn't have to be something you see. It could be a scent—perhaps the scent of freshly baked bread coming out of someone's house. Or it could be the sound of the breeze slightly rustling the leaves in the trees. Or the way the morning light catches one autumn leaf as it falls gently to the ground. Please look for these things and cherish them. Although it may sound trite to some, these things are the stuff of life—the little things you're put on earth to enjoy, the things we most often take for granted.'

The class was completely quiet. We all picked up our books and filed out of the room silently. That afternoon, I noticed more things on my way home from school than I had that whole semester. Every once in a while, I think of that teacher and remember what an impression she made on all of us. And I try to appreciate all of those things that sometimes we all overlook."

CHAPTER 17

Investigating Anattā: Clinging

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this retreat talk, Carol Wilson offers a practical, experiential approach to understanding anattā (not-self), moving beyond philosophical concepts to direct investigation. Rather than waiting for some dramatic breakthrough or treating anattā as a distant achievement, she invites practitioners to notice how the sense of self arises and passes away moment to moment through clinging. Drawing on Ajahn Buddhadāsa's teaching that emptiness of self is 'truly normal and natural,' she emphasizes recognizing both when 'I-ing' and 'my-ing' are present and when they are absent.
> Wilson explores several domains where clinging creates the sense of self: physical sensations and the body, vedanā (feeling tone), and emotions. She illustrates with vivid examples—from walking in cold wind to discovering a favorite mug on retreat—how self arises through contact and grasping, following the pattern of paṭicca samuppāda (dependent origination). She pays particular attention to how certain emotions feel like our 'core identity,' making them especially difficult to see as passing phenomena.
> The talk culminates in examining 'self-referencing'—the mind's habitual tendency to locate itself in experience for security. Wilson suggests that liberation isn't about destroying the ego but about withdrawing identification from whatever arises, allowing the natural peace and openness of awareness to reveal itself. She concludes with the Buddha's teaching to Bāhiya: when the seen is merely what is seen, 'just this is the end of suffering.'

So I'm happy to be here. In case some of you don't know me, my name is Carol Wilson. I'm happy to see you all here.

Tonight, I want to talk about investigating anattā. And it looks like it's going to end up being a two-part talk, or else it would be really, really long. So I'll make it two parts.

To the best of my understanding, whatever the Buddha taught, he wasn't teaching in order to have people acquire another philosophical concept. He wasn't teaching a body of knowledge that he wanted people to learn. But as he said over and over, he's just teaching what we need to know to free our hearts and minds from suffering. And that's true also in his teaching about anattā, the sense of no-self.

I say that because so often this particular characteristic of existence—the three characteristics together: anicca, impermanence; dukkha, suffering or unsatisfactoriness; and anattā, no-self—which are just the way that all conditioned phenomenal existence is, just how it is—of those three, often anattā is the one that makes people crazy. I don't mean literally crazy. We're already crazy. If we understood enough, then we'd be more sane. But thinking about it, trying to figure it out, trying to understand it in a philosophical way—that's how we tend to approach things—that makes us crazy. And that's not how I want to talk about it tonight. I'd like to investigate anattā, or more the feeling of the sense of self, in a very concrete way, using our practice.

The other thing people often tend to do in terms of anattā, if they're not just trying to think their way through it and getting crazy, is to wait. So many people say this in different ways: they're waiting in their practice, or measuring their idea of whether their practice has any benefit, by waiting for some big anattā flash, after which everything's changed, no more sense of self, life is copacetic and there are no more problems. I don't know if that relates to anybody here.

And the other way people relate to this is: "That could never happen to me. That's somewhere else down the road." All of this is really holding the idea of anattā as some state other than here, something to be achieved that isn't already true. And that's just not the case.

As with so much of what the Buddha's teachings reveal, it's simply a matter of recognizing our experience more accurately, and then responding to that more accurate recognition in the obvious way that makes sense. We stop suffering so much.

So rather than waiting around—follow the breath, in, out, in, out, notice the sensations, okay, okay, but when's it going to happen?—rather than practicing like that, it's more like recognizing when sense of self is present, recognizing when it's absent.

Just personally, what I've experienced in my own life is not that there was some big moment after which I got anattā and before which I didn't. It's more the image that Suzuki Roshi gives: if you go out in a rainstorm and you get totally drenched, you know it. It's not like that. It's more like walking in a fog. You're walking in a fog and you don't realize you're getting wet. But when you come inside, you're completely soaked to the bone. Yet you couldn't point to the moment where that happened. That's another way of looking at it.

So what keeps us from recognizing just the way things are, just the facts? Ramana Maharshi once wrote that the idea of self is like a ghost which is caused by the play of shadows. If you look closely, the ghost vanishes. The ghost was never there. So also with the sense of self. So long as one does not look closely at it, it continues to give trouble. But when one looks for it, it is found not to exist.

With our practice, with our mindfulness, with the wisdom—sati-paññā, just mindfulness and wisdom at the point of contact, just noticing what's arising free of conception—we have the tools in any given moment to look more accurately, to recognize more accurately, to really get interested in what am I calling "me" in any particular moment, if there is a sense of me or mine, or if there's not.

There's one sutta where someone asked the Buddha, "What is it that liberated ones know? How would you sum it up?" There are lots of different ways to answer this. But in this particular sutta, he says that having heard that nothing is worth clinging to, the liberated one directly knows everything. Having heard that nothing is worth clinging to, he fully understands everything.

And Bhikkhu Bodhi in his commentary on this says: "He does not cling to any formation by way of craving and views. He does not become agitated because of craving, and thus personally realizes nibbāna through the extinguishing of all kilesas, of all torments of mind, of all defilements."

Does not cling by way of craving and views.

Realizes that nothing is worth clinging to. So yes, we're back to the familiar pith teaching, the core of pretty much everything. If you had to boil the Buddha's teaching down into one little line, that would be it: nothing is worth clinging to.

But rather than going into "oh no, not again, I know I can't give up clinging," what we can do, what I'm proposing tonight, is to explore in our own experience the nature of clinging—and in particular, the clinging that manifests in any particular moment as a sense of me or mine.

Non-clinging, really. Supreme truth, liberation through non-clinging. That's truly at the heart of whatever form of practice we're doing. Whether it's concentration or samatha practice, it's non-clinging. All the brahma viharas, wisdom practice, mindfulness practice—non-clinging is essential. Nothing works when we're clinging. All the practices open up by themselves when the heart and mind is not agitated through clinging.

I'm sure by now everybody knows from your own experience various ways that clinging is suffering. It's pretty clear in some ways. We can kind of get it that holding on to particular objects or particular experiences that are going to change causes suffering. It doesn't mean we don't still do it, but we do have the basic understanding—that's not really rocket science—although we still do it, and that's the interesting thing.

But on a more subtle level, the clinging that perhaps is more difficult to see through—and in many cases, in my experience, is so familiar that it's difficult to recognize—is the clinging to aspects of experience that create the sense of self. Basically, clinging to form, to mind and form, nama-rupa, to the body, to ideas, to perceptions, to thoughts, to emotions, to formations, to views, ideas about ourselves. A lot of these things we don't even recognize are arising, never mind recognize that we're clinging to them—the basic habits of mind that are based in inaccurate understanding, inaccurate recognition of our mind and body.

Tonight I want to give more of an overview and point to some different ways we can explore when we're clinging in that way.

So the first thing really is just to get interested—not afraid of, not aversive to, but interested whenever we notice the feeling of me and mine, of I. Just to meet it as another arising experience, literally the same as you'd notice a sound or any other thought. We need to recognize when it's here.

But also recognize—and this is something that Ajahn Buddhadasa, the famous Thai forest monk who died perhaps fifteen years ago, talks about—the nature of mind when it's not agitated by clinging, when it's not distracted by being caught up in reactions to any particular experience. That emptiness of self, translated as "voidness" in English by his translator (I don't like that so much), but the nature of our heart and mind is naturally empty of self, naturally pure, naturally clear, naturally peaceful.

This isn't some state that we're striving to achieve, where we finally have dug up and annihilated all sense of self and can finally rest at ease. Buddhadasa points out over and over that along with recognizing when we're caught up—when there's this sense of need, this sense of struggle or agitation or conflict—it's equally, maybe more valuable and important, to recognize the nature of heart and mind when this is not present.

That emptiness of self, this kind of natural awareness, peaceful quality, open luminous quality, freedom from self is, in his words, truly normal and natural. Not a state we create when we get to some high level. It's truly a normal and natural way that we are. It's really how things are.

When we can recognize this—recognize when we feel like me-ing and my-ing, and recognize when that's not there—Buddhadasa talks about generating a contentment with voidness, generating a contentment with no sense of self, no sense of me or mine. As I go on, hopefully some of what I say will help point to why it may not be that easy or natural to really have contentment with voidness. As much as we resist our sense of self, we're back to clinging. We really, in some ways, like it, cling to it.

A simple example of how we can see that the sense of me being there or not is just a trick of perception—it's not about changing the circumstances: When I was walking home this morning, the wind was blowing and it was really cold. I don't like the cold. My body doesn't like the cold. So I was walking, the wind was blowing, and I felt my body contracting and shivering. Then the thought came in: "It's too cold. I don't like it. I've got to walk fast." Subtle resistance, sense of me walking fast, needing to get home to where it was warm.

Now, this isn't some huge dramatic suffering, just very mild, everyday experience. But definitely a sense of me clinging to wanting it to be different, clinging to the sense of hurrying home.

But then it can shift just like that. No clinging, no resistance—just walking, movement, the sense of coolness, the sense of sharpness, the sense of constriction. And that's it. There's no resistance, no clinging. Nothing is changed about the situation, but it's just coldness, sensations, walking, breeze. That's it.

In that moment, the clinging to wanting experience to be different, the resisting—which is really just clinging turned around—resisting the sensations creates the sense of me. Looking at that, it drops away.

The actual situation is no different. The sense of self in that moment simply isn't there, and there's no problem. It's still just as cold. My body still reacts uncomfortably to cold. I didn't get home any quicker. It just doesn't matter. It's simply not a problem.

You can see that's not a big deal. And I know, just as Ajahn Buddhadasa said, that everybody has many, many moments like that throughout the day—really noticing. Not like, "Oh yes, I'm having an experience of anattā," because then it's gone; you're back, you're having an experience. But just the simplicity of: "Oh, just this. Just this. It's like this." That's the beauty of our mindfulness practice.

Buddhadasa likes to use the terms in the Pali language: ahaṅkāra and mamaṅkāra, which translate as "I-ing" and "my-ing." For those of you whose first language isn't English, does that make sense? I-ing and my-ing—making it a verb rather than a subject, which is sort of how it actually is. Something is being created in the moment.

And when I-ing comes up, my-ing comes up, it feels really real, doesn't it? Because it feels as though, unexamined—at least for me—unexamined, it feels as though it's always there, doesn't it? I mean, I am always here. Maybe not "my," but I am always here. It's so familiar, and the more I try to analyze it, the more I try to think about it, the stronger it gets, doesn't it? Because I'm thinking about it, and it just gets into this big knot.

This is from Dzigar Kongtrul Rinpoche. I like this a lot. He's talking about a Tibetan word, shenpa, which he says usually refers to the raw experience of the suffering of ego-clinging. He says it's generally translated as attachment, but that's not sufficient. Shenpa is a pervasive discomfort, the experience of I, me, and mine—all the wants, needs, aversions, hopes, and fears that come out of that. The discomfort of shenpa can be vague and subtle, like having a stone in your shoe, or a sour note that plays throughout the day. I love that—just something's a little off and it bugs you. Or when the ego is strongly challenged, shenpa can be the painful charge of the negative emotions. By seeing and accepting the mechanisms of shenpa and self-importance, they no longer have a hold on us.

That's exactly what Buddhadasa is saying. Simply by seeing, understanding, and accepting how this sense of shenpa, of self, is created, it no longer has a hold on us. The main attitude on the path to peace is to accept whatever our experience brings—accept it and also recognize it accurately.

So that's what the invitation really is: to use our sati-paññā, our mindfulness-wisdom, to get interested, to notice the presence of I-ing and my-ing, whether just when it begins or however long it's been there. It doesn't matter. Notice it and then really get interested. Bring investigative wisdom, dhamma-vicaya, to really explore—not thinking about, but by bringing our attention to the actual experience in that moment that feels like me or mine.

I can feel it personally, and it's different each time, but there's a sense of a kind of contraction, that clinging, that holding on to something. That's already saying too much—holding on to something. But just a little sense of... it shrinks, it limits things. I can feel it.

So the first thing when we start to explore—this is Buddhadasa again—is that we see the sense of self is merely a condition that arises when there's grasping and clinging in the mind. That's all. This big, seemingly huge, endless monolith we spend all our practice trying to chip away and chip away and dynamite and fight with and hate ourselves over—it's just a momentary condition that arises when there's grasping and clinging in the mind.

So that gives us a little hint about how often grasping or clinging arises in our experience—or my experience, I'll speak for myself. I mean, I really get why non-clinging is the centerpiece of liberation. It's merely a condition that arises and passes, born out of contact with a sense object, with an experience, with a mental object.

I use this story all the time because it's so simple, but it really works. Notice the birth of self. It can be really clear. It's great on retreat. You have so much time to explore this. Because when things aren't so busy, when all the activities are kind of stripped away, you can notice in relationship to little things the birth of self. And the self feels just as big.

It doesn't matter if it's born in relation to a little thing.

So here's a story I always use. Once I was on retreat over at the retreat center, a long retreat, and I was pretty quiet. Things were just flowing. I mean, not always, but it was relatively what we misleadingly call a good time in practice. I was noticing things. I liked how it was going. Not a lot of suffering.

And I noticed this one time—over there you walk into the dining room and there's a big shelf with all the mugs and cups and dishes. At that time, we used to have many different kinds of mugs. Now they have more similar ones, but back then they were all different, just what people had left. And I'd just go, take a mug, take my dishes, eat, go.

One time, way into the retreat, I got a mug, I was getting my tea, and as I sat down I started thinking, wow, this mug is really the perfect mug. The good color, it fits my hand, it feels good on my mouth. And right in that moment there is: I like this mug, I want this mug, I want this mug again. It was so clear in that moment—the birth of me. Me. Me and my mug. Very clear.

So I sat there and instead of just being present with the tea, I thought, should I save it? We're not supposed to save it. Should I take it back to my room? We're not supposed to take it. No one will know and who cares anyway. But no, then every time I wanted tea I'd have to go back to my room and then come back here. And at the rate I was walking, that would take half the day, so forget it.

So then I put the mug back. Oh, death of me and my mug. It was just free and easy and fine. Incredibly complicated—that sense of self made everything complicated. It restricts what had been open, easy, just as it is. Everything gets quite constricted, limited. The mind, the consciousness gets limited. Everything gets complicated. You can feel in that moment the sense of grasping, almost like an inner contraction. You can feel that sense of me and then all the complications, the papañca that ensues from it. Put it down, went away. It was gone.

But I came back the next day and I looked for it. So already there was complication. And I found it. And I took it. And I went through the whole thing again, even more. And at that point, the suffering of it—I know this sounds ridiculous, like the suffering of liking a mug—but when your mind's quiet, you can really see it. This is ridiculous. All this planning, all this agitation, all this wanting. And I put it down, and that was it. It was over.

If only it could always be that easy.

But this is exactly dependent origination. This is the birth and death of me-ing and my-ing that happens for each of us hundreds of times in a day. It's a real blessing to notice the birth and notice the death. What we tend to do is notice the me and my mug, but we don't notice the death of it. Then we notice the me that doesn't like the complication, then we notice the me that's putting it back, then we notice the me that's wanting the next thing. And we forget to notice the times when there's no me-ing and my-ing, in between. Really important to notice the birth and death.

This is the dependent origination. This is from the Buddha, talking about this middle part, the continuation of the round of dependent origination: "On seeing a form with the eye"—like the mug—"he lusts after it if it's pleasing, or dislikes it if it's unpleasing. He abides with mindfulness of the body unestablished, with a limited mind."

And that's exactly how it feels. As soon as there's that clinging to something, the me and my arising, the mind feels limited, the heart feels limited.

He delights, and engaged as he is, whatever feeling he feels, he delights in that feeling, welcomes it, and remains holding to it. As he does so, delight arises in him. Now delight in feeling is clinging. With his clinging as condition, being comes to be. With being as condition, birth. With birth as condition, aging and death, sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief and despair come to be. Such is the origin of this whole mass of suffering.

So that's just talking about one moment of contact in this moment of life—that lusting after, that sense of me arising, the constriction of mind, and the whole mass of suffering. Notice when that arises. Notice when it dies. Notice the sense of limitlessness again, of space, of ease, of peace. It's not like some huge light going off. The sense of self simply fades and dies. Anatta is truly normal and natural. When there's no grasping or clinging in the mind, it's just the way things are.

I want to talk about a few areas—I won't by any means cover all of them tonight—but just a few of the grosser areas of our nama-rupa experience, of our mind and body experience, where clinging so easily creates a strong sense of me-ing and my-ing, and where we so often overlook or don't recognize the clinging. With the mug, I use that because it's a simple, obvious example. Of course it's recognizable. I didn't think the mug was me—it was the me who wanted it. But there's clinging to much more from experience that really seems so like me, where we think, "This is really where the sense of self is. Of course this is me. I'm not clinging to it. It is me." That's where our sati-pañña, our mindfulness wisdom, becomes so helpful.

The first and most obvious area—and in some ways the easiest to see through—is clinging and grasping that arises in relationship to sense contact with rupa, with our body, with physical experience. What I've found really helpful is nothing new; it's mindfulness. It's that willingness, that ability to meet with our attention the bare sensory experience, to see and tell the difference, to recognize accurately the sense experience without confusing it with the conceptual overlay. This is what starts to help us see when there's clinging.

Simple examples: when you're sitting and there's that pain, we talk about this all the time—the difference between noticing burning sensation and the overlay of "my back is hurting" or "I've hurt my back" or "I need to do X, Y, and Z." Just sensing.

Even more subtle is when there's a sense contact—say there's itching, or a lightness, a pleasant physical feeling—and the attention just connects, notices lightness. But do you notice how often there's a visual overlay, just a visual image of the body or that part of the body? Which is fine if we recognize this is seeing and this is feeling, burning or tickling. But when we don't recognize it, when we don't even recognize the seeing, there can be a subtle holding to that image as the description of my body. Do you see what I mean?

When I'm sitting, there can be periods where every single moment there's a lot of physical sensation and there's just a noticing of it. I don't have to be noting, just noticing—tightness or burning or tingling, just there. But with each one, there's a picture of my knee, there's a picture of my back, there's a picture of my whole body, there's a picture of my face noticing. And if I don't recognize that image, there can be this subtle sense of clinging—oh, that's me. It just feels like me. I'm not saying this is true for anybody else. It's just an example. Look and see.

Or "I'm hungry." It's the same as when I was walking in the wind today. The difference between sensations—bubbling sounds, gurgling, a feeling of discomfort—it's just that. "I'm hungry" is a thought. Just a thought. But clinging to the thought or holding to the sensation is immediately a sense of me. And then when you notice the sense of me, don't fight it or try to think about it. Just notice that's the next arising experience. Bubbling, gurgling, "Oh, I'm so hungry," sense of me. Feels like this.

Just notice how it comes and goes. Notice how when you're just breathing and there's just sensations of coolness, you can't even say that's a body—never mind my body. At times there's absolutely no form. There's just sensations, and as far as your actual experience, it's sensation arising in space. Can we just notice that? Let it be, or notice if right on top of it comes a sense of, "No, my body." And then just notice that. Get a sense of what I mean. Just explore this.

I don't want to say a lot more about body because we really pay a lot of attention to that. But I'm talking about the actual experience, not the idea of the body. The idea of the body, of course, we're much more likely to cling to. But that's actually not the physical—that's an idea. That's mental. That's sankhara.

Another aspect is vedana, the feeling tone. You all know what that is, right? The pleasant, unpleasant, neutral feeling tone. It's a mental experience, rather subtle often, that arises with every sense contact. So every sound, each of us will experience a particular sound as pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral—every thought, every physical sensation.

And obviously, as we talk about it, because so often it's not the thing we pay attention to, it's often not the predominant experience. But it's very easy for a clinging to arise, an identification to arise, so that we experience, say, the pleasant feeling as being either me or mine—and not recognizing that that little clinging is going on. We can get into quite a little world of identification and complexity based on this clinging to pleasant or unpleasant vedana. Yes, we cling to unpleasant too. And not recognizing that is very easy to overlook.

For example, in the sitting—I just use sitting as examples because that's what we're doing—something's happening, and finally it's going right. Either the breath is smooth and the mind isn't wandering as much as it was before, or that's if you're someone who thinks what should be happening is that you should be with the breath and it should be smooth. The person next to you thinks that what should be happening is open awareness, and you're not even really noticing the breath, but the mind is just connecting with each arising experience and there's no hesitation and there's no wavering and it's really clear and it's really penetrating—that's what they think should be happening. Someone else thinks something else should be happening. I'm just saying this so that you know there isn't one thing that's supposed to be happening. Our thinking that there is—that's the problem.

But anyway, it's finally going the way you think it's supposed to be. So take smooth breath, nice, peaceful, really noticing it, being there with it, the mind isn't wandering, and you even think, "I know this is going to change. I know this is going to change, and I'm not attached to this breath. I know it's going to change."

And of course, it does change. And you really thought you weren't attached to that sensation. So why are you so totally bummed out when it changes? Why?

There are lots of different things that can be happening, but one thing is that we weren't clinging—we could see we were clinging to the breath—but we were completely overlooking the pleasant feeling and totally clinging to the pleasant feeling. That contraction of me around that pleasantness. Not even the thought "it's finally going right" prior to that. "This is it. This is so nice."

I remember one time I was on retreat, and I don't even know what was happening, but something in the walking that I thought was really good and I liked it. My teacher—I think it was Sharon at the time—said, "Okay, you have to note 'pleasant.'" That's all she said. I knew what that meant. I went back and had a total little minor temper tantrum because I knew that as soon as I consciously noticed the pleasant, the sense of selfing around it would not keep on being created. You'd think I would like that, but we're attached to that. In some way, the sense of self, the clinging—whether it's to the pleasant or whatever—is so comfortable and familiar that even though we think we want to be free from it, given the choice, and we're given the choice millions of times in a day, we often go, "I want to cling to the pleasant. Don't tell me to notice the pleasant."

I'm going to walk, and I'm going to note, note, note, but I'm going to overlook pleasant. Because if I do that, the gratification of me having pleasant goes away. What goes away? Just that sense of me. That's all that goes away. It's really pathetic. It is. How many millions of times have I experienced the ease of—ah, death of the self? And how many more millions of times do I think, "Yeah, but not yet. Let's just enjoy this a little bit."

So, just noticing if something is pleasant or unpleasant, if there's that sense of mine or me around it. And just have a kind of eye out to explore. As Chokyi Nyima says, really watch the fickleness of the mind, especially in terms of vedana. Notice in our mind how easily it's influenced just by a pleasant or an unpleasant sight, thought, sound, anything. The mind is so fickle. We just have a pleasant sight and it influences us into an immediate mood, and then a whole story comes from it. Right? Then there's an unpleasant sound. The mind goes off into a whole other mood, a whole other story.

If we just notice that series of events, rather than jumping on each one as "yes, this is me, yes, this is mine," just notice. It's amazing. It's amazing how far the mind goes, how fast, based on how little. And if you can just kind of get interested in watching that without hating it, without fearing it, without being afraid to see it—"Oh yeah, look at that me arising so strong about the noise that person is making in this sacred hall. Wow, that's amazing." And in that moment of just getting interested, "wow, that's amazing," in a way that's a moment of death of that sense of self, because the energy has moved from the clinging to "I like, I don't like," the pleasant, the unpleasant, to simple awareness. Wow. It's like that. In that moment, that's a death of self.

And it's just—I like to call it like a Tai Chi move. You don't actually have to do anything other than withdraw the clinging, all the identification, from whatever's happening. Say the pleasant, liking the pleasant, holding to the pleasant. "Oh, holding to the pleasant feels like this." We don't have to get rid of anything. We're not here to destroy the ego. We don't have to be afraid of experiencing a really strong sense of me-ing and my-ing. It's just a momentary arising experience, however subtle, however strong. And that freedom from it is just always right here. "Ah, me-ing feels like this." In that moment, that me-ing has died.

Nothing lasts more than an instant anyway. When we're paying attention, we'll see that. We can't not see it because that's how it is. We just, in a way, need to trust that more in our experience. If you feel like you have to set up some kind of amazing conditions in order to create the state of non-self, well, that gets beyond us and way out in the future. But if you really can have the—it's not a faith, it's just knowing that it's already how it is. There is no steady state you or me. There isn't one. So if you recognize that, your world isn't going to fall apart, because it's already like that. That's what's so amazing to me, just to me.

Okay, another huge area, and I'll talk a little bit about it but I don't want to go into too much, is emotions. I find emotions in some ways one of the most tenacious aspects of mental experience—tenacious in terms of really feeling like the emotion is me. So often we think the presence of particular difficult emotions is the barrier to peace, and the presence of the beautiful emotions when we're clinging to them can feel like the barrier to peace. But of course it's not. It doesn't even mean the emotions have to go away. The sense of real suffering from them is this identifying with them, clinging to them, thinking they are me or mine, either one.

So for each of us, I think we each have certain emotions that feel—I was saying to someone today, I forget what words we were using—they feel more like they're really me.

Disappointment feels like this. I can notice it. I don't go too far down the road. I know it comes. I know it goes.

For many people, the wholesome emotions are like this—they're ones that they easily see are not who they are. In fact, often to the point that they don't even recognize, "Oh, yeah, well, that's happiness. That's not me. That's going to go." You don't give it any weight.

But the other ones, whatever they are for you—often they're self-hatred, or feelings of loneliness, or the judging voice, or feelings of worthlessness, or for some people a kind of deep sadness, loneliness, whatever it might be for you. And it can be different for each of us. There are certain ones that when they come in, they're often not even recognized at first, because this is really the core manifestation of who I am. And even though it seems like it just arose in this moment, I know that I just haven't noticed it. Because it's been there all along, but I've been being distracted by feeling the breath and noticing this other stuff. But now, here it is. Self-hatred. I'm home. This is really who I am.

And we wouldn't say that we were attached to it. Oh no, we're not attached to this. I hate it, for God's sake. I'm practicing so it'll go away. But in the moments of its arising, this is really like a clinging to—this is me, me and my-ing, my self-hatred. I'm this loathsome worm, whatever your particular way of saying it is.

And the first thing is, this is really one of the aspects of what's called sakkāya-diṭṭhi, which is like personality or identity view—really this clinging to any particular mental formation, any saṅkhāra emotion, as me or mine.

So first, just start noticing which ones, which particular emotions creep in under your radar. And then you might notice the sense of me around them, the clinging. But also, even if you don't notice that, do notice when that emotion goes away. You might not notice the moment it leaves, but notice when it's gone—just like I was saying about noticing when there's no sense of self. Notice when these so-called core personality emotions are gone. And really notice that they're gone. If your mind says stuff like, "Well, I'm just not noticing it. It's not really gone because I know it's who I am," just notice stuff like that. When it's not there, it's really not there. When it comes back, it really comes back. That's okay.

But notice how emotions then lead to thoughts like, "Oh, sadness. This is who I am. This is what my life is all about." And then of course the thoughts just carry on and get so complex. I think I'll talk more about thoughts the next time.

But there's the resistance, or the suffering from resisting the emotion itself, and there's also the kind of subtle clinging contraction around it: This is me. This is mine. Notice that. Notice the difference. To use Ajahn Sumedho's language, the difference between "takes sadness"—just sadness—and "my sadness." I'm so sad. This is really the depths of despair. How can I keep going? Whatever your story is.

The difference between "my sadness" and "sadness is like this"—feeling it just as fully, perhaps even more fully. Sadness is like this. Despair is like this. Loathing is like this. Joy is like this. The difference when there's the me-ing and my-ing versus when there's just the emotion as it is, received in awareness—this is really a huge difference.

You see, we don't have to fix our personality. We don't have to analyze any of the emotions. We don't have to get lost in the story about me, and we don't have to push away the story of me. We just notice it. Oh, sadness is like this. The thoughts that arise that make the sadness stronger are those thoughts. How can I feed the sadness? How can I feed identifying with it? Just keep going into those thoughts. Oh yeah, and another thing. Oh yeah, and another thing. This feeds the sadness, feeds the anger, feeds whatever it is. Tuning back to awareness—oh, the sadness is like this. Oh, those thoughts come and go. Sadness is like this. This feeds the awareness, not the sadness.

And we can flip back and forth, back and forth, in every moment. And that's okay. It can be fascinating to do that back and forth—where you're really feeling the me-ness, the I-ness of a difficult emotion, and it's just unbearable. And the next moment: oh, it's like this.

I was sitting, I think it was in Burma a few years ago. It was really one of the more emotionally difficult retreats I'd done in years and years. For some reason, just this really intense despair and dukkha-filled emotions would come up. And I was pretty mindful. I was really watching it. I would notice an image come, I would notice the thought, I would notice the emotion start. I was really aware of the whole train. But each time it came, it kept coming so strong that I would get really caught in the me-ness of it, in the unbearableness of it. The emotion was: this is too much, I can't bear it. That's actually what the emotion was.

And I could see the whole process, but there kept being the sense of me, of mine, in which I really can't bear it. For a while, I just kept going on like that. I can't bear it. I can't bear it. And finally, I got really fascinated. What is the clinging here? I mean, I'm not clinging to that image. I wasn't clinging to the story. I wasn't really, after a while, hating the emotion, but I wasn't holding on to it either. And I kept thinking: I'm really seeing the whole thing coming and going. What's the clinging that I'm not seeing? Because I know when I really see, "Oh, that's me-ing"—just in that awareness, it might still be there, but the whole texture of it changes.

And this is something I've really been interested in. What I finally saw was what the clinging was to. When that emotion would come up—this is unbearable, this is so intense—the sense of me, not the emotion itself, but just that sense of me, which is very subtle, just that contraction, was so familiar, was so comfortable. That's actually what the clinging was to. It's totally unbearable, but "me"—you know, I'm home.

And that was fascinating, because since then I can recognize so often this subtle sense of me that refers experience back to me, and that little contraction of clinging keeps the whole cycle going until the clinging releases.

So the question that then came up is not so much about how to understand this emotion, how to get rid of it, how to fix it, how to purify my mind—but really: am I willing to be without self-referencing? Am I really willing to just let things arise—emotions, sights, sounds, thoughts, sensations, whatever—just to be so present that there's not even the tiniest referencing back to me?

And it's not a choice I can just make in my mind. But starting to notice that clinging to the habit of self-referencing, and the feeling at times of disconcertion—I don't like to be without self-referencing.

This comes not from a Buddhist teacher, but from one of these contemporary nondual teachers: "Self-referencing is the mind's tendency to locate itself. When it's realized that there's no self apart from the perceiving, then the tendency to try to find oneself in any experience, insight, or concept ceases. What I'm talking about is a condition where the mind has no compulsive need to understand in terms of ideas or concepts or beliefs—a condition where you are no longer referencing the mind, your feelings, or emotions for security in any way."

Just imagine that: a condition where you are no longer referencing the mind, thoughts, feelings, or emotions for security in any way. So immediate. Just what's arising.

The sense of self is not some steady, unchanging thing that we have to get rid of. It simply arises in a moment of misperception, of clinging, and it vanishes when that misperception, when that clinging vanishes—which of course it will in any given moment. This self-referencing, trying to locate ourselves with thoughts, with moods, with feelings, with emotions—it's so familiar. We do it so automatically. And often we're suspicious of when we don't do it.

There's a phrase Ajahn Buddhadasa uses in another context, but I like it in this one: "volunteering for suffering." Do we want to volunteer for suffering? Then we can add on this whole sense of self-referencing.

I'll give you a simple example, and sometimes it pushes people's buttons a little bit—so that's good. One time when I was in Burma teaching, I was sitting and just noticing whatever was happening. I was noticing tickle, tickle, tickle, and just the different things, and then I would notice cough, cough, and then I was noticing heat, heat, and then tickle, tickle. This went on for a while.

You know how when you're deep in retreat, you really do stop referencing yourself? You just notice what's happening. You don't put it together into a story. So I was just noticing these different things. After a day or so, suddenly: "Oh, I've got bronchitis. This is bronchitis. I recognize this." Immediately there was this sense of referencing. This is what it is. This is my history. I've had bronchitis a certain number of times in the last five years. I get really sick. I can't afford to get sick. When this retreat is over, I have all these things I have to do. Total panic. Total me. A lot of suffering.

And I thought, wait a minute—that's a story. Just go back. Tickle, tickle, cough, cough. That whole thing just completely fell away. Tickle, tickle, cough, cough is just what it is.

Then I started playing with it, this volunteering for suffering. I'd think, "But maybe it really is bronchitis and I have to deal with it," and all of the emotions would come back. What am I going to do? I have to go to the doctor. My mind was malleable enough that I could play with it.

Do you get a sense of what I mean? Often we can't play with it. That sense of "I'm going to jump on the description, I'm going to jump on the self-referencing," and once I'm on, there's no way off. Volunteering for suffering.

Are we willing to even explore the possibility of being without self-referencing? The way the Buddha described this—and I'll end with this—was when he was talking to Bahiya. This is really that way of perceiving where there's no self apart from the perceiving.

The Buddha was talking to Bahiya. He said, "When in the seen is merely what is seen, in the heard is merely what is heard, in the imagined and what is thought in the mind is only that, when in the cognized is merely what is cognized, then, Bahiya, you will not be with that. When, Bahiya, you are not with that, then you will not be in that. When, Bahiya, you are not in that, then you will be neither here nor beyond nor in between the two. Just this is the end of suffering."

Neither here nor there nor in between the two. When the seen is merely what is seen, just this is the end of suffering.

That's not a steady state. That's in any particular moment.

CHAPTER 18

Investigating Anattā: Personality View

Carol Wilson · 1h00

In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines sakkāya-diṭṭhi—the deeply ingrained habit of perceiving any aspect of our ever-changing experience as 'me' or 'mine.' Drawing on teachings from Ajahn Sumedho, Ajahn Buddhadāsa, and the suttas, she illuminates how personality view forms through a chain of perception, thinking, and solidified views that we then believe and defend.

Wilson explores how the Buddha describes four ways we identify with the five khandhas (aggregates): regarding form as self, self as possessing form, form as in self, or self as in form—and how this identification leads to agitation and suffering. She offers the powerful teaching that we cannot create an ultimately peaceful self through our thoughts; the sense of self is intrinsically unsatisfying. Using vivid examples from daily life and retreat practice, she demonstrates how inaccurate perception leads to wrong view and how accurate perception of anicca (impermanence) naturally releases clinging.

The talk offers deeply practical guidance for working with sakkāya-diṭṭhi in meditation and daily life. Rather than needing to deconstruct every identification, Wilson suggests we can simply recognize 'sakkāya-diṭṭhi is like this'—shifting our allegiance from believing in personality to resting in awareness. This disenchantment (nibbidā) with the aggregates isn't revulsion but rather a natural letting go when we see clearly that nothing can provide lasting satisfaction. True liberation, she concludes, doesn't come from wanting to be liberated, but from not being moved by conditions.

So tonight I want to talk about sakayaditthi, which is another aspect of anattā, usually translated as identity view or personality view.

I don't know if you remember from last week—it's not a test—but I quoted the scripture, the sutta that Ajahn Buddhadasa quoted about all that one needs to know: having heard that nothing is worth clinging to, one directly knows everything. Having heard this, one fully understands everything. And then Bhikkhu Bodhi's note explains that this means one does not cling once one fully understands everything. One does not cling either by way of craving or of views.

Last week I talked mostly about how craving creates a sense of self. Tonight I want to focus a little more on views. Of course, at the bottom of views is craving and clinging—that should go without saying, but I'll say it. But I want to talk more in terms of how views come to be and how we get lost in views, particularly sakayaditthi, personality view.

I like the way that Sayadaw U Lakkhana defined this one time. He defined sakaya as the stream of nāma-rūpa. Nāma-rūpa being mind and form, name and form—basically the five aggregates that, in the way the Buddha describes a human being, make up our experience: the aggregate of form, and then the mental aggregates of vedanā (feeling tone), perception, sankhāra (which is all the different mental formations, including intention), and consciousness. So he said sakaya is just this stream of ever-changing nāma-rūpa—the six sense objects, really, and the consciousness of them. And identity view happens when any aspect in any moment of this stream of nāma-rūpa is clung to or identified with as being me or mine.

As you can imagine, this happens all the time. It's a mistaken view of this compound, ever-shifting process of nāma-rūpa, of name and form—a mistaken view of it as self, as me or mine.

So what do we mean by view? How does a view form?

There's just a stream, for example, of seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, mental experience, awareness of consciousness. That's just going on and on and on. And when any particular one of that is clung to through grasping—much as I said last week—any of that nāma-rūpa, in that moment, it's like we pick it up, carry it with us with a perception of what it is. We think about it, we get it more complicated, we remember, we associate. And all of these are mental formations that turn into thoughts, which turn into a view—a description, giving meaning to something. And then we take that description, that view as being true, and cling to it. This can be very simple, happening all the time in any aspect of our mental and physical experience.

Like today, I have a thing going on with my shoulder, so I went to the physical therapist and she did her thing—fine, very nice. Came home, and then this other shoulder started hurting. And I could see, in that moment, my mind going, "No, we so much don't want this to be happening." And it really went there. And then I could see—I didn't actually go there too much—but that was the form, the physical experience, unpleasant physical experience. And then the thought: "No, this can't be happening. It's supposed to be getting better, not going to the other shoulder." And then the thoughts and the memories that make up this whole sakayaditthi sense of self-personality—I could see them starting. "It's always something. It's this shoulder, it's that shoulder, it's my back, it's my knees. Ever since I was thirty, there's always been something wrong with this body." I could just see it going, along with the appropriate emotions.

Now, that could go without clinging to it. You know what I mean? It could just kind of be running, and it could just be aware of, "Oh yeah, that's thinking." But as soon as there was that "No, we so much don't want this to be happening," and then the whole story—the thoughts, the emotions, and the believing that view, "I'm this kind of a person with this kind of a body, this is my history"—right there, you have basically the history of your whole life, so it would seem.

The thing with views, though, and this we really need to notice, is how limited they are. Because of course, that's not a true and accurate reflection of my whole life. It feels like it.

It seems like it in the moment. And in terms of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, personality view, the point is really that it felt like me—one solid me going back to whenever, the time I was born, having to deal with this particular situation. Obviously, that's not rocket science. That happens all the time.

I want to give you another definition, the way Ajahn Sumedho talks about sakkāya-diṭṭhi. He talks about it in a couple of ways, and I like the way he discusses it informally. He says you can experience it in either a subtle way or a gross way.

The subtle is something I referred to last week. It's just that subtle sense of me here now—not even a specific thought, not a specific memory like I was describing with my shoulder, but just that subtle sense of me. If you had to put more words to it, it could be "the one who is mindful," "the one who is observing," "the one who is making choices." All those thoughts we get into—"the one who is thinking." That's already going further. It can be much more subtle, just that felt sense of me.

Or on a more gross and complex level, Ajahn Sumedho talks about it as really what we would classically, in regular speech, call our personality: our ideas about our behavior patterns, our memories, our cultural identifications—who we think of ourselves in terms of nationality, gender, race, family history, all that kind of stuff. Our moods, our particular personal history. Like, "I'm a person with limited energy, I'm tired, I can't do any more than this." That kind of stuff comes up all the time, doesn't it? And all the innumerable conditions that are constantly changing, but we don't often notice how much they're changing.

So, for example, "I'm tired, I'm a person with limited energy, I can only do so much"—as if that is the experience every single moment of every single day. Is anything that we're saying is me—"I'm a person who has a debilitating disease"—is that the actual experience every single moment of every single day and night? Or is it sometimes a physical experience, sometimes a thought, sometimes a mood, sometimes completely absent from the present moment experience? This is just something to hold as a question.

The ideas we get into: "I'm someone who could never really be free. I don't even know why I'm practicing because it's clearly hopeless for me." That's a personality view, which we then believe. And then that belief can actually color our succeeding thoughts and how we act.

Again, Ajahn Sumedho talks about how, on one level, we create ourselves with our thoughts. All these examples I gave—a perception like my perception of pain, then another perception of "now my other shoulder, what's she doing?"—and then all the memories, all the thoughts. We're creating ourselves through our thoughts: "I'm this, I'm that, I was this, I will be that, I've always been and I always will be."

And this is what I love that Ajahn Sumedho says. He says we cannot create an ultimately peaceful self. Not that we ever stop trying, but we cannot create an ultimately peaceful self. The sense of self is intrinsically non-satisfying, non-peaceful.

I think that's just an interesting idea to contemplate and see if we can really look at it that way, rather than, "Well, this particular self is unsatisfying and not peaceful, but if I could rearrange it and get it right, then..." And how much of one's meditation, at times, really, when I come down to it, is about getting myself to be a better self so things are more okay?

But this sense of telling ourselves stories, making it up as we go along, creating an intrinsically unpeaceful, unsatisfying self—this is based literally on inaccurate perception, which leads to wrong view. Sakkāya-diṭṭhi is one aspect of wrong view. I love that translation, diṭṭhi as "view." In the Eightfold Path, the first step is wise view, right view. To me, it's kind of a literal translation: we're seeing accurately, or we're perceiving inaccurately. Sakkāya-diṭṭhi, wrong view, is based on inaccurate perceptions and interpretation of our experience.

Nisargadatta Maharaj said: "Discovery cannot come as long as you cling to the familiar. As long as you have all sorts of ideas about yourself, you know yourself through the mist of these ideas. To know yourself as you are, you must give up all ideas. You cannot imagine the taste of pure water. You can only discover it by abandoning all flavorings."

In some way, what sakkāya-diṭṭhi is, is that we keep putting all different kinds of flavorings into our ideas about ourselves, coloring our perception, throwing out a whole description and taking that description to be the truth—and completely ignoring or overlooking the fact that five minutes later we have a completely different description, a completely different set of ideas, and believing that to be the truth, and believing both of them to be me. We just don't quite look at what we're doing, why we're believing it. Wrong view.

So how is a view formed? There's saññā, perception, which is just the recognition of a particular sense contact. Like if I hit the bell and you hear it and recognize, "That's the bell"—that's perception.

Perception leads to how we think about something—thinking. And thinking then can coagulate, kind of form itself into one big solid glob of a view. This is how things are.

This is a story a friend told me. She was on retreat in a big old house in Switzerland a few years ago. These big old wooden houses without much insulation are really quite creaky and noisy. Once in a while there's a creak outside here and it's like, "Oh my god, a creak! There shouldn't—god forbid—be any noise in this meditation room!" But in these old houses it's creak, creak, creak all over.

She said the meditation hall was upstairs, and right below it was the room used for walking meditation. It was her first retreat. She's Swiss, in Switzerland, and following the schedule, it was the sitting time. She was sitting, getting into the middle of the sitting, starting to feel, "Oh, I'm really getting with the breath now. I'm really getting quiet, starting to get nice." And then she heard creak, creak, creak. "Oh, somebody's walking downstairs. It's making such a noise." It just kept going and kept going.

And she said, "How can they do that? It's not the walking period. It's the sitting period. We all agreed to follow the regulations here and..." She wouldn't mind if I said this, but she's Swiss. You definitely follow timetables. You do it as you're supposed to do it. And she was getting really worried. "They're ruining my concentration! I was finally getting somewhere on this retreat. Really, they're completely wrong. This is the right way to do it."

So it went from perception to thinking about what was happening to a view of "I'm right, they're wrong. This is how things are supposed to be done."

And then she said, "Well, let me just come back and feel my breath again." She felt her breath. And as she felt her breath just being there, she realized she was leaning against the wall. And whenever she breathed, her back went out into the wall and made it creak. That was the sound she was hearing.

Wrong perception, inverted perception, leads to all kinds of thoughts and a view that we totally believe and get emotional about and act on. Then the correct perception—well, as you can imagine, all those thoughts went away. She really couldn't hold on anymore to how bad that person walking was. It's gone. It's free. I mean, she could have added another set of thoughts about what a stupid jerk she was and then got into hating herself for always jumping to conclusions. That's another thing, which isn't accurate either.

But you see what I mean? If the perception is inaccurate, but we don't recognize that, and the thoughts that follow from it we take to be real, and then the thoughts form into a view, and we already believe that—we maybe never even know anymore what the original perception was—and then we're off and running. This is basically, moment to moment, a very simplistic way of describing how sakkāya-diṭṭhi gets created in our mind stream, moment to moment.

It's of course not a steady state thing. It's not like you're sitting here with a solid personality that maybe somehow you're going to change to something else and then you'll be better. It's being created moment to moment.

So according to the Buddha—and I want to use some sutta references tonight—according to the Buddha, he talks about how we practice self-identification, how in the moment we practice creating sakkāya-diṭṭhi, and also ways we can practice that lead to the cessation of sakkāya-diṭṭhi.

First, one set definition. I know it's a little fiddly, but I want to put it out there because it's the way the Buddha talks about it. He describes the creation of sakkāya-diṭṭhi in any particular moment. When an uninstructed worldling—basically an unenlightened, normal person—in any particular moment, there are four different ways that one could regard form, or any of the other four aggregates, to create the sense of self. He says in any moment, one regards form as self,

Like regarding the body as self. The commentarial example is that form and self would be indistinguishable, like the flame and the color of a candle—you can't separate the two. That would be regarding form as self.

Another way is regarding self as possessing form. These are subtle, but they're different ways we relate. That would be like taking the mind or mentality as self, and it's possessing form the way a tree has a shadow.

The third one is regarding form as in self. That would mean the self is the formless, the mind, and form is within that, the way scent is within a flower.

And the fourth is self as in form, which would mean that the formless is like a self located within form—as if the self was a little jewel inside a box.

You see what I mean? A little fiddly. You don't need to remember all that. I just like to share it because these are slightly different angles that lead to the inaccurate perception of self in any relationship to form—either being form, having form, form within self, or self within form. And then the Buddha applies the same formula to vedana, feeling tone, to perception, to all the volitional formations, the sankharas, and to consciousness itself.

Then he goes on to describe how this brings us suffering and agitation: "How, bhikkhus, is there agitation through clinging?" Here he goes through that same analysis—basically an unlearned, unawakened person regards form as self, or self and form, the whole thing I just described. That form of his changes and alters. With the change and alteration of form, his consciousness becomes preoccupied with the change of form.

Can you relate to that? Just the slightest change of form and the consciousness becomes preoccupied with it. Agitation and a constellation of mental states born of preoccupation with the change of form remain obsessing his mind. Because his mind is obsessed, he is frightened, distressed, and anxious. And through clinging, he becomes agitated.

I love that passage because it's such a straight-out description of what the mind does—well, what my mind does all day long. A little twinge in my shoulder and the mind becomes obsessed with the change of form. A whole constellation of emotions and thoughts arise. It gets agitated. There's anxiety. And then, you know, it stops hurting. The mind forgets all about it, goes on to something else, and starts the same process all over again.

And it might not be about form—it might be about a thought. "Oh, I'm feeling so agitated, and before I was so calm. How did this restlessness get into my practice?" It's just the same thing. It may not be form; it may be a mood, it may be a feeling tone. We do that over and over and over. This is the creation of sakaya-ditti when we don't recognize it—in such a way that one is afflicted in body and afflicted in mind.

This is Bhikkhu Bodhi's translation: "He swallows these ideas with craving and views and takes his stand upon them and grasps hold of them."

Really, that's it. We take our stand. We fight to the death. "This is what's happening. I really am this kind of person. My body really is this. It really is my body." It's just so hard to see through the misperception, the thinking and the views.

So our practice really is to cultivate accurate, wise, right view. I mean, obviously, that's the whole practice of mindfulness. It's what we always say: just meet experience as it is, connected, without preconception, without confusing our ideas about the experience for the experience itself.

But we can't make the right perception arise just because we want it. Have you ever noticed that? We can't make the right view come. We can think in our mind, "I know that I'm identified here with these thoughts," but that doesn't really do a lot of good, does it?

I mean, it doesn't really let go of the clinging, because the clinging is there precisely because we're not recognizing accurately.

So the shift of perspective—and again, like I said, we can't make it happen—but I'm sure you know, I absolutely know you all know, over and over, the mystery of that moment when that shift happens.

For example, I'll just make up another particular story. There's an unpleasant sound. There's aversion. Just like my friend, it's bothering one's practice. One gets annoyed. And at some point in there, one's taking some part of that to be me or mine. Maybe it's the annoyance. Maybe it's the anger. And then the memories: "I'm such an angry person. This is my personality. It's because of X, Y, and Z reasons going back to when I was three. I understand it, but this is who I am."

And even when we try to say, "Okay, anger—it's really okay. Anger, anger. I can just be with anger. That's okay." We know the rap. But it's not really working, because at some point we're not seeing that view that really, "This is who I am, an angry person." Or "The anger is mine," you know, sort of like the shadow of the tree. "I'm not the anger, but somehow it's mine." Some way that there's that sakkāya-diṭṭhi, that personality view.

Or we even go to the space of, "It's okay, I'm really equanimous, just being with the anger." And you really are equanimous—but still, you're the person who's equanimous. You're the person.

And you can feel, as Sumedho says, there's no self that the thoughts can create, that our experience can create, that's really ultimately peaceful. So even being the equanimous person—"Okay, so I have this history of anger, that's okay"—it isn't really ultimately freeing. And somewhere back in there, we know it. Somewhere there's that feeling of still being kind of glitched up.

And then what I'm going to say, we all know: that shift that happens, sort of like magic, what we call insight, that aha moment where somehow, magically, the clinging to the view, the belief in the view just disappears. It releases, and it absolutely goes—that shift of perspective, that real shift from "I'm an angry person," or "I'm an angry person being equanimous," or whatever particular view, to just—oh, the way Sumedho says—"anger is like this." Not my anger. "Equanimity is like this." Not my equanimity.

No identification. No need to relate it to past or future. No need to make any story whatsoever. No need to move away. No need to move into. No need to fix. Just the "oh, anger's like this." Just a saṅkhāra arising and passing.

And it's so, as people say, it's so obvious, so simple, so peaceful. Why the heck do we get caught up again? That's to me the big question of spiritual practice. Why, for the love of God, do we get caught up again when it's so peaceful, so obviously free?

It's kind of a shift from being the personality to being the knowing. It's the way Ajahn Sumedho talks—I like it a lot. Nothing has to change. It's not about fixing the personality. But it's kind of a shift of loyalty, maybe, you know? From being so loyal to me being the angry person, to me being anything. "Anger's like this." Nothing to refer back to. Being the knowing.

That moment of insight, that moment where the perception shifts from that inaccurate, upside-down perception—perceiving any arising experience as being "me" or "mine" is one of the inverted perceptions that the Buddha talks about. Seeing anything coming and going as "me" or "mine." And it's one of the most subtle and pervasive, I would say.

And so what shifts, in really not putting our loyalty so much into our sakkāya-diṭṭhi, into our ideas about ourselves, what shifts is—oh, we just recognize more accurately.

And that's not something we can make happen, but it happens through steady, non-clinging attention.

It's just like those magic eye visual games—you know what I mean? They used to be very popular. They had books of them, just a page of two or three colors, graphic art with nothing representational about it at all. It's just design. There's nothing realistic about it. And if you look at it very steadily but without clinging, without focusing, without looking for anything—you just have to look very steadily and softly—suddenly a particular image will jump out. It'll look as though it's three-dimensional. That's part of the magic. And the other part is that where before you just saw little yellow and blue squiggles, little yellow and blue shapes, suddenly there are dinosaurs or hockey players or UFOs or whatever. And you really see it.

Now, it was there all the time, right? You didn't create it by doing something. You just allowed it to emerge through steady, non-conceptual attention. When you go back and look hard, it goes away. Or if you look away and look back, it's gone. But it's still there. Did it really go anywhere? It's still there. Both ways of perceiving are still there.

It's sort of like that when we've been perceiving something as me or mine—my anger, my history, my story—and then, oh, it's just this. All the dynamics might still be there. You could call up the same memories. There's the same physical sensation. You might still be experiencing anger. But that view, the thoughts and views leading to "this is who I am, my personality"—they're just gone.

So that shift of perspective is really what we're talking about when we talk about insight. A shift from being the personality to being the knowing.

I like the way Krishnamurti describes that quality of looking: "When you look totally, you will give your whole attention—your whole being, everything of yourself, your eyes, your ears, your nerves. You will attend with complete self-abandonment, and then there is no room for fear, no contradiction, and therefore no conflict."

You attend with complete self-abandonment. Basically, there's no room for self. It's just what there is.

So how do we keep getting tripped up, seduced back into identity view, into self-view, into the perception of any aspect of experience as self? How can we practice not to create this?

Here's something else from Sayadaw U Tejaniya that I found really interesting. This is from a retreat I sat with him. He was talking about how, in over thirty years as a monk and many years teaching Westerners, in his opinion one of the biggest hindrances for Westerners—really for people with a materialistic upbringing, a scientific type of mind—is self-doubt. Self-doubt in terms of trusting our insights into awareness, in terms of trusting the real liberating power of awareness.

He sees the cause of this self-doubt partly in how strong our personalities are and how strong our belief in and reliance on our personalities is. Even as much as we may not like our particular personalities, in a way it's like our refuge. It's the thing we absolutely believe. The personality, he says, is so often our reference point for who we are, for what things mean. And I would say ditto for our thoughts, which are what's creating our personality.

And so we get caught back into our personality—believing it, reacting to it, trying to fix it, relating to it over and over and over.

A story just came to mind that Steve Armstrong tells, and I've seen this too when I was in Burma. You put your shoes out when you go into the meditation hall. He said he came out once, and he had a really very nice pair of sandals, which would stand out among all the old, rubbery, corroded flip-flops. As Steve came out of the hall, a Burmese man was putting on Steve's slippers, about to walk away. Steve just kind of said, "Oh, what?" And the guy just said, "Oh, well," left them, and went away. He wasn't upset about it at all.

Now, for me at least—maybe not for you—but if I was doing something like that, I would be incredibly furtive about it. Checking around, making sure no one was watching. And if I got caught? Where my personality would go with that... it would be all about me and how I felt. Either way, it would be about me.

But for this guy? Just, "Oh well, I guess I won't take them," and he walked away. No problem. The personality, "who I am," wasn't the center of the world for him.

I don't know about you, but in here, this personality is a lot of times the center of the world. And it's a pretty limited, up-and-down, cockamamie world, I'll tell you.

Why do we choose to make our personality the center of the world? I don't know. Maybe you know somebody with a perfect personality. I don't. Nothing personal—I didn't mean anybody here.

See, don't we right away think it's about me? It's just stuff happening.

So, another sutta from the Buddha. Someone comes to him and says, "Venerable Sir, how should one know, how should one see, for the view of identity—sakkāya-diṭṭhi—to be abandoned?"

Abandoned.

Now, this isn't going to be anything big that you haven't heard before, but that's no reason not to listen to it.

The Buddha says, "Bhikkhu, when one knows and sees the eye as impermanent, identity view is abandoned." And of course, he goes through all the six senses, but I'll just go through with the eye.

Then he says, "When one knows and sees forms"—in other words, there's the eye and there's what the eye sees, the objects of sight—"when one knows and sees forms as impermanent, view of identity is abandoned. When one knows and sees eye consciousness"—that moment of knowing, when eye and form come together and there's consciousness, that moment of seeing—"when one sees that as impermanent, the view of self is abandoned. When one knows and sees eye contact as impermanent, when one knows and sees whatever feeling tone, vedanā, arises with eye contact as conditioned, as impermanent, the view of self is abandoned."

Then he goes through the same thing with the ear, with smell, with taste, with body and tactile phenomena, with the mind and mental phenomena. So that's pretty much everything. And that's a high bar, right?

But we don't have to sit here thinking, "I have to see everything as impermanent all the time." Rather, it's about having the contemplation, the idea, kind of in the back of our mind—the power of the perception of anicca, of impermanence.

He's basically saying here that when one perceives these aspects of our experience—seeing, eye contact, the feeling tone, the form, the eye itself—as impermanent, when that perception of impermanence is accurately perceived, the view of self, or in that moment the sense of self, the personality view, is basically not created. You could say it's abandoned, but it's really more that it's not created.

So this is, again, that inverted perception the Buddha talks of so much. We have such a deep habit to perceive what is impermanent, what is constantly changing, as permanent. To perceive what is not-self as self. To perceive what is inherently unsatisfying as satisfying, as capable of giving us happiness.

Now, I'm saying this, it's a thought—we can think of it. That's a concept. But the concept won't really help us abandon the personality view, the construction of a sense of self.

Because on an intellectual level, impermanence—maybe even personality view, but certainly impermanence—is pretty understandable, isn't it? Not too many people would really argue that eye contact is permanent, or even that their eye is permanent. We can all at least give lip service to the idea that however solid I seem, I know at one point I was born and at another point I'll die. However solid this experience of anger and this personality view seems, I know I go through different moods throughout the day.

But what we're actually perceiving in the moment may not at all correspond with this idea of "Well, I know it's impermanent." We can say that. But what we don't recognize—something I heard the Dalai Lama say once in a teaching—he said, "When we talk about the perception of anicca, of impermanence, we may think we understand it, that we can really see things arise, they last for a while, they go away. Arising, persistence, going away. And you think, 'Yeah, I really understand impermanence.'"

But he said, "No. Things don't exist for a while in between arising and passing away. There is no steady state." Impermanence means experience is in constant flux. Constant flux. There is no little stability in between the moments of arising and passing. And that's what we don't often really let in through our perception.

It's too radical. It's too unsettling. And it gives rise to all sorts of questions. We start thinking, well, if everything's impermanent, how can I do this? If there's no steady state at all, how can I get up and walk out of here? Who's walking out of here if it's not the same person who walked in? We go into all of that.

This is the same as the magic eye. It's the same as no self. It's not that things are permanent until we allow the perception of impermanence and then suddenly everything goes into constant flux. It's not that if you allow in the perception of impermanence, you can't find your feet anymore. It's not that everything's just arising and passing in molecules and you can't find your mouth when you're trying to eat.

Things are impermanent. There's not even things—I mean, that's already saying it wrong. "Things" is already taking a bunch of changing energy and putting it together and calling it a thing. I know that's going a little far, but that's what the scientists tell us. And there are moments when that's our actual experience. It's true. There are moments when you can be in retreat, sitting, and really there isn't a mouth, there isn't a body. But most of the time, it's like the magic eye—that's one level of how things are: constant flux.

But it's useful, this conventional perception. Even though this body is in constant flux, I still can recognize it when I get up in the morning. When I walk out of here, I don't get it confused with Viranyani's body. I know what I'm supposed to do. She knows where she's supposed to go. We can go and eat and find our mouths. It all works.

But just because there's this perception of lastingness doesn't mean it's accurate at the deepest level. And so, knowing that it's a convention—a useful convention—we don't need to be afraid of the perception of no self or the perception of impermanence. We're still going to be able to function, because it's only the way things already are.

The only thing that goes away is that burden we're dragging around of me, me, me—everything about me, every thought, every sound, everything that happens connected to my whole history back to when I was in second grade, or before I was born, everything. Who needs all of that? The sense of our personality being so important, the sense of having to fix ourselves, change this personality, get a better one—or at least put on such a good mask that no one can tell how really disgusting you truly are, right? How much of our time do we spend doing that?

In the perception of impermanence, on this level that the Buddha is speaking of—and it doesn't have to be on that level all the time, it doesn't even hardly most of the time—but just let it in as you're walking around: sight is impermanent, constantly changing. Walk out of here and you see a plant, then you see the window, then you see a shoe, then you see the hall, then you see the light. It's constantly changing. You don't have to flip out and get all trippy about it, but you can just notice that. Thoughts are constantly changing. Moods are constantly changing. Physical sensations are constantly changing.

How does it work that this seeing, this perception of impermanence, starts to erode the habit of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, of creating a sense of self? What it does is this: when we see how things actually are, the clinging that arises due to our confusion, our inaccurate perception, simply drops away. Sort of like my friend in the house in Switzerland. As soon as she knew what was true, the aversion and the clinging were gone. The view was gone. You don't have to abandon it. It just goes away.

There's a model that the Buddha uses frequently—you could call it three movements in an unfolding process of insight—where we recognize more accurately, then we begin to see, in terms of the six senses, in terms of the five aggregates: the gratification, the danger, and the escape in any aspect of our experience. He uses this all the time.

For instance, in terms of seeing, the gratification in seeing a pleasant sight is the pleasure and joy that arises in dependence on that. That's the gratification. The danger, obviously, when we see that it's always changing, is that it is subject to change. It's unsatisfactory. We can't place any lasting sense of self or hope for happiness in that experience. And the escape is the abandonment of desire and lust for that form, for that particular experience.

It's not that we have to get rid of anything. We don't have to get rid of our personalities. We don't have to get rid of pain in the body. We don't even have to get rid of anger.

But what goes away when we recognize accurately is the desire and lust for whatever the particular experience is. It's that word that's often translated as "disgust"—nibbida—but "disenchantment" is really a better translation.

Just to describe how that works: when we see accurately, "Oh, this can bring me this pleasant feeling, this brings a moment of pleasure, and then it's gone. Placing all my eggs in the basket of more pleasant feelings—completely, it can't do it for me." It's not a "should." It's not "I'm so stupid" or "I'm bad." It's like a disenchantment with pleasant feeling, for example. Seeing with that disenchantment, we go, "Ah, this can't do it," and just put down the clinging.

The description that Andrew Olendzki gives of this in the Insight Journal—he wrote a whole piece about nibbida—I just want to read the metaphor he gives. He says that knowing things directly as they really are and seeing what is impermanent as impermanent with right view, when one sees as it is with right view, then one becomes disenchanted with the aggregates, with all five aggregates.

What does this mean, disenchanted? Because as I said, as he said, it's often been translated as "revulsion" or "disgust." And often when people hear that—"I should be developing revulsion for the five aggregates, that means revulsion for the body, for forms, revulsion for perception"—no, to us that's subversive. That doesn't sound right. Certainly it doesn't really inspire one too deeply. "Yeah, let me work towards revulsion."

But if you think of it as disenchantment, and then use this simile that's in the texts about a dog that comes across a bone that has been sitting out in the desert for months and months—where it was once a really juicy bone, now it's just bleached white and bare. The marrow is gone. It's just a dried-up old bone. So the dog comes running up to it, all lathering, slathering, happy, starts chewing on it. He's enchanted by the prospect of gratification as he scrapes away furiously at the bone. But when he wakes up to the fact that the bone is empty of anything that will offer him any satisfaction, he becomes disenchanted. He just spits it out and walks away.

There's no aversion necessary in that. No revulsion. It's just, "Oh, this isn't what I thought." Puts it down and walks away.

That, I know, is actually an experience of real equanimity—the equanimity that allows us to recognize our experience ever more accurately. Not push it away. Not distance ourselves. Not have revulsion. But the clinging of wanting anything to last, of perceiving anything as "me," just becomes abandoned in that moment. And more and more frequently, as the perception is accurate more and more frequently, the abandonment of sakkāya-diṭṭhi gets stronger, gets our loyalty. Our belief in personality view really begins to weaken.

But one point I want to make is in our practice here—and not just on retreat, in daily life—I find this really personally: often I can access this level of seeing. "Okay, seeing the moment of eye consciousness, seeing all the aggregates as impermanent." There are times when that is the level of perception, especially when we're on retreat.

But there are other times when the sakkāya-diṭṭhi—you know, the perception, the clinging, the thoughts, the view—that all happened really fast and quite a while ago. We couldn't even say what was the original perception that led to the view. But we wake up really caught in some personality view. And it might be a really familiar one—any of the examples I've been giving—but we're really in it. Sometimes you can say, "Well, I'm such an angry person and I can say all of this," or "I've always been unhealthy," or "Wow, I'm really doing great," whatever it is. "I'm this kind of person, I'm shy, I'm introverted," whatever it is.

Sometimes you can't say what it is, but in daily life I'll just start to feel really kind of contracted. I look, and it's all complicated, and I can't tell what the belief is, I can't tell what the perception is, but I can tell that sakkāya-diṭṭhi is really strong right now.

And that is actually enough.

In that moment, rather than, "Oh, there's eye consciousness and there's clinging and there's identification"—I can't get there. I can't even say, "Is this anger? Is this fear? Is this back to my childhood?" All I can say is, "Wow, sakkāya-diṭṭhi feels like this." Just naming it in that way that Sayadaw U Tejaniya uses. And it actually is very powerful.

Instead of getting in there, fighting it out—"Oh no, here I am being selfish, I want to be compassionate, I better start doing the Chenrezig mantra, I better do this, I better sit more"—you know, how we're going to fight? Wait a minute. Sakkāya-diṭṭhi is like this.

It's not magic—I wouldn't say it's magic—but sometimes it's so powerful. Because just in that moment, you don't have to figure it all out. You just shifted loyalties right then, from total belief in sakkāya-diṭṭhi to "Oh, it feels like this." Just that movement into awareness receiving sakkāya-diṭṭhi. Just another complicated, messed-up saṅkhāra that's arising in this moment, and it's going to pass away if I don't keep feeding it fuel.

That—you don't need to be incredibly concentrated, and you don't need to be incredibly quiet and peaceful to do that. It's just to have that willingness to recognize, "Oh, sakkāya-diṭṭhi." Just to have the sense that that's something that arises and passes.

It's not who I am.

Are we, as I said the other night, willing to be without self-referencing? Are we willing not to be our personality? Are we willing just to be with what is without having our personality be the center of the show? Are we willing not to be the center of the show?

Because it's peaceful.

And what's interesting—sometimes we find out peace isn't really the thing we're wanting. A little more action, a little more glitziness, a little more interest, a little more sense of me, basically.

So I say, "Oh, sakkāya-diṭṭhi is like that." I mean, just in yourself, how did that sound? Really lame? Like, "Oh yeah, right. I'm going to go through life saying 'sakkāya-diṭṭhi is like that.'"

But you know, then what? What are we left with?

Just awareness. Awareness, when it's not colored by craving or delusion or fear or anger—in that moment, of itself, it's pure. It's just this. Just what is in this moment. Nothing to do. Nothing to fix. Nothing to be.

And it's just a moment. It's not some big explosion. It's very, as Buddhadasa says, normal and natural. We all have many, many moments in a day when there's not the misperception of something as self. Many moments when sakkāya-diṭṭhi is not being created or clung to. They're normal, natural, and simple.

So we could just, as Buddhadasa says, generate a contentment with that. And then on the other side, notice when there is the perception of permanence, when there's the perception of self, when the thoughts are creating a view—just notice how that happens. And notice you don't have to go back and deconstruct the whole thing. At any point, we can just go, "Ah, it's like this," and simply step out of believing that whole thing. Step out of the magic eye altogether.

That's accessible to us now, just as we are. You don't have to wait until you're better. You don't have to wait until somehow you've rearranged everything so you can be completely enlightened. It's not some other place. It's right here, right now, no matter what's happening. Just a shifting of allegiance.

I want to close with a short quotation from Master Sheng Yen. He's a wonderful Chan master from Taiwan, from China. He's not so healthy now, but he's really a wonderful being. He said:

"True liberation does not come from wanting to be liberated. In true liberation, there's nothing to want, nothing to discard, no place to go, and no place to avoid. It means not being moved by the environment, not having likes or dislikes. True liberation does not come from wanting to be liberated."

Let's just sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 19

Investigating Anattā: Power of Renunciation

Carol Wilson · 59 min

In this heartfelt talk, Carol Wilson examines renunciation (nekkhamma) as a transformative practice that liberates rather than restricts. Building on her previous discussion of sakkāya-diṭṭhi (personality view), she explores how clinging pervades even subtle levels of experience, referencing the Khemaka Sutta where a noble disciple describes the residual conceit 'I am' as being like the scent of a flower—present yet impossible to locate in any single aggregate.

Wilson draws from the Buddha's teaching to Tapussa, who described renunciation as seeming like 'a sheer drop-off' to householders who delight in sensuality. Yet the Buddha himself acknowledged that before awakening, his heart did not leap at renunciation—until he investigated both the drawbacks of sensual pleasure and the rewards of letting go. Through teachings from Ajahn Chah, Huang Po, and Sogyal Rinpoche, Wilson illuminates how our minds habitually 'face away from themselves,' constantly seeking completion outside the present moment.

The practical heart of this talk lies in understanding 'unwise attention'—focusing on the attractiveness of phenomena that fuels craving. Wilson offers accessible examples, from chasing photographs of beautiful irises to the subtle grasping at pleasant meditation states. True renunciation, she explains, is not about rejecting life but about bringing sati-paññā (mindfulness-wisdom) to the point of sense contact, discovering that each moment of simply returning to presence is itself the greatest renunciation—putting down all self-images and constructions to find we are already home.

I think it must have been mettā, the feeling. Such appreciation for the Sangha. And looking around here, half the people in here are really good friends. All of you are really dedicated practitioners. I feel like we could just all take turns giving the Dhamma talk. It feels like such a privilege.

When we were chanting the refuges and precepts, I just was flashing on how that's been going on for 2,600 years, just like that. There's a saying that if there was ever one moment where no one was practicing the Buddha Sāsana in the world, it would go out of existence—not the truth, but the Buddha's teaching. And so actively, with us sitting here practicing and committing to the precepts and the refuges, we are part of that. I flashed back on all the nuns chanting in Burma, and this feeling arose that it's the same as it's been for 2,600 years, and we're all part of that. Somehow my heart just felt really full. I wanted to share it with you because sometimes you can forget that, just sitting here slogging through the day. But it's a beautiful thing you're all doing. All of us.

Those of you who were here last week remember I was speaking about sakkāya-diṭṭhi, personality view, personality belief. My focus last week was on how our sense of self is constructed moment to moment by how we cling to views, to constructions, thoughts, and beliefs that are based on clinging to any aspect of nāma-rūpa—any aspect of mind or body experience. Because we perceive permanence in what is impermanent, we cling to an aspect of the aggregates of nāma-rūpa and construct a whole sense of self moment after moment. Why couldn't I have said it that quickly last week? I ended by saying how it's cut through by the deep and transformative perception of impermanence, of anicca. That cuts through the sakkāya-diṭṭhi clinging to views.

Tonight I want to talk about another aspect of practice that is very basic—you all know this—but it's another avenue of seeing through the delusion that keeps creating a sense of self. It's very simple. Rather than view, the first step of the Eightfold Path, it's wise intention, the second step: attitude. Specifically, the attitude of renunciation.

But first I want to say that this sense of clinging to a sense of self, of creating or somehow just having a sense of self, is so subtle at times. Sometimes it's really gross, but it's so subtle that it pervades through all levels of our experience. This isn't to be discouraging. I actually found this rather encouraging, because sometimes people think, "Well, I should see through these views. Why do I keep having a sense of self? It's enough already." But the elimination of complete belief in sakkāya-diṭṭhi, which in itself seems like it would be huge—the elimination of the belief in sakkāya-diṭṭhi does not completely remove the sense of personal identity.

In fact, I want to read you from the sutta. I want to read a lot of Buddhist material tonight. There's one that I've always really liked, about a bhikkhu named Khemaka. The other bhikkhus thought that he was an arahant, completely enlightened. The sutta goes on with this whole long story of how they keep coming to talk to him, saying, "You're an arahant." And he says no, he's not, back and forth.

But the point is, he says he's not an arahant because he still has this feeling of "I am." And they said, "Well, what is it?" He said, "Friends, I do not speak of form as 'I am'"—rūpa, part of the aggregates—"but at the same time, I don't speak of 'I am' apart from form." He says, "I don't speak of feelings as 'I am,' of perception, of volitional formations as 'I am,' or of consciousness as 'I am.' Friends, although the notion 'I am' has not yet vanished in me in relation to these five aggregates, still I do not regard anything among them as 'I am.'" He doesn't think form, perception, consciousness, volitional formations, or moods are me. He knows this is not me. But at the same time, there's some feeling of "I am" there.

Can't you relate to that? And this person, he's not just some schlump. He's a very seriously practiced bhikkhu.

He says, suppose, friends, there's the scent of a blue, red, or white lotus. Would one be speaking rightly if one would say the scent belongs to the petals, or the scent belongs to the stalk? He said, no, friends. So how would you answer it rightly? Answering rightly, one should say the scent belongs to the flower. So too, friends, I do not speak of form as I am, nor do I speak of I am apart from form. He goes through all of the aggregates in this way. So although the notion has not yet vanished in me in relation to these five aggregates, I don't regard anything among them as this I am.

Even though a noble disciple—when they say noble disciple, that means someone who has at least reached the first stage of awakening; when they use that word noble, that's what it means, at least—even though a noble disciple has abandoned the five lower fetters, he's passed the first stage, still, in relation to the five aggregates subject to clinging, there lingers in him a residual conceit I am, a desire I am, an underlying tendency I am that has not yet been uprooted.

I can really relate to this. Not the five lower fetters being gone—I'm not saying that. But this subtle sense, like a perfume, the scent of a flower, just this conceit, this underlying tendency I am, kind of floats around and you can't quite pin it down.

The point I want to make here is how clinging is so pervasive, because all of this residual conceit or sense of I am arises because of clinging. And so that's why clinging is always the core teaching—freedom from clinging.

So tonight I want to talk about seeing through clinging in the arena of the attitude of our heart and mind, working with the second step of the Eightfold Path, which is wise intention, wise attitude.

The direct response to the tendency, the reflex action of clinging—because it seems like that, a reflex—and by clinging, we mean not only clinging for the pleasant, but wanting the unpleasant to go away, sort of like clinging to non-being, so it covers both of those. The direct response is paññā, wisdom, seeing through attachment to views. But when paññā is turned on clinging, with clear seeing we begin to perceive the seductive and delusional nature of clinging. And the natural response is this shift, this purification of our attitude, where we put our trust. The natural response of the attitude of heart and mind shifts from one of greed, wanting and not wanting, to that of non-greed, of a natural renunciation.

This inner attitude, this purification, is something that we can actually include in our practice through giving attention to renunciation. So renunciation is both an expression of the spaciousness, the coolness, the peace of the fire of greed and clinging having gone out, and it's also a structure, a form of practice that we can cultivate to purify the tendency of clinging.

Uninvestigated, and even partially investigated—what's interesting is if you look and see for yourself. Don't believe what I say, but what I see is that our notions are kind of superficial about both of these two attitudes, about clinging and about renunciation. They are both kind of backwards in a way. Clinging—not if we think about it rationally, but the way we act—is going to bring us happiness. Clinging and wanting and getting things is a way of happiness. Renunciation is kind of dour, unpleasant, a penance at best, but certainly not very joyful and nothing that we particularly want to hang out with.

Two things from the Buddha in this regard. One about clinging. He says: Monks, what is the noble truth about the origin of suffering? Just this—his answer—just this craving, which brings renewal of being, and which is accompanied by pleasure, by lust and emotion, finding delight now here and now there, namely the craving for sensual pleasure, the craving for being, the craving for non-being. This is called the origin of suffering.

What I like about this in this particular context is that he points out that craving is accompanied by pleasure and lust and is finding delight now here and now there. That's the way, I think, when we don't really investigate, that's how we relate to craving. Oh, delight over here, delight over there. This doesn't work anymore, never mind, delight over here. And that is superficially what we notice, what is feeding the reflex action to go to clinging as a strategy for happiness, this finding of delight. You could say that's the gratification in clinging. There is pleasure. It brings delight. The danger, of course, is it doesn't last. And the escape is the abandonment.

Now, in terms of the way that we view renunciation—that's kind of upside down to what the real experience of it is when we open into that, that real renunciation of attitude which is freeing, which is so spacious. This is again from a sutta. The Buddha was speaking with Tapusa the householder, who had been talking to Ananda and asked Ananda some questions. Then Ananda took him to the Buddha. So Tapusa sits down and Ananda says: Tapusa here said to me, Venerable Ananda, we are householders who indulge in sensuality. We delight in sensuality. We enjoy sensuality.

We rejoice in sensuality. For us, indulging, delighting, enjoying, and rejoicing in sensuality, renunciation seems like a sheer drop-off." In other words, that's not attractive, right? "Yet I've heard that in this doctrine and discipline, the hearts of the young monks leap up at renunciation, grow confident, steadfast, and firm, seeing it as peace. So right here is where this doctrine and discipline is contrary to the great mass of people—this issue of renunciation."

Can you relate to that? Maybe you're not exactly rejoicing in sensuality, but there's that sense that renunciation means I can't have anything.

The Buddha's answer is interesting. "So it is, Ananda. So it is." He didn't say, "Oh, this foolish man." He agreed with him. "So it is. Even I myself, before my awakening, when I was still an unawakened bodhisatta, thought, 'Renunciation is good. Seclusion is good.' But my heart did not leap up at renunciation. It did not grow confident, steadfast, or firm, seeing it as peace."

So we could cut ourselves some slack, if even he as the Bodhisatta experienced this. The Buddha continues: "The thought occurred to me, 'What is the reason? Why doesn't my heart leap up at renunciation? Why doesn't it grow confident, firm, or steadfast, seeing it as peace?' And I thought, 'Well, I have not seen the drawback of sensual pleasures. I haven't pursued that theme. I have not understood the reward of renunciation. I have not familiarized myself with it.'"

He's always just so straightforward and practical, you know? That's why my heart doesn't leap up at renunciation. Of course, you can imagine he goes on and says that he did pursue those themes, and his heart did leap up at renunciation. Because when we really explore with a clear heart and mind, without getting lost in our preconceived notions, clinging actually isn't such a purveyor of delight. Momentary, maybe. But if we really look...

This is from Nisargadatta Maharaj. I know, I'll read from the Buddha too, but I just like this one: "The state of craving blocks all deeper experience. Nothing of value can reveal itself to the mind that knows exactly what it wants."

Can anybody here relate to that in your meditation practice? The mind of clinging is narrow, restricted, limited. The Buddha says this over and over. Nothing can reveal itself to the mind that knows exactly what it wants. That's the danger in craving.

The Buddha often used strong fire images about the burning of craving. You know the Fire Sermon, where the eye is burning, eye contact is burning, forms are burning, they're aflame. I'm not going to read that one, but basically he's saying all our senses, all forms, all contact—everything is burning with passion, burning with aversion, burning with delusion. It's not a light, "Oh well, let's just see how it goes" kind of image. It's saying we are burning.

Here's another passage where he describes clinging. Actually, the name of the sutta is "Clinging." A bhikkhu once said, "In one who keeps on focusing on the attractiveness of phenomena—the five aggregates—craving develops." And this is very important; I'll say it again later too. This is unwise attention: focusing on the attractiveness of phenomena. It develops craving, and craving then, as a requisite, develops clinging. From clinging as a requisite comes becoming. From becoming, birth. Then aging and death, sorrow, lamentation, pain, distress, and despair. You know that chain of dependent origination.

"The origin of this entire mass of suffering and stress—just as if a great pile of fire, a massive fire of thirty or forty cartloads of timber, were burning, a giant fire, and into it a person would time and again throw dried grass, dried cow dung, dried timber, so that the great mass of fire, thus nourished, thus sustained, would burn for a long, long time."

In the same way, one who keeps focusing on the attractiveness, the allure of phenomena—craving develops, and the whole chain of dependent origination unfolds. It burns for a long, long time.

So basically, it's not that sense objects or any object is a problem. It's that craving keeps throwing fuel on the fire. Craving itself is the fuel that keeps us going.

Renunciation, actually, rather than being a sheer drop-off, rather than being a penance, rather than restricting and limiting our life—it's craving that restricts and limits and contracts consciousness, contracts the mind and heart. But renunciation, the inner attitude of non-greed, the inner attitude of simplicity, of contentment—that actually opens up space to be truly awake. The coolness of a mind and heart that's not burning with the fire of clinging. The spaciousness that actually allows for nature to reveal itself when the mind is not clinging.

This is from Huang Po: "This pure mind shines forever with the radiance of its own perfection. But most people are not aware of it and think that the mind is only the faculty that sees, hears, feels, and knows, blinded by their own sight, hearing, feeling, and knowing. They don't perceive the radiance of the source."

That's clean, actually. We're blinded by our own sight. It's not the sight that blinds us—it's the clinging to it. It's that looking outward. It's really the crux of our problem, the heart of our ignorance: that in the attachment to forms, to our seeing, to our hearing, to the meanings of our thoughts, to our emotions, to what's happening, to experience, there's this continual looking—as a metaphor, not looking with the eyes, but a continual turning of attention outward, away from what Huang Po calls the radiance, the natural radiance of heart and mind. Looking outward for completion, whether it's to pizza, whether it's to concentration, whether it's to enlightenment, whether it's to the person next to you being quiet—it doesn't matter what it is, whether it's to a different mental state.

The looking outward isn't necessarily outward beyond this body. It's outward from just resting at ease in whatever arises. The looking outward that's fueled by craving, by clinging—it's really the heart of our problem, as if somehow perfection is outside of ourselves.

Huang Po continues: "This one mind, this pure mind, is the Buddha. And there is no distinction between Buddhas and ordinary beings except that ordinary beings are attached to forms"—and by forms he means all of experience—"ordinary beings are attached to forms and thus seek for Buddhahood outside of themselves. By this very seeking, they lose it."

That seems to me really the heart of the conundrum. But it's radical. It's not give up some of the seeking but hold on to this one. Any tiniest little looking outside, we lose the recognition of the pure mind. That's the clinging. You see how pervasive, how subtle it is. And as we all know, just saying, "Okay, I get it, clinging's no good, I think I'll stop now"—no. It doesn't work that way.

So in terms of looking at renunciation as a quality of mind and heart, in small ways, large ways, whatever—playing with, practicing an active kind of renunciation—it's just another way of changing the channel from the constriction of clinging to the spacious coolness of non-greed, of renunciation. It's a movement of deep compassion for ourselves, not of penance, of punishment, of negativity. Real renunciation is a joyful, opening experience—just a state of mind that comes and goes like anything.

So really, when we think of renunciation, rather than thinking of it as a giving up, it's more about learning to renounce this fruitless quest of looking for peace in something outside of here and now.

The way Sogyal Rinpoche said: "The purpose of meditation is to introduce us to that which we really are—pure awareness, which underlies the whole of life and death. In the stillness and silence of meditation, we glimpse and return to that deep inner nature that we have so long ago lost sight of amidst the busyness and distraction of our minds. Meditation is bringing the mind home."

That's really how I think of simply opening to the moment, of putting down the craving, of renouncing the craving in any one particular moment. It's bringing the mind home—withdrawing this looking elsewhere for peace, for wholeness, because it's the looking elsewhere that actually hides the wholeness.

But it's such a deep, deep habit. We really rely on it. And I think, as almost everyone I've talked to here has noted, and as I see in myself all the time, we see through many, many moments of reaching outside or clinging to something—whether it's a particular outside sense object, a particular state of mind, wanting things to be a certain way, or suffering. We see it, we really see through it. And then it may really be peaceful, spacious, open for a while. But some little other something comes into the mind or the experience, and that deeply ingrained reliance on clinging, that reliance on the idea—we don't even hold it consciously—that something has to be different for peace, for freedom. Whether it's the sitting has to be different, this thought has to be different, my experience has to be different.

And as soon as that comes in, it's clinging. Clinging might be in the form of pushing away. And it's so easy for us, especially when it's subtle, to overlook that attitude of craving and get a little bit focused on the thing that we're craving or pushing away. That's looking away. Even when it's something like a mood—we're involved in it, and then, "Oh, there's disappointment. What does that mean?" We're trying to think. Looking away right there. It's so subtle.

But it doesn't mean we're renouncing life or renouncing experience or even renouncing sense objects. As Geshe Rinchen says, having great compassion for yourself is the same as renunciation, because we're renouncing the delusion, the attachment that keeps one bound to samsara.

So what I'm talking about here with renunciation is really this inner attitude—just a willingness to notice the attachments. And you can't necessarily stop it, but we can at least renounce buying it wholeheartedly. The inner motivation of renunciation is, I think, more important than the outer form. The outer form can support us, and I'll talk about that some. But I know it's possible to live very simply or to be practicing very austerely—I know it's possible to be an ordained person and be completely filled with attachment to the form, with pride or arrogance or complete self-judgment, which is really the same thing, one or the other. It's possible, although it is hard, to be living a completely immersed worldly life and not be clinging. It's harder. It is harder, just because stuff happens so fast. But it's really all about inner attitude, what's in the mind that's noticing.

So as I was saying, we get so habituated to looking away. Almost like one of the ways it feels is: something will make me feel happy when things are unpleasant. But sometimes when things start to get spacious and quiet, that sense of—again, it's a superficial sense of an emptiness, of something lacking, of something needing for completion—and looking out for that. It's a reflex habit. Whether it's for sense experience, the five senses, whether it's to mental experience, emotion, whether it's to ideas and views, views of self—it doesn't really matter what to.

So our practice of renunciation is really a conscious choice for our happiness. It's a conscious choice to break this habit, to consciously see what the mind is doing—the constriction and the burning that clinging brings, and the peace and the space and the joy that a moment of renunciation can bring. It is hard because it's such a habit for our mind to face away from itself, and things happen so fast.

This is Ajahn Chah. He's talking about the flood of sensuality. Kāmogha, the flood of sensuality: "We are sunk in sights, sunk in sounds, in smells, in tastes, in bodily sensations, in mental activity. We're sunk because we look only at externals. We don't look inwardly."

And there's so many. They happen so fast. And Sogyal Rinpoche goes on to say: our mind faces away from itself. Our attention, our mind, bends towards whatever we experience—sight, sound, smell, taste, texture, mental experience. Our mind leans toward. The attention is completely caught up by what's happening, and then we get into thoughts about it—the future, the past, the associations—and then we're gone. Out of that comes views. But it's this tendency to lean out.

And then how that leads even more to craving is that unwise attention that I spoke about. Play with this in your practice. When you notice something pleasant—whether it's an image in your mind, something pleasant you're eating, a pleasant emotion, a pleasant sitting, doesn't matter what—the unwise attention, this is what the Buddha said fuels, throws the fuel onto the craving, is really focusing on how attractive this thing is. That's different from noticing pleasant vedanā. That's just pure mindfulness. It's more like, "Wow, this really tastes good. This is really so smooth on the tongue." That kind of "This is really gratifying. I really like it."

Unpleasant, of course, is easier to see. When you're annoyed at someone, the mind just keeps going back to those annoying things about that person, every time. You can see it more easily—I can see that one more easily anyway. Each time the mind goes back to what's wrong with that person, you get a little more annoyed. A little more annoyed.

Well, it's the same with the pleasant. They're both unwise attention. Throwing fuel on the pleasant object and the gratification.

So I'm using simple sense experiences, like food. But try a really smooth, light sitting. You're aware of it, and you're noticing, "Oh yeah, this is nice, this is pleasant," but there's this subtle quality of, "Mmm, yeah, this is how it's supposed to be. I'm just really seeing the rapture now. This is really..." And we keep focusing, subtly, on just how nice this is. We don't see the clinging in the background. We think, "I'm really immersed in the beauty of this experience."

Just play with how that happens. I mean, you'll know. We know. We don't always know how we got there, but we know that craving was being fed—sooner or later, when it hits us back in the face. And those are the times when we don't think craving is finding delight now here, now there. We think, "Wow, I was mindful. I was doing it right. How come it went away?" And then we hear ourselves and go, "Well, I know it's supposed to go away. Everything's impermanent. I really know that. But something's wrong. There's something I'm doing wrong." And then we'll find some other rationale or some other reason, because we can't really acknowledge that we're just clinging—that was really nice and I really liked it. I. That sense of me.

Just play with that. It's unwise attention. We do it all the time and get led into whole worlds of papañca, of action.

Here's an example. Once I was sitting in a beautiful place in South Africa, and I came out one morning right at dawn. There was this big row, this really beautifully landscaped arrangement of iris bushes. And this one morning, right at dawn, they'd all bloomed. It was really exquisite in my memory—the memory is years ago now. Very subtle lavender and white, extremely beautiful.

And I came out: "Ah, beautiful." You see, renunciation doesn't mean we can't appreciate the beautiful. Renunciation doesn't mean, "Oh no, don't look at that." Renunciation means renouncing the clinging and really bringing mindfulness, wisdom, satipaññā, right to that moment of sense contact. That's the place for renunciation.

Well, I didn't do this at that point. "Wow, aren't they beautiful? They're so beautiful." The pleasant feeling in my body—I'm all liking that. "They're so beautiful." And then, you know clinging is going on because it leads to papañca of mind and proliferation of action. "My mother would love to see these. She's such a gardener. I wish I had a camera, but I don't. But maybe my friend sitting over on the other side does have a camera."

I ended up running around the place, looking for my friend, bothering him on his retreat, getting his camera, trying to take a picture. Which, of course, when you look at the picture, it doesn't show anything. It just shows some green leaves.

I wasn't appreciating the beauty of those irises anymore. I was running around like a nut, trying to hold on to it. That's just a simple example, but that's how craving leads to complexity, leads to papañca, makes our lives so complicated.

The renunciation isn't "I'm never looking at a flower again." The renunciation isn't cutting down all the irises so we don't, God forbid, get tainted. It's bringing in sati-pañña—mindfulness and wisdom—right at that point of contact. Oh, it's beautiful. You feel the energy going out. Or it's awful. You feel the energy recoiling. Oh, it's like this. That's really the essence of wise attention, of renunciation, right at the point of contact, understanding it.

This is the Buddha: "For some people, contact—the point where sense plus object meet—if you've been right there, that point of seeing, the eye, the iris, is seeing, is enthralling. Contact is enthralling. And so these people are washed by the tides of being, drifting along an empty, pointless road. Nowhere is there any sign of broken chains. But others come to understand their sense activity, and because they understand it, the stillness fills them with delight. They see just what contact does, and so their craving ends. They realize total calm."

It's beautiful, isn't it? It doesn't sound so harsh or like penance or a restriction of life—restraint at the sense doors. First is sati-pañña, mindfulness and wisdom, at the point of sense contact. When we're able to do that, great. It doesn't have to expand any further into clinging, into papañca. In that moment, that's a renunciation of the clinging, of looking outside, looking elsewhere for completion.

That's something the space and structure of a retreat, the simplicity of a retreat, helps us do. All of you have chosen to come here. It's a huge form of sense restraint, of renouncing complexity, renouncing having things your way, renouncing getting the meals you want, renouncing being with your family—whatever—to be here. It's not that all the things we're putting away to come here are bad, or that those things are keeping us from freedom. Of course not. But the strength of our trust in clinging and looking outside is so deep, and it rises so quickly. As Ajahn Chah says, we're so sunk in this flood of sensuality, the flood of experience. Even on retreat, it's not as much, but there's still so much going on—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, thinking. That's always going on.

But there's so much, especially in our daily lives, that this is why renunciation as an outer form matters. Often when we say renunciation, people think right away of it as an outer form, whether it's taking robes or renouncing work and busyness for a while to come on retreat. I'm not saying renunciation is merely the outer form, but outer form and structure is extremely helpful to give us the space to explore the burning of clinging, the coolness of renunciation.

It's like Thich Nhat Hanh says: things are so busy and loud, just shut the windows once in a while. You don't have to let every wind come blowing through your house. It's not that we hate the world. It's not that we're shutting out the world. But simplifying just gives us a lot more possibility to notice what's going on. And I know you all know this. None of you would be here if you didn't know it. I'm just reinforcing what we already understand. Clear the decks. Appreciate the simplicity.

But the simplicity itself is meaningless if we're not using the space it creates to really look at what's going on in this mind and heart when we come to that point of contact. So how much form, how much simplicity we want—that's personal. It's something for each of us to explore, and it may change as we go through our lives. But it's really about what helps us be more present at this point of contact.

With sati-paññā we just meet what's happening, and we don't concoct a whole world out of craving, out of clinging. I know you know what I mean. But just later, think back over how many worlds has your mind concocted today based on contact? Contact with a sight, contact with some thought. How many different, incredibly strong personality views have you created in your mind today just based on an unpleasant thought that came up? Based on not liking the way your breath felt?

Or maybe a really beautiful moment arises, and then it goes. They come, they go. All we have to do is watch it.

But you see how fast, how much contact there is. It really, really can help to simplify. It gives us space to recognize what the mind is doing. And the conscious renunciation of outer form—say, the conscious putting down... Take, for example, the eight precepts. Not that people should do it, but one of the things it can do is this: I've made the renunciation of outer form, I'm not going to eat in the evening.

So when I'm on eight precepts, like sitting in Burma, you're just on eight precepts. It's easier, actually, when everyone's on it and they're not putting out tea—I must say, it's a lot easier. But you just watch what comes up in the mind. So hunger comes up. So what? It doesn't really matter. You just watch it. What you put down is that clinging, that urge to do something about it. And it really doesn't matter. I really mean it. You're hungry? Go hungry tonight. Okay. The hunger's like this. There's no "I've got to fix it, I've got to do anything." There's no clinging. So hunger, not hunger. You feel weak, you feel fine. It doesn't matter if there's space. There's coolness. There's no burning in the mind.

That's just a simple example. Sure, at first, with some outer forms of renunciation, the mind kicks and screams. "I don't want to do this! No, don't take it away! I'm going to be so—if I don't have that, I don't want to live without that." Well, most of us have something, maybe more than one or two somethings, that fall into that category. And sometimes it's something really banal that you're too embarrassed to admit to anyone. Often when I go to Asia, it's just some little thing—I'm not going to say what little thing—things I just have to take. I don't need this, but now I've got to have it.

Sometimes it's not banal, and we might not even be able to say what it is to ourselves because it's much closer to home. A certain sense of ourselves. A certain personality trait that we hold to. Or a memory. Or a way that we relate to the past. Or whatever it might be—a particular experience. Sometimes it's a fear of something we don't even have, but we don't want to give up the possibility that maybe someday we're going to have that, you know?

Just watch. Where is the mind? No, not this, not this! It's kicking and screaming. And then realize the problem has nothing to do with having or not having that thing, or that state, or that sense of yourself. The only problem is the clinging. Renouncing the clinging that keeps us bound to samsara.

Again, we get so focused on having or losing the thing, or the idea, or the sense of ourselves. We're looking outside again. We're jumping over, we're overlooking the attitude of mind, of heart. "No, no, I need this. I need this. I need this." And in that moment when we see this—we've shifted to the wise intention of renunciation. We've put down the claim in that moment, just for that moment. And we discover we're already home.

I mean, there's the larger renunciation of form in this particular tradition—people who take robes, nuns or monks. I myself lived for about a year as a precept nun in Thailand. And it's true, my mind was kicking and screaming for a good two months. Everything that came into my vision—aversion, aversion. And I mean, it was my choice, right? No one held a gun to my head.

But really, the mind doesn't just say, "Yes, the coolness of renunciation! I'm so happy." But by the end of that time, I'd adjusted to the life in Asia. I'd adjusted to a lot. I won't claim that everything was wonderful, but the simplicity of that life really suited me. And the sense of space in my heart, in my mind, the sense of ease, the sense of joy—of course, I probably exaggerate in retrospect; we can't trust our memories. But I do know it's true that I was really happy the last few months of that time.

And it's given me a really strong appreciation of the beauty and power of simplicity externally, to just reinforce the possibility of recognizing the simplicity internally. Again, it's not that we have to have a simple external life. It's just easier to turn around and bring the mind home, or recognize it's really already at home. So just have a look for yourself. The mind does kick and scream, like Tapussa the householder said—we rejoice in sensuality, we don't even like to think about renunciation. But that's because you don't know what it is. You don't know how happy it really is.

I think also why monks and nuns are so honored and respected in Buddhist countries is that traditionally the householders have a great respect for the level of external renunciation that's required. And the longer you live like that, in some ways the bigger the renunciation, the harder it is. For me, I knew I wasn't going to live like that all my life, so there was a way in the background where I could think, "I don't have this now, and that's fine." The craving doesn't come up. But you have that little out in the back of the mind: "I know next year..." So it's not like I've given it up forever. I didn't have to look at that. Although that's just a thought, because who knows what's going to happen the next moment.

In some ways, our practice—just our moment-to-moment mindfulness, samādhi, whichever one you do in practice—each moment that you simply come out of a fantasy and feel the sensation in the foot, each moment that you notice disappointment is taking you away and recognize, "Oh, disappointment is like this," you come out of the identification, out of the wanting, and you just are aware with mindfulness. Each moment that we come out of a story, that we come out of a criticism, out of a space-out, and just recognize, "Oh, this is what's happening right now"—in a way, each moment of that is the hugest renunciation of all. Renouncing in that moment all your self-images, your self-ideas, your holding to fantasy, your constructions, your concoctions, your saṅkhāras—just for that moment, it's like, "Ah, just this."

In that moment, just for that instant, you've put down all clinging, all looking outside, all feeling of incompleteness and needing something else, all sense of self. "Oh, just sensations of pressure, tightness, calling it breath. Feeling of self-judgment is like this." I know, it's so simple. It's like, "Yeah, fine, right." The next moment, okay, the habit of clinging arises again. Concocting a view, concocting a story—it arises again. That's okay. But notice those moments of renunciation. We're already home. It's not that we got rid of something and created peace; we just turned around and saw, "Ah, peace is in here." And I'm not lost in clinging. And I'm not feeding that fire with cow manure. That's what it feels like usually—feeding fire with cow manure.

Anyone can renounce things, people, places, or lifestyles. Okay, we're already at a high bar here, right? Anyone can renounce that. But only a true renunciate renounces interest in her own mind—renounces her ideas, her beliefs, hopes, conditioning, her wounds, her defeats, her victories, her past and her future. That's the moment of true renunciation. Just renouncing the clinging, because in the moment there's no past or future. Victories, wounds—they're all thoughts, they're all imaginings. Just that pureness of presence, that's the moment of true renunciation.

This is what we can practice. In the mindfulness practice, or samādhi too, you just come back to the breath.

Without clinging, without aversion, you just put down the craving, the attachment that binds you to stories or wanting something other than where you are.

And we can also use it in terms of specific forms. If you notice you're really getting caught over and over in a particular thing, you might experiment with putting it down. Really look at how renunciation brings space to the heart, to the mind.

You might notice—see if this is true for you—how when clinging is getting strong, when we're uncomfortable, how when the mind hasn't quite gotten quiet, when something's disturbing it, how quickly the tendency is to fill up the space.

When you notice the ending of a thought: quick, get back to the breath, right away! Not just, "Oh, that's thought, it's over. Just space." No—do something. Do something!

You walk out and you're just walking. Look at the bulletin board. Go do something. "Oh, I have fifteen minutes and I just walked. I'm not ready to sit. It's going to be lunch. I've got to do something." So you read the bulletin board again. You read the back of the toilet bowl cleaner again. You go and wash your hands. You go and do something.

Or even in the sitting, nothing's really happening. You're just there. It's not like there's nothing happening that you can feel good about. It's just nothing's really happening. So you have to do something to fill up that space.

Just notice that tendency. What is it you're drawn to do? What do you get involved in? What do you get caught up in? Experiment with putting it down. Don't read, if that's your thing. Don't look at the bulletin board more than once a day, if that's your thing. If seventeen cups of tea is your thing and you're gagging on it, you don't want any more tea, but there's nothing else to do—put down the tea.

If it's looking at other people—how much do we look at other people? And for what? Don't judge it, but notice. Wanting to look, notice when you look, and notice what's the effect. How often does looking at other people really make you happy? Not too much. Not too much. Just notice that.

But remember that renunciation is a path of joy. It's not that the problem is in the forms, in the externals, or in our moods, or in anything. The Buddha said: "It is not the fetter of forms, or form of the eye, but whatever desire or passion arises in dependence on the eye in the form—that is the fetter. If the sense door, the eye for example, or the sense object, the form, or eating and food, whatever, was the fetter, was the chain, then this holy life for the ending of dukkha would not be proclaimed." It wouldn't be possible. "There is an eye in the Blessed One," he's saying. I have an eye. "The Blessed One sees forms with the eye. Yet no desire or passion arises in the Blessed One. So the Blessed One is well released in mind."

You get the sense. Forms aren't the problem. The eye isn't the problem. Renunciation is not trying to cut off life, cut off perception, cut off experience. That's not renunciation—that's aversion, fear. Renunciation is that ah, seeing sense contact with sati-pañña, and just putting down that looking down.

Anywhere else, looking outside to any degree for completion, for fulfillment—when we see the futility of that, what opens up is a great path of joy and space and coolness.

And it requires a kind of surrender, doesn't it? A surrender to just the truth of this moment. A total surrender of our beliefs, our expectations, our desires about practice, our ideas of who we are, of where we're going. A surrender even of our ideas of freedom. Our ideas of liberation.

This is on a moment-to-moment level. I'm not talking about something abstract or far away. We absolutely surrender all the concepts, the self-concepts, the expectations, and just land completely at this moment of contact. Without the mind moving out in any way, then the natural radiance reveals itself.

Can we trust that enough?

The more we recognize the burning nature and the futility, really, of this searching outside for the peace that's already here, the more the heart and mind naturally incline to the spaciousness, the coolness of letting go, of non-greed—or as Ajahn Amaro calls it, the peace and ease that is the natural peace and ease of the mind and heart.

Can we just rest in the peace and ease that is the natural peace and ease of the mind and heart? That's what renunciation opens us up to.

I want to end with a little poem from one of the nuns from the time of the Buddha. Mittakali was her name. She was turned to the Dhamma when she heard the Buddha give a discourse on the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. The texts tell us that up until this point in her life, she had the reputation of being a very difficult person—angry and self-centered. But when she heard the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, it changed her. She put a great sense of commitment into her life as a nun. And of course, she became an arahant—otherwise you didn't get your poem in this collection.

She wrote:

Although I left home for no home and wandered full of faith—
so the outer renunciation—
I was still greedy for possessions and praise.
I lost my way.
My passions used me,
and I forgot the real point of my wandering life.

Then as I sat in my little cell,
there was only terror.
I thought, this is the wrong way.
A fever of longing controls me.
Life is short.
Age and sickness gnaw away.
I have no time for carelessness before this body breaks.

And as I watched the elements of mind and body rise and fall away,
I saw them as they really are.
I stood up.
My mind was completely free.
The Buddha's teaching has been done.

CHAPTER 20

Ceaselessly Responsive

Carol Wilson · 59 min

In this profound talk, Carol Wilson addresses the essential balance between the wisdom of anattā (non-self) and the heart qualities of mettā (loving-kindness) and karuṇā (compassion). She explains that emptiness without compassion represents only half the picture—what Tibetan teachers call 'falling into emptiness.' The awakened mind, empty of intrinsic self, is described as 'ceaselessly responsive,' naturally manifesting friendliness, non-harming, and connected presence when confronted with the need to act.

Drawing on teachings from Nyoshul Khenpo, His Holiness the Dalai Lama, and Nisargadatta Maharaj, Wilson illuminates how the path from ordinary being to awakening involves the gradual opening from a narrow, self-referential mind to one that instinctively encompasses all beings. She connects this to the Buddha's teaching on sammā-saṅkappa (right intention), showing how intentions of ill-will transform into mettā, and cruelty into karuṇā.

Through compelling stories—including Mahā Ghosānanda chanting the Dhammapada verse 'hatred is never conquered by hatred' in Cambodian refugee camps, and civil rights leader James Lawson's nonviolent response to violence—Wilson demonstrates the power that emerges from truly knowing, not merely believing, our interconnected nature. She emphasizes that our personal suffering, when met with mindful compassion, becomes the avenue into understanding the dukkha of all beings, and offers practical guidance on noticing where we let our minds dwell and consciously choosing openness over contraction.

So the last three weeks I've been talking about anatta, non-clinging, various aspects of the suffering of identifying or clinging to any aspect of experience as self, and hopefully conveying some sense of the freedom of putting down the burden of constructing everything around the idea of me, me, me.

Tonight I just want to speak about the balancing manifestation of non-clinging, of emptiness, which is the second wing of the two-winged bird: friendliness, compassion, benevolence, connectedness of beings.

I know often the idea of anatta, of no-self, or just the idea of not clinging to anything in this world—the idea, not the actuality—can be less than attractive. Most people, I don't think, begin practice thinking, "Yes, let me achieve a state where I just really don't yearn for anything, where it's just that six-limbed equanimity, no movement towards or against, just cooled out." It actually, to me, sounds lovely. But it can seem unsettling or downright frightening, or it can be misconstrued as a sense of uncaring indifference, annihilation, basic psychotic disconnection. Of course, we all know it's none of that.

But still, if emptiness were the only manifestation, if that was our only aspect of understanding, there's a piece missing, a piece incomplete. Essential right view, anatta, no-self, is not about a kind of cold, indifferent void. Everything's empty of intrinsic self—me, you, and everything else—so nothing makes any difference. That's sometimes called falling into emptiness, and it's a great piece of delusion because it's only half of the picture.

The way the Tibetan tradition describes our empty nature is that it's empty of self, but has that radiant, naturally awake knowing aspect, and it manifests by being ceaselessly responsive. In other words, this empty, awake knowingness, confronted with the need to act, is ceaselessly responsive.

The natural expression of the wakeful, non-clinging heart and mind will be the response of wisdom: that of friendliness, metta, of benevolence, of non-harming, of compassion, of equanimity in the face of nothing one can do—equanimity which is connected but not trying to change that which can't be changed—and of appreciative joy, when that friendliness, that connectedness, that empty knowing connects with the joy of another. The natural response is appreciative, empathetic joy.

The natural expression of the mind, the heart of non-clinging, of this knowing—just in a moment, doesn't have to be forever, but just in a moment of really knowing anatta, no intrinsic self—the natural expression of this is that instead of the contracted, ceaselessly self-referential mode of responding to any experience, that contraction, that closure of me, me, me is gone. The mind of non-clinging, the heart of not clinging, is that of a heart and mind that is not limited, that is not contracted. And the natural expression of that is kindness, friendliness, compassion, or just, as one teacher said, doing the obvious—just responding in the obvious way that can be of assistance.

To me, even just on an intellectual level, never mind experience, it makes total sense. Because when there's that sense of me—and again, we've been talking about this all month—every situation we walk into, there can be that relentless, obsessive self-referencing about everything that happens. And the experience of that gives rise to separation, gives rise to greed, gives rise to fear, gives rise to need, to me and the other.

I can remember telling that little story about sitting in the airplane with the empty seats next to me, perfectly happy until I started realizing that it was an overnight flight, that if no one came and sat in those seats, I would get to lie down. And as soon as I realized that, every single next person getting on the plane was my enemy until they passed that row.

That experience is not totally unusual. I don't think I'm a total psychopath that I had that experience. It's that me-centric quality—it's all about me. Everyone getting on the plane only mattered in terms of what they meant to me. The mind, the heart is constricted, is narrowed. There's a sense of separation. Everyone else is seen only as how they reference me. We can see this all the time.

As soon as I saw what was happening, without getting into judgment, I just thought, "Oh, this is a lot of suffering." I just really felt that. And I was able to just say, "Okay, may you be happy." Let's just change it to metta. I could do that. That self-referencing just really dropped. And then the way that manifested—I didn't get up and hug everybody in the plane or anything. Just sitting there, nothing looked any different. But there was not anymore this sense of the enemy. It was just, oh, here we all are in the plane together.

It's not like a huge deal, but it is. The difference between that need to calculate and separate and protect and fear, and just the sense of "okay, here we are, whatever happens"—that's all. But it's huge. In that space of "well, we're just here together and I don't have to protect my seat at the expense of everybody else's comfort," there's just really not a problem. One does what needs to be done. It's an openness to life, rather than this constriction, this separation.

This is how Nyoshul Khenpo described it—he was a wonderful Tibetan Dzogchen master: "The difference between the impure and the pure mind, the deluded mind and the enlightened mind, is mainly a difference of narrowness and openness. In our present deluded state, our mind is extremely narrow. The more constricted and narrow the mind, the more it thinks only of itself, completely disregarding the well-being, happiness and suffering of others. Conversely, the enlightened Buddha is one who considers the infinity of sentient beings, rather than being concerned only with his own ego and individuality. Thus the entire path from ordinary being to Buddhahood is the gradual opening of mind. And that is precisely what we call the bodhicitta—literally, to grow and develop that enlightened attitude. The concept of growth is used here for the passing from a completely narrow attitude focused principally on oneself to an open loving heart whose scope instinctively encompasses the infinity of sentient beings."

So this natural movement from narrowness to openness—he's putting that down as the whole path in a way. And I really like it. First, it's completely normal and natural: the experience of heart, of friendliness, which you could call metta, of non-harming compassion, of happiness with others' happiness, of equanimity. These are not some incredibly esoteric, distant experiences that we have to endlessly practice to maybe somehow attain. They are a truly normal and natural response of the heart and mind that's imbued with wisdom in a moment. It's the natural, normal response of the truth of who we are.

All this fear and separation and self-concern is a kind of incredibly exhausting something we've learned, very unfortunately, way back somehow in the sands of time. It just takes up so much energy, and we get so involved in it that we don't notice enough, or maybe trust enough, or have confidence enough in the natural expression of the truth—of impermanence, of not-self. The natural expression of non-clinging is metta and compassion, friendliness and compassion, metta, karuna.

They manifest in terms of intention. Remember last week I talked about non-clinging, and that one of the ways we can cultivate, to move our noticing in the direction of non-clinging, is intention—the second stage of the Eightfold Path, samma sankappa. The intention of renunciation, letting go of clinging. The other two aspects of wise intention that the Buddha speaks about are how the intention of ill will changes to friendliness, metta, and that of cruelty changes to non-harming, to compassion.

So again, in this manifestation—this ceaselessly responsive aspect of the fact that there's no one home—the way that manifests is when we need to think, speak, or act. The intention, the motivation in the mind, is fueled by, is triggered by friendliness, compassion, non-harming. And as I said, this is totally normal and natural.

I was giving a talk on metta last week in Cambridge, and the example I like to give, just for how natural metta is: metta is really just the open state of friendliness, of well-wishing, that comes when our attention, our heart and mind, connects with the good, or connects with our common humanness—or common not even humanness, beingness. The natural expression of that is just a simple friendliness, well-wishing.

The example I gave is if you see two little kids playing, or two little puppies, and you're in a relatively open space. In other words, if you're completely self-absorbed in some big problem, you could see anything lovely and it just doesn't register. That's the self-absorption, the small mind, the small world. But if you're just walking out of here, open, present, nothing special, and you see two little kids running by, the natural response is just a kind of happiness, a kind of wishing them well. Your mind doesn't necessarily say, "May you be happy and peaceful and free from suffering"—that's a trained thought. But there's an "oh yeah," a wanting them to be happy. You don't say, "Hope that little kid—what is he doing?" Unless you're in a bad mood. And the bad mood prevents the connection in that moment. Same if you see a little puppy. It's just normal and natural. It's not some big esoteric state.

And in the same way, that open-hearted connectedness, when it naturally connects with suffering—the normal response is compassion, empathy with the suffering. And if there's a movement or something to do to help, one would do it. Doing the obvious doesn't require rocket science. So if the kids are playing and one of them picks up a two-by-four and starts whacking the other one in the head—hopefully we're not so lost in some mindfulness state that we don't respond.

That's a little missing piece there—missing the connection.

We also wouldn't grab the two by four and hit the kid with it to show him, right? That would be overreaction. But the empathy of attention that connects with suffering—we'd feel the suffering of both. The suffering of the kid getting hit, the suffering of the kid who's hitting. And we'd intervene, one hopes. We would intervene in whatever way: take the stick, do whatever. But with this connectedness, this compassion that can see that there's harm without hating the one, loving the other, making good or bad, and just doing the obvious. This is not rocket science. Not unreachable.

Two things. One is to realize that it's the natural manifestation of wisdom, the natural manifestation of our understanding of practice, of the way things are when our delusion is not in the way. So it will happen naturally and strengthen. But also, through our mindfulness, through our practice of noticing what's going on here and now in this mind and body, we actually will begin to see more and more times that we have a choice where to let the heart and mind dwell. We, more than we know, have a choice to stay in that closed creation of separation and fear, or to choose openness, friendliness, compassion. It doesn't mean we're choosing ultimate, total bodhisattva bodhicitta, but that we do have a choice. Like that time when I was sitting in the airplane—I didn't do some big deal, but I saw what my mind was doing: the separation, the enmity, the fear. And I said, "You know, I don't need to do this. Let me change the channel." Sometimes that's all we need. So one thing is realizing that we do have a choice.

The second is really looking and seeing: Do we each actually have the confidence, the trust? I don't want to say belief, because that's kind of too intellectual—but the actual confidence in the depth and power of friendliness, of compassion, of connectedness out of emptiness as a way to be, to live, to act, to relate in this world. I know from the culture it's not exactly what might have been what I was taught verbally. And there are many people who act in ways that really inspire and show me this is possible. But I wouldn't say it was the predominant message that comes in from all the different aspects of culture that we're exposed to.

In any case, I think it's just worth a look, over and over: Where do I place my trust, my refuge? Where do I choose to let my mind dwell? And do I really know there's a choice?

One of my favorite lines from the Buddha: "Whatever a person frequently thinks and ponders upon, that will become the inclination of their mind." So just bear that in mind. Without judgment, without negativity, just notice what your mind frequently thinks and ponders upon, left to its own devices. And that becomes the inclination. We're all of us old enough to see there are quite some habits going through this mind. That's one of the things that really shows up in the silence of retreat—the inclination of mind. And what's really being shifted on this deep level through mindfulness, or through metta and karuna if you're practicing metta, is the habit of where we let the mind dwell.

So do we really believe it's a possibility to choose friendliness, to choose compassion, to choose non-harming? Do we think we have to wait until we're an arhat for it to naturally manifest? The Buddha spoke of liberation of the heart, which is love.

I know many of you have heard this story. I just like it because it shows the power of really knowing—not believing, but knowing the actual truth of the unified nature of our being and the expression of that as love. Do you know the story of Maha Ghosananda? Do you all know who Maha Ghosananda is? He's very old now, and I think he's getting kind of senile. He's a Cambodian monk, and he got out of Cambodia during or after the time of the Khmer Rouge, when so many millions of Cambodians were killed. He's a Buddhist monk, and Cambodia was largely a Buddhist country. Since that time, he has been all over the world. He's been a real peace activist.

He's the real inspiration for the Cambodian people, known as a true metta being. He's done peace marches through Cambodia and has been quite an activist.

So he came out of Cambodia into the massive refugee camps where so many had fled from the Khmer Rouge. And he, along with probably almost everyone else in the camps, had had most, if not all, of his family members murdered. He comes to this refugee camp where there are thousands and thousands of people coming out of starvation, torture, murder, terror. They're living in this refugee camp. I can't even begin to imagine what that would be.

He came to the camp—he wasn't so famous at this point, but they recognized him as a monk and a symbol of their religion and culture. He set up a little place, perhaps a small temple, and people came to hear him give a talk.

This is just what I heard: What he did was start to chant. Remember, these people in Cambodia were Buddhists, so they would be familiar with the specific chant as well as with what it was saying. But he just came, and in the power of his heart—what do you say to people whose lives and everyone they love is destroyed?

He simply started chanting: "Never by hatred is hatred conquered, but by readiness to love alone. This is the eternal law."

And he just kept chanting that over and over. After a while, other Cambodian people started chanting it until they were all chanting it together.

To me, it's a lovely story. But the point it brings to me is this: one couldn't go and do that from thinking it's a nice idea. He couldn't walk into and be the carrier of that level of destroyed life, of so much violence and suffering, and chant that and uphold that and bring people together—unless it came from a place of absolutely knowing that it's true. That hatred is never conquered by hatred. This is an eternal law, only by love alone.

Maybe we don't know that every minute, but do we know it in some moments? Can we trust enough to access that level? This is the truth of who we really are. Not some idealistic idea of how we should look, how we should speak, how we should act. That doesn't hold up. It doesn't work. It has to come from our deep understanding. And this is what our practice is opening up to us.

To me, it's one of the reasons sangha can be such a refuge—because of the conflicting messages we get from culture. Well, I do. Maybe you don't pick them up. There are quite a few other messages in all different cultures.

I read this on the BBC news last summer about a new bar in China, in Nanjing. It's called the Rising Sun Anger Release Bar. It's a bar that lets customers smash glasses, rant, and even hit specially trained workers. The owner, Mr. Wu, was inspired to open the bar by his experiences as a migrant worker. He has employed twenty men who've been given special protective gear and physical training to prepare them for the job. Most of the customers are women who work in the service or entertainment industries.

They went out on the street interviewing people. The clients can ask the men to dress as the character they wish to attack. One woman said the idea of beating someone dressed as your boss seems very attractive. "We get no place to vent anger." This place was in the news because it was really taking off.

But they interviewed another man on the street who said, "No, no, violence is not the answer. You need to adjust your lifestyle or seek psychological treatment."

So Mr. Wu's dealing with that too, because for the most stressed-out cases, he has counseling available from psychology students he recruited from the local universities.

That's one message we get—that we have to vent our anger, there's nowhere to do it, and you feel better if you do.

So where are we putting our trust? Where are we taking refuge? Again, it's not a should, but looking deeply and seeing what's really true for me.

And remember, every moment can be different. We can't control externals, but we can begin to take responsibility for our own actions, our own minds and hearts. This isn't a judgment thing. This is really seeing and trusting that the natural response of a moment of awakened mind and heart is metta, is love, is compassion. You don't have to create it, but we do have to pay attention.

You know that story about the two wolves? I'll read it. An elder Native American was teaching his grandchildren about life. He said to them, "A fight is going on inside me. It is a terrible fight. It is between two wolves. One wolf represents fear, anger, envy, sorrow, regret, greed, arrogance, self-pity, guilt, resentment, inferiority, lies, false pride, superiority, and ego"—and add your own. "The other stands for joy, peace, love, hope, compassion, sharing, serenity, humility, kindness, benevolence, friendship, empathy, generosity, truth, faith. This same fight is going on inside you and every other person too," the grandfather added. The grandchildren thought about it for a minute, and then one asked his grandfather, "But which wolf will win?" The old Cherokee simply replied, "The one you feed."

That's what I mean about paying attention. The Buddha used that image all the time—feeding and starving. It's very interesting that he used that exact image. Noticing how we pay attention. What states of heart and mind are we feeding? What ones are we starving? Are we taking refuge in states of mind that can create and continue the sense of separation or superiority or self-judgment or fear? Or are we taking refuge in the sense of compassion, of just meeting what's happening without judgment, of generosity, of mindfulness?

There was an interview I heard on public radio the year the Red Sox won the World Series and beat the Yankees. This is baseball. This is American. It's a big deal if you like baseball and you're American. And if you lived in Boston, it was a really big deal because the Red Sox was the Boston team. Anyway, it was an over-the-top big deal.

So this was an interview with a Red Sox fan right at the end of the World Series when the Red Sox had beaten the Yankees. This fan said, "The joy was not in the winning. It was in the sorrow and misery in the Yankee fans' eyes. It's like a dichotomy, if you know what I mean." And this fan said, "This was the best moment of my life." Oh my God—judgment, judgment.

Then they interviewed a Yankee fan. And the Yankee fan said, "This was the worst moment of my life." The interviewer said, "Don't the Red Sox deserve to win sometime? Because the Yankees, they always win." And this Yankee fan said, "Yeah, sure—when I'm dead."

And I'm sure they all thought they were having a good time. I mean, it's supposed to be about a good time, isn't it, sports? So what wolf are we feeding?

When we hear a story or meet someone or have an experience that inspires us—like when I think about Maha Ghosananda and his chanting—I personally feel really inspired. It touches something in me. And for all of us, we all have different things that inspire us.

Another important point I want to make is that that inspiration inspires not just because of that person, but because they are bringing out a truth that's already an expression of who we really are. That we can even feel inspired is proof that this is an aspect of who we are. So rather than thinking, "They're so good and I'm such a worm," it's much more useful to notice: ah, inspiration, appreciation of goodness, appreciation of the possibility of kindness and love. You don't have to jump to "I am" or "I'm not," but just let in the supportive, onward-leading power of that inspiration, opening to it, beginning and continuing to deepen where we put our trust.

And at the same time, we can consciously cultivate friendliness, connection, compassion.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama teaches that compassion develops through two things: deep insight into what suffering is—and that insight arises by focusing on our own experience—and second, compassion strengthens with a sense of empathy, connectedness with all beings, that wisdom aspect of non-separation. Compassion develops and strengthens by deep insight into our own suffering experiences on one side, and also deep connection to our oneness with all beings.

This is one of the reasons why the difficult times in retreat are so important. They're essential. Sometimes I think they're the most growth-producing, most wisdom-producing aspects of our retreat—the difficult times, the times we stumble, the times we're flat up against some really suffering pattern of our mind. And the times we think, "I know this, I've seen this a million times. Enough already, I'm done with this." And then of course you turn around and it comes up again. Self-judging, arrogance, greed, delusion, whatever.

The fact of its presence—it's arising due to previous actions, previous karma. These are the habits of our mind, where we've been in the habit of letting our mind dwell. Whatever it might be. Self-judgment's a good one. Arrogance is another. Striving is another. Comparing, all that stuff. That it's arising is simply the past karma, the vipāka, karmic result. How it's met in this moment—that's the new karma that's being created.

So our self-judgment comes up. We're really caught in it. It's it. "I've had it. I'm out of here." Oh, right. "I've had it." It feels like this. Just that willingness to be here for it without adding anything extra—that's a huge shift from trusting in the negativity, the separation, the ideas of perfection, all the things that are wrong with me. That's a huge shift from that to friendliness, just like this, compassion.

You really see then that your suffering is the same as the suffering of the world. Seriously, when you're all wrapped up in self-judgment—and granted, self-judgment is totally all about me, it's about the most me-centric thing there is going—but you know what? I haven't spoken to everyone here, but I've spoken to a lot of people. I can tell you, if you're completely caught up in your judging, you are not alone. You're with about 98.5 percent of any yogi I've ever talked to. So you can't even take yourself judging personally. You can't even build up a whole story about how you're the worst person on the planet. It's just another symptom of the dukkha of being a person. It's completely impersonal.

And so if you can meet even self-judging—just feel the pain of that. Wow, how much suffering is that? And then we realize it's just like a stand-in experience for the dukkha of all beings who are suffering, who are judging themselves. There's a way that our personal suffering, when met with just this clear-eyed mindfulness really, friendliness, non-judging, becomes the avenue into this oneness with beings, this natural compassion for the suffering of all beings on the planet.

The suffering, the difficulties, the demons we meet in our practice here—they're very important. This is where we're really understanding emptiness and compassion. And you don't get a nice little sign: "Yes, this is difficulty, and this is what percentage you're learning from it." We don't get self-fulfillment from it. That's why it works. If you really duke it out judging yourself and you had a little thing here that said, "Yes, but if you just stick with it, three more bad thoughts, you're going to really have this much more compassion," right? Would that work? It would just feed our ego totally.

So we have to be in there with nothing personal to show for it, nothing to refer back to, and just surrender. And then it touches that tenderness of the human heart, that tenderness for life. Our suffering is all suffering.

Really start to get a sense of the difference. We can have the idea that compassionate action is good—really sincere, ideal, mean it, want to act from that—from the intellect down.

But it doesn't have the depth, the power, the stay-with-it-ness that comes from really knowing we're not separate. The kind of compassion that comes from really being able to be with your suffering, with another's suffering.

Let me give you an example. Actually, today—this morning—I turned on NPR, the public radio news, and it came on in the middle of an interview with somebody. I was sort of listening, and right away they were talking about nonviolence, the theory of nonviolence. So I was interested. And after just a few lines, I recognized who it was. The man being interviewed started talking about Gandhi and how he'd studied Gandhi's teachings. It was a man named James Lawson, who has always been very inspirational to me for many years.

I actually have something I wanted to read about him, since hearing him talk on the radio this morning made me so happy. They introduced him as a leading theorist on nonviolence, and he has been since the Korean War. He was in divinity school during that time and had studied some of Gandhi's teachings in India. When the Korean War came, he was a conscientious objector. He said, "I just cannot go to war. I cannot commit violence." As a conscientious objector, he could have been deferred for being in divinity school, but he said no—it's not fair. There was a draft at that time, and he said it's not fair for him to take a deferral when other people can't. So he went to jail. He spent fourteen months in jail.

They asked him in the interview what that was like, and he said—this is a quotation from him—"When I was in jail, I discovered a strength and power in me to live out of my own conscience."

Now, where I'd heard of him before: he did discover a strength and power. During the civil rights movement in the late fifties and 1960, in Nashville, when there started to be sit-ins, James Lawson was one of the leaders of that whole movement. He was training the students, because that was a period when a lot of college students—mostly African-American students—were doing sit-ins and being subjected to a lot of violence, a lot of horrible stuff. James Lawson was one of the trainers in nonviolence, because he was deeply, deeply committed to nonviolence based on Christian love.

So this is what I wanted to read today, from a book about that period—an example of his acting from that place of knowing the power, the commitment to nonviolence and love. Not as it should be, but from that power he speaks about: the strength and power to live out of his own conscience.

This is a story about the marchers in Nashville demonstrating for the right for African-Americans to eat at lunch counters in downtown stores. They were marching, and a bunch of white motorcycle toughs attacked the two guys at the end of the line while the other marchers were ahead. They knocked one down, and the second guy, Bernard Lafayette, came and threw himself on the first guy to protect him. Then they were beating on Bernard. Jim Lawson saw what was happening and walked over. He didn't rush over—he just walked over calmly.

When he arrived, it shifted the attention of the white toughs from the guys they were beating to James Lawson. The thing about Jim, Bernard remembered, was that he was so self-assured, so confident, as if he were accustomed to dealing with white toughs beating up black demonstrators every day. The leader of the whites was wearing this DA haircut and a black motorcycle jacket. He was really enraged when he saw Lawson's coolness, and he spat at him. Lawson looked at him and asked him for a handkerchief. The man, stunned, reached in his pocket and handed Lawson a handkerchief. Lawson wiped the spit off his face. Then he looked at the man's jacket and started talking to him. Did he have a motorcycle or a hot rod car? A motorcycle was the answer. So Jim asked a technical question or two, and the young man started explaining what he had done to customize his bike.

Amazingly, Bernard thought, these two men were now talking about the levels of horsepower in motorcycles. A few seconds earlier, they had seemed to be sworn enemies, one ready to maul the other. By this time, both Solomon Gordon and Bernard Lafayette were back up on their feet, the line was moving again, and Jim and the young man were still talking about the man's motorcycle. In that brief, frightening moment, Jim had managed to find a subject which they both shared and had used it in a way that made each of them more human in the eyes of the other.

As they walked away, Jim waved to the man. The man remained still, neither accepting the friendship nor, for that matter, rejecting it. It had been a marvelous example of Christian love for Bernard.

That really inspires me—that power and courage that truly comes from knowing on a different level what's true and what's possible.

It was interesting because in the conversation today, the interviewer kept asking him about violence, about the Middle East, about what happens when someone's trying to kill you. And James Lawson kept saying, "You're asking the wrong questions. You're looking from the wrong angle. It's really about a completely different configuration of power and where real power comes from." That just reminded me so much of the awakening that comes from practice. It's really about a completely different way of looking at ourselves, at life. That's what is true.

So we really look and see: Where do we take refuge? Do we even have the sense that this could be possible? Because if deep in our heart we think, "This is a waste of time, this is impossible, that can't happen"—if that's the story we're telling ourselves over and over—that's what we're going to end up believing, taking refuge in.

That's why mindfulness as a tool, as a practice, is so powerful. A moment of mindfulness—just meeting that thought that says "this is impossible," meeting the fear, meeting the self-hatred, meeting the pain, meeting the disdain you feel for someone else, meeting whatever arises—mindfulness is just totally present without adding extra, without belief or disbelief, without pushing away, without holding on. And because it's not falling into our usual denial system, it just meets whatever happens, it allows the possibility to perceive in a different way. That's what I was talking about in previous weeks: perceiving more accurately allows us to see that it's not all about me.

So if we do start noticing the story we're telling ourselves is "this is impossible, my ego is too strong," whatever—we don't give up. We notice that. That moment of noticing it, that's mindfulness. It's a moment of freedom from that story. And you just have to notice that to see, "Oh yes, a whole other way is possible."

Nisargadatta Maharaj said, "Once you can say with confidence, born from direct experience, 'I am the world, the world is myself,' you are free from desire and fear on the one hand and become totally responsible for the world on the other. The sorrows of humankind become your sole concern."

We all have moments where we can maybe see that I am the world, the world is myself. Our particular sorrows can be the avenue into really opening to the sorrows of humankind—with that connectedness that allows us to care, with the wisdom that allows us to see if there's something we can do to help. Great. If there's not, we don't need to turn away. We can still stay open, still stay connected.

But also, if we don't meet—it's not just about difficulties, it's also about beauty, about joy. And if we don't meet suffering with some wisdom, we can really drown, just as you can fall into emptiness if there's a sense of no-self without compassion. If we go for the compassion without the wisdom, we also fall off the side.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama says that compassion must be supported from our insight into emptiness of inherent self. This is where the vast meets the profound. Knowing that people's suffering is avoidable, that it is surmountable, our empathy, our sympathy for their inability to pull themselves out of it leads to a more powerful compassion—the same thing Nisargadatta was saying. But without that knowing that their suffering is avoidable, without that emptiness, our compassion may be strong, but it is likely to have a quality of hopelessness, even despair.

I can certainly relate to this. If I look at the state of the world and specific instances—you want to fix this, you want to help this, you want to do that, and of course you can't help everything or fix everything. If that's looked at, even just our own suffering, just the suffering of our family—looking at my aging parents, doing what I can, but unable to take their suffering away—if that's not met with the knowing of emptiness, that it's not just all about the particular personality, it's unbearable. So compassion and non-self support one another. They allow us to deepen in wisdom and love, really from the inside out.

Just paying attention to where you let your mind dwell. When it's on suffering, if it's your own suffering, really meeting it with kindness, with compassion. Knowing that that's your avenue into knowing that we're the world. Sometimes when I'm on retreat or off, I can't get there for my own suffering. It's too much. It's eating us up. We're drowning in it or we're just shut down or we're afraid or we're just in a self-judging loop. So then sometimes I'll switch and just notice, in the big picture—not in a drowning way—but just the suffering in the world. It keeps my heart open and connected.

So whenever I hear a siren going—a police siren or an ambulance siren—I just like to, in myself, stop a minute and let it in. Someone's life is really changing right now. I don't know whose, I don't know how. In the city, how much do we hear sirens? Just little things like that. Whenever you see a crushed animal on the road. Whenever you—well, reading the news, my God.

Sometimes it's overwhelming, and then we need to see that we're drowning in it. But sometimes when I feel disconnected and shut off and I can't open to my own suffering, tuning into that of others, I can really see the impersonality in dukkha, in difficulty. Mine, theirs—it's all the dukkha of the world, and it connects us to beings.

On the other hand, we need to recognize when, as the Dalai Lama says, it's getting overwhelming. Sometimes we get so that we only focus on the suffering—our own or others'. We think the world is in such bad shape that to really cultivate compassion, we need to keep focusing on what's wrong, on the pain. And we drown. We're not balanced. That's not the complete truth either.

So just as here in practice we talk about really using skillful means when you're bottoming out—to contemplate something inspirational, to maybe shift to metta, or maybe to just open your field of perception and notice something beautiful, notice something touching—this is really important because, as Sharon Salzberg writes, it reintroduces us to the fact that completeness and unity constitute our most fundamental nature as living beings. No matter how terrible or wonderful our lives have been, no matter what we have gone through or what we are suffering now, our natural innate wholeness is always present, and we can recognize it.

Oddly enough, sometimes we recognize our innate wholeness through suffering. Sometimes that's too much, and we recognize our innate wholeness through deliberately contemplating the beautiful.

If you can't find anything beautiful because the dukkha lens is on too strong, the Buddha actually recommends—and this is serious—to contemplate your own generosity. Really sit, reflect, and let in all the acts and thoughts and speech of generosity you've offered. Another practice is to contemplate your sila—your non-harming actions, your skillful, kind actions. Not necessarily generous, but not lying, not harming—all the kind and good things you've done.

If it's hard to let that in, if it seems egocentric—it's not. That's a kind of warpedness we've gotten into in this culture. But if you really contemplate your generosity—not like "aren't I a good person," but just remembering a time you've been generous, the doing of it and the receiving of it—happiness comes. A kind of wholesome happiness that brightens our mind, brightens our heart, and allows us to then open again, past creating fear and separation.

So again, really looking at where we choose to let our mind dwell—and more than we realize, we do have a choice.

The last thing I want to say is about the power of mindfulness in all of this. This is Sharon again: "Gratefulness of being, which we might experience as happiness, can also be described as love. To be undivided and unfragmented, to be completely present, is to love. To pay attention is to love."

I want to close with a poem I often read, because it's a great example of this—how everything is here in paying attention. It's by Mary Oliver, called "Singapore."

In Singapore, in the airport, a darkness was ripped from my eyes.
In the women's restroom, one compartment stood open.
A woman knelt there, washing something in the white bowl.

Disgust argued in my stomach and I felt in my pocket for my ticket.

A poem should always have birds in it.
Kingfishers, say, with their bold eyes and gaudy wings.
Rivers are pleasant, and of course trees.
A waterfall, or if that's not possible, a fountain rising and falling.

A person wants to stand in a happy place, in a poem.

When the woman turned I could not answer her face.
Her beauty and her embarrassment struggled together, and neither could win.
She smiled and I smiled.
What kind of nonsense is this?
Everybody needs a job.

Yes, a person wants to stand in a happy place, in a poem.
But first we must watch her as she stares down at her labor, which is dull enough.
She is washing the tops of the airport ashtrays, as big as hubcaps, with a blue rag.
Her small hands turn the metal, scrubbing and rinsing.
She does not work slowly, nor quickly, but like a river.
Her dark hair is like the wing of a bird.

I don't doubt for a moment that she loves her life.
And I want her to rise up from the crust and the slop and fly down to the river.

But maybe it will.

If the world were only pain and logic, who would want it? Of course it isn't.

Neither do I mean anything miraculous, but only the light that can shine out of a life. I mean the way she unfolded and refolded the blue cloth, the way her smile was only for my sake. I mean the way this poem is filled with trees and birds.

So let's sit quietly for a minute.

CHAPTER 21

The Stories and Poems of the Early Buddhist Nuns

Carol Wilson · 1h03

In this heartfelt talk, Carol Wilson brings to life the remarkable women of the early Buddhist Saṅgha through their own words preserved in the Therīgāthā (Verses of the Elder Nuns). She begins with Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī, the Buddha's aunt and foster mother, whose persistent faith led to the establishment of the bhikkhunī order, opening the path of renunciation to women.

The talk weaves together diverse stories: Paṭācārā, who lost her entire family to tragedy and became mad with grief, yet after meeting the Buddha became the foremost teacher for those suffering loss; Khemā, the beautiful consort so attached to sense pleasures that she had to be tricked into hearing the Dhamma, only to awaken instantly; Dhammadinnā, whose teachings the Buddha himself endorsed in the Cūḷavedalla Sutta (MN 44); and Puṇṇikā, the slave girl who fearlessly taught a Brahmin the true meaning of purification.

Wilson emphasizes that awakening came differently to each woman—some instantly, others after twenty-five years of struggle. The poems reveal both the challenges and triumphs of practice: Vaḍḍhesī's persistent effort despite decades without peace, elderly Bāhuputtikā's extraordinary diligence despite physical frailty, and Uttamā's realization of 'what is vast and empty, the unborn.' These verses remind us that the path to liberation transcends gender, caste, age, and circumstance, and that we too can be 'true daughters and sons of the Buddha.'

So this seems like a good way to end the year, taking the refuges and the precepts, recommitting.

Tonight I just thought I'd talk about appreciating the Sangha, basically recognizing that what we are doing—as I mentioned a couple of weeks ago—by the act of the commitment that you make in your life, the commitment you're making sitting here, we are taking our place in the line of active Sangha women and men that stretches back, at least in the Buddhist Sangha, 2600 years to the time of the Buddha.

The way I want to share tonight is through some of the stories and poems from some of the women who were nuns at the time of the Buddha. Some of their poems—the women's and the men's, though I'm just sharing the women's tonight—have been saved in some of the suttas at the Therigatha. And of course, there's only poems from enlightened women. Many others wrote poems, we know, that didn't get in there. But the poems and also some stories about their lives—some of them we know more about than others.

What I love about this is it takes away, for me, the sense of somehow being distant in time and maybe not real, maybe some kind of mythological thing. To actually hear about, read about the lives of these women and the choices that they made to become nuns—and many of them were practicing the Dharma well before they became nuns and awakened in daily life as well—is very inspiring to me, because the outer circumstances of their lives are of course different from ours, but I can relate to many of the inner circumstances. People don't seem to have really changed that much. It just really inspires me with the immediacy of the teachings, of the truth that the Buddha shared with us, and of our own capacity to understand this, to live from this truth, to really recognize it in our hearts. We're not so different.

These women—I can't talk about all of them—but they all come from very different backgrounds. Some were very wealthy and privileged, some poor. Some came to the Buddha out of great grief and distress, actually having lost their mind from grief. Some were tricked into coming. Some were dying to come and their husbands wouldn't let them, and they had to wait till their husbands died. Some came out of grief at their children having died. Some just happened to hear the Buddha teaching and got lit up. Some became nuns and right away that was it—like the stories you hear where they heard one talk from the Buddha and sixty people became arhats. But others struggled for their whole life and didn't really come to deep understanding until they were old. The whole range.

One of the things about the Buddha is that once someone joined his Sangha, women and men both, there was a radical change in how they were regarded. In ancient India—and it still exists in India today—the caste system was more than strong. It completely ruled your life. If you were born in the Brahmin priestly caste, that was it. If you were born in the lower caste, that was it. It determined who you could live with, talk to, the work you could do. Very segregated.

In the Buddhist Sangha, once you joined, there was no sense of caste. There was no sense of, "Well, this monk used to be a prince, so he should get better treatment than this monk over here who was an iron worker." It didn't matter. This woman was a courtesan. This woman was a prostitute. This woman was a poor slave. This woman was a queen. Once they became nuns, seniority was simply determined by the day that you joined. You were senior to the person who joined the next day. That was really quite radical in terms of the way the Buddha set up his Sangha. Even today in India there's still a huge movement of people in the lowest caste, the Dalit caste—which is a Hindu designation—to become Buddhists. Many of them for a few generations have been converting to Buddhism as a way of stepping outside of that really stringent caste system.

That's an aside. I just want to tell some stories and read some of their poems as they've been translated.

The first woman one has to talk about—you can't really skip over her—is Mahapajapati Gotami, because she is the one who insisted to the Buddha that he open up his Sangha to women. There had just been monks, men monks, for a while.

Mahapajapati Gotami was the Buddha's aunt, the younger sister of his mother. Before he was the Buddha, when he was Siddhartha Gautama, the young prince, his mother died when he was a week old. His aunt Pajapati Gotami was also married to the same king that her sister had been married to—the kings had several wives, lots of courtesans, it was a whole different scene. And so Pajapati raised Siddhartha as her own son. She also had a son herself, so she was really like his second mother.

At some point, after Siddhartha had left home—he was married, he left his wife, his son, went off, became the Buddha—he came back.

His family came to respect him, many became awakened—his father, many of his cousins, the men in his clan.

At some later point, after his father had died, Mahapajapati's husband was gone, and her son, the Buddha's cousin, had joined the order of monks. This left Pajapati without a male family member to live with. In the India of that time, even higher-class women—unless you were a courtesan or belonged to some special category—their place in society was defined by their relationship to a man: a husband, a father, or a son. And so she didn't have any.

At the same time, many other women looked to her for leadership. She was obviously a strong woman, the head of her clan. Well, she had married into the Sakya clan; her birth clan was the Koliyas. Her son, her grandnephew—they went off to become bhikkhus. And many other men in the clan did the same, just leaving the women behind.

Then the two clans, the Sakyans and the Koliyas, went to war over water rights in a river. These are the two families of the Buddha! So he came and spoke with both sides, established a peace, and eased the conflict between them. At which point, some of the men had been killed in that war, and many of the others were so inspired by the Buddha that they went off and became monks.

This left Mahapajapati and, it is said, five hundred women. As Andy Olendzki notes, when the texts say five hundred, it usually just means "a lot"—not really counted. So a lot of women said, "You know what? All the men are going off and ordaining. Why can't we do the same thing?" They had real faith in the Buddha. They saw the power of his teaching and its effect in their lives. And they said, "Let us go off too."

So they went with Pajapati. And through all of this, some of the qualities she demonstrates are enormous faith, real courage and persistence, a dedication. You'll see what I mean—she just doesn't give up. It's the courage of faith, of commitment.

She goes to the Buddha, whom she had raised like a son, and asks him—I'll read the translation: Standing at a respectful distance, she says, "It would be good, Lord, if women could be allowed to renounce their homes and enter into the homeless state under the Dharma and the discipline of the Tathagata."

And he says, "Enough. Don't set your heart on women being able to do this."

She asked three times, which is the requisite three times, at which point if he could say yes, he would say yes. But he didn't say yes. He still said no. And so after three times—that's all you could ask—she left, really upset, weeping.

Then the Buddha went off with the monks to another town, some couple hundred miles distant. So Mahapajapati and all the women with her shaved their heads and put on yellow robes. In India at that time, sadhus or renunciates, men and women, could go around in yellow robes. And they followed him.

When they arrived where he was teaching, it is said that Pajapati, Mahapajapati, was standing outside the door of the hall where he was teaching. Her feet were all dusty and bloody. She was standing out there weeping.

And Ananda, kind Ananda, comes along. Now, Ananda was also a cousin of the Buddha—they're all related—so she was his kinswoman too. He says, "What's going on? Pajapati, why are you standing here all dusty and bleeding and crying? What's happening?"

She says, "The Blessed One does not permit women to renounce their homes and enter into homelessness."

So Ananda says, "All right, I'll go ask the Buddha." And he goes and he says, "Pajapati is standing outside under the porch with swollen feet, covered with dust and crying, because you do not permit women to renounce their homes and enter into the homeless life. It would be good if women could have permission to do this."

And the Buddha says the same thing: "Enough, Ananda. Don't set your heart on women being able to do this."

The same response, three times.

Why? We don't know.

And I haven't personally found it very helpful to go there from this way of looking. But anyway, he said that.

So then Ananda, because Ananda is very persistent in wanting everyone to have access to the Buddha—that's one of the beautiful things about him as an attendant for twenty-five years. He's not trying to keep people away. You know how some attendants to famous people are like, "Get back, don't come too close to the famous person." Ananda's always trying to get everybody in to see the Buddha.

So he switched tactics. He said, let me try asking another way. He says, "Are women able, Lord, when they have entered into homelessness, to realize the fruits of stream entry, once returning, non-returning, and arahantship?" Those are the four levels, same as men. And the Buddha says, "Yes, absolutely. They're able. There's no difference."

So Ananda says, "So if women are able to realize this perfection, and since Pajapati was of great service to you—she was your aunt, your nurse, your foster mother. When your mother died, she even suckled you at her own breast—it would be good if women could be allowed to enter into homelessness."

And so at this point, the Buddha said, "All right, all right already, okay." And so he allowed it.

As time went on, he made special rules for nuns. And as I say, the special eight rules, the most unappealing of them being that any nun, no matter how many years, was less senior than any monk, even if the monk was a monk of one day. A little known thing is that some years later, Pajapati came back to the Buddha and tried to get him to take that rule back. So I think the women were probably the same then—it's like, "Enough of this. Take it back." But he wouldn't. From what I can tell, it seems more of a social thing. Anyway, who knows?

Anyway, he let women enter the homeless life. And so at this point, as you see, Pajapati had this real commitment and dedication based on faith. When she became a nun, all these other five hundred women became nuns as well. She was really the first true leader of the women. Many women looked up to her because of her making this happen, but also because of her setting the example by becoming a nun and living the homeless life. It made it possible for many, many other women.

If you read through the suttas, it just comes out that as time went on, the Sangha of nuns became a very strong community—many different communities, really. And you can see within it that women had their own personalities and their own way of manifesting their homeless life and their understanding. Some women became teachers, like Mahapajapati, who brought many other women in. The couple of women I'll tell you about next were ones who, just by dint of their personality, became teachers. But others were the compassionate, quiet ones who kind of kept the sangha together. Others were the organizational leaders. Others were more drawn to solitude and living quietly in silence—all in the way that their particular personalities expressed themselves. There was no one right way.

Let me read you some of Pajapati's poem—not the whole thing, but after she's awakened:

Homage to you, Buddha, best of all creatures, who set me and many others free from pain.
All pain is understood.
The cause, the craving is dried up.
The noble eightfold way unfolds.
I have reached the state where everything stops.

Look at the disciples all together, their energy, their sincere effort.
This is homage to the Buddhas.

Maya gave birth to Gotama for the sake of us all.
She has driven back the pain of the sick and the dying.

Did you catch that second to last stanza? That's us. "Look at the disciples all together, their energy, their sincere effort. This is homage to the Buddhas." It really hasn't changed.

In Thailand, which as you know is a Buddhist country, it has happened over the years that in the Theravada tradition, the bhikkhuni order—which is the status of nuns that the Buddha organized through Pajapati, really on a par with the bhikkhus—ended up having more rules. That bhikkhuni order hasn't lasted in the Theravada. Somehow it all died out. And so ordained nuns in Burma, in Thailand, in Sri Lanka take eight to ten vows. There are really many more that are subsidiary—not exactly precepts, but many other rules that the nuns live under. But they're not formally bhikkhunis.

In Thailand, there's a woman—this is from the New York Times, just a couple of years ago. She's a Buddhist scholar, Chatsumarn Kabilsingh. She taught as quite a well-known Buddhist scholar in Bangkok, married, in her fifties. And a few years ago, with the consent of her husband and her grown children, she went to Sri Lanka and ordained in another tradition as a bhikkhuni, then came back to Thailand. And so she's living now as a fully ordained bhikkhuni, really committed to keeping this line of women renunciate practitioners going. In Thailand, this is very political, and she gets a lot of flack from some of the monks, while others really support her. It's a whole political thing. But that she's doing this, keeping it alive today—I think it's really quite inspiring.

This is just one thing from her. She's talking about the politics. She said, "This is a conflict between ignorance and right understanding." Her name is Dhammananda now. She quotes the Buddha, which he did say: the health of Buddhism, the health of the sasana—the whole of disciples practicing this—the health of the sasana depends on four pillars: male and female monks, male and female lay people. He did say this, that all four are necessary for a healthy and vibrant sasana to continue. Male and female monks, male and female lay people. So Pajapati's commitment has really had a profound effect and continues to.

Now I'll tell you about another woman who became one of the most well-known teachers—one who became so strong in compassion because she came through so much suffering herself. It's said that once she was an awakened nun, she's the one whose name was mentioned the most in the other poems of women as one of the nuns who brought them to the teaching. Her name is Patachara.

She's one of those, you know, going from bad to worse stories. It would be like worse than the worst soap opera on television, where each new thing makes you think, "Come on, it can't get that bad." But this is her story.

She came from a banker's family in Savatthi, so quite well off. When it was time for her to be married—as you know, in India at that time marriages were arranged, and of course within one's own caste, one's own social class—she had fallen in love with a servant. Her parents would never permit that, so they ran off together, got married, and settled in another town.

She got pregnant, and in the Indian tradition, when you get pregnant, you go back to your home village, your parents' home, to give birth. Even so, she wanted to do that. Her husband, understandably, wasn't really too keen to go back. So he procrastinated and procrastinated. Finally, she started on her own. But she was so pregnant that she had the baby on the way. Her husband came after her, found her, and they went back home.

A year or two later, she got pregnant again. The whole cycle repeated. She started off, and this time he caught up with her. She was about to have the baby again, halfway there, and a huge storm started up. So she's having the baby there in the field. Her husband goes off to collect boughs and reeds to build her a shelter. He goes off and doesn't come back. It turns out he was bitten by a poisonous snake and killed while he was off. She has the baby in the rain, doesn't know what happened to her husband, gets up afterwards, goes out, and sees him lying there dead. Pretty intense.

So what is she going to do? Nothing else to do but get up with the newborn and the little boy and start walking towards her parents. They get to a river that normally is fairly easy to cross, but because of the rains, it's swollen with a huge current, and she can't walk over with both children. So she has to take each child one at a time. She takes the newborn, puts it down on the bank, starts back over. She's halfway across, in the middle of the river.

A giant bird of prey comes down and grabs her newborn baby. She starts screaming. The other little boy thinks she's calling him, so he jumps into the river. The baby is gone. The little boy is swept away in the current, and she cannot save him.

She gets up and staggers on towards her parents' village. She arrives there almost crazed, reaches the outskirts, and runs into some man. "All I want to know is where is my parents' house, where are they?" she asks. The man says, "Ask me anything, but don't ask me that." She says, "What do you mean? Don't even ask me." She persists. He says, "Well, there was that—see that smoke over there? In the huge storm last night, a tree fell, knocked through the ceiling of the house. It fell and killed your parents and your brother. That's their funeral pyre."

That was it for her. She lost it and basically lost her mind. Just went crazy. For—it doesn't really say how long—she was just going about mad, walking in circles. People made fun of her, threw things at her. You know how people can be. Her clothes were falling off, becoming rags. And finally, at some point, she came to the Jeta Grove where the Buddha was teaching. She's on the outskirts of this crowd and the people are saying, "This mad woman, get away, don't bother the Blessed One, you should stay away, you're too crazy," throwing things at her.

But of course, he saw what was happening and called her to him. She came up with no clothes on, and some kind man gave her a cloak. The Buddha just looked at her and said, "Sister, recover your presence of mind." And she did at that moment—just enough to look at him and say, "Help me." He asked, "What's happened?" And she tells him the story.

What he says really touches me because it's just so—this is the truth. Nothing like "Oh, I'm so sorry, that must be hard." Just, this is the truth. He said, "Patachara, don't think you have come to someone who can help you. In your many lives, you have shed more tears for the dead than there is water in the four oceans."

It's kind of counterintuitive to what I would think—that he's like, this is the truth. But this made her grief less heavy. He went on to say that when she herself went to another world, no family can help. No family can help you when you die. And you can't help your family when you die. And he spoke of the Buddhist path.

This made her want to become ordained. It wasn't one of these "Yes, I'm completely awakened" moments. But it made her see: okay, there's more to this than I know, and can I become a nun and join your path? So she did.

She had periods of difficulty. She didn't just la-di-da awaken right away and start teaching. She had to struggle for some time. But when she did, her poem is a really nice one. I like it because it describes the exact moment of her awakening—what she was doing. That's kind of cool. It's also a good advertisement for a willingness to be mindful no matter what you're doing, not just when you're sitting on the pillow. Sometimes those in-between moments are when awakening happens. What's going on with her is she's had a period of strong concentration, and then she just relaxes it a little bit, still paying attention but not with that strong concentration, and that's when she wakes up.

So she's saying: "When they plow their fields and sow seeds in the earth, when they care for their wives and children, young Brahmins find riches. But I've done everything right and followed the rule of my teacher. I'm not lazy or proud."

"Why haven't I found peace?"

Does that sound familiar? "But I've done everything right."

"Bathing my feet, I watched the bath water spill down the slope. I concentrated my mind the way you train a good horse. Then I took a lamp and went into my cell, checked the bed, and sat down on it. I took a needle and pushed the wick of the lamp down. When the lamp went out, my mind was freed."

I get chills. I can just see the whole thing, so present. "When the lamp went out, my mind was freed."

Obviously, many women were drawn to Patachara once she joined the Order, but especially those who had experienced periods of deep grief. I read somewhere that of the women whose stories we know about, eighteen had been mothers, and six of them came having experienced the death of a child—something that happened rather frequently in those times.

I want to read a couple of poems from women whom Patachara helped. This one is from Chanda. She was originally from a wealthy family, but they lost all their wealth and possessions when she was a child, so they became quite poor. Then a mysterious plague came through—I mean, life was hard. This plague came through and killed everybody in her family except for her. Her grandparents, her parents, her siblings, her entire family, her husband, her children—only she was left. She became a beggar.

So this is her poem: "I was in a bad way, a widow, no children, no friends, no relations to give me food and clothes. I was a beggar with a bowl and stick and wandered from house to house in the heat and cold for seven years. But I met a nun who had food and drink, and I went up to her and said, 'Take me into the homeless life.' She was Patachara. Out of pity, she guided me in leaving home, encouraged me, and urged me to the highest goal. I took her advice. It wasn't wasted. There are no obsessions in my mind."

Another point I like about this is: "I met a nun who had food and drink." It's practical, realistic. You care for people. They need to eat and drink. When some starving person comes, you don't just start preaching the Dharma. They need to eat, they need to drink—you take care of people. I like that. This is just one of many examples of people Patachara helped, women that she helped.

Now, this is a different woman who also became one of the most respected teachers. She was said to be foremost in preaching—in other words, she could give a good talk. They always kind of labeled everybody: foremost in wisdom, foremost in preaching, foremost in compassion. This is Dhammadina.

Actually, in the Majjhima Nikaya, number 44, there's a whole sutta that consists of questions asked to Dhammadina. Dhammadina is answering the questions, not the Buddha. It's included in the canon because after this series of questions and answers, the person who was asking her went to the Buddha and repeated it all. And the Buddha said, "Yes, what she said is just what I would have said." That elevates it to what's called "word of the Buddha." So we have a sutta from Dhammadina.

She didn't have a time of suffering. She was the wife of a man named Visaka, who was an important man in Rajagaha, and they had a happy marriage. They were very content together. Whenever he'd come home from his day of business, they'd eat together—which isn't that usual—and talk and share.

One day when he went out, he met the Buddha and got so inspired by the Buddha's teachings that when he came home, he just kind of walked past Dhammadina without saying hello, without sitting down. And she's wondering, "What's the matter? Is he angry?"

What did I do wrong? You know, right away, that's where her mind went. What did I do wrong?

And he called her after a while and said, "No, I heard this man, the Buddha. I'm so inspired. I really want to... I'm thinking of renouncing, becoming a bhikkhu. That leaves you, but I will give you all my wealth. You can really do what you like with it. You can live here at ease and comfort. You have all my wealth. You can go back to your family. It's completely up to you. But I really feel this call to be a bhikkhu."

So she thought about it, and she thought, well, if he can do that, why can't I? I too want to renounce. So she said that, and he supported her in that too. He called for a palanquin and took her to the nuns, and she became a nun and went off and practiced and became quite accomplished. She practiced intensively. She is said to have attained the highest insight and awoke.

Sometime later, after she was awakened, she went back to Rajagaha, and to her great surprise, her husband had never actually gotten it together to become a bhikkhu. Well, what did she care? She was an arahant. She didn't care. And she went back, and actually he was the one asking her all these questions that made it into the sutta, because he realized, wow, Dhammadina is a respected bhikkhuni at this point.

So she doesn't have a poem so much. She has the whole sutta, which I'm not going to read to you. Just one line—when he's asking her, "What is meditation?" She says, "Meditation is the focusing of the heart." So she became the foremost in preaching. And her husband just kind of drops off the map of history. We don't know what happened to him.

One other happy story, because then there are a number of unhappy ones. Although Patachara took the cake for unhappiness.

Khema. Khema is the opposite of Patachara in that she was incredibly beautiful. Khema means "gold skin." Whenever they talk about someone being beautiful, they always talk about them having golden skin. She was the chief consort of one of the famous kings of the time, Bimbisara. Now, consort is not wife. He would have had all his wives and then his consort. She was the chief consort, a position of great respectability, a great deal of fame really, and comfort.

So she was quite conceited, actually, because she was incredibly beautiful. She had this high position. She loved sense pleasures and beauty and everything. Bimbisara was a disciple of the Buddha, and he would try to get Khema to go and hear him, but she wasn't interested. She said, "Look, I've heard. He puts sense pleasures down. He's not really into beauty. I don't want to go listen to that."

So she would never go. So Bimbisara tricked her. The Buddha was staying and giving teachings at a hermitage that was said to be really beautiful, a really beautiful park. So Bimbisara hired a lute player, a poet and singer, to sing about how beautiful this grove was, the beauties and pleasures of this place where the Buddha was teaching. So he went and sang this to Khema, and she couldn't resist it because she was really into beauty and sense pleasures. So she said, "Okay, okay, well then I'll go."

What I like about this is that sense of how we really don't want to hear. I like my beauty. I'm attached to my status.

I don't want to hear anything that's going to take it away from me. I'm happy like this, thank you very much.

So she went, and the Buddha, of course, with his mind that could read what was happening in everyone's awareness, needed only to see her on the outskirts of the crowd to know who she was. And he could also see that actually she was very ripe for awakening.

So what he did, with his amazing mental powers, was project the image of an incredibly beautiful female goddess—like a hundred times more beautiful than Kema. And she loved beauty, so she was completely entranced. She thought, "Wow, that's so much more beautiful than I am." Not with envy, just entranced.

And then the Buddha had this image of the beautiful goddess gradually, gradually go from youth to middle age to old age. Her hair turned gray, her teeth started decaying, her skin became all wrinkled, and she just kind of withered away and died. And then Kema, who was no fool, thought, "Huh, that's going to happen to me."

Then the Buddha gave her a pithy little talk about how some people are devoted to physical beauty, and so they're bound to the world. And people devoted to pleasures of the senses are bound to the world. One who renounces this world of attachment is free in their heart, in their mind. Of course, he knew exactly what to say—that's one of the wonderful things about receiving a talk from a Buddha. They know exactly what to say to touch you.

So Kema is one of the rare occasions of a layperson being completely awakened on the spot—all four stages, right then, hearing that talk. Not for nothing is she considered foremost in insight.

This backfired on Bimbisara, of course. Because as soon as she was completely enlightened, she went and said, "Look, I can't be your consort anymore. I have to go and become a nun." Which of course she did. So she was the nun with the greatest insight, and she was one of the two women who ran the whole order of nuns, kind of in charge.

Her poem is not one of the greater ones, in my totally personal opinion, but I'll just read you a little of it so you hear her voice:

Everywhere the love of pleasure is destroyed, the great dark is torn apart, and death, you too are destroyed. Fools who don't know things as they really are revere the mansions of the moon and tend the fire in the wood, thinking this is purity.

Here she's talking about rites and rituals.

But for myself, I honor the enlightened one, the best of all, and practicing his teaching, I'm completely freed from suffering. Everywhere the love of pleasure is destroyed. The great dark is torn apart.

That's the line they use a lot: "The great dark is torn apart."

There's also a story where King Pasenadi of Kosala—who was another very serious disciple of the Buddha, actually more serious than Bimbisara—came looking for the Buddha for teachings, or for a senior monk for teachings, and there weren't any around. But Kema was around. And so without hesitation he went right over and sat at the feet of Kema, and listened to her teachings with the same appreciation and respect as if it was any monk or the Buddha himself.

At that time, that's really something. Just a realization within the Buddha's sangha that awakening insight has nothing to do with gender or status or history or life situation. Really available to all and respected as it is in whoever manifests it.

A very different story, which I also like, is very spunky—based on the commitment of verified faith. This is Punika.

She was a slave, so a very different social experience, the daughter of a slave. Apparently there were many men and women who were slaves, kind of a situation where if their parents were, they were. She was actually a slave in the house of Anathapindika. Anathapindika was the most generous of all the Buddha's supporters, and also a sotapanna. So it doesn't jive with our understanding of culture at all, that someone like Anathapindika could have a slave. But anyway, she was a slave.

In her poem, her poem tells the whole story—she had to carry water down from the river and carry water up. And when she's down at the river one day... Interestingly enough, it seems that women who were slaves or servants often had more freedom of movement than upper-class women. There are several stories, and in this one, Punika the slave is able to go out and actually hear the Buddha's talks, where many of the upper-class women are kept secluded in their houses, in their families, and they can't go out.

There's another story, maybe if I have time I'll tell it later, of another servant, not a slave, who goes out, hears the Buddha's talks, has this amazing memory, and comes back and repeats them all word for word to her mistress. And they all together get enlightened through this woman who actually remembers all of these teachings. Her name is Khujjuttara.

She remembered all these discourses, and actually the ones she remembered and came back and told to her mistress, whose name was Samavati, are collected in one of the small books in the suttas called the Iti Vutaka, which contains the sayings that Kujutara remembered and came back and told to her mistress.

In this case, Punika the slave was able to go out and hear the Buddha's teachings, and she had become a Sotapanna, a first-stage awakened person, at this time. She goes down to the water to bring it up to her mistress and ran into a Brahmin, a Hindu man from the Brahmin caste, who was doing ablutions in the river, like they bathe in the Ganges. The belief was that by washing yourself in the water, you could wash off all your previous bad karma and purify yourself. And she basically, as you hear in the poem, just lights right into him and says, "What are you doing?" Really what we would call speaking truth to power, but with real clarity, just speaking the Buddhist truth.

I'll read you her poem. It's a dialogue poem.

Punika says: "I am a water carrier. Even in the cold, I've always gone down to the water, frightened of punishment or the angry words of high-class women. So what are you afraid of, Brahman, that makes you come down to the water? Your limbs are shaking with the bitter cold."

And this man, whose name is Uddhaka Suddhika, says: "You know why, Punika. I am doing good to prevent evil. Anyone young or old who has done something bad is freed by washing in the water."

Punika says: "Who ever told you that you were freed from evil by washing? The blind leading the blind. In that case, all frogs and turtles would go to heaven, and water snakes and crocodiles and the rest of the water creatures. Thieves, executioners, and other wrongdoers would be freed from their bad karma by washing in water. Also, if these streams carried away all your old evil, they would carry away your virtue too. Just don't do that thing, the fear of which leads you down to the water." She's tough. "Stop now, Brahman, and save your skin from the cold."

And he says—and she's won him over, this is how it happens—he says: "Lady, I was on the wrong road and you brought me back to the great road. I will give you the robe I bathed in."

And Punika says: "Keep your robe, I don't want it. If you're afraid of pain, if you don't like it, then do nothing evil, either openly or in secret. For if you do, even if you get up and run away, you won't escape its pain. If you're afraid of pain, if you don't like it, take refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha. Train in the precepts. This is good."

It's a little mini-lesson on karma.

Uddhaka Suddhika says: "I take refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha. I train in the precepts. This is good. Now I am a true Brahman, I am washed clean"—meaning washed clean by the precepts.

There is that sense that when you know verified truth, there's no fear to say what you know, and it carries. The truth communicates itself.

And that's not the end of her story. She did want to go off and become a nun, but being a slave, she wasn't free to do so. She asked the Buddha to help her, and he basically spoke to Anathapindaka, who of course immediately released her, adopted her as his daughter, and she became a nun and became completely awakened.

That aspect of confidence—confidence in our own understanding, confidence in awakening, confidence in awareness—it's really important. It's what gives us the faith, the courage to keep on practicing. It's not something to brush aside with "Oh no, not me, I don't really know anything." What we really know, not ideas but our verified faith, it's kind of incumbent on us to share it. It communicates itself.

Not everyone who became a nun popped awake right away, as I said. Khema, before she even became a nun, is a really rare case. I'll read you a couple of poems that perhaps we can relate to.

One is from Vadesi. She was one of the five hundred who came along with Mahapajapati Gotami; she was actually Pajapati's old nurse. So she wasn't so young at the time they ordained, and she still struggled for another twenty-five years. She had a hard time being a nun.

And it makes it clear that it's not easy for everybody. This was a way that one chose, but that doesn't mean it's just kick back your shoes and be enlightened and cruise under the tree for the rest of your life. It can be really quite a lot of struggle.

So this is Vadesi. Susan Murcott says her persistence comes through, that she really had to struggle for those 25 years:

It was 25 years since I left home, and I hadn't had a moment's peace. Uneasy at heart, steeped in longing for pleasure, I held out my arms and cried out as I entered the monastery.

I can just see it, you know.

I went up to a nun I thought I could trust. They say this was Dhammadinna. She taught me the Dharma, the elements of body and mind, the nature of perception, and earth, water, fire, and wind. I heard her words and sat down beside her. Now I have entered the six realms of sacred knowledge. The eye of heaven is pure and I know the minds of others. I have great powers and have annihilated all the obsessions of the mind. The Buddha's teaching has been done.

So she clearly attained a lot of psychic powers, which are kind of like a sideline, not the main thing. But it's interesting—after 25 years of not having a moment's peace, she finally broke through. You just never know. It's like trying with a hatchet to break open a stump—you hit it a hundred times, and 99 times nothing happens, and the hundredth time it opens. But you can't discount the 99 times. You can't discount the 25 years.

One other one. Number forty-two. This woman became a nun out of great sorrow. Her name is Sama. Her best friend, her dear friend Samavati, was the high-class woman I mentioned before, whose servant Khujjuttara would go out and memorize the suttas of the Buddha and come back and teach them to Samavati and all her women who were in the court. Samavati was, as the Buddha said, quite awakened, even though she was a laywoman. And she was known as the laywoman most renowned for being filled with metta. She just pervaded metta and everyone loved her—except her husband's other wife. Her husband was a king.

That other wife didn't love her. In fact, she murdered Samavati. Samavati and all her women were in a house, and this other wife caused it to be locked up and then set fire to it. Samavati and all of her women were burned to death in that fire. And this was precisely the point of the Buddha's saying that Samavati had been the most accomplished in spreading metta.

So anyway, this other Sama was Samavati's dearest friend, and she was so upset at this murder—that this could happen to someone so filled with metta and so devoted—that she became a nun. But her mind was always distracted. She didn't have an easy time either. This was another case where that stock phrase appears:

It was 25 years since I turned away from home and I hadn't had a moment's peace. I had no peace because I did not know my own mind. Then suddenly I was shaken with dread, remembering the words of the Conqueror.

That's the Buddha.

Because of the pain of things, I love to be alert. I have finished with craving. The Buddha's teaching has been done. It is the seventh day since my craving died.

I love that one. "Because of the pain of things, I love to be alert." She sounds like an aversive type to me, whereas the one before, who was lost in wanting things, was more of a greedy type—both suffering. "I finished with craving. The seventh day since my craving has died."

Alright, just a couple more. There are quite a few stories of women who only became nuns when they were really old. When I was a nun in Thailand, about 20 years ago, there really weren't so many nuns as there were monks. And quite a few of the nuns were really quite elderly. It seemed that they would become nuns sort of when their families were gone and they didn't really have someone to take care of them.

Not all nuns were like that, but you could really see a lot of it.

Well, here in the Therīgāthā there are some women who became nuns when they were quite old—but not in the same way, where they're just hanging around being taken care of because they have nothing else to do. These women were really sincere.

One of them was simply called Dhammā. She's the one I mentioned who wanted to ordain, but she waited until her husband's death because he didn't want her to. Like a good wife, she stayed with her husband. And in her old age, after he died, like a shot she went off to become a nun in the Buddha's sangha.

Her poem is interesting because she actually woke up through experiencing the misery, the unreliability of her old aging body:

I wandered for alms.
I leaned on a stick.
My whole body was weak and trembled.
Suddenly I fell down and could see clearly the misery of this body.
My heart was freed.

You see, when we talk about really seeing dukkha, it's not to make us suffer more. She really saw, and her heart was freed.

Another old woman wrote this poem when she woke up:

Though I am thin, sick, and lean on a stick,
I have climbed up the Vulture Peak.

That's a really high, rocky hill. So she climbed up it, shaking on her stick.

Robe thrown down, bowl turned over, leaning on a rock—
then the great darkness opened.

In fact, the nun who was commended by the Buddha for the strongest capacity for effort, who was really celebrated for her diligence, was a woman who only became a nun when she was quite elderly.

Her name was Soṇā, and it's said that she had seven sons and seven daughters, and she was wealthy, and they were all married. When she was old, she said, "You know, instead of you waiting until I die to inherit my money, why don't I divide it equally among you all now, and then I can just take turns traveling and living with each of your families. It's not that long in a year—fourteen of you."

And they said, "Oh, sure, Mother, we'll take care of you."

So that's what she did. But as she traveled from family to family, they became less receptive, less welcoming, treating her like the old mother-in-law in the way. So finally she said, "Okay, enough of this. I'm out of here. I'm going to become a nun."

By the time she joined, she was old and feeble. She couldn't do much. Some of the other nuns had her doing simple little chores, but they made a little bit of fun of her for being so old. She would bring them water and just do what she could.

But she was so committed. She was so committed to awakening.

The story goes that one night, the other nuns were all out, and she was just committed. She was just going to do her walking meditation. She had to hold her hand up on a wall to hold herself up because she couldn't see, she was so shaky, so old—but she was just committed to her practice.

The Buddha saw this with his mind, and he appeared to her like a radiant vision and inspired her. And it so inspired her that she awoke that night. Then, according to the commentaries, she became a complete arahant.

Now, one of the classic rules is that you don't go bragging when you're awakened. You don't show up and say, "Okay, ladies, now I've done it, so a little respect, please." So she'd become an arahant, but the next day she came bringing the water in the normal way.

However, it's really unwholesome karma to insult an awakened person in any way. It's just not a good thing to do. So she came the next day, and they sent her to heat up the water and were about to berate her a little because she was so slow.

She knew she had to do something so they wouldn't have a chance to berate her now that she was an arahant—because it would be really bad for them. But she also couldn't just announce it.

So with the concentrated power of her mind, she caused the water to be heated.

I guess she knew tummo yoga somehow. And she caused the water to be heated. Seeing that, the other nuns knew. They simply knew.

Just like when Ananda, after the Buddha died and there was the council of five hundred arhats getting together to repeat all the suttas, to begin codifying the teachings—they really wanted Ananda because he was the one who remembered them all by heart, but he wasn't yet an arhat. There's that story of how Ananda had to practice really hard the night before to become an arhat, and he was just giving up, just lying down, giving up. It's always said it happened in the one posture that isn't any particular posture—he was just about to lie down, halfway between standing and lying, when he awakened. So again, the way he signaled that he was an arhat is that he simply appeared, magically, sitting at the table with all the others. And they said, "Oh, okay, you did it." That was the sign.

Just to know, the one who was most known for her energy, for her effort, was Bahupitaka, a really old woman. So age—even health, as long as there is wakefulness—is not in the way.

Just two more. This one is kind of humorous—I find it humorous. A woman who was clearly happy to have left her marriage and become a nun. She is known simply as Sumaṅgala's Mother, not by her own name:

Free, I am free!
How glad I am to be free from my pestle.
My cooking pot seems worthless to me,
And I can't even bear to look at his sun umbrella.
My husband disgusts me.
So I destroy greed and hate with a sizzle.
And I'm the same woman who goes to the foot of a tree
And says to herself, "Ah, happiness,"
And meditates with happiness.

And then I'll end with Uttama, because I just like her poem. She was another one of Paṭācārā's disciples, from a Brahmin family. I don't know too much else about her. This is her poem:

The Buddha taught seven factors of enlightenment.
They are ways to find peace, and I have developed them all.
I have found what is vast and empty, the unborn—
It is what I've longed for.
I am a true daughter of the Buddha, always finding joy in peace.
I have ended the hunger of gods and humans,
And I will not wander from birth to birth.
I have no thought of becoming.

May we all be true daughters and sons of the Buddha.

CHAPTER 22

Mindfulness Has No Preferences

Carol Wilson · 50 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines a fundamental question posed by Sakka, king of the gods, to the Buddha in the Dīgha Nikāya: why do we continue to act in ways that cause suffering despite our sincere intentions to live wholesomely? The Buddha's answer points to our deeply ingrained habit of holding to preferences—our constant evaluation of experience as pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral, and our compulsive grasping and aversion based on these assessments.
>
> Wilson weaves together Buddhist teachings with contemporary psychological research, citing Harvard professor Daniel Gilbert's studies showing that humans consistently misjudge what will make them happy. She illuminates how this pattern of 'miss-wanting' reflects the Buddha's teaching on vedanā (feeling tone) and the three root afflictions of lobha, dosa, and moha (greed, hatred, and delusion). Drawing from the Sutta of the Two Darts, she explains how untaught worldlings compound their suffering by resisting painful feelings and seeking escape only through pleasant experiences.
> The practical heart of the talk addresses how these same habitual patterns infiltrate our meditation practice—how we unconsciously evaluate our sitting by whether it feels pleasant, judge ourselves when concentration wavers, and seek confirmation through particular experiences. Wilson invites practitioners to recognize that awareness itself has no preferences; it can meet any experience arising in the six sense doors without needing to change or manipulate anything. True freedom, she suggests, comes not from arranging pleasant circumstances but from resting at ease in whatever arises—just this.

So, a little bit as I mentioned this morning, or alluded to, it's kind of interesting, or mystifying, or frustrating, depending on your particular mood on a particular day. But I find that most of us have a really clear, sincere intention to live as good a life as we can. To cultivate the wholesome, to cultivate the good, to be good to others, to be happy in our lives, not to cause harm. And still—maybe I'm the only one, but I don't think so—we find ourselves saying and doing things that cause ourselves suffering, cause other people suffering, that aren't really at all how we think we want to live. How does it keep happening?

This relates to the whole path, but I just want to come in from a particular angle tonight, starting with a sutta, a part of a sutta from the Dīgha Nikāya, about when Sakka, king of the gods, comes down to the Buddha. Now, king of the gods means he's living in one of these heavenly realms that really has quite a lot of pleasant experience and also goodness, not just total sensual pleasure. But he comes down and says to the Buddha, in the middle of the sutta, "What is it, dear sir, that even when we are delighting in the wholesome—and what is the fetter, what is the bond?—that we think, 'May we live free from hostility, free from violence, free from ill will,' we really want to live in a wholesome, good way. What is it that we still find ourselves living in hostility, living with ill will, living with confusion, violence, rivalry—all of that—even when we're trying to delight in the wholesome and do our best?"

Now, this is Sakka, king of the gods, so we could cut ourselves some slack.

The Buddha, of course, gives a complex answer that I'll just speak about a little part of tonight. But he says the bonds, what we're fettered by—the first answer he gives is envy and covetousness. That's our first problem: holding on to things, not being generous, trying to protect for ourselves. And that is caused by holding to preferences, by holding on to our choices for what is dear and not dear, which is a more specific translation. Since when dear and not dear exist in our minds and we hold on to that, we hold on to preferences. This, of course, is fed by desire. Desire is fed by thinking about it. Thinking is fed by the endless papañca, the proliferation of thought.

So that's what I want to talk about tonight: this point of having and holding to preferences. Just one of the many ways we do that. Do we even see that as a problem, as part of the root source of our suffering? That we maybe don't see it as a problem might be part of the problem.

Holding to preferences. Often when one reads this, or we talk about it, it comes up in many people's minds: "Of course we have preferences. We're not just dead slabs of meat. We know what's pleasant and unpleasant. We make choices in our life. The Buddha made choices in his life. We have to vote. We have to make choices when we go through the food line. We have a preference. We know the difference between rice and beans, the difference between cooked and uncooked oatmeal," and so on. The mind can get quite wigged out going through all that.

Remember, it's not the having; it's the holding to them.

Realizing that having and holding to preferences really arises from each of us, from our deep yearning for happiness, for peace. The Buddha said it, the Dalai Lama says it in lovely ways: we all experience an innate inner desire for happiness and to overcome suffering. That's normal. That's not an unwholesome, bad thing—that we have a yearning, a real yearning for happiness, to overcome suffering. That's what gets us on a path.

We wouldn't be here if we just said, "I have no preferences and I don't care. I suffer, I don't suffer, what's the difference? I cause suffering, I don't, what's the difference?" Of course we make some choices. That's what gets us on a path.

But then it's seeing that we don't actually—at least when we begin the path, and this keeps refining as we go along—really understand what happiness is. We want happiness. But the only way, at least in the world at large, as the Buddha uses the phrase "untaught worldling"—he uses that phrase a lot...

For some reason, worldling—puthujjana—trips me up. But that's us, unless someone here is an arahat. We're untaught worldlings, puthujjanas. There's one phrase—I think John might remember—that describes them as simply mad. They're just mad. We just don't understand things in a way that brings us peace and happiness. And in trying to achieve happiness and overcome suffering in our untaught ways, our unenlightened ways—and I don't mean the big Enlightenment, I just mean unenlightened in understanding the way things are—we keep spinning and spinning, trying to be happy by doing what we think will make us happy. But that actually just keeps us in more suffering, because we're so confused we don't know what happiness is.

A few years ago, a friend sent me an article—I think it was actually from the Wall Street Journal—an interview with a man who was a professor in the Department of Psychology at Harvard, at least at that time. Together with several other scholars, including a Nobel laureate in economics and another scholar at Princeton, they had been doing years and years of study on the psychology of happiness and how we as humans predict what will make us happy.

Now, the name of this article is "The Futile Pursuit of Happiness." So that's going to give you a clue where it goes. I just noticed in the last year that this man, Daniel Gilbert, has a book out—which I assume, though I haven't read it, comes from this work he's been doing. The book is called Stumbling on Happiness. Basically, the gist of the article is that we don't have a clue what makes us happy, and we don't understand this. Now, this is just scientific study—it's not Buddhist-based at all, as you'll see.

Their study examined how we as humans predict what will make us happy, how we feel from the choices we make, whether our predictions are accurate, and how we feel afterwards. Gilbert says this is so important because almost all of our actions—the decision to buy jewelry, to have children, to get a new job, to come do a meditation retreat (that's not in the article)—are based on our internal predictions of the emotional consequences of these events. Or, as we would say in Buddhist terms, we're looking for pleasant feeling. We make our choices, as Ajahn Buddhadasa says, ninety-five percent of them based on pleasant feeling—getting and having more pleasant feeling.

That's not what they say in the article, but Gilbert goes on to explain that we make our decisions, our choices, based on thinking that this paycheck, this car, this piece of jewelry, having kids, whatever, is going to make me happy for the long term. And he asks: Do we even know? If we don't know what makes us happy now, how will we know what makes us happy in the future?

It's interesting because he says we basically "miswant," as he calls it. We don't really understand. We think something is going to be pleasant, and we think it's going to make us happy for much longer than it does. Conversely, something we think is going to be really unpleasant, we think is going to make us unhappy for much longer than it does. And he says we make the wrong choices in that way.

For example, if you were asked: Would you rather have a broken leg or a bad knee? Most people think, well, I'd rather have a bad knee because a broken leg would be really a lot of suffering. But actually, the broken leg heals much quicker. The bad knee is like ongoing, niggling suffering for years. Or consider: would you rather have a bad breakup of a relationship or a tense marriage? People say, well, no, I'd rather have the tense marriage. But that's going to drag out suffering, suffering, suffering for years. You have the intense breakup, and things aren't as bad for as long as you think they're going to be—and they're not as good for as long as you think they're going to be. But we never seem to get that.

He says, basically, we just don't understand. We don't have a clue what makes us happy, and we keep overestimating and making the wrong choices.

That's scientific evidence for what are basically the habits of mind I want to talk about tonight—the very basic ones. We tend to react to all experience: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, the whole range of mental experience, any physical sensation. If it's pleasant, we don't notice that, but we like it. We move toward it. We want it. If it's unpleasant, we tend not to notice that, but we judge it as really bad, wrong, shouldn't be happening—we move away. If it's neutral, we just kind of space out or get bored or look for something more intense. These are really strong habits of mind that we mostly don't notice. And then we make our choices through the veil of those habits. We look through it like green-colored glasses or something.

So when we're making choices—in our life and in our retreat and in our sitting—that's coming from this sincere yearning for happiness.

Just have a look. How many of our choices, how much of our perhaps not very clear idea of what happiness and freedom would be like—how much of it is pleasant? How many of us, when we think about when we finally finish this arduous practice and we're enlightened, imagine we're happy? And what does happy mean? Does your back still hurt? Are you still forgetting things all the time? Has that really unpleasant coworker who's always in your face suddenly stopped doing that? Has the whole world suddenly, magically started to work the way we wanted it to work?

I know we don't say that, but really, looking at it—we don't awaken into a different world. The world doesn't change. And people, with all their ideas and opinions—well, look around. It doesn't change.

Even the Buddha. And this is how ingrained this sense of assessing things by pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral can be. It was only a few years ago I suddenly realized: look at the Buddha's life after he became the Buddha, not even before—after. In terms of his life, it doesn't look like it was a piece of cake.

Sure, he had preferences. He made choices. He chose to live as an ascetic monastic—that's a choice. He made plenty of choices. He chose how to teach. He chose which things to talk about. He chose how to set out the rules and how the monastic life would be lived. He chose who his attendants would be. He made lots of choices. We're not saying there's this gray sameness where you don't have opinions and you don't make choices. It's the holding to them, thinking that choice is going to make me happy—that's the difference.

And so when the Buddha lived his life, he walked around India barefoot with a begging bowl for forty-five years. If you read the suttas—not that I've read all of them—but it's interesting to see that he had the same kinds of external beautiful experiences and problems that still exist. He couldn't fix the world. His clan's people on his mother's and father's side went to war with each other over water rights. He could come and mediate and stop the war sooner, but that was really all. A lot of the kings who would come to be his disciples—one king was a disciple, and his son killed him to take over the kingdom. The Buddha couldn't prevent that kind of thing.

And if you read about a lot of the people who come and talk to him, it's just like one big annoyance. If you weren't really equanimous, all these people coming and challenging him and not believing him, the different monks getting into squabbles with each other. There's even one sutta where two sets of monks are squabbling so much the Buddha goes to try and calm it down, and they basically say to him, "Oh, go away, we'll take care of it ourselves." They didn't even listen to him. The Buddha! People are people.

So he had all kinds of what we would call dukkha, stuff that's difficult. His back hurt. He got headaches. His main disciples died before he did, so he experienced that loss. It's just life. And yet he was the liberated one, the peaceful one, heart and mind free from suffering.

So clearly, if we believe that—and if we didn't, probably no one would be here—clearly the freedom, the happiness the Buddha's talking about is not about having external things, including external people, acting in the ways that we want. And we know that on some level. On some level. I don't know if we really know that. Because where do external things stop and internal things begin? And frankly, is it any different internally?

We're just talking about the six sense experiences: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, and mentality—thoughts and emotions. So whether the object is someone coming and talking to you and complaining about the other bhikkhus and whining and challenging you, or whether the object is the mind as you're sitting on the pillow being reactive—same difference. It's just unpleasant experience arising.

What's the suffering in the unpleasant experience? What are we talking about when we say not having preferences, not holding to preferences? Is it in the external life, but more in the internal life—not holding to preferences that things should be this way and not that way?

Not holding to the preference that I should have a really concentrated mind as compared to a mind that's scattered all over the place. Not holding to the preference that my back shouldn't hurt, and because my back is hurting, something's wrong. Not holding to the preference that I should feel this open, loving, open-hearted experience, and because it's not—it's closed down, it's tight—I must be meditating wrong.

But that's really not very easy for us to even wrap our minds around, never mind actually trusting it. This practice is not about getting things the way we want them. It's not about getting your meditation technique all together and perfect so that you sit down and it just flows every time. Because sooner or later something will happen and it won't flow, I promise you—unless you die. Sometime that will happen. Then something else will flow.

Meditation is sort of designed to bring up, to take us into every corner where there's holding to preference and we don't even recognize it. These habits of mind—judging pleasant as good, right; unpleasant as bad, wrong. The natural recoiling from the unpleasant. The natural holding, identifying, going towards the pleasant. And just the delusion around the neutral.

These, of course, are the three basic torments of mind, the three basic kilesa in Pali, the afflictions of mind: greed, hatred, delusion—lobha, dosa, moha. They're the big three. They're like the root from which all of our mental confusion and suffering grows.

In terms of exploring out of genuine interest how these habits are created and acted upon in any particular moment of experience—because this is something that arises and passes in every moment—working with noticing these habits in response to pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experience is really fascinating. It's a great way in to explore. It's ubiquitous in that with every moment of sense contact, the mind experiences it, feels it as pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral.

So vedanā, this translation of "feeling tone," is really a process of feeling. We're not going to notice it every moment—don't even try. But in many moments it is noticeable. And noticing how quickly, it's really fascinating, how quickly the mind moves. We know the mind moves incredibly fast from, say, experiencing pleasant to way down the road into a whole complex construction.

Chökyi Nyima, a wonderful Tibetan Rinpoche—he's the brother of Tsoknyi Rinpoche and Mingyur Rinpoche, four brothers—he talks about this. Just watch the fickleness of the mind, the unreliable nature of the mind, how easily it is influenced just by a pleasant or unpleasant sight or thought into an immediate mood. And then that mood immediately takes us into a whole world of construction, of creation.

I've been noticing this myself. It's really so much fun if you just approach it as exploring, as seeing how the mind works—how in this contact with pleasant and unpleasant the mind moves so fast. Just watch the construction come up. Watch how if we don't see it, we act on it, we believe it.

I was driving somewhere a couple of weeks ago—maybe it was a couple of months ago because I've been in Europe—but anyway, I was driving somewhere. Just calm, no traffic, nothing going on. I was turning from one road to another, and I was fairly quiet. I didn't have the radio on. My mind was pretty calm.

And I noticed, just as I was turning, that it was on a fast road. The car behind me was just a little too close. That's all. I turned. The car was a little too close, but it didn't turn—it kept going. And I noticed, just in that moment: the car's too close, it felt unpleasant, an immediate little aversion came up. That's not right. They shouldn't be so close. It was so subtle.

And I thought, whoa, what if I had been in busy traffic? That little aversion would come up—they're too close—and then I'd turn onto another road where I didn't really have to react to anything. But if you do that, and there's that little bit of aversion, and then another car cuts in, and there's a little more aversion, pretty soon you've got road rage in no time.

We don't really see how it builds until the poor last person who cuts in front of us bears the full weight of our accumulated frustration. But it starts that quickly—just "too close," then "it shouldn't be like that," then "I don't like it."

Or with pleasant. I was sitting, I think this morning, and just some image came up. You know how that is—just some memory, some image. It may not even have a thought attached that carries any meaning; it doesn't have to. Just some image came up, and I didn't notice "pleasant." I just noticed it felt nice. And right away: "Oh, that's nice." Then my mind brought up another, more pleasant image. "Oh, that's nice." And then it starts. In just two seconds, you're into a total pleasant fantasy, whatever way—it doesn't even matter what it is. Food, sex, vacation, having a nice sitting, whatever. The mind's just concocting things: pleasant, pleasant, pleasant—and poof, down the road you go.

Luckily, we're sitting on the cushion. That's what's so good about it—you hopefully won't act on it. Although here, because the bell doesn't ring on a fixed schedule, you might get up and just go get some oatmeal with hot water. But in our daily life, we can really act on these impulses. Not that the acting is bad in itself. It's the delusion—the acting while thinking this is going to make me happy. And we really think it. We don't even know we think it, over and over and over. "If only that car wasn't so close to me, everything would be okay." That's so deeply ingrained.

And so when we come to meditation—not just a retreat, but the way we relate to meditation itself, the technique, the sitting, the walking, the watching our mind—it's the same mind. Even though we come to the path of awakening really to see through how we suffer, at least when we start, we're starting with the same mind and we haven't even begun to see through it. Everyone here is past this initial stage; I know I'm saying things we all already know. But for me anyway, I keep falling into the trap, more and more subtly, where I'll see: "Oh, I was doing this for pleasant again. I was evaluating by pleasant and unpleasant again."

Just notice: we come to practice meditation and technique, and even if it's just being open to everything, it's a particular mindset, a particular learned activity. We're going to bring the same habits of mind to that activity that we bring to anything else, at least in the beginning—because that's all we know, and we don't even know that we know it. We don't even know what the habits of our mind are until we turn around and look and get really familiar with them.

So for many people, we come and we're practicing with really great sincerity, commitment, strong viriya energy. But so often that energy—whatever way we're putting it out, whether to feel the breath or to hold the form of sitting and walking or to work through sleepiness—however sincere we are, we don't notice how often we're putting forth that effort to get some reward.

Just check it out. "Reward" might not be the word we use. We're looking for results. How often are the results you're looking for pleasant? How often are the results even static? I mean, if you're looking for a particular experience, we all know everything's impermanent—but somehow not this experience, not the one I'm putting out all my energy to attain.

That's what it's all about. How often is the experience or the state we're seeking—and sometimes we're not even clear what it is until we look—somehow going to confirm me, a sense of me? I'm going to feel better.

So sometimes the state we're looking for, or why we think we're practicing, isn't actually pleasant. Sometimes people are really quite happy, they feel better and confirmed, when they start having some kind of emotional meltdown. They think, "Well, at least something's happening." I teach a lot of large retreats, and often someone will start really crying in the hall. That person usually feels embarrassed, feels like something's going wrong with their practice because they're crying when they should be calm and blissed out and concentrated. Meanwhile, the people sitting around them come to me and say, "What's the matter with me? I saw there was a person crying. They're really getting into their stuff, stuff's really happening, and I'm just sitting here noticing my breath and whatever comes. I'd much rather have some big, unpleasant knot of emotion to be working through."

So even though that's going for unpleasant, the sense of confirming me, of getting somewhere, is actually pleasant. Don't think about this a lot, but just notice how ingrained—how deeply ingrained—these habits are of assessing pleasant, unpleasant, neutral.

I talk about this often. I've been looking at it for years and years. On some level, obviously not deep enough, but on some level I really absolutely know this: happiness has nothing to do with pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. Dukkha, unreliability, includes all of it—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. But when the mind isn't calm, when I'm tired, when I'm getting caught on something—struggle, struggle, struggle—somehow when I just let go and see underneath, ah, it's slipped in again. This unpleasant experience is not supposed to be happening.

So I just want to drop in that thought for those of you here. If by chance, as you're here in these days of silence, something you don't like should happen to come up—in your mind, in your heart, in your body, somewhere in these days—notice what the attitude is in the mind that's paying attention.

We tend to get so involved in what's happening. "Oh, my heart is closed like a rock." "Oh, my back is killing me." "Oh, I'm having beautiful free flow of sensations." We get so involved, and we can be mindful. You could name very precisely what's happening and how it's happening. But we forget, or we neglect, or we're so familiar with these habits of mind that we often don't even notice we're looking through them, actually feeding the habits by how we're relating to the object. And it feels like we're being really mindful.

So with painful, "my heart's closed" emotion, the mind is saying, "You're no good, you're no good." And we can see that, we can name it—this is all what's happening. But we forget to notice, and when we turn around and notice, it's not so subtle. Oh, I can name everything that's happening, but you know what? I really hate it. And it's a sign that my practice is going nowhere. That attitude, that really not-so-subtle reaction, is not even noticed sometimes. Or when it is noticed, it's not with mindfulness. We totally believe it. We just totally believe it to the point that we can't let our awareness open and sink into: this is just what's happening.

And even when I say it, I can just imagine when we're in it and someone comes into an interview and we say it—you can see them: "Yeah, uh-huh, right, this is just what's happening, right, uh-huh." We suffer, we be with it, sometimes for a minute, sometimes for hours, sometimes, God knows, for days.

And if we're really fortunate, at some point we notice this reaction in the mind and recognize: oh, hating it feels like this. That's all. We move back and accept the hating it too. That's just another emotional arising. Hating it feels like this.

In that moment—that's Ajahn Sumedho's terminology—oh, it's like this. It's a great way to be really present and not feed the sense of "it's me." Oh, hating it feels like this. Wanting it different feels like this. In that moment, it's moved out of blindly acting from the habit, and the awareness is just noticing it. Oh, wanting it different feels like this. That's all. Awareness, again as Ajahn Sumedho says, is the point that includes.

It includes anything, everything. In the big picture, really the great secret of meditation practice is that awareness doesn't care. It doesn't care one bit what's happening. Anything that's happening—any of the six sense objects—when it arises, that's the chance to recognize it with awareness. That's the chance for awareness to become more familiar, more recognized. So any object is a doorway to awareness.

We tend to get so focused on the object that we don't turn around and notice what's coloring the mind that's paying attention. When we see it as wanting, when we see that it's aversion, when we see that we simply don't know—that's all. That's all we have to do.

Awareness doesn't care, but what strengthens the wisdom, what strengthens the awareness, is the steadiness—not steadiness of the object, but that willingness to show up. To just meet the wanting, to meet the pain, to meet the closed heart, to meet the hearing, to meet the sensation, to meet the smelling, to meet the thinking, to meet the not liking, to meet the judging. It really doesn't matter what it is.

In terms of technique, in vipassanā—not in samatha, which is really about cultivating a one-pointed awareness that shuts other things out and goes deep into one thing—but in vipassanā, which is what I'm speaking about now, the steadiness of awareness is the point. All the techniques of vipassanā are to help collect and balance the attention enough just to notice what's happening. What's happening happens by itself.

So whether we start with feeling the breath, or we start with feeling just what's happening in the body, or if the mind feels more at rest we can simply sit or walk and notice what's happening by itself—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, sensing, emotions, thoughts. And that also includes the reactions in the mind. That's another layer: wanting, preference, not liking, judging. It's all just happening.

The whole direction of vipassanā is to more and more trust the awareness. Less and less get all involved and entranced by whatever object it is and our reactions to it. What does it mean about me? Not much. Just steadiness, moment after moment after moment. The awareness strengthens, the samādhi of mind strengthens, and the wisdom, the understanding, also strengthens—pretty much by itself.

It takes some practice and some trust, right? Because, from what I said before, we want some confirmation. It's hard to trust unless we get some nice lights, if we get some big insight, if we get a sense of concentration. I know from experience, then my self-judgment can let down and I'll think, "Oh, the practice is going well, I'm concentrated, it's flowing, things are nice." And then it does flow better because the wanting, the preference, the self-judging isn't being fed. But we could learn not to feed the wanting, the preference, the self-judgment even when it isn't going nicely. Because it isn't about going nicely. It's just about awareness showing up for anything that's happening.

Joseph likes to say that our practice is simply coming back into natural wakefulness whenever we get distracted. What I mean by distracted—really the only thing I would call distracted is being completely lost and absorbed in thought with no awareness that that's what's going on. There's consciousness, certainly. Unless you're asleep or in a coma, there's consciousness. But you know how it is. You can be really in a thought. You can come out and go, "Oh, I was thinking." And you could say what the thought was about. So there was definitely consciousness. But awareness is the knowing that thinking is happening at the same time. Do you get a sense of the difference?

You know how if you drive, those times when you're driving and you suddenly realize you haven't seen anything for two miles? That's scary to me when that happens. How did I get here? The last thing I knew, I was way back there. Clearly, consciousness has been going on. The appropriate decisions, thank goodness, have been made. But there wasn't any awareness happening. It can be like that here.

We're really lost in that. That's what I would call distracted. But as soon as we're aware—oh, thinking is happening, hearing is happening, wanting is happening—we're no longer distracted.

So distractedness is not about thinking. Thinking is just as valid an object of awareness as anything else. Distractedness is not about the mind being away from the breath. Distractedness only means when there is no conscious awareness of what's happening. And the second we're aware—oh, I was thinking—again, we're here. There's nowhere else to go. We're here. Awareness is here.

So it's learning to trust that steadiness. Put out less forcing and more sense of trust of whatever's happening. And when we find we're trying to manipulate and change the object and fix what's happening, step back a minute. Just check what's going on in the mind and heart. Oh, I don't like it like this. Okay, not liking feels like this. I know the way I say it makes it sound very simplistic and easy and clear, and I know very well it's not always like that. But it's actually a lot more simple than we can trust somehow.

Someone just said to me at the retreat I was teaching last week—they were practicing and they came in and said, "Is it just that it's really this simple and I just can't believe it?" And it was true where they were coming from. The awareness was quite strong. Not every minute—we space out. But noticing a lot. The mind was getting less reactive. There wasn't so much wanting and aversion. They were really just noticing.

And the more it's like that, the less there is to do. And that's what they were saying: I don't trust this. I should do something. I should make something happen. This way, there's a lot less me.

A lot less doing. When there's no me, there's also less feeling of being confirmed, so we're kind of on different territory. That's great—when you feel like you're in unfamiliar territory, that's fantastic. Because what's familiar territory? Wanting, aversion, and delusion. That's what's familiar territory. We know to push away what we don't like and try to make things the way we want them and space out if it's new. That's what's familiar territory. So when we're feeling all familiar and it's in control, watch out. Check out what's going on in the mind that's paying attention. When we feel like, "I don't know what's happening"—that's great. Then there's interest, not to make a difference, but just to see what's in the mind right now. You don't have to ask those words, but just that turning around, having a look. Oh, yeah.

So back to the fickleness of vedana—how pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral changes so much. I want to go back to this article because he's talking about what I was just saying, what the Buddha talked about a lot, really. He's saying that we don't realize, when we want something pleasant, a pleasurable event, and we make a choice for it—we don't realize how quickly we will adapt to a pleasurable event and make it the backdrop of our lives. So when that happens to us, that pleasurable event becomes ordinary. And then through becoming ordinary, we lose our pleasure from it. And we don't recognize that this is happening. And so we go out and look for something else to give us pleasure because that first one lost. Do you notice? Can you relate to that?

And he says we keep moving on to the next thing or event, almost certainly make another error of prediction—not predicting that it will become ordinary—and then another, ad infinitum. Perfect description of samsara.

So really seeing this, seeing how the habit of our life, the way we know to do things, is to move from pleasurable event to pleasurable event, each time thinking it's going to make us happy. I don't think I can overemphasize from my own experience how deeply ingrained this is.

I'd say almost every real conflict that comes up in meditation has something about this at the root. We're looking for something to make us happy.

This brings us to the Buddha's teaching in the Sutta of the Two Darts, where he describes the difference between an enlightened person and an ordinary worldling. When an ordinary person is hit with a dart—a painful physical feeling—then on top of that they beat their breasts, they cry, they lament, they moan. They basically shoot another arrow at themselves. But an enlightened person, when hit with the first arrow—nothing. Just space. They don't create any commotion around it, no mental suffering.

But the next piece, I think, is what's even more interesting. Under the impact of that painful feeling, an ordinary worldling resists and resents it. And then, in one who resists and resents, the underlying tendency of resistance comes to underlie the mind. It becomes a habit. On top of that, an untaught worldling doesn't know of any other escape from painful feelings except the enjoyment of sense happiness. It's the only way out an ordinary person knows. So then they go and look for sense happiness, and the habit of lusting for pleasant feelings comes to underlie the mind.

Can you relate? We're feeling upset. We go to the refrigerator. We make a phone call. We go out to the movies. We take a hot bath. None of these things are evil. But it's that sense of, "This is unpleasant. Let me go for something pleasant." That becomes the habit of mind.

And what the Buddha says—to me this is so poignant, really sad—is that an untaught worldling doesn't know of any other escape from painful feeling except to go and get something pleasant. That's samsara.

This is what the habits of mind create, and certainly the culture feeds it. Our world is built on this—going for pleasant holds everything together. Dividing the world into pleasant and unpleasant, good and bad—that's where we're comfortable. That's where we take refuge. That's all we know how to do. Clinging is our refuge.

It's so poignant to me, but it also makes me feel so grateful that we have a path, that we know there's another alternative, there's another meaning to happiness than just the enjoyment of pleasant feelings. Without knowing that, it is just an endless cycle.

I want to read one last thing from this article. At the end, the interviewer is talking to Gilbert, and Gilbert is laughing. He says, "I should have learned more lessons personally from my research than I really have." He's laughing as he says, "I'm getting married in the spring, and that's because this woman is going to make me happy forever, and I know it." He finds it funny not because it's untrue, but because nothing could be more true—this is how he really feels. He says, "I don't think I want to give up all these motivations, that belief that there's good and there's bad and that this is a contest to try to get one and avoid the other. I don't think I want to learn too much from my research in that sense." This man spent years doing this research.

So I just drop that in. Not to judge ourselves, but just to look. When we're suffering, how are we relating to the mind, to the practice, to whatever particular object is happening? We're relating to the object. Look back at the mind. Is there aversion to unpleasant? Are we trying to change it? Are we trying to hold on? Are we judging ourselves? Is it all about the object? Is it all about what it means about me? Or can we just step into the awareness that really doesn't care, but can meet whatever's arising at any moment?

That's really mindfulness. That's really what our practice is about. And this retreat is a microcosm of our life—the same mind, perhaps a little more subtle experience, but it's the same way that it works.

She talks about how we go through our life trying to protect ourselves from unpleasant experience, from painful experience. We do, right? We think this is kindness to ourself. But of course, we can't do it. And she says—it's a great line—when we realize we don't have to, we can relax. We can open to the beautiful, to the difficult, to all of life. Then we realize we don't have to spend our life going around tensed up like we're sitting in the dentist's chair our whole life.

It's really a releasing into. The Buddha didn't wake up into another life, but into this life—more open, more present to whatever's arising in this life, just as it is. Because we're not holding to preferences, preferences based on inaccurate understanding of what peace and happiness really is.

So then, even in moments—in a moment when the mind isn't caught in wanting, in aversion, in delusion—it's just here with whatever. Notice those moments, whether you call them peaceful or happy or calm, or you don't really call them anything. It's just, as a friend of mine says, a place of no problem. It's just the is-ness of things. Notice those more. Come to appreciate, to trust, to recognize this purity of awareness, of mind, that's always available when we're not lost in the preferences, the reactivity, and not looking through it. Just notice that.

As the Tibetans say, it's like resting at ease in whatever arises. Just this. Just this.

CHAPTER 23

Viriya - Patience and Courage

Carol Wilson · 54 min

> In this Forest Refuge retreat talk, Carol Wilson offers a nuanced exploration of viriya, commonly translated as energy or effort, but which she reframes as patience, perseverance, and courageous willingness to show up moment after moment. She emphasizes that viriya is ethically variable—neither inherently wholesome nor unwholesome—and its value depends entirely on the mental factors accompanying it.
>
> Wilson distinguishes between willpower driven by self-identification and true resolution rooted in wisdom, using the Buddha's determination under the Bodhi tree as an example. She guides practitioners to continuously check the mind that is paying attention: Is there wanting something to happen? Aversion to what's arising? Confusion about what to do? This checking back, rather than fixing or forcing, allows wisdom (paññā) to naturally do its work.
> The talk addresses how difficult emotions inevitably arise in intensive practice—the "snakes coming out of their holes" in the light of awareness. Rather than seeing these as obstacles, Wilson presents them as opportunities for purification. She offers Michelle McDonald's RAIN technique (Recognize, Allow, Investigate, Nature) for meeting afflictive emotions with balanced viriya. The key insight is that moment-to-moment continuity of awareness, met with receptive yet courageous presence, builds its own momentum toward liberation—not through striving, but through steady, wise attention.

So what I wanted to speak about tonight really came up in my mind after talking to people over the last few days. It's a very common theme, but one that I feel I've certainly never gotten right—which is exactly the point, we don't—and that is viriya, the quality of viriya.

As you probably know, it's often translated as energy or effort, but I just want to talk about some different translations and different ways we can understand and work with this quality in our moment-to-moment experience in our practice.

Working with and understanding viriya is based in a sense of knowing for oneself why one is practicing, why one is on the spiritual path. Not in a broad way, but really: what's the point? In terms of the way I'm talking tonight, I'm using the Buddha's description of a free mind or a liberated heart and mind as being a mind-heart, a consciousness that is purified of clinging, that is free from greed or wanting, from dosa—aversion, hatred, fear—and free from identification, from confusion. That's like an expression of why we practice, both in the long term but also moment to moment. So that gives rise to the motivation. And you'll see why I want to start by saying that.

Viriya, energy, is essential—of course, essential—to keep us moment to moment waking up on our path. And as I'm sure most of you know, it's one of the qualities that apparently the Buddha referenced most frequently. So it's really important for us to understand this accurately, and I really feel like mostly we don't understand it accurately.

The most common translation is effort, right? Viriya is effort, courageous, heroic effort. But when the word "effort" goes through your mind, just notice what kind of connotations come with it. There's no right or wrong, and it may be different for different people, but just notice. I know for me, effort has the quality of doing, of trying, of achieving, of getting somewhere other than here. It's not actually the best description. It carries too much baggage, at least in English.

Other descriptions or definitions include a quality of mental energy. Another description is this quality of attention, of presence, of not shrinking back. Just a courage in the sense of a willingness to simply be here. Not this kind of "I don't want to be with this"—that actually leads to both aversion and sloth and torpor. It's a not shrinking back, a courage, just a willingness no matter what it is.

And patience, perseverance—much more useful in terms of how we can understand and work with this in our practice to think of viriya as patience and perseverance rather than thinking of it as effort. But thinking altogether about it isn't that helpful. I'm more talking about it in order to help us bring our attention into our experience and recognize viriya: when it's wise, when it's not.

And that's what's interesting about this quality of viriya. This is a mental factor, a quality in the mind. On its own, it's what's called ethically variable. It's not necessarily wholesome. It's not necessarily unwholesome. It depends on what other factors come together with the viriya in the mind, in the citta at that moment, what's kind of motivating it.

When we don't realize it's ethically variable, how many times in practice are we putting out tremendous effort? We just think the more I put out, the better it is, because it's good no matter what. But that's not true. So tremendous viriya—energy, not shrinking back, willingness to show up (that's kind of the way I think about it, a kind of courage, just the willingness to show up)—it can be put out with an amazing amount of steadiness, of effort, using deliberately the word effort. But it is not necessarily wholesome. It really depends what goes with it. It can be for all variety of motivations.

I was watching the US Open tennis the other day, watching the two guys in the finals. Incredible viriya—very, very beyond anything I could even imagine just to get through the match, never mind their whole lives, how much they work. And watching the two guys play is really an example of all these qualities I mentioned: not shrinking back, showing up. Each point is new. You don't hold on to the past.

You're really there. You're fully present. Enormous effort.

Is it wholesome? I don't really know. I don't know what their motivation was. It could have varied from moment to moment. But it could be total greed. It could be completely about "me." It could have been to win the two and a half million dollars. Or it could have been aversion. It could be a lot of different things.

Someone could put out—like we see in these caper movies—tremendous virya, steadiness to commit the perfect crime. Clearly, you couldn't really say that motivation was a wholesome factor, right? That's not wise virya.

So if we think of it as just the energy put out to achieve a result, we're going down the wrong track.

Take it to meditation, since that's hopefully what we're all doing here. How much virya, steadfastness, patience, and persistence—or downright effort—is the mind putting out to make something different happen? Is that wise virya? Or how about sitting through enormous pain, absolutely vowing, "I will not move"? Classically, from the outside, that person's really got some virya. They've really got some resolution—that steadfastness, that willingness to do what we decide.

But you don't know that. It's what is it paired with? It's quite possible to sit like a rock through enormous pain and internally every moment of that is fed by aversion, if not downright hatred. "I will not move no matter what. I will not move." And we're looking at it as willpower, a sense of me, me, me—being the perfect yogi, proving something.

If we don't notice what's motivating, what qualities, what mental factors are coming together with that energy, that effort—and it is effort, that virya—we think we're really practicing on the road to freedom, and all we're doing is feeding sense of self, or feeding aversion, or feeding desire.

You get a sense of how really key it is to both get familiar—more and more familiar—with how we can play with this factor of virya, but even more to keep checking in the mind what's coming together with it, what's feeding it. Because that's really the whole point: to see that willpower is not the same as resolution. Willpower is not the same thing as virya. Willpower is really driven by a strong sense of self.

Resolution is different from virya. It's one of the paramis, one of the wholesome qualities of mind and heart that we can develop in our practice, in our life. It is said that the Buddha, before he became the Buddha in all his lifetimes as the Bodhisattva, was cultivating these ten different qualities, which I won't go into because that's a whole talk.

But resolution is that quality of clarity and firmness, you could say. The classic example is that night after all his six years of strenuous work, the Buddha-to-be sat down under the Bodhi tree and said, "I will not get up until I become awakened. Let my bones and sinews dry up. I will not get up."

There are two things I'd like to point out about that. One, that resolution is not desire or aversion. It's not willpower—"I'm so great, I won't get up." It really comes from wisdom.

The second piece of wisdom about resolution is that it's based in reality. I always like to think he knew which night to sit down under that tree and say, "Okay, I'm not going to get up." He didn't do it for the six years prior. He was ready then.

So you could sit here and make a resolution: "I will not get up until I become a Sammasambuddha, a perfectly enlightened Buddha." Now, I don't know where any of your minds are at. That might be a resolution from wisdom. It might be unwise effort based on desire or self-identification. How do you know? You're the only one who can know. We keep remembering to check back: what qualities of mind are in the mind that's paying attention?

It's putting out the effort. This isn't a big thinking thing. It's just remembering to check back.

Viriya as a path factor—the wise viriya that we use in our practice—needs to come together with wisdom. And that's something that for years I didn't quite think of. Not that I didn't understand it, I just didn't consider it. You think, you know, it's not going well enough, try harder. We're not getting what we want to happen, so push more, do it more, be more steady. But if we don't check back and see what's fueling that effort with wisdom, with paññā, with understanding, then we can really get ourselves all knotted up and not quite understand why. Because we think, well, I'm doing the best I can. And very sincerely, we are doing the best we can. But we're forgetting to look and see what's fueling this "best we can." Is it wisdom, or at least a mind that is not being motivated by wanting, by aversion, by self-interested confusion? And it's not really that hard to tell. This is not some big mystery. It's just that we're so familiar with these states that we can forget to check.

So, for example, this is the way U Tejaniya describes it. Check the mind that's paying attention. This isn't so hard. As you're practicing—whether you're being with the breath or walking or drinking your tea, whatever—as you're paying attention to what's going on, in the back of the mind there, are you wanting something to happen? Are you expecting something to happen that isn't happening now? And that can be very subtle, but check and see. Are you trying to create something? Trying to get your practice to look a certain way? Wanting some experience? Or even ever so subtly trying to nudge things in a certain direction? That's greed, just flat-out greed. It doesn't matter how subtle or how gross it is. And that's not a judgment. It's like, great, see the greed. In the moment of seeing it, the mind isn't feeding it. Ah, that's greed. Right then, you know, it moves back into wise attention, into wise mindfulness.

Okay, are you trying to make something stop happening? Or ever so subtly judging, "This isn't supposed to be here"? Or practicing harder, more steadily, but because you're dissatisfied with how things are going? It isn't quite the way it was on that last retreat, so I better amp it up a little bit. Or I better do something to get rid of this so that it can get back to where it was before, or what I read about, or what I heard about. That's aversion, ill will, anger, hatred. That's all. Just notice it.

And on the third level—delusion—it shows up in different ways. One is that we don't know what's going on. You don't even know where you are. That's kind of obvious delusion. On another level, it's like you're trying to figure it out. You don't know what to do, but you really feel that you should do something. And you're kind of going through the catalog of all the skillful means, trying to figure out what to do to make it right. Just settle down. Notice what's happening right now.

So how does right energy, right viriya, feel when we're working with it, when we're connecting with it? Of course there's a wide range. How can it show up?

It's not forcing. It's not pushing. It's not aiming towards another goal. It's not trying to manipulate in any way whatsoever. And manipulating can be very subtle. But it's just—and this is in vipassanā now, for example, though it works the same way in samatha, in one-pointedness, just with different objects.

In Vipassana, for example, all the six sense objects are naturally arising. Whether you're using the breath as a beginning point—that's physical, that's the body—or you're using sound, that's hearing. Using the whole body is also physical. But all six sense objects—seeing, smelling, tasting, the body, hearing, and of course the mind with thinking and the whole range of what goes on there—they're just naturally occurring. That's just nature. We're not here to make something different occur. We're not here to have a better object. That's just what's happening. The only job of viriya is to be present, aware, to know what's already happening by itself.

So consciousness—the moment where the sense door and the sense object come together, and there's just the bare knowing of it, of the sound as hearing, of the smell as smelling—that's going on every moment, as long as we're conscious. As long as we're not in a coma—and who knows what's happening when you're in a coma—but that's going on every moment. That's happening by itself. Awareness and energy, awareness is the knowing that that's happening.

We can be conscious without awareness, right? Like those times when you're driving and suddenly you wake up and realize you don't know where you were for the last two miles, but somehow you're still on the road and you followed the stop signs and everything. Did that ever happen to anybody? It's a little spooky. That's consciousness without awareness.

When you're lost in thought here, as opposed to being aware of thought, and you suddenly wake up and go, "Oh, I was gone for ten minutes"—but you could actually say what you were thinking about. Sometimes, and I'm not advocating this, people then amuse themselves by going back, tracing it all back. That's another ten minutes gone, right? But you trace back everything you thought about. So there was consciousness, but there wasn't the awareness, that purity of awareness that knows: this is what's happening now.

So that's awareness. With wisdom means it doesn't have greed, hatred, or delusion in it. And the viriya, the courage, the energy, is that willingness to just meet it moment after moment after moment—not to push into change and not to shrink back because it's not what we like, but just whatever's arising, awareness notices it, and viriya is right there with the awareness. They come together, meeting it, meeting it, meeting it. Receptive in terms of just receiving what's happening, not in there trying to fix it and change it.

That's why working with hearing at times is a lovely way to just sit and be with hearing for a while. It's nice with the insects. Several people have mentioned that because it keeps going. It gives you time to really just drop into this quality of real presence, but it's quite receptive. You're really there, aware and knowing, but that manipulating, that trying to fix or do isn't part of it. So playing with hearing, for some people, gives a real sense of that receptiveness. Receptive but also courageous—that willingness just to show up, not to shrink back, no matter what it is.

So they go together, and this is the delicate dance of appropriate viriya. We tend to easily keep falling one way or the other, even with the best intentions. Receptive, receptive, there's absolutely nothing to do, it's all happening by itself—and there's the receptiveness, but there's not quite the connecting, not quite the showing up. The energy kind of falls out the floor.

That also happens when one is working with concentration in terms of calming the mind, being very steady, always coming back to one particular deliberately chosen object like the sensation of breath at the nose or metta meditation. Because the mind gets calmer and calmer and calmer, often the energy falls out, the viriya falls out. It's just really calm and kind of going on by itself, and that quality of not shrinking back, of showing up, starts to just fall away. So at that time there's receptivity, there's calmness, but there's not enough of the connecting energy, the courageous aspect. And so we need to notice that.

And for us—well, for me, maybe not for you—what can be so difficult is how to cultivate, bring in that courageous connecting energy without doing it from wanting or aversion. It's so easy, isn't it? We've spaced out a little and go, "Oh no, I'm spaced out! Get back to the breath. Connect, connect. Aim and sustain. What does it feel like, you know?" And, "Oh, now how come I don't feel more balanced? How come—" It's like, oh, duh. So we need to keep checking.

It's very tricky—how to let wisdom do the work, not wanting do the work, not pushing or striving do the work. And this is not our habit. It's not, for most of us, the habit of our mind. We let wanting, aversion, pushing, expectation, self-whipping—whatever it is—do the work, and we confuse that with virya.

So that's on the one side: too receptive. And the other, of course, is this trying, trying, doing, doing, and "my practice isn't clear enough, it isn't good enough." So I need to, for example, try to see the breath more clearly. It's too dull. Has anyone ever had that sense? These sensations aren't clear enough. If I try to see them a little more, aim and sustain, aim and sustain, get things clearer. Or I'm getting lost in thought and I will not do that anymore. No more thinking. This is what our mind does. And then we say, "Oh, well, she said don't do this. Okay, no more, no more, no more thinking. I won't do that anymore. I'm just going to be receptive, and everything will balance out."

It's a trip. As long as we're caught in trying to figure it out that way, it's an endless spinning cycle.

When you notice it's getting into this—out of balance, what do I do? How do I fix it? Is it too receptive? Is it too strong?—back up. Open up the field of attention, by which I mean don't try to narrow down so precisely on "how does it feel" with the object. Open up. Feel the body, the mind, and just notice. "Oh, I really want this to get better." Oh, duh—wanting. And you don't have to fix it. You don't have to change it. You just have to notice it.

That's what's so amazing with awareness and wisdom. When the wisdom sees enough of what's going on, the wisdom actually understands and makes the changes. It doesn't have to come from pushing. This takes trust. It takes trust. But I am sure—really sure—that all of you have had this experience over and over in different ways. Not just about virya, but about many things. When we're willing and able to just meet what's arising with awareness, with balanced energy, not shrinking back, with this awareness that isn't colored by wanting, by aversion, we see clearly. The wisdom arises out of the steadiness, the continuity of seeing, the continuity of awareness.

So that's really how working with virya, how the virya strengthens and deepens and then supports the deepening of wisdom and all the other factors—not through pushing harder to see more clearly, but through this gentle, steady connectedness, moment after moment after moment. It's the continuity of awareness, the continuity, the perseverant aspect of virya, the patient aspect that is really the key.

And in some way, all of you who practice a lot, we know that. But in another way, we can easily get sucked into: How good was my sitting? How was my walking? The time in between, I'm sort of, you know, halfway paying attention, whatever. But that just moment-to-moment noticing what's going on in the mind, without a huge effort—so it's not exhausting—it's quite possible then to keep just noticing, moment after moment after moment, all day.

That's the resolution. Not that I will do it no matter what, but that willingness to say, "You know, just when I notice I don't know what's happening, I'm willing to come back." And as soon as you recognize you don't know what's happening, you are back. That's the thing.

There's not a place to go back to. It's here.

So that's the aspect—the steadiness, the steadiness of noticing—that strengthens the whole practice. That's really what develops the steadiness of viriya. And it's from that steadiness of viriya and clarity of seeing, moment after moment after moment, that samādhi really builds. The whole seeing, the whole steadiness of awareness, gathers a momentum that doesn't come from your willpower. It doesn't come from greed or dissatisfaction. It comes from how one moment of mindfulness is the proximate cause for the next moment of mindfulness to arise. One moment of viriya—just this receptive, connected, courageous attention—is the proximate cause for the next one to arise.

So at first we have to remember: oh yeah, right, just what's happening now. That's the extent of it, that level of effort. What's happening now? You feel your body as you sit there. It's not hugely effortful. You feel your crossed arms. You notice tiredness in the mind. You don't have to do anything about any of it. You just notice it. Oh, that's not so hard. I could do that the next moment. I could do that the next moment.

And slowly or quickly—or however long, in relation to what is slow or quick anyway—a momentum starts to build. The first day or two on retreat, you're just dragging yourself along, trying to find your body when you're sitting here. A week in, two weeks in, yes, stuff's still happening. It's not all the way you want it. Probably never will be. But it's getting easier. The remembering to know what I'm doing starts to happen more and more by itself. The sense of huge swings of exhaustion and pushing too hard, the up and down—that starts to even out a bit. And that's happening by itself. Also the sense of trying to push and see more clearly—that doesn't work. But the steadiness, the continuity, the moment-to-moment awareness and viriya connectedness starts showing up by itself.

And I know you've all seen this: the awareness starts to notice more. Things start to get clearer. We start to notice, without even looking for it, more subtlety of what's going on in the mind, what's going on in the body, really seeing suffering and what's creating it.

Because that's really the point. What fuels our viriya, our willingness to show up moment after moment, isn't right viriya wanting something to happen, but the quality of interest—investigation. What's going on? How does the mind work? How is suffering created in this moment? How does it come to an end in this moment? What's happening right now? With the intention just to understand out of interest. Not to judge, not to fix, not to make something different happen—just to notice and see how it works.

And that's when intensive practice gets to be fun, because we're not having to fight with what's happening. We're just willing to be there and see: what's the mind doing right now? I'm feeling all locked up and pushed and stressed. Instead of running down a list and judging ourselves, we just turn around and look at the mind. Ah, dissatisfaction. The breath ought to be more steady. Look at that. Look at how much suffering is coming from that. And there's nothing else you need to do. Just noticing that.

This is from Nisargadatta. It's kind of an intense way of saying it, but I like it. He says: "You people want to become supermen overnight." You know, we're all like that. "Stay without ambition, without the least desire, vulnerable, unprotected, uncertain, completely open to and welcoming life as it happens, without the selfish conviction that all must yield you pleasure or profit, material or so-called spiritual."

That to me is a good description of awareness with right viriya.

Really present, open, without desire or the conviction that this is to somehow yield me profit. I'm not saying that's easy, but that's the sense. That's the sense of how we practice. Virya isn't here to say, "This is good, this is bad, and the more we're aware, the better everything gets." It doesn't work that way. It just totally doesn't work that way.

From that sense, I want to move into the courage, a little more about the courage of not shrinking back. Because often what shows up—especially on intensive retreats, though in our life too—are difficult experiences. And these difficult experiences rarely, sometimes but rarely, fit into most people's conceptions or preconceived notions about what's good practice, why I'm here, what awareness and effort and energy are about, how I'm supposed to purify the mind. All of that.

What shows up as a function of retreat are the habits of our mind that cause suffering. That's part of it. If that didn't show up, the retreat wouldn't be working. If that didn't show up, we wouldn't have a chance to explore, to understand, to meet these habits with awareness and virya rather than just being run by them as we are in our normal life.

But usually, when these strong habits show up, we meet them—at first at least—with the same habits of mind that we meet them with in daily life. We don't recognize that this is a chance for us to step out of our unconscious patterns of feeding these afflictive emotions. And that's usually how they show up, as afflictive emotions.

Patrul Rinpoche, the Tibetan teacher, was also talking about the paramis, and he went into some detail about the parami of patience. One of the lines he used is that we need to cultivate patience to bear hardship for the Dhamma. I'm thinking of this patience as virya—that courageous willingness to show up, not to shrink back or shy away or push back or hide from whatever arises.

As Ajahn Chah says, there's suffering that leads to more suffering, and there's suffering that leads to the end of suffering. It's all about the attitude of mind, of attention—how we meet that suffering in any particular moment. And so this balanced virya, virya that's fed by wisdom, is so key in meeting and working with this stuff.

I really want to talk about these habits of mind because in the last couple of days it's been coming up for quite a number of people. No big surprise. But somehow we are surprised. It's always amazing. No matter how much we've practiced or looked at our minds, it can still be a surprise when we're settling into the retreat, or we've been here for some time, and suddenly—pow! It's like the pond settles down for a few days and then boom, all this stuff starts coming up to the surface. One of my teachers used to say that in the light of awareness, all of the snakes come up out of their holes.

That's not a problem. That's not something wrong. It is a great place to practice with cultivating and recognizing the attitude of mind we meet these difficulties with—what's right virya, what's right awareness.

In some ways these habits show up as really obvious afflictive emotions, right? Intense desire, strong fear, habits we know we carry from our life of great resistance or self-judging, contempt, blame. All the stuff we have—past trauma, self-distrust, a lot of anger, a lot of sadness and grief, sorrow, guilt. You name it. All of our normal stuff. This at least we notice is happening. We may think it's a mistake, but it's hard not to notice that these things are coming up.

But these same habits of mind can also show up in ways that are not really subtle, but more hidden. They can show up in the way that we're relating to our practice. And this is often where we don't notice them and get really caught in wrong effort.

For example, these big habits I mentioned—judging, comparing with past retreats, wanting things to be different, a real underlying sense of resistance, anger at whatever's going on, real sorrow over how one's behaved in the past. On one level, there's a whole personal story, a personal history. The emotions feel very much about me. On another level, if we just get a little bigger and notice what energy in the mind is fueling these, it really will break down to desire, aversion or fear, confusion, delusion. It's all about me, in the big picture.

I'm not saying we should just wipe out and not pay attention to the emotions. Not at all—I'll get into that in a minute. But for me, it's been very helpful to get bigger and notice. I'm all involved in my resistance—why, back to the past, it's been like this—not noticing. As I get into exploring it, the story, it's about me, I see how it starts and where it goes, it feels like good mindfulness. But if I check back into the mind that's paying attention...

There can be, for example, in my own personal case, really strong motivation in that description of craving, of clinging. I'm really wanting to see what it's all about, and I'm wanting to figure it out so that I don't have to deal with it anymore. So craving fed by aversion. And if I don't look back at the attitude in the mind and notice that craving, then what I'm taking for wise mindfulness and wise energy—looking and seeing and naming and noting—is actually only feeding craving.

Do you get a sense of that? When you turn around and look, it's not so subtle, but we get so engrossed in exploring and looking at the object that we forget to turn around and see: Is this effort, is this virya, is this mindfulness being fueled by wisdom? By interest? Or by wanting or aversion? You don't have to ask that constantly, but just keep checking, just keep checking, just keep checking. And that's all you have to do. You don't have to fix it. I really found this to make a profound difference in the way that I'm able to just be with what's happening in a much freer and clearer way, moment after moment after moment. And as I said, wisdom starts to do the work, not pushing.

For example, I wasn't even trying to work with anger. I was walking, just taking a walk. I wasn't on retreat. And I started thinking about politics and different political figures and the war in Iraq and all kinds of stuff, and getting really angry. I was watching it happen, feeling the anger, and of course the sense of justification—appropriate, it's appropriate to be angry—which of course just keeps the anger going. So I was really noticing that and feeling it and very present, mindful in the way of being able to notice and say everything that was happening, but not really noticing what was feeding it.

And then at one point, just paying attention, paying attention, I turned around and noticed: Oh, this is just anger feeding anger. That wasn't with any judgment. That was just noticing. And in that moment of seeing, the wisdom did its own work. In that moment of seeing, there arose: Oh, I don't want to add more anger to the world. It just stopped. My opinion didn't stop. The sense that things should change didn't stop. But that anger fueling itself—as soon as the mindfulness just saw, "Oh, this is just anger fueling itself," with wisdom, the wisdom just said, "Don't need this anymore." And it stopped. Doesn't mean it doesn't come back. But you get a sense of how the wisdom does the work.

It's very different from: "This is anger, feeding more anger. I don't want to do this anymore. It's really bad. And I'm a bad person because I'm feeding the anger. So I'm not going to be angry anymore. Stop it. Loving kindness. May you be peaceful. May you be happy." And it's just spinning, spinning, spinning.

I'm not saying every time that awareness with balanced energy sees something unwholesome, it just naturally poofs away—would that it were so. But it starts to happen more and more. And you also get a sense of what balanced virya is.

These habits can be strong emotions like that, but they can also show up in how we're relating to practice in the way I talked about before. There can be a huge amount of judging that what's happening isn't right, that it could be better. A huge amount of remembering and wanting from some other time. And in terms of focused, one-pointed practice—coming back to the breath, coming back to metta—how often is that bringing the mind back done with wanting? How often?

I talked to someone who spent two months practicing a very strict shamatha, one-pointed meditation style—just come back to here, come back to here with the breath. And this person told me later, after it was over, "Wow, I'm looking now and I see I spent that whole time practicing with craving, not noticing that every time I was coming back to the breath, it was from craving." So you might get somewhat focused, but it's not balanced samadhi. It's from craving. And that's what's being fed in the mind.

So that's why I said at the beginning, when we talk about the understanding that fuels our practice, that fuels our virya—if it's the understanding that it's purifying the heart and mind—

Purifying from craving, from aversion, from confusion. Then we know it doesn't matter what's happening. You can get to some really exalted state of heart and mind, but if you've been feeding craving that whole time, what good is it?

Or you're going through the day here and you're noticing the mind, noticing what's happening, and there's that courageous showing up. You're having no great experiences. You're just sitting and walking and drinking your tea and going out for a walk. But you're really noticing. The momentum of noticing is growing. The getting caught and reactive, the pushing and trying to make something happen, is lessening. That's where the purification is really starting to happen. That's where the strength of wisdom and awareness, mindfulness and virya, are all coming together.

So we look back at what's going on in the mind, less focused on evaluating ourselves by object. But I do want to return to the fact that in terms of bigger emotional experiences—like the snakes coming out of the hole—sometimes that's going to happen on retreat, and it really isn't a problem. In fact, often it's kind of a normal, useful circumstance.

I haven't read this for years, but Ram Dass has a great line. He says that as your mind further purifies, as your heart further purifies, the impurities—the greed, the confusion, the difficult emotions—will seem grosser and larger. So you need to understand that it's not that you're getting more caught in the negativity, in the illusion. It's just that you're seeing it more clearly. You're feeling it more vividly. It's really important to see this and think, "Wow, that's interesting. Let me understand how suffering is created"—not thinking, "Oh God, I'm really falling apart. It's getting worse and worse." We're seeing it more clearly.

So the fact that these difficult patterns arise—that's just the effect of our past karma, the past habits of our mind, the way we're used to relating in our life. No blame; that's just what's happening. How it's met in this present moment of awareness—that's the place, that's the moment where we can see what's being fed and what's being starved, which is a way the Buddha talked about often.

So when a really difficult emotion, say grief, comes up, and it's met with, "Oh no, grief again. What's the matter with me? I've got to figure it out. I thought I worked through this. I've been to therapy for ten years"—that's feeding aversion. That's feeding resistance. That's pushing it away. That's shrinking back. That's not virya. But when it's met with, "Oh, grief. It's like this"—that willingness just to be there—that's wisdom. That's virya with wisdom.

So I want to offer some guidance for those of you who I sense would find it helpful to have a little bit of technique, if you're not used to meeting difficult emotions as part of the practice—not as something to jump over and get back to practice, not as something to get rid of so that purifying means they never come, but as the next arising object.

First is just recognition. Michelle McDonald made up this little acronym, RAIN—R-A-I-N—which if it helps, use it. When a difficult emotion comes, or a happy one too—though we don't usually struggle with those; we get attached to them and don't even know they're there—recognition is helpful. "Oh, guilt. It's like this." "Happiness." "Desire. It's like this." "Self-exaltation. It's like this." Whatever it is, that's all recognizing. The name can help, but the name is to bring us into the experience, not to note distantly, "Oh, guilt is like this. That's nice. Guilt, guilt, guilt."

Let me go back to the breath. Like guilt. Recognize, and the A is for allowing, accepting. Just letting it be, being in non-contention. Oh, guilt feels like this. Accepting, allowing it to be, to live its life.

It's really like the weather. Emotions feel so much like the weather to me. You're just sitting here, minding your own business, and suddenly—whoom—a huge wave of sadness comes in. And you're like, what? I'm just practicing here. Sadness, heaviness. And then we get into all our reactions. But sadness comes in just like the fog, just like the rain. Recognize, allow it.

The I is for investigating or just noticing how it is. I don't mean thinking about it—what does it mean to me? That's not investigation. Just recognizing, feeling how it is. Guilt feels like this. There may be physical sensations. There may be a coloring in the mind. There may be thoughts coming and going with it—all kind of like the package that we call guilt.

We're allowing it, investigating it, not to make it go away. Simply with viriya, to be present without flinching from what's happening. Receptive, allowing, connected. Oh yes, guilt is like this.

And the N is for: it's just nature. Sometimes I'm feeling guilty. Sometimes you're feeling guilty. This is the nature of guilt. Your particular personal story—everybody's guilt has a particular personal story. That's the nature of guilt. Yours isn't any better or worse or more personal than anybody else's.

So to me, there's the cloud, the rain, the fog, the sun, the happiness. It comes. We recognize, allow, investigate. It's just nature. It goes. And that's how the wisdom comes. You don't have to tear it apart to see impermanence. If you just stay, moment after moment, steady, connected, you'll notice: it wasn't here before, and now it's here. You'll notice: it's really here, and now it's gone. And I promise, it will come and it will go. Everything will come and it will go. We don't have to try and see that, figure it out. Just be here, meet it, steady, and that understanding shows up by itself.

So that's really the quality of awareness, viriya, and wisdom. It can sometimes be with very subtle experience, but it's just as valid with the huge difficult emotions that are coming up. Either one, it doesn't matter.

Just notice when you're involved in some kind of reactivity, some kind of trying to change, and the feelings of dissatisfaction with yourself, with the emotion, with how your practice is going. Back up a little bit. Open up a little bit. Just notice what's in the mind that's paying attention. Just notice what's in the mind that's paying attention. And when you notice that, you're already connected again.

Ah, this is wanting.

In that moment, we've stepped out of our normal habits of reacting with aversion or self-justification to these big patterns, and we're shifting the karma. Instead of feeding the aversion, feeding the self-identification, we're feeding wisdom, feeding awareness, feeding virya. And that's really huge. Maybe not in each little moment, but as the momentum builds, as the wholesomeness builds, this is really how the mind purifies itself.

I want to end with a quotation from Pema Chödrön. She's so pithy—I love how she says things:

"We think if we just meditated enough or jogged enough or ate perfect food, everything would be perfect. But from the point of view of someone who is awake, that's death. Seeking security or perfection, rejoicing and feeling confirmed and whole, self-contained and comfortable is some kind of death. It doesn't have any fresh air. There's no room for something to come in. We're killing the moment by controlling our experience.

From an awakened perspective, trying to tie up all the loose ends and finally get it together is death because it involves rejecting a lot of your basic experience. There's something aggressive about that approach to life—trying to flatten out all the rough spots and imperfections into a nice, smooth ride.

We want to be perfect, but we just keep seeing our imperfections, and there's no room to get away from that, no exit, nowhere to run. That is when this sword turns into a flower. We stick with what we see, we feel what we feel, and from that, we naturally begin to connect with our own wisdom mind."

CHAPTER 24

All Skillful Means Are For The Purification Of The Heart-Mind

Carol Wilson · 57 min

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Carol Wilson illuminates how all skillful means in Buddhist practice share a single purpose: the purification of the citta (heart-mind) from the kilesas (afflictions). Drawing on the Buddha's famous declaration that he teaches "suffering and the end of suffering," she explains that every technique—whether meditation, ethical conduct, or devotional practice—serves to cultivate non-clinging in each moment.

Wilson presents a template from Sayādaw U Paṇḍita showing three levels of purification corresponding to the Eightfold Path's groupings. Sīla (ethical conduct) purifies the gross level of transgression through restraint of harmful speech and action. Samādhi (collectedness of mind) suppresses the obsessive level of torment, particularly repetitive thoughts of greed and aversion. Paññā (wisdom) addresses the deepest latent tendencies—the subtle seeds that sprout when conditions align. She emphasizes that samādhi alone, while valuable, is state-dependent; only wisdom seeing things as they truly are can uproot these tendencies.

The talk includes the Buddha's teaching on directed and undirected meditation from the Satipaṭṭhāna framework, offering recollection of the Buddha, Dhamma, Saṅgha, one's own virtues, and generosity as skillful means when the mind becomes overwhelmed by afflictions. Wilson weaves in teachings from Zen Master Dōgen and Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche to show how devotion and compassion naturally reveal the purified heart-mind. Throughout, she reminds practitioners that skillful means are not about achieving special states but about expressing awakening itself in this present moment.

Well, last week I was talking about virya, energy, and the balance of that. Something that I didn't get to really at the end of the talk was to discuss skillful means, which is really all the different techniques and methods that we use both in meditation and in our life to balance the energy, to help us wake up. So that's kind of the jumping off point I want to start with tonight: skillful means. But really the point being that all the skillful means are in the service of one thing only, which is what the Buddha said he taught, very famously.

The Buddha said, "I teach one thing: suffering and the end of suffering." He said that a lot. And all skillful means, not only meditation but in our life, are to help us understand, to realize the end of suffering—but not only as a goal. In the moment, to actualize the heart and mind of non-clinging. That's a simple way to say it.

I just want to read this little bit from the Buddha just because I like it. This is just little snippets from one of the many suttas where he's talking about the Four Noble Truths. I'm not going to do the whole truths, but he's talking about how he first discovered the profound truth that can't be gained by mere reasoning, by thinking about it, visible only to the wise:

"The world, however, is given to pleasure, delighted with pleasure, enchanted with pleasure. Truly, such beings will find it hard to understand dependent arising, this profound truth. Yet there are beings whose eyes are only a little bit covered with dust. They will understand the truth."

So we can only hope that we're some of those beings whose eyes are a little bit covered with dust.

But I was really reading it because this is sort of how he describes the cause of suffering—that the world and beings are enchanted by pleasure, given to pleasure, attracted to pleasure. That's sort of our dilemma, you could say, in life and practice. No difference. And so when he talks about the ending, the extinction of suffering, it's exactly this attachment to pleasure, this craving that he addresses. So he could talk about the mind, the heart of non-clinging, as one way of saying it.

A more simple way—and that's how I'll refer to it later—but again, I just want to read one of his many descriptions of how that manifests and how it can manifest:

"One who has considered all the contrasts of this earth and is no more disturbed by anything whatever in the world, the peaceful one, freed from rage, from sorrow, and from longing, has passed beyond birth and decay. This I call neither arising nor passing away, neither standing still nor being born nor dying. There is neither foothold nor development nor any basis. This is the end of suffering."

To me it's inspiring. It's also kind of grand. But we can also talk about it, as he often does, as the heart, the mind of non-clinging. Or another way of putting it, as I've been talking about the whole time, is the mind, the heart that's free in a moment even from any of the internal torments: clinging, aversion—two sides of the same coin—delusion, confusion, attachment to sense of self, which gives rise to the craving and the aversion.

And so any skillful means, any of the forms of meditation that we do, and any of the other aspects of our life are all in service of cultivating the wisdom that ultimately sees through the delusion that gives rise to clinging and aversion. Right? Big picture. All of the different techniques are ultimately for that end.

Whether it's mindfulness and the myriad of techniques of mindfulness, whether it's absorption practice in the way that the Buddha taught it—absorption practice, shamatha practice, absorption of the mind very, very deeply into one object is not the end in itself. It's to cultivate a quality of mind that then comes out of absorption to explore the nature of reality, to understand it. His thesis is: when we understand things the way they are, the way they already are, clinging and aversion will naturally cease because they don't make any sense. And as long as we think they're serving us and making sense—well, so long there's an "us" that we think it's serving and making sense—it just keeps on cycling.

And as he said, the world, people love pleasure. We do. It's very, very deeply ingrained in us, and so we need all these different skillful means at different times. Not to get to some particular state, not to have a better experience, not to get rid of what we don't like—but the skillful means in themselves, even in a moment, are ways of in that moment not feeding the torments, starving the torments. So in the moment, any of the skillful means are also a manifestation of a heart and mind of non-clinging.

So you see what I mean? The means are the end. The end are the means. We can't practice in a way of wanting and hating and trying to get rid of something and fool ourselves that this is the way to understand non-clinging. It just doesn't work.

So that's what all the skillful means share. And I just want to talk about one template that I really like because I find it very helpful, interesting, in the different ways that some aspects of our life of awakening—not only intensive practice—work, you could say, to purify, to cultivate purity of the mind and the heart in the moment.

So in this template, which I first heard from Sayadaw U Pandita (but he didn't make it up), he talks about how this purification—now when I say purification, it's kind of, in my mind, a bit of a loaded word. It's not something I grew up with, purification.

I don't know. In my mind, it has a connotation that's a little holier-than-thou. But I don't mean that. When I say purification, I'm using it because I can't think of a better word. And what I mean is simply this: in the moment, the heart, the mind, the citta, the consciousness, when it's pure, in that moment it isn't clouded by the torments, by the afflictions, by any form of aversion or greed or delusion. Just for a moment. We're not all the way to never being bothered again by anything in the world, but in the moment—that's what all of our life of awakening is about. Cultivating that purity, recognizing it when it's present, and recognizing what goes along with it so we appreciate it.

So on three levels, this happens in our life and in our practice. And interestingly enough, they're the three groupings of the Eightfold Path: sila, morality; samadhi, collectedness of mind; and panna, wisdom.

They say that with sila, in other words with ethical conduct of body and speech, what we're free from when we're acting from these simple five precepts, from non-harming in speech and action, is that in that moment the heart is freed from, purified from, what's called the torments, the kilesas of transgression—the grossest level. So you see, just as mindfulness and wisdom get more and more subtle, so also do our friends the kilesas get more and more subtle. We start by working on the really gross level. And that's hard enough, God knows. Just keeping our mouth shut and not saying something aversive. Keeping our hand relaxed and not writing something aversive. On that level, when we are refraining, we're purifying the heart and mind from that level of kilesa, that level of affliction. And that's not nothing. That's really what lays the basis for purification on more and more subtle levels, for us to see and understand and see through the need for the kilesas on more subtle levels.

There's a lovely saying that when we are acting according to the precepts, when we're not acting from hatred, from aversion, from cruelty, from greed, watching our speech and actions, we are giving ourselves freedom from remorse. And how many of you have mentioned having stuff come up in your practice—memories from however long ago? We all have them. Stupid or worse than stupid, painful, harmful things that we've done or said, and the suffering, really the remorse. Which is different from guilt. Guilt is like, "I'm such a stupid jerk." That's just adding aversion on top of it. But remorse is that sense of wisdom meeting that memory and seeing the causes and conditions for why we did it, the ignorance of it, but feeling the pain of it. So freedom from remorse and, of course, granting to others in our field of presence the gift of fearlessness, knowing that we're not going to hurt one another. That's already a great thing.

Then on the next level, the next round of purification, the level of samadhi—in the time that there's samadhi in the mind, the level of kilesa or torment that is kept away, that's cleared out, is called the obsessive level of torment. Which I think you might be able to relate to. It's the level mostly of thought and mental energy. Whether it's greed or worry or aversion to something, upset comes up over and over. You know, just like, "Oh my God, why is this happening?"

I want to clarify samadhi. The best description I like is that it's collectedness of the dispersed mental energy. It doesn't have to be one-pointed on one object. Samadhi is a moment-to-moment mental factor, just like everything. Everything's moment to moment. So it's a time when the mental energy—you know how it's just going all over? You're sort of aware of the breath and you're sort of with sound and there's this thinking going on and there's some feelings in the back and you have that little memory. You could kind of say you're aware of it all, but it's not very collected. It's not really very satisfying somehow. A moment of samadhi is when all that mental energy is collected, unified. It's not squirting in all these different directions. That's what we call samadhi.

As with virya, samadhi is not necessarily wholesome. It can go either way. The mind could be extremely focused and totally driven by anger or greed. Let's pick greed. That can happen in life, of course. We get totally focused on how to get whatever it is we want. It can happen here too. If you found yourself totally absorbed in something you really need, or how to be first in line for lunch, or how you can scheme to get the extra pillow or something—totally stupid when you step outside of it. But at the time, it could completely absorb your mind, right? All the energy of that collectedness goes into being driven by greed.

This is not the path factor of samādhi. The path factor of samādhi is, of course, wholesome, meaning that in that moment there isn't greed, hatred, or confusion. So there's that sense of the unification of heart and mind.

It can manifest in what we call absorption states, where attention is unified on one particular object. You're coming back, coming back—whether it's ānāpāna, whether it's mettā phrases, whether it's a light, whatever it is. It can also be what Mahasi calls khaṇika samādhi, momentary samādhi, which is that steadiness, that collectedness of attention just in a moment, but the object could be changing moment to moment. The samādhi isn't about the object. It's about that quality of collectedness in the mind.

We can notice what samādhi feels like, just as we can notice what greed feels like. Samādhi has a stability. It doesn't mean that you don't get distracted or that greed or aversion doesn't ever slip in, but the mind doesn't get carried so far, and it comes back more easily. The stronger and more steady the samādhi becomes, the less the afflictions—greed, hatred, and delusion—arise. Really, in a way, that's one of the reasons everyone loves concentration.

I don't want to exactly equate samādhi and concentration, because we often talk about concentration as this one-pointed focus, getting really deep. And then we don't appreciate the quality of samādhi that can be present moment to moment as we move around with changing objects—where the attention is collected, the mind and energy are collected, but the objects are changing. When the samādhi is strong and steady, it basically keeps the hindrances, the afflictions, away. They don't have room to slip in.

I remember one time I was on a long intensive retreat with Sayadaw U Pandita where you note every moment, every waking moment. The object of attention is changing, but that steadiness of connecting and noting, connecting and noting, from the moment you get up until the moment you go to sleep—that develops a really strong and stable kind of samādhi.

But I also really saw how that kind of samādhi is very state-dependent. I was noticing that when there was that steady noting, no greed was coming, no aversion was coming—just noticing: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting. And I was playing with it one day. I was noting seeing. The attention was connected to seeing something. Then I deliberately pulled back the attention. I stopped noting. I stopped letting it connect. I just let the mind hang for a minute.

Immediately—immediately—some affliction rushed in. I forget if it was wanting or aversion or what. I saw it right away. It didn't go anywhere. It was like, "Oh my gosh, all this work, and as soon as I stopped—boom—here they come again."

It's not always like that, but I remember that so clearly because I thought, "Somehow this isn't enough. This isn't enough."

And I know now that that samādhi, that steadiness, was strong, but it was suppressing the afflictions. And that's extremely useful. For one thing, it strengthens mind and faith. You get a sense of the brightness, the lightness, what a sense of purity of mind and heart can feel like. Sometimes people say they didn't even know—you don't even know how much garbage is in there. You don't even know that it's possible to have just a moment where nothing special is happening, but it feels so clean and so pure. Sometimes it feels happy. Sometimes it feels calm. But just to notice that.

Over time on retreats—we've done longer retreats with a lot of very steady concentration—there's a feeling of the consciousness being cleansed, moment after moment. It just feels like it's being... sometimes it felt scoured, a little bit rough. Sometimes just like it's being washed and cleared and cleansed, and you feel a lot brighter and purer for a while.

So that's the suppressive level—state-dependent, very useful, not to be confused with liberation.

Also, sometimes with different kinds of samādhi, very strong and wholesome pleasant states arise, like pīti, rapture, or sukha, a real comfort and ease in the body. Those are great. Those are fine. Appreciate them. But those are also states that come and go. They don't have to be there for the mind, the consciousness, the heart to be pure. When it's pure, all kinds of different wholesome states can arise. But they don't have to be present. There could just be calm, which is also a wholesome state.

And so then the third level, that of paññā, of wisdom. And this I really like. It's said to purify the latent underlying tendencies—the really subtle levels of these torments, these afflictions of our mind.

Many of you have talked about this in interviews, using different words. It's as if things are going fine, the mind is really quite mindful, and nothing is really bothering you. Then out of nowhere, seemingly, suddenly aversion arises. Suddenly greed. Suddenly "me, me, me" is just all over the place. And why?

This latent, underlying level is described as if it's a seed. There's not really a seed, okay? There's no concrete thing called a seed of greed sitting in any of us. This is a metaphor. But it's as if there's a seed, and when the latent tendencies are still existing, still coming up in our mind stream, when the conditions are appropriate, that seed can sprout.

That's why when the Buddha talks about different levels of awakening—or the absolute awakening of a Buddha where there are no more seeds—that's what is said: it's no longer possible for those seeds to sprout. They're gone. That would be nice! But for us to see, without any aversion but just seeing how that works, is kind of interesting.

And wisdom is said to be necessary because these latent underlying tendencies can't be seen through by thinking, by right intention, by samādhi, but only by wisdom—by really seeing those moments of insight where we understand some aspect of reality the way it is, whether it's impermanence or not-self, or just seeing the clinging come up, seeing it so clearly, and it goes. That's a moment of wisdom. In that moment, it's dissolved.

Just a little example. I use this a lot because it's so clear in my mind. One night I was driving down Lockwood Road on the way up to the retreat center to give a talk a couple of years ago. Not really late, but you know how sometimes you have exactly no extra minute to spare to get there in time. So I was driving down, and it's a kind of narrow driveway in the middle of the road. I was present, but not one hundred percent. A little bit of rushing back there that I didn't quite see. So those were the conditions.

And then there was some person—I don't know who—walking ever so slowly and mindfully in the middle of the driveway. Did they move when they heard the car? No. Slowly and mindfully in the middle of the driveway.

I was present enough that I saw, just in that moment, this shoot of aversion come up. Just like, "Oh, what do they think?" Like that. And it was so sudden, because there hadn't been any aversion present. And so strong and sudden that I just couldn't not see it. Wow, aversion—look at that!

And that was really a sense of that latent seed—not so latent, right—but the latent seed sprouting in that moment. It was met with... it was so obvious that awareness was right there. It wasn't even judging it, just kind of like, "Wow, look at that. Aversion's like that."

So in that moment, because it was met with mindfulness and wisdom—I wasn't judging the aversion, I wasn't owning it—oh, look at that, it went right... immediately disappeared. That's a simple example of how when there's mindfulness with wisdom, it takes care of things. In that moment, aversion was not being fed.

That's the purification of paññā, of wisdom. Seeing clearly with understanding. Oh, aversion arises due to these conditions. It isn't personal. You see it, the conditions change, it's gone. And it's not like it went back down underground, working here to come up again. That's an inaccurate assumption. It was gone. Another time, another aversion will come, sure. But that one was gone.

And that's really—you get a sense—that's the purification of wisdom. And actually, that level is a lot of what we see on a silent intensive retreat. Until we've tuned into it on retreat, we might not notice it so much in our daily life. Believe me, it's happening. Like that was my daily life.

It happens in our daily life. But to kind of tune ourselves into all these different ways—how we act, how we focus our mind, how we notice and pay attention to what's happening—these are all aspects of purifying our heart and mind, of tuning into the possibility of living with a heart and mind that's free from clinging.

What I like about this template is that it includes the whole Eightfold Path. It's not just about meditation. In terms of skillful means, we're not just talking about meditation. Meditation, despite all the myriad different ways of meditating, is only one of the skillful means embedded in a path—a path of wisdom, a path of sīla, of non-harming conduct, always paying attention, a path of paying attention to our intentions, a path of generosity, a path of friendliness, of loving-kindness. All of these aspects of how we live our life are part of the skillful means of opening.

When we talk about an open heart, or often we use the phrase "gladdening the heart"—that sense of sensitivity, connectivity, of love—all of those are expressions in the moment of a pure-hearted mind. In that moment, it can show up in many different ways.

What I appreciate about how the Eightfold Path works, how this template works, is that each aspect of sīla, samādhi, and paññā, the purification, the wisdom that comes from them, serve as a kind of feedback loop. They keep strengthening each other. Just like with the Eightfold Path, we wouldn't start without some little piece of right view, of wisdom. Otherwise, we wouldn't even set foot on the path. We wouldn't even think there was a problem.

If I read to you, "beings are lost in pleasure and wanting pleasure, and freedom from suffering is freedom from clinging," and you thought, "That's the stupidest thing I ever heard. I'm out of here. You're right, I want pleasure. I love pleasure. I'm going for pleasure because that makes me happy"—you wouldn't be sitting here listening to me talk about this. You'd be out there looking for pleasure until finally you saw it's not working, and then you'd come back in again.

That initial wisdom leads to our meditating, leads to samādhi, leads then to how we act in the world. That leads back to deeper wisdom. And it keeps cycling and cycling. It opens up our faith. It opens us up to greater purity, really, in all the different levels. And we just start where we are—on the meditation retreat, off the meditation retreat, doing your yogi job, whatever. We start where we are in that moment. What skillful means will help to starve the torment if it's present, help to feed non-clinging?

This is a story I love of St. Francis, because to me it's inspiring in how, from the story, he started where he was before he was a saint. When he was just Francis living in Assisi as a young man, he was the son of a very wealthy merchant. In the couple of biographies I've read, when he was a young grown man, late teens or early twenties, he was kind of a wild guy—rich, hanging out with a lot of other rich, wild young men. They basically partied and drank and chased women, I guess like current-day rock stars or something. That's how he was, pretty wild. It's not how I ever imagined St. Francis would have started. I think of him as just popping out as St. Francis from the time he's a baby, but not so.

In this story, at that time there were a lot of people in Europe with leprosy, now called Hansen's disease. People who had leprosy were forced by the different townships, the different governments, to live in hospitals or homes—probably not very well taken care of—on the outside of the city, so they wouldn't be among the townspeople. People were really scared because it was contagious; they didn't know how you got it.

They were also disgusted by how people looked with it. So people with leprosy had to live outside the city, and whenever they were walking on a road, they had to always be ringing a bell, so that anyone walking or riding their horse along could hear the bell and avoid them. That's where that phrase comes from—"Are you treating me like a leper?" Completely like you're disgusting, ring a bell so I don't ever have to see you.

And St. Francis was like that too. He was really afraid and disgusted by anyone with leprosy, afraid to even get near them.

The thing that touches me is how he started where he was. Who knows what motivated him, because this was before he had his vision of Jesus speaking to him from the cross, before he moved into great devotion. But something started him. He knew he had to break down his barriers, his fear, his self-centeredness.

So he started one time when he heard someone ringing the bell while he was riding by on his horse. He threw some alms, some money down on the ground for the person. That was the start. Then another time, he managed to get off his horse and hand the money hand to hand, which for him was huge—just to touch someone. And from there, he moved on to really looking the person in the eye, kissing his hand, and then going down to do volunteer work in the place where the lepers lived. That's where he started, and he turned into St. Francis.

We don't know where we need to start. We don't know how it's going to unfold. But I think it's important not to have a hierarchy, not to think that somehow the subtlety of deep samādhi is better than the purification of watching our speech and our actions. All of it, all of the different ways work. In any moment, any skillful means arises out of a heart and mind that's pure and feeds the non-clinging, feeds the non-aversion.

When we're not paying attention—this is a phrase the Buddha uses a lot, feeding and starving—when we're just not really noticing what's going on and just acting, like that example I gave of greed and concentration where we're totally focused on getting what we want for half a day, we're feeding greed. That's basically throwing another log on the fire. "Oh, I could get it that way. Yeah, throw on another log." And that place where the pleasant fantasies feel good—"Let's go for another one"—feeding greed. "I am right. They are wrong. I should be angry"—feeding anger. Not with judgment, but just looking and seeing how this happens.

How one experiences in any particular moment the heart-mind of non-clinging—it can respond or show up in a situation in many different ways. I'm saying this because I know my mind, and I don't think it's alone, has a really amazing capability of taking anything and saying, "Okay, now that's how it is. This is how it should feel. And everything else isn't right. It should feel like that."

I know we often—when I was talking the other morning, some of you were here—about how sometimes with mindfulness we conflate it, we include other qualities and think of mindfulness as always precise. That's what good mindfulness is, for example. And it doesn't have to be. Or we think the purified heart and mind, we experience it maybe most frequently or most noticeably in a state of absorption or deeper concentration. And so we think, "Well, the purified heart and mind means always calm, or always a lot of sukha, or always that glitzy brightness of absorption." Just know that's limited.

The heart and mind of non-clinging just means the citta, the consciousness, the heart-mind. Citta is translated as "heart and mind" into English. In Pali there's not that distinction. The moment of awareness, of consciousness, just means it's not clouded by greed, by hatred, by confusion, by any of the suffering states. So it's clear. Any of the various wholesome states could be there. There could be pīti, rapture. There could be sukha. Or not. There could be calmness. There could be a sense of peace. There could be a sense of joy. There could be equanimity.

Just simple, calmed-out equanimity and clarity. It could be a kind of simple quietness that then responds differently depending on the situation the mind is faced with in a particular moment. This is what the Tibetans call the emptiness that's ceaselessly responsive.

Often we talk about this with people on retreat—that space where people say their heart has really opened, or they're feeling really sensitive and connected. We use different techniques to gladden the mind, gladden the heart. And how does that show up? Often in response to a situation.

So if you're out walking and you see a little bird that's struggling or suffering, the sense of compassion will just spring up naturally. You feel that connectedness. If you see a bird that's just flying and looks happy, a sense of friendliness, of metta comes up, or mudita, appreciative joy. Or often you see some complicated thing going on and you don't know what's happening. It's just equanimity. Okay, that's what's happening.

Like today I was walking down the driveway and there were five or six turkeys—the big adult one and the babies, though they're still pretty big. And there was a cat lurking. The cat was a third the size of the smallest turkeys. The turkeys were pretty much ignoring the cat, but the cat was lurking around and charging at them, trying to... And the turkeys would react, and then the cat would back off, and then they would just ignore it. They were walking all around it. It was kind of fun to watch.

At first I thought, should I do something? I've got to save the turkeys. Then I said, come on. They're taking care of themselves. The cat's taking care of itself. I don't know what needs to happen. There was just a sense that this is life living itself. We keep on going.

So ceaselessly responsive, it shows up in all of these ways. All of them are manifestations of a heart, a mind, citta, that is free from clinging, free from aversion and confusion. But we don't need to hold on to any of these particular manifestations as "this is what I need, this is how it should feel." No. See right away—we're back in clinging.

All the skillful means and different techniques of meditation, except for the Brahmaviharas, aren't meant to make a particular state of mind come. I set aside the Brahmaviharas because of course in practicing metta you're cultivating the state of mind of metta, practicing karuna you're cultivating the state of mind of karuna. But still, in the bigger picture, we don't hold on to metta or karuna, because when a real moment of metta or compassion comes, it can only come from a heart and mind that's free from clinging. Otherwise it isn't really metta. There's still that me-ing about it, that limitation.

I'm mentioning these just so we know not to cling to manifestation, but then to see that all of our skillful means might show up with different states yet share the same quality. The goal, you could say, the aspiration, is really uprooting the seeds, freeing the heart and mind more and more of even the tendency for confusion and clinging. But what skillful means share is that you forget about the goal. They are very pragmatic. They express that quality of pure heart and mind right now, in the middle of it.

And that's really how we can evaluate whether the technique we choose in a particular moment is skillful or not. It's not like there's a list saying these are skillful and these aren't. It's really about what it's feeding and what it's starving.

In very simple terms: you're all caught up, just lost in fear. You're noticing fear. It's intense, but you have a sense of "fear is like this." We don't like it, but fear is fear. Fear doesn't change into not-fear. It's fear. But you have a sense that you're not feeding the fear. You're allowing it to be, and there's awareness. That's skillful means. Okay, keep watching it. Keep noticing it.

Another time, same story, similar fear. The energy is lower. The mindfulness is more distracted. And the fear is getting stronger and stronger. The stories are getting stronger and stronger. And you really start to feel out of control. Maybe not so skillful, because it's not really mindfulness anymore—it's feeding the fear. Maybe more helpful then to get up, go outside, open the senses to something else: seeing, hearing. Redirect the attention. That's not an avoidance out of aversion. That's a movement of skillful means. And you'll know it because then you'll notice that the fear goes down, and either calm or balance or mindfulness is fed. The next day it could be totally turned around again. So it's always about what's happening right now. You do the best you can, you notice what happens.

I want to offer something the Buddha often talks about as a skillful means, which is really working with what you could call the qualities of devotion or gratitude. But again, I want to emphasize that it's not to get somewhere other than we are.

This is from Dogen, the very famous Zen master: "Truth is not far away. It is ever present. It's not something to be attained since not one of your steps can lead away from it. The practice of meditation is not a method for the attainment of realization. It is enlightenment itself."

Just to approach how we practice, how we live our life, how we're meeting our mind in any particular moment, what skillful means we're drawing on—with that attitude. Not to get to some goal, but to express awakening itself in this moment.

The Buddha talks in one sutta about directed and undirected meditation, and I want to show how this moves into a contemplation on gratitude or devotion. In this sutta, he's actually talking to Ananda, and Ananda has been telling him about some nuns who are doing really good practice. So just so you know, this sutta is about the nuns too. Then he's talking to Ananda—the nuns aren't there—and he says, "For one who is abiding contemplating body as body..." You're familiar with this line from the Satipatthana Sutta, the four foundations of mindfulness, which is the classic sutta on how to do mindfulness meditation from the Buddha. The four foundations are the body; vedana, feeling tone—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral; the citta, the state of mind, the quality of mind; and dhammas, which is a whole list including the hindrances and the four noble truths and the qualities of mind.

He goes through all four, but I'll just work with the body here. "For one who is abiding contemplating body as body, with the mind clear and balanced, it can happen that a bodily object arises, a fever in the body." Bhikkhu Bodhi says that this means a fever of kilesa, a fever of torment in relation to the body, or a sluggishness of mind. It can happen that these arise. And either that fever in the body, that fever of kilesa in the mind, causes the mind to scatter outward—that's the Buddha's words. Either we get completely lost and distracted, or we scatter outward into reactivity to the kilesa, to the torment. Basically, it's no longer mindfulness. We're lost.

So he says at that point, the nun or the bhikkhu should direct her mind to some inspiring sign. What he means by an inspiring sign is to place the mind on an object that inspires confidence, that inspires inspiration, that inspires devotion. This is when you're in the middle of a sitting, for example, or a walking, or whatever you're doing. And it's not just that you don't like what's happening—let us be clear. It's that the mind is really caught in a fever of kilesa, and the more we try to meditate on that particular object, the more the kilesa is being fed. So you deliberately direct the attention to an inspiring sign, to some image, to some object that inspires confidence or devotion.

The example he gives in another sutta is recollection of the Buddha. That may not be the one for us, but in this sutta he says you recollect the Tathagata—that's the Buddha. We could imagine really bringing to mind, in this state, if the Buddha inspires you, great. Maybe there's some teacher you've had, or someone you know or don't know, who really inspires confidence in some aspect of the pure heart and mind of awakening. Maybe it inspires loving kindness, or...

the truth of compassion in you. Maybe it inspires this sense of onward leading. I know people talk so much about the Dalai Lama because he inspires this so much in people.

I remember quite a few years ago, it was the early nineties, I went with some friends to Nepal, and we spent some time with Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche, who's dead now, who was really one of the main Dzogchen teachers—a very revered and respected Dzogchen master. He was wonderful. I didn't spend that much time with him, just ten or fifteen days. I took refuge with him and all. But taking refuge with him, I didn't even realize it at the time, but it made a connection in my heart and my mind, a kind of inspiration. I didn't think about it so much.

But I was on retreat quite a few years later—he was dead by then—and I was on retreat here doing walking meditation. I forget what was going on, but somehow I needed some sense of inspiration. And somehow, I didn't even consciously direct my mind, he just came up. And it brought up such a sense of gratitude and brightness and purity and appreciation and basically love of the Dhamma. It was palpable. It was amazing, actually. It was so inspiring. And not to hold on to that as a happy experience, but the whole point of it is basically to feed the purification of mind so we can then go back to the meditation.

This is what the Buddha says when you do that, when you recollect the Tathagata: "At any time when a noble disciple is recollecting the Tathagata, her mind is not overcome with passion, not overcome with aversion, not overcome with delusion. Her mind heads straight. When the mind is headed straight, the disciple gains a sense of the Dhamma, experiences joy connected with the Dhamma. In one who is joyful, rapture arises. In one who is rapturous, the body grows calm. One whose body is calmed experiences ease, and then the mind becomes collected."

That's the same thing he said in the other sutta I was reading. He goes through the same progression where basically the mind, or we would say the heart, opens to gratitude, to appreciation, to goodness, to faith in the Dhamma, to loving-kindness—whichever it is. And then as it goes through those phases, we're no longer struggling with the kilesas. The heart, the mind is calm again, collected again.

And then he says, "One then reflects: the purpose for which I directed my mind has been accomplished." It's really a very specific, skillful means. So now I withdraw the directed attention from that object of devotion, that object of appreciation. It's not denigrating or putting down the appreciation, but saying even that, we don't just hang out there because it feels good. It's really because it's purifying in that moment. We're lost in kilesas. We can't see through them with mindfulness of that particular object, so we switch objects. It's great to consciously bring in what opens the mind and heart.

I would say for some people, a few minutes of loving-kindness meditation or compassion meditation does that same thing. It moves the attention. It stops feeding the aversion or the greed and starts feeding the openness of unconditional love, of unconditional compassion. And then when that's accomplished—in other words, the mind has stopped feeding unwholesomeness and is now feeding wholesomeness—we can go back to moment-to-moment mindfulness. That's directed meditation.

And then he says "undirected," which is basically just moment-to-moment noticing whatever arises. He understands it's not focused on before or after. I'm just abiding, observing. The body is body. Ardent, fully aware, mindful, and I am content. Just moment-to-moment noticing.

I want to say a little bit more about the gratitude and devotion, the ways it's been helpful. I want to give you the other examples the Buddha uses in the sutta as objects that can help. When you develop this recollection of the Buddha, he says, you can do it while you're walking, while you're standing, while you're sitting, while you're lying down, while you are busy at work, while you are resting in your home crowded with children. Basically saying: no excuse that you're too busy, you can't do it.

It's something we can do no matter what.

Other recollections include recollecting the Dhamma. For me personally, that really inspires me more than the Buddha, or as I say, particular teachers. We can recollect the Sangha, the Sangha of the Blessed One's disciples. It might be other people we know who have inspired us.

These next two are interesting because I don't think we do them. You can recollect your own virtues, your own wholesome, kind behavior. This is actually something that's accessible to all of us, and we really rarely do it. We think of that as an ego thing. But recollecting with that sense of the purity, the wholesomeness of our virtues and of our past behavior—that's really a way of gladdening the heart, brightening the mind, and purifying the consciousness at a particular moment. Similarly, you can recollect your own generosity. That's also very lovely. It brings happiness.

And you can see, you can feel when you're feeding the purity, the brightening of the heart. You can feel when it kind of switches over to "Yeah, I really was generous, wasn't I?" Then you notice, oh, we're not feeding purity anymore—we're feeding "me." Okay, put it down. It feels worlds different when we're paying attention.

I want to say something about how this devotion works, this gratitude to beings, our gratitude to Dhamma, our appreciation of our own goodness—it's not about the person. As the Buddha said to someone who kept looking at him and wanting to be near him all the time, who said, "I need to see you. You're inspiring me so much." The Buddha responded, "The holy life is not about seeing the Buddha's person or being with the Tathagata's person. One who sees the Dhamma sees me."

So when he's talking about recollecting the qualities of himself, he's not saying, "Hey, come hang out with me. That's really great. I'm giving you shaktipat." He's not saying that. He's saying it brightens the heart, it brightens the mind, it opens us out of self-concern and self-interest into vastness, into the surrender to the unknown, into just that sensitivity of presence.

This is how Tulku Urgyen describes it: "The present moment method for becoming quickly accustomed to the unfabricated state of awareness is to have devotion to enlightened beings and compassion to unenlightened sentient beings. Devotion and compassion are both love. And in the moment of love, the empty nature dawns nakedly. If in that moment, the moment of love, you can look inwardly, it is like seeing the sun unobscured by clouds. The nature of emptiness is nakedly manifest."

Yet, he says, in the beginning we need the fabricated devotion—consciously thinking of someone, of the Dhamma—because the natural, unfabricated, naturally arising devotion and our uncontrived compassion does not occur immediately. Obviously, we're not just walking around like that. So great, use the fabricated, what the Buddha is talking about. Consciously bring to mind beings, your actions. Allow the heart and mind by itself to contemplate the goodness, to open through gratitude, through devotion. And just see that empty awareness—the heart, the mind that's purified in that moment—naturally arising together with love, with compassion. They're really both wonderful.

In some ways, I think the bhakti path, which they use more in the Tibetan tradition and Hindu tradition, places a lot of emphasis on finding a particular guru and doing much of the work through total devotion to that guru. I know from standing outside, you might wonder, "How can you see all the faults of that person?" And it's not about the person. It's about opening up that channel of unconditional devotion, of inspiration, of love, of compassion, of trust—that then allows us to be so present, so pure in heart and mind, that we notice, we recognize, and we trust the moments of that citta, of the mind, of the heart, that is free, that is pure.

There are so many moments of that in all of our days. So I'm talking about all the ways to notice it, to feed it, to create it. But also just notice all the times when it's already like that, when the mind, the citta, is not clouded by greed, by hatred, by confusion. And just noticing that is feeding it.

Notice all the different manifestations. Don't try to limit it. Just open into not knowing. As soon as we need to know "it's like this," we know that's wrong. Just being open to discover—through devotion, through compassion, through mettā, through moment-to-moment mindfulness, through concentration, through taking a walk, through looking at the mind. Sitting, walking, standing, lying down, eating, working—not with aversion but with love. With surrender. With really appreciating the infinite possibility that's available here and now, to all of us.

The Roots of Self-Judgment

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this talk from the Forest Refuge, Carol Wilson offers a penetrating exploration of self-judgment as a form of dosa (aversion) rooted in our fundamental misunderstanding of the First Noble Truth. She traces how aversion works moment-to-moment—the pulling back from unpleasant vedanā (feeling tone), the gap where delusion enters, and the proliferating papañca (mental proliferation) that follows. Wilson emphasizes that whatever triggers our fear, anger, or self-criticism is always arising in response to something happening right now, even when we're lost in memories or future projections.
>
> Wilson examines the three levels of dukkha—dukkha-dukkha (actual pain), vipariṇāma-dukkha (the unsatisfactoriness of constant change), and saṅkhāra-dukkha (perpetual incompleteness)—noting that understanding dukkha means accepting rather than transcending it. She points out how self-judgment flourishes when we hold unconscious views about how practice "should" be, creating idealized standards that generate aversion when reality doesn't match. The talk explores how wrong view solidifies the mind, filtering perceptions to confirm our negative self-assessments.
> Practically, Wilson suggests that when caught in self-judgment, stopping to ask "what's happening now?" often reveals an underlying difficult experience we unconsciously avoided. She shares Ajahn Sumedho's teaching that mettā means witnessing the unpleasant without creating anything around it. The talk concludes with a liberating perspective from a Burmese practitioner: when practice doesn't match expectations, simply "never mind"—no problem, no self-judgment, just returning to what's happening now.

So tonight I wanted to talk about the habit of self-judgment, which of course takes us into aversion, which means we also need to talk about the first noble truth.

I want to start by talking about how aversion can be experienced in a moment in our practice—just very simple, moment-to-moment, experientially. The function of how a moment of aversion works isn't going to be news to anybody here, I know that.

I'm using "aversion" to translate the Pali word dosa, which covers a whole range: aversion, ill will, irritation, fear—all the kinds of retreating and pulling back in the face of the unpleasant. I'm using aversion as a cover-all for those different mental states.

Very simply, when we can meet a moment of aversion arising in any of its forms in our mind, in or out of practice, this is what we can see happening. Basically, it's said that the habit of aversion, anger, irritation, or fear arises in the mind when sense contact—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, mental contact like thoughts, moods, emotions—has the feeling experience, the vedana, of being unpleasant. Although sometimes when it's neutral, some people actually experience a little aversion too.

The thing that's really fascinating to me, and that you can get really interested in and explore, is that whatever form the aversion is taking in your experience in a particular moment, it's a pulling back that's arising in response to some sense contact that's happening right now. Always right now, in this moment. Any sound, a sight, a smell, a thought—it's unpleasant, and without awareness, or even sometimes with awareness when the unpleasantness is strong, the way aversion works is that the attention, the connectedness, just pulls back. It's like your finger touches a hot stove—without even thinking, you flinch back, you pull back.

In moment-to-moment mindfulness, what I notice is that when there's an unpleasant sound that I don't like, the attention disconnects and pulls away just in that flash of a second. That's the momentary experience of aversion, of pulling back. It could be just a little unpleasant sound, and there's just a slight aversion. Or it could be huge fear coming up—fear about a sensation that projects into the future. We get caught in all this story. But the fear is just arising in response to one of the six sense contacts happening right now.

Even if you have a memory or enormous grief or guilt or fear or sorrow—if you're really caught in a lot of aversion or fear about some past really intense memory that comes up—we can easily get lost in the story, in the past, and it feels huge. The thing we can always know is it's only arising in response to an experience that's happening right now. Huge guilt isn't being triggered by ten years ago; it's being triggered by something arising in this moment. It's a memory, maybe, but the memory is a thought happening now. It's a sensation that reminds us of our past, but that sensation is happening now. The reminding, the thought, is happening now.

I emphasize this because I've found it so enormously helpful when the fear or the sorrow seems like it's really getting out of control—that I've got to do something, it's so much, it's huge, my life, what am I going to do, the future. Wait—what's actually happening right now? Sometimes we can get there, sometimes we can't. Sometimes fear is all we can do, and that's great. At least the fear is happening now.

I'm starting out this way because I wanted to give us a sense that whether it's a very tiny pulling back of aversion or something really huge, it's all that immediate withdrawing of attention, that disconnect from one of the six sense contacts. It's unpleasant, happening now.

How it goes from just a little to huge is that in that flinching back, that pulling back, there's a space that says, "Delusion, please come in right here." When there's not connectedness, when the attention isn't just connected—"Ah, unpleasant memory, I hate it," but seeing it—okay, that's clear seeing. It's unpleasant. We hate it. Hating feels like this. The memory is this. This is what's happening now. No problem. You might not like it, but no problem.

But when the attention flinches back, pulls back, in that moment awareness can't have wisdom in it. It can't see or recognize clearly what's happening. And in that space, which doesn't have to be very big or long—huge, huge. One thought leads to another, to an association, to a memory, none of which we're quite noticing.

The fear has us down the road for the next ten years. And it's just feeding on itself, getting really huge. And the more this fear—fear is like retreating aversion. Anger is forward going. It all retreats. And then anger is like lashing out. Fear is pulling away more. They're both aversion.

But in the sense of this gap, this space, you could say, the habits of the mind—which is what they call papañca—it just kind of runs wild. "But if this happens, then that could happen. And what about that last time? And this reminds me of when I was in the third grade and how my father used to treat me." And this really—you're back there. It's huge. And then the aversion just feeds, the thoughts feed on themselves. We're further and further removed, so to speak.

I mean, we didn't really go anywhere, right? We understand that. It's always right here. But in terms of recognizing accurately what's happening, we're further and further removed from being able to just meet this moment with mindfulness. We're getting caught in the aversion spinning itself, in the fear spinning itself.

You know what I mean? It's like Sayadaw U Pandita says—it's like a cow. You know how the cow chews its cud and then it swallows it down and then it regurgitates it up again and chews on it and chews on it and chews on it? Well, when you're caught in an aversion state, it's like that. It calms down. Then a thought: "Yeah, but what about..." And it comes back up and we jump on the train and go, go, go.

So delusion—I mean, aversion really comes from an essential delusion, which I'll get into in a minute. But then when mindfulness doesn't recognize the aversion, the source of the aversion, or can't come in and say "what's happening right now" because of the disconnect, it just kind of feeds delusion. And delusion gets further and further along because we can't recognize or discern accurately. Then the papañca, the thoughts just filling up our mind and the world, get further and further afield. And the delusion increases—delusion in the sense of just not recognizing accurately what's happening.

So the essential delusion with greed, with aversion—of course, but here we're talking about aversion—it's kind of the misunderstanding, or maybe the unconscious thought, the pulling back, that somehow I can hold myself separate from this unpleasant experience. The loud, unpleasant sound—like our whole body flinches back and tightens up, as if that helps anything, but somehow as if we're trying to hold ourselves separate. Or: "This shouldn't even be happening." Or: "I should be able to do something to stop this from happening. Clearly, it's a mistake." Or complete, total denial that it's even happening at all. "This isn't happening, and there's no—by the way—aversion in my mind either. We're just going along happy, happy."

All of these are different aspects of the delusion.

Self-judging—how that feeds in here, I mean, it's obvious. Self-judging is a form of aversion. Negativity. Pulling back. Judging. Not liking what's happening, based on these other delusions, and then turning it against ourselves.

So an unpleasant experience arises. And then there might be a thought: "This shouldn't be happening," or "I'm no good." That's already the delusion coming in. Say you're with the breath. Suddenly you're lost in thought. You recognize it. And there's an unpleasant feeling—you don't even see that. Then there's the thought, "This shouldn't be happening." We're pulled back already from the unpleasant feeling. And instead of just noticing—oh, lost in thought, unpleasant feeling—it's: "This shouldn't be happening. What did they say? Let me remember. Let me read this book. And maybe I should listen to that talk."

And let me try and get back. And the mind is just pumping itself with more thoughts and reactions. What's happening now?

So this self-judging just keeps going—it's the way that papañca, that proliferating way of thinking, spreads out. And it takes the particular story: I'm wrong, I'm bad, this shouldn't be happening.

But the main source, in my opinion, of the delusion altogether that gets us lost in the aversion—that the aversion even arises as a habit—the habit is based in not really deeply understanding, in ourselves, all the Four Noble Truths, but particularly the First Noble Truth of Dukkha. So I want to talk a little bit about that.

As you know, when the Buddha talked about the Four Noble Truths, he said the first truth, dukkha, is to be understood. Not to be transcended, not to be changed, but to be understood. And personally, I find in my whole life of practice—of course, many, many understandings, many aspects of reality—we just keep cycling through, seeing new levels of it, new subtleties, new understandings. And with this First Noble Truth of Dukkha, that continues to be the case for me. And each time I reconnect or understand or open to how it is a little more, the experience is one of lightness, of more freedom, of happiness.

So just to again remind us what this noble truth is, in my current understanding: the word dukkha is often translated, and I don't think so accurately, as "suffering." This is where people who don't really know much about Buddhism get the rap that Buddhism means life is suffering—First Noble Truth, right?

Now, I don't know how it is for you, but for me—and I know I'm not alone—the word suffering, I can hardly think that word without some subtle feeling coming along with it of a slight aversion, a slight negativity. And dukkha, actually the truth of dukkha, is not about engendering or having anything to do with aversion, or judgment, or even necessarily anything unpleasant.

So dukkha, just the word—this is from the book by Anālayo about the four foundations, one of his little footnotes—he says there are two different ways in Pali the word dukkha could be broken down. Both come to a similar meaning. The du part means difficulty. In the first way of breaking it down, the second part would be kha. And one meaning of that is like the hole in the wheel, like in the old carts—the hole where the axle would go through. So that's kha. It means the axle hole is difficult; it doesn't fit properly. And so from that, he comes to define dukkha as meaning disharmony, friction. Like every time the wheel's turning, it doesn't really work right. It rubs, it rubs. I can relate to that as dukkha.

The other meaning—again, the du is difficulty or badness, and instead of kha, they take it from the root ṭhā, which means standing. So it means standing with difficulty, an uneasiness, an uncomfortableness. And so in that way, maybe one closer word that we often use rather than suffering is unsatisfactoriness—the basic unsatisfactoriness that runs through our lives. Unsatisfactory doesn't mean, of course, always unpleasant or painful. It's not just suffering.

As you know, the Buddha talks about dukkha as being birth, old age, disease, and death; being separated from what we love; being together with what we don't love; the five aggregates of clinging. But there are other ways he talks about it too.

Sometimes he breaks it into three levels. One level being dukkha-dukkha, or actual pain—actual physical, emotional pain. That's definitely unpleasant. The second is viparinṇāma-dukkha, which is the dukkha, the unsatisfactoriness, of constant change—pleasant to unpleasant to neutral, and the constant change. That's the being separated from what we love, being brought together with what we don't love, just the fact that everything is unreliable. It doesn't mean everything's unpleasant or suffering in the terms of how we think of suffering. And in fact, it includes the pleasant, the beautiful.

This is interesting if we want to really understand the First Noble Truth of Dukkha—that it doesn't just mean the stuff we don't like. There's one sutta where the Buddha was talking, and Sāriputta was there. And Sāriputta, in hearing the Buddha talking about this, became completely enlightened. He was already partly there. The Buddha was talking about vedanā, feeling tone. And he said it in this one line: "Whatever is felt, whatever is felt is included within dukkha." So not just the unpleasant. Whatever is felt is included within dukkha.

So dukkha means unsatisfactory, unreliable, because always changing. And then there's the third type, sankhara dukkha, which I like the way Bhikkhu Bodhi described it as perpetual incompleteness. Insubstantiality. Sankhara being formation—stuff's always coming together and going apart, coming together and going apart.

Now, within this understanding, it doesn't mean every moment is suffering. It's all dukkha, yes, but it doesn't mean, "Oh, that's beautiful, but it's just going to go to hell with it. Life is dukkha." That's aversion. The First Noble Truth is not aversion. That's the Second Truth—the cause of our suffering, aversion and clinging. The First is just kind of, "Hey, this is how things are."

If dukkha is to be understood, the Buddha's not saying understand this so you can be even more miserable than you already are. He didn't come saying, "I'm here to increase your suffering. Read this and weep." He's really saying that understanding dukkha brings freedom. It brings peace of heart.

And I know for me this is true, and I know for many people I've talked to, that one of the things that first lit me up when I began practicing and hearing Buddhist teachings—and it wasn't until after I'd practiced some that I started to even get the teachings—but hearing about dukkha was like this huge relief. Because growing up in a kind of middle-class American white culture, you're always pretending everything's okay, basically. You go out and do things and it's all this struggle, and you're trying to have a nice time.

I remember this story. I went with a friend to a sauna somewhere half an hour from here. We were tired. We didn't want to go. We get in the car. We drive. It's freezing out. We're driving in the ice. We're stressed. We get in the sauna, separate saunas. Ah, fine, you know, for a couple minutes. Then you start sweating. Then you're hot. Then you're too hot. Then you go out and take a shower. It's too cold. Then you go back in, and it's nice for a second. Then it's too hot. Then you come out. You stink. You wash. You get in the car, drive back in the rain. And you go, "Wow, that was great!"

You know, that's how half my life was lived. Everything's great! But how come so much of it wasn't great? And if you say that to someone, they respond, "What's the matter with you? You're just a downer. It's wonderful. You're so lucky."

So understanding dukkha is just this: there are beautiful things, there are wonderful things—they're going to change. There's difficult stuff—it's going to change. It's always coming together and going apart, coming together and going apart. Understanding all of that comes just from seeing how it is—not sitting and thinking and making a list, but bringing in our awareness, meeting the moment-to-moment experience, like I described with that sauna.

If I'm just present with all of that, I'll notice, "Oh, it's pleasant. Now it's not." But it's no problem. I'm not needing it to be pleasant to be okay. I'm not going to the sauna to increase my moments of pleasantness, and if it's not pleasant, something's wrong, so we deny it. When we see how it actually is, clinging doesn't have to come. Aversion doesn't come.

That's just how dukkha is. It's to be understood.

The Buddha often used this way of talking about exploring—seeing the gratification, seeing the danger, and seeing the escape in different aspects of experience. He talks about this in terms of the world, and I want to read this short passage because I think it's important to realize that in terms of dukkha, the first noble truth, it includes gratification. It includes beauty. It includes appreciating nature. I'm adding that interpretation, but the point is that this isn't about trying to deny the pleasant or the lovely and just seeing, "No, it's all bad, it all stinks." It's not that. It's seeing the gratification, understanding it, and then understanding the limits of it, the danger of it, and the escape.

He's talking about when he was still a bodhisatta, and it occurred to him: What is the gratification in the world? What is the danger in the world? What is the escape from the world? Then it occurred to him: whatever pleasure and joy there is in the world, this is the gratification. And that's true—it is a gratification. That the world is impermanent, bound up with dukkha, subject to change—this is the danger in the world. The removal, the abandoning of desire and lust for the world—this is the escape from the world.

I think that's really important. He's not denying joy, pleasure, or beauty. Just understanding it's only just so much. It's going to change. When there's no desire and lust to hold on to that joy, that beauty, it's not a problem anymore. That's the escape. It doesn't mean we have to kill beauty or kill joy. But it means understanding.

Understanding these different levels of dukkha—and I don't just mean on the intellectual level—this is, in my case, why it keeps going deeper and deeper. Because of course it's in our own experience, and then when we look out in the world, just at the level of suffering, it's huge. At the level of the constant coming together and going apart, the insubstantiality, nowhere we can take a firm stand and hold on to it—in the material world, in our thoughts, in our views, in how things feel, in your meditation practice, God knows. Seeing that, really when we understand that cellularly, and we all have moments of that in practice, that's when the aversion, that's when the clinging, lets go, is seen through, or doesn't even arise.

In my experience, the basic delusion that aversion, fear, and the sense of self that comes with them arises from is on deep, habitual levels—not totally getting, understanding, accepting the fact of these aspects of dukkha. That guess what? There's no way we can hold ourselves separate from the unpleasant. There's no way. It just gets better and better and better. Back and forth, up and down, in and out, together, apart, endlessly, endlessly. That's the sankhara dukkha—endlessly. So that's the level of delusion, the big picture.

Now I'm going to come back to the moment-to-moment picture again in our practice. I'll keep going back and forth.

In the moment, something unpleasant comes up. What feeds it? What keeps the aversion going? Aversion comes—what are some of the things that keep it going? Where do we move from just noticing an unpleasant sound, aversion arising like this, and that's the next object, no problem? I'm not saying it shouldn't happen. It's no problem. But what's the difference between that and—you all know what I mean—running around here, even if you're going slow, but running around like a nut filled with aversion and fear? What can I do? How can I fix it?

There are a few things. I'm just throwing out different things to notice. One thing the Buddha said—one of the things that feeds aversion, feeds ill will actually—is unwise attention to the unpleasant or repugnant aspect of an experience. For example, you're angry at someone. Someone here did something really inconsiderate and stupid, and they're a jerk. Every time you see them, every time they walk by, you're just sitting there. You can't not look at them.

You look at them, and every time you look at them, it gets you more angry. How can they just walk around like that when they acted like that? The more you look, the angrier you get.

Thich Nhat Hanh uses a wonderful example for this. If you have a tooth that's just a little bit rough, a little hole in the tooth, notice how you can't keep your tongue away from that little rough spot. The rest of your teeth are fine. You don't notice the rest of your teeth. But with that little rough spot, you're at it all day, and it just bugs you more and more and more. This is unwise attention to the unpleasant or repugnant aspect of an experience—not quite noticing what we're doing each time. It feeds another moment of aversion. And the first aversion maybe didn't completely go away. You know how the thought's gone, but we still feel a little tightness in the body. We think, "Oh, well, that's gone. Okay." Then we go back. And each time it's stronger and stronger, feeding on itself.

That's one way. Another way is getting really lost in the thoughts about, say, somebody who did something wrong. We're angry. It's unpleasant. We're judging them. We feel ill will. And we can get quite caught up in thinking, "But it's true. They did do a wrong thing." The same with fear: "But it's true. This might happen. It makes sense to be afraid of it." None of those are really noticing what's exactly happening, right? We get lost in the story. It's true. The fear is right.

And fear, particularly, is a very self-justifying emotion when we're not totally mindful of the fear itself. If you're sitting, like several people have said, sitting and really pretty quiet, and something happens—the breath changes, or some experience happens that's different from what we've experienced before—it's almost built in that fear comes shooting up right then. And if we're not right there with the fear, the mind almost thinks, "Well, because fear's here, that's proof that there's something wrong." The fear proves it. It's self-justifying.

Anger can be the same way. "But they did do something wrong, and my anger is justified because of that thing." It just becomes an endless loop until we bring the mindfulness: fear is like this, anger is like this. It's got nothing to do with what that person did. Nothing to do with what that person did. Everything to do with the mind reacting to unpleasant without mindfulness and wisdom and then getting lost in thoughts about it.

The third way that really feeds aversion is what I mentioned before: basic outright denial. Either that unpleasant isn't even happening—which we're actually amazingly adept at doing—or that there's any aversion at all.

A friend was telling me he was sitting the three-month retreat last year. This is somebody who has sat—I don't know how many three-month retreats. We're not talking about a neophyte here. And it's something we're all quite capable of doing. He was sitting in a sitting well into the retreat, and he said, "I felt really pretty mindful and present. I was just noticing, noting what happened, noticing the sensations in the body. And I thought, no, a little aversion came up and I really noticed that. And then I went back. It was just all gone." He got up and was walking to the—it was lunchtime, walking to lunch.

He thought he was being totally mindful. Got in the lunch line and was just overwhelmed with ill will and negativity towards the people, the food, everything. He was completely knocked back. He said, "Oh my gosh, there was this aversion going on in the background the whole time since that first little moment of aversion in the sitting. I just completely overlooked it. Completely."

So there's aversion happening, and you're just noting lifting, moving, placing, rising, falling, touching. And then as soon as it lets up a little bit, it's like you're shooting out: "I can't believe these stupid..." Oh my goodness. A little bit of aversion here. We're really good at that—or coding it all in wanting. Something unpleasant comes up and the mind just moves into wanting right away. We get sidetracked into the wanting. Or outright denial.

I have a friend in Switzerland. She used to cook at the retreat center in the mountains where I teach every year. In the mountains, the weather can change really rapidly. It can be beautifully clear in the morning, not a cloud in the sky. Suddenly at lunchtime a few clouds will come over, and by one o'clock you're having a huge thunderstorm. She came from a flat area of Switzerland where it wasn't like that.

She was telling me this: after three years in the mountains, she loved to lie in the sun in the garden when she wasn't cooking. She'd be lying in the sun, pristine blue sky, and suddenly a cloud would come, rain clouds would gather. And she'd just lie there saying, "No, this isn't happening. It's not going to turn into anything. It isn't happening."

That might sound silly, but check it out. Just check it out.

Resistance. Just that subtle tensing up, holding ourselves away from—no, this isn't happening. We know it's happening. It's not quite total denial, but we're holding ourselves away.

Often all of these are based on a view that we have, based on thought, based on our not really opening to, not really understanding and allowing the truth of dukkha, the radical nature of dukkha. Somewhere there's the view: this isn't supposed to be happening. This shouldn't be happening. If my practice—if I were doing my practice correctly—my mind wouldn't wander more today than it did yesterday. And I'm counting! If I were doing my practice correctly, I would be done with sleepiness by now. Not supposed to be happening.

So this unpleasant thing—we kind of tighten up, hold away, look at it out of the corner of our eye. This is disconnect. But we kid ourselves. "I'm waiting for this to go away, for the real thing to start happening." And the real thing is always a little bit better.

This is where self-judgment really gets a foothold and can start taking over. It's a view—really a wrong view—that operates to the level that we're not, in any particular moment, letting in, accepting, seeing and understanding dukkha. Whatever form of change, of unpleasantness or suffering, of just the insubstantiality, the perpetual incompleteness—when we're not quite recognizing, "Oh yeah, this is how it is."

I don't know if you've noticed, but the mind has a tendency to set up a view, which we don't even recognize as a view. Often it's not even in clear words. But it's essentially: this is how things are, this is what's supposed to happen. In our whole lives we do it, but really, really big time in meditation practice. This is what's supposed to happen in a sitting. This is what's supposed to happen in a walking. This is the direction my practice is supposed to move. This is what it's done before, and that's the right thing.

What's happening now isn't the right thing. It's the wrong thing. And somehow I've got to take it and move it and twist it and get it to the right thing, which is getting better and better and moving in the right direction and generally more and more pleasant. It sounds so silly when I say it, doesn't it?

With self-judgment, something arises that's unpleasant. It could just be a jagged breath. It could be a thought that's unpleasant, and we don't notice it's unpleasant. It moves into, "Oh, I'm thinking too much." But really, that was delusion coming because we didn't notice it was just an unpleasant thought.

With self-judgment, we start to notice the unpleasant, and then the view, the thought comes: "This isn't right. I can't do this," or "I always..." or whatever way your mind says it. And it solidifies into a view. "It's supposed to be like this. I can't do it. It's like that." And then that self-judgment, which is just a form of aversion, while it's in the mind, colors all our perceptions. It slants what we notice. When you're really in the lens of self-judgment, I know how it feels. I can recognize it now. It has a feeling. The thoughts, which are usually not too subtle, even though we're quite able to miss them, we think.

"You're doing it wrong." Is that self-judgment? "No, no, that's just... I'm trying to have some skillful means here. Tighten up. Do it right. Get rid of that thought. This isn't self-judgment. That's just, you know, I've heard the teacher say that, and that's how you practice." It's not—when we really see it.

So learning to recognize the thoughts and how it feels, and then knowing: once that lens of self-judgment is feeding, it sees everything that happens through that lens. It almost only lets in—this is what wrong view does. It solidifies the mind. It almost only lets in perceptions that go along with the view we're holding. The view being, "I'm a stupid jerk and I can't practice. After all these years, I'm wasting my time." Any perception that doesn't match that is discarded, if it's even noticed.

So next time—if ever this happens to you again—notice how you think, "Well, aniccā means everything's coming and going." Yeah, right, everything's coming and going, but better things should be coming and worse things should be going. And it's not happening like that. I'm not trying hard enough. Things are coming and going, but they should be getting more subtle, and they're not because I'm not trying hard enough. It'll just twist everything.

I can recognize now—in life too, it's not just on retreat, God knows—I can recognize just how self-judging feels, sometimes before I even recognize the thoughts. And I know in that space I cannot trust any assessment or any skillful means thought that comes up. I just know that. And then it's fine. Oh, that's what's happening—self-judgment. I know I can't trust what it perceives, and I don't need to. I just notice those thoughts coming and going, coming and going.

But when we don't, the view of self-judgment just covers everything and solidifies and feeds, doesn't it, our aversion to everything that's happening. Nothing's right because we're not right. And the stronger that gets, the more difficult it is for mindfulness with wisdom to meet what's happening, to just experience directly—because we're more and more going to have to fix it, because I'm so bad, instead of, "Oh, self-judgment is like this." Just meeting what's happening.

As Ajahn Sumedho says—I think maybe I've used this before, I love it—he talks about this. He's actually defining mettā, but it's a great definition for mindfulness with difficulty as well. He says it doesn't necessarily mean liking anything at all, but witnessing the unpleasant in yourself in another, in a situation, without creating anything around it. It's just, oh, unpleasant. It's like this.

Or another way Sumedho talks about awareness being the point that includes. So finding a way, instead of pushing away that unpleasant—whether it's so-called external or internal, whether it's about a sound or whether it's about the judgment of yourself—just finding a way to include that in awareness, rather than staying lost in this fighting, trying to hold ourselves separate, trying to judge what's happening as wrong or bad.

I'll read you a poem. It's funny—I think it's funny. It's an example of how to switch from holding something as bad to including it. From Billy Collins: "Another Reason Why I Don't Keep a Gun in the House."

The neighbor's dog will not stop barking. He is barking the same high rhythmic bark that he barks every time they leave the house. They must switch him on on their way out. The neighbor's dog will not stop barking. I close all the windows in the house and put on a Beethoven symphony full blast, but I can still hear him muffled under the music, barking, barking, barking. And now I can see him sitting in the orchestra, his head raised confidently as if Beethoven had included a part for barking dog. When the record finally ends, he is still barking, sitting there in the oboe section, barking, his eyes fixed on the conductor who is entreating him with his baton while the other musicians listen in respectful silence to the famous barking dog solo, that endless coda that first established Beethoven as an innovative genius.

It's interesting, in a way, that we have this almost instinctive reflex of denying—now I'm using suffering deliberately, that dukkha dukkha part of dukkha—of denying suffering, as if it shouldn't be. And as Ajahn Sumedho likes to say, it's one of the things, along with joy might I add, along with friendliness, but suffering, difficulty, pain, sorrow is one of the things that unites us all. It's one of the common things we all share as living beings, as human beings.

And in terms of self-judgment, I find it kind of sad and weird that when we experience something difficult, sorrowful, painful, unsatisfactory, we turn against ourselves and feel more alienated and separate and judgmental and bad, instead of actually—when we meet it with compassion—it takes us through to a commonality, to our union with all beings.

Ajahn Sumedho likes to talk about how some Thai abbots start their talks to people—you know, the local people come on the weekends—they would start with, "Dear brothers and sisters in old age, disease, and death." It just brings us all here together, you know? It can be met in such a different way, not with denial.

Again, Sumedho says to understand dukkha—and I mean all of it, not just suffering—means that we accept it rather than just trying to get rid of it or trying to deny it or trying to blame somebody else for it, which is kind of all the ways that our mind tends to act. And so when we're in those modes, when we don't accept, even on very subtle levels, that painful, difficult stuff's going to happen, that no matter how beautiful our practice is going—beautiful meaning we like it, or it matches some idea we have—it's going to change. And that change is just a law of nature.

The levels to which we don't accept that on some deep level, and turn it against ourselves, means when in our own experience, in our own life, something painful or difficult or unsatisfactory or changing happens, we can't accept it. Can't accept it outwardly in the world, can't accept it inwardly in ourselves.

So really this opening to understanding dukkha is both so-called external and internal. Sometimes it's about bearing witness, really being present with kindness, with mindfulness, with wisdom for our own sorrows, pains, unsatisfactoriness, confusion, constant change, beauty. Sometimes we can't do it so-called with ourselves, but we can bear witness or be present for the sorrows, the pain, the change, the confusion in the external world—or vice versa.

In myself, I've always found it—I don't know why, it's just how my mind works—very inspiring to read about or know about people who have been present in the world, present or part of or witnesses to some of the enormous, endless suffering states, aspects of history that go on. There are endless examples, whether it's a poet, or someone who's involved like Dr. Martin Luther King or Aung San Suu Kyi, or whether it's a writer like Alexander Solzhenitsyn writing about the gulags in Russia, whether it's someone—like I have several friends with HIV—and just seeing how they're able to be present. I mean, through all the ups and downs, not always like, "Oh, isn't..."—I don't mean being present when everything's wonderful, but being able to keep showing up with mindfulness, with courage, to their fear, to their lack of fear, to whatever it is that's happening. Friends who've worked in hospice, people in my family.

So it can be on the vast field of history. It can be just friends that we know. It can be ourselves. But whenever I read about or meet or hear about someone who's been able to just bear witness without becoming embittered—you know, without having to turn to violence, without having to just shut down—I'm always really inspired. Inspired in a way that kind of opens me up to a sense of the possibility of connectedness, of compassion externally, also internally.

And it's always amazing to me to see, again in the big picture or just one-on-one, how rare it is and how really meaningful it is for someone when they're in a lot of pain and you or a friend is able to just be there with them. Often there's nothing we can do. But to still be there, not with ten million suggestions of how to get rid of it. I mean, if you know something that can help, yeah, great.

But often we don't. I know there was a time when I had a chronic illness that no one knew what to do about. It was really interesting. You can just feel the different degrees of ability people have just to be there. I mean, I know a lot of people, and everyone had an idea what to do, which if you've had a disease, it can drive you nuts. And you can feel the difference when people are coming with, "Wow, that's really hard," and they can just be there with you. There's not an aversion, not a needing to fix to make it go away. And then how other people, really well-meaning, would say, "Try this, try this, try that, try that." And the energy is just, "I can't bear this. It's too much." Well-meaning. But that sense of how powerful it is to just be able to be present in the midst of change, in the midst of the unknown, in the midst of dukkha dukkha. In the midst of joy, without needing to fix, without needing to get lost in aversion and fear.

And we're not ever always going to be able to do that. But just beginning to touch it. And for yourself. That's really what we can do here on retreat. Inside, it works the same outside. It's not selfish. This is really where we start.

So I find for myself, on or off retreat doesn't matter, but when I'm finding that I'm really getting caught in self-judging, a lot of self-judging, or just feeling disconnected, which then leads to self-judging—something's just off and I don't know what, and I'm trying to figure it out, and I'm doing all the things, and let me do my practice, and it just gets more and more intense, exaggerated, magnified—pretty much every time I can remember, when I finally just stopped, whether I'm on retreat or off, sit down, stand, whatever, and just feel myself, my mind, my body, what's happening now? Not to fix it or understand, just wait, what's going on now? I almost always found that there was something—the disconnection, the judgment, all of that—was a reaction to something obviously difficult or unpleasant happening in my mind, in my body, my emotions, that I just unconsciously didn't even want to be with. And I don't have to fix it or understand it or anything. Oh, that's what's happening.

For example, loneliness. Oh, loneliness. It's like this. And it doesn't mean it's la-di-da. It might be very intense, moving in and feeling it. I know my mindfulness and wisdom has hit what's happening because instead of all this kind of fog of self-judgment and confusion and thoughts and trying to figure it out and reading texts and trying to remember, which is exhausting and it's like a big miasma of what's happening, when I hit the sorrow, or the fear, or the longing, it's like, "Oh, loneliness. It's like this." Just—ah—relief. Oh, this is what's happening. It's just dukkha. It's just life. It's okay. That's just what it is. I don't have to make anything around it, as Sumedho says.

It's not a sign of my intrinsic failure to be a spiritual person because I'm angry. It's not a sign that my practice is going to hell because I'm having all these thoughts, whereas my last retreat it wasn't like that. It's not a sign of anything. All of that is just making up the story of me from some unpleasant experience, or a pleasant one that went away.

So I really find it true, the opening into what's unpleasant. Oh, it's this. The connection's there again. The whole story of self-judgment doesn't have any grounding in anything. It can still be there. It doesn't matter. It's just a habit of mine. But it's not really grounded in anything. That moment of real—the potential of liberation, just for that moment. Liberation not from the unpleasant experience.

Liberation isn't from having things fall apart. Liberation isn't from having things we don't like happen. It may not even be liberation from the thoughts of self-judgment, but it's liberation from believing the self-judgment, liberation from the delusion—and now I'm using the word suffering deliberately—the suffering of thinking, "This is not how it's supposed to be, and it's my fault. I should be able to make this better, and I'm a failure, or I'm weak, or I'm embarrassed because I can't." Oh, it's just how it is in this moment. That's dukkha. And there can be peace, ease, in the midst.

Don't go for the biggest, most painful story you have. But just in the midst of the unpleasant sound, of the headache, of the sleepiness, of the sitting where the mind is just going off and back, off and back—not even to intelligent thoughts, but totally stupid ones, and unpleasant—in the midst of that: "Oh, it's just dukkha." The insubstantial, always coming together and falling apart nature of reality. That's how it is. What's the problem? What's the problem?

Just one last thing I want to say about self-judging, something that's helped me a lot, is seeing how one of the things that can really lead to buying into self-judgment and getting caught in it is the tendency of our minds towards a kind of idealization. This view again—wrong view—a sense that things should be perfect or ideal. I don't know if you notice this. We do it with people, with teachers, with meditation technique, with how we should feel, with all kinds of things. And not realizing—again, it's not getting dukkha—how can anything be perfect and stay perfect? That completely obviates impermanence, dukkha, and anatta, that everything's in constant flux.

But this sense of idealizing—and I also notice in my mind—the thinking mind has a tendency toward "it's good or it's bad," "it's this or it's that." Very linear and clear and discrete. And the thinking mind, which is very limited, doesn't know what to do with things that don't fit into these nice categories.

I'll give you two examples. When I first went to Thailand to be a nun, I was staying in a temple with a very famous, well-known Thai abbot—one of the most famous in Thailand. I'd just been there a day, and I hadn't become a nun yet. We were just sleeping on the floor of the little hut, and I had long hair. When I woke up in the morning, a stream of ants had somehow moved into a new pathway through my hair. So I woke up with ants in my hair and all over, and I had just gotten to Thailand. I was freaking out. I hadn't adjusted to the climate, to the bugs. So I went running to the Ajahn, who was this very famous, very well-respected teacher—"What do I do?" you know, because of the precepts and all. And he just had his assistant, who was also a monk, hand me a can of Raid, right there. Raid is an insect killer. I was just like, "What?" It did not compute. I'm here in Thailand with all the precepts, and they said, "Here, go spray the Raid." What do I do with that?

Another time, I noticed this same sense of "you're either all good or you're all bad." When I was a kid, about eleven or twelve, I used to read these books by a man who was a medical doctor and had set up clinics in Laos and Vietnam in the fifties. He's writing about himself and all the work he did. I was very inspired by this guy. Then when I became an adult, I heard that he was also a CIA agent. So in my mind: doctor working in Laos, great; CIA agent, bad, totally bad. Can't compute the two together. You're all good or you're all bad.

I was saying this in a talk once, and a friend came up afterward, an older man. He said, "I used to work in the government, and I knew a lot of CIA agents. They're not all bad people. You can't just think of CIA agents as bad people. Some of them are very sincere, wonderful people."

And my mind just goes blank. We do that with ourselves, with our meditation practice. Just notice when you're getting into self-judgment and comparing and aversion—see if there's some view, some thought. It might not even be as clear as a thought, something we're holding onto without even realizing it, comparing ourselves to, and it's not matching. And just that not matching is the unpleasant experience in that moment that's feeding all the self-judging. So these are just some ways of looking at this and not getting so caught.

I'll end with another possibility, from a friend in Burma. We were on a retreat taught by Sayadaw U Kena, who teaches in the Mahasi method of noting, noting, noting every moment. He'd been giving a talk saying, you know, with noting—for example, anger—if anger arises, note it three times, and then it'll go away, and then you come back to whatever's arising next.

This was a retreat of mostly Westerners. At the end, the teacher left, and one of the people there said, "But I noted three times, and the anger doesn't go away. What am I doing wrong? It's supposed to go away." The whole self-judgment arising.

Later, you know, the teacher clarified: of course it doesn't always go away. You just keep noticing whatever is present. As long as it's there, it's there. No problem. That's what I'm saying. Thinking it should go away, and the self-judgment—that's the problem.

My friend, a Burmese man who had been translating for a while, said afterward, "That was so interesting. I never heard something like that."

I said, "Because for us, it doesn't go away in three notings either. But I never heard that you can just note and that it's not a problem."

He said, "Oh, really?"

I asked, "So when it doesn't go away in three notings, what do you do?"

He said, "Oh, we just say, 'Oh well, never mind.' And that's it. No problem. No self-judgment. No big angst. No 'Oh my God.' Just, 'Oh well, never mind.'"

So I leave you with that. Next time practice doesn't go the way you ideally think it should: Oh well, never mind. What's happening now?

CHAPTER 26

Perception and Thought

Carol Wilson · 54 min

> In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson addresses a common meditation dilemma: the paradoxical nature of thought. While thoughts are inherently empty and ephemeral—dissolving back into nothing—they possess tremendous power to construct our entire sense of self and world. Drawing from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche's teachings, she illustrates how deluded thoughts arise like clouds and vanish into the voidness of mind, emphasizing that "in reality, nothing at all has happened."
>
> Wilson systematically examines how papañca (mental proliferation) develops from perception through the influence of unwholesome mental factors. She identifies four primary fuels: taṇhā (craving), diṭṭhi (view, particularly sakkāya-diṭṭhi or identity view), māna (conceit expressed through comparing), and fear. Using vivid examples—from the famous Joshua Bell subway experiment to dining hall dynamics on retreat—she demonstrates how perception colored by these factors leads to elaborate mental constructions that obscure direct experience.
> The practical wisdom offered here is profound yet accessible: rather than fighting thoughts or considering them problems, we can observe their arising and passing with detached attention. When thoughts become too powerful to simply observe, Wilson suggests turning attention to underlying feelings or bodily sensations. Through sustained mindfulness, wisdom naturally arises, revealing the futility of mental proliferation and allowing thoughts to pass "as a bird crosses the sky without leaving any trace."

Tonight I want to talk a bit about this paradox, this dilemma of thought. This arises once in a while in interviews, and occasionally it seems to be something of a problem in people's meditation. So I thought I'd offer some thoughts about it.

That's really interesting, right? Because if you just look at a thought, it's nothing. It's absolutely nothing. It's completely ephemeral, empty. "The floor is brown"—just nothing. "I'm a stupid jerk"—just nothing. Just emptiness going through. And yet it's so powerful. Our whole career, our whole world, really our whole sense of ourselves—the whole world is created by thought.

Look at the power of propaganda, for example. That's nothing but thought. I was watching a public television special on Goebbels, the propaganda minister from the beginning of the Third Reich through the Nazi time. Amazing—just how to manipulate, what thoughts to put out, repeating them over and over, preying on emotions. But it's all the work of thought. Quite amazing.

When thought isn't understood properly, that's when we get so seduced. We're seduced by the content, obviously completely wrapped up in it—like, don't like, upset, whatever. We're seduced by the strong mental states and emotions that come along with thought, often seduced by not even seeing them and getting even more involved in the content. Or we think that because there's this strong emotion, whatever the thought is saying really must be true, that it needs to be paid attention to. But generally, I find that's an inverse proportion.

Or in meditation—this isn't so much for people who don't meditate—we get totally seduced by the idea, the thought, that thoughts shouldn't be happening. That thought is bad, thought is a distraction, thought is a sign that your practice is no good, that you're getting nowhere. I'd be a millionaire if I had a dollar for every time someone came in and said, "I'm thinking more, there are more thoughts. My practice was going well, and now I have more thoughts." As if that's the end of the world.

So it's a paradox, a dilemma, right? This is from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche. I love the way he puts things—two paragraphs describing both sides of the paradox:

"What we normally call the mind is the deluded mind, a turbulent vortex of thoughts whipped up by attachment, anger, and ignorance. This mind, unlike enlightened awareness, is always being carried away by one delusion after another. Thoughts of hatred or attachment suddenly arise without warning"—did you ever notice that?—"triggered off by such circumstances as an unexpected meeting with an enemy or a friend." Triggered off by any circumstance, right? "And unless they are immediately noticed, met with mindfulness, they quickly take root and proliferate.

"Yet, however strong these thoughts may seem, they are just thoughts and will eventually dissolve back into emptiness." Have you noticed that too? "Once you recognize the intrinsic nature of the mind, these thoughts that seem to appear and disappear all the time can no longer fool you. Just as clouds form, last for a while, and then dissolve back into the empty sky, so deluded thoughts arise, remain for a while, and then vanish in the voidness of mind. In reality, nothing at all has happened."

That's what I love. We can really see that nothing at all has happened. What a relief. End of the story.

Well, I'm going to continue, but that's really all we need to know. Seriously.

So let me talk about some different ways we get so caught up in these thoughts. By now, some of you have been here on silent retreat for a long time. Some of you have just come in the last day or two, but you've all done plenty of meditation before. So I'm sure you must all have the experience of thought that just comes and goes with no punch at all—like "the floor is brown." You can really get that sense.

You may not see it beginning and end, but you really get the sense it comes from nowhere, dissolves back into nothing, and really nothing at all has happened.

So what's the difference between that and the occasional other thought that somehow seems to have Velcro and a lot of other stuff going along with it?

I want to talk a little bit about perception and papañca, which is the process where we get so caught up. And then hopefully a little bit about how not all thoughts are unwholesome, either.

Really starting where thoughts begin, you could say, the way the Buddha spoke about it, is from the point of perception. And you all know what perception is, correct? That's the way the Buddha talked about it. It's a very specific mental factor that arises in each moment of sense contact. Seeing, smelling, hearing, tasting, physical sensation, mental activity, thought or emotion—the six sense experiences.

Whenever there's contact—sound, an ear that works, consciousness—when those three come together, that's contact, a moment of contact. And in that moment, according to the Buddha, there's naturally perception, which is simply the recognition factor, the discernment of what is arising in that moment. It could just be hearing. That's already perception, knowing that's hearing. Or it might just be a bird song. You don't even have to say the word, but there's just that recognition, that knowing. That's what's considered perception.

Obviously, perception is based on memory, on our past experience, on what we know. It could also be a perception of hearing something and not knowing what it is. That's also a perception.

This is arising in every moment. The Buddha says what one perceives, one thinks about. So often perception is what places us in a context. Even though we don't have conscious thoughts, a perception generally comes together with the thoughts or almost-formed thoughts, the associations of context and place and meaning.

For example, when you looked at your watch or clock tonight, you saw the minute hand at 25 past 7. That's a whole lot of perceptions already—watch, minute hand, 25 past 7. That's a huge amount of perceptions, and we put it together. It means something. Not only that, you know it means you're here at this forest refuge. It's Monday night. It's time to go to the dharma talk. Again, that's a huge amount of thoughts, a huge amount of perception. All of it useful, extremely useful. We're not saying perception is a bad thing here, and the thoughts are also useful. They give us a context. Not a problem.

Now, often perception—well, almost always perception—that moment of perception, hearing birdsong, for example, in that moment of consciousness, the consciousness is the knowing and the perception is the recognition. In that moment of consciousness, it comes together with whatever mental factors, whatever mental states happen to be present at that moment. And those mental factors can, once in a while, disguise, distort, or actually make the perception inaccurate.

For example, it's like delusion, which puts a cloud over things. A classic example is walking in the forest and you see a snake and have all the reactions as if it were a snake. But when you get closer, you see it's just a rope. So the delusion, the not recognizing accurately, leads to a whole set of thoughts, emotions, and assumptions based on inaccurate perception. That's ignorance clouding the perception.

But equally, desire or anger or fear can color the perception, leading to inaccuracy. And from this, there can be a jumping off place. If we don't recognize that, if there's no mindful awareness with wisdom, then the thoughts, the reactions, the associations are all based on that inaccurate perception.

I remember once I was in the hospital. It was early morning—they come and get you out of bed at 5 a.m. to weigh you, and God knows why. I was out of it; someone had given me some painkillers or something.

But someone told me later there's something called ICU psychosis, where your perceptions become a little wacky, your mind goes a little crazy. Mine certainly was.

So this poor nurse—a nice lady, as I realized the next day—she came in, and I literally saw her as demonic. That's what I actually perceived. And I say "poor lady" because that seeing led to assumptions, which led to how I responded to her. Plus, I didn't want to get out of bed at 5 a.m. to be weighed.

And just like that—the next time I saw her, I could see through it. But a lot of the time we don't know that's happening. We don't even recognize perception as perception; it's just occurring every moment. Never mind whether it's accurate or not, or questioning it, or even having an openness to it.

What tends to happen is there's the perception, we assume it's accurate, and all the assumptions go along with it. We don't even know. And then the freshness of attention snaps shut. We know what it is, we know, and we just stop really meeting the experience freshly, moment to moment.

That's what happens with the breath, right? "Enough already with the breath." Or there's a pain that's been there—"I've had this pain ever since I began practice twenty years ago. I know this pain. I don't need to look at it. I know what it is."

Or have you ever had this experience? Those of you who've been here a while may find that without at all meaning to, as soon as someone walks into your field of vision—contact, seeing, perception—there's an immediate sense of all the baggage of assumptions and associations that your mind has created with that person. Do you have any sense of what I'm talking about here?

I've noticed for myself on retreat, I love it when I see how wrong the perception is. For example, over at the retreat center, in the bigger dining room, I'm sitting at the table, not looking up, not looking around. Someone comes and sits at the table. You don't look. I don't turn and look. But I know who it is, right? I know. I can just feel it. I know. I've got everybody scoped out.

So they're sitting there, and I can watch my mind go through all the reactions, all the associations this mind has created in regards to that person. Pleasant, unpleasant—they're eating sloppily. I knew they were. That's how they are.

And then I see that person who I thought was sitting beside me walk past way in the distance. It's like, oh. It's such a moment of startling, of the mind just letting go. I really had no clue. Let's start fresh.

It's really interesting. I read this article, and I really like this story. It's about perception—how we assume we know what's what, and we don't even meet the world freshly. This is what mindfulness is countering. This is the whole point of mindfulness.

The story is about an experiment in Washington, D.C., that the Washington Post newspaper arranged with one of the world-famous concert violinists, Joshua Bell. He's extremely well-known. They did an experiment where they had him, during the morning rush hour on a Monday morning, get dressed in just a baseball cap and jeans, take his—as they say—$3.5 million Stradivarius violin, and position himself at a really crowded subway stop.

It was at a place where the people coming out of the subway had to go up a long escalator, and he was positioned at the top playing his violin. So they had to hear him coming up the escalator. He just looked like anyone, his case open for money.

He had this incredible violin, and he was playing incredibly difficult, beautiful music. He wasn't playing something anyone could play. One of the pieces he played was Bach's Chaconne, which they say is very, very difficult—one of the most difficult—and fourteen minutes long. He's just playing it incredibly.

Anyone who knows music would recognize it. But they were saying the experiment was really to see if people would just recognize beauty without it being set up.

And they, of course, videoed it all. So it was fascinating because hardly anyone stopped to pay attention. It was six minutes before the first person stopped to even listen.

They could question everybody afterward, because they had it all on videotape. This one man who stopped was coming up the escalator, and he said he was on his way to work. He wasn't particularly a musician, but coming up the escalator, he was just struck by it. He said, "I just felt really peaceful. I felt really happy." So he looked at his watch and saw he had three extra minutes. He went and waited against the wall and listened for his three requisite minutes, gave the guy some money—the first time he'd ever given a street musician money—and went on.

And that was like the maximum that anyone really stayed. Mostly no one stopped at all. A few people would look for a little while, give some money, and hurry on. They said there was no ethnic or demographic pattern to distinguish the people who stayed for a minute or who gave money. But there was one absolutely consistent thing: every single time a child walked past, he or she tried to stop and watch. And every single time, the parent was in a hurry and scooted the child away. Really interesting.

Also interesting was what Joshua Bell said afterward. It was a strange experience for him. He said, "You know, it's a very strange feeling that people were actually ignoring me." And he was laughing at himself. He said, "At a music hall, I'll get upset if someone coughs or if someone's cell phone goes off. But here my expectations quickly diminished. I started to appreciate any acknowledgment, even a slight glance up. I was oddly grateful when someone threw in a dollar instead of change." So he got thirty-two dollars for his forty-five minutes, and 1,070 people hurried by.

Then they had a quotation from Billy Collins, the poet, who once laughingly observed that all babies are born with a knowledge of poetry because the lub-dub of the mother's heart is in iambic meter. Then Collins said, "Life slowly starts to choke the poetry out of us." Maybe it's true with music, too.

So I don't know about that, but you get the sense: street musician, know-it-all, I'm in a hurry. We don't meet life freshly. We don't meet our experience freshly. And perception can play a part in this. That's one place where we get caught up and lost—we think we know. We don't even know that we think we know. We don't even know all the associations that are arising, and the mind snaps shut.

I notice this with political figures a lot. Certain political figures will come on the radio or the TV, and I know more than I want to know about them. I'm not even open to hearing one word. I just have to hear the tone of voice—it's over, it's off. And I remember, way back now with Nixon, something came on where they were saying something good about him, and I saw my mind so clearly: "I don't want to know anything good about this man. Let's not be open here. This is how it is, and I don't want anything to mess up my assumptions."

Dilgo Khyentse again: "When sense organs encounter an object—like the ear encountering sound—the only part the object itself plays is to initiate the process of perception in your consciousness. From then on, as your mind reacts to the object, influenced by all your accumulated habits and past experiences, the whole process is entirely subjective. When your mind is full of anger, the world seems to be a hell realm. When your mind is peaceful, free from any clinging or fixation, you experience everything as primordially pure."

Then Ajahn Chah says it, of course, in his very direct, earthy way. He was holding up a vase. He says, "Look at this vase. You think it's nice, or you think it's ugly."

The vase itself is completely indifferent. It's we who are making ourselves insane. Can you relate? That's how it works.

So starting with perception—when it's fueled by unwholesome states of heart and mind, that's when we get what the Buddha calls papañca. And this is how he describes it: What one perceives, one thinks about. What one thinks about, one complicates—complicates with associations, notions, memories, ideas. This is the manufacture, the creation of papañca. And these notions then assail and overwhelm a person. In the commentaries it says it's "the tendency of the imagination to break loose and run riot." I think these old guys were very dour, but it's like that, isn't it?

When they talk about papañca, we can actually explore it. We don't have to be afraid of it. We can really use our mindfulness, our cultivation of moment-to-moment awareness, and turn it onto the process of perception, of thought, of this phenomenon of thoughts feeding on themselves, taking off, running riot. We can actually observe the whole process. And in the observing, as we well know, we've stepped out of believing it. We see, "Oh, it's just cause and effect." And again, no matter how intense or how out there the thoughts, the papañca, the craziness gets—when we're watching, at some point, no matter what it is, it dissolves back again into the nothing it came from.

You know those moments when you've been just completely crazed for the last hour, and then it's just gone? Nothing happened. What was that all about? Nothing. It's really gone. Let it be gone.

In the classic texts, in the commentary, they talk about three states of mind, three mental factors that most readily fuel this papañca, this habit of the mind to go so far so fast. We don't notice them, and we get lost in the content. So I just want to enunciate them a little. You know them all, but I want to talk about them in this context.

The classic ones are craving; diṭṭhi, or view, and particularly self-view, sakkāya-diṭṭhi; and the third is māna, or conceit, which is most observed in the process of comparing. Bhikkhu Ñāṇamoli, who was a German man, a monk for many years, a Pali scholar and teacher, added a fourth which I find really helpful: fear. Fear really fuels some major papañca when we don't recognize it.

Remember, it's not that this stuff is a problem when we see it. It's just the next arising mental object of awareness. We don't have to fix it. When we see what's happening, we don't have to get so caught in believing it. When we don't see what's happening, we're seduced. We're gone.

Craving and fear I'll put together. Obviously we understand—we know what craving is, right? You've had the experience once in a while. Fear is recognizable too. Just begin to notice, or continue to notice, how when craving, when wanting is in the mind, it colors the perception. You know the phrase that Tibetans use, that craving "puts feathers on the object." It makes the object more attractive, more desirable, whatever it is.

I remember—this is weird—but one time I was on retreat and I kept having this thought, a mental image, this picture that would come up of a street corner in Bangkok. Not at all a nice street corner. A corner of very busy streets with all these little sidewalk shops that sold plumbing fixtures and parts. But it would come up together with craving. God knows why. There was craving in the mind, and I'd go, "Oh, Bangkok! Oh, Banglamphu!" And even then I'd think, "What?" But it kept happening like that. And in the moments when I didn't notice it, I'd go off into a whole fantasy about Bangkok. "I want to go to Banglamphu!" There's nothing charming about Banglamphu—it's just crowds and fighting the crowds. It was so humorous. I could see how the process happened. It doesn't have to make sense.

It's more a problem when it does make sense.

So the whole phenomenon of getting a crush on somebody, on or off retreat—it doesn't just happen on retreat, unfortunately—but when the mind has got craving associated with a person, aren't they beautiful? Aren't they handsome? They walk so sweetly, the way they dress is so lovely, how they eat—everything. And then when the crush is gone, the person hasn't changed that much. You look at them and go, "What was that all about? Thank God we were in silence and I didn't go anywhere with it." The person didn't change. Maybe they changed their socks, but not a whole lot else changed. It's just what's going on in the mind. So craving distorts the perception.

Papañca is then the series of thoughts that, with craving, often move into what I call papañca of action. We act on it. Sitting here on retreat, one of the reasons we restrict what's going on is so there's less you can act on. But how often, if something comes up in the mind, you really think, "That would be nice. I need some long underwear. The fall is coming." Next thing you know, you're on the computer—but no, you can't do this, you can't go on the computer. But next thing you know, you're on the computer surfing, and all of a sudden all these things are being delivered by FedEx: long underwear and gloves and boots. And when it comes, by that time you're like, "Huh? Got a little carried away by craving, by acting." That's papañca of craving.

Or you're just doing your walking meditation, and the thought of tea comes up, colored with craving. Next thing you know, you've finished the tea. You don't even know how you got from the walking meditation to the dining room. You don't remember making tea. You didn't even like it. It's gone. But craving—that's papañca of craving. Pretty obvious when we're looking at it this way. But look back at how much it runs our life. It's actually shocking how much papañca—the thoughts driven by perceptions based on craving leading to action—runs our life.

And we know how much suffering craving brings, how difficult it can be to just be present and mindful with wanting, wanting, wanting, and not go into the thoughts. The thoughts can come, let them come. We don't hate the thoughts, but we don't have to be seduced by them. It's just papañca fueled by craving. And just because the craving is really strong doesn't make the thoughts more true. So just noticing that is really interesting.

There's a little story I like from Andrea Levine, Stephen Levine's wife, about this—how unreliable the mind is in this way, yet how persuasive it is. She says, you know, you're sitting there eating a piece of chocolate cake and there's more, and the mind says, "Oh, have another piece of cake. It's so good. You'll be so happy. It's just what you need to top off the day. Just have another piece of chocolate cake." On and on, papañca, until finally we just eat the cake to shut up the mind. And then you eat it, and the mind goes, "I wouldn't have done that if I were you."

So that's papañca driven by craving. Not very reliable, but certainly we can recognize it.

The second one is papañca that's driven by diṭṭhi. Diṭṭhi is the word for "view" in Pali. Mostly we're talking about sakkāya-diṭṭhi, identity view. But I just want to mention how any series of thoughts can coagulate, can solidify into a view—a perception that "this is like this." We believe the perception. And then the series of thoughts follows from that. When I say it hardens into a view, it's that place where our clear seeing, our beginner's mind, has snapped shut. We're not seeing freshly.

We're seeing through the view. And the way the Buddha describes view is the mind that says—although it never says it so clearly—"this alone is true, everything else is false."

So for example, when I was thinking about Nixon, the view was really: this is a horrible man and there can't possibly be anything good about him. And the mind doesn't want to see. That's the view.

Well, we do that a lot. Really a lot.

Just to give examples based on meditation—that's one of the big areas of suffering I see with people on meditation retreats, and even with some people here I've seen it happen—where the mind constructs a view of what proper or good meditation is. You may not even know you're doing it.

But it's really a privilege being on the meeting-with-you-all side of things, because I can see how people can come in with totally opposite views, both completely convinced that this is right and that's not what's happening, and so my meditation's a mess.

It can be: there should just be breath and no thoughts. It can be: there should be really deep access to emotions. It can be: if there are deep emotions, it means I'm not concentrated enough, it's not going right. It can be: I should be mindful every single moment. It can be: whatever happens is fine, I'm relaxed as long as there's no tension. Whatever.

A view is not a problem when we recognize it. It's just another thought. "Oh, it should be like this—that's right meditation." That's just another thought. Unrecognized, as I said, it snaps our awareness shut. There's not an openness. There's not a willingness to just be with the unknown. And it actually creates a selective perception in the mind, like that thing with Nixon: I'll only let in the perceptions that fit the view. Well, of course, we're not doing that consciously so much.

So this is a real example I use often. I was teaching a retreat many years ago in California with another teacher, James, and even then I had to sit in a chair. There were about fifty people at this retreat, and quite a few were pretty new. About the fifth or sixth day in, I was having an interview with a woman for whom this was her first long retreat. She was in agony with sitting on the floor, sitting cross-legged. I mean, we all have pain, but sometimes it's such agony that one is just totally fighting it. And it's basically stupid—it's a waste of time.

When she saw me, she said that the last five days, all she'd been doing was getting lost in aversion and pain and a sense of total failure sitting on the floor. And of course, in the beginning, we said—as we always say—floor, bench, chair, it doesn't matter.

So she said, fifth day, she's sitting there thinking, "I can't do this. The whole meditation's about sitting like this, and I can't do it. I'm useless." And she looked up and said, "Oh, Carol's sitting on a chair." Five days! And we were at every sitting when we were doing that retreat—it's not like I just came in in the evening. It's amazing, the power of selective perception to fit a view.

And the view is often a suffering view, a view of oneself: I can't, it should be like this, and I can't do it.

So that leads into sakkāya-diṭṭhi—identity or personality view. She was doing that, for example. She was just having the view that proper meditation, the only way to meditate, is to sit cross-legged. That's just a view. The sakkāya-diṭṭhi, the personality view, was: I can't do it, I'm a failure.

That could just be a thought. "I can't do it. I'm a failure." It's a thought just like "the floor is brown," "the sky is blue," "today is Monday."

It doesn't have to pack any punch. We don't have to be seduced by it. It's not like we have to get rid of that thought—we just see it. "Oh yes, rising from conditions and going away."

But when we really believe it, holding to it, and the papañca continues on and on from it, that's when it's really sakkāya-diṭṭhi, this personality view, this holding on to some aspect of nāma-rūpa, of one of the six sense contacts—a thought, an emotion, a sight, a sound, a feeling in the body—thinking of it as me or mine and kind of carrying it around with us. Like one of my teachers used to say, it's like carrying a dead corpse around with you all the time.

You know this famous Zen story, very famous, of two monks—an older monk and a young one. They're walking and they come to a river that they have to cross, and there's a beautiful young woman who can't get across. So the old monk picks her up, carries her across, puts her down, and they walk on. Nothing's said. After quite a while, a couple of hours, the young monk finally bursts out, "I can't stand it anymore! How could you do that? You know it's against your precepts to touch that beautiful young woman, and you completely disregarded that!" He was really upset. And the old monk said, "I put her down at the river. You've still been carrying her these last two hours."

That's sakkāya-diṭṭhi, right?

So we take any thought, any mood, anything that comes—and we carry it with us through the day. Actually, there's no way you can really carry it all the time, but we think we're carrying it with us. We say, "Is this always here? This feeling of worthlessness, this sense of not being good enough, this angry personality I have"—you know, whatever. Or occasionally, "this incredible, wonderful being that I am." Very rarely, but once in a while, that's the one people carry. "Even when I'm not noticing it, I know it's there under the surface." Are you familiar with that feeling? "Even when I'm just sitting, being with seeing and hearing, seeing the beauty of the leaves, there's a feeling of happiness. It's just that in that moment I'm not noticing the sense of total worthlessness and aversion, but it's there because that's who I am. That's me."

That's sakkāya-diṭṭhi. And I don't think I have to elaborate too much on how much papañca can arise from that.

This is something I love to see, actually. I really love playing with it on retreat—though you can do it off retreat too, of course—to notice how quickly almost any sense contact can move into sakkāya-diṭṭhi, into "it's all about me." It doesn't have to when the mind is clear, but how quickly, with diṭṭhi, with view and craving, papañca just ripples out.

So, for example, walking outside today, I was just walking. The leaves are beautiful, right? I love this feeling of fall. So I'm already there: "I love this feeling of fall." And immediately—it's like there's the leaf, how much I love it, it's so beautiful, the smell in the air, the memory of so many past falls, a feeling of kind of sadness that comes in the fall. "Oh, me—I'm experiencing that feeling of sadness. It reminds me of all these other falls, another year gone, blah, blah, blah, blah." It could be pleasant or not. It doesn't matter. But I've gone in one second from just smelling—just smelling—to the whole story of Carol's life, you know, poignant and sad and this and that.

That's a pretty neutral example. It wasn't really upsetting. But it could be. It could involve really strong craving, really strong upset. We could get caught in it for a really long time if it's a little more juicy.

How often is it that someone will tell me about an unpleasant sound and get lost in "What does that mean? Why are they doing that? How can they be like that?" And it reminds them of something from their past—"My father used to do this." I remember one retreat where some guy was being driven insane. Okay, I'm exaggerating a little, right? He wasn't really being driven insane.

by someone's loud breathing near him in the three-month retreat. As a friend of mine, we'd talk and talk. It took him weeks to realize—I mean, he was just spinning out with thinking about that person and his life. It took him weeks to realize that the breathing sound had triggered a memory of his father, of some way his father sounded when he was angry with him. And it was just completely spinning him out of control. Papañca.

Often we don't see what associations are coming with the perception, and the papañca just takes off.

So that's the sakkāya-diṭṭhi. And it's mostly—it's Joseph's line. Joseph loves to say, "We're just making it all up." There's just sense contact. It's pleasant or unpleasant. There's a perception. And then the imagination just breaks loose and runs riot. We're just making it up.

As Nisargadatta says, "The world appears to you so overwhelmingly real because you think about it all the time. Cease thinking about it and it will dissolve into thin mist."

And we can notice that over and over. You might also notice you don't really want it to dissolve into thin mist. And that's another thing that keeps us spinning in the sakkāya-diṭṭhi and the papañca of it.

The third aspect, the third thing that fuels papañca, is māna—conceit, conceit of self, as it's described. But the best way to explore it is through this habit of the mind of comparing. Have you noticed your mind doing that at all in these days here? And how much thought that leads to, and what a charge that often has?

So much comparing is with others. First, that sense of how you can't bear to have someone walk by without looking to see who it is. It's a well-known phenomenon, totally bizarre, but it's very well-known. And then as soon as we've looked, immediately the mind goes into comparing. They're this, they're that, they're better, they're worse, we're the same—whatever. How people are sitting, how people are eating, how people are moving. And it's all dukkha, it's all suffering. But it leads to a huge amount of papañca and thinking.

"They're walking so slow. How come? I wonder what kind of practice they're doing. I remember when I was doing practice and I was walking so slow. And now I'm not. I wonder which is better. I wonder if I should be slowing down and noting. I remember when I did that. But no, I really get into striving. Maybe I'll just be free and easy. I'll just walk outside and be free and easy."

And all of this is going on in one step. Gone. Comparing.

We could just be with seeing. Just seeing. Perception. Pleasant, unpleasant. That's all. It doesn't have to go into all those worlds of creation.

We compare with our own past experience, and this is a huge source of comparing. Just notice that. Previously, other retreats, last sitting, yesterday—"it was like this." Just notice that comparing. Notice the way, when we're not aware of it, it leads into a whole series, a whole train of thoughts, construction of self, suffering.

We get really seduced by it. That's mana—that's conceit. It's going to keep coming. Of all the ten fetters in the Theravada view, where different fetters drop away at different levels of awakening, mana is the last one to go. So don't get upset at yourself when you see it happening. But notice it, and then it doesn't have to go into all the papañca.

We compare with each other, with our past experience, with a view—very much a view and idea of what practice should be, or how I should be. "I should always be a compassionate person, and I'm not"—whatever it might be. We compare with that, and the whole sense of not being good enough can get really strong. Or "I'm great"—either one. Again, you're back to sakkāya-diṭṭhi.

Working with mana, with comparing, I find it to be a great dining room practice in a retreat setting like this. It's a good practice in the hall too, but hopefully most people are sitting with their eyes closed and not checking everybody out. In the dining room, though, you have to have your eyes open. You have to go through the food line, hopefully knowing what you're doing, noticing other people. So just be aware when this comparing kicks in. Notice how soon you notice it. Are you way down the road? Has the papañca been running for five minutes? Great—notice it then. "Oh, that's comparing." Let it dissolve into thin mist. Maybe you notice it right away.

Some people have told me, and I have the same experience: I can be walking by myself, no one around, completely calm, serene, present. Then just one person comes into sight—not even close, but way in the distance—and immediately there's a tightness, a comparing, a sense of clenching. Just noticing.

Noticing in the dining room with comparing—make a game of it. Not that we're afraid of it, but just noticing how there can be comparing and it doesn't have to go to papañca. There can be comparing and it does go to papañca. Notice how that works, what the effect is, where the suffering is, where the freedom is. It's not that we have to be afraid of these things, but to cultivate the interest, the willingness to simply explore thought as an object arising together with different mental factors, the perception—and to really see the difference when it's just dissolving into thin mist versus when it's coming with a punch and we're getting caught. Not to judge ourselves, but to get interested, to see how it works. Really quite fascinating.

This is from one of my teachers, talking about thinking: "It does not matter whether thinking stops or not. It's more important that you understand whether your thoughts are skillful or unskillful, appropriate or inappropriate, necessary or unnecessary. Mostly they're unnecessary. This is why it's essential to learn to watch thinking without getting involved. When a thought keeps growing, no matter how much effort you put into trying to simply observe it, you're probably somehow involved in the thought. When this happens, when thinking becomes so powerful, so incessant that you can no longer observe it, that's when you stop looking at the thoughts and watch the underlying feelings or the bodily sensations instead."

From my experience—I don't know if I could say always, but it's close to always—whenever thoughts come with a punch and they're really pulling, and it's more than just one thought, when you're really getting caught, there's an underlying feeling, an underlying mental factor. So we don't hate the thought; we just see the thought. But we enlarge the awareness to notice, to be with that underlying energy—the papañca energies I was talking about: fear, wanting. Just being with it and seeing how that fuels thought. When we're watching all of that, thought is no problem. It's just another arising experience, just like sound, just like sensation—literally. And when we no longer need to get rid of it or fight with it or hate it or take it personally, it really starts to lose its power.

This is from Ramana Maharshi. He's talking about watching the mind with full attention: "Whenever the mind wanders, just notice it. Notice how thoughts connect with each other and watch how this ghost called mind catches hold of all your thoughts and says, 'This is my thought.' Watch the ways of the mind without identifying with them in any way. When you give your mind your full, detached attention, you begin to understand, to see the futility of all these mental activities. Watch the mind wandering here and there, seeking out useless or unnecessary things or ideas which will ultimately only create misery for itself."

Watching the mind gives us a knowledge of its inner processes. It allows for the wisdom to arise that we become more and more detached from our thoughts. Ultimately, if we notice steadily and long enough, it allows for the wisdom to arise to remain as consciousness, unaffected by transient thoughts.

So it's not that we're trying to get rid of thoughts—simply to understand, simply to see the cause and effect. And the more we see it, you can't help but notice. Wisdom arises in the awareness. You can't help but notice the energy, the unnecessary complications, the unnecessary suffering. And it really does happen by itself.

I'll give you an example from my own life of long ago, when I was so grateful for this wisdom of mindfulness. Almost twenty years ago, I was coming down with some chronic disease that no one knew what it was. It had a lot of effect on my movements. It was quite painful in my joints. At the time, before anyone knew what it was—I just wrote this to someone the other day—I remember so clearly, one day I was leaning down to wash the bathtub or something, and it was really difficult to bend down, it hurt to move, and my mind started off like, "Poor me." And then that jumping into the future from fear, the papañca of fear: "What's this going to be like? If I can't move, I won't be able to take walks. I'll never be in a relationship. I can't even clean the bathtub. How am I going to function?"

And I just saw the mind starting off like that. Without aversion or anything, I saw that happening. And the wisdom just said, "That's completely unknown. There's no point in going there. It's completely useless." And that wasn't said with aversion. That was just totally wisdom-like—boom. And it didn't go there. And from then on, really, it never went there. The mind would start off one or two thoughts, awareness would immediately notice it, and just the energy of it would completely drop out. That wasn't striving. That wasn't willpower. That's wisdom. And it comes from simply just watching what thoughts do and seeing that total emptiness of them.

The most horrific thought in the world dissolves just like the most beautiful one. And the emotions underneath them—we just need to see that. Emotions are emotions, but they're not thoughts. We don't have to get so caught in believing them.

The Buddha said that the end of papañca is the end of conflict. We can notice that just in a moment, like that example I just gave. "Oh, what am I going to do?" Papañca's gone, the conflict is gone. What's happening now is just what's happening now—in very simple ways.

Someone gave me an example today of noticing how mind is in a really calm quantum of space, and say, for example, a pain would come up in her foot, and it would just be that sensation. The mind just doesn't create anything around it. No papañca, no reaction, no creation of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, identity view. It's nothing. It's just a sensation coming and going. In that moment, that's the end of conflict.

I want to end with this from Dilgo Khyentse again, because I like when he's on the really challenging "this is how it is" aspect. But it's possible for us to notice that:

All phenomena of samsara and nirvana arise like a rainbow. And like a rainbow, they are empty of tangible existence. Once you recognize the true nature of reality, which is empty and at the same time appears as the phenomenal world, your mind ceases to be under the power of delusion. If you know how to leave your thoughts free to dissolve by themselves as they arise, they will cross your mind as a bird crosses the sky—without leaving any trace.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 27

Seclusion (Viveka)

Carol Wilson · 58 min

> In this talk from the Forest Refuge, Carol Wilson offers a comprehensive exploration of viveka (seclusion) and its role in awakening. She begins by noting that in the Saṃyutta Nikāya, seclusion is listed alongside emancipation and release as designations for nibbāna itself. Wilson examines three progressive aspects of seclusion: kāya-viveka (physical seclusion from people and sensory bombardment), citta-viveka (mental seclusion from the hindrances), and the ultimate seclusion from suffering through recognizing suññatā (emptiness).
>
> Drawing on teachings from Ajahn Chah about being 'sunk in the flood of sensuality,' Wilson explains how retreat conditions support our ability to notice the natural peace that's always available but usually obscured by relentless sense contact. She introduces Ajahn Buddhadāsa's concept of satī-paññā (mindfulness-wisdom) at the sense doors—not as rejection of experience, but as simple presence that doesn't proliferate into reactivity. The talk includes the Buddha's own admission that before his awakening, his heart did not leap up at renunciation until he understood both the drawbacks of sensual pleasure and the rewards of seclusion.
> Wilson offers practical guidance on working with what arises in silence—including the 'shrieking and groaning' of suppressed material—while cautioning against attachment to peaceful states. Quoting the Buddha's resolve never to settle merely for wholesome and pleasant states of mind, she emphasizes that true seclusion points toward the mind's natural emptiness of clinging, accessible in countless moments each day. The talk concludes with Thomas Merton's insight that authentic solitude leads not to separation but to 'a deep, pure, and gentle sympathy with all other humans.'

What I want to talk about tonight is seclusion, or viveka. There's a line in the Sutta Nikaya where someone says, "Do you know, dear sir, emancipation, release, seclusion for beings?" And Bhikkhu Bodhi, in his footnote, says that these are three different designations for nirvana: emancipation, release, seclusion for beings—viveka.

I'm going to talk about different aspects of seclusion, starting with the most obvious one: the sense of being secluded from people, being on retreat. In all the different aspects of seclusion—and they're not hierarchical—how is it supportive for us in recognizing the natural peace, in recognizing and coming back again and again to the heart and mind of non-clinging? Why and how is seclusion supportive and helpful? And is it necessary? Do you have to be secluded?

The first aspect is going on retreat, this kind of separation from the hubbub, from other people, to the point of living completely secluded. In our culture, and probably even back with the Buddha, it was always somewhat questioned. It wasn't always accepted by everyone. Even in myself, sometimes the feeling arises: why should I need to separate from life and go on retreat? Is awakening, is mindfulness, is being able to recognize how the mind works—do I have to be separated from so-called life? As if this isn't life and that is life. But do I have to be separated? And how does the separation help? Obviously, we think it helps. Hopefully, that's why you're here.

I've read a couple of books about the early Christian desert fathers. If you want to talk about physical seclusion, they really had it down. The most famous one I've read about is St. Anthony of Egypt. His life inspired thousands of people to leave their homes and follow him. When he actually renounced and went off into the most secluded part of the desert in Egypt, it was about 285 A.D., two or three hundred years after Jesus. He was a Christian from a wealthy family. His parents died, and he had a lot of money. But he heard the Christian teaching to give all you have to the poor and follow Jesus. And as one writer said, he actually believed it and did it, gave away everything he had and went to the desert to be alone.

He kept going to more and more remote places until finally he ended up in a deserted fort on the east bank of the Nile, fifty miles south of Memphis. He lived alone without seeing a human face for over twenty years, being brought supplies of bread and water every six months. Sometimes the friends who brought these supplies would hear terrifying shrieks and groans from behind the locked doors. Eventually, they couldn't stand this any longer—it took them twenty years—and they broke down the doors, expecting to release a wasted and emaciated maniac. But Anthony emerged healthy, sane, and balanced. He went to Alexandria to support Christians who were being persecuted there, and then he spent the rest of his life alternating between helping people, giving advice, being present for people, and going back into retreat.

I find the whole thing really interesting. Who knows what went on for him in those twenty years. But I think in a little way, we can imagine just a little bit of what we're here for.

So that's the first kind of seclusion—the most obvious, the grossest—actual seclusion from other human beings. And of course, the point of it isn't because we hate other human beings. Hopefully not. Or if that's the point in the beginning, hopefully that doesn't stay the point.

Thomas Merton, the Trappist monk who spent a lot of his life wanting to be a hermit, wrote about this extensively. He said: "The search for solitude is a journey to discover the inner self. The monks fled to the desert to become ordinary. If they had gone there to become extraordinary, this would have meant taking the world with them as a standard of comparison. They lived among the rocks just because they wanted to be themselves." Just to become ordinary. I love that. Sometimes I feel like my biggest aspiration in practice is just to become totally ordinary. Nothing special.

So this is seclusion of body, out of this wanting to discover ourselves—how does the mind work? How does the heart work? That's just the very beginning. It's a lot, just being quiet, being away from people, being away from engagement. But certainly in our practice, that's just the very beginning. The seclusion from other people, the seclusion from the busyness of our lives, is really simply a support to help us be a little more secluded from what Ajahn Chah calls the flood of sense experience.

It's not even just about other people, but about all of it. This is when we talk about renunciation. We come to a place like this, a retreat, where we are with other people but we're not speaking, and we're secluded from so much of the sensory input that we experience in our daily life—the five physical senses and also the mental input. There's so much of it.

This is from Ajahn Chah. He calls it kamogha, a flood of sensuality. He says we're sunk in sights, in sounds, in smells, in tastes, in bodily sensations—sunk in them. We're sunk because we look at the externals. We look at these experiences. We don't look internally. It's like being a slave. Somebody else has control over you. When they tell you to sit, you have to sit. To walk, you have to walk. He doesn't mean the people setting up the schedule of the retreat. He means being sunk in wanting sense experience. Being enslaved by the senses is like this.

When we come on retreat, when we have this seclusion of body—this first aspect, kaya viveka, seclusion from people—we're more secluded, of course not completely, from the flood of sensuality. Not because sense experience is somehow bad or wrong, but just because there's so much of it, we're so overwhelmed. There's mostly no space to notice the silence of heart, of mind. There's no space to just notice that we're nothing but space. There's no space to recognize the quiet of a mind that's not enthralled to reaction, to sense experience. So we need to give it a little external, almost artificial space, just to be able to see, to recognize another possibility of how to be.

We're bombarded by seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, information, news, conversation. This was true even when the Buddha was teaching. Now, it's unbelievable. Walk through an airport and notice how many people have cell phones. One in two or one in three are walking through talking on them. "Oh, hi, now I'm walking through the airport." "The plane has landed." "Now I'm at my luggage." "Just called to say hi." God knows we can't be quiet for a minute. We have to know that we exist.

So when we come on retreat, when we seclude ourselves physically from so much, we're just left with the flood of our mind, the mental input. But over the days—in the beginning of any retreat, I don't care if you've sat for thirty-five years or it's your first retreat—it's a rare person whose mind doesn't either fall asleep or get really restless or go all over the place, because it's like an addict coming off cold turkey. Not completely cold turkey, because it can keep creating thoughts and reactions to the thoughts and endless stories and memories, until you just want to throw up from it. And then finally, the flood begins to slow down a little bit.

That's what's so great. It slows down by itself. We might think we're doing something—feel the breath in and out, feel the sensations, walk up and down. But that's not slowing the flood. That is the flood. That's the blah, blah, blah chatter. Finally, we get sick of that. We shut up.

I think if we just came here, sat and walked, shut up, didn't write notes, didn't read, and just stayed here for a while, things would get really quiet in the mind. You don't actually have to do so much. Just stop doing.

So the relentless chatter starts to slow down a little bit in this kaya viveka. We begin maybe to notice there's a little space here. When you say it's in the mind, in the heart, it's not really anywhere. We just start to notice, when the mind isn't obsessively relating to and sinking itself into sense experience. That's what Ajahn Chah means by saying we're always looking out. The attention notices hearing. It sinks into that. What does it mean? It notices a taste. It's really in that taste, exploring it, really in that thought, in the aversion. Everything's external, whether it's mental or physical.

When that obsessive relational activity slows down a little, as Nisargadatta says, in the silence, just be quiet, free from the obsession with what next. And in the silence, something may be heard that's ordinarily too fine and subtle for perception. We start to notice the possibility of peace, calmness, the mind that's non-reactive, the heart that's not on fire. Or just no special words at all. Just a moment when the mind isn't shouting and nothing much is going on. You don't even think of it as peace. You don't think of it as anything. But these little moments start to be more noticeable.

It's not that they don't happen in life, but they're fast. And we're really good at filling them up. But it starts to happen. This is the first and most obvious supporting reason for kaya viveka, seclusion of body—just separating from so much sensory input.

You've probably noticed, you've all done lots of retreats, how often meditation centers and monasteries tend to be in beautiful, natural places when there's that possibility. And you must have noticed how in some way nature, the beauty of nature just being how it is, the naturalness, the silence of it, is also a huge support for just letting go of the absorption in the flood of sense experience.

Seeing nature, smelling the leaves, hearing the birds—all of that is still sense experience. It's pleasant. Noticing pleasant, that's fine. I'm not taking this out of the realm of sense experience. But somehow being here with the wind and the leaves and the smell of the leaves and the birds brings us into a sense of presence and peace a little different from watching television. Somehow it's different. Being in nature, ever since the time of the Buddha—he's always saying, there are these roots of trees, there are these forests, go sit there—there's a sense of appreciating the stillness of nature. Not stillness meaning nothing's happening, but the stillness that it touches in our mind and heart of non-reactivity.

For me, what being in nature does on retreat is just that: ah, we stop fighting it. We just open. There's no resistance. It brings us into a sense of presence, an appreciation, but a presence that's not filled with desiring, with wanting. It's the silence of non-self-referencing. When you're just sitting outside and there's just that "ah," before it gets to "I'm sitting here enjoying nature"—just the space, the peace, the silence. It mirrors the space, the peace, the silence of mind, of citta. It allows us to recognize this.

Even in the Buddha's time, the monk of his sangha renowned as the most ascetic was Mahakashapa. But he loved nature. People sometimes think that the renunciate ascetic is kind of sour and not liking anything, that you wouldn't appreciate nature because that's just clinging to pleasant experience. But no. This is a poem from Kashapa:

Strung with garlands of flowering vines, this patch of earth delights the mind.
The lovely calls of elephants sound.
These rocky crags do please me so.
The shimmering hue of darkening clouds, cool waters in pure streams flowing, enveloped by Indra's ladybugs,

these rocky crags do please me so.
Like the lofty peaks of looming clouds,
like the most refined of palaces,
the lovely calls of tuskers sound,
these rocky crags do please me so.

You really get the sense of appreciation of the beauty. And being that he was an arahant, he ends it making the point: There is not so much contentment for me in this five-fold music as in truly seeing Dhamma with a well-collected mind. The beauty, the pleasure, the peace of nature is the support for seeing Dhamma.

Don't confuse appreciating nature with being sunk in the flood of sensuality. Use the beauty of nature. Use the silence. Use the peace that it helps us recognize in our heart and mind—the lack of self-referencing. If the mind is using nature as a way of sinking into sensuality instead, you'll notice it, because peace won't be what you're experiencing. "I want the leaves to be prettier. I want them to be redder. I want the turkeys to come." That's wanting. That has nothing to do with the peace of the Dhamma. Our mind can do that with anything, but that doesn't mean there's something wrong with nature. It's just noticing.

Using this aspect of kaya viveka is really very powerful and accessible. It's lovely. Those times when you're all caught up in a struggle in your mind and you don't even know what, sometimes I just go outside and stand or walk, not trying to fix it. You've got to give that up. But just go and be outside and let it all go into the world, into the universe. The silence, the peace—that's our natural birthright. It's always available, always accessible. We can just put down the burden, put down the fixing it, put down the ideas for a little bit. Nature's a huge support in this way.

Thich Nhat Hanh wrote: "Our senses are our windows to the outside world. And sometimes the wind blows and disturbs everything within us. Many of us leave our windows open all the time, allowing the sights and sounds of the world to invade us, to penetrate us and expose our sad, troubled selves. We feel so cold and lonely and afraid. Do you ever find yourself watching an awful TV program, but you can't turn it off? The noise, the explosions of gunfire—it's upsetting, yet you don't get up and turn it off. Why do you torture yourself in this way? Don't you want to close your windows? Are you afraid of solitude, the emptiness and the loneliness you may find?"

That touches an important aspect of seclusion of body, seclusion from the senses, because it's a choice we make. We're doing this out of a choice for our own awakening, our own well-being. It's not like we've been taken prisoner and put into a sensory deprivation tank. It's a choice we're making.

All of you know that in this choice of withdrawing from constant bombardment, withdrawing our senses, the space of peace, of completeness, of quiet is not always the only thing that can arise. St. Anthony's shrieking and groaning behind the doors. Thich Nhat Hanh asks: are you afraid of what you may find if you close the windows, if you turn off the TV?

Sometimes, even when we know in our mind that physical withdrawal, solitude, pulling back from so much sense input is useful, that it's going to support our awakening, support our recognizing the natural peace that's our birthright—even when we know that experientially, there can still be a kind of kicking and screaming.

Even the Buddha, before he was the Buddha, speaks about this. There's a sutta where a householder comes to him and says, "Sir, we're householders. We indulge in sensuality, we delight in sensuality, we enjoy sensuality, we rejoice in sensuality. For us, renunciation seems like a sheer drop-off. Yet I've heard that in this doctrine and discipline, the hearts of the young monks leap up at renunciation, grow confident, steadfast, and firm, seeing it as peace. So right here is where this doctrine is contrary to the great mass of people, this issue of renunciation."

And the Buddha says, "So it is. Even I myself, before my awakening, when I was still an unawakened bodhisatta, I thought renunciation is good, seclusion is good. But my heart did not leap up at the idea. It did not grow confident or steadfast or firm, seeing it as peace."

Then the thought occurred to him—I like how he says "the thought occurred," giving that sense that the thought's just coming and going—the thought occurred: "What is the cause? What is the reason why my heart does not leap up at renunciation, doesn't see it as peace?" Then the thought occurred: "I haven't seen the drawback of sensual pleasures. I haven't pursued that theme. I haven't understood the reward of renunciation. I have not familiarized myself with it. That's why my heart doesn't leap up at renunciation, doesn't understand it, doesn't see it as peace."

This is so straightforward and obvious, but I find it encouraging. Sunk in the flood of sensuality, the mind that's really in the habit of wanting and aversion and reaction and amusing itself—it's not really very amusing, but anyway—it's not going to say, "Oh yeah, great, let me just drop all of this stuff and be silent."

We come on retreat, the first day the mind says, "Why did I do this?" Maybe not the first day—the first day it's all nice. Then the second day, the third day: "Why am I doing this?" We start concocting all kinds of things to do and think and talk about and worry about. And then there's some quiet, some space, some peace. We re-recognize the natural state. And then, for many people, not everybody all the time, but for everybody sometime—the moans, the shrieks, the groans. We start to think, "Oh, this is why I didn't want to be quiet." We start to see the things that maybe the incessant sense busyness, the incessant thinking, the incessant input has really been shutting out.

For all of us, it can be whatever our particular demons might be. Self-judgment starts getting so loud. People say, "How could I not have noticed that every single thought I ever have is judgment?" It's not true, of course—no one has every single thought as the same mental state. But we start to notice how often. Whether it's judgment or needing to control or guilt or sorrow or comparing or fear of chaos or worthlessness or pride—whatever your particular ones are, they're going to come up. That's part of it. That's part of what the silence, the seclusion allows: for these things that have been pushed away, but at a price, to come up.

The next aspect of this kaya viveka, seclusion of body, is really our mindfulness or restraint at the sense doors—the moment-to-moment mindfulness. This is what supports us when these demons, when the shrieks and the groans and all the stuff that's been kept down starts to emerge.

Restraint at the sense doors is often talked about as renunciation, but the way Ajahn Buddhadasa talks about it, I love. He calls it satipañña, mindfulness-wisdom at the moment of sense door contact. There's seeing, there's feeling sadness, there's hearing, there's thinking, whatever. Sati is of course just our moment-to-moment bare attention, just meeting what's happening just as it is. Wisdom—we can't make wisdom be there, but the moment-to-moment bare attention, just meeting, seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, sensing with the body and the emotional, the thinking realm, moment after moment.

This aspect of seclusion, restraint at the sense doors, doesn't mean shutting all the windows, as Thich Nhat Hanh said—you just narrow it down. We're still having the six sense doors and the six sense door contact. This satipañña at the moment of sense door contact is the restraint: you bring the attention, it meets what's happening right at the point of contact, and it just doesn't have to proliferate any further. It doesn't have to judge or compare or remember or make up a story. And if it does happen, that's the next sense door contact—the thought, the emotion, the memory. "Oh, thinking."

There's no sense that whatever's arising is wrong or bad. This aspect of seclusion, of restraint at the sense doors, doesn't mean pushing away anything. It means that mindful, simple awareness right here. Right here, right here, right here. That's what our practice is from the moment we walk in the door, and hopefully the rest of our life too.

That's what is our support when the demons start to shriek, when it really gets wild. In a way, it's good that this doesn't usually happen in the first couple of days, when the mind is just falling asleep and getting restless. We're cultivating, developing the moment-to-moment restraint at the sense doors. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, feeling, thinking—just this, just this, just this. It doesn't matter what this is. So when "just this" is suddenly intense, "Oh, yeah, this too, this too." That's also restraint at the sense doors. Satipañña, mindfulness wisdom. The wisdom arises just from the steadiness of bare attention. This is an aspect of seclusion, of restraint, of renunciation.

We're not shutting out the world. We're not shutting off the senses. And this is where this seclusion that helps us cultivate moment-to-moment awareness and wisdom is going to be able to take us back out into the world of people, of more stuff coming in. We're clearing the decks with the physical seclusion so that we can actually have a little space to notice how the mind works, how it gets sucked into sense contact and lost, how with just awareness that doesn't have to happen. But also how the sense contact is not the enemy. It's not a problem. And that includes the mental sense door.

So seclusion is not motivated by thinking that sense experience, human beings, anything is bad. Or that awareness, that freedom of heart and mind, that non-clinging is dependent on not having certain sense things present. That's conditioned. It can't be conditioned. But we're using conditions because we're so sunk in the other way of being and in the reactions that we need to artificially create a little space, a lot of space, over and over.

In a way, when the stuff starts coming up and the demons are shrieking, that's great. That's where we really learn the strength of moment-to-moment awareness, where we learn that it's accessible. Sometimes we're really lost in the shrieking and the groaning and whatever's going on behind those closed doors. But sometimes we all have that moment where, "Oh, it's just this. It doesn't have to go away to know the peace of heart and mind of non-clinging. It doesn't have to go away. I don't have to be different. Nothing has to be different."

The only shift is a shift of interest, of awareness, from really being so absorbed and sunk in the object—even when the object is my emotional crisis, it's still an object—to the awareness of. Awareness gets more interesting, the object less so.

Andrew Olendzki, in one of his articles, put it this way: "As sati, as mindfulness grows, our mental attention is gradually shifted from the objects of awareness to the process of being aware. This comes from an attitude of letting go of the object, abandoning attachment to the object." And as I said, the object includes any of the six senses, including all our stories and thoughts about me.

The mind is a dynamic process. When that mind and attention is stuck on what has arisen, kind of glued to it—as Ajahn Chah says, sunk in sensuality—then the mind seems rigid and limited. But the mind that is letting go moment after moment just keeps opening into the emerging flow. The flow just keeps on flowing. Mind is also part of that flow, moment after moment. Our practice isn't about lining up and changing and getting the right flow of objects so we don't have to be bothered anymore. It's the whole shift from being sunk in any sense experience at all. And viveka, seclusion, is just a support for this.

Moment after moment of simple mindful presence, this restraint at the sense door—just not shooting off—leads to citta viveka, or seclusion of mind. Classically, it's defined as the moment when the mind is secluded from the hindrances. This is often in the suttas when the Buddha says, "Secluded from the hindrances, the mind entered the first jhana." That's often the little phrase that's the prelude to moving into the deep absorptions: secluded from the hindrances.

It doesn't have to be deep absorption states, though. We all experience times of citta viveka when the mind is secluded from the hindrances. There are moments when the hindrances aren't there—times when your moment-after-moment attention is getting more steady, the mind is quieting down, and you're noticing more, even if it's not quite conscious, the peace, the stillness of the non-reactive heart and mind. As that begins to be more felt, more noticed, it becomes a little more likely to occur in consciousness. One moment of mindfulness is a proximate cause for the next moment of mindfulness. One moment of anger is a good indication for the next moment of anger when we're caught in it. So moment after moment of mindfulness quite naturally leads to citta viveka.

Whether it's deep absorption concentration or moment-to-moment just being with what happens, we like it. It's lovely. Those times when you're not thinking, "Oh God, when's anger going to come back? I'm having a moment of peace, but I know craving's going to come." The citta viveka is more like a relaxed space where just for some time, those old hindrances just aren't coming. It feels very spacious, relaxed, light, unified. It's not like you look around and think, "Wow, they're really not here. This feels nice." If you say all that stuff, then you're gone. But it gets less brittle, more reliable, more flexible. It's not like you have to hold on to your concentration, have to protect it because something's going to come back.

It's really just this: because the peace is more accessible, the non-clinging mind is more familiar, more tangible. And clinging and aversion and being sunk—it just isn't very interesting anymore. The more flexible and relaxed and steady this state is—and it is a state, not the end of things—the less appealing all the regular sense pleasures are. To the point that things you really thought were so important, from that place, you just can't even... Who cares if I ever experience that again? Who cares? It's so gross, so crass. There's just a subtleness.

This is citta viveka, whether it's deep concentration or in a more broad, flexible way. It's not the end of things. It's not what we aspire to. But it is another level of seclusion, and it leads to what Sayadaw U Pandita calls vikkhambhana viveka, a more subtle sense of seclusion, where the hindrances are not only not there, but very far. They're really quiet. There's a sense they just couldn't get in there, even if you tried. The mind is very light and soft and buoyant and pliable. It's nice. This is not freedom, though. We like it, but it's not freedom.

But as the mind gets more and more secluded from being sunk in sense pleasures, from reactivity, from the hindrances, the lightness, the emptiness, the buoyancy, the non-reactivity, and the ability to be with anything gets more and more pronounced, recognizable, familiar. That's the value of this seclusion—not that it's a state to hold on to, because you can't, we can't, it's going to go—but that within it, just as without it but a bit easier, we can recognize that peace, the emptiness, the non-clinging.

But as it gets more subtle, the seclusion is very tricky because we fall so easily into what's called corruptions of insight—upakilesa—where we get basically attached because it's so nice. In the citta viveka, in all its various forms, one big thing that happens is at some point attachment creeps in. Usually we don't notice it right away because attachment isn't there. The hindrances are far away. But gradually, little by little, the attachment can really creep in. It's subtle. We don't recognize it until it's not there, until that nice citta viveka isn't there anymore. We really think we weren't attached. But so much of our practice, even without realizing it, can come to be around trying to get back to that state, that experience. "That's what freedom is. These grosser things can't be freedom. It has to be that." We don't see that this is conditioning. That can't be freedom.

The more subtle level is so much nicer than anything we normally experience that sometimes we may know it's not freedom, but we say, "You know what, it's good enough. I'll settle for this." And that's when we start getting attached to the silence, attached to retreat. We start yearning for retreat or not wanting anything to do with other people. Or on retreat, any sound—God forbid there should ever be a sound. We run around trying to stop all the sounds because it's going to wreck somebody's practice, impede their silence, their liberation.

I've been part of meetings where we're talking for twenty minutes about how sometimes people walk out that door and people sitting in the hall hear it open and it's going to destroy their practice. And I had just come back from Asia, where noise is not exactly the issue. Nobody is thinking there shouldn't be noise. Great, let them slam the door. Let there be some noise.

We can get reactive, obsessive, trying to protect our seclusion of mind, our viveka. Or we get dull—"This is good enough, this is it, this is all there is." Very subtly, something turns off the interest, the investigation. "Okay, now I know. This is it." If we relax in a way that means we don't need awareness anymore, it's going to take care of itself, we tune off into dullness.

The Buddha once said two things he never lost sight of when he was still an unenlightened bodhisatta: one was never to be lax in his energy, and the second was never to settle merely for wholesome and pleasant states of mind. That's a lot more difficult than it sounds. "All this work. This is great." Not settling doesn't mean we have to hate the wholesome and pleasant states of mind, but not to land there as me. Not to land there with clinging. Keep looking. Keep exploring.

I had a friend who was a monk in Thailand for many years, living in the forest. His life was very peaceful. His mind seemed really calm, equanimous, untroubled. You could think, "This is freedom." But at some point, he realized, "No, the conditions are supporting peace, calmness, equanimity. But I don't think it's freedom. I'm just getting dull." That realization motivated him to leave Thailand, come back to the States, and disrobe. And he found out it was true—clinging was still arising in the mind and heart.

I'm not saying we have to look for trouble. We can support ourselves. But not to settle merely for wholesome states of mind, merely for peace.

This brings us to the third kind of seclusion: seclusion from suffering—the way I described it in the beginning, seclusion of beings as a synonym for awakening, or suññatā, emptiness.

This is how Ajahn Buddhadasa talks about it. First, suññatā refers to the characteristic or fundamental nature of all things: the fact that the character of all things is voidness, emptiness of inherent self. The second application points to the quality of the mind when it is not grasping and clinging at anything. The character of the mind when it isn't attaching to anything is called voidness also. To know Dhamma means that Dhamma is truly present and that we are aware of it. To know suññatā means that voidness is manifest in awareness.

I encourage you: in any moment that the mind is aware of any measure of emptiness, of voidness, even if it's not absolute or perfect, keep on recognizing it. On any one day, emptiness—remember, the quality of the mind and heart that's not clinging to anything—is there repeatedly in our awareness. Even if it's not the absolute suññatā, it's still very good. As long as we take the trouble to notice it. If we take an interest in this sort of emptiness, this voidness, right from the start, it will generate a contentment with voidness. It makes it easier to practice, to recognize, and to really come to know it more and more deeply.

In a way, that's the point of all our seclusion: to help awareness notice voidness, emptiness, the heart and mind of non-clinging, seclusion from suffering in a moment. It may not be the end of things, but it's still very good, and it's arising really very frequently every day in our minds, especially here.

When we're set on looking for experience or reacting to experience we don't like, we're still caught in the flood of sensuality. We don't notice just the moments of emptiness—nothing special, no reference point to me, no reference point to anything. They're not like big fireworks going off. Nothing special. But over and over, we learn to recognize them. We don't have to generate a contentment with voidness. That happens by itself. It's very trustworthy, this sense of attention moving more and more to the process of awareness and less and less sinking into whatever the object is. The emptiness becomes more and more obvious.

Our task is to learn to recognize and trust that the silence, the space, the emptiness is within, always accessible, not dependent on seclusion—though the seclusion helps us learn to recognize and re-recognize. It's not dependent on any particular experience.

It is easier for most of us to recognize the heart and mind of non-clinging, just little moments of it, to recognize how we're lost in reactivity and sensuality, when we have a measure of physical and mental seclusion. Otherwise there's just too much going on. But we don't have to stay locked in that seclusion. We don't have to be afraid. We have to find somehow that as long as it's dependent on the situation, it still isn't free. It isn't stable enough. It isn't strong enough. We haven't really stabilized in it. So it's how to take it back into the world.

This is our practice for whatever we do after this. It doesn't mean one couldn't be a hermit or a contemplative or live really silently. That's also possible. But even that won't always be the case.

Thomas Merton wrote: "One who is called to solitude is not called to solitude to cultivate the illusion that he is different, withdrawn, and elevated. He is called to emptiness. And in this emptiness, she does not find points upon which to base a contrast between herself and others. On the contrary, she realizes, although perhaps confusedly at first, that she has

Impermanence

Carol Wilson · 52 min

> In this contemplative talk, Carol Wilson examines why the perception of impermanence (anicca), though constantly present in our experience, remains so difficult to truly embody. Drawing from the Buddha's teaching that when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated, it eliminates sensual lust, lust for existence, ignorance, and the conceit "I am," she explores what it would mean to live from the cellular knowing that all phenomena are in constant shift and change.
>
> Wilson identifies three obstacles to perceiving impermanence: basic misperception where we see things as permanent, inattention that contributes to this misperception, and our instinctive resistance to the sadness and loss that change brings. She introduces the Pāli concept of santati—how the rapid continuity of successive phenomena creates the illusion of permanence—and shares a moving account of witnessing death in a Burmese village, contrasting how different cultures integrate or hide life's great changes.
>
> Through the Buddha's teachings on the five khandhas, stories of Ānanda's grief at the Buddha's approaching death, and poetry from Galway Kinnell and Billy Collins, Wilson illustrates how opening to impermanence—rather than resisting it—actually deepens our appreciation for life and love. She emphasizes that insight doesn't create a different reality but reveals what's already here through a shift in perception. The practice of continuous mindfulness naturally reveals change without needing to conceptualize it, freeing us into what the Buddha called "the supreme state of sublime peace: liberation through non-clinging."

Tonight I want to talk about impermanence.

The Buddha talks about three doorways to the deathless, really. The understanding—the cellular, the really living insight understanding—of impermanence, and or of dukkha, and or of anatta, the truth of non-self. These are like different doorways into the real opening of heart and mind in a moment, to seeing and understanding life, ourselves, mind and body the way it is.

Recognizing, seeing things the way they are, even in a moment, releases the heart and mind from clinging—only for a moment. It's a good moment. It releases the heart and mind from clinging, from confusion, from all these endless stories of me, me, me. It's a huge relief.

I read this quotation from the Buddha a couple of weeks ago, where he said: "Bhikkhus, when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated, it eliminates all sensual lust. It eliminates all lust for existence. It eliminates all ignorance. It uproots all conceit 'I am.'"

As I told you, that basically means complete liberation of heart and mind—those four phrases together. It's powerful. The perception of impermanence developed and cultivated.

To me, it's a mystery and it's not a mystery, but one of the mysteries of practice is: if this is how it is—and we should say this is how it is, pretty much everything, more than pretty much—things are impermanent. Why isn't that our perception? And how can we develop and cultivate that perception?

It's really quite interesting to me to explore, to keep reminding myself. I'll say a few things tonight—no way to cover the field. But it is difficult to truly, cellularly know, to live, to act from that knowing that all phenomena are in constant shift and change.

What would it be like? These are questions I ask myself sometimes. One is: Do I truly believe, live from, accept that truth? Not "oh yeah, that's right, everything's impermanent"—just conceptual knowledge. It's useful, but not enough. I really mean live from that truth. And what would be the effect of living, really responding, just knowing that that's how things are? How would it affect our responses, our actions, our decisions, how we meet the moments of our life?

Do we even—and this is now at a conceptual level—do we even believe it? Do we believe what the Buddha says quite often? In a lot of his talks, in his suttas, the way he describes the proof of anatta, of no self, he'll go through the sense doors or the five khandhas and he'll say: You see how they're impermanent? And anything that is impermanent is inherently unsatisfying. Anything impermanent cannot be held to as me or mine. He says that often as a definitive proof.

I find it worth exploring myself. Do I actually believe that? Do we believe, even if we know things are impermanent, that this makes them inherently unsatisfying? It doesn't mean not pleasurable—sure, pleasurable in a moment—but inherently unsatisfying, nothing we can hold to for any reliability, any lasting satisfaction.

It's really radical. Radical. Do we live from that? And yet it's in our face, in our perception, constantly.

This is the Buddha again: "Bhikkhus, there is no form, no feeling tone or vedana, no perception, no volitional formations"—which is all the thoughts, the moods, the formations of mind, the motivations—"and no consciousness."

Those are the five khandhas that make up a person. There's no moment of that which is permanent, stable, eternal. Nothing that is not subject to change, that will remain the same like eternity itself.

And then the Blessed One took up a little bit of dirt under his fingernail, and he said to that bhikkhu, "There's not even this much form"—a little bit of dirt under his fingernail—"not even this much form that is stable, that is not subject to change, that is eternal." And he went on through all the five khandhas. Not even this much that's not subject to change.

And he said, "If there were this much form, consciousness, or anything that was not subject to change, that was permanent, then this living of the holy life for the complete destruction of dukkha, of suffering, could not be discerned. But because there is not even this much form that is permanent, then it is possible—this living of the holy life for the complete destruction of suffering, of dukkha."

Not even this much.

Is that how we live? Is that how we respond, relate to life? Do we really have that cellularly in our knowing? For me, there are moments—rare moments—when I actually know that. But there are many moments when that's not the perception.

So I want to talk a little about three different ways I see that we don't let this in. And I'm sure you can recognize other ways for yourself. Hopefully this sparks your own investigation—not thinking about, but investigation.

One is, of course, what I talked about a couple weeks ago: the basic misperception. We see things as being permanent. We just don't perceive the changing nature. "See" could be hear, smell, taste—but we don't perceive the changing nature.

Another way is simply inattention, which contributes to the misperception. We're zoning out. "Oh yeah, this has always been here. It always will be here." We don't even know what is here, but we just think something's always been here. Never going to change.

And another one, I think, is a kind of first noble truth response: our instinctive or habitual resistance, fear, or pulling back from sadness, from the unpleasant, from the sense of loss. The sense of sadness that comes often in our normal lives—we unliber-ated, not completely enlightened human beings—when we are face-to-face with change. Often, not always. Sometimes change is beautiful. But often when we're confronted with change, it touches this place of loss, of sadness, of fear. And that's the whole second noble truth. We shrink back from that. We just don't quite let it in. As if it's a problem. As if sadness is a problem instead of just being part of life. No, but it feels wrong. Things shouldn't be changing.

Even in really big ways, in our whole culture, there are ways it's enshrined that we don't really include the great changes in the common culture. How old people are put away, sick people are put away in little enclaves. Death—we don't see it so much unless we choose to work in hospice or hospital. It's not so much part of ordinary life.

A couple of years ago, when I was helping to teach a retreat in Upper Burma near Sagaing—which is a beautiful spot on the banks of the Irrawaddy River, with tons of nunneries and monasteries—one day after lunch, the other Western teachers and translators and friends, about five of us, went for a walk along the river. We got about five minutes down the road, and along there was a stone wall looking down over the river, quite big, a broad river. And there were about fifty or sixty people gathered—the nuns from the two nunneries nearby. We knew some of them, along with other villagers.

So we stopped, and with us was the translator who could speak fluent Burmese. We talked to some of the nuns we knew. Mostly older, but there was also the Inyeti—she's like the cutest little nun in the world. She was six at that time, and we'd known her since she was four. So cute in her little pink robes. She came running over and was talking to us.

It turned out what had happened, what everyone was waiting for, was this: three young novice monks—about eleven, twelve, thirteen years old. It's very common for young boys to become monks for a while. They stay in the monasteries and get their schooling that way. These three had been out playing on the river, and one of them—who, it turns out, had just come from a far province a week ago and wasn't used to being near the river—had gone under. And he hadn't come up.

And they were looking for him. Well, it had been an hour, so he pretty much knew.

So they were looking for him, and everyone was gathering around. As we waited for a while, they found his body, pulled it up in a boat, carried it. They were just right on the road, and then right on the other side of the road was a big kind of sala, an open platform that was covered, part of the nunnery that was right there. So they carried him over very respectfully, put him on a bed that was on that platform, did everything they could to try and revive him. Of course, they couldn't—it had been an hour.

And then, seeing that he was dead, some of the monks ran and got fresh robes. They made him all nice. Now, mind you, the whole village—all the nuns and the monks and the laypeople—were all there and part of this. It was carried out really right in the middle of everything. And so everyone was there. This little six-year-old nun also—she was telling us she sort of knew him. He was a little bit of a relative, and everybody knows everybody there. It's very small. People know what's going on.

And so they were really sad, really sad. But everyone was there dealing with it. They sent someone off to his parents, which was going to take 24 hours to get to them. And in the meantime, they made shifts to sit there and chant and be with his body until his parents came. They were sad. People were upset. Little Linechi, she was upset. But it wasn't that the adult nuns were saying, "Oh, no, no, you shouldn't see this. This isn't something for a child to see." She knew everything that was going on. The sadness was there. The care. The including of his death as part of life.

The young monks he'd been playing with—of course, they'd run off. They were scared they'd get in trouble. So the nuns and monks were worried about them too. They went to find them, make sure they were okay, include them. They included us, brought us up. And there was just this sense that was really beautiful in a way—that this is a very touching part of life. The whole village, everyone there, shared it. It was just as sad as it would be for us, but it wasn't weird or something to hide or something to shut off.

And I thought how, here, if someone came up after an hour, when it was clear they were dead—not when maybe they could still be revived, but when it was clear—we'd have to call 911, the sirens, the flashing lights, the heart paddles, the whole thing. And that sense of community, of this being a part of life, wouldn't be there.

It really affected us all deeply. As we were leaving, one of our friends, a good friend of mine, said to me, "You know, I'm 47 years old, American. I'm 47 years old. I have never seen a dead person before." Just living a normal life in Silicon Valley.

I don't know, it just touched me in this way—how kind of split off the major changes are, the major transitions. And this is the big one, of course: birth and death. If we don't even open to that, if it's even hidden from us... never mind the fact that every single moment of our life is a constant transition. We're just not put in the modality to notice that. We have our habits, our attention trained to look for stability, to look for familiarity, to look for comfort. And it's more upsetting when things change.

When I, or someone I know, or even my elderly mother suddenly gets a disease or becomes sick, does my mind go, "Oh, the conditions for a healthy body have changed. Now there's sickness"? That's not the first reaction that comes up in my mind. Even with my elderly mother, even with myself—it's "Oh, no." And then maybe I can get there, and maybe I can't.

But it's just kind of like taking for granted when things are going along in a relatively okay way. Of course, that's how it's supposed to be. And when a difficulty or a change comes, something's gone wrong. So that's part of not letting in the perception that I see—it's kind of threatening, scary, uncomfortable, kept out, not really consciously.

Another thing we don't notice—and this is something I really got clearly one time at a teaching His Holiness the Dalai Lama gave—he was talking about how we assume permanence and we don't notice the momentariness of change. We say, yeah, we really know things change, and we can see something starts, my life starts, and it goes on for a while, and then it ends. Or the day starts and it goes on for a while and then it ends. Or the sitting starts and it goes on for a while and then it ends. But there's no persistence, no starting a period of persistence, staying the same and then change. There's no persistence for more than an instant. It's constantly arising and changing, arising and changing, arising and changing.

We don't tend to really recognize that. And it's true, it's happening so quickly that often we can't literally perceive it. But then on top of that not perceiving, we also don't look carefully enough. That's what a lot of our formal meditation practice supports us in doing—looking more carefully. And then on top of the not recognizing, there's just an assumption.

When people come into interviews and say, "Well, what happened in your sitting?" it's funny because people say, "What happened in my sitting? It was an hour. So much stuff happened. How can I say what happened in the sitting?" And that's right. It's a ridiculous question, what happened in your sitting. It would take an hour to describe what happened in the sitting, because every instant is different. So just in the way we communicate, we make big, sweeping assumptions.

I mean, it's okay to be able to communicate. It's okay that I more or less look the same as I did yesterday, so we can recognize each other. But it's not really the same. The whole thing about bad hair days—your hair is never really, unless it's shaved off, exactly the same day to day, which is a source of distress sometimes and happiness others. Little things, but big.

I was just talking to a friend yesterday who I haven't seen for a few years. He used to come here and sit a lot, but he's been home. And he said, "Well, but I see your pictures, and you look just the same." And I said, "Yeah, it's the same picture for ten years. Of course I look just the same." But he somehow didn't want to let that in. He goes, "Oh, no, it's a new thing that you're doing." I said, "Yeah, new thing, same picture." That's what we like to think—oh yeah, you look just as young as ever. I'm afraid not.

So never mind the big things. The momentariness of anicca, this constant, subtle shifting, is something that first is difficult to perceive, but it's also masked by lack of continuity in our awareness. There's actually a word for this in Pali: santati. Mahasi Sayadaw talks about it. He describes santati as mistaking a series of successive phenomena for a single phenomenon. For example, you're seeing or hearing something repeatedly, moment after moment after moment—say I'm looking at that chair, and it seems like it's staying steady, that I'm seeing it over a prolonged period. And so I think the thing I'm currently seeing is the same thing I saw before.

So I think that chair is the same. But it's also positing that this I, this consciousness, this body is the same. And it's all just going along the same until I turn my head. Then I'm seeing something different. But without actually looking carefully, I'm still positing that this I and this consciousness and this body are the same.

So santati, this continuity of phenomena and also the fast continuity of consciousness and of the sense door contact—it causes us to think that the thing we're currently seeing is the same thing we were seeing a second ago. It's a little disorienting to think that might not be true, isn't it? How can we function if this isn't the same as it was before?

The whole world's going to fall apart. How are we going to function? You know, the mind goes off into that trip.

And this is what's so great, because the perception of anicca really frees our heart and mind from clinging. It's not that going to the land of anicca from the land of permanence is what frees our heart and mind from clinging. It's already anicca. It's already that way. So if fear comes up just kind of spontaneously—oh no, how can that be?—okay, we just notice the fear. That's fine. But if you really let yourself get into the thinking about how can we function if everything's changing, and all of that, notice that is a complete waste of time. And just, if it's happening, fine, blah blah blah, but don't give it any energy. It's already that way.

The same is true with no-self. It's not like you have a self and you're going to get rid of it and then you won't know who you are. It's already that way. And this really helps me—I've said this before, but it just keeps coming back. The whole nature of insight is not about creating a different reality. It's about just that little shift of perception that recognizes what's already here in a different way. That's all. That's all it is.

I always use the example of those Magic Eye images that are just geometrical forms with no particular thing you can recognize. And if you look at it—steady but soft, right? You can't look for something. Steady, soft gaze, not trying, relax, and just stay there. And all of a sudden, a three-dimensional image pops out. Now, do you think that it wasn't there and then something happened and all of a sudden this 3D image popped out? Or was it maybe always there? We just needed that little shift of perception. Both ways of perceiving can be there. They both are there.

So in terms of impermanence, the perception of impermanence—even in a moment when we really are experiencing that constant rising and passing, rising and passing, the constant change of things—there might be fear in a moment. But just noticing that come and go too, that moment of experiencing in that way really frees something in that moment, something that we never really knew we knew. And even though that perception doesn't stay, that's probably how we function in the world. We go back to being able to recognize each other, and the room is still the same, and we know what objects are, and the table doesn't move generally. We're perceiving permanence.

But it's different to have a perception that's a conventional reality and useful, and we know that's what it is, and we're using it. That's different from once we know it's in constant change, but we can use the conventional reality. That's great. But when we don't know there's another reality, then the way we relate to the conventional perception of permanence is what leads us to clinging, to holding on, to fear—to basically relating in a way that isn't in sync with how things are. Square peg in the round hole, you know?

Remember that definition of dukkha? Like the axle rod fitting into the hole of the wheel and it doesn't really fit. So it's always not quite fitting—bad fit, not quite. It's a great description of dukkha. Part of that is we're not perceiving impermanence, so we're always relating as though this has got to stay, this has got to stay. Or this is going to stay and I want it to go, oh my God—instead of opening to the mystery, to the wonder.

So the second aspect I wanted to talk about is something that, for me, this is the way I experience it. Maybe it's not so for you. But there's the tendency, of course, to cling to what is familiar or beautiful, what I love, or just comfortable. And there's the sadness, the poignancy, the sense of loss that is a part of life for we unenlightened human beings on this earth. There's no way—no way to not experience loss, to not experience change.

And for most of us, I feel that the sadness that can come, from poignancy all the way to grief, is part of the play of being human in this world. Just like joy is. Just like compassion and love are. Just like anger is. I'm not saying we should feel grief or sadness, but I'm saying we don't need to be afraid of it, or pull back from it, or block the openness of our mind and heart, our consciousness, to recognize change out of a kind of instinctive fear of the sadness.

Clinging is so interesting, so poignant, because in some ways it's our unconscious strategy for happiness. If I hold on to this—this person, this relationship, this life situation, this finally perfect moment of mindfulness after all these months—clinging feels like the natural response. It's going to make me happy. And of course, as we know on this level, clinging is the very thing that actually blocks the ease, the happiness, the peace.

I experience clinging as a kind of intuitive but unfortunately wrong response to the unreliability of life, the shakiness. When I was talking before about everything being in constant change, my thinking mind, even as I say it, doesn't like that. I get a little feeling here. Everything's constantly shifting? No, I need something solid.

It's like being in an earthquake. Years ago, when I was teaching at Yucca Valley, we had an earthquake in the middle of the dharma talk. I was talking and everything went shhhh. I'd never been in an earthquake, and it wasn't a bad one. I thought, "Oh, this is kind of cool." But then later we had a much bigger one. I was outside, and because I was outside and no one was hurt, I could just experience it—the ground going, everything shaking.

Then for the next three days, every five or ten minutes, there was an aftershock, some of them quite big. So it stopped being so cool. Every few minutes everything starts shaking, whether you're lying in bed, sitting, eating, whatever. And the radio kept saying, "Thirty-five percent chance of the big one"—making everything sound as bad as it could be. So you sit there, everything starts rolling, and you think: Is this the big one? Do I have to run outside? Wait it out a little more?

You just couldn't settle. It was almost physical. The body just couldn't settle. And I really understood: you can't rely on this earth to be solid. The earth isn't solid. You can't rely on anything never to change, to always be there. It felt actually biological after a couple of days—it wasn't that my mind was so afraid, it was just the adrenaline, the unsettled quality in the body. But I got that sense of how much I didn't like it. I wanted to think there could be some steady, solid thing that I don't have to think about, where I don't have to let in impermanence.

I'm not giving this example as how the wisdom of impermanence, the perception of impermanence, frees us. This is an example of how resistance to impermanence causes this little bit of angst, this dukkha, this square peg in the round hole—it just shouldn't be like this. I want to settle instead of just rolling with it. Yes, it was unpleasant. Half the time things are unpleasant. That's how it is anyway. Half the time they're not.

So I get a sense that clinging is the response, the reaction to that unsettledness. And it's so poignant because it just doesn't work.

Galway Kinnell has a little snippet from a long poem:

You cry, waking from a nightmare.
When I sleepwalk into your room and pick you up and hold you up in the moonlight, you cling to me hard as if clinging could save us.
I think you think I will never die.
I think I exude to you the permanence of smoke or stars even as my broken arms heal themselves around you.
I have heard you tell the sun, don't go down.
I have stood by as you told the flower, don't grow old, don't die.
Little Maud, yet perhaps this is the reason you cry.
This the nightmare you wake crying from:
being forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls.

I like that line: as if clinging could save us. It's really so poignant. But we can open to the poignancy. When we open to that, it's so touching. It opens us into beauty, like he says, while my broken arms heal themselves around you. When we don't fight it, it opens us into the mystery and the wonder of the world.

The Buddha said, "The search for a resting place is burning. Not to need one is cool and peaceful."

I like to think of this as cellular anicca—the cellular perception of impermanence, just letting it in. It really leads us into a deep connection and acceptance of what's happening now. It allows us to recognize, to be fully present and engaged in just what's happening now. Not holding to what was two seconds ago, ten years ago. Not busily constructing what could happen in the future, for bad or good, some kind of resting place. Not to need one is cool and peaceful, even just for a moment.

And yet it's really natural to resist, and to feel real sadness at change and loss. Even in the suttas there's plenty of it. The most famous example, of course, is Ananda, the Buddha's longtime attendant for twenty-five years. I'm sure you know the story of when the Buddha told Ananda he was going to die within three months. Ananda kind of disappears. The Buddha is sitting there in his assembly, and of course he knows—he can know, if he turns his mind to anyone, what's going on in their mind. So he turns to the other monks and asks, "Where is Ananda, O monks?"

Ananda had gone into his lodging. It's so lovely—the sutta actually gives the posture: "He stood lamenting, leaning on the doorpost." He's leaning against his doorpost and crying: "Alas, the teacher is passing away, who is so compassionate to me."

It's really touching. Ananda comes across as very human, very kind, very accessible. He almost embodies what we could relate to if we were partially enlightened like he is. We can really relate to that.

So the Buddha calls him and says, "Enough, Ananda." Now, he's saying this kindly, not "you stupid jerk." He's saying it kindly: "Enough, Ananda. Do not weep and wail. Have I not already told you that all things that are pleasant and delightful are changeable, subject to separation and becoming other? So how could it be, Ananda, since whatever is born, become, compounded, is subject to decay—how could it be that it should not pass away?" It's just impossible.

He's not saying don't care, but just pointing to the fact that a great deal of our lamenting, our struggle, is really resisting what's already happening. But the feeling of loss can still be there without all the grief, without all the aversion.

There's another place—I may misquote it a little, but it's the right drift—where the Buddha says, after his two chief disciples Sariputta and Moggallana both died before him, he's looking at the assembly and saying, "It's as if this assembly is empty for me." Empty. He meant empty because it's empty of Sariputta, empty of Moggallana. They're nowhere to be seen.

He's not beating his head against the doorpost, weeping and wailing and saying things come together and go apart, the end of every meeting is parting. But he's noticing they're gone. He's noticing the loss.

So for me, I try to let the sadness, the sense of resistance, be a wake-up call rather than something to resist or think is bad or wrong—to just look and see: What's going on now? What's being resisted? And I find when I open into "oh yeah, this is changing"—really, by the time I'm saying this is changing, it probably already changed three days ago—but "oh yeah, this is changing," the holding on lets go. And then by itself—it's not like I say, "now I will open into being more connected"—it just happens by itself.

The response becomes more flexible, more appropriate.

There's the story of a friend of ours, a friend of mine who used to come and sit at Yucca Valley for many years—an older man who lives as a farmer in the middle of the country, doesn't know anyone else where he is that meditates. He would always come every year, one of these people who would say, "Oh, I really can't do it right, I don't know what I'm doing," but really dedicated, devoted. Sometimes he'd call up and share how when he was driving on his tractor, he'd be contemplating the Four Noble Truths or looking at his experience—really quite lovely. But one of those people who would think, "I can't meditate, I can't concentrate," you know, so that's for nothing.

Anyway, he told us that a few years ago he had to have open heart surgery where they replaced a valve. The surgery went okay, but then he was in the intensive care unit that night or the next day. And as he said—he's very funny—hooked up with a tube to every orifice. Then all of a sudden, everything started beeping and going wild, which isn't good. If you're in intensive care on these machines and they start beeping, it's not a good sign. He was lying there going, "Oh my God, I'm dying. Something's going on." And he was really present, he said. He thought, "This might be my last breath." He started panicking, and then the thought just came out of nowhere: if this is my last breath, let me really be here for it. And he just completely surrendered into that breath and then went unconscious.

Obviously, it wasn't his last breath. Later he woke up and freaked out and all of that. But that kind of—we never know. We don't know what seeds we're planting. We don't know when our attention is truly called, when the focus has to be there, and boom, here we are. Impermanence presents itself and the response is appropriate. It's flexible. It's connected. It's nothing we can plan, but we can trust actually that that's how it shows up.

So continuity of awareness, continuity of mindfulness—and I don't mean for two seconds. I mean that willingness we have. Of course we space out, but the willingness to really keep coming back into moment-to-moment awareness all day, every day. It's that continuity that actually reveals change on these quick and subtle levels. Because when we're just noticing moment to moment what's happening—and again, it's mindfulness that isn't conceptual, not what we think we're seeing or what we want to see or what we wish it was or what we think it is, but just what's happening now, now, now, that bare attention—that starts to reveal. You don't even have to think about it. Just keep noticing moment to moment. It reveals impermanence. It reveals the change.

You're sitting, you're walking, you're just noticing sensations in your body. For a while, the conceptual overlay might be "my back is always hurting" or "I always have this knot in my neck." But when you're looking moment to moment, it's rarely the same for two seconds together. Nothing's always. Nothing's always.

And I can't say how many times people come into interviews—and I do it myself—saying, "It's always like this. I always feel that. This is here all the time." And I'll say, "Frequently, or often?" And the person will go, "Yeah, frequently, often, yeah, yeah, no matter." Inside you know—yeah, it's always here, don't tell me. But when we really look, we notice when something's here. We may not see everything end. We're not always going to see things end. Something else starts and we're involved in the other thing. But notice when you're saying, "Well, I always feel this aversion." Right now you don't feel it, but it's always under there. No—notice that right now it isn't here. It's really gone. Notice the gone-ness of things as well as their presence.

A friend of ours, a friend of mine was describing this, the whole sense of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, personality view. Sakkāya—Sayadaw U Lak Khana defines sakkāya as just the flow of nāma-rūpa, the six sense doors, contact going on and on and on. Sakkāya-diṭṭhi—diṭṭhi is view—is in a moment when any of that six sense door experience, the body and the mind, is clung to in that moment, identified with in that moment as "me" or "mine." That's a sense of identity view, sakkāya-diṭṭhi. In the bigger picture, the way Ajahn Sumedho uses the term sakkāya-diṭṭhi is like our personality view—our view, our sense of our personality, our familiar, comfortable sense of self. Even if you hate it, it's comfortable, or what we think our personality is.

And it's an effect of not seeing impermanence. We have certain habits that come up frequently—different ones of us may have different permutations of the habits—but nothing is always there. Steady awareness shows this.

I'm leading up to this: a friend of mine was telling me at a retreat, she was cooking at this retreat, and she considers herself a very aversive type person. And as she was saying to me—I've known her a long time—everyone else also says, "Yes, you're a very aversive type person." So she is someone who, at times, can manifest aversion once in a while.

But she noticed that was her sakkāya-diṭṭhi, her personality view: "Aversive type, I manifest aversion, that's the kind of person I am." But she was sitting for a couple of days during this long retreat, and she just brought in steady continuity of mindfulness, of sati—just to notice without prior conception the thoughts, the moods, what was coming up in her mind over and over.

And she said, as she looked steadily, yeah, aversion would come up, but also there were many kind, generous moments, many thoughts of compassion, many generous actions, a lot of just normal boring stuff, some desire—the whole range. She said maybe ten percent of the thoughts and moods were aversive.

So when you really look, you see that the overview, the concept, tends to cling to certain ones, string them together in the mind and say, "I'm aversive. That's what's always going on." The steadiness of mindfulness, when we're really committed to just noticing what's happening now—and when we space out, we're committed to notice again—you don't have to get all "let me see impermanence." That's just how it is. Just be willing to show up for what is without any preconception. The perception of impermanence is going to show up. There's no way for it not to.

And that's the other thing I was saying: just notice the gone-ness of things—of moods, of thoughts. A lot of people have said this to me in the last couple months. They'll be talking about some mood or some habit of mind, and they'll say, "Well, it was there a lot, and then it was gone away, but it was just underground. I didn't notice it, but it was still there."

Notice when your mind makes that assumption: "I didn't notice something, but it was still there." How do you know that? I mean, looking at what we really know, not our assumptions. And our assumptions are so familiar, we don't even notice we're making these assumptions a lot of the time. Again, familiar assumptions are another place we sometimes try to land for reliability, for comfort, for ease. "I may have a rotten personality, but at least I'm familiar with it and I can rely on it."

My friend—she could rely on herself to be aversive. I know she felt a little disoriented to find she had a lot of kind and loving thoughts. "Wait, that's not me."

I know after I did a long mettā retreat and I came out of it—not that I was spewing mettā everywhere; that would have been nice—I was just being me. But I have an aversive tendency, which means not anger, but just I'll notice what's wrong with things. The mind will go to the unpleasant first and go, "Well, that could be better."

And my mind would start doing that, and then completely spontaneously, the next moment, the consciousness would notice something pleasant, something beautiful about a person or a situation. "Oh yeah, but there's this thing." And the first couple times, I would go, "Who said that? Where did that come from? Who is that? That doesn't fit my image."

So we let the image go.

Ajahn Chah offers the practice when we're assuming permanence—notice when we're assuming permanence. He offers the practice of just reminding yourself as you go through the day, in any situation: "This too is uncertain." It could be a little ruffling at times, but just reminding with anything, "This too is uncertain." Not to scare us—and it opens us into actually the beauty of connectedness, of appreciation.

When the Buddha says the fact that something's impermanent means that it's inherently unsatisfying, unreliable, it doesn't mean we can't appreciate what's beautiful. It doesn't mean we don't love or care. It just means we don't look to that experience, that person, that sensation, that mood to give us something it can't give—which is any kind of permanence, any reliability in this world. But that doesn't make it bad or worthless. It doesn't mean we should be afraid of love or beauty.

It actually, in my experience, allows for much more appreciation of life, much more love, much more presence. It's really Krishnamurti's phrase—freedom from the known. That's what our whole practice is. Mindfulness is a moment-to-moment opening into the unknown. We never really know what's going to arise in the next moment. Never. We assume, and a lot of times the assumptions are more or less accurate—which is really too bad in a way, because that's what keeps us assuming.

This is uncertain.

Just in the last two days, I was told two stories—the shocking kind. One friend was telling me about her stepmother, an older woman who woke up one morning with her legs kind of numb, and within six hours was completely paralyzed by some kind of virus, something strange they couldn't identify. This was years ago. She's fought back; she can walk now, for a while with crutches, but she's never really gotten back to normal. Completely—who knows? Someone else told me a similar story about a person who just had a stroke like that, overnight. You're fine, and boom—paralyzed. Who knows?

Now, if we go around scared to death of that, that's not perception of impermanence; that's fear. But when we just open into that—wow, who knows?—it makes me just here, really alive. I can appreciate the poignancy. It actually has a kind of touching sense, that harbinger of change.

I don't know how it is for you, but when I see the geese, when I hear and see them flying over in the fall—I saw a flock today—it touches something really quite deep. It's beautiful. It's kind of sad. It's just this sense of real connectedness, and who knows? Who knows? And I feel so alive in that moment. I'm not looking forward or back. I'm just really here.

Freedom from the known.

It allows us to really open past the clinging, past the assumptions, past the dukkha, to just fall into that experience of the heart and mind of non-clinging. The Buddha's description of the supreme state of sublime peace: liberation through non-clinging. The coolness of not needing to find something to take refuge in.

I want to end with this poem from Billy Collins, because it gives me that feeling. He calls it "Aimless Love":

This morning, as I walked along the lake shore, I fell in love with a wren, and later in the day with a mouse the cat had dropped under the dining room table.

In the shadows of an autumn evening, I fell for a seamstress still at her machine in the tailor's window, and later for a bowl of broth, steam rising like smoke from a naval battle.

This is the best kind of love, I thought, without recompense, without gifts or unkind words, without suspicion or silence on the telephone.

The love of the chestnut, the jazz cap and one hand on the wheel. No lust, no slam of the door. The love of the miniature orange tree, the clean white shirt, the hot evening shower, the highway that cuts across Florida.

No waiting, no huffiness or rancor, just a twinge every now and then for the wren who had built her nest on a low branch overhanging the water, and for the dead mouse, still dressed in its light brown suit.

But my heart is always propped up in a field on its tripod, ready for the next arrow.

After I carried the mouse by the tail to a pile of leaves in the woods, I found myself standing at the bathroom sink, gazing down affectionately at the soap, so patient and soluble, so at home in its pale green soap dish.

I could feel myself falling again as I felt it turning in my wet hands and caught the scent of lavender and stone.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 29

Compassion (Karuṇā)

Carol Wilson · 58 min

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson explores karuṇā (compassion) as the natural corollary of realizing emptiness (suññatā). Drawing from both Theravāda and Tibetan teachers including Nisargadatta, Nyoshul Khenpo, and Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche, she illuminates how understanding the lack of inherent self-existence naturally gives rise to compassion, mettā, and generosity. When the narrow self-referencing of 'me' dissolves, the heart becomes ceaselessly responsive to the suffering of all beings.
>
> Wilson connects this understanding to the Buddha's teaching on right intention (sammā saṅkappa) from the Noble Eightfold Path, explaining how wholesome intentions of renunciation, friendliness, and compassion naturally transform from their unwholesome counterparts through wisdom. She emphasizes that the seed of kamma lies in intention rather than results, using the sutta example of the blind arahat walking over ants to illustrate this point. The talk explores how moment-to-moment mindfulness practice purifies the mind stream, transforming habitual patterns into compassionate responsiveness.
> The teaching comes alive through contemporary examples of compassion in action: Martin Luther King Jr.'s refusal to let hatred become his motive, Aung San Suu Kyi's unwavering commitment to justice and love despite years of house arrest, and the Dalai Lama's tearful acknowledgment that he 'cannot be otherwise' than nonviolent. Wilson also shares the Milarepa story of meeting demons with increasingly open-hearted surrender, and offers Dilgo Khyentse's practice of perceiving all phenomena as Chenrezig—the Buddha of compassion—as a means of cultivating this quality in daily life.

So tonight I wanted to talk a little bit about compassion, karuṇā, in the context of what I talked about this morning in the reflection—the sense of when we realize emptiness, the lack of inherent existence of any phenomena. I read from Dilgo Khyentse this morning: when you realize all phenomena are empty and at the same time appearing, existing, we don't just leave it there, hanging out in nothingness. The natural response, the corollary, the kind of completion—you could say the other side of the realization of emptiness—is the manifestation of the good heart, as His Holiness calls it: generosity, mettā or friendliness, compassion, non-harming. It just makes sense.

This is one of my favorite ways of expressing it, from Nisargadatta: "Once you can say with confidence, born from direct experience, 'I am the world, the world is myself,' you are free from desire and fear on the one hand, and become totally responsible for the world on the other. The senseless sorrow of humankind becomes your sole concern."

Think of that not in a depressing way. It just makes total sense when we consider how concerned and caught up we usually are with the obsessive self-referencing of me, me, me—I'm the center of everything, good, bad, indifferent. We've talked about that a lot. When we're consumed by that, there's not really room to feel with, to have your heart quiver with, to be open to, present for the pain and sorrow of all humankind. We're hardly even present for our own.

The natural effect, the natural response in a moment when the heart, the mind is realizing this lack of inherent self-existence—the flip side is that we're all it, it's all us. What the Tibetans call "ceaselessly responsive" is the response of caring, the response of connectedness. Whether the appropriate response would be compassion in the face of pain or suffering, muditā in the face of joy, simple connectedness, friendliness, mettā whenever we meet anyone, or generosity if that's called for. I like to think of it as a tenderness for beings, ourselves included. Rather than desire and fear—the desire to complete ourselves, the fear that somebody else or something is going to get in the way.

Nyoshul Khenpo said that someone who realizes that all phenomena are empty and who realizes the non-existence of self or ego will naturally have spontaneous compassion for all sentient beings who do not realize this truth of emptiness and so continue to suffer through delusion and clinging.

Have you ever noticed that? In ourselves, of course—it's always easier to notice it in others. When we can see that someone's really suffering through holding on to some idea, through holding on to needing something, and we can just see, not with judgment, how unnecessary that is. When we're seeing that with balance, with equanimity, we don't think, "That stupid jerk, get over it." The natural response is simply, "Wow. So much suffering over something that isn't even real." Like when we're waking from a nightmare—it's the natural response. It's not like we have to do something, crank it up. We can work with that, sure. But what I love about awareness, what I love about mindfulness practice, is that simply by recognizing the truth of how things are, compassion, mettā, generosity spontaneously develop, grow, and manifest in us—starting with thought, moving to speech, moving to action. You don't have to be some special kind of person. It's the natural response.

This struck me last time I was in Burma. This could be completely not true—it's just something I made up—but it struck me in terms of the sense of naturally moving from the constriction of "all about me" and how narrow that is and how self-serving and how much that breeds desire and fear. I was noticing, from hanging out in Burma and with different Burmese people, how my sense of "me"—and also what I experienced with my family, with friends here in the States, in the West—is very much that me is me, like one person. It's about me and my identity and my ego and making my way in the world. It's a one-person sense of identity.

What I've noticed quite often in groups in Burma in particular, and some in Thailand too, whether it's the family group or even a group of people sitting at a table together day after day in a monastery on retreat, is that the sense of looking at "what about me" is really "what about us"—the me being extended to the family group or the group at the table. Just a natural kind of inclusion. Not of everybody, but at least a little bit bigger than just me.

For example, I'm remembering years ago I was on a long retreat at a meditation center in Mobi, actually where Venerable Ariyānani used to live. You'd sit for the meals at the same table every day with the same people, so I sat with three other women.

And they were always so happy to do it for her. It was lovely.

But in terms of sitting—because you share, they put pots of curry out and you share them, you don't get your own plate—I would notice that I'd be in my own little Carol's-meditating-world, taking my curry completely in my own little space. And the other three, all of them, were much more tuned into the whole table. They'd notice if I was running low and hand me more. And I made a point of mentioning that this one woman was kind of greedy and self-involved, because I'm not trying to say she was some especially compassionate person. But that was just more the sense of me extended beyond itself to the group.

Somehow this was like a huge insight for me—that it's a convention. It's just a convention.

And so in our practice, when we simply recognize for a moment that this idea of me is just a thought, just a convention, just a feeling, the natural response that comes from that is compassion, is inclusion. As Ajahn Sumedho likes to describe it, awareness is the point that includes—nothing left out. That's the natural way we move into compassion.

Nyoshul Khenpo also describes this beautifully. I'm paraphrasing here, but he says that the difference between the deluded mind and the enlightened mind is mainly a difference of narrowness and openness. A deluded, ordinary mind in our normal life tends to be very narrow, meaning closed in on itself, mostly concerned with the happiness and well-being of ourselves and those really close to us—our family—not really thinking too much or giving much concern to the happiness and suffering of the vastness of sentient beings. But through our practice, what happens is our mind and heart constantly becomes less rigid, broader, more open, not so narrow. This is really the way of the Buddha, who lived with compassion and care for all sentient beings, no one left out. Our whole path is a movement from this narrowness of self-centeredness and concern only for those close to us, toward considering the well-being of all sentient beings.

I like that.

So the way this shows up in terms of how the Buddha describes the workings of the mind—the connection between emptiness, compassion, friendliness, generosity, and how we are in the world ceaselessly responsive—is this: when you're sitting, or walking, or eating, everything comes and goes. All phenomena come. There's sense door contact. You notice it. It goes. Nothing's more important than anything else. Nothing's to be clung to as me or mine. And in that space—I keep saying awareness doesn't care what's happening, right? Nothing really matters. And that's true on that side of emptiness.

But if we take it without the corollary of ceaselessly responsive, if we take that into the world as "nothing really matters, awareness doesn't care and neither do I, whatever is happening is just what's happening, just what is, and the hell with it"—that's called falling into emptiness. It's actually massive delusion.

Ceaselessly responsive is when whatever factors in the mind or heart coalesce in a moment into what the Buddha describes as intention, motivation. Intention—right intention—is actually the second step of the Eightfold Path, the first being right view, right understanding. So you could say this understanding of no inherent self-existence is right view, one example of right view; the Four Noble Truths, right view. How we understand ourselves in the world forms the qualities, the states in mind and heart that coalesce our energy into intention. And intention is that quality, that factor in the mind, a volition that leads to thought, to speech, to action.

When the Buddha spoke about right intention—sometimes translated as right thought—he was being very specific. The intention of greed transforms, and it transforms naturally through wisdom into renunciation or generosity. The unwise intention of ill will transforms naturally into friendliness or mettā. The suffering, the unwise intention of cruelty transforms naturally into compassion. And I would add that pity or indifference as well transforms into compassion.

This starts by simply being a state of mind, a quality of mind and heart we experience just sitting here in response to thoughts, in response to experience. But it moves—a stronger intention motivates speech, and a stronger intention motivates action.

So ceaselessly responsive: when we talk about compassion, the description of compassion is the quivering of the heart in response to suffering, our own or another's. And sometimes Buddhism gets the reputation of being very passive.

So you might think, okay, so we sit here and let our hearts quiver and feel good about ourselves, and that's the end of it. But of course not. Of course not. That's where we start. But as compassion grows stronger and the appropriate situation arises, that intention will naturally move into speech and action.

Intention is really interesting in terms of understanding action and result—kamma and vipāka—in terms of how the Buddha talked about it. Because kamma just means action. And when he speaks of wholesome or unwholesome action, it's not a moralistic judgment, but rather action that leads to happiness, goodness, to wholesome results, versus actions that cause more suffering for ourselves and others—that's unwholesome. The seed of the action, the determining aspect, isn't the result of the action, because that's not in our control most of the time. The seed of action is the intention.

This is what I've been going on about for two months now—that what we're doing is purifying the mind stream, purifying the heart stream, the habits of our mind. This is what forms our intentions. This is the heart of awakening, the heart of how we move and act in the world. Because the same action seen from outside could come from many, many different intentions. And I know personally that one can really fool others as to one's intention. It looks good. But the seed inside ourselves—well, we can even fool ourselves, but it can't fool kamma. It's just what it is.

The example in the suttas about intention is this: a bhikkhu at the time of the Buddha who was blind was doing walking meditation outside in the forest. He was said to be an arahant, completely awakened, which means in the way the Buddha talked about it, it would not be possible for him to harm living beings. There would be no cruelty, greed, or aversion in his mind. So he's doing walking meditation, and there's a whole stream of ants, and he's walking back and forth across these ants and killing them. Some of the other bhikkhus saw this and went running to the Buddha, saying, "He's supposed to be an arahant, but he's killing ants! What do you say about that?"

If you read the Vinaya, the whole book of monastic rules, it's not meant to be funny, but it's interesting because I really get a sense that human nature hasn't changed very much. A great many of the rules come from bhikkhus running to the Buddha going,

"Yeah, yeah, yeah, he's doing this!" And then the Buddha responds, "Okay, obviously the spirit of it would be this, but I see I have to make a rule." And we won't even get into it, but in the beginning there were hardly any rules and they just keep adding up.

Anyway, the Buddha said, "Yes, well, he is an arahant"—only the Buddha could say that—"but he's blind. He does not know that there are ants there. There is no intention, no motivation, no volition in his mind whatsoever to harm living beings, and so it's not an unwholesome karmic action."

I think that's interesting, just putting it out for us to explore in ourselves. Because our tendency is to think, well, if it comes out to a good effect, it's been good. And maybe it has been good—that's still good. But the seed is really in the intention. Now, once that bhikkhu knew there were ants, if he just said, "Well, who cares," and kept on walking, that's very different. Very different.

So this is the place to really explore in ourselves what it's like when we think, speak, and act from desire—or not. From aversion—or not. And again, what I'm saying, what I really love, is that through clear seeing, through wisdom naturally arising in the mind as a function of moment after moment of clear seeing, our habits of mind, our intentions naturally transform. Naturally.

How many times—maybe even just here if you've been coming for a while, or in your life—just pick somebody who's bugging you. Don't pick the biggest, most difficult person in your life, but just something that's bugging you. You're crossing paths, you're feeling aversion, judgment, blame, the whole deal. And at some point you stop. You stop projecting, you stop buying into the ill will, and there's just this sense of connectedness.

This happens to me all the time. I just stop and let myself look at or feel with or just be there with a sense of that person. Or in my mind I think, "How would I feel if I acted like that? How would it feel to act like that?" Immediately, in that openness to connect—not the hugest thing in your life, okay, but in littler things—in that connectedness, the sense of me and what I think and my views is gone, and compassion naturally is there.

Wow. That would be suffering. There's no more anger. There's no more judgment. There's not even that sense of me and you. It's not about what's best for me—it's what's best for us. And that just naturally comes about. Trying to think what to do in a situation, instead of me and everybody else, it's us. The "us" might be here in this room, here in the center, in the whole world.

It doesn't mean we know what's best for us, right? That's another piece. It doesn't mean we have all the information, and sometimes we'll never have all the information. And it may be that what we really clearly think is best for us, we're not actually able to put into effect.

Okay, then our job, our awareness, the wisdom is: can we keep coming from the compassion, the connectedness, rather than the frustration of all these incredibly dense people not seeing so clearly what's best for us and acting on it, by God.

How we speak, think, and act—mostly when we're not consciously choosing but simply letting whatever comes up arise—is the habits, the old habits we've been talking about. It's beautiful to see them transform. One of my favorite lines from the Buddha is: whatever one frequently thinks about, dwells upon, that will become the inclination of the mind. And without getting scared about it, just explore. What one frequently thinks about, dwells upon, that becomes the inclination of the mind.

A lot of what happens for many people in intensive meditation retreats is that we see, kind of like in neon lights, some of the habits of our mind—some of the not-so-lovely habits, but also some of the beautiful ones. Part of why people are really struggling, when it feels like you're up against the wall or moving through muck, is because habits we didn't even know were habits—they're so familiar, like an old glove—start to stand out in neon.

But seeing them is different from believing them and being them. That's the key. That's the transformation. How we meet what's currently arising in our mind—that's where wisdom and compassion are developing. Not by what's happening, but by how we meet it.

The habits of our mind become who we are, the intentions. I've been spending the last few years a lot of time in nursing homes, assisted living homes, hanging out with elderly men and women with dementia—really a lot of time. I won't say Alzheimer's, because sometimes that seems to eat at the brain and actually change the personality like a disease. But there's a different kind of dementia, which my mom has, where you're essentially the same person, but you're just not remembering so much. And the habits of mind are just so clear. I want to tell you, sometimes it's scary. They're just so clear.

My mother has become much more childlike and enjoying. We'll be on the way somewhere, like the doctor, and she won't remember where we're going or even why. When I remind her, she doesn't even remember that she's sick—unless she coughs. But on the way she'll stop and go, "Wow, those trees are so beautiful! I just love looking at those clouds." Fifty times on the way: "I just love looking at those clouds." And it's fresh. It's new.

There are other people—Ajahn Sumedho tells this story. He went to some nursing home in England and there was one old lady; the first thing she'd say is, "You're not getting my money." So sad. I mean, that's the reality. My mother, every time I go: "What can I do for you, honey?" That's her thing. It's both beautiful and scary to see.

What I really want to emphasize is that we may not even realize how much the habits of our mind are shifting simply through the moment-to-moment clear seeing of awareness. That's really extraordinary. We're just noticing what's happening, noticing what's happening, noticing what's happening. But in each moment that we notice what's happening, we're not feeding greed. We're not feeding aversion or ill will. We're actually strengthening connectedness, compassion.

In every moment of activity, we are committing to something—the question is, to what? It's not so much the object we're committing to, but the way, what's in the mind that's paying attention, what quality of mind is present in how we meet this moment.

Currently arising experience—say a moment of greed, a moment of love, some memory from the past, some fear—that's the result of previous action, previous karma. That's just what's happening. How we meet it in the moment is the present moment karma, which will create future results. This is why how we meet our joys and our demons in our life, in our meditation retreat here—that's why the difficult times are so important.

And it really doesn't matter the magnitude of the difficulty. Some people at times might have huge suffering, either in their external life or huge trauma coming up, or they're simply a kind of person whose nervous system is incredibly sensitive and it seems like massive suffering. Someone else might think, "Well, my suffering's nothing. My knee just hurts, or I'm feeling a little lonely." But it's not about comparing suffering or the quality or degree of it. All of our suffering, any of our suffering—it's good enough.

It's good enough to awaken with. It's good enough to meet with this openness of heart, of mind, this connectedness that is the response of compassion in the moment.

When we hate what's happening, when we push it away, that's the response of aversion. Okay, next moment—another chance to meet it with compassion. It doesn't matter.

If we just had retreats that go from good to better to best, pleasant to beautiful to sunny, light and bright and peaceful, and that's all that ever happened—it just wouldn't really do the job. But I somehow know, I've never met anyone for whom that's all that ever happened. Some people get more difficulty than others, but it doesn't matter. They still suffer. Don't worry—everybody's suffering. And we get just the suffering we need, you know?

When His Holiness the Dalai Lama talks about compassion, or bodhicitta, which is the ultimate compassion, the noble or awakened heart—the conscious motivation to practice, to awaken, in order to bring all beings to awakening. So our conscious motivation in meeting our knee pain, in meeting our loneliness, is to really meet it with compassion, not only for ourselves, but so that we can be of aid to all beings. It's vast.

But he says, how does this vastness of compassion develop? It starts with insight into what suffering is, what pain is, what sorrow is. And how do we get that insight? He says by focusing on, by meeting our own experience, by really opening to suffering in our own hearts, in our own minds. Where else are we going to learn it? And from that place—and again, this is still the Dalai Lama—that compassion then strengthens as we move into a sense of empathy, a sense of connectedness with all beings.

I love that in terms of meditation retreat, in terms of awareness in our life. Where do we start? We start where we are, right here. How do we start? Simply by meeting this moment with kind attention. Sharon Salzberg likes to say that to pay attention is to love. I really like that. You get the sense when you're suffering, if someone's just really there with you—kind, present, non-judging, not trying to fix, just really there with you while you talk or whatever you need to do. To me, that's a real experience of feeling loved, feeling received, feeling cared for. And in some ways, it's kind of rare sometimes.

So we start by bringing that to ourselves. To pay attention is to love. To love is to connect with, to accept, and from that the wisdom arises that moves into the ceaselessly responsive—whatever is appropriate. We just start simply in this moment right now.

Desmond Tutu, the archbishop from South Africa who won the Nobel Peace Prize, who was one of the instrumental people in organizing and carrying out the peace and reconciliation process after the end of apartheid—he was recently in Boston. I heard a little snippet of what he said on the radio this morning. He was facilitating a group of Israelis and Palestinians. But what I actually heard was a moment where he was taking questions from young women and men, late teenagers in Boston who were coming from schools in areas where there was a lot of violence, a lot of hatred.

One young man asked him, "Bishop Tutu, you say that we learn to hate. We're not born hating. It's not our natural state—we learn to hate. But I'm a student in this violent environment where there's so much hatred and so much fear. So how can we, in the midst of this culture, learn to love? How can we bring that to the culture?"

And Desmond Tutu said, with a great deal of emphasis, a great deal of passion—he said to him, "You can make a difference." He really emphasized it: "You, you, you." And you could tell he was pointing to all the people there. He said it so fervently: "One person can make a big difference. You start with you. Learn to love here and now."

Now this is me saying, so what we can do is you, you, me, start now. Learn to love—at least learn not to hate this present moment, whatever's arising. Beautiful, ugly, scary, boring, not what we need, crappy practice, whatever it is. Learn to love. How do we love? Simply by paying attention. Whatever it is.

This is from Pema Chödrön. She says, "How are we ever going to change anything? How is there going to be less aggression in the universe rather than more?" She says it starts by being willing to feel what we are going through. It starts with being willing to have a compassionate relationship with the parts of ourselves that we feel are not worthy of existing on this planet. If we are willing through meditation to be mindful not only of what feels comfortable, but also of what pain feels like—if we even aspire to stay awake and open to what we're feeling, to recognize and acknowledge it as best we can in each moment—then something begins to change.

Just even aspire. Don't even try to be successful. Just have the willingness, as someone said today, to be here.

And just today, it hit me really strongly. I think I was walking up here, walking somewhere. At the moment, my mother's really sick, and I have to go down there in a few days and go through some whole thing. It was just kind of weighing on me. As I was walking, I could feel that little bit of distance—I could name it, I could feel it, but there was just that little bit of separation. And in the noticing, boom, my attention just really dropped in. I quit trying to hold myself separate.

How many times has this happened in my life? A million, right? That I've been watching my mind and suddenly: Oh, right. As soon as you drop in, quit fighting, surrender, quit trying to figure out, just feel whatever it is—you don't have to know what it is—that's the place where compassion naturally arises. The sense of love, the sense of connectedness. Duh, you know? Holding away is separation. Feeling is connectedness. There's nothing else to do.

And also, I might say, the place of freedom. There's no more fear, no more problem. It's just this. I've experienced that a million times. The habit is still to push away. But oh, right—this is the place of freedom. Right here. The place of connectedness.

So really looking at how we meet what's arising, how do we meet the demons that are coming up in our own experience here? I want to read you a story from Milarepa that I like—which is why I'm using the word demon.

You know who Milarepa was, right? The incredible Tibetan yogi, one of the most famous, in his cave for years and years. A great poet. I'm going to condense this considerably.

He was in his cave, and his mind had become very blissful. He'd been there a long time, so he was really tripping out on his meditation. He went out to gather wood and carried some back up to his cave. When he got there, he found seven metal demons with bodies the size of thumbs and eyes the size of cups. Some were making fire. Some were bringing water. Some were grinding tsampa, barley flour. Some sat performing various magical tricks. Basically, they'd made themselves at home.

When Milarepa saw them, he became frightened. So he meditated on his deity. He uttered a subjugating mantra.

He performed a subjugating gaze. He did all the tricks he knew to make them go away. Then he meditated on compassion and friendliness. But he still could not pacify them.

I just love that, because that's the order, right? Do everything you can to make them go away. And then, "Oh yeah, compassion." But they still don't go.

So he thought, maybe these are local deities of the place. And I have been here for months and years, and I have not really praised them. So then he sang them a song of praise, basically saying, "Okay, okay, we can live here together." And at the end he said, "You non-human demons assembled here are obstacles. So drink this cup of friendliness and compassion and be gone."

And you know, three of them went away. Three of them went away. But he was still unable to make the other four go away.

So then he said, "Oh, I realize your magical obstacles." And he sang a song of confidence in his understanding and in the view. I'm skipping it because it's really long, but it's beautiful poetry of confidence in his understanding, in the view. He ends that with, "It's wonderful that you demons came today. You must come again tomorrow. From time to time, we should converse." So it's like, "Oh, okay."

Three of them vanish like a rainbow. The remaining one performed an imposing dance, and Mila thought, "This one is vicious and very powerful." So then he sang a song of the view, the pinnacle of his realization. He reached into his deepest realization, and this ends with, "A demon like you does not intimidate me. If a demon like you could intimidate me, the arising of the mind of compassion would be of little meaning. So Demon, if you were to stay here longer, that would be fine with me. If you have friends, bring them along. We'll talk out our differences. Ah, Ma, I feel compassion for this spirit."

And then he prays: "Lord Vajradhara, whose essence is Akshobhya, grant your blessings so that this lowly one"—meaning himself—"may have complete compassion."

Thus Mila sang. And with friendliness and compassion, and without concern for his body, Mila placed himself in the mouth of the demon. But the demon could not eat him, and so vanished like a rainbow.

Our steps of compassion. And when we really surrender, really surrender, we find the true compassion and the wisdom and the emptiness. But we can't fool it. We just can't fool it.

I want to come back again to the fact that in the way I'm talking about it, the heart of compassion, of connectedness, of mettā, is in the understanding, in the intention. It's interior, you could say—from the inside out. And for sure, there are many people doing wonderful things in the world, really wanting to help, and this is great. But mostly, if it's from the outside in, from an idea of what compassion is or what loving-kindness should be, it can still do good. I'm not saying that we have to wait until we're absolutely perfect Milarepa before we do anything. But if it's from the outside in, matching an idea, matching a view, for the most part it's not sustainable. And it's not really this depth of wholesomeness.

We all know about peace marches that turn violent, or people really doing active social service work, environmental work—really good stuff that is so difficult that it ends up getting fueled by anger, by despair. It starts to eat the person up from the inside. Not sustainable in that way. That's not complete enough. That's not really the compassion that's coming from the inside out.

I just love to hear about, read about, meet people that do seem to come from the inside out. It's incredibly inspiring. And you see, far from being passive or what we'd call a doormat, there's incredible courage. It doesn't mean they can necessarily fix everything. The Buddha couldn't fix everything.

But you really get a sense of the power of this coming from the inside out, that the wise motivation we can keep drawing from, this ceaseless response, is because it's fueled by really knowing in ourselves the wisdom of our basic goodness.

I see the difference in myself when I'm trying to be compassionate versus when it just naturally springs forth. It's a world of difference. The second one has nothing to do with me. It's just life responding to itself. The first one is all about me. And maybe I do something useful, but there's this tightness, this constraint. It's just very different, and it's not sustainable.

So I'll give some examples because I love them. One that's always deeply affected me is from Martin Luther King. At one point in reading a biography of him, he was talking about the bombing of the church in Birmingham where four little girls were killed—really, really an awful thing. His whole movement, the whole peace movement, was coming from the place of nonviolence. It wasn't just Dr. King. But one place he said, "No matter what people do, I refuse to let hatred become our motive. I refuse to become bitter." That just really touches me. I refuse to act from hatred. I refuse to become bitter.

And another place I read, still about Dr. King, was about this sense of not making someone the other. That's how we get into hatred. That's how we get into bitterness. He was on a plane, and there was a Justice Department lawyer—this was a time when the Justice Department wasn't being very supportive, just kind of trying to work a little in the background. At this point, one of Dr. King's main advisors was a lawyer from New York, a white lawyer who many years ago had some communist connections—you know, in the 50s he'd gone to some communist meetings or something. This was around the early 60s, when it was still a big thing if anyone had been a communist or ever shook hands with someone who was a communist. It wasn't that far from McCarthyism.

So this Justice Department lawyer spent the whole plane trip trying to urge Dr. King to abandon this friend who was also one of his advisors. He kept saying, "Look, this guy used to have communist connections. You shouldn't be seen with him. It's going to look bad for your movement." Dr. King was being very polite and listening and responding. And suddenly this Justice Department man got it. He said, "Oh, this man I'm talking to—Dr. King—he would never shun even the most hateful segregationist bomber. If that person came up to him and really said he wanted to meet him as another human being and shake his hand, Dr. King wouldn't put him out of his heart." That's not this guy's language, "out of his heart," but he wouldn't shun him. And the lawyer realized: never mind a friend. So Dr. King is being very friendly to me, but he's not about to make this friend the other because maybe he has some bad connection. He's not about making anyone the other.

Really, how can we do that if it doesn't come from deep within our own understanding, our own way of being? It can't just be an idea. How are we going to act when the chips are down?

Aung San Suu Kyi is another one like that. You know who she is, right? She was still under house arrest for the better part of eighteen years. I read once that she said when she first went back to Burma—she lived in England with her husband and kids—she first went back in 1988, not to be part of the democratic movement and the demonstrations that were happening. They weren't happening yet. She went back because her mother was really sick and dying, and she went to take care of her. So she just happened to be in Burma in '88 when the demonstrations and uprising happened, when the democratic demonstrations were so ruthlessly put down. Because her father had been a hero of independence in '48, '49, she became the figurehead—because of her own strength of heart.

But this is what she said: "I never had any idea to become the head of the democratic movement for Burma or any kind of icon to the Burmese people. I suppose people think I'm extraordinary because I'm so simple that they can't believe it. I have very ordinary attitudes towards life. If I think there's something I should do in the name of justice or in the name of love, then I'll do it."

The motivation is its own reward. Just that quality. Incredible courage, right? It's not about being a doormat at all.

I have friends who live across the street from Aung San Suu Kyi's house. So mostly for years, ever since I've been going to Burma, that road has been blocked off. But last year—now, forget about it—but last year there was a little short instant where it wasn't, and so they sneaked me into their house for tea. It was kind of cool, just to see, oh, Suu Kyi's over there. I mean, it was still guarded, and it's way in the background. But just seeing someplace gives you more sense of the reality.

And so just driving by her house, which you can't really see, but just down in there, I was talking to my friend Kinson and I thought, wow, just on a daily basis, what must her life be like? She's been locked up in this house with maybe one or two ladies to help cook for her and take care of her, no phone, no other contact, for years, all by herself. What would your days be like? What would your years be like? Her husband died. Her kids have grown up. What would it just be like on a day-to-day basis? What quality of sincerity, of wisdom and motivation, the willingness to keep coming from? And she does—every time anyone has a chance to speak with her, she keeps coming from clarity, wisdom, and compassion. She's never in any public way given into anger, bitterness, or just "get me out of here." Incredible power of heart and mind. And she said, if there's anything I think needs to be done in the name of love, in the name of justice, then I'll do it.

But in terms of actions in the world, it isn't easy. In terms of just being with ourselves, with the pain of ourselves, it isn't easy. For great karuṇā, for ourselves, for the world, it doesn't matter. And it really moves from self into the world. I know you must have experienced this. I have many times. Well, just like today, when I dropped into that sense of the sadness—the sadness of change and old age and suffering and illness. It stops being about me personally or this particular story. Not even thinking about it—it just becomes the pain of the world. In that moment, there really isn't a sense of differentiation or "why me" or "why my mother" or "why?" It's just like, oh yeah, this is part of life on this planet. And we feel really connected whenever I've been in a hospital or when I've had friends going through difficulty.

This might sound silly, but I'll say it anyway. It isn't personal. But someone was telling me once she was on retreat and she was doing eight precepts and really, really hungry at night. And at first she was having a lot of aversion, a lot of reaction to it. And then it kind of hit her. This might seem like a coddled American who's had everything, but it was very sincere. I thought it was very touching. She said, "I've spent so much time in India where there are so many people who are really starving. And I thought I was compassionate, but I never really let it in. I mean, we can't really know what it's like to be starving, but I never even could let it in what that might feel like. And when I just open to my little simple hunger pangs without it being all about me, it opens into the hunger in the world. I really get a sense—oh, there are people everywhere in the world going to bed hungry, and they don't have a choice."

We never know what way the connectedness takes us in, but really the sense of our dukkha stops being personal and it starts being that of all beings.

So whether it's for here, whether it's in the world, great compassion really needs to be balanced with wisdom, with equanimity—with the equanimity that first knows we can't control all the results. We can't. Like Martin Luther King or like Suu Kyi—how can we stay open? How can we keep connecting when the results not only don't turn out good, but sometimes turn out really bad? How do we not let bitterness become our motive? Moment to moment, moment to moment. Also knowing that we can act with really sincere compassion and, as I said before, not have the big picture, not be able to have the big picture, but still do what we need to do.

Sister Chan Khong, who is the nun who's a close colleague of Thich Nhat Hanh, talks about in her autobiography during the Vietnam War, when she was quite young then, and still quite a peace activist, a Buddhist activist.

And at one point she was thrown in jail, a South Vietnamese jail, for handing out peace pamphlets, something like that. She was in a big holding cell with maybe sixteen or twenty women of all ages. And she said in that cell there were two young girls, eleven, twelve years old, who had been swept up in one of the sweeps the South Vietnamese did of a village. "These are all Viet Cong," and they threw them in jail. They were just young girls in the wrong place at the wrong time—the wrong place being where they lived. They had done nothing, and they were in this bad environment with some hardened criminals.

Sister Chan Kong got released soon through connections; her family had connections. As she was leaving and having, I guess, an outtake interview with the head of the jail, she said to him, "Oh, by the way, there are these two young girls. They didn't do anything. It's really not good for them. Maybe you could let them out."

And he said, "Oh, so I see that the prisoners are talking to each other. I see that the prisoners are exchanging information. This is not okay. I'm going to really harden up the conditions here. Thank you for letting me know this."

How would you feel? How can we refuse to let bitterness become our motive? How can we keep going? And also, for me, I could imagine being a more passive type. I say, "Okay, that's the last time I ever try to do anything to help anybody. I'm just screwing it up worse." But that's also aversion, despair.

So that's our koan. I don't have the answer. But I do know: moment to moment, moment to moment, how am I meeting this moment? And when it all seems too big, when the vastness of suffering in the world seems too big—I know for me there are plenty of times when I just feel overwhelmed. Listening to the news, or it can be my own life, it can be pick your spot on the planet. Overwhelming. If I keep going into that, it is too much. The wisdom, the compassion isn't strong enough in that moment. But if I can just come back from ideas to meet the moment, then it's possible again.

One thing I want to offer, because it's been really interesting and helpful for me, is a practice that Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche mentions in his book Heart Treasure of the Enlightened Ones, which is a lot about Chenrezig, who in the Tibetan cosmology is the Buddha of compassion. He's talking about imagining that all phenomena are Chenrezig. He says when it's like this, you imagine in this sense all appearances, everything you see, all form is Chenrezig's body. All sounds, whether it's the sounds of animals or the wind or people or machinery, all sounds are Chenrezig's voice, the voice of the Buddha of compassion. All thoughts, all moods, all mental experiences are the blissful unity of compassion and emptiness. Everything is the manifestation of Chenrezig.

Play with that. I was playing with it once when I was on a self-retreat for a month, and it was... no, don't get too trippy about it. But just notice—I especially was doing it with thoughts and emotions. I thought, "Oh, that again." That's Chenrezig's emptiness and compassion. That's just Chenrezig manifesting. Somehow magically I didn't get all upset at it. "Oh, Chenrezig, emptiness and compassion just manifesting." Everything is of one taste, and the response of acceptance and compassion really came quite naturally. It's just a lovely shift, for me, on how I perceive all aspects of the universe. All sounds were Chenrezig's voice, so I didn't differentiate between the dogs, the motors, the sounds I like, the sounds I don't like. What is that? Oh, it's Chenrezig. Hard to get mad at Chenrezig. And it really was quite lovely in the effect that it had.

I just want to offer that.

And in terms, again, of this refusing to become bitter—the story of the Dalai Lama, an interview with him where he's talking about young Tibetan men. He was having a discussion with them, and they were basically saying, "Look, your way of working with the Chinese, with nonviolence—it isn't working. They're taking over Tibet, destroying our culture." The young saying to the old: "Old man, it isn't working. We need to do something else. We need a different procedure, a different way."

And in this interview, the Dalai Lama was weeping. He said, "You may be right. Maybe it isn't working. But I cannot be otherwise. I cannot."

So I just want to end with a line from Adyashanti:

Saving all beings is not something that you do. Saving all beings is a verb that you become. You become the saving of all beings. That's just what you are.

Emptiness and compassion working together.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 30

Habits of Mind

Carol Wilson · 57 min

> In this profound talk from the three-month retreat, Carol Wilson examines the habitual patterns of mind that perpetuate our suffering despite our sincere intentions to awaken. She illuminates how our conditioning drives us to seek pleasant experiences, avoid unpleasant ones, and construct everything around a sense of self—habits so deeply ingrained they feel natural and trustworthy.
>
> Drawing on teachings from Bhikkhu Bodhi, Ajahn Sumedho, and Sayadaw U Janaka, Carol explains how these mental habits operate beneath our awareness, coloring our experience before we even recognize what's happening. She references the Buddha's teaching on the luminous mind from the Aṅguttara Nikāya, noting that the mind's natural clarity is always present but obscured by our attachment to the afflictions that visit it. The practice isn't about making awareness purer—it's about learning to trust it over our habitual reactions.
> Carol offers a radical reframe: liberation isn't about changing experience or achieving special states, but about withdrawing identification from our reactive relationship to experience and resting in the knowing itself. She describes this as a 'Tai Chi move'—shifting from entrancement with objects to confidence in awareness, which she calls 'the point that includes.' Any moment of struggle becomes a doorway back to this recognition, and every appearance serves as a conduit to awakening when we simply notice: 'It's like this.'

The other day—or maybe it was only yesterday—I mentioned in the morning how it can be helpful just to take a moment to reflect, to connect with our deeper motivation, that faith which keeps us going.

This morning in the instructions, Guy also spoke about moment-to-moment intention, but in the questions I could hear it morph into the bigger sense of our motivation. So I want to begin by reminding us—mostly tonight I'm just talking about things we all know, reminding us of what we already understand—how this practice, both the external form and the internal work we're doing, goes against the stream of society. That's how it is now. That's how it was at the time of the Buddha. He said it himself. It's like swimming upstream against the normal flow of society.

If you've been here for six weeks, there's no question, but even if you've been here for one week, you know that there are times—sometimes fleeting, sometimes quite long—when you really need to be able to reconnect, to call on your motivation, to call on your faith. Our usual way of thinking, the way of being in the world that we've been taught from our culture—you can't always draw on that to keep doing what we're doing here.

As someone said today, practice is going fine, and then the mind says, "Okay, I'm out of here. Time to go to that beach. Time to do whatever." And the way we're brought up, the way we live, we believe all this stuff. The mind says something, and we go, "Yeah, that's right," and we do it. The next minute it says something else, and we think, "Oh, yeah, that's right too." We do that, and we wonder why we're crazy. But in the world, in the way of normal society, that's what we do. We just follow the habits of the mind.

In some ways, that's one of the great things about an intensive retreat structure like this—the fact that we're all here together. Other times, that's the hard thing. But at those moments when we really think, "What am I doing? It's so hard to just keep paying attention," we look around and there are all these people also doing it. We think, maybe I'm not completely insane.

That's externally. We find something to strengthen our faith, to strengthen our motivation. Whatever got us started in our practice in the beginning, whatever inspired us—it's called bright faith in the way the Burmese speak about it. Maybe someone you met really inspired you, or talked about the Dhamma, or inspired you in how they were. Maybe something you read. Whatever it was, it lights us up. It gives us energy. One of the definitions of faith, or saddhā, is confidence, willingness to do. That gets us here. It gets us started. Sometimes that's what we need to call on in the hard moments.

You might have a little short snippet of something you read—tiny, tiny, little short thing. Not books and books, not forty talks on one CD, but some little thing that inspires us. Bright faith. It reminds us. Or looking at the statue of the Buddha, or reflecting on people that we've known. I think the reason people talk about the Dalai Lama so much is because he's such an inspiring figure in that way. We need this.

We also need to be able to tune in internally to our deepest motivation, as I said the other morning, because external bright faith gets us going, but it doesn't keep us going through the most difficult times. Luckily, as we begin to have more experience for ourselves, the bright faith, the external inspiration, gets verified, doesn't it?

One of the wonderful things about the way wisdom arises in our mind through paying attention, through awareness—you only need one little short second of wisdom, of insight. That can balance weeks of slogging through. Thank goodness it doesn't have to be equal airtime, or we'd really be in trouble. You're going days and days and weeks, and then it's like, "Oh, I see. It's all empty. It's no problem." And it really is no problem.

So the big mystery, really—the big mystery of our life, of how our mind works, the habits of mind, the spiritual practice—to me the big mystery is this: why, when it's so clear there's no problem, when it's so clear that really nothing that's happening matters—you may not agree with me, but in those moments it's so clear it doesn't matter—why do we get sucked in again? Why? Two seconds after we see, "Wow, that's just craving, and the suffering is the craving," why do we turn around and go crazy because the last banana's gone?

Why? And we can watch the mind doing this and go, "But it's just craving. It shouldn't bother me. It shouldn't bother me, but..." We can't kid ourselves. Now it does bother me. And why does it bother me? That bothers me. And then we get spinning, spinning.

So this is the habits of our mind. And that's mostly what I want to speak about tonight.

The faith, reconnecting with our motivation—it's essential. It's inspiring. It takes us out of the known. It takes us out of the normal cultural world, what we've been used to. And that's really what the practice of awakening is: looking at our life, our minds, our bodies from a different perspective. And to do that, we need to create a little space.

But sincere motivation needs to be supported by discerning wisdom. Just the most sincere motivation in the world, the bright faith—it gets us going. But until we start to really have verified experiences, until we really start to see through things for ourselves, even for a second, then with the best will in the world, with the most sincere motivation—"I'm really here to wake up, to serve all beings," whatever—our motivation is very sincere, and we should honor that motivation. Yet it takes just a little turn of the mind for it to morph into, "Well, what am I getting from this retreat? What's this practice doing for me? How is my practice doing? How am I progressing compared to everyone else?" You know all the different ways of that. And it slips in so subtly that we don't really notice.

So without the discerning wisdom, we get caught—really, with the most sincere motivation—practicing for whatever reason we're practicing, but the attitude, the mind that's paying attention, is caught in the old habits. What we're doing is shifting our focus of interest, shifting what we trust.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama says, "The purpose of our spiritual practice is to fulfill our desire for happiness, for peace. We are all equal in wishing to be happy and to overcome our suffering. And I believe we all share the right to fulfill this aspiration."

So he uses the H word: happiness. That's a big word these days. I was in a bookstore a couple of weeks ago, just a regular bookstore, not spiritual, and I was looking at one of the tables where they lay out books to display. It wasn't even the spiritual table—just one of the tables in the middle of the store, many books. So I started counting. There were fourteen books with the word "happiness" in the title on this table. A couple of them were spiritual, but the rest weren't. Yes, we'd like to be happy. There's nothing wrong with wanting to be happy. As His Holiness says, that's normal motivation. The Buddha taught suffering and the end of suffering.

But without wise discernment, without understanding ourselves, the nature of happiness, the nature of suffering accurately, the choices we make—all too unfortunately, in our deep motivation for happiness—are not coming from wisdom. The motivation may be sincere, but without understanding ourselves and the world accurately, it doesn't work. Samsara doesn't work. That's why I think we're all sitting here. If it worked, we wouldn't have to do things like this. We could just follow our intuition, follow our basic instincts.

This practice goes against the stream—the stream of society, the stream of the habits of our mind, habits that are so familiar they feel natural, they feel appropriate, they feel trustworthy. So the real question, and what we're shifting in our practice, is: where do we place our trust? Where do we place our confidence moment to moment to moment?

One of the big places in normal life, in the stream of this culture anyway, is that we really trust our thoughts. Which on another level is laughable, having sat and looked at your thoughts—but we trust them. We trust our explanations of things. We trust our rationalizations of things, our descriptions of things. And when something happens and we can't explain it right away, we don't like that very much. Fear comes up.

So even if on an intellectual level we can all say we know our minds are crazy, we know thoughts aren't reliable, notice how often when you come into an interview or when you're spinning in some kind of struggle, it's because we're either believing in or reacting to our thought process. Our habits, our instincts aren't reliable, but it's hard for us to see it.

I read a review of a book called How Doctors Think, written by a doctor. It's really interesting because I don't think doctors think any differently from the rest of us—this just happens to be about doctors. The author says that only about twenty percent of misdiagnoses are accounted for by technical mistakes: machines, not reading handwriting correctly, things like that. By far the majority of misdiagnoses result from habits of mind that cause doctors to make snap judgments or to overlook alternative possibilities. And remember, this isn't just doctors, right? It's all of us.

He gives a couple of examples. The author's own son almost died at nine months old from an intestinal obstruction because the pediatrician, since these were first-time parents, just assumed they were overreacting to a normal virus. The doctor didn't really look carefully, and the baby almost died. Or other times, when a doctor makes a diagnosis and then sends the patient to specialists, because of that first diagnosis, the specialists by far start by already thinking it's that. They're much more likely to confirm than to actually look fresh and see whether it's that or not.

Does that sound familiar? "I already know what this is. I labeled this yesterday. I don't have to look at it again. This is what fear is like, now and always."

Also, diagnoses may be wrong because the doctor stereotypes, paying more attention to the patient's age or race or living habits. I've read a lot about how women's heart attacks are much more frequently missed than men's by doctors, because the assumption is that men have heart attacks more frequently than women. And it isn't really true. Or emotions interfere. A doctor may like a patient too much to consider a worst-case scenario. Or they may not like the patient, and so they don't listen to important complaints. "Just a whiner—I'm not going to really pay attention."

You can see how our minds can do that with ourselves, right? I don't need to draw the obvious parallels anymore.

This is really the power of moment-to-moment mindfulness: this willingness to just meet freshly, without bringing the whole baggage of all our preconceptions. Okay, that's the idea. Simple, but not easy. We don't even know what preconceptions are there half the time. We think we're meeting something freshly, just like the doctors.

This is from Sayadaw U Janaka: "We practice vipassana in order to live in happiness, to be free from suffering. Our suffering arises due to our suffering mental states. And these arise due to our belief in personality view, sakkāya-diṭṭhi. And sakkāya-diṭṭhi, personality view, arises due to our incorrect understanding of the nature of mental and physical experience."

So it just keeps coming down very simply to the nature of this moment-to-moment mental and physical experience. Going against the stream in that we don't even recognize a lot of the time what we already think we know. And so we're looking through that veil. We're not meeting mental experience, physical experience, freshly.

And in our motivation, our real wanting to be happy, we assess, we make choices for our happiness based on misunderstanding what happiness is, what can make us happy—what even we are, never mind what can make us happy. Based on these really deeply inlaid habits of mind.

I just heard on public radio yesterday that it's the ninetieth anniversary of the revolution in Russia in 1917. They were interviewing people on the street and saying how the last decade or so in Russia has been so chaotic that some people are yearning for, have a kind of nostalgia for, the stability of the Stalinist era.

Even though it's known now—it's not a secret anymore—that some twenty million Russians were killed in the gulag. That's not a secret anymore. So this one woman they were talking to on the street said, "Yeah, people say he murdered half of Russia, but still, he had a unique personality." There are not many people like him. You have to be someone special to be able to have all that power in your hands. And this was said in an admiring kind of way.

We think we know what will make us happy. It's chaotic? Okay, I love stability. Take it from Russia to sitting here on the pillow, but you get the drift. It's chaotic. If I could just have everything stay the same for a while, then I'd be happy. Then I'd see how things are. So get rid of all this stuff. We think we know. We don't have a clue.

Bhikkhu Bodhi—do you know who he is? He's an American man, actually from Brooklyn, who has been an ordained bhikkhu in the Theravada tradition for many, many years. He lived in Sri Lanka. Now he lives in the States. He is one of the foremost translators from the Pali into English of the Buddhist scriptures—really extremely learned. He's also very humble, a truly wonderful person.

So he writes this: "Remember that the Buddha's teaching goes against the current of one's habitual assumptions and attitudes. After all, most of our habits revolve around the desire to enjoy pleasure, to avoid pain, and to preserve the illusion that the universe centers around our individual self."

I want to repeat that. See if you can recognize anything here. Most of our habits—the habits of our mind, and these are the habits that drive our choices, more than our choices, our assumptions about what will make us happy—the desire to enjoy pleasure, to avoid pain, and to preserve the illusion that the universe centers around our individual self.

He continues: "When one's personal experience of suffering becomes vivid enough, then it will induce one to become disillusioned or disenchanted with these habits and to begin to place our trust in something else."

He says in the Buddhist discourses on reality—I think what we start in this practice to see and place our trust in is mindfulness, awareness, consciousness itself, rather than placing our trust in pleasure making us happy, displeasure causing our suffering. Rather than placing our trust in everything centering around me, me, me. We don't even know half the time that that's what the mind is doing.

I read this on the back of The Inquiring Mind from Francisco Varela, the scientist: "The purpose of calming the mind in Buddhism is not so much to become absorbed, but to render the mind able to be present with itself long enough to gain insight into its own nature and functioning."

That's exactly what we're doing here. Just allowing the mind to quiet enough to turn around and look at itself, to see what is the nature of mind and how does it function. And to do that, moment by moment, we have to be able, just for a moment, to put down our preconceptions, to put down our ideas about what makes us happy, our preferences, and just meet this arising experience as it is, trusting that insight, understanding, discriminating wisdom is a natural function of moment-to-moment awareness.

Do we trust that? Sometimes, maybe. But a lot of times, what are we putting our trust in? These habits. They're so ingrained. They're so deep in our life. That's what the Buddha saw when he woke up—that everyone wants to be happy and keeps doing, in their effort to be happy, just the thing that makes them keep on suffering.

We see something isn't working in our daily life, so here we are, really sincerely. But until we recognize that these habits are the lens through which we're experiencing moment-to-moment reality and making choices—until we start to see that—we come here and bring the same habits to a meditation retreat that we bring to how we live our life. Meditation technique is a learned activity.

Even when we say sit down, just be aware of whatever's happening by itself, there's still a sense we're doing something. You're sitting down. You're shutting up. You're turning your attention inside, hopefully noticing once in a while what comes and goes. Already that's some direction, that's some activity.

And so how are we going to approach any new activity when we're not in the freshness of awareness? With the same old habits. We approach it, we put forth effort in order to achieve a result that is pleasant. I mean, how many of you here are really working with virya in order to experience more unpleasant? Do you think of waking up as including unpleasant experience?

When you really look at it deeply, what's in our mind—isn't there somehow a bias that the more we wake up, the more pleasant everything's going to be? The ending of suffering somehow has a connotation of pleasant. Somehow, even though there's pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral, all that unpleasant is just going to fall away, and it's all going to be nice, floating on clouds.

I know, it sounds exotic, but just watch next time you're having a little hissy fit about what's happening in your practice, and see if you're having a problem because it's pleasant. Probably not.

So the effort is usually for some result—because that's what we've learned—usually pleasant. And in any way, it's somehow going to confirm me, a sense of how I can assess myself. It fulfills me. It confirms me. It gives me a sense that I'm getting somewhere, that I'm more empty than I was when I started this retreat. That sense of it's all about me.

And then we trust our thoughts so much. When you sit there and start thinking, "Well, if it's not all about me and there isn't any me, how am I going to do it?" And why do we get so caught in that? Because what's getting stronger? The more we think about that, the sense of me, me, me. I'm losing me. Oh, my God.

So that's our habit. That's what we know. We'll bring the same thing to the meditation, and that's how we get into the striving. It doesn't have to be this way. I'm not saying this is what's going to happen and there's no way out of it. I'm just pointing it out so that we can begin to notice when there's this sense of looking ahead, when there's this sense of striving, when there's a sense of somehow it isn't going right. "I thought I would be further along by now." To see that—oh, what habit's driving the bus right now? It's all about me. It should be more pleasant.

Instead of looking into the experience, instead of trusting in that moment, we're trying to organize and manipulate and arrange experience to meet some cockamamie idea we have that we heard or we read or we made up. Instead of turning around and saying, just trust in this moment, only for this moment, the awareness. The simplicity of just the awareness of knowing in this moment. Hearing, seeing, smelling, tasting, sensing with the body, sensing with the mind. And it doesn't matter what. It really doesn't matter what.

Ajahn Sumedho calls awareness the point that includes. Really trusting that awareness in one moment—not extended in time as some thing existing, but just in the moment—that moment of pure awareness, the consciousness aware of what's happening without the coloring of wanting or aversion or me, me, me. Just this sensation. Just this hearing. Just this pleasant. Just this unpleasant. Moment after moment after moment. That continuity. It's a very different possibility. And it's so subtle.

Always accessible. So familiar. Even more familiar, if possible, than the habits of wanting and aversion and "it's all about me." But completely intangible—nothing you can really point to or hold on to. Just this. Oh, this.

The practice is really about turning our interest, our trust, our love, our confidence—whatever word works for you, devotion—away from whatever experience or object is arising. You know it's there, but it's going to come, it's going to go. No matter how fantastic or horrible, it's going to come, it's going to go. And when it's gone, it's gone like it never existed. I don't care how incredible an experience we have. I don't care how horrible and fearful it is. It's going to go, and it'll be really gone. It'll be like it never existed.

You know, when you think about it, just get that taste. It happens more as we get older, so maybe you younger people don't have the feeling yet, although it's true for all of us. I see it with my mother; I see it more with me now. All the stuff that happened in my whole life—it's nothing but a thought. It's just nothing. I couldn't tell you if I feel fifty-six or two. I mean, I know how old I am intellectually, but how do I feel? It doesn't really matter. It's just a concept, because it's only now.

And when there's that freedom of only now, we don't have to cling on so much for dear life to what's arising, physical or mental. It's just—ah—awareness, experience in the knowing of it, hearing in the knowing of it, thinking in the knowing of it. And we can come to trust, to have confidence, to love the knowing of it. That's really the shift that this whole practice is about.

And in those moments—those moments like I said in the beginning—when it's really so clear, there's no problem. Sometimes we think there's no problem because we've hit into a really pleasant, lovely state, but that's a problem because it goes and then we see it's a problem. But the kind of no problem where there's nothing special happening, just no clinging, no aversion, it's not me-centric—it's just this thing, nothing special, always available. Those moments are really the heart of this practice.

We lose it. We get caught up again. We get focused back into experience, into manipulating experience, into trying to. And those are the habits that Bhikkhu Bodhi talks about. Fascinating. Fascinating how we keep getting sucked back in. And if we can bring interest to that rather than incredible frustration and dismay, it's helpful. If you can just see—it's fascinating.

It continues to be fascinating to me that I really, on some level, sometimes really get it: nothing that I can experience is going to make me ultimately happy. It never has. It won't last. It really doesn't matter. I know that. And sometimes I really know that. And then I turn around—my thinking knows it, but that's basically useless—and it's like, no, I've got to have this. This headache has to go away and then I'll be happy. And all the resistance and all the wanting and all the sense of struggle.

What's happening? Oh, just this. Just as it is. Because it's not about the experience. Oh, yes—awareness. It's like this. The point that includes. Awareness can be aware with anything. So our practice comes to be more noticing the awareness than the knowing. Noticing when we're not noticing it. Noticing what experiences or thoughts or actions we somehow place outside.

Awareness can't be present if this is happening—we all do it. And then at some point, we struggle. You struggle for an hour. You struggle for a day. You struggle for three days. And something in the mind lets go: "All right, this is just this. That's okay." All the clinging went away. We took confidence again in the awareness.

It's just like a Tai Chi move, you know. When we're caught in relationship to experience—this should be different, this should be better, this should last, this should go away, this means this about me—and that's the big one. When we're caught in that, it's endless struggle. Like trying to rearrange the furniture in prison and not seeing that the door's always open.

But we don't have to change anything. We don't have to change anything. You don't have to be a better person, a different person, have a better personality or a different personality. You don't have to have better concentration. You don't have to walk slower or faster. You do have to be interested. But the awareness is not some special thing that some people have—an awareness power, you know. It's just the nature of how the mind works.

The Tai Chi move is withdrawing the identification, the entrancement with our reaction to what's happening, and just noticing the knowing. Just noticing the knowing. There's nothing you can judge that by. There's nothing you can confirm yourself by. But when there's that withdrawing of relational reaction to experience, that movement into the knowing—just like that, it's completely different.

It's like the Buddha when he woke up. As far as we can tell, he woke up into the same world, didn't he? It's not the world that changed. He's still in a body, still had a mind. He got headaches. He had backaches. He ate bad food, whatever. What changes is the relation. The happiness isn't about getting better experience. It's about the understanding of the nature of mind and body—the coming, the going. It's not about me. It's not that we just get pleasant. It's not that the suffering is the unpleasant. The waking up is that knowing, knowing, knowing, knowing.

When we talk about emptiness, it's not that there's nothing. It's just that there's no solid, permanent, lasting entity in anything. But everything's still here. It's just that we withdraw our tenacious hold, our relational reactivity, our entrancement with experience and our reactions to experience, our entrancement with what everything means about me or to me.

And if you think I'm exaggerating, just notice as you go through the days—with humor. It helps. Humor helps. Notice how almost everything that happens, how quickly does the mind get it back to what it means to me? Just somebody walks through the dining room on the other side. How quick does that have something to say about me? "Oh, look how they're walking. They look pretty mindful. I'm not as mindful as they are." Or, "That's the person who was breathing loudly this morning. They really bugged me, but I'm so equanimous, it doesn't matter." It doesn't take any time. Somebody puts food on their plate—immediately, how does that relate to me?

Just notice this. And notice the difference when you're caught in "I'm really such a lousy meditator."

Oh, awareness of judging. You don't have to get rid of anything. Awareness doesn't care. I love the way Sayadaw U Tejaniya talks about it. He says, "You know, it's like this." It's like this. So judging feels like this. "I really am so caught up and frustrated" — this is like this. Sleepiness is impossible to meditate with — sleepiness is like this. There's nothing that needs to be different. Awareness can be aware of anything. Anything.

I don't know if you can get a sense of how truly liberating that is. The thing is, we have to be interested enough. It's not like, "Okay, two moments a day I'll be aware and just have that freedom, and the rest of the time I'll just run around seeking pleasure and avoiding the unpleasant." That strengthens that habit. So what we're doing with this austere structure here is to support our moving into noticing the knowing — just to support that.

If we're willing to have the steadiness through the day, not of striving to make something different, it's really liberating. Oh, all I have to do is just notice what's happening all day. And whatever's happening, we can notice it. Doesn't that feel much more relaxing than "I somehow have to twist and turn my experience and get it like this, and then I can notice it, and then I can feel like I'm getting somewhere in meditation"? Oh my God, that's exhausting.

Someone was just saying to me today how they'd had a day or two where it was just this sense of things happening and the knowing of it, and there wasn't much reactivity or aversion in the mind. And suddenly, when they woke up in the morning, unusually there wasn't tiredness. There was just this brightness, this clarity in the mind, because there's no struggle anymore. All the energy that goes into our running after the pleasant and avoiding the unpleasant and constructing the whole world every moment — making a new construction of the world about me and then reacting to it — it's exhausting. Just think, we don't have to do it.

And you don't even have to get rid of that either. Just shift from our entrancement to the knowing. And then when we're not noticing that again, we'll know, because we're struggling again. Oh, struggle — it's like this. It's just all day long. And it's really a whole different possibility.

So in that way, any appearance, any object, serves as a conduit back to awareness, back to knowing. There's nothing that's a distraction. There's nothing that needs to be a problem. Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral — a problem is just another word for struggle, and struggle? Oh, struggle's like this. Really, in the times when I'm knowing that, it's so free, so lovely. And you're just the same old person. You don't get a new personality, but you don't care anymore. Other people may care, but that's their problem.

But I do want to emphasize — I know Guy spoke about right attitude the first night, and that's the point. This love of awareness, confidence in awareness — it's really the quality of knowing that is, you might say, the pure mind, the luminous mind. That's the sutta of the Buddha. I'll read it in a minute. It's awareness that is not colored by wanting, by aversion, or by confusion. There could be other beautiful qualities present. There can be calm, compassion, wisdom, rapture, interest, investigation. It's not like there's nothing there. But it won't be colored by these afflictive torments of the mind, which keep us from recognizing nāma-rūpa — mind and matter — accurately, and which keep us spinning in this confusion.

I just want to read this. I'm sure most of you are familiar with it, but it's really just about the shift. From the Buddha: "Luminous is this mind, brightly shining, but it is colored by the attachments that visit it."

This unlearned people do not really understand, and so do not cultivate the mind. We don't understand, we don't recognize the pure, luminous, empty quality of knowing that is the mind. We get entranced by the attachments, by the kilesas, by the wanting, and that's what we spend our life and our time in relationship to. That's what unlearned people don't understand.

"Luminous is this mind, brightly shining, and it is free of the attachments that visit it. This the noble follower of the way really understands, and so for them there is cultivation of the mind."

That's what we're doing—cultivating. When we say cultivation of the mind, it's not that we're making the mind better. The mind is always—that moment of awareness is always luminous and pure. The attachments, the greed, the aversion, the kilesas that come, they come and go. When we're entranced by them, we just don't notice the luminous, pure quality. But even when the attachments are there, it's not that they can ever really stain or affect the luminous pure quality.

When we know that, when we have just a moment of insight, we realize, "Oh, right—just knowing is like this." That touches us so deeply because we recognize that's really how it is. And it's like that in any moment. We just forget.

So when the Buddha talks about cultivation of the mind for the noble follower of the way, it doesn't mean somehow we can control and make that moment of knowing, that moment of awareness, somehow more pure. It's that we learn to have confidence in that more. And we feed the wanting, we feed the attachment less and less and less. Any moment when we're going, "I've got to have this, I need this," there's so much suffering. Then—"Oh, it's like this." That's a movement from feeding the attachment to confidence in awareness. In that moment, we're no longer feeding the kilesa. That's cultivation of the mind.

It's not in our power to make awareness any clearer, any better. It doesn't need to be. We just learn to recognize more and more frequently and to trust that—to trust that over our assessments and our evaluations and our judgments and our ideas about ourselves. To trust that over our deeply rooted sense that somehow if it's unpleasant, something's wrong and I've got to fix it. "Can't possibly be free with this going on." Oh, it's like this.

Even when I say that, probably in the back of your mind you're going, "Yeah, yeah, right, easy for you to say." But when it's really difficult, where do we place our trust? And it's not something we can just have an idea about. It's a deeply experiential thing that cuts underneath these habits of mind over and over and over.

So how do we get so tricked back? There are lots of ways. I just want to highlight something that Guy spoke about in the instructions today.

This sense of vedana, this quality, this feeling quality where the mind experiences a sound, a sight, a smell, a taste, a thought, a sensation—experiences it as being pleasant or unpleasant or neutral. That's not something inherent in the experience. That's how it's experienced in the mind in that moment. The so-called same experience, the sound, you could experience it as pleasant one moment, neutral another moment, unpleasant another moment.

Because we so often don't notice this—and this is one of the subtle experiences that happens almost every moment, it's happening a lot—it's so quick and fast that we often don't even recognize, "Oh, the pleasant or unpleasant is happening." Right away, the thoughts go into "pleasant is good, this is what should be happening," or "unpleasant is bad, this shouldn't be happening." And that happens so quickly.

There's an unpleasant sensation. You don't even recognize it as such. The mind goes, "This is pain. Something's wrong with my knee. What's going to happen? There's five more weeks." And in no time, you're in the hospital. That's gone so far, so fast.

Mingyur Rinpoche has a great way of describing this.

We get into so much pain and confusion by letting ourselves get lost in the thoughts of whatever happens. You project a thought, then a second thought believes the first thought. Then the third, fourth, and fifth thoughts are projected. And by this time, the first thought has become absolute reality. By the time the tenth thought comes—and that's about this much time—it believes that the fifth has always been so. Explore that. And then we're just running on that. No wonder we don't have a clue what's going on half the time.

So this is one way we get tricked with this pleasant-unpleasant-neutral. As the Buddha said, for the noble follower of the way, there is cultivation of the mind. One of the ways we cultivate is by what we're doing here—just our interest, this quality of quieting the mind just enough, as Francisco Varela said, to look and see how it works. Notice, without judgment, out of interest. Notice, as Ajahn Buddhadasa said, how much of what you do is for the sake of pleasant feeling. And notice how long pleasant feeling actually lasts. A feeling, a vedana—like that, like that, like that. It's so quick. But just keep noticing how much of what we do is in thrall to trying to get more pleasant or to get away from unpleasant. Unpleasant also—like that, like that.

Neutral? Well, we think we want calm. People think they want calm. I can't tell you how often people come in and really see—and it's often quite a surprise—it's calm, what's wrong? It's calm, I'm bored. It's calm, what's going to happen to me? It's calm, I've got to do something. And in fact, often people see—I've seen it myself—that the mind will just start creating all kinds of suffering scenarios rather than stay with calm. Neutral? I'm out of here. Back to basic instinct again.

But this is, again, where our practice, our understanding of how things really are, the true source of happiness, runs counter—running against the stream of the world again. This sense of going after pleasant, avoiding unpleasant, it's all about me. On some very basic level we trust it—not reliably, but we trust it. It sort of holds our world together. This is what makes sense to us. This is how we've lived our lives. I mean, when people are really in a suffering state and you talk to them and say, "Oh, great, just notice it's unpleasant"—most people don't respond with, "Oh, thank you so much! That really helped. That's what I came here for."

It holds our world together. And in fact, the Buddha said in his sutta about the two darts that when a normal, unawakened person experiences an unpleasant feeling, an unpleasant vedana, the only escape they know from unpleasant feeling is to lust after sense pleasure. And so when there's unpleasant, we pull away. He says it's as if we're hit with a dart and then we hit ourselves with a second dart. This is unpleasant and this is really bad. I don't like it. I've got to do something. We shoot ourselves with a second arrow.

So we have the habit in our mind of pulling away, of resisting and resenting unpleasant. And then—to me, this is so poignant because it really resonates as true—the only escape normal, regular people know from unpleasant is to go and get some pleasant sense experience. So that's life: running between avoiding the unpleasant and going to get something pleasant. Food, sex, relationships, sleep. Sleep's a big one—a big pleasant experience here especially, right? Food is limited, sex is out, but sleep...

I think it takes a lot of vision, a lot of faith, a lot of courage to step out of that way of being. And I feel so personally fortunate, so grateful every day to know that there's a path, to know that there's another way of being, to know that this isn't the end.

Because really, imagine before you knew there was a path of awakening, and all you knew was to get more pleasant. That's how samsara doesn't work. Because sooner or later, it doesn't work. But if that was all there was, how sad would that be?

So here we are. We get lost often in thinking it's only about getting pleasant, only about feeling good, only about what confirms me. But then again, we remember: no, I can turn around again and notice the knowing.

If you went out on the street and said to someone, "Do you know what would be really freeing? If you just noticed the knowing of your footsteps"—I don't think they'd be convinced. But actually, it's incredibly radical. It's freeing. It's available every moment with every experience possible. There's nothing that awareness can't be with.

Ajahn Sumedho says it's the point that includes. And we simply recognize it by, in a moment, letting go of our entrancements and our absorptions with experience, with objects, with our likes and our dislikes.

I want to end with reading something from Ajahn Sumedho to that effect. He's talking about patience and non-clinging:

Buddha wisdom is just this much: knowing the conditioned as the conditioned, the unconditioned as the unconditioned. Buddhas are no longer deluded by any conditions, and so they incline to the spaciousness, the emptiness, rather than towards the changing conditions within the space. In your meditation now, as you incline towards the emptiness, the space—I would just say the knowing—your habitual grasping, fascination, revulsions, fears, doubts, and worries about the conditions begins to lessen. You begin to recognize them as just things that come and go. They're not self. They're nothing to get excited about or depressed about. They just are as they are. We can allow conditions to be just as they are because they come and go. Their nature is to go away, so we don't have to make them go away. And in this way, we naturally liberate ourselves from the struggle, the strife, and the confusion of the ignorant mind that has to spend all its time evaluating and discriminating, trying to hold on to something, trying to get rid of something. It means that we exist peacefully rather than complaining, rebelling, and causing more friction and confusion and adding to the confusion through believing in our own confusion.

We recognize the space just by not clinging to the objects and the reactions to the objects in our experience.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

Nisargadatta Maharaj said that habit and passion blind and mislead. Compassionate awareness heals and redeems.

CHAPTER 31

Nature of Insight

Carol Wilson · 1h04

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson examines the fundamental nature of insight (paññā) and how it differs from conceptual understanding. Using the vivid analogy of Magic Eye images, she illustrates that insight is not something created through willpower but rather a spontaneous shift in perception that occurs when the mind is free from clinging. The moment of insight itself is brief, yet its effect on our understanding is lasting—we can never return to our previous limited view.
>
> Wilson draws from the Udāna to show how the Buddha skillfully prepared Suppabuddha's mind for awakening through progressive teachings on generosity (dāna), virtue (sīla), and the drawbacks of sense pleasures before revealing the Four Noble Truths. This demonstrates that moment-to-moment mindfulness, while essential, is not the only support for wisdom. When meditation becomes self-obsessed or contracted, we can call upon other practices to brighten and open the mind: the brahmavihāras (loving-kindness, compassion, appreciative joy, equanimity), generosity, ethical conduct, bodhicitta, and gratitude.
> The practical implications are profound: insight can arise with any experience, not just in subtle meditative states. A woman standing with restlessness discovers freedom not by changing her situation but by seeing 'uncomfortable sensation' and 'aversion' clearly. Wilson emphasizes recognizing wholesome states of mind as readily as unwholesome ones, and offers gratitude practice as a powerful way to shift from contraction to openness when we feel stuck in self-referential suffering.

After Joseph's beautiful talk last night about cultivating the wisdom, the perception, insight into impermanence, I wanted to talk a little tonight about the nature of insight, of wisdom. What is it? How does it arise? What supports its arising?

This is insight meditation, so what do we mean by insight? Insight is really an aspect of wisdom, *paññ*a, a mental factor that comes and goes in the mind stream like any other mental factor. It's not something we can create by willpower. I don't know if you believe that yet, but it's true.

So what actually is an insight? Is it something created new, some new thing or way of being that suddenly comes into existence that hasn't been here before? Are we now somehow different and new, or is the world different and new? Is it some new way of thinking about things? Does the situation change? No to any of that.

Remember the quotation Joseph read where the Buddha said that the perception of impermanence, the perception of anicca, leads to the ending of the conceit of self. That's really what insight is. It's a shift of perception. We experience it not as a thought. Insight is basically not thought. It's a kind of aha. Something in the mind shifts and we perceive a particular situation in a new way, from another angle. Has everything changed, or is it just that our view has changed? Really, something in the mind lets go and we're able to see in a new way.

In speaking of the Eightfold Path beginning with right view, sometimes I think that's actually quite literal. Right view: accurate perception, accurately seeing ourselves and the world as it is. It's not thinking. Of course we'll think about it—thinking will come—but that's usually after.

The example I always use, because for me it really works well, of what I mean by this, what insight really is, is those magic eye graphics. You know what I mean. They used to have books and books of them, where you look and it's just little graphic designs. There's nothing, no picture that you can tell what it is. And there's a whole way of looking at it. When you look, it's just red and green, little designs. If you look in the right way—and the right way happens to be steadily, without looking away, but relaxed, unfocused—suddenly out pops some other literal design, like a spaceship or dinosaurs or whatever.

Now, if you go to that and you haven't seen it before and you say, "I know there's dinosaurs, I'm looking for dinosaurs," you won't see it. And some people never really get the knack. But once you've done it once or twice, you see: the steady, steady way of looking, unfocused, relaxed, and boom, out pops the thing. And it doesn't last, does it? It goes back and you see it the other way again. But having had that shift of perception, you know that that's possible. You know that there's both ways of looking at that particular experience.

Once you learn how to do it and you practice, you go through the whole book—oh, this is a dinosaur, this is a spaceship—but you learn how to do it. The first time is amazing. Wow. By the end of it, it's like, oh yeah, well, that's how it is. You don't have to think about it anymore. It's made a shift in your mind stream, a shift in your understanding.

Even though the seeing of the dinosaurs doesn't stay, the knowing that it's that way—the first time it's amazing, but then it starts to have an effect on your mind stream. Until it's just our whole view, our whole understanding that we didn't even know we were clinging to has changed, and we know there's something else in that. And it's no big deal. You don't have to have an argument with someone about it. You can't show anyone else. But if someone came up to you and said, "No, that's not true," you don't have to get all upset. You're not defending a view. You just know: oh, well, it is.

I'm sorry you can't see it. There's nothing to get upset about.

So that really, to me, works very well with insight—whether it's insight into impermanence, into not-self, whether it's insight into a particular problem, a personality problem, a mathematical problem (not that I know anything about that), or a scientific problem. Something lets go that we didn't know we were holding to. It's like, "this is right," and we don't even know—then suddenly we see it from another angle. That's just a quick aha moment.

And as I was saying, the moment itself doesn't last but a second. I don't know, maybe it's longer than a yoctosecond or whatever it is—it's a little more measurable—but it doesn't last very long. Yet the time is irrelevant. It has an effect on our understanding, on our mind stream. Something has changed. We're never quite so fixed. Yet we can't hold on to that moment of insight, that sense of "ah, it's really different." We try.

First there's just a thought, because for most of us—maybe not everyone—but for most of us, thinking is how we process things. It comes secondary, but it's how we think we're understanding something, or holding on. "Oh yeah, I really do see something. That emotion wasn't here before, and now it's here, and it'll go away. I really do get it that it's all impermanent." But that thought isn't really carrying anything. It's describing, but it's not carrying the freshness of the insight.

You'll notice the first one or two thoughts are kind of "oh, that's interesting," and then it goes on and on. That's when you cut it. Two thoughts is enough. Just go back to what's happening in this next moment. But we say, "No, let me feel that again. It is impermanent. It is impermanent. I'm really seeing impermanence everywhere." And it's long gone. It's just become a concept again.

But the moment of insight—and this is what's really interesting—can happen with any kind of experience. It doesn't have to only be in some really deep, subtle state. It's just that shift of perception. It's about the quality of the mind at that moment, not about the quality of the experience itself.

Here's an example—this is one any of you could have said. Someone told me this at a retreat a few years ago. She was having a very uncomfortable sitting, a lot of restlessness. Not dying pain, but restlessness, really uncomfortable, couldn't sit still. So she stood up to just stand and be with standing. Well, standing, she was still really restless, uncomfortable. And of course, standing, you're one step closer to being able to walk and just walk right out of the hall. So she was standing there thinking, "This is really stupid. I should just leave and fix it." The problem is this restlessness, this uncomfortableness. Fixing it would be to just get the heck out of here. Of course, she was at the back of the hall, and it was a crowded hall and hard to get out—that probably had something to do with why she didn't leave.

But anyway, as she stood there, just kept noticing, she suddenly became aware—and it was very profound for her. How did she say it? "Oh, it's just uncomfortable sensation. That's what's happening. An aversion in the mind." But really seeing: uncomfortable sensation and aversion, and that's all it is. It's really not a problem.

In seeing the uncomfortable instead of the whole story about "I have to do something, this can't be borne," in seeing aversion where aversion simply becomes another arising mental experience at that point—oh, no problem. And it was really very profound for her, seeing that the freedom, the ease, the peace wasn't about getting rid of the situation.

I mean, that's what we've been talking about the whole time. That's what we each know. But when we have an experience like that for ourselves, it really deepens our insight.

That's a moment of wisdom. And it really deepens our faith, our trust. Oh, yeah. That really is true. This really might be a way. And it's very different from someone telling us, from thinking about it. That awakening can happen in any moment, with any experience. It's not about getting a better experience to have a better insight.

So that's where I want to go with this—talking about what supports, what enables this shift of perception, this non-will-powered suddenly letting go of the beliefs, the ideas, the viewpoints we're holding to that we don't even know we're holding. When the Buddha talked about the perception of impermanence, it's not that we're consciously going around saying, "I perceive permanence, I want to perceive permanence." We don't even think in those terms. Unconsciously, we're perceiving permanence and not even knowing it—the assumption of permanence.

When insight arises, when wisdom, paññā, arises in the mind, it arises because in that moment the quality of mind, of heart, of consciousness—these are all kind of the same thing—is in a state of openness, of non-clinging. It's interesting when the Buddha said the supreme state of sublime peace has been discovered by the Tathāgata, namely, liberation through non-clinging. Liberation through non-clinging could be thought of or seen as the end of our path. In a way, that's the experience of the Arahat. But it's not only the end of the path. It's the moment-to-moment unfolding of the path. Wisdom insight arises only in a mind moment that is free from clinging, that is not contracted and closed around the incredible starring role of me, me, me—where there's just a fraction of a millimeter of space for something other to be perceived.

So what supports this opening, this purity, this non-clinging quality of mind? That's really, in some ways, what you could say the practice is about. It's not that the experience needs to change. Suffering, the cause of suffering, the end of suffering—in the big picture, these don't really change. But the mind that's holding to something, or that's colored by kilesa, by greed, by fear, by aversion, by views, by me, me, me—something in it allows it to open. Clinging doesn't arise. Moment by moment, steady awareness—that's what we're practicing here—leads to a kind of stability. The continuity allows for the kilesas to be seen and not fed, allows for wisdom to arise.

But that's not the only way, and I want to talk about other things tonight. We tend, especially in a meditation retreat, because that's what we're here for—to meditate, right?—we didn't come here to have everything be the same as our daily life, probably. We came here to meditate for whatever reasons we tell ourselves, and we probably all have different language for it. But one reason is to purify the mind, to free our heart and mind from suffering. Because we're here in a meditation retreat, that's what we talk about, that's what we're focused on—moment-to-moment mindfulness.

I'm not trying to change that focus. It's a good focus, a useful focus. Moment-to-moment mindfulness really is the most direct way to allow for wisdom to arise. But that's the thing: wisdom arises just by our moment-to-moment awareness and interest, not through our willpower, and not through getting the right content, the right experience, the right meditation, the correct way of walking or sitting or breathing, the correct free-flowing attention, the correct choiceless awareness.

We get so focused at times on doing the meditation, just doing it, doing it correctly. I don't know if you've noticed how we can be really sincere and working very carefully, trying not to strive, really doing everything as best we can. But at times it can start to feel very self-obsessed. It all becomes about my meditation, right? I mean, I spent a long time in that state. It comes and goes like anything. But there are times when we're really trying, and yet the focus all becomes about how my meditation is doing, getting my meditation better. "This noise is disturbing my meditation." I could feel it walking through the lunchroom today.

Perhaps I'm projecting. But I've been there myself, so you can only project what you know. That sense of walking around the lunchroom so carefully because I'm protecting the cocoon of my meditation—whatever the heck's going on in my meditation.

But there are times—and we all go in and out of this—there are times when there's nothing to protect because there's no meditation. There's just this moment of awareness. Whatever's happening doesn't matter. And in that, there's that openness. There's that possibility for insight to arise.

Now, as soon as I've said this, the mind goes, "Okay, openness... the possibility..." You know, it's just what our minds do. But because insight arises spontaneously, in a moment of really a purity of mind, of consciousness—it's not clinging, it's not self-referencing or obsessed—we can't create that. You just can't. And I don't know why we can't believe that. It would spare us so much suffering. But we can't create it. We can't make insight happen out of willpower. We can't make wisdom arise.

So it's a tricky thing, because we can call on, incline our mind towards the wisdom of what we've already understood or known. Taking impermanence again, there are ways we've all experienced impermanence. We can incline our mind in that way in terms of remembering, reminding ourselves, "Oh yeah, right, stuff is impermanent." But you can't sit down and say, "I will now have an insight into impermanence." You can't. I mean, you can sit down and do that, but you can't say, "I'm going to now notice the beginning and ending of every arising experience." Have you tried that today? I bet a lot of you have. I knew when I heard him say that—I just knew that's what the mind was going to do. And sometimes we can, and sometimes we can't, because guess what? It's not in our control.

So having the inclining of mind toward the wisdom of "yes, impermanence is a truth, and I have experienced that"—that's useful. But then we can't make the wisdom arise again. It's like the letting go—the spontaneous, and staying really present. So usually that's what we talk about as the supports for wisdom, for insight: the steadiness of mindfulness, this bare attention, non-judging without concepts, the non-striving, the continuity, and the stability, the steadiness that grows from the mindfulness that becomes samādhi.

But that's not all we have to call on. It's not like it's that or nothing. When your mindfulness isn't steady, and when you're feeling like I was saying—so obsessed with the meditation that it's just becoming one dismal, dark, new way to suffer... Am I making that up, or have you experienced that? Oh my God, life was bad enough, and now on top of it I have to be the bad meditator.

A good friend of mine was sitting for a few weeks over at the Forest Refuge last month when I was there, and he was talking to me about how we discuss the attitude of mind, just checking the attitude of mind—which is really what I'm talking about tonight. But he said, so really sincerely—this is someone who's been sitting forever and who knows better, but really sincerely—"So the attitude of mind... I mean, is there ever an attitude that isn't kilesa? Is there ever a moment, an attitude of mind when you check it that isn't greed, hatred, or delusion? Because that's all I ever see."

Which of course isn't true. It wasn't even true for him. But it's as if we get sometimes—and usually when things aren't going the way we like them to, or they're unpleasant—so kind of focused, zoomed into the kilesa aspect, the defilement, the torments of mind aspect.

Yes, they're the source of the suffering. I mean, it's good to notice them. I'm not saying otherwise. And we've been talking about that a lot, understanding them as freeing. I just have to say that's all still true. But there are times we get so fixated that even noticing—like just before when I said that woman noticed the aversion—she noticed it with a mind that was not holding. So the aversion becomes the object. The mind that's noticing it is clear, pure, non-clinging. Aversion's not a problem.

But there are other times—once in a while—when the mind that notices greed, aversion, self-judgment, fear, isn't quite totally pure and non-clinging. It's really, really colored, identified with that particular kilesa.

It's just seeing through it. And the more we really try to be moment-to-moment mindful, the more we really try to let go, it just seems like we're digging ourselves—it feels like at that moment—into a deeper and deeper hole. And you can't figure it out, because technically you're doing everything you should be doing. You're doing the practice right. You're not just sloughing off. But everything's just kind of spiraling, spiraling.

Out of control is okay. Unpleasant is okay. But there are times when the more you seem to be mindful, the more it seems like you're feeding the unwholesome. Have you ever had that experience? It's usually the time when you come into an interview and I say, "Okay, you need to shift the focus of attention." And the person usually feels, "I failed. I have to switch the focus of attention because I wasn't good enough to get through this."

What's happening is that the mind at that point is colored by self-judgment or wanting or attachment to a view, and we can't see it. Far from being bright and open and non-clinging with the possibility for insight or wisdom, it's just contracting on itself.

So at this point, we can learn that there are other ways to brighten, to bring the mind into readiness for insight, you could say.

I want to read part of a sutta that I really like. It made me see that this is how the Buddha worked.

It says that when the Buddha, the Blessed One, was staying in Rajagaha, at the squirrel sanctuary, there was a leper named Supabuddha—a poor, miserable wretch of a person. At that time, the Blessed One was sitting surrounded by a large assembly, teaching the Dhamma. Supabuddha saw the large gathering from far off and thought, "Without a doubt, someone there must be distributing food. Why don't I go over and get some?" So he went over, and then he saw the Blessed One sitting there teaching the Dhamma. He realized, "Oh, there's no one distributing food. That's Gotama, the contemplative, sitting surrounded by a large assembly teaching the Dhamma. Why don't I listen to the Dhamma since I'm here?" So he sat down.

Now the Blessed One, comprehending the minds of the entire assembly with his awareness—this is one of the special powers of a Buddha; there are often suttas where he does this—asked himself, "Who here is capable of really understanding the Dhamma? Who here is really capable of waking up?" Don't you wish we could do that and say the right thing? Sorry—we have to do it ourselves.

And he saw Supabuddha, the leper, sitting in the assembly. On seeing him, the thought occurred to him—and it's always like that, never "he thought" but "the thought occurred to him," it just came through—"This person here is capable of understanding the Dhamma."

So aiming specifically at Supabuddha, the Buddha gave a step-by-step talk: a talk on generosity, on giving; a talk on virtue, on non-harming conduct; a talk on the heavens. He talked about the drawbacks, the suffering, and the corruption of sense desire, of sense passions, and the rewards and happiness of renunciation.

Then, when he saw that Supabuddha the leper's mind was ready, malleable, free from hindrances, elated, and bright—then he gave the Dhamma talk peculiar to the awakened ones, that is, the Four Noble Truths.

He very carefully talked about all these other qualities of our life, of our practice that brighten the mind, that free the heart, that open us up out from our self-absorbed tendencies. And then, when he could tell the mind was ready—boop.

And of course, even that wretched, miserable wretch of a person, on hearing this—just as a clean cloth, free of stains, would properly absorb a dye—in the same way, as Supabuddha was sitting in that very seat, the dustless, stainless Dhamma eye arose within him: "Whatever is subject to origination is all subject to cessation." That's one of the little lines that indicates he was a stream-enterer.

I really love that—that sense that it's not always the most helpful or appropriate thing to just hone in with all your energy on getting more precise, on being more mindful, on seeing more clearly, thinking that's going to make insight happen. It just doesn't always work. Yes, it's great, and it's our first line of refuge, no question. But sometimes we can call on lots of other qualities that open us out, that open the mind and heart into the spaciousness, the openness of non-clinging.

He was saying how we tend to really try to see the object of our awareness more clearly a lot of the time. We think, "Oh, it's a cloud. I've got to see it clearly, see it clearly." We get so focused on the object—and the object can be mental too, remember—but we forget that really the path is about purifying the mind.

And so he said, this is what I thought was really interesting, that we can't force the insight. The quality of mind, of consciousness—the state of mind is matched with the object that it can observe. Actually, he said the mind will perceive the object that it deserves. That was his language.

So basically saying that if the state of mind is filled with, identified with wanting, with dislike or aversion, with clinging to views, with "this is all about me," that quality of mind can try as hard as it wants—it's not going to see Nibbana. It's only going to see through kilesa in a moment. And so as long as we're looking through what he calls a "kilesa mind"—let's take a mind that's colored and we don't recognize the wanting, the striving, the dislike, the self-judging, the views—he said that all a mind like that can recognize is concepts. It sees the concept and takes the concept for reality. It's interesting.

So like that woman I talked about standing in pain, she would see through a mind with aversion that this unpleasant restlessness is her problem and she needs to get rid of it to fix it, and that's just how it is. The Vipassana mind, he calls it, can observe things just as they are. Vipassana mind, meaning connected, awake, free from clinging, without bringing in concept, can recognize things just as they are. It can see concept—it can see that concept. "Oh, I thought this is the only way to get rid of this pain, by walking out, but now I see: this is unpleasant experience. It feels like this. This is aversion in the mind. It's like that." Nothing changed but how it's observed. Kilesa mind, Vipassana mind.

So that's when we talk about turning around and just noticing what's the attitude of mind. It is not always kilesa mind. A great deal of the time it's not. It's really, really helpful for us to also recognize that. Recognize when there is wisdom, clear seeing, just seeing things as they are without adding anything extra. Recognize when there's metta, when there's compassion, when there's sympathetic joy or equanimity. Recognize when there's gratitude, when there's generosity, when there's non-harming moral conduct—which can be of thought, not just of speech and body.

And all of these are also practices that we can call on consciously to brighten, to make our mind more malleable, more elated, more flexible, more open. When we feel that we're practicing as hard as we can and as sincerely as we can and we're just getting tighter and tighter and it's more and more about me, then maybe for a moment we could call on some of these other ways of brightening the mind, opening the heart.

So I just want to mention a few of them. I mean, each of them is a talk in itself, so I just want to touch on a few. But recognizing, again, that insight wisdom can arise in relationship to any experience, and the most mundane experience can be the source of really profound insight. So when we're getting upset because our experience isn't subtle enough, and we're just sitting in fear, and then we get up and go eat, and it feels like our normal everyday consciousness, and we want something special—you know, we're looking out to object, to experience. Turn around and look at the attitude of mind. It's in the little things sometimes that something lets go, like that woman standing there, and really a whole other way of being, of freedom, is perceived as possible.

There was someone else at the Forest Refuge, and she was having lots of insights. And it seemed like most of them, the ones she would talk about, came when she was doing her vacuuming during yogi work meditation.

I love that because it really shows that we're just meeting everything as our path of waking up. We're not focusing only on some particular activity.

Sometimes people don't even know they're striving. You're really very committedly being continuous, not tense. And there could be such a tiny, tiny little bit of wanting or pushing that we really can't even notice it until it drops. Sometimes I know for me it would drop like when you go into the toilet. Just something where you quit trying to be so mindful, and insight can come. Or you're drinking your tea, or she's doing her vacuuming, or whatever. So never give up, but don't try too hard.

Nyoshul Khenpo, who was a very wonderful Dzogchen master, speaks about bodhicitta, the awakened and noble mind and heart. But this is broader than that:

"The difference between the impure and the pure mind, the deluded mind and the enlightened mind, is mainly a difference of narrowness and openness. In our deluded state, our mind is extremely narrow. For example, we live alone; we rarely consider the infinity of sentient beings. The more constricted and narrow the mind, the more it thinks only of itself, disregarding the well-being, happiness, and suffering of others.

Conversely, the enlightened Buddha is one who considers the infinity of beings rather than being concerned only with his own ego and individuality. Thus the entire path from an ordinary being to Buddhahood is the gradual opening of mind. And that is precisely what we call bodhicitta—literally, to grow and develop that enlightened attitude. The concept of growth is used here for the passing from a completely narrow attitude focused principally on oneself to an open, loving heart whose scope instinctively encompasses the infinity of sentient beings."

So all these step-by-step ways that the Buddha mentioned in that sutta to Suppabuddha, and a couple I'm going to mention, they're all moving in that direction—from the narrow, constricted heart and mind centering around me, driven by greed and fear, to the open heart and mind, the mind of non-clinging. Basically non-clinging, open, which will instinctively consider other beings' needs. But it's not that we have to be thinking that. It's just that when we're not centered here, the energy is available to respond to whatever presents itself to us, to respond to other beings. There's not this sense of me and other. It's just this.

And so in support of insight, supports for wisdom are all these different ways that the Buddha mentions, all working towards this brightening, lightening, opening the heart and mind. Mostly they're happy, joyful qualities. But it's not about cultivating them because we want to feel good. That's both the old motivation of how we used to do everything, and then sometimes we get so cautious, so fearful that we might fall back into wanting to feel good, that we get focused on the negative, like my friend. When we're feeling really the happiness of a generous thought that comes up and you feel really happy, the mind goes, "You're just clinging to the pleasant," and pulls back. Instead of the openness that we could really appreciate, it's like, "No, I have to do it right." But we don't recognize that.

So really we can cultivate the wholesome. It's one of the four right efforts: recognizing wholesome states of mind that have arisen and helping them increase, and cultivating unarisen wholesome states of mind. That's a piece of wisdom. That's not, "Oh, I don't like what's happening and I want to feel good." That's not a wholesome state of mind.

So I want to just mention briefly bodhicitta, even though that wasn't in the sutta. Just briefly, relative bodhicitta being a noble or awakened heart-mind. Tibetans always talk about it as a motivation that we can consciously cultivate, if we choose, to feed our whole life, our whole practice. Very simply, you could say it is cultivating an altruistic attitude, cultivating an attitude just as Nyoshul Khenpo said—not only just about me, but caring for the infinity of all beings. Okay, we can't go that far yet. But just that sense of: may my practice be not for myself alone, but may my awakening be so that I can then be of service to help awaken all beings.

Of course, we don't start out feeling that. At first, it might seem really very far away. But we can cultivate it. In fact, Sogyal Rinpoche talks about it a lot. In one of his books, he says it's really okay to practice bodhicitta. Because in the beginning, he says, this enlightened attitude has two aspects. This is relative bodhicitta, cultivating this sincere wish—and it's not sincere at first, maybe. That's what he means when he says we cultivate it: may I really awaken in order to help all beings awaken. So he says the enlightened attitude has two aspects. One is the urge in ourselves to purify our negativity, to come out of our suffering. And the second is the sincere desire to benefit all beings through our awakening, to awaken in order to bring others to awakening.

It's really compassion for self and others. And always remember with this, and also with all the Brahma Viharas, that when we're connecting with all beings—with metta, with bodhicitta, with compassion—you are one of the all beings. Sometimes people do "all beings" and forget this one here. So compassion to all beings includes oneself.

In talking about cultivating this, at first it may seem, well, that's too highfalutin. I'm just sitting here. It's all I can do to get through the sitting. And when I say, "May I awaken to serve all beings," it just sounds completely phony. So, you know, it's okay if it's artificial at first. It's not what we're used to. We haven't been thinking this way before, so we need to deliberately bring it up. We need to deliberately shift our heart and mind that way. So just try it. If you're inclined, just say it to yourself—beginning of a sitting, the end of a sitting, the beginning of the day. And see what happens. Just see what happens.

So again, he said that if you cultivate the correct motivation in your own heart, just do that. It'll turn into bodhicitta all by itself. And I have found actually in my practice that's true. You may for many years be practicing for whatever your own particular motivation is—to free myself from suffering, to free yourself from a particular pattern that's just too much suffering, to experience more love, to be compassionate, to awaken, whatever. And it's pretty normal that even when it's wholesome, it's pretty much about me in the beginning. I mean, that's all we know.

But slowly, slowly, those motivations begin to open up as the wisdom develops, as the sense of self being so solid begins to be seen through. As impermanence deepens, there are more and more moments of insight, of seeing through the blind, unconscious holding to all the views—"it's all about me and I have to do this to make myself happy." They just naturally start to get more transparent. You don't have to try so hard to root it out. That's too much me doing. It just gets more transparent. It does start to turn into bodhicitta by itself.

I have a friend—I haven't seen him for a few years, but I think I could safely say he's one of the more aversive people I know. And I know a lot of aversive people. Aversive, sincerely practicing, but very aversive. And with that, really most of it turned towards himself, very, very self-judgmental, feeling like he could never really practice or do anything good, really down on himself. He was talking to me after a three-month course where he'd been just saying this bodhicitta to himself: "May I awaken to be of service, to awaken all beings." And then, you know—wham, wham. "Who are you? How can you even say that? How can you even—" Just so much self-hatred would come up, and cynicism, and "you don't feel anything." And then it just shows you're just... all the stuff you can think of about yourself.

But he said he just kept on doing it. And something really started to change. I've had the same experience, not quite to the negative intensity of his, but where it stops being just words and you start to really feel—not "Oh, I'm so great, awakening for all beings," or that I'm awakened or anything—but the motivation starts to shift.

This is the way Sogyal Rinpoche describes the effect of that, which is really quite lovely. He's funny, but it's also quite lovely. It gives us courage. It opens the mind and heart. When it stops being all about me first, but really, somehow I'm doing this for all beings, then there are times when you feel like, "I've had enough. I'm out of here. The hindrances are too strong." And something comes in: "Well, it's not just for you, you know." And it's not like an ego thing—"I'm going to serve all beings." It's like, okay, just one more step. One more breath.

It expands the possibilities. It expands our mind and heart. The way Sayadaw U Tejaniya puts it is that it's the antidote to our chicken heart. It expands our chicken heart and gives us courage to be here for the next moment, for the next moment, for the next moment.

And it may sound like it's strengthening the sense of ego and self, but it's actually not. It's just the reverse. It's really quite lovely and very supportive, helping us just to keep going. We don't have to know where it's going. We don't get into thinking, "Well, how is this going to help anybody?" That's just thinking. But it's this really deep motivation: May what I say and do awaken me to awaken all beings. Just try it, play with it, and see what effect it has.

Sometimes we can't access it, of course. All of these things I'm mentioning are skillful means. Sometimes we can access them, sometimes not. Sometimes we need to, sometimes not. So we're just seeing which ones are helpful.

I'm going to mention the others very briefly, and we'll talk about them more as the retreat goes on. The four Brahma Viharas: loving-kindness, compassion, appreciative joy, equanimity. Compassion, appreciative joy, and equanimity we'll go through in the evenings here. Loving-kindness was covered in the first six weeks, and most of you are familiar with it.

These practices, even though the phrases we use are about "me wishing for you" and seem very self-and-other oriented, in the moment, in a single mind moment when there's any of the four Brahma Viharas, it actually partakes of the vastness, the impersonal nature of the open heart and mind. When there's any of those four present, there's not clinging in the heart and mind. It is not all about me. The distinctions, the separations break down. And so, in any of these four, it really opens and brightens, makes the mind and heart softer, more flexible. At the same time it's softer, it's also not so brittle—more flexible, not so easily shaken.

You know, when you're really feeling metta, and you walk through the dining room, you don't so much feel like you have to protect anything, do you? It's not like they're all out there waiting to ruin my meditation. It's just: here we are. It's a very different feeling.

Dana, or generosity—this was the first thing the Buddha spoke about to seekers, and really it's pretty much the first thing he seemed to always teach when he started teaching, especially to lay people. We've talked about generosity and we'll talk about it again. The one point I really want to make about it tonight is something I didn't really understand until I'd spent a lot of time practicing in Thailand and also in Burma.

We hear about generosity as a way of creating merit, wholesome karma, wholesome results of doing good for people, of caring. But the great secret about it is that it's actually a source of incredible happiness in our own mind and heart when we're expressing generosity through thought or speech or action. The act of generosity, the intention of generosity in the mind, is a source of real brightness. It brings a kind of happiness, a kind of elation to the mind that I hadn't really understood before I'd seen it in action and experienced the effects going both ways.

I was a nun in Thailand for about a year, many years ago. At first I was really uncomfortable—and the same going to Burma—really uncomfortable with how generous people were to me in little things. I'm not saying everyone's perfect, everything's wonderful, but there's a quality of generosity in the Dhamma culture, and often in many places in Burma especially just the regular culture, of spontaneously offering time, gifts. I was offered so much support when I was a nun in Thailand—my robes, my food everywhere. People would give me the best kuti, or whatever they could offer for women to stay in. I was treated so kindly, with such care.

And my first response was, "No, not me, I'm not worth it," or "I really don't need it, I have enough money myself, I don't need to take from you." But you see, that just cuts it. There's this open generosity, and I'm wanting to push it back. What one really sees is that in the people offering, there's so much happiness. They're really happy to offer. And when I would open and receive, that happiness would affect me. Then it becomes like a circle.

I noticed at times when I was spending extended periods in different monasteries in Burma or Thailand, in communication with people, I would find certain aspects of my heart getting brighter and brighter and happier. Other things were going on too—this isn't the only thing—but a kind of brightness, a lightness that could open to the suffering. I felt really inspired and uplifted. And some of this was from the generosity.

A friend of mine put it in a good way. She had come to a retreat in Burma a couple of years ago, and she hadn't been there much at all. She was telling me later that she didn't quite notice it at the beginning—it kind of crept up on her. She was an acupuncturist, and she came to a study retreat in Chazwa. Then I took her across the street to the hospital to meet some Burmese practicing acupuncturists. She wasn't training them; she just met them. They were so kind to her and friendly. They took her into Mandalay and introduced her to a really famous acupuncturist from China. Then they took her to meet this wonderful old teacher, a Sayadaw. Then they took her to dinner. And then she met this Chinese teacher that she'd actually studied with in China who happened to be in Mandalay. It just kept happening—all this kind of magical, happy stuff. It's like that sometimes. Sometimes it's just the other way.

And then the guest houses where she stayed, people went so out of the way to take care of her, to be kind. She said she started to notice she was just getting happier and happier, feeling more and more open, wanting to offer and wanting to give and wanting to share. And not out of a sense of "I should." It starts that way because we're not used to it, but really a kind of happiness that opens the heart. The non-clinging is just the natural response, and then the heart is open, it's brighter, you start to see more, you start to experience more, you start to have some insights. But for her, it was just this happiness.

She came home and she saw how her receiving the generosity, and the happiness of that person who gave, made her happy. She saw when she came home that her friends who didn't really know anything about what she'd been doing or her meditation—they really noticed it in her. And being around her, they would start to feel happier, more open and more generous. It can kind of roll like that.

And then she said also that back here it started to kind of go away again. It didn't feel as supported. But there's a lot more to say about generosity. I just wanted to bring out how it functions as a way of brightening and opening the heart and mind.

Even just a generous thought—and here, please, please don't go around doing and saying things to other people, like "I'm going to write everybody a note to be generous" or whatever—but sometimes a generous thought will come up in your mind. What we can do is notice it. Notice, "That's an attitude of mine too." Notice it. Appreciate it. Sometimes when we're really down or kind of tight, you can actually reflect on, contemplate your past generosity. Not as an ego thing, "Aren't I something great?" But just bring up, feel moments when you've thought or said or done something that's really from that open-hearted generosity. And you experience, again, the brightness, the uplifting of that—kind of like karmic result, vipāka. It's really quite helpful.

Similarly with sīla, with non-harming behavior, moral conduct. Certainly it's in order to protect other people and to protect ourselves. But the Buddha talked about the brightness of it as the bliss of blamelessness, freedom from remorse. This is a really happy state. This is a state that really allows us to relax, to open the heart and mind.

I imagine that most of you, in the time you've been here, have had some unwholesome thing, some stupid thing you did in the past, arise in your consciousness. We all have done at least one or two stupid, unintelligent, harmful things. And it's painful when they come up. Even if it's met with wisdom, met with openness—so it's remorse—that remorse is painful. But it's healing if we don't pile on top of it guilt and present moment aversion.

The freedom from remorse, the bliss of blamelessness, is a very profound aspect of non-clinging, of opening the heart and mind, of strengthening the mind, of support for wisdom, for insight.

I have to read this. It's a little aside, but I have to. From a news magazine, under a little column called "Only in America": "A California perfume company has introduced the world's first biblically-themed fragrance called Virtue. From the perfumer: 'It's based on years of scriptural research. It includes frankincense, myrrh, in a blend of 3,000-year-old scents.'"

Retailing at $80 for a bottle, Virtue will enable its wearer to smell like Christ and many of the saints, says CEO Rick Larimore. I won't tell you what I think they must have smelled like schlepping around in the desert all the time, but probably that's not what the perfume smells like.

Anyway, this is the main point. The CEO of the perfume company says, "Many individuals of high spiritual attainment give off a fragrance attributed to their virtue." So if you think that person near you is wearing a scented product, maybe you just don't recognize what it really is.

On a serious note, the Buddha—and I'm not going to read this whole sutta, but it's one of these progressive teachings where this leads to that, leads to that—says: "What is the purpose of skillful virtues? What is their reward?" He says, "Skillful virtues have freedom from remorse as their purpose, Ananda, and freedom from remorse as their reward. And what's the purpose of freedom from remorse?" It goes on and on. Freedom from remorse has joy as its purpose, joy as its reward. And it goes from joy to rapture, rapture to serenity, serenity to sukha, sukha to concentration, concentration to knowledge and vision of things as they actually are. Knowledge and vision of things as they actually are leads to disenchantment as its purpose and its reward. Disenchantment has dispassion as its purpose. And what's the purpose of dispassion? What's its reward? Dispassion has knowledge and vision of release as its purpose, knowledge and vision of release as its reward. "In this way, Ananda, skillful virtues lead step by step to the consummation of arahatship."

I wanted to draw the links very clearly. There are times when we're nowhere near able to be dispassionate, to see things clearly. But we can be calling on our sila, our skillful virtues. And no matter what we've done in the past, skillful virtues, sila, moral conduct can start right now.

Even Angulimala—you know this story, I'm not going to go into it, but the mass murderer who killed 999 people—when he met the Buddha, and the Buddha really helped him see through it, he became a bhikkhu. Even then, he began right then the cultivation of skillful virtue.

There's an interesting little story in the sutta about him. After he became a monk, and he was very sincere—he'd reached first stage anyway—he went into a village for alms and saw a woman giving birth and in a lot of pain and suffering, and he was really touched. He came back to the Buddha and said, "Ah, so much suffering. I wish I could help." So the Buddha says—this was a common blessing then—"Go and say to her: 'Sister, since I was born, I do not recall intentionally killing a living being. Through this truth, may there be well-being for you and your child.'"

He says, "Buddha? Wouldn't that be a lie? I mean, I've intentionally killed many living beings."

The Buddha says, "Okay. Then go and say: 'Sister, since I was born in the noble birth, since I was born in the Dhamma, I do not recall intentionally killing a living being. Through this truth, may there be well-being for you and the child.'" And it says there was.

Just taking a stand on that profound truth. Skillful virtues begin now. Non-harming speech, non-harming thoughts, non-harming action. And in calling on them, we can actually contemplate, reflect on, call up times of skillful virtue as a way to brighten, to open the contracted heart and mind, to support the faith and the trust.

Again, this is something many times we don't do so much in the West, but it really is a source of wholesome happiness sometimes. You might have to get over a little feeling of, "Ugh, this is so egocentric." That's aversion. But when you're purely calling up wholesome things you've done and those memories come, don't shy away or be afraid to look. Feel the wholesomeness. Feel the brightness.

In the one minute left, the last thing I want to mention is gratitude. One time, Sayadaw U Pandita was giving a talk here, and I didn't have the notes so I can't remember all of it, but he talked about five kinds of rare beings, rare people.

One of them was a Buddha, so that's pretty rare. But one was someone who really feels and expresses gratitude.

In terms of opening oneself to gratitude—this is something I actually often practice, both on and off retreat. When my mind and heart feel contracted and narrow, just focused on my little self, or on what's wrong, or overwhelmed with suffering (mine or another's), I consciously call on gratitude. Whether it's gratitude to the Buddha, to your teachers, to our circumstances, gratitude for human birth—or it can just be gratitude for little things. It still brings this openness, this inspiration of mind, this purity of the mind stream.

Sometimes on retreat, I remember getting into bed at night—one of those nights when you think, Thank God, tomorrow is a new day. Hopefully things change and we'll wake up and it'll all be okay again. This state will be gone. And I would just start bringing in some gratitude. "I'm grateful for..." and I might start really mundane. Again, like with bodhicitta, I'm not feeling anything at first. I'm grateful to have a bed to sleep in. I'm grateful to have enough warmth. I'm grateful I had enough to eat today. I'm grateful for the dharma.

And really pretty soon, unless it's a really contracted state, some little glimmer of actual gratitude would come, and then things would just start pouring—more than I could even think, things that surprised me. It's not so much about the content. It's just about touching again that attitude, that wholesome attitude of heart and mind, really supporting this quality.

It's not so much about feeling good. It really isn't. Feeling good comes along with these things as a nice side benefit. But it's really about calling on these different ways to enlighten, to support the purity of consciousness, to help support the mind of non-clinging. Here and now as the means to the end of awakening. But it's only in this moment, experienced fully at times in this moment, here and now.

Something we can all be really grateful for.

I wanted to share this bodhicitta prayer from the Twelfth Gyalwang Drukpa Rinpoche. I really like it:

I call on you, my teachers, regard me with compassion.
I sincerely wish to receive your blessings.
Please regard your child's longing desire.
Please bless me with the resolve to attain realization.
Please bless me to have a steady and smooth mind
so that for this life and those to follow, as a true practitioner whose heart and mind are in accord,
the special intention to help others is spontaneously present.
May I be able to benefit measureless beings.

CHAPTER 32

First Noble Truth and Self-Judgment

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines self-judgment as a specific form of aversion (dosa) rooted in our misunderstanding of the First Noble Truth. She clarifies that dukkha is not simply "suffering" but rather a basic unsatisfactoriness—like an ill-fitting axle—that runs through all conditioned experience, including pleasant states. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching that "whatever is felt is included within dukkha," she explains that our practice involves understanding this truth rather than trying to eliminate unpleasant experience.
>
> Wilson traces how self-judgment develops from momentary aversion to sense contact: when mindfulness doesn't meet an unpleasant experience, papañca (mental proliferation) fills the gap, and for those prone to self-criticism, the resulting storyline turns inward. She offers a crucial insight: when caught in self-judgment, no thought can be trusted because dosa distorts perception. The Buddha's teaching on the two darts illustrates how we compound unavoidable pain with mental suffering through resistance and resentment.
> The path forward combines mindfulness and compassion—not to make difficult states feel good, but to peacefully coexist with them. Wilson emphasizes that meeting our own difficulty with awareness creates new wholesome karma that gradually transforms habitual patterns. This capacity to bear witness to our own experience becomes the foundation for genuine compassion toward others and the world.

What I want to talk about tonight is the subject of aversion—self-judgment really, as a subset of aversion. And that means actually starting by talking about the first noble truth. So as you see, it's a serious topic.

Self-judging is not everybody, but many, many people really suffer a great deal from it in our culture. As I said, self-judging is just a form of aversion, and aversion is one of the habitual responses to unpleasant feeling tone, unpleasant experience. And it's all based in delusion.

Perhaps you've heard the very famous quotation from the Dalai Lama to a Westerner talking about their self-judgment. He's saying, you know, you're just wrong. You're wrong. It's basically wrong, first, because we're believing there's a self—but that's a whole other talk. It's wrong because aversion, as a response to difficulty, as a response to the unpleasant, is based in delusion. And the very movement of aversion in a moment in our mind increases and feeds delusion.

When we respond by pulling back, it keeps us from being able to recognize accurately what's going on. In that gap of disconnect, that's when there's rife space for papañca to flow—papañca based on aversion. And we just get further and further from what's really going on. So aversion is based in delusion, it feeds delusion, and it just keeps us more and more confused. Self-judgment is just taking that and turning it back on ourselves. So that's kind of the overview.

To start by talking about the first noble truth, the truth of dukkha: I personally find it fascinating, really quite profound. It's a whole lifetime's worth of exploration at least, and really quite subtle and freeing. As the Buddha talked about, the first noble truth, dukkha, is to be understood—not to be changed, not to be gotten rid of, not to be avoided, but to be understood. And so really, on one level, the source of a great deal of our confusion and suffering in life—and I'm not going to translate dukkha as suffering, I'm using suffering more specifically—is in not understanding the way things are. Dukkha is the way things are.

I'm sure you're all familiar with dukkha and the various translations. One of the most common and easiest being suffering, but not such a helpful one really. The kind of shorthand for Buddhism is "life is suffering," right? That's the first noble truth. Now, at least for native English speakers—I don't know what the connotations would be if English isn't your native language—but for native English speakers, if you hear "life is suffering," what kind of mood, what kind of connotations come from that? It's not really inspiring, is it? It doesn't really feel onward leading.

As Sayadaw U Tejaniya says, when we think of the first noble truth that way, it's almost impossible for a sense of aversion not to come along with it. "Life is suffering"—there's already that tinge of aversion. But the first noble truth is not meant to be something that brings out aversion. When we understand it, it actually frees us from aversion, confusion, and greed. We understand it.

In his book on the Satipaṭṭhāna, Bhikkhu Anālayo—it's really a great book if you haven't read it, he just brings in so many different angles, so many different sources—talks about the Pali etymology, possible readings and interpretations of the word dukkha. One of them is that the "du" part means difficulty, and the "kha" part could be standing for the hole of an axle. In an ox cart, there's a wheel and a hole in the wheel, and the axle, that pole, goes through it. Based on that interpretation, dukkha means the hole just doesn't really fit the axle. It kind of grinds around with difficulty. It just doesn't really work so well. That I can relate to more as dukkha, as an expression of our life.

Another interpretation: "du" again means difficulty, and "kha" could come from another root, "sta," which would mean standing. So in this case, dukkha would mean standing with difficulty, or standing badly.

Again, uneasiness, uncomfortableness. And I find personally this much more to the point than suffering.

So as Bhikkhu Bodhi then goes on to say, he describes dukkha as "the basic unsatisfactoriness running through our lives." That's not saying everything's horrible. It's not saying everything's negative. Just saying there's a kind of basic unsatisfactoriness that runs through our lives.

Part of what opens up in our practice, on and off retreat, is that willingness of the mindful attention, the receptive awareness that stops trying to block that perception, that stops trying to fix that perception. I think of my mother, who has difficulty—always has had—being with unhappiness, with difficulty, with things not working. She's afraid of it, pushes it down. And so for some reason, one time I was trying to explain to her what dukkha meant, which I don't know why we were even in that conversation, but I was trying to explain and she goes, "I'm not suffering. I don't have uneasiness running through my life. Everything's great."

So that level. And then when someone's holding that, it's like, "Don't tell me. Basic unsatisfactoriness running through my life? Did I come here to hear that? I don't think so. I came here to be more at ease, more loving, more happy."

That's why, when it comes to self-judgment, when your practice isn't going the way you think it should, when it's opening up to sometimes a basic niggling uneasiness, sometimes much more obvious, we think something's wrong. Something's wrong when it's more difficult and unpleasant. That's our basic not understanding of the first noble truth.

So then, as the Buddha talked about the three aspects—I don't want to go into them in detail, but just to give some flavors of what we mean—there's dukkha dukkha, which is really what you would call basic suffering: pain, old age, disease, death. No one gets out without it. Basic suffering. Sickness. Not being together with what is loved. Having to be together with what is not loved. Not getting what you want. These are the definitions in the suttas—dukkha dukkha.

Another aspect is that of change. No matter how wonderful or how difficult something is, it's constantly changing. Basically there's an unreliability and insecurity in that nothing can be held to or relied on for lasting satisfaction—or lasting suffering, for that matter. Nothing can be relied on for lasting anything. And when we're not completely at ease with that, it definitely gives this little undercurrent of... it's just not quite... I just want to be settled. It's just not quite easy.

And the third is called sankhara dukkha, which one way is described as a kind of perpetual incompleteness or insubstantiality. There are different ways of describing it. One way is just the ongoing nature of everything. You have to get up and drag yourself out of bed and go pee, and then you have to wash, and then you have to dress, and then you have to eat, and then you have to go pee, and then you have to wash—and it just goes on and on and on. Well, finally, why do we love to go to bed at night if you can sleep? Thank God. It's over. It's over. That's why Joseph used to say that sleep is the worldling's nirvana. Just check out.

So I'm joking. But that doesn't have to be accompanied with aversion, what I just described. The way I said it definitely had a tinge. But it doesn't have to be accompanied with aversion.

And this is what's so interesting: we still tend to think of all of this as insecurity, difficult, unpleasant, nothing can be relied on. But that's not so. The beautiful is included within dukkha, within the first noble truth. It's just that it can't be relied on because there's change.

In fact, there's one sutta where Sariputta, the Buddha's chief disciple, and the Buddha are talking. The Buddha is quizzing Sariputta on aspects of his enlightenment, his awakening. At one point, the Buddha rephrases something Sariputta said. He rephrases it this way: "Another way of saying that, Sariputta, is that whatever is felt"—felt being vedana: pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—"whatever is felt is included within dukkha." Is included within this first noble truth.

So the first noble truth isn't about everything being grim and unpleasant. It's about there's pleasant, there's unpleasant, there's neutral in constant, ongoing, unending succession. And it can't be relied on. It's insubstantial. And that is dukkha. So you see why to just have a sense of aversion right away isn't really accurate.

But this is not always so easy for us to understand. The Buddha talked about, again in relationship to this, as with many other things as well—he talks about three aspects of experience in relationship to how we can come to understand this, that all feeling is included within dukkha, in relationship to many other aspects of our experience.

And he talks about it as really seeing and understanding for ourselves the gratification, the danger, and the escape in these things.

The Buddha said—and this is the Buddha talking—he said, "Before my enlightenment, when I was still a bodhisatta, it occurred to me: What is the gratification in this world? What is the danger in this world? And what is the escape from this?" And he said, "Then it occurred to me: whatever pleasure and joy there is in this world, this is the gratification."

This is very, very important for us to see. Because if we don't really let it in—sure, there is gratification, there is pleasure and joy—if we're trying to just pretend it's all neutral, pretend we think it's all empty, nothing is giving me pleasure, then we're not recognizing accurately. And as long as we're not recognizing accurately, we're not going to be able to see the danger and see the escape. We stay lost.

So sure, there's gratification, there's pleasant, there's joy, there's love, there's beauty—all of this. That the world is impermanent, bound up with suffering, subject to change—this is the danger in the world. This insecurity, this unreliability. And the abandoning of craving and lust for the world—this is the escape from the world.

Do you hear? He said the abandoning of craving and lust is the escape from the world. Not hating the world. Not trying to avoid seeing that there's beauty. Not trying to avoid being with the unpleasant. Just seeing. Abandoning the craving and lust is the escape.

So this is really how we need to look—to see accurately our experience and to allow wisdom to arise that does free our heart and mind from confusion, from suffering.

I had to lay that foundation, but now I want to go and particularly talk about aversion in terms of aversion arising in relationship to unpleasant. But as you see, the first noble truth of dukkha isn't only about aversion. What the Buddha is saying is there's pleasant, there's unpleasant, there's neutral. And that's just how it is.

There's nothing wrong or bad about unpleasant experience. Physical and mental experience arises. It's going to happen. It doesn't mean that there's something deeply, deeply wrong with you when you have pain, when you're sick, when things don't happen the way you want them to, when you can't control your experience. It means, hey, welcome to the human race.

But that's not really—when we're not looking carefully—that's not the way the habit of our mind and heart responds.

So just to begin to explore on a very simple moment-to-moment basis, and then we can spread it out. In a moment, we've talked about this: the six sense doors, the sense consciousness—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, thoughts, emotions—experience arises with pleasant or unpleasant or neutral. The mind feels it that way.

And just as when there's pleasant, the habit of the mind when there's not mindfulness just leans into it—a little bit of craving, hardening into grasping, hardening into becoming, wanting more—so with aversion, similarly, based on delusion. I mean, I'm saying these words, it's not in the moment, but the delusion is like, "This shouldn't be happening." And somehow by pushing it away, I can either keep myself separate from it, not feel it, or just continue on with the pretense that it's not happening at all.

But in the moment, the mental reflex to something unpleasant—just take an unpleasant sound, let's not take anything too really deeply complicated—the momentary reflex in the mind is just to pull back a little bit. Very mild. If there's mindfulness and you notice it—unpleasant sound, pulls back—then the attention can go right to the unpleasant, back to the sound, and that was just a little blip. It doesn't go anywhere. You just see that.

But say there's that pulling back, and there's not much mindfulness. You don't really know it. In that moment, there's like a little gap. What comes into that little gap? What could it be? "Oh, that sound—that shouldn't be happening. Why is that so loud? That's really going through my whole body." And what was just a little moment of pulling back can just blossom into aversion immediately, really quickly. Unseen, it just kind of cycles on itself. It just feeds on and on and on.

So we have millions of examples of that, but I want to stay on the momentary aspect for a moment. What's interesting, of course, is that we don't always notice on this level. It takes a certain calmness of mind at the moment. And it's also helpful if the sense impingement isn't something that hugely triggers our personality patterns.

But whenever we recognize that we're in some form of aversion—fear, anger, disappointment, rejection, frustration—it started in the moment with an unpleasant sense experience that's occurring now. For example, the content of fear may be about all these horrible things that might happen in the future. But what triggered that aversion playing itself out into papañca? What triggers that moment of aversion that goes into fear is something unpleasant arising now. It may be a memory of a past difficult thing, and then "what if that happens in the future?" It could be a little twinge in your spine—you can't even call it pain, you can barely call it sensation, but it's just mildly, barely unpleasant. Even intense fear or intense grief over memories of something that happened to you starts by the memory occurring now, a mental experience happening now.

I'm emphasizing this because it has been enormously helpful in terms of giving me a way to trust bringing my mindfulness into the present moment experience. Sure, sometimes it's overwhelming, and we'll get to that. But before it's overwhelming, or when it's just kind of, "Oh, what's all this aversion? What's going on?"—sometimes I'll just sit there a minute, widen my attention, and ask, "What's going on right now?" And I'll see, "Oh, my stomach feels a little unpleasant." Or I'll sit there and suddenly notice, "Oh, I just had this really unpleasant memory. It kind of floated through and I didn't really notice it."

Seeing the cause and effect really breaks down the sense of solidity, the sense of taking it so personally, and the sense of inevitability and unworkability about the aversion. It's just a habit of mind in response to unpleasant. And when we have that courage and that willingness of mindfulness to know, "Okay, unpleasant is like this"—I mean, it's built into us from most of our whole experience: unpleasant, get the heck out of here. So it can be scary. That's why we have to really cultivate the mindfulness. It's not our natural tendency, for most of us anyway. Unpleasant arises and awareness just flows into reactivity without a bubble of space.

But sometimes it happens, doesn't it? And isn't that so peaceful? You can't even tell if it's unpleasant after a while. There's no aversion. And you think—well, you can think all kinds of things, you can think anything. But there's a sense of, "Wow, this is possible. It's another way of being." That's the moment of understanding the first noble truth. Unpleasant is like this. Pleasant is like this. Neutral is like this.

So when the mindfulness comes back and meets the experience, the sense contact, there is again a possibility of wisdom—just knowing it for what it is. "Oh, unpleasant sound." When the mindfulness doesn't meet it, or we don't even recognize it, then delusion and confusion come in with the thoughts: "That sound in the hall, I can't believe it, how could they bring it?" And it just spins and spins, and the confusion, the not knowing what's happening, gets stronger and stronger and stronger—until we're relating with great fear, great self-hatred or aversion to something that basically we've completely made up. It isn't even happening. There was just some moment of unpleasant.

A simple example: someone told me years ago, they were sitting in this hall—a different setup some years ago—and their concentration was good and deep, they were really present. They kept hearing this noise, some kind of steady little noise, the kind that just drives you crazy in the meditation hall. Because why? First, it's a little unpleasant. And second, it shouldn't be happening, right? So we don't just notice "unpleasant sound" and the tightness in the body, which is also unpleasant. Maybe there's not noticing that, but there's a thought.

This shouldn't be happening. And that moment of papañca isn't seen as a moment of papañca—it's taken as an accurate description of experience, isn't it? "This shouldn't be happening. This is messing up my concentration. I need to do something." And we're absolutely believing each of these thoughts.

So the trick is, how soon do we notice what's happening? Three thoughts, we're doing well. Sally was talking about yogi mind last night—three days and we haven't noticed.

Anyway, this person said this went on and on, sitting after sitting, and they couldn't escape it. They were going crazy. Then finally they had a sitting where the sound was still happening, but they just noticed it. The mind didn't get reactive. They just kept being with their breath, their body, whatever was happening. And they thought, "Oh, wow. It's really true what Ajahn Chah says: the sound doesn't disturb us. It's we who go out and disturb the sound." It's just happening. The only thing disturbing my meditation was my attachment to the thoughts.

Really noticing this gives us the inspiration, the trust, to simply try and meet what's happening in this moment.

Self-judgment arises when there's a moment or longer of unpleasantness, of difficulty, and the way the papañca goes, the way the thoughts unfold, is that as aversion grows into anger or hatred, the story turns around and comes back on ourselves.

Now, for each one of us who experiences some form of worthlessness or self-judgment or "I'm not good enough"—we each, in terms of our personality and personal history, will have a particular story, particular events in our past, usually starting from a very young age, that could explain the particular flavor of our self-hatred or worthlessness. And certainly, that can be very useful to know.

Sometimes, as you begin to be able to just touch the feeling—and self-hatred feels awful too—you notice: "Oh, okay, unpleasantness feels like this." If we can drop the story and just feel it, we come into being present, bearing witness, showing up for ourselves, for our own experience. That's the expression of mindfulness, the expression of kindness, the expression of mettā. Mindfulness and kindness—mettā and compassion—are really the two tools that bring us out of this habit and into the present moment.

So as we're exploring this here in retreat and in our life, if you're not already familiar—and many of us are—with your particular story and the particular thought patterns that arise in response to unpleasant experience, getting to know that can be very helpful. Sometimes people then choose to explore it further—the storyline, the past history—through therapy, examining how it shows up in thoughts and reactions to situations now. I've found that very helpful.

And then, in terms of the freedom of understanding how the mind works in awareness, at some point I know the story already. I really don't need to keep rehashing it. So when I'm sitting or in daily life, it doesn't matter. I start to notice that I'm also very familiar with what self-judging or self-hatred feels like. There's a tone in my body—and it's not a pleasant tone. Then there's a certain quality that the thoughts begin to take.

It really isn't so subtle once we start tuning in. It's not like it sneaks up on us. It's like, "Hmm, you really could have done that a little better, couldn't you?" Or, "I think that person really doesn't like me." Or I just feel like I'm creeping around, even if I'm alone in the house. You just notice that.

I don't need to sit down and go, "Well, that's because when my mother... and then... and then..." I don't need to know that. I know that already. That's enough. Right now, I know what it feels like. It feels like this. It's simply unpleasant physical and mental experience.

It feels like this. Met with mindfulness. Met with compassion.

There's nothing to fix. There's nothing you need to change because it isn't you. It isn't me. It's just thoughts and unpleasant feelings and sensations. It's just a mental state, as we say.

That's not a put down. When I'm suddenly caught in something difficult in my life and I recognize, "Oh, this is just a mental state"—that's like a huge freedom. Because I know, even though it feels so gripping... Isn't that one of the things about difficult and unpleasant mental states? Even though we know better, it feels like this is how it's going to be forever. This is it. All that other stuff came and went, but this one is different. Four more weeks? I don't think so. This is the root of who I am.

And once you recognize, "Oh, this is a mental state"—because somehow just being able to have awareness big enough to name that—actually, the awareness, the attention, the energy relaxes into the experience of the mental state. When I recognize it like that, without resistance, without so much identification, without making it a problem. "Oh, primal terror feels like this."

Serious. When I get to primal terror, I'm really happy, because all that craziness my mind has been doing since I was two to avoid feeling it—I don't need to do that anymore. "Oh, primal terror is like this." It's a huge relief.

Because who told us we would only have pleasant mental states? Did you think that the more you sat, you'd only have pleasant ones? Pleasant states are important. Wholesome states are important. The arahat maybe only has wholesome mental states. But until we're arahats, if we hate every unwholesome mental state, if we take it as proof of what we always knew—that we're useless and a failure—well, it just keeps on spinning, doesn't it? It just keeps on spinning.

So—oh my, I have so much more to say. What is it then that, once aversion comes in—whether it's fear or anger or self-judgment—what feeds it? I've said how mindfulness and just meeting it as it is helps it to drop, but what feeds it?

One thing Sally talked about last night was wise attention. There's also unwise attention. The Buddha said—and I find this very helpful—unwise attention to the repugnance of an unpleasant object. Repugnance means it's repellent to us, the aspect of the unpleasant experience that just feels yucky. Unwise attention to that is what feeds aversion and really keeps it spinning.

Ṭhānissaro Bhikkhu always gives a very concrete example. If you're really angry with somebody—they've just done something and you're really angry—if you keep looking at them, what does that do to the anger? What effect does that have?

Dosa is the word in Pali for all the different qualities of aversion. I actually want to use dosa because there's frustration and anger and fear and resistance, but dosa covers all of it. I like to use dosa because it takes me out of the minuteness of the story.

So I'm looking at the person, and they did this to me, and the anger is getting bigger. And then dosa in the mind distorts perception. Have you noticed that? Have you noticed that if you're really angry with someone, the more you look at them, they kind of start to look uglier? It does that, you know.

Or if something is uncomfortable—there's some food and you're really feeling sick, you feel nauseated—does the food in front of you look attractive? Does it look good? Maybe. But if you've ever had food poisoning from something you ate, you know what happens. You just know. You can't go near that food for fifteen years. Does it look attractive?

Does it become distorted? And then it just keeps going. We just keep looking at it, looking at it, looking at it.

You know how if you have a little broken tooth—it doesn't even hurt, but it's just rough? Can you keep your tongue away from that? Your other teeth are fine. Do you even notice them? Of course not.

And then it's unpleasant, and then we get more unpleasant, and it just spins and spins and spins. Then you're on edge, so the next unpleasant thing that enters your line of perception—some poor person happens to walk a little too close—and the mind goes, ugh! What did they do? Nothing. But aversion feeds on itself.

And if you're inclined towards self-judgment, then it turns back on yourself. "What's the matter with me? I shouldn't have done that. I shouldn't have had that aversion to that person. I'm so bad." And we don't see—that's just dosa in the mind again. So I might be analyzing, "Oh, aversion to them, but no, aversion to me. No, I really shouldn't be like this. This is because when I was a child..." And it just keeps it going.

But if we can simply note, "Oh, dosa in the mind feels like this"—it takes the personality out of it. It takes a lot of the identification out of it. The attention is able to really be there. "Oh, dosa in the mind is like this, is like this." The papañca doesn't have to take off so much.

So one way aversion is fed is through this unwise attention to the unpleasant aspect of an experience that we don't like, and we just can't leave it alone. Another way is just outright denying—consciously anyway—that this unpleasant or difficult thing is happening, externally or internally.

I have a friend in Switzerland where I teach. She used to be a cook at the meditation center there. It's in the mountains, and the weather changes very quickly. You get up in the morning and it's a beautiful blue sky. By noon, clouds are coming over the mountains, and by afternoon, it's raining. She came from a flat part of Switzerland—there are flat parts in Switzerland—and she loves lying out in the sun in the summer. So she'd be lying in the garden, and then the clouds would start coming, and it's getting all dark. And she'd just say, "No, this isn't happening."

We do that when we have the idea we should be perfect. We should be loving. We shouldn't feel angry. "No, I don't feel angry." Has anyone ever done that? "Oh no, I'm not feeling aversion to this. This pain in my back—I'm just equanimous with this." We're walking, we're bored, people are just a little too close. "Well, I'm just equanimous with this. This is just a little, you know..."

And we fool ourselves until suddenly it breaks out somewhere. "I seem a little overaversive to this little thing. What could have been going on?"

So outright denial—and we don't notice it until suddenly it shoots up really strongly.

Or another pattern is just some little subtle background unpleasantness. It could be just a mood of very subtle tiredness, or discontent, very subtle—we hardly notice it. But it's going on.

And it can slowly, not noticing what's happening, the aversion feeds on itself each time.

For instance, in my mind and body, when I'm really tired—and at night I'm almost always really tired—my body is uncomfortable. It hurts a little. And I would get aversive. I didn't really learn this until the last few years, but thank God I finally learned it. At night, I used to get a little cranky once in a while. And if I was doing something with my family, I was much more likely to get cranky. Even now we have teacher meetings and I always say, you know, we should have them in the afternoon. It's really a lot better for everybody because I just get cranky and impatient.

But I notice it much more now. And I see that what it comes from is the uncomfortable, unpleasant feeling in my body and my not bringing awareness to it. So the mind tries to move away from the unpleasant, and in that comes aversion, and then it just shoots out at whatever other unpleasant experience arises. When I just recognize—oh, body feels like this, unpleasant, painful—well, it's really fine. It's really fine. And I don't feel that uncomfortableness, that negativity in myself that I used to feel when I got really tired. If I just remember to notice.

Another form is resistance. Just that sense. And resistance can really fool us. Resistance can come with a really good story about why we shouldn't do something. Take walking meditation, for example. "I'm just feeling so tired right now, and I really think it wouldn't be helpful to walk." Or, "I just feel heavy, and I think sitting is better. Sitting is calmer. Walking is more gross. I don't think I should do the walking."

Resistance can just be a habit. Once you recognize it's a mental state—oh, resistance feels like this—it doesn't mean anything. It doesn't mean anything. You stand there, feel resistance, and start walking. Resistance is gone. Just a mental state. But when we don't notice it, again, because there's not the connection, there's that delusion. We're not with what's actually happening. And the one aversive thought leads to the next aversive thought, and the next thought, and the whole thing spins and becomes really solid.

So all of these forms of delusion that increase through aversion, through the not connecting—this is really how aversion increases. And when it's self-hatred, this is how we get lost in it: by not knowing what's happening.

These habits are very, very deep—these habits of assessing our life, assessing our experience by virtue of how much is pleasant and how much is unpleasant. And somewhere deep down there, when it's unpleasant, it's so familiar to evaluate it as being wrong, as being bad. And that really our life, our journey, is one of having more and more pleasant, more and more good things. If that's how we think, then whenever unpleasant comes, the Buddha described it so well in that sutta, the Two Darts, which I want to read a little more than usual of, because he describes the whole thing.

He says, what an unenlightened worldling—puthujjana, it's easier to say—what they do when they are shot with an arrow. There's a bodily unpleasant feeling. That happens to everyone. An uninstructed worldling, what they do on being shot with an arrow: he worries and grieves, he laments, he beats his breast, he weeps and is distraught. Thus he experiences two kinds of unpleasant feelings, a bodily one and a mental one.

You get the drift. Self-hatred is exactly that. Self-judgment is exactly that. Something unpleasant happens, and we turn around and stab ourselves. It really is—sometimes it feels like I'm stabbing myself in the heart. You're so bad. You're so wrong. This shouldn't be happening. Just complete second dart.

Then he goes on: having been touched by that painful feeling, he resists it and resents it.

So say you're feeling angry. Say you've had good concentration, whatever that means to you, and it's gone. Say you had a really calm day sitting, and now you can't string two breaths together, and you really hate it. That's unpleasant feeling. We resist it, we resent it.

And then in one who so resists and resents that painful feeling, an underlying tendency of resistance, just a habit of resistance, comes to underlie the mind. It becomes a habit. Self-hatred is just that habit. Something unpleasant happens, and it's all my fault.

Then under the impact of that painful feeling of that resistance, one proceeds to enjoy sensual happiness. Why? As I said this the other night, an untaught worldling knows of no other escape from painful feelings except the enjoyment of sensual happiness.

So something's unpleasant. You're blaming yourself. You're loathing yourself. You're sure you've done wrong. So what do you do? You run into the refrigerator at midnight when you think no one will be there and eat a handful of figs. Just something pleasant. But we know where that goes, don't we? Because then your stomach hurts. Or then you have the feeling, "Ah, I was trying to take eight precepts, and now I ate three." And then we go back to it's unpleasant, and you beat and you beat. And then you know no other way out except the enjoyment of sensual happiness, so you go and read something. And then you go, "Oh, I read," and you beat and you beat.

You get it? This is the weariness with saṃsāra.

But this is broken if we simply have the courage and the willingness to look. You don't have to fix it, but just to have that steadiness of mindfulness, that kindness to just come in and notice what is happening.

If the pain, if the difficulty is unacceptable, we often get a sense like an idealization of how it's supposed to be. We do this in ourselves. We do it in the world. We definitely do it in meditation practice—this sense of not really getting that painful stuff happens. Even though we get it on the intellectual level, on the deep cellular level, when you start beating yourself up, going into hatred because—I don't know—it can be something so simple as your foot hurts, or you ate too much, or craving had the audacity to arise in your mind even after you've been so concentrated. Or, "I really saw through that pattern. I really saw through it. I understood it. Finished, right? That one's not coming back again." And it comes back. Of course it comes back. What do you think?

So we get into this sense of idealization, and that's another place that feeds selective perception. We only see what we think it should be. And that keeps feeding that running and resisting the unpleasant and going for the pleasant.

The selective perception is really a fascinating thing. Sally talked a little bit about it the other night, this idealization. And notice, sometimes it's helpful to actually bring into your mind in words what views you're holding of what the ideal you should be like. "I should never..." If you really say it, hopefully you can realize how ridiculous it is. Because when we have these idealizations, they're really up there.

I should never be angry again. I'm a practicing Buddhist. I only feel metta toward other people. I don't feel angry. If I feel angry, it's because I'm bad, I'm wrong, so I shouldn't feel it. And of course, that itself is dosa in the mind.

An example I use often: on a retreat I was teaching with a friend in California years ago, there were about fifty people, and many of them were brand new yogis. It was their first retreat—a five-day retreat. So we were giving all the instructions about how to sit: you can sit on a bench, on a zafu, on a chair. It's about the posture. We explained everything.

About the fifth day, a middle-aged woman came to me in the interview and said, "I have been in nothing but excruciating pain at every single sitting. I just can't sit cross-legged. I've never done it in my life. I'm a fifty-year-old woman, but sitting cross-legged, all I'm doing is filled with hatred, anger, and aversion, fighting the pain. It's unbearable." This had gone on for five days.

Then she said, either that morning or the night before, "I looked up and noticed for the first time—I noticed, oh, Carol's sitting in a chair. Maybe it's okay to meditate sitting in a chair."

It wasn't even the sense, which we all have, of knowing we can use a chair but refusing to really do it because we know deep down that the real stuff happens on the cushion. I know. You all go through that. I went through it myself, until you have to give up and accept reality as it is. But this wasn't even on that level. This was on the level of her not having consciously noticed that I was sitting in a chair. I'm sitting up there talking the whole day.

The selective perception was so strong—this is how it's supposed to be—that we don't even let reality in. It's a fascinating thing.

This is why the steadiness, the continuity of mindfulness, is essential. Not that you can force it, but the willingness to be continuous matters. The selective perception comes in when we click on and click off. We pay attention when we like something, or when we don't like it. We pay attention at certain times and then don't notice when that isn't going on. She would notice whenever she saw people sitting cross-legged. She wouldn't notice me or the other people in chairs. She would notice how painful it was, but the thought would never come into her conscious head to try another way, even though we were saying it. It sounds incredible when I describe it, but this is what we all do.

Self-hatred is a function of this idealization, this sense of perfection. Your practice is never good enough. What's it supposed to be like? "I'm not with the breath enough." What would enough be? "I'm not concentrated enough." The Buddha said one of the four things that drive people mad to think about is the power of a concentrated mind. You're never going to be concentrated enough if your idealization is simply more, more.

This is when the dosa actually distorts what we perceive. We don't perceive accurately, and then our decisions aren't accurate. This is the Buddha: "Brahman, when one dwells with a mind obsessed and oppressed by ill will and does not understand as it really is the escape from arisen ill will, on that occasion one neither knows nor sees as it really is one's own good, or the good of others, or the good of both."

So not to hate ourselves, but just to notice when there's dosa in the mind, when it's taking the form of self-judgment. If you don't remember anything else I say tonight, remember this: when there's self-judgment in the mind and you're caught in it,

You can't believe any thought you have. No thought you have can you believe. Because it's all distorted by dosa. And so when you're trying from a place of self-hatred to make your practice better, what are you using for an assessing tool? It's unreliable.

At that point, though, you don't need to do anything except notice: oh, dosa is like this. Dosa in the mind is like this. This is the amazing tool of awareness just receiving what's happening, of mindfulness just meeting experience.

A couple of quick ways. Mindfulness and compassion are really our allies here. They work together. Sometimes mindfulness is enough. Sometimes we need to consciously bring in the kindness, the compassion. So sometimes when you realize you're caught in judging and aversion, it's mild enough that you can consciously bring in mindfulness to ask: what's the sense contact that's triggering this right now? And really come in there.

One time I was in Burma on retreat and had to sit in my kuti, my little hut. And they decided, as they always do, to start a construction project just across the street—not even as far away as the first row of chairs there. That meant from 7:30 in the morning till 5:30 in the afternoon, they were doing some kind of electric sanding, solid. It was really that grating noise. And then they came in with another one on a different frequency and a different sound, and they would go in tandem.

And I saw right then—it starts. The whole thing starts. But I saw so clearly: I have no choice here. I either surrender into, die into the unpleasantness of this sound, or it's going to be a bad scene. And so, knowing that, knowing we can—this is where we say awareness can be with anything—it was like, just relax. And then I'd take a breath, and the other one would start up. Okay. And I could really see: if I just let the attention—and it wasn't heavy—just be with it, relax into it. But as soon as I'd let the attention move away: I can't believe it, it's all over. So you just come back. And you can watch that.

Sometimes that's quite possible. That's with continuity and a light but very committed touch with the awareness. Sometimes it's more about looking at the mental state, being with the unpleasantness. For example, Sayadaw U Tejaniya talks a lot about sitting with a strong pain. Sometimes we'll say just be with the pain, notice how it breaks up. And sometimes, if the mind's calm enough and the samādhi's strong enough, it really does—boom, just go into the sensation. It breaks up and there's no even sense of unpleasantness, no problem. There's no aversion.

But you can't always do that. There has to be the right combination of factors, as you know. You all know you can't always do that. So other times you try it, but it's just not happening. And what is happening in the mind? Then it's much more useful: don't pay so much attention to the physical pain. Actually bring your sati, your mindfulness and compassion, to the aversion in the mind—to the tightness in the mind, the aversion in the mind, the self-hatred, whatever form it's taking. And that's the next arising object of awareness. It's not bad or wrong. We can be mindful of aversion. We can bring compassionate attention to the feeling of self-hatred.

That doesn't make it feel good. That's idealization. Self-hatred is always going to feel like self-hatred—that's its nature. But the aversion to it can actually fall away.

There's a sense that this is actually how the habit begins to change with the two darts. The difficult, unpleasant pain or mental state is there, and the habit is to say, "Oh, this is horrible. I should fix it." And that's just increasing dosa. That's dosa feeding dosa in the mind. "Oh, self-hatred. It feels awful. I hate myself."

But when we can meet it with awareness—"It's like this"—that moment of mindfulness, of compassionate awareness, is actually what's creating new karma. That's the moment of new karma. And that's not dosa. That's mindfulness. That's compassion. That's wholesomeness. That's actually what begins to change the pattern.

So it's not bad that this difficult stuff comes up. It really isn't. How we can meet it in this moment is all there is. It's the whole place of practice. Can we meet it? Sometimes we can with mindfulness, with compassion. Sometimes we can't.

This is Ajahn Sumedho: "If you're being very idealistic and you hate someone, then you think, 'I shouldn't hate anyone. Buddhists should have metta for all living beings. I should love everybody. I'm a good Buddhist, so I should like everybody.' And all that comes from impractical idealism. That's not wisdom. So instead, try having metta for the aversion you feel, for the pettiness of the mind, for the jealousy, the envy. Metta means peacefully coexisting in the moment with these experiences, not creating more problems, not making it difficult or creating problems out of the difficulties that arise in life within our minds and in our bodies." Metta as peaceful coexistence.

Sometimes the energy of the self-hatred, the anger, is really big. And so the mindfulness has to be also really big and almost very gross. It's not always nice and tidy—"anger is like this" and "self-hatred is like this." Sometimes the anger is just spewing, but you can still meet it with mindfulness.

I have invented what I call stomping meditation. One time I was so angry at something someone had said or done outside of the retreat. I went out and I was really with the anger, but I couldn't sit—the energy was so strong. So I was away from people and I was really just stomping up and down, up and down, back and forth, but feeling the body, feeling the energy of the anger just churning in my stomach, and seeing how that just fed the thoughts. And if I went into the story, how much that increased the physical experience of the anger. I learned so much about how anger and papañca fuel one another. And it was not at all a pretty, subtle meditation. I was really out there making sounds and stomping. But that's okay. Mindfulness can also be big. Compassion can take many forms.

I've noticed in myself, in and out of retreat, that the times when I feel most disconnected, alienated, confused—when I can't figure out what's going on, and that may go on for however long it goes on—it's when I finally notice, when I just sit down and ask, "What's happening?" I always see that that sense of alienation, separation, confusion is arising because there's something happening right now in my experience that I'm basically trying to avoid, deny, repress.

And as soon as I recognized, "Oh, it's this primal terror, this unpleasant memory, the pain in my body, the scleroderma coming back," whatever it might be—or the sense of, "I can't believe I did that stupid thing"—as soon as I could say, "Oh, shame feels like this," in that moment, the connection, the sense of wholeness, the sense of aliveness is back again.

In trying to hold ourselves separate, we're shutting ourselves off to so much of life—our own life and the life of all beings around us. By actually finding that courage, that willingness to open into the unpleasant as well as the pleasant, as well as the neither, we're really opening into all the beauty and vibrancy and compassionate connection and love that's available in life.

When Joseph talked about viriya the other night, he spoke about it in terms of courage. I think he mentioned Martin Luther King—the courage, the energy to keep showing up. In the midst of so much suffering, in the midst of such powerful forces of opposition, how does one do it? Yes, there's viriya, there's courage, but I also want to offer that the sense of real compassion and the ability to be with difficulty comes from the deep wisdom that knows difficulty, fear, pain, loss, and violence are part of life. It doesn't mean we like it or we want it. We really can do what we can to change that, but not out of avoidance.

The ability to really be present, be steadfast, to bear witness in the midst of the most horrific experiences—our own, others', the world's—to me, those are the people I find most inspiring, whom I respect and admire the most. And it starts with ourselves. Can you bear witness? Can you accompany yourself in your own difficulties, in the self-judging, in the idealization, in the trying to be perfect? Can you simply say, "No, this is what it is now. I can be with this just as it is"?

Why? It's not just for ourselves. There's no way it's just for ourselves. Joko Beck asks, can we find in ourselves a willingness to rest in the confusion and unpleasantness? Why? Because as the Dalai Lama says, why do we endeavor to discover the present moment? Because it's the only place we can know love.

Whatever's happening in this present moment, when you can accompany yourself with compassion, with mindfulness, through the fear, the self-hatred, the unpleasantness, the beauty, the change—then you can be there for somebody else, your friends, your family, whatever situation you might find yourself in, joining the truly inspiring people in this world.

So we're not doing this just for ourselves. We're doing it for everybody. And for me, that really gives a greater sense of aspiration and a little more courage. When I'm really fed up with being with this junk in my mind just for myself, the sense that it isn't just for me—it's for all beings—gives me more energy to be there, more courage to be there, more compassion to show up.

May we all discover love in this present moment.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 33

Unity of Compassion and Emptiness

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the essential unity between emptiness (suññatā) and compassion (karuṇā), demonstrating that these are not separate qualities but two aspects of the same awakened understanding. She explains that genuine insight into the empty nature of experience—the absence of a fixed self, the impermanence of all phenomena—naturally expresses itself as compassion, loving-kindness, and equanimity. Conversely, deep compassion becomes sustainable only through the wisdom of emptiness.
>
> Wilson addresses the common experience of feeling that emptiness teachings seem cold or alien, distinguishing authentic understanding from 'falling into emptiness'—a conceptual nihilism that lacks the quality of being 'ceaselessly responsive.' Drawing on teachings from Tibetan masters including Nyoshul Khenpo, Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche, and His Holiness the Dalai Lama, she describes the natural state of mind as empty, spontaneously knowing, and ceaselessly responsive to suffering.
>
> Through powerful contemporary examples—including activists in Burma facing 65-year sentences, refugees in Congo, and the process of aging and death—Wilson explores what it means to 'bear witness' to suffering without drowning in despair or shutting down. She shares inspiring accounts from Sister Chân Không and Martin Luther King Jr. as models of sustained compassionate action rooted in wisdom. The talk emphasizes that our meditation practice—bearing witness to our own pain with acceptance—is precisely where emptiness and compassion unite, transforming habitual reactivity and opening us to genuine connection with all beings.

Unity of Compassion and Emptiness

Unity of emptiness and compassion. The main point I want to make is not that these are two ways of talking about, or two aspects or manifestations of, the same reality, the same understanding, the same wisdom. It's not as if they merely go together. Rather, there's no way that real understanding of emptiness—that no experience is lasting, that there's no specific self in anything—does not manifest as compassion, or loving kindness, friendliness, or equanimity. They just go together.

And conversely, the real depth of compassion, the ability to really be present, that quivering of the heart together with the capacity to be here for one's own difficulties, for another's difficulties—it gets more and more possible with greater and greater depth and breadth only through the wisdom of emptiness. The two really are the same, two aspects of the same thing.

But of course, as life is, as our practice is, as we develop, things don't remain completely balanced all the time. We can, in our mind, put too much emphasis on one or the other, or think one's missing and get kind of upset because it's not all perfectly balanced every moment.

Here, a lot of what we've been talking about includes both, but in terms of the practice of mindfulness, the practice of insight, the teachings of anatta, dependent origination, the sense of non-clinging—really recognizing the emptiness of self, the freedom of heart and mind in non-clinging—as quite a few people have said, there can be moments when that recognition is really freeing, and other moments when some of the words that have been used can feel alien, unfamiliar, uncaring, inhuman.

As Guy said, quoting Trungpa I think: nostalgia for samsara. You just want to get back to it. It feels like we're really in there, in the juice, really. That's really what it's all about. And compassion would be in there with your heart ringing and caring and crying and grieving. Without that oomph, something's missing.

And sure, part of it is that in touching the space, more and more the sense of freedom of heart and mind in non-clinging—it is unfamiliar. Hopefully it gets more familiar, but at first it is unfamiliar. And our habit of not liking the unfamiliar leads us to think something must be wrong, something is missing. Which, thank God it's missing—that's the whole point of our practice. But something does feel absent at that time.

But that's also not all. One of the lovely ways that some Tibetans describe the natural state of mind is that this emptiness also has the quality of spontaneous knowing, as we've been pointing to—just natural cognizance. Like, as Sally was saying, you hit the bell, you hear it. It's immediate. It just happens, out of nothing, going back to nothing, out of the emptiness. That's spontaneous.

The third quality that rounds it out—because there's no shape and no nothing—is that emptiness is ceaselessly responsive. The heart and mind of awakening, of non-clinging, of wisdom, in the real knowing of emptiness, confronted with a situation requiring action, will naturally respond from either compassion or loving kindness or joy or equanimity—whatever is appropriate. Ceaselessly responsive. Not distant, empty, indifferent, cold, void, nothingness.

to kind of fall into a view, a taste of emptiness that does seem alien, indifferent. To some of us, that's a near enemy really of equanimity, but you can kind of—they call it falling into emptiness—where there is not really the ceaselessly responsive nature.

This is from Nyoshul Khenpo, who was a great Dzogchen teacher: "The danger is that we hear too much too soon. We think we have understood shunyata, or emptiness, and we err on the side of the absolute in a nihilistic fashion, and we're obscured by concepts—the concept of emptiness." Nagarjuna said, "It is sad to see those who mistakenly believe in material, concrete reality, but far more pitiful are those who believe in emptiness." Believing in emptiness because that's just a concept.

Nyoshul Khenpo says, "Those who believe in things can be helped through various kinds of practice and through the way of skillful means. But those who have fallen into the abyss of emptiness find it almost impossible to reemerge, since there seem to be no handholds, no steps, no gradual progression, and nothing to do."

I think sometimes this might be what people are afraid is going to happen with just a little taste of non-clinging. "Oh yes, it's all empty, so who cares? It's all empty. It doesn't matter. I can do whatever I want. Whatever happens to you, it's all empty." If, not just in a moment but over time, that's where your practice seems to be taking you, where your understanding seems to be taking you—yes, it's only partial. Something's missing.

But don't get all freaked out, because unless we're really, really strongly attached to the view of emptiness, the concept of emptiness, simply the natural unfolding of wisdom, paññā, awareness, understanding—the mind of non-clinging naturally expresses as compassion. They really do support each other, and you can trust that.

So really, if there's some taste of it that feels alien, unfamiliar, don't freak out. Don't go running away. Give it a little more time. Let it open up. It takes time—a little bit on this side, a little bit on that side. If you trust, they come together, manifest as compassionate.

The understanding of emptiness, the mind of non-clinging, exactly because the energy is released from that contraction, that obsessive self-referencing—all our energy in a way is contracted around the sense of me, me, me. Sayadaw U Tejaniya gives a great example. He says it's like we measure, without realizing, every experience from the felt sense of me. Me here, seeing out there. It's not that we say that, but it's a sense of "this is me, and I'm seeing; this is me, and I'm hearing; this is me, and I'm thinking, 'Oh, how can I help this poor person? How can I be compassionate?' Or 'I'm not compassionate enough.'" He said it's like you're at the center point. In Tibet, they measure the foundation of a house by picking the center point, using a string, and then measuring all the way around to get the footprint of the house. So it's like that with us—the center point.

And so those moments when that's not there, the energy is all released into tenderness for beings, a connectedness with life. There's not this need to protect and fear and plan and manipulate and control.

This is from Nisargadatta Maharaj. I like this a lot. He says, "Once you can say with confidence, born from direct experience, 'I am the world, the world is myself,' you are free from desire and fear on the one hand and become totally responsible for the world on the other. The senseless sorrows of humankind become your sole concern."

So that release from self-obsession releases us, you could say, into being the world. And the natural movement of that is compassion, is connectedness—but without that sense of personal doing or personal fear or personal overwhelm. It's really very different.

Just as we can fall into emptiness, into a concept of emptiness—this indifference, this separation, this "oh, it all doesn't really matter," just floating above the clouds, "this is equanimity"—so we can also fall into compassion when it's not held with the real understanding of emptiness, the equanimity that comes from that, the understanding that we don't control. That equanimity allows us to really be here in the face of difficulty. Without that, that's when we can easily start to either drown in the amount of suffering or our reactions to it, or fall into that kind of denial, shutting down.

So many people say, here and other places, "I really want to open my heart." We do. We have this sense often, almost physical, of the heart here being contracted, our sense of connectedness to the world being separate. You can really feel when there's aversion in the mind—that sense of separation, that sense of alienation.

So with the sincerest wish or wanting or intention to be compassionate, and we are—all of this is in degrees, right?—but when compassion isn't supported, really held from the foundation of emptiness, well, at some point we either have to pull back or we get lost.

The question that comes up often is: how do we contrive to stay open in this world? How can we keep connected? How can we even begin to open to the pain in this world? And it's a bombardment, isn't it? Even just sitting here where you don't have to listen to the news or the newspapers or talk to your family members—it's a bombardment.

I just want to share three things from this week that I heard, the ones that happened to touch me out of thousands of stories, just to remind us this is the world and it is difficult. How, without the deep knowing of emptiness, do we expect to really be present without being ground down?

The first story is from Burma. As you know, in Burma last year there were many totally peaceful demonstrations from monks and activists and ordinary people—really about prices getting high. They weren't even complaining about the government at first. But anyway, a lot of demonstrations. In the past year, a little over a year, they've arrested over two thousand people. And two weeks ago they started sentencing them. In the last two weeks alone, they've sentenced over a hundred people to terms like sixty-five years—sixty-five years for things like using a cell phone without a permit, because that's what they can get them on.

I heard an interview on the BBC. The reporter was in Bangkok because he couldn't get into Burma, and he was talking on the cell phone to one of the activists. Her name is Nilar Thein. At that point she was in hiding. It was a very clear connection—she was talking in Burmese but you could hear her voice clearly, and it was being translated.

Her story: she and her husband, whose name is Kyaw Min Yu but he's called Jimmy, had both been in jail after the 1988 demonstrations. She was in jail for eight years and he for sixteen. They came out, got married in 2006, and had a little baby. But they're part of this 88 Generation Students group—a very well organized but very underground movement, totally committed to peacefulness.

When these demonstrations started in August, they both talked about it along with all the others in their group, and they just marched in these peaceful demonstrations. That's all.

At this point, when they were talking to her, her husband had been arrested immediately in 2007. She had been on the run and hiding for months, at first with her young baby, just a few months old. But that got too dangerous for the baby, so the baby was with her in-laws. The government had guards all around the baby, knowing she would try to see it. So she couldn't go to see her own baby.

They're having this conversation with her, and she sounded so clear—not fanatical, not rabid at all. Very clear, very normal, saying, "Sometimes I despair. I really miss my baby. My husband at least gets to see the family. He's in jail, but the family can visit. I can't even do that. But this was my decision. We all decided who would go out and get arrested, who would go into hiding. We're just following that."

The interviewer was asking, "Don't you ever despair?" And she said, "Well, I have moments when I think I could be doing something more useful. But my friends say, 'No, don't give way to emotion.'" She sounded really clear, and she said, "I've been through so much worse." She's also sick—asthma and bronchitis. "When I was in jail and in solitary and really ill, they would bring me these things to sign. I'm just really clear: when you know what's important and what you believe in, that gives me the courage and the strength. And I know I'm not going to despair."

She said, "I've been through worse than this." And she was just so clear and calm.

Anyway, she was arrested a couple of months ago. She just received a 65-year sentence. Her husband got 65 years too, along with over a hundred other people. And they're splitting them all up now. They're not letting them stay in Yangon anymore. They're scattering all these people to jails all over Burma so their families can't reach them. They can't bring them medicine. They can't bring them food.

That's one story. One story, and there are hundreds of others in Burma. I'm sharing this not to overwhelm us, but just to notice where our mind and heart goes with it. That's one example.

Another one. This is just coming at us. This is this world. There's a lot of fighting in the Democratic Republic of Congo again. I saw a little bit on the news. They were interviewing a young boy, a 10-year-old, who with his mother and grandmother had to run from their village because his father and his three older brothers were killed, along with many, many people massacred. They were in hiding, trying to get a little food and water from neighbors, but there wasn't much. He had to leave school and could probably never go back. And the grandmother, who was over 90 years old, was out for three or four days walking, sleeping rough, just trying to find some food to bring back to the family because she was afraid they would starve to death. And there they sat, just talking to the interviewers.

That's another story. And again, just notice—can we take it in? Can we be here with this? Does the mind get sad? Does it push it away? Does it blame? Does it get angry? There's no right or wrong. It's just for us, with wisdom, to see what arises, what's compassion, how much we might push away.

A third story, just one of a billion stories of old age. The mother of a very good friend of mine, 91 years old—I know her well—lives in Germany. She's been very bright, very active, slowly getting weaker over time. She had a stroke about two months ago, was in intensive care for two days, then back to assisted living. Her daughter and son, my friend, came from Asia, and they've been taking care of her. She's been back in the hospital with internal bleeding, then out again.

She's not so clear anymore. She speaks part gibberish and part coherent sentences. Her body's really weak. She's never been afraid of death. But now she's talking to her dead relatives, calling on spirits. She wasn't particularly religious, but she's saying, "Please, I'm ready. Please help me come to where you are. Please help me come to the other side." But her body won't give up. It keeps getting worse. Then she's in the hospital. Then she's back. This has been going on and on. So they sleep there. They take care of her. They wash her. They feed her. What she's going through, what they're going through to be there with her—

Just to know that this is one of however many billion stories unfolding in this moment.

And I watch for myself. When can I be there? I think of her a lot. When does my mind not want to go there? When does it just want to shut it out? Just seeing all of that.

This is what we're bombarded with in this life. And if our idea of compassion is coming on a really deep level from a sense of me personally doing something, holding or creating this mental state—that's helpful. Inclining the mind towards compassion rather than anger, rather than shutting down, that's helpful. That's part of what I'll talk about.

But in the big picture, if it's all coming from a sense of self, from a sense of me, we can't maintain it. At some point it gets overwhelming. I'm saying maybe it doesn't for you, but at some point, just to be open in this world—without emptiness, we drown one way or the other.

There's a great quotation from James Baldwin I just came across. He wrote, "I imagine one of the reasons people cling to their hates so stubbornly is because they sense that once hate is gone, they will be forced to deal with pain."

I could see for me, in stories where there's a sense of a political oppressor or people acting in really awful ways, hate might be strong, but anger or blame—that is easier than feeling the pain. That's what compassion calls us to do. And without the pañña, the wisdom, the insight—we just start with a little insight—without that, the personal, individual, strength-of-will mind can't hold it.

But when there's that sense, like Nisargadatta says, where we can say with confidence, "I am the world, the world is me," then I don't have to hold it. It's just how it is. And we move from having to be the compassionate person, having to somehow overcome, to just this—the phrase that I really like is a sense of bearing witness. Just being able to be here. And we start just with our own pain.

Bearing witness. Or as I heard on NPR, they have a series called StoryCorps, where they just have people write in and tell a short little snippet of some story of their life that's important, that they want to share. And their motto is, "To listen is an act of love." Bearing witness is an act of courage, an act of compassion. It's that willingness, that ability to be present, to see through.

For myself, I'm really inspired by people who've done that with their lives—by many artists, poets, writers—who maybe weren't the activists in the way of marching or political organizing or doing something in that manner, but who had that ability to really bear witness without falling into anger and hatred. And sharing that is a really powerful force for connectedness and compassion in this world, I believe.

A tiny example: the Russian poet Anna Akhmatova, one of the most famous poets in Russia in the 20th century. Her life spanned from before the revolution, through the revolution, through the Civil War and the starvation, and then all the purges and the terror of all the years of Stalin. Her friends, her husband, her son were all arrested. Some of them were killed. Some were sent to gulags. She wasn't allowed to write. And then came the starvation in what's now St. Petersburg during World War II. On and on. She was just part of all of that, and she was able to write about it.

Just this little story. She's talking about what was called the Yezhov Terror in 1937, one of the big purges when Yezhov was the head of the secret police. So many people were swept up and sent to jail, and if it was one of your relatives, mostly the women who weren't arrested, they would go and stand in line at the jail in Leningrad every day, hoping to hear where their relative was and to hand over a package of food. Every day.

So she's saying, in the beginning of this whole poem called Requiem, covering five years, 1935 to 1940:

No foreign sky protected me.
No stranger's wing shielded my face.

In other words, she didn't leave for Europe as much of the intelligentsia could have.

I stand as witness to the common lot, survivor of that time, that place.

In the terrible years of the Yezhov terror, I spent seventeen months waiting in line outside the prison in Leningrad. One day, somebody in the crowd identified me—because she was quite famous. Standing behind me was a woman with lips blue from the cold who had, of course, never heard me called by name before. Now she started out of the torpor common to all of us and asked me in a whisper—everyone whispered there—"Can you describe this?"

And I said, "I can."

Then something like a smile passed fleetingly over what had once been her face.

And then there's a whole long poem that follows. But it's a beautiful poem. It's filled with heart. All her work is filled with heart, with sadness, with appreciation of beauty, of love, of life. It's not a hateful rant. That's what bearing witness is.

So where do we start? That's what our practice is. Can we bear witness to ourselves? To what's going on in your own mind and body here, sitting here. It doesn't matter if you think, "Well, it's just a knee pain and people are starving." That's denial. That's resistance. That's pushing it away. "No, my pain doesn't count." Pain is pain. Suffering is suffering. We're not so special that our pain doesn't count. So can we bear witness? What is my pain then becomes the pain of all.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama speaks of this when talking about bodhicitta. Of course you're familiar with compassion itself. Karuna translates as the quivering of the heart in connection with suffering, in connection with pain—the natural expression of the awakened heart. Bodhicitta, the awakened heart, tenderly leads us to practice with the intention, with the wish that through our practice we can awaken in order to bring all beings to awakening. That's a vast intention, the most vast aspect of compassion. I'm not saying we should have that. I'm just sharing what the Dalai Lama says about it.

As I mentioned last week, it's a beautiful and very supportive and inspiring aspiration because it gives us the courage to come back and bear witness to ourselves. And the Dalai Lama asks: how does this tender heart, this bodhicitta, develop? He says first, through deep insight into what suffering is. And that arises by focusing on our own experience. Then from that, compassion strengthens with a sense of empathy and connectedness with other beings.

But the point I want to make now is that simply by bearing witness in this way, this willingness to be here for our own experience, it naturally opens up to empathy with all beings in that moment when that so me-centricness lets go. What had been my own particular brand of grief or sorrow or back pain or illness becomes simply grief. All beings experience grief.

Pema Chödrön shares a passage from Stephen Levine. She's talking about bodhicitta, this kinship with the suffering of others, this inability to continue to regard it from afar, the discovery of our soft spot, the discovery of bodhicitta—a Sanskrit word that means noble or awakened heart, inherent in all beings.

Stephen Levine writes of a woman who was dying in terrible pain and feeling overwhelming bitterness. At the point at which she felt she couldn't bear the suffering and resentment any longer, she unexpectedly began to experience the pain of others in agony. A starving mother in Ethiopia, a runaway teenager dying of an overdose in a dirty flat, a man crushed by a landslide and dying alone by the banks of a river. She said she understood that it wasn't her pain, it was the pain of all beings. It was not just her life, it was life itself.

We awaken this bodhicitta, this tenderness for life, when we no longer shield ourselves from the vulnerability of our condition, from the basic fragility of existence. That's what's going on in our practice—opening. So often you feel vulnerable, fragile, so we open deeper and deeper to that.

But you see why. There's also the opening into emptiness, the non-clinging, the recognition that it's not all about me. The two have to go together. They don't always develop completely evenly. Sometimes it's so fragile, so vulnerable, we're so tender, and the mind can't hold it. That's the time when we pull back and work more with awareness. We work more with the sense that awareness doesn't care, that awareness can hold everything. Then there are other times when we think, "Yes, awareness doesn't care"—okay, let's just come back into the tenderness. But mostly it takes care of itself.

And that's why, I think Annie said this the other night, the difficult parts of a retreat—of our whole life—are so important. Where else can we first bear witness to the human state? Not just the human state, but that's the one we know. Where else can we bear witness to it? But also, this is exactly the place where the wisdom of non-reactivity, of acceptance, is changing the habit.

So the difficult stuff that comes up—our patterns, our greeds, our aversions, our self-hatreds—it all feels like, oh, this is all stuff that's supposed to go away. If I had any understanding whatsoever, this stuff wouldn't be coming. And then we just get lost in that.

Instead of seeing, oh, right—kilesas, greed, aversion, fear, delusion—this is the human condition. Again, you're so special, you know? Three weeks, six weeks, three years of practice and no more of that comes up? No, it comes. It's arising. This is what we're here to see. How the mind meets it in the moment is what's creating new karma. That's creating new patterns.

So in that moment of hating the pain, that incredible greed for the seventeenth piece of cake or the first piece or whatever, the aversion, the self-judgment, the judgment of somebody else, the feeling just awful about yourself because you haven't been kind, the pain in your back, whatever it is—in that moment when we recognize, oh, it's like this. Aversion. I really have aversion. It's like this. Wanting. I am such a greedy loser—when we can meet that with, wanting is like this—in that moment, in that moment of acceptance, of bearing witness, what's being practiced is compassion, is acceptance.

Just as we say awareness doesn't care in the moment of awareness, it's the same with compassion. First of all, compassion doesn't arise except in response to suffering. That's one thing. So maybe something beautiful is arising, and you meet that without clinging—that's equanimity or the friendliness of metta. But to really see that if you're able, even for moments, to bear witness to the difficulties in your mind, in your body, in the environment, in your memories, in your home life—this is how the wisdom of emptiness, of non-clinging, and the natural response of compassion are coming together and being strengthened. It doesn't seem like much, just sitting there with your nutty mind, but it is. It really is.

The world is complex. Situations are complicated. Compassion, you know, really—this is again why it has to come with wisdom for it to be reliably real. I like to say it needs to sort of come from the inside out rather than from the outside in.

Compassion, wisdom, all of it starts as a nice idea. We start with a concept, and we work from that concept, of course, because that's how our minds are. Compassion means being with someone in pain, doing what we can to alleviate suffering. And yeah, that's great. And our tendency is, as we've talked about, intention—the motivation that leads to speech and action—that's the heart of karma. That's the seed of all action. That's really where it begins.

But in our normal life, in the way actions and responses are judged in the normal world, it's more like whether the desired result happened determines if our actions were good or bad, useful or not, compassionate or not. If we help somebody who's suffering, great—we could be compassionate. But if we feel compassion and we try to help and we just mess things up more, we tend not to think that was compassion. We think, I blew it. Compassion should be able to fix everything. Even the Buddha couldn't keep his kinfolk from going to war with each other. Compassion doesn't mean we can fix everything.

And it takes real wisdom, real trust, real courage to keep coming back to our inner understanding, our inner intention of being willing to be here, to bear witness with wisdom and then act in the way that's appropriate—but from a mind of wisdom, not from a mind of wanting to fix, or hating it and wanting to change it.

And this can be very complex. We all know stories—friends tell me—of going on peace marches here a couple of years ago and seeing how many of the activists, for whom this was a really big part of their life, were so angry, so bitter. And at some point, frustrated and wanting to turn to violence and breaking windows. It's understandable.

But that's when the compassion or the wanting to change things for the good of the world—when the motivation doesn't really come from that deep wisdom of emptiness, from that understanding that we can't control, from that commitment really to understanding, to compassion.

We've worked with retreats for environmental activists, wonderful people, deeply committed, doing really important work. One lawyer said he was working hard, but he said he needed his anger. "I can't go into court without my anger. These other lawyers are so vindictive, and if I don't have my anger, I'll just be crushed. So don't give me metta. Don't tell me about all this stuff." But he practiced. And at the end, he saw how you can't just compartmentalize. The anger was eating him up too, spewing out on his family. And he really saw that.

It takes enormous faith and courage to trust that we'll go off, we'll try to do our best, and end up responding from some sense of me, what's best for me, or from anger, or from fear. We'll all do that. Or we'll shut down. We'll all do that. But to see that—okay, anger is like this—and come back again just to our own pain, bearing witness to our own pain, and allowing ourselves to come back into contact with really the mind, the motivation, the intention of compassion, over and over and over, trusting enough not to act until we can get in touch with that.

Joseph mentioned Martin Luther King the other night. There's one quotation from him I like very much on this line. When he was in the Birmingham jail, this is one line he wrote in a letter: "We are caught in an inescapable web of mutuality, tied in a single garment of destiny. Whatever affects one directly affects us all indirectly." And everything I've read of him conveys this sense of never making someone the other. Compassion isn't just compassion for the obvious victim or the obvious person being oppressed. Compassion includes everybody, includes the world. And out of that one clarity, maybe one can see what seems the best action. But we don't always know. It's this sense of commitment to that motivation.

So King said once, in 1963, after one of the terrible bombings of a church in Birmingham where four little girls were killed, he said after that, "I have come to see even more as we move towards our goal of justice that hatred must never be our motive. I refuse to become bitter." I mean, I can't even imagine. "I refuse to become bitter."

Or the Dalai Lama, a few years ago, when he was being berated—you know, his deep commitment to nonviolence, to a nonviolent way of trying to get China to withdraw from Tibet, which of course isn't happening at all. Some young Tibetans were basically berating him, saying, "It's not working, it's not working." And in this interview I read, tears were streaming down his cheeks and he said, "Maybe you're right. Maybe it's not working. But I cannot be otherwise. Maybe I'm wrong, but I cannot be otherwise." He could not abandon his deep commitment to compassion and nonviolence.

It's a complex world. We can't know. We can't know all the situations. We can't control it all. Can we have that faith, that courage, and the willingness to be with the pain of our own sense of failure sometimes? To trust in the power of the pure mind, the pure heart, to act from compassion, from caring, from connectedness?

Without the wisdom of emptiness, I don't see how it's possible to keep doing that. The doubt, the confusion would just get too strong.

This is the Dalai Lama again. He's saying that compassion must be derived from our insight into emptiness. This is where the vast meets the profound. If we don't have that, we fall into despair. Knowing that people's suffering is avoidable, that it is surmountable, our sympathy for their—and our—inability to pull themselves out of this suffering can lead to a more powerful compassion. But if it's not supported by the wisdom of emptiness, our compassion may be strong, but it is likely to have a quality of hopelessness or even despair.

I'm not saying this to suggest that if we notice hopelessness and despair, we should jump on ourselves. Of course there's going to be hopelessness and despair. We don't have to be afraid of it. That's again where we come back to bearing witness with ourselves. Oh, hopelessness is like this. But don't confuse hopelessness and despair for compassion. That's where the wisdom and our own self-compassion let us be with it.

And this is a line from Adyashanti I liked a lot: "Saving all beings is not something that you do. Saving all beings is a verb that you become."

So we really need a resilient and flexible heart, a real sense of trust in the mind of non-clinging, and a willingness to keep showing up even when the way isn't clear, even when it seems like we don't even know what to do, and that compassion seems like it's not strong enough.

It seems like the situation is too complicated or too horrible—like the Dalai Lama with Tibet. It doesn't seem to be working.

So then we really find ourselves, we really come down to: What do I really know? Where do I really place my faith? And at this point, having a "should" in our mind—"I should put my faith in compassion"—it's not going to work. But that's okay. And we keep on practicing. We keep on looking. We keep on seeing. This is where compassion is supported by equanimity.

A couple of examples. Without the wisdom of equanimity, we get confused. Because the motivation itself, in a deep sense, can be a true compassionate motivation. It doesn't mean that when we act from it, we get the results we want. The results of actions are out of our control. How hard is it? There's a great story about how we can't control the outcome, we can't control others' responses. And often we try to get as much of the picture of a situation, but often we don't have the big picture.

The story I often tell is from Sister Chan Khong, who is the nun who has worked with Thich Nhat Hanh ever since the Vietnam War. They were both peace activists, but really committed to nonviolence, to compassionate action, and to mindfulness practice. Very sincere practicing Buddhists.

She told this story from the Vietnam War, where she was put in jail for passing out some leaflets in South Vietnam. She was in one cell with a bunch of other women, and in the cell were two young girls, eleven and twelve years old, who had just been caught up in a sweep of a village that the South was claiming were all Viet Cong. They threw them all in jail. But the girls had done nothing, and it was a bad environment.

So Sister Phương, as her name was then, got released because her family knew the chief or whatever. And as she was going out, she had an exit interview with the head of the prison. Very compassionate and very forthrightly, as she is—she's a very strong woman—she said, "You know, these two young girls, they did nothing. Eleven and twelve. This is bad for them. They should be released."

And the head of the prison said, "Oh, I see that the prisoners are talking to each other. They're communicating with each other. And this must stop. I'm going to make the conditions more rigorous." And that was it.

So with all the compassion and wisdom that she could have, doing what seemed right, things got worse. Can we stay open with that? Can we bear witness to our own experience, not get lost in anger, bear witness to our anger or our sense of failure? Can we not give up on the power of compassionate action, of a pure mind and heart?

I know I'm throwing out all these challenges. I'm not saying I have some answer. I'm saying this is a profound exploration for our life. And it's going to bring us up against everything in our hearts and minds and in the world that's in the way of that. It's both seductive and scary and painful. We'll get lost, we'll turn away. But the faith that comes —even just a glimpse of the emptiness of not-self, of the purity of our basic goodness, we can put it that way—the more we learn to recognize and trust this basic goodness of who we are, of the natural mind, then even when we can't quite find it in all the craziness, that's more and more what we come back to. Sort of like how Martin Luther King or Sister Chan Khong does.

So just to say, it's not a one-time thing. It's a life process. Enormous patience, enormous kindness to ourselves as well as to others.

So again, this is Sister Phương. She wrote this during the Vietnam War. She was just in her late teens at this time. Two of their friends, social workers who had been working in a village, had been killed by a grenade attack. This was her eulogy that she said at the funeral:

"We cannot hate you, you who have thrown grenades and killed our friends, because we know that people are not our enemies. Our only enemies are ambition, jealousy, hatred, and the misunderstanding that leads to such acts of violence."

Please allow us to remove all misunderstanding so that we can work together for the happiness of the Vietnamese people.

So that's powerful to begin with when your friends have been murdered. But I read this because it's not as if she just sprang forth as this being of compassion and her life simply rolled out like that. It was an act continuing moment after moment—an act of commitment and rediscovery of the place of mindfulness, the place of wisdom that allows compassion and action to emerge.

I say this because she wrote quite some years later—you know, she and Thich Nhat Hanh were both unable to return to Vietnam during the middle of the war, and they lived in France and started Plum Village for many years. In her autobiography, written I think in the eighties, already twenty years later, she talks about her commitment to never act unless she can act from compassion.

She was still an activist, and at the point she was writing, there was a phase when the Vietnamese government was arresting many monks and nuns and artists. She was involved in a campaign—whenever someone was arrested, she would write letters to the government and try to get a whole movement going, similar to what Amnesty does now.

This is her talking about that:

"Every time I received news of a new arrest, I became angry. And I knew that I had to do walking meditation. Sometimes I would walk several hours in order to regain my calm. Sometimes I needed several days or even weeks to relax my heartbeat, knowing how unfairly the authorities had acted in arresting such a monk, nun, or artist. I always waited until I felt serene before beginning any campaign. Thanks to this serenity, my words were gentle but firm, and people found it easier to cooperate."

What inspires me is that sense of ongoing commitment and the understanding that it is a continuing process to reconnect with our serenity, our basic goodness. To act from a genuine motivation of compassion and caring is so much. It may get better results, but more truly, it's the expression of wisdom and compassion—and her willingness to wait weeks, if that's what it takes.

For us to know: this is someone who has devoted her life, who is a remarkable woman, and this is what it is. This is what, knowingly or not, we signed up for when we set foot onto our spiritual path of awakening. And it's beautiful. It's inspiring. It inspires others.

Bearing witness to our pain, to our suffering, balanced with the equanimity of emptiness, means we can open to more. We can open to more. And it's not suffering. It really is that beauty of connectedness. With wisdom, compassion opens. With bearing witness to our own suffering and that of others, compassion opens. With the simple intention to act from kindness—not some big thing, but just a willingness toward some kind act—compassion opens.

This is from Tulku Urgyen, who was a wonderful, very powerful Dzogchen master. Well, his son, Tsoknyi, first said it: it works both ways. Compassion naturally manifests as an expression of emptiness. When we understand emptiness, compassion naturally manifests. But also, compassion starts with methods of compassion and kindness. Simply being kind can open us up. Because to be kind, we're touching. And this applies in little things.

I've been talking about wars and people dying, but this is present in every aspect of our life. Nisargadatta says that when we realize we are the world, all aspects of our life are calling us to wake up to our non-separation, to our compassion, to bearing witness.

Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche, in his book Heart Treasure of the Enlightened Ones, offers a commentary on a Tibetan text. He speaks about Chenrezig, the bodhisattva of compassion, and I want to share a practice I found so lovely and inspiring, putting it a little in my own language.

Chenrezig embodies the great compassion inseparable from the vast expanse of the Buddha's wisdom—the totality of emptiness and compassion. This practice involves seeing all aspects of experience as the manifestation of Chenrezig himself.

Rinpoche says: Through the blessing of Chenrezig's body, you perceive the whole universe as Chenrezig's Buddha field. Through the blessing of Chenrezig's speech, you perceive all sounds in the universe—the sounds of water, of fire, of wind, the cries of animals, human voices—as the reverberation of Chenrezig's voice.

Imagine that. Next time someone's breathing too loud in the hall, it's Chenrezig's voice. Next time the francolins are calling, it's Chenrezig's voice.

And even more: through the blessing of Chenrezig's mind, you experience all thoughts as the display of Chenrezig's awareness.

Try that. I was practicing on a self-retreat like this, experiencing every thought as the magical display of Chenrezig—

Boy, my relationship to everything was really different. Every animal, every sight, every sound, every mood—this is just the display of emptiness and compassion. This is just Chenrezig manifesting everything. Everything becomes an aspect of emptiness and compassion. It becomes the way that we open up to the world, so that our whole life becomes—not every moment, but just play with that—an expression. Nothing is too mundane. Nothing is too gross.

Let me share a couple of little stories of kindness like that, stories about the power of kindness. This one comes from NPR, from a prisoner who had been in jail for twenty years.

He said: "One day in the prison yard, a scruffy orange cat showed up, and I was one of the first to go and pet it. I had not touched a cat or a dog in over twenty years. I spent at least twenty minutes crouched down by the dumpster as the cat rolled around and luxuriated beneath my attention. What he was expressing outwardly, I was feeling inwardly. An amazing bit of grace—to feel him under my hand and know that I was enriching the life of another creature with something as simple as my care. I believe that caring for something or someone in need is what makes us human.

"Over the next few days, I watched other prisoners responding to the cat. Every yard period, a group of prisoners gathered there. They stood around talking and taking turns petting the cat. These were guys you would normally not find talking to each other. Sometimes I saw an officer, a guard, in the group—not chasing people away but just watching and seeming to enjoy it along with the prisoners. Bowls of milk and water appeared, along with bread wisely placed under the edge of the dumpster to keep the seagulls from getting it. The cat was obviously a stray and in pretty bad shape. One prisoner brought out his small, blunt-tipped scissors and trimmed burrs and matted fur from his coat. People said, 'That cat came to the right place. He's getting treated like a king.' This was true, but as I watched, I was also thinking about what the cat was doing for us.

"There's a lot of talk about what's wrong with prisons in America—we need more programs, we need more psychologists and treatment. But I think what we really need is a chance to practice kindness ourselves. Not to receive it, but to give it."

And then one last example of how simple compassion can be, just everyday compassion, from Studs Terkel. He died just this past October—a legendary oral historian. This was his last piece they recorded on NPR. He loved the human voice, and he noticed when it was missing, as it was one day on an airport shuttle train in Atlanta.

I've taken these shuttle trains a lot. They come every ninety seconds, taking you between terminals. So Terkel is on this shuttle train, and a machine-like voice rang out from above, informing him and his fellow passengers that the train was about to leave the concourse. Otherwise, it was dead silent. The pneumatic doors were closing when a young couple pushed them open to get in.

Without missing a beat, that voice above says, "Because of late entry, we're delayed thirty seconds."

People looked at that couple as if they had just committed mass murder, Terkel said. The two cringed, and Terkel spoke up. "George Orwell, your time has come and gone!" he yelled out.

The passengers greeted his attempt at humor with complete silence. "And now they looked at me," he said, "and I'm with the couple. The three of us are at the Hill of Calvary on Good Friday."

"My God, where's the human voice?" Terkel asked the passengers. Nobody said anything.

So he noticed a baby on the train. He went up to the baby. "Sir or madam," Terkel said to the infant, "what is your opinion of the human species?"

And the baby started to giggle.

"I said, thank God—the sound of a human voice."

From Chokyi Nyima: "When watching the magical display of this world as it seems to be, spontaneously an overwhelming despair and pity well up in me."

When watching its nature of innate simplicity as it really is, I cannot help but feel wonder and break out in laughter. When watching the one who feels pity and the one who is laughing, both disappear and cannot be found. Now what to do?

So let's just sit quietly for a minute. That's what we'll do.

CHAPTER 34

Insight, Views, and Opening to the Mystery

Carol Wilson · 1h03

> In this profound talk from a three-month retreat, Carol Wilson addresses a common challenge practitioners face: the arising of deep insight followed by confusion or discouragement when that clarity seems to fade. She explains the three types of wisdom from the commentaries—suta mayā paññā (wisdom from hearing), cintā mayā paññā (intellectual wisdom), and bhāvanā mayā paññā (experiential wisdom)—emphasizing that only direct experiential insight truly liberates.
>
> Wilson illuminates how insight involves a genuine shift in perception rather than intellectual understanding, and how papañca (mental proliferation) can quickly transform even accurate perceptions into limiting views. She pays particular attention to sakkāya-diṭṭhi (personality view), showing how we construct solid identities from fleeting moments of experience through selective perception and memory. The talk explores various ways practitioners "hit the wall"—through feeling practice is too much, stopping within when things go well, or fearing the loss of familiar reference points.
> Drawing on teachings from the Buddha's discourse with the dying monk Asaji, Thich Nhat Hanh, and even an allegory from The Lord of the Rings, Wilson encourages practitioners to recognize that the path requires repeatedly rediscovering courage and recommitting to practice. She concludes with the Tibetan practice of the three excellences—taking refuge, practicing with pure motivation, and dedicating merit—as a way to strengthen aspiration and find the faith to surrender into not knowing.

I've been noticing—not only in myself, but in all of us through the interviews, especially these last couple of weeks—so much insight, so much understanding opening up in a whole variety of ways, different for each person. It can be insights into impermanence, anatta, into dukkha, that level of nature. There are also many insights into how that manifests as our personality patterns, how we get caught, how we can be free. These are powerful and important aspects of freedom, of understanding, of liberation. And it's wonderful. It's so inspiring for us to witness this, even more so when you allow yourselves to recognize that it's happening for you too.

And then there's the other side of it, something I've also been noticing in many interviews. Not exactly a corollary, but it often comes along: a sense that the insights don't stay. You've probably noticed that. They change. And not always, but often, people can fall into a kind of confusion, discouragement, frustration, or even losing a sense of faith or confidence. You feel like you've really seen through your personality patterns. You've really understood deeply that craving that extra piece of candy isn't going to do it for you. You really let go of it. "Okay, I've got it. I've seen through craving." And in that moment, you really did. In that moment, you really did.

But it's so striking when it changes. We see very clearly, and the mind intellectually knows craving brings suffering, and yet the hand goes out, takes the thing, shoves it in your mouth, you swallow it down, you go get another one—and you're watching the whole thing. Watching it, which only makes it worse, really, right? Because then you can add self-judgment on top of it. "What the heck? Two minutes ago, I was so awakened."

I want to address some aspects of this, because it's a misunderstanding to think that you've somehow fallen away. It's a misunderstanding to feel that way. We're so impatient. And in some ways it's our culture, though not only our culture. There's a famous story Sharon tells: many years ago she got a letter addressed to the "Instant Meditation Society." We see it, we see it once—boss, that should be enough. I'm joking a little, but it can really be quite deeply painful, confusing. It can lead, at times, to a crisis of confidence or just a sense of frustration.

So I want to talk about a few aspects of this—not comprehensive by any means, but just some different things that have come to mind, which I hope are helpful.

One thing to remind you: when you're seeing yourself caught again in a particular pattern that you've really seen, when you know the pain of it and the pattern seems so huge and what you're doing—having that third piece of candy or whatever—seems so enormous, I want to remind you all that you're in a very protected environment. Things are exaggerated in your mind. That helps us see the patterns more clearly. But Sayadaw U Tejaniya loves to say that samādhi magnifies experience, and kilesa exaggerates experience. Put them together—whoa, it's huge.

"I felt this anger at this person. I mean, I felt anger. I really wished them ill."

"Did you do anything?"

"No, no, no. But it's horrible. It's horrible. I'm so greedy."

So just to give you a little bit of a reality check—I heard this on the radio this morning. The day after Thanksgiving is a huge shopping day, right? They were talking about some Best Buy, an electronics store, in Virginia or somewhere. It's a chain. The store was going to open at 5 AM this morning. Five in the morning. You might think, who in their right mind is going to be there at 5 AM? So they sent a reporter to interview people. They interviewed one man who got in line—the store opened at 5 AM this morning, and he got in line at 10 AM yesterday morning. He stayed in line all day and through the night until 5 AM when he could go in and buy stuff.

You know, it's scary, right?

So then she's interviewing him. What are you buying? Oh, you must have really wanted to get stuff for your family and friends. And he just roared with laughter. He goes, "Are you kidding? I'm getting stuff for me. Who would stand in line that long to get stuff for somebody else?" So really, you could cut yourself some slack. That's just one thing I wanted to say about it.

In terms of really cultivating wisdom and insight, there's a constant deepening. I'm sure you've seen it—it's a spiral. It's not that we see through one thing, that's done, and we see something new. I'm still seeing, and this isn't going to be too inspiring, but I'm still seeing the same old personality pattern from different, more subtle points of view. You know how I'm caught. They're more empty. But it keeps spiraling. "Oh, this again" versus "this again." "Oh, now I see." But then we're not really getting the levels of wisdom we think every time. "Now I've got it. Now I see." Oh, this again. It keeps going.

So they talk in the commentaries about three types, three aspects of wisdom. The first is called in Pali sutamayā paññā. Paññā is wisdom. Suta means—it's the same root that the word "suttas" comes from. Suta means what is heard. So sutamayā paññā is wisdom that we get from hearing or reading the words of others—wisdom that comes in from outside. It's important. You could call it borrowed wisdom. It inspires us.

The second one is called cintāmayā paññā—cintā like from citta, the mind. This is roughly translated as intellectual wisdom. With our thinking mind, with our reasoning, with our logic, we kind of look over, we contemplate, we test. Does the stuff that we've heard, the suta, the heard wisdom—does this seem true? Does it seem real in my experience? We're contemplating it. And that's very useful.

But both of those don't really take us into the depth, into ourselves, so to speak. So the third type of wisdom they talk about is bhāvanāmayā paññā, or experiential wisdom. Bhāvanā—the word that's used for meditation, for cultivation of mind. So that's experiential wisdom, what's really based on our own experience.

All three of these are useful. Only the bhāvanāmayā paññā is liberating.

So when we talk about—when we here talk about—oh, you had a deep insight or a shallow insight or some insight, what do we mean by insight, really? Insight really is on this bhāvanāmayā paññā level, this real internal experiential level of knowing, of wisdom. What we call an insight is not thinking about something. We will think later, up the wazoo. But at the moment of insight, it's not thinking. It's a kind of aha moment. Really what it is, is the perception shifts. It's a shift in perception.

I actually really like the translation of Sammā Diṭṭhi as "right view," thinking of view as how you see something. It's almost literal—the perception that allows an insight just shifts. We recognize that the perception, the interpretation, the understanding of an experience, of ourselves, of a situation in life, an interpersonal relationship, or the nature of things—impermanence, for example, or not-self—the way the mind is perceiving just suddenly shifts, and we see it from a completely different angle. You can't make that happen. It happens through the process of steady awareness.

What's so cool is that if the perception shifts, the reality hasn't changed. So it's not that we're creating some new reality. It's more like, "Oh, it's like this." You all know that. We all see that. And when that happens, that shift of perception, we may perceive that way for some moments, for some time. It may not last very long, and the more habitual way of perceiving may reemerge in the next moments, which is fine.

But when you really see—take the example I was giving about eating candy and craving. Intellectually, we may have heard that craving is a cause of suffering. Yeah, yeah, okay, maybe let's look at it. We explore it. We really think about it. We say, "That makes sense." You study the dependent origination. You think about it. That really makes sense. And as we know, that still doesn't end the craving.

Then you have an experience like I mentioned, where there's the wanting, the wanting. You're dying for that candy. You sit there. You be with it. It goes. And it's like, "Oh." The peace, the happiness—it's here. I didn't need the candy. That was a smokescreen. Craving holds out—someone said, I forget who, one of you in an interview said—it's like a false promise. It holds out the promise that it'll make you happy. But you were happy before the craving started. You'll be fine after it ends. Craving itself is the thing.

So you see that really deeply. That's an insight. It's a shift of perception. You really see craving from a different point of view. Even though two minutes later or three days later you have that intellectual memory, the craving catches us again. But having really experienced that perception from another angle, even though it doesn't stay, it has an effect. It has an effect on our mind stream. It has an effect on how we relate. At the very least, it gives us more faith. Okay, craving has really caught me now, but I know there are other possibilities.

We may lose the immediacy of the insight, but even having recognized it and opened to it, it opens up the possibilities. It opens up the box we've been living in without realizing it—the box of what's possible, the box of how we think things are. And that's very powerful.

This shift can be a little thing. I mean, craving is not a little thing, but it can be a little instant. Or it can be a huge shift of perception. For example, times when you're sitting and the whole sense of body falls away. The sense of anything permanent is gone. You just experience for moments, maybe for hours, things simply coming and going. There's nothing steady anywhere. The mind might be afraid. It might be relaxed and happy with it.

But it's real—it goes on, and there's a sense of: "Oh, wow, this is really how it is." That's the place I want to go next. The mind goes, "This is really how it is." But for a while, that shift of perception feels definitive—oh yes, that other was one way, this is another way.

And then we get caught in our black and white minds. If this is true, that can't be true. If this is true, that can't be true, right? Why can't they both be? Different perceptions of things—relative and absolute. This is one way we get confused.

So this point of insight, this aha, this shift of perception—that's really what liberates our hearts and minds. We come to understand, "Oh, that's how things are." There's not the struggle. There's not the trying to make things fit some idea. And this is because that perception may change, may fade. The more familiar sense of solidity of body comes back—we've perceived moments of that all our life, and we'll perceive moments of that again. It's useful.

If we get caught in thinking, "But it was like this, and now it's like that, and I've fallen away, I've lost it"—just as I said in the beginning—this is a place where deep and really transformative insight, which it has been, gets disrespected or shoved away, or we start to doubt because we don't understand the depth and breadth and length of the path. Can the other be okay too when it comes back?

We can fall into a lot of confusion, a lot of views. Now, how do we get there, into that confusion, into those views? Just that thing I said—the thought, "Oh, so this is how it is." Papañca. The definition in the commentary says: what one perceives, one thinks about. That's just normal—what one perceives, one thinks about. An accurate perception, an inaccurate perception.

So when there is an insight—"Wow, maybe things aren't so solid"—it's natural, it's normal that we're going to think about it, that thoughts will come and try to explain and help, because that's the way we hold information, the way we process. There's nothing wrong with thinking about it. That's going to happen.

It turns into papañca—I'd give it two thoughts, and then it's turned. Papañca goes on: what one thinks about, one complicates. One complicates with associations, with memories, with ideas. And then these notions assail and overwhelm a person. This is from the commentaries.

This can happen with the most beautiful insight or with the completely stupidest perception you ever had. It doesn't really matter. Once it turns to "Wow, this is how it really is. So now I know that everything's impermanent. Now I know that I'm not so... How am I going to live the rest of my life? How am I going to explain this to people? No, but now my body feels solid. It feels solid. How can it be?"—whatever way you go, you get the drift.

And if we can do that with a really accurate perception and insight, well, I don't need to tell you where we can go from the thought, "I can't do this right." From the thought, "My breath is ragged and heavy—it means something is wrong." Boom.

So what happens with insight? Often when there's an insight, there's a huge release of energy. We feel it as a kind of happiness, pīti. It's a wholesome release of energy. Often that can just turn back into mindfulness—we're just practicing with it. Often it leads to some thoughts about the insight. That's fine.

But sometimes we get a little carried away in the energy and forget about the mindfulness. And that's when it can go really fast from insight into real exuberant spinning, and then suddenly crash. And you think, "Did I make that whole thing up? Now I'm just back in the soup. How did that happen?"

No problem, because you'll be out of the soup again too. Nothing's permanent. But just to notice this movement from insight into thought. Thought is useful—chintamaya paññā, that level of intellectual understanding—but not to be confused with bhavanamaya paññā, with insight. They're not the same thing.

Simply because a thought arises together with strong energy or strong emotion, wholesome or unwholesome, that doesn't make the thought more accurate. This is really important. In fact, I would tend in the other direction. The thoughts arising with really strong emotion and punch—hmm, check it out. Don't land in that story. Just come back and feel the energy that's underneath it.

So this is from Thich Nhat Hanh: "Understanding does not arise as the result of thinking. It's the result of the long process of conscious awareness." Just what we've been saying. Sometimes understanding can be translated into thoughts, but often thoughts are too rigid and limited to carry much understanding. That's not to say thoughts are bad. It's just recognizing how we can use them but not mistake them to be able to do more than they can.

One of the ways—or maybe the main way—that we get tricked by thoughts, that they are rigid and limiting, is when there's this papañca, this whole proliferating story. What we perceive, we think about, and we use the perceptions and the thinking to define our world, as Guy and Sally have talked about. That can be useful if we know what we're doing. The bell rings and we know it's lunchtime—that's a perception, that's a thought, time to go eat, totally helpful. You hear "meditate," all those thoughts, totally helpful.

But when it becomes a problem is when the thoughts, the explanation, the defining of our world becomes a view, an explanation. Without recognizing it, views are one of the main fields of attachment, one of the main fields of grasping. We've mentioned this too. And views are so seductive and can be so subtle.

The Buddha describes a view as when the mind thinks, "This alone is true and everything else is false." But what I've found is that views rarely signal themselves that clearly. In fact, often I don't even realize I'm holding a view. This is how we think the world is, or this is how we think I am. The whole idea of personality view, as Guy described—it so clearly arises just with a moment of craving and clinging to any of the aggregates. But it really strengthens into this view of "this is how I am, this is who I am, this is mine," and then the rest of the thoughts that lead to papañca.

A view is like a box that our idea of ourselves and the world is bouncing around inside, but it's a completely illusory box that we don't know is there. It defines, it limits our world. And we often don't even know we have it until some perception arises. Well, you know, the view kind of shrinks our perception. So when you're thinking "I'm doing this wrong" and you're really believing that, any perception that comes in just shows that you're doing it wrong. We've talked about this before—the selective perception. And often the way we know there's even a view there is when we start to feel somehow threatened or fearful or uneasy, when some perception is coming in that doesn't fit the view but that we can't completely block.

A friend of mine was telling me a story about a Tibetan lama he was with a long time ago, Lama Gendun. Seeing through views, this opening into the moment, just having the possibility that how we think things are is just an idea—it's really about this willingness to open into the mystery, into the unknown, into unknowing, you could say. And so often we're not comfortable there.

So he was telling me this story in relation to this idea, on a retreat or a teaching with Lama Gendun. The lama was going on in a really, really long description and explanation about one of the deva worlds in the Tibetan system called the Pure Land, the Dewachen, which is where the Amitabha Buddha resides in that system. It's said that if you want to aspire for another realm to be born into in your next life—this is just a tip—this is a really good realm to aspire to, because it's a deva realm. So it's not too horribly suffering, but it's one where there's dharma teaching, so you don't get totally lost in the pleasure. Can't hurt. Aspire. Aspire isn't the same as greed. Anyway, he's going on and on describing the realm, the Buddha, a very happy realm of practice, very intricate.

And after quite a while, he looked up at this skeptical audience of Westerners, just kind of sitting there, okay, the teacher was on his trip. And he just looked at them and said, "If you think I'm making this up, I've been there." And then he went on with his description.

So just what do we do with that? It's really interesting. That's just an example. Wow. Could be great if I could just let go. Just to see when something kind of rattles our cage, and see how quickly our views spring up over nothing—over nothing.

I was with some friends in Germany at a retreat, and we were having lunch. Two of the people were cooks, and there were mushrooms for lunch somehow. One of them said, "Mushrooms, you know, they're the most easy food to digest." The other one goes, "No, mushrooms are the most difficult food to digest." So that was just starting what could have been an easy conversation, and they each had readings and things that they'd read. We could just see with what intensity—but we could all see it. Okay, who knows? For some people, it's easy. For some people, it's hard. Let's just put it down. But just to see how quickly that can happen about something completely inconsequential—unless you're lethally allergic to mushrooms, then it matters.

So, never mind that the strongest, most seductive, and most limiting view that we get caught in over and over and over is this sakkāya-diṭṭhi, personality view. And it's when we're caught in sakkāya-diṭṭhi, in our view of personality, that we're going to believe these thoughts of discouragement or frustration—that I can't do it, or it should be better by now, or any way that it goes, doubting the practice. It's coming from belief at that moment in sakkāya-diṭṭhi.

It's the habit, as Guy said, of perceiving and thus interpreting any particular moment of nāma-rūpa—mind and matter—as me or mine. And we do this all the time. If we're aware of what's arising in the moment, that's fine. As you know, it goes like that.

I think I used this example last year, but I was doing something that required doing some little thing with my hands, putting something together in the house. And I was having a bit of a hard time, kind of fumbling around. It didn't just go easily. It wasn't a horrible thing, just a little bit of fumbling. And it was unpleasant. So there's a little bit of aversion and impatience in my mind. "You're so clumsy." This is true—I don't have good eye-hand coordination. And from that moment, "You're so clumsy," the aversion to it immediately flowered into this whole view, which didn't feel like a view. It just felt like that's me. That's Carol. She's clumsy. She always has been. She can't play sports. That's why I meditate, because I can't do anything active. You can pick everything wholesome I've ever done in my life, and it all comes from compensating for being a total klutz. And believing it at that moment—that is who I am. That's Carol. It goes so far, so fast.

And then the selective memory, picking out the fifth grade gym class for losers, which I was put into because I couldn't throw a softball further than thirty-three feet when we had the President Kennedy physical fitness tests. These things are deeply traumatic.

This is where, when we see it, it's funny—it's just empty thoughts, it's not a problem, it's not bothering me now. But when we don't see it, we're believing that papañca. That's all papañca. We're mistaking it for what's happening in the moment. I mean, the papañca is happening, but we're believing the content is accurately describing reality.

And this is where we just need to recognize: I don't need to fix it. I don't need to go out and suddenly, after all these years, find some way to become more coordinated eye to hand. I don't have to go to therapy to get over the trauma of not being good at sports. I mean, I could do any of those things.

That's fine. There's nothing wrong with any of those things. But in that moment, it's just, oh, unpleasant feeling. Unpleasant memories. Unpleasant experience of trying to do this. Basically frustration because I don't want to be doing this—I want to be doing something more enjoyable. Let's cut to the chase here. And you just see, okay, it's like this. You just feel that.

This is where the power of our awareness, our mindfulness, our confidence in that, is what we can come to rely on. Not having confidence in our personality. First of all, there is no solid-state personality, which I hope to show. But also, if I was having confidence in my personality, I would have given up a long time ago.

What we see with awareness is that personality is nothing solid-state there. It's just a bunch of thoughts and memories and feelings at this particular moment. At another moment, it's something completely different. That's what we really need to see. And when we see that we're confusing the story, we're making a view and putting it onto the openness, the ever-changing nature of this moment's mental and physical experiences —oh! You don't have to change your personality. You don't have to get rid of it. Oh, it's like this. Physical, mental experience.

Sometimes the story is too complex. The papancha has moved way too far too fast, and you're in the really core personality story of your life, right? We've talked about this before. You're at your core thing, and you can't think it through and dissect it. But I love Ajahn Sumedho's approach. He just says, "Oh, sakkāya-diṭṭhi is like this." You know you're caught in sakkāya-diṭṭhi. You can't go any further than that. Oh, sakkāya-diṭṭhi is like this. That's fine. I've done that a lot. It's wonderful, because it's that little shift from believing the papancha, believing the view, to recognizing a view is happening. Recognizing that even there's belief, but already the perception has shifted. And that's really the place of freedom.

The real support is the awareness, the mindfulness, but the real support is the steadiness of it. Thich Nhat Hanh said that wisdom comes from the long process of continuous mindfulness. Continuous means continuous intention. Of course we know we all space out—that's a given. But the willingness, no matter what we're doing, the moment we realize, "Oh, here I am," to just notice what's happening—that steadiness, that continuity of awareness is what really allows for the perception of impermanence, for the perception of anicca.

Because otherwise, I was just doing my clumsy thing and then I space out for a while and I don't notice all the other moments when something completely different was going on. I come back and notice the clumsy thing three days later. "Oh yeah, I'm a clumsy person. That's who I am."

A good friend of mine who has been a cook here and at Spirit Rock for many years, a long, long-term practitioner, was telling me one day about sitting on a retreat at Spirit Rock. She said, you know, she self-identifies as an aversive person. And her self-identity is supported by her friends—you could put it that way. "Yes, you are an aversive person," right? Sometimes she's fine with it, sometimes not.

But she was sitting, and she was just really feeling bad about herself. I think she'd just had some aversive interaction or something. But she was really feeling badly about herself. And she said, "I'm sitting. Let me not get lost in the story. Let me just stay steady with my awareness and notice what's happening."

And she said, yes, there were quite a few aversive thoughts. But she said ninety percent—maybe ninety percent—of the thoughts and ideas that came up weren't aversive at all. They were neutral, they were compassionate, they were loving, they were generous, they were interested, they were equanimous. She said, "Oh, so this view, this selective perception was picking out the ten percent and saying this is who I am."

She didn't identify herself as a generous person, although plenty of generous motivations and thoughts came through. Plenty of loving, plenty of creative. You see what I mean?

So the steadiness is really what helps us see the impermanence of the view. It's what lets in the perceptions that don't support the view. And that's why sometimes practice is rather uncomfortable, even though it's opening us to much more comfort and ease in the world, a much more spacious and free way of being. But the intersection—we don't like that so much. It's uncomfortable.

The Buddha said, "Bhikkhus, when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated"—developed and cultivated, he doesn't say have it once and you're done—"when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated, it eliminates all sensual lust, it eliminates all lust for existence, it eliminates all ignorance, it uproots all conceit 'I am.'"

That's a pretty powerful statement. You recognize those as meaning a completely enlightened person by the end of that. But it's a powerful statement—the perception of impermanence developed and cultivated over and over and over and over.

So this is where we really need to find the trust, the confidence, the re-inspiration for ourselves over and over and over. That yes, something as simple as the perception of impermanence—and that's just one example—that it really has to be perceived over and over and over. And to have the patience, the faith, not get so lost in either discouragement or our stories we tell ourselves or that sense of hitting the wall. "That's enough already, I'm never going to get there, this whole thing's a waste of time, I saw impermanence and it didn't do it."

I mean, a lot of people have moments—I've had it myself, people have said it here—"I almost wish I never started on a path if I knew it was going to be this"—whatever it is—hard or long, or if I had to open to this, or whatever. I think those are interesting moments. They're just moments, but I think they're really interesting moments. The times when our faith might not be challenged, our trust in our own personal ability. Or we're caught in our views, or our aspiration—we can't quite find it. We just get discouraged.

I just want to talk about a few different ways I've seen that happen, and I'm sure you can think of many more. But it's all those times when we need to at least have enough trust to reconnect with our motivation, to have the patience not to just give up.

Now the thing is, I actually think at this point none of us could give up if we wanted to. That's what some people mean by, "Oh, I almost wish I didn't start—I could go back to ignorance." But it's too late. That's the good news. So we can even fall into discouragement and despair and give it up for a while. Something always happens to wake us up again. That's what's so great. Usually it's dukkha. Usually it's suffering. Usually. It doesn't have to be, though.

But there are different ways this discouragement arises. One is just that feeling: "I can't do this. Enlightenment is not possible for me." What I just read about—what the perception of impermanence opens us to—and people say, "That's not possible for me." Or, "To be rid of all sensual lust, to be rid of all lust for existence? I didn't sign up for that. I'm not actually sure I want that."

Don't you sometimes have times when you hear certain teachings and you think, "That can't be right"? I mean, I'm not claiming everything we say is. But I'm saying you think, "Enlightenment? Like that—all dull, gray, nothing?"

I don't know if I want to keep going with that. Or we have a kind of attachment to a particular view that we don't even realize.

I want to give a few examples of this. I call it "hitting the wall." And we will hit the wall over and over and over. That's okay—that's part of it. We have to learn not to take it so personally.

Here's one from the time of the Buddha that I really like. It illustrates when we've had deep insight and understanding, but a view has constructed around it that we don't realize, and then we think we can't get it back, that we can't do it, that it's gone.

There's a monk named Asaji who is very ill and dying. The Buddha comes to talk to him—he does this in a lot of different suttas. He comes and says, "Are you getting better?" And the monk says, "No, I'm not getting better. I'm dying."

The Buddha says, "Well, I hope you're not troubled by remorse and regret."

And Asaji says, "No, I am. I have quite a lot of remorse and regret."

The Buddha asks, "Why? Is it your virtue, your sīla? Have you acted wrongly?"

"No, no, no—my sīla is fine."

"Well, then what do you have remorse and regret about?"

And the monk says, "Formerly, venerable sir, when I was ill, I was able to keep on tranquilizing the bodily formations. I was able to obtain concentration. And now I cannot obtain concentration. And the thought occurs to me—this thought of fear—let me not fall away."

So he's dying, and he's in a panic because he can't get the samādhi back that he used to have. The Buddha then goes through a whole talk: this is impermanent, that's impermanent. Basically what he's saying is, "Haven't I told you everything is impermanent? Nothing to have remorse about."

I find this quite touching—the Buddha with a monk who's lived his whole life practicing, and still we can so easily fall into that. Remorse and regret. "I can't get concentration back. Let me not die." Confused. And the Buddha just takes him through: everything's impermanent. Nothing. No problem. Just see that.

Sometimes we don't have the Buddha there to remind us, but we might just know when we feel that sense of panic—"Don't let me fall away. Don't let me lose it. I can't get what I used to have." Let that be a little light bulb going off. Wait a minute. I can't get what I used to have. Formerly I could, but now I can't. Impermanence. Perception of impermanence.

Then maybe you can even see what the view is. Sometimes when we put the view into words, it becomes so obvious. When we haven't put it into words, we don't even know we're fighting against it. "Oh, the view is I should have this. Now that I've obtained samādhi, it should be like this all the time." As soon as we say it, we know it can't be that way. So it's helpful sometimes. That's the thinking aspect that can be useful.

Another way we sometimes hit a wall—and we all hit this at times, though sometimes the times seem to last quite a bit—is when it just feels like too much. Too much pain, physical pain. Too much emotional pain. We all hit moments of that, when our mindfulness, our viriya, our energy just isn't as strong as the intensity of the emotional and physical pain. We're worn down.

And then it's skillful means. We need to pull back, regroup, balance. That's fine—I'm not talking about that. I'm talking about something deeper, not just on retreat but in our lives, when somebody hits that moment of "Whoa, this is too much. I don't want to see it anymore. I don't want to know about this anymore."

And we can fall into a great discouragement—not quite denial, because it's too far from denial, but really deep discouragement. That usually spirals into the blanket view that I'm not good enough, I can't do it, I should have been able to work through this, or if I'd really had insight it wouldn't happen. All of those stories about how it should be.

Another similar thing is fear—it's not actually a pain or a sorrow or a loss, but the intimation of something. Do you ever get the sense that something really hellish is about to open up? It hasn't, and you actually don't know that it will. But sometimes there's this sense that some deeply held view holding the world in place is about to be maha-challenged, and I don't want to go there.

On retreat you might notice yourself suddenly getting into distractibility, doing all these important things, a kind of restlessness, a kind of anxiety. In our daily life it happens too. It might be hidden longer or acted out over more time. But still, it can lead to doubt, to self-doubt, lack of confidence, losing your aspiration, a lack of courage.

And those are views you don't need to hold onto because this happens to everybody.

At this point it's really helpful if you can remember and actually call up your deep aspiration. But when we're really falling into "I can't handle this pain, I don't want to know from this pain," and we try to call up our aspiration, the tendency is not to believe it. "Yeah, right, that's really my aspiration. I don't think so. My aspiration is get me out of here." Or: "I'm not good enough to have that aspiration. If I could really have that aspiration, I wouldn't be running from this or hiding from this."

Sakkāya-diṭṭhi, sakkāya-diṭṭhi.

Call up your aspiration and just take your stand there—not to make everything better, not to fix the painful thing. Just that. Yes, the aspiration, and the former insight that's feeding our mind stream now, will give us the courage in its own way, in its own time, to show up, to be a witness to whatever's happening, to see through it.

We don't have to stick with comfort, with the known. That's where my mind goes: "Let me just stay where it's comfortable, where I know. I'm just being kind to myself." You know that one. And that stepping outside of the cage can be scary, can be uncomfortable. And we think, "Well, I can't do it. I'm just this puny little old lady. I can't do it. Maybe I could do it when I was nineteen—that was amazing what I did when I was nineteen. Now I'm old and sick."

Just personality view.

This is like a kind of allegory. Recently, a couple of months ago, I had the flu, which is unusual for me, and I was kind of laid out for a couple of weeks at home. Thank God I was home. And I was basically useless—I could just lie around. So one way I passed the evenings, for three evenings in a row, was I watched again the three-part movie, The Lord of the Rings trilogy, which probably some of you know.

And I was really struck—actually quite profoundly—by how the whole story of Frodo felt like a really deep allegory for our practice and for how we keep having to rediscover within ourselves the courage. We have to remake our commitment and remake our motivation. We set our foot on the path and we're wholeheartedly committed. But we don't get to just do that once and then it flies. Over and over.

And so, just a little bit of the story: he's this sweet little hobbit in a kind of perfect world where people are kind. And most of the people there have no sense of an outer world of confusion and violence and evil.

He has a little bit of a sense because of his uncle and the wizard who knows the whole world. And so this evil ring of power comes to him. The wizard, whom he trusts deeply, says, "You have to take it. You have to leave your home turf, the Shire, and go to this nearby place where you've never been, and deliver it. I'll meet you there, and then we'll figure it out."

So that was really scary for him. That was more challenging than anything he had done in his life. But he saw that it needed to be done, out of his basic goodness. He brought up his courage. He trusted the wizard. And he went and did this thing.

Good things happened in that friends came to support him—a kind of mutual goodness and courage. But it was also more scary and dangerous than anything he could have imagined. Those dark riders were trying to kill him. And it really was horrible. They barely made it there. Like, "Wow, thank God. That was an adventure."

And then, of course, it turns out Gandalf isn't there. Black riders tried to kill them there. They have to end up trusting somebody they've never met who seems kind of seedy and sinister. And not only is it not over then, they have to follow this guy Aragorn on a much, much more difficult path to where the elves are—for days, not knowing if they can trust him. And so Frodo has to make that decision. He could have made the decision not to do it. He could have made the decision to go back. But he has a sense it's about more than him.

So they do that. And then he's really almost killed. He's stabbed. And they're having fights much, much closer. And the elves come and take him. And finally, they get to Rivendell, which is like the most beautiful place—like a deva realm, more beautiful than they could ever imagine. Thank God. Here's Gandalf. Everything's okay. "I've done more than I ever could have done. I feel good now. I can go home."

And then, of course, it turns out that's only the beginning. And he has to find in himself the courage when he sees that this ring has to go all the way to the evilest place in the land, and he has no clue where that is or how to get there. He knows by now that he has no clue actually of the danger he's going into. He knows enough to know how really vast the journey is—which he didn't know at the beginning.

And that's like us now. We know enough to know how vast the journey is, and that we really don't have a clue, although we'd like to.

And he has to make that decision. And out of that comes the friendship of all the other beings that go with him—the loyalty and the courage and the humility and the strength and the wisdom. And it keeps going. He finds finally he can't trust anybody. He has to make the decision to go off completely alone, having no clue how he'll get there, how he'll do it. And his friend Sam comes with him.

So over and over, he's having to make more profound, difficult decisions to move toward the difficulty, not away from it. But it's not the same decision, because each time he has a much greater sense of wisdom, a greater sense of faith, a greater sense of the importance of what he's doing. It's less and less about him and more and more about beings in the world. But it never gets easier. In fact, it gets harder. The love between the friends gets stronger. His sense of goodness gets stronger.

But then, even as he gets closer to Mordor—to the really bad place where he must put the ring in the fire it came from—the evil stops being just out there, and it starts to eat him up from the inside. So it really shows that his courage and stamina almost break, almost break. But somehow there's also support and help where it's unexpected.

You never know how it's going to go, and somehow he manages to complete the task—which doesn't, of course, end the growing or end the love or end life.

I just thought that was so great. I really feel like our whole practice is like that. We think, "I really can't do this anymore. This is harder than anything I ever thought I'd have to face." But then we need to turn around and recognize the wisdom, the courage, the compassion, the equanimity. All of that is so much greater than we ever knew we had before. And it's really important to recognize that too.

So when you're in your life and you think, "This again? This pattern, this anger—I see it, I'm still blasting my little kids and I ought to know better," and you feel the shame even more... you think it's just worse than it ever was. What's the point of practice if it's worse than it ever was? But it's not worse. The seeing of it is already a huge shift. The openness to actually feel the pain of the anger, and the shame, the pain of the shame, and the immediate feedback of the pain from somebody else—that's a much deeper level of sensitivity and non-separation than we started out with.

If we stay focused on "this feels worse than ever and I'm still doing this," we're lost. If we let ourselves expand the view and say, "Wow, yes, it's a deeper step into the interconnectedness of all, into the power of habits of kilesa, but also the power of awareness and the importance and power of patience and our motivation and commitment to keep on bearing witness"—at some point, it does happen, over and over. It shifts from just feeling hopelessly caught in the pattern to there's a moment of, "Oh, right now I don't have to do this. I can turn and walk away just for this moment." Maybe next time you're caught again. But that shift comes from the openness to all of the interconnectedness and the deeper sensitivity to the suffering that comes from acting and thinking from greed, from hatred, from confusion. And that's a great courage, that we have to keep opening in this way. It's important to recognize it, because we tend to sometimes just notice how it's going wrong.

Another way we get caught—briefly—is what Sayadaw U Pandita calls "stopping within." It's actually when things are going really well, on retreat or in our life. I've seen it in myself a lot when there's been quite some insight, or I leave retreat in a really balanced place, feeling really alive. The kilesas don't feel so sticky, and the personality view doesn't feel so sticky. Not reactive, more connected. And it's just, "Wow, this is great." After my first retreat, it was like that more or less for a year. I don't wish that on anybody, because there's this feeling, "Well, now that's it. I can just coast." You don't even think you're coasting. You think, "Now that's it."

So that's called stopping within—"Okay, now I got it." Not that we have to try, try, try all the time, but just have that willingness to be awake no matter what's happening. At first, when you're stopping within, the wakefulness is natural. The momentum of awareness is there. You know those times when it's just going by itself? Well, anicca rears its head usually here too. And what seemed so natural stops being so natural. You can't find it.

Stopping within is "this is cool, this is it." Sometimes it's not even that, but just "this is good enough. This is pleasant. I'm not suffering so much. I don't want to rock the boat. I can live like this. This is okay. Good enough." Unlike the Buddha, who resolved never to settle for less than total awakening.

But the problem with stopping within—I don't need to tell you, do I? Nothing is steady state. "This is good enough. I can live like this." Well, you won't live like that forever.

I can promise you that.

Another place we encounter resistance is really around our personality view, what people have mentioned—a fear or resistance at moving out of the familiar. It's really more an idea of losing something familiar about ourselves or about our lives. It's the kind of questions we all ask: Does freedom from clinging mean I don't care about my family anymore? Does freedom from clinging mean I don't appreciate the beauty of nature? Does freedom from clinging mean I can't tell pleasant from unpleasant, can't appreciate art? Fill in your blanks. Freedom from clinging means I don't have a personality anymore. What about my irritability—I like my irritability, I'm comfortable with that. That seems crazy, but we're comfortable with our patterns.

So you might just notice if there's that sense of, "If it means this goes away, I'm not so sure I'm signed on for this." You don't have to land in that either. But just notice—that's another place where we can hit a wall. Or that nostalgia for samsara that Guy talked about. I've felt that often, and really very powerfully sometimes. I don't even know what for, sometimes. Nostalgia is something that's been the fabric of my whole life, and I couldn't even put a word on it. Something is dissolving, going to go away, and I'm going to be thrust into the unfamiliar—and with unfamiliar, read whatever projection: cold, distant, disconnected, inhuman, whatever it is. And this huge nostalgia, this poignancy, this real sadness.

I've seen, especially in intensive practice over years at different points—I could say it's been like a series of deaths. A sense of death. And it really feels like a death of some particular aspect of my personality or some particular way I held myself. Not even how my personality manifests, but some view or some way I related to myself, to my life, to the people in my life, how I thought about myself. When I say it, it probably sounds clear that it's no great loss. And that's actually the truth. But in the moment of seeing it, seeing through it—that isn't who I am, that isn't really accurate, that isn't really how I relate to whatever it is—it's been experienced internally for me like a kind of death, a real giving up.

On the other side of that, it's freedom. It's really freedom. But not to deny or belittle or think it shouldn't be that way. There's sadness, there's poignancy, there's a sense of loss or fear that this is going to go. Fine. Notice that. There's room in awareness for that too. It doesn't have to be a problem.

But in the big picture, which includes everything of our life, awakening—the liberation of heart, of non-clinging—it's radical. It's uncompromising. And we can't know. The mind can't know what that's like because the mind can only know the thoughts that it already knows. It can only know the views that it's expressed. But awakening—enlightenment's not a self-improvement project. It's the standpoint of "me" that gets seen through. So we don't personally get gratified by having some kind of enlightenment experience. It's not about that. That's what creates the sense of loss or death, these little blips—it's like, "Oh, that meaning, not just having so much meaning right now."

Stephen Batchelor says emptiness is not just the experience of oceanic bliss. It is a falling apart of all our strategies of self-interest, of self-centeredness, of seeming protection. And although freeing—it is freeing—it also can evoke a great sense of disconcertion, of dis-ease, even fear. Sort of like being in no man's land without our familiar reference points.

When we see this, there's no stasis. One of my invited teachers, Poonjaji, used to say, "Pick up your foot and then don't put it down again anywhere." I didn't used to understand it, but now I realize that you pick up your foot and there is nowhere to put it down. Because there's no stasis. You put it down, but there's nothing stable there. You pick it up, you put it down—there's nothing stable there. Disconcerting at times, but that's okay. We find a willingness to rest in the confusion, as Joko Beck says. And then we see that this disconcertion actually opens up our cage of view, of self-interest, and—ah, it's like this. It's just like this, as Guy said from the Bāhiya Sutta.

So simple. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, thinking. Just like this. It's so simple we can't stand it.

But when "we" isn't what's being held to, a friend of mine calls it the place of no problem—coming and going.

So over and over, just finding that willingness to commit, to surrender to the unknown. We don't have to know. We can't know what should happen. If we think we know what should happen, that's the trap. Oh, not knowing. It's like this.

And what can really help—just one thing to end with that I find helps me a lot—is a Tibetan practice. It's very simple. They call it purifying our aspiration. Just reminding us of our aspiration, our motivation. And they say, just to cultivate the correct motivation within your own experience, it turns into bodhicitta all by itself. Are we touching, finding our aspiration by itself? That'll give us the courage to keep going, like poor Frodo, ending up for all beings.

So it's a very simple practice. They call it the three excellences. In any practice period—which could be a sitting or a walking or the whole day—you always start with taking refuge, really connecting with your refuge. For the Tibetans, they would cultivate bodhicitta. But I'd say, cultivate your deepest aspiration while you're practicing. Then you just forget it and practice, just being moment-to-moment awareness. Then at the end, when the bell rings or you stop the walking or you finish eating—whatever is your practice period—you complete it by briefly dedicating the merit of your practice to all sentient beings.

I just want to say for this: if there's the feeling "my practice isn't worth dedicating any merit to anybody"—sakkāya-diṭṭhi.

And along with dedicating the merit, again, making a really pure aspiration. This is something that's interesting to me. If I would dedicate the merit—good. But they say, make the merit a pure aspiration for my own awakening and the awakening of all. So that the merit doesn't just fly out there and get you a nice comfortable job, or you don't have back pain tomorrow, or something.

But anyway, the point of it is it really connects us again to our deepest aspiration. And I've done this a lot, and I go through all that stuff about "Oh no, I'm not good enough, nothing to me, bodhicitta." Just let that blab on. Connect to the motivation. It really does strengthen and deepen by itself. And then in times when you're hitting a wall, you'll remember it. You'll be able to call it up. And it'll give us the faith, the confidence to just surrender into not knowing.

And that's really all we need to do.

So let's sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 35

Wise Attention

Carol Wilson · 1h05

> In this comprehensive talk, Carol Wilson addresses a common struggle among practitioners: the overwhelming desire to find "the right way" to meditate amidst seemingly endless instructions and approaches. Drawing from the Sabbāsava Sutta (MN 2), she introduces the Buddha's teaching on abandoning the āsavas—the most subtle underlying tendencies of craving, aversion, and delusion—through seven distinct methods: seeing, restraining, using, patience, avoiding, removing, and developing.
>
> Wilson illuminates the Pāli term yoniso manasikāra (wise attention), explaining it as a nurturing, womb-like quality of mind that supports balanced awareness rather than harsh penetration of experience. She emphasizes that wise attention isn't about achieving particular states or finding correct objects of meditation, but about noticing what qualities are being fed or starved in each moment of awareness. Using vivid examples—from Vipassanā romances to the smell of pizza—she demonstrates how the same experience can be either wise or unwise attention depending entirely on the attitude meeting it.
> The practical applications extend far beyond formal meditation. Wilson explores how we relate to food, clothing, and resources; how patience with difficult conditions can actually uproot aversive tendencies; and when it's skillful to redirect attention away from overwhelming experiences rather than forcing mindfulness. Throughout, she returns to a radical trust: that any object whatsoever can be met with wise attention, and that freedom lies not in what's happening but in the quality of mind meeting each moment.

I was struck this morning in the questions and in talking to people over the last couple of days by a couple of things. For some people, there just seems like there's been so much information—how to meditate, all our talks, everything. And then listening to the questions today and speaking with people in interviews, I noticed a sense of how our minds want to reconcile everything and figure it all out, figure out which is the right way. There must be some right way. It can't just be all this huge amount of information that's all useful somehow. We just like to have models, plans, to know: do it like this and that happens. This is the right way—really focus. But now there's big mind, and what am I supposed to do if I'm in big mind? If something gets small, but I'm small in the big mind, is this the right way? And how can I do big mind when I'm walking? But what about concentration? And the hindrances are coming back, and it matters—no, it doesn't matter because it's all empty, but how come?

So first I thought I just don't want to talk at all, but I wasn't allowed that option. So then I picked the longest talk I have—that's what they get for making me talk, my long talk.

Actually, what I do want to talk about is just that. I want to talk about a particular sutta of the Buddha's where he is actually talking about the very, very subtlest level of the patterns of our minds, which they call āsavas or the taints—the most subtle latent level, and I'll describe it. So he's talking about the most subtle levels of how to abandon these underlying tendencies. This isn't like the gross level, where if you can't do anything else, do what he's suggesting here. This is the most subtle level. And he gives seven different ways of working with this, which is not just about very subtle, quiet meditation. It's about all different ways of our life.

I wanted to talk about this because I want to try to reinforce what's so hard for us to trust: that there is no one right way. Right way to what? As soon as we say "right way," the mind is making some idea, some sense of a state, or how things should look, or how I should feel, or what should or shouldn't be happening. As soon as we think "right way," the mind has come into comparison, making measurements, making limits. As soon as you're thinking, "Is this the right way?" it's all solidified just in that moment.

And it's so hard. This is the same thing I've been saying the whole time, but it's so hard for us to really trust. It's not about what's particularly happening. All the different practices and all the different aspects of the meditation and the Buddhist path they're pointing to—it's not getting some right way of meditating. It's just a tool. Not achieving some state of mind—that's going to change. If you can achieve it, it can go away.

But really recognizing, trusting this moment—that Bhante Vimamsaka talked about last week—of the mind and heart that's really free from clinging. Whether that clinging is in the form of grasping or aversion, sense of self—all of that is clinging. And in a moment, all we can practice, all we can cultivate, all we can pay attention to is: what's the quality of the mind in this moment? That's it. The past is a thought in this moment. So is the future. So is the present. All we can cultivate.

Everything we talk about is ways to help us notice, really tune in: What's the quality? What's the attitude in the mind, in the awareness, in this moment? And so there's millions of different ways. If one doesn't work, another one might for this moment. The next moment is all different again. So you might as well—although I'm going to give you another one—throw out the lists that you go down. And I'm going to give you one. You can write it all down. Then at the end, you can throw them all out and just check what's happening now. Is there wanting? Is there aversion? Is there craving? Or not. Or you can't tell—that's also okay.

But looking, just knowing what's the quality of awareness now—not so focused on the object, the object, the object being sense pleasure, the object being the mind, the object being a state.

So all the methods he talks about in the sutta and all through the teachings, the practice—there's a simile he uses a lot, which is about feeding and starving. When we think in terms of "is this the right way to meditate—spacious, precise, very subtle, more gross?"—it's not about whether it's subtle or gross or spacious or precise. It's about what, in the way we're paying attention, in the way mindfulness is meeting what's happening, what qualities are being fed, what qualities are being starved.

The Buddha talks like this a lot. He talks about feeding the wholesome, starving the unwholesome. If in the way we pay attention we're feeding wanting, and it's getting stronger and stronger and stronger, and the sense of self is getting stronger and stronger and stronger in a moment—that's what he calls unwise attention. So that's what I want to really talk about: wise attention.

But first to this sutta. Andrea read a little bit of it, so I don't have to read that part about why his attention were all the views. But he says, he's talking about these taints—that's the usual translation for āsava—or this subtle underlying tendency, and the exhaustion, the abandoning of these tendencies. So I just want to describe what we mean by those.

When Sayadaw U Pandita was here, he talked about what he called the three rounds, or the three levels, of kilesa—defilement, suffering in the mind, the way it manifests. Three rounds of saṃsāra, he called it. The first—and also wholesome manifests in the same way—but the first he called "in deeds or speech." So if there's in a moment in the mind, in the awareness, really strongly, for example, greed, desire, and if it manifests on this most gross level, the level of what he calls the level of transgression, we act on it. There's really strong desire, and you act on it. You go in the kitchen, in the walk-in, in the middle of the night and take something, right? None of you, of course, have done that here, but it has been known to have happened. We have everything numbered and charted, and we know. But right, so that's acting out—level of transgression. And that's what sīla, the precepts, protect us from. When we commit to sīla, that's protecting us on this level of acting out, of transgression of kilesa.

The second level he called—the translation to English was—the obsessive level. So take desire again. You're not actually acting it out, but the mind is completely caught up in obsessive thinking: "Oh, I've got to get that date. I've got to get that fig. How could I get figs? How could I get dates?" Not just a thought here and there—we're talking obsessive, right? You're all familiar with this. We're in the realm of familiarity so far, right?

What protects us on that level is samādhi. Samādhi, both in terms of the balance of mind—when a thought of desire comes up and the mind just doesn't go there—that protects us. Also the samādhi, the samatha, the really quiet, one-pointed concentration, also protects against this level of obsession. As U Tejaniya says, it actually suppresses that wanting. After a while, when the mind's really focused on something, it doesn't even come up. That's why we like when the mind gets really focused and concentrated and kind of narrowed down on one point—because the kilesas and the hindrances are suppressed. They're kept away. And we find out how really actually lovely it is when those things aren't harassing us in the mind all the time. It's like, "Oh my God, this is amazing." We think it's the best. It's the end. It's enlightenment. We just haven't had a moment that wasn't having this obsessive stuff going on.

But as you may have noticed, if you had some period when it's really quiet or really balanced, whether it's the one-pointed samādhi or just more open but really balanced—it changes, right? And have you noticed there can kind of, not always, but be these waves where it's really calm, really focused, craving's not coming much, aversion's not coming much, and it creeps in? "Now we've got it. I've seen through this now, right? That particular obsessive pattern's no longer coming up." And then it changes. The mind gets a little more restless, more things happen. And again, the assault—it can come up. And sometimes it takes a while.

And sometimes—this was amazing to me on one retreat I was doing—I was really very one-pointed, with concentration on changing objects, but with a lot of effort to connect and focus. Like, no, no, no, connect. As long as I kept up that effort every single moment, connecting with whatever was arising, there was really steady mindfulness. And even if wanting came, it was just like wanting, and I'd notice it as the next arising thing. That's wise attention.

But I started playing with this, and I noticed that when I would deliberately pull the attention back and not note, not land, just kind of pull it back and not be connected—it would just come rushing in, this wanting about anything, just some stupid thing. I was really both amazed and a little bit disheartened, I must say, to see how quickly it arose. Well, what's the point? I mean, there is a point, but at that point I said, why? As soon as I pull back—boom—I want this, I want that, I like this, I don't like that.

My only point in saying that is that this samādhi protects us from the obsessive while it's there. But it doesn't uproot. It doesn't possess the wisdom that allows for the seeing through of the tendency, the kind of seeing that really allows the mind to just lose interest, to abandon, to uproot—going all the way to arahat. But even moment to moment, we all have that capacity.

So this third level, which is the one we're talking about—the latent or underlying tendencies—it doesn't mean that there's some stream of craving and aversion that's part of you, always there. It doesn't mean that, even though sometimes it might feel like it. It means that there's a habit, a tendency in the mind stream, a kind of momentum, so that when the conditions are right and there's still that underlying tendency, greed or aversion or delusion-identification might arise.

Here's an example a yogi gave me a few years ago—I mean, there are a million. She or he, I forget who it was, was walking by, and I thought they were being very mindful, walking through the dining room. There was a bowl of fruit there in the late afternoon, and they thought they were being very mindful. They saw the fruit, didn't notice wanting, and thought they were just walking by with no intention at all. The next thing they knew, their hand shot out and grabbed an apple and kept on going. Where did that come from? Just that moment of not quite noticing what was happening in the mind, and there's this underlying—yes, apple, want, take, go. It just acts out really quickly.

Or the times when you're walking and very present, and someone cuts in front of you, and aversion or judgment just surges up. You don't act on it, but it's so surprising because it seems to come from left field. Just the underlying tendency.

So this is a very subtle level we're talking about. Sometimes people have described—and many have—times here where suddenly it seems as if you're seeing craving, for example, or self-judging, or pride, as if it were behind almost everything you do, in a way that's shocking. It's subtle but coming up all the time, and you think, how could I not have seen this before? But this is really—you don't get it that it's subtle because it seems like everything's like that, and you must have been so deluded not to notice it. But really it's that the attention is getting much more fine, much more subtle, and you're starting to see a very subtle level of wanting or identification or fear behind movements, behind things in the mind, arising just because the conditions are there.

So this is actually a very useful part of practice—not uplifting, really, but very useful just to see it with wise attention.

That's what we mean in this sutta when he's talking about all the tendencies, all the taints—I don't really like that word—all the stains, the āsavas. He's talking about this level. And what protects us from, or sees through, these levels is paññā, wisdom. He says actually that the subtle tendencies are abandoned not by acts, but by wisely seeing—just by clear seeing.

As someone said today, they were noticing in regard to a certain situation that had kept coming up and triggering wanting in the mind throughout the retreat. Suddenly the mind was sort of disenchanted with it. The situation would come, the same seeing, the same conditions, and just instead of going to wanting, the mind would just go, don't need to go there. Not an act of will. That's actually the movement of paññā. When we talk about real renunciation—by seeing through with wisdom, the clinging is abandoned. It's not an act of will. It just doesn't come up in that moment.

So it's important for all of us to notice when we do actually have those experiences—because you all do, and probably a lot, believe it or not. And you just think, well, it just didn't come up this time. Maybe it's because I'm not close enough to the experience. I should be there. Where is it? Notice. That's the seeing of wisdom. That's the dispassion. That's actually the protection—the latent tendency not arising, being abandoned in that moment.

So that's what he's talking about in this sutta. "Bhikkhus, I say there is exhaustion, abandoning of these asavas in one who knows wise attention and unwise attention." You know both of them. "When one attends unwisely, both unarisen asavas, stains, and arisen ones increase. When one attends wisely, unarisen taints do not arise, and arisen ones are abandoned."

I want to talk about wise attention, and then I want to talk about these seven specific ways that he mentions in the sutta—different places to use wise attention.

Wise attention he defines very specifically as knowing—well, it's how we pay attention, and that's the main thing, and what we pay attention to. He defines it as knowing what things are fit for attention and what things are unfit. Now, at first, that sounds like it plays right into our idea of there's a right way and a wrong way. Certain aspects of our experience are fit for attention—that means we're doing it right. And other ones are unfit for attention, and if they're there, we're doing it wrong. This is not what it means.

It's really how we're paying attention. When there is right attitude in the mind at any moment, when the attention, the awareness is meeting whatever's arising without wanting or aversion, without delusion, without that sense of me, any object is the right object. It's wise attention. When the paying attention is colored—and we've said this a million times—with any of these collations, and we don't recognize it, seeing through it, it's unwise attention. It's not so much about the object as about how we're paying attention. But sometimes we can use noticing as we're paying attention to the object and the collations increase—we can use that as a sign: "Oh, this isn't wise attention."

There's no fixed determination in things themselves, in objects themselves. The same experience—for example, aversion—could be a fine subject of wise attention in one moment, and it could be unwise attention in the next moment. It's all in the attitude.

The word translated as "wise attention" in Pali is two words: yoniso manasikara. It might be better to translate it as "appropriate attention," or Andy Olenski, the head of the study center who's a Pali scholar, likes "careful attention." I like the way he breaks down these words. Mana means mind—chitta and the concomitant mental factors with it. Kara is from the same word as kamma; it means action. And so manasikara really means a doing, an action of the mind. Attention—that's usually how it's translated.

Yoniso comes from the word yoni, which is the word for womb. And so Andy likes to translate yoniso as womb-like: nurturing, supporting, protecting, held in protection—as in sati, mindfulness being our protection. He translates yoniso manasikara as an active quality of mind that is nurturing and supporting. Not hitting, penetrating, beating down the object mercilessly, but a quality of mind that is nurturing and supporting. Supporting what? Balanced awareness, right attitude. Just a moment of presence free from suffering, from kalesha—that's nurturing and supporting clear seeing, discerning wisdom, paññā, in this moment. Feeding or starving, very pragmatically.

That's what's so hard for us to absolutely radically trust—that this quality of yoniso manasikara can meet any object whatsoever. No exceptions. That's what's so hard for us to trust. We keep getting pulled into the belief that our problem is with what's happening, and if we could just change it, we'd be doing better, we'd be suffering less. But really, radically, it's about the attitude and the awareness in any moment.

For example—and I fall into this as much as anyone—there's the sense, just the subtle preference, the subtle sense that it's better attention when things that are coming and going, we see them coming and going. They're clear. We usually feel a little more at ease when the attention can clearly notice. The more precise the better—we see what's happening, it's coming, it's going, we're sensitive, we're tuned in, really feeling a sense of presence. That somehow seems much better than when it's all vague and cloudy and chaotic. But even that can be unwise attention because it's in what's in the attitude that's noticing.

I just read this in a news magazine about a guy named Dean Potter. They said he's a legend in the rock climbing world. He's way past rock climbing now—that's boring.

And what he mostly does is two things. One is called highlining, which means walking across chasms on loosely strung nylon ropes. And the other is base jumping, which I've seen in Switzerland. It's pretty intense. You leap off a really high cliff or mountain with this little kind of parachute on your back. You just jump out, go as far as you can, and pull the parachute in the last two seconds or something. It's a special kind of parachute. Very intense. People die doing it.

Once I was with friends, and we were just sitting on a bench near a big cliff, and we heard this whoosh—a guy had just base jumped. It takes like ten seconds. That's it. It's over. And he had to walk in for an hour carrying his gear and walk out for an hour just to plummet down and pull the parachute at the last minute. It's intense.

So this guy, that's what he does. Now, this is what he says about it: "I'm addicted to the heightened awareness I get when there's a death consequence. My vision is sharper. I'm more sensitive to sounds, my sense of balance, and the beauty all around me. Something sparkles in my mind, and nothing else in life matters."

You can almost think that was good mindfulness, right? But I have a feeling that there's something in his motivation that might have a little bit of kilesa in it. I'm not sure. He's going so far as to think that maybe, if he really concentrates and enters a trance-like state, he could fly. He says, "I know it's insane to think, but that's all I can think about—going to a place that's not accepted."

So it's not in how it looks. It's not in the object. Can we be that radical to turn around and look?

At the same time, something that is clearly kilesa and suffering—for example, dosa, aversion, unpleasantness, anger, however you want to put it—that can be a perfectly fine object of awareness when we see it. "Oh, that's just anger doing its job." Just noticing anger, how it acts, how it feels in the body, the thoughts that come. Just noticing that with non-judging awareness. It comes, it does its thing, it goes. Really noticing it, though. Not that sense we can often have with any of these things—wanting, anger, self-judgment—where you say, "Oh, I know it's there. I know it's there." But it's running in the background. And this is where the latent tendency is getting more and more strengthened. We don't really turn around and notice it with wise attention. That's not the same thing. That's how it grows.

So this is what we're talking about with wise attention, what the Buddha's talking about. And then he describes seven ways that with wise attention, these latent underlying tendencies come to be abandoned—different ways we can pay attention with wise attention in our practice, in our life. They can be abandoned by insight, by seeing. Second is by restraining. Third is by how we use things. By patience. By avoiding. By removing things. And by developing. Developing means cultivating the seven factors of awakening, which we talked about the other night.

Abandoned by seeing is largely what I've already described. I just want to highlight a couple of things about how, by seeing, by insight, we pay attention—and that we can pay attention and think we're being really mindful because we're so focused on the object that we miss how we're paying attention. As we think we're being mindful, the greed,

Or the sense of self, or whatever it is that we're caught in—it seems to be getting bigger and bigger and bigger, in a way that we're really caught.

The Buddha gives some examples that I find really interesting. It's the hindrances—I won't go through all of them, but I want to highlight a couple. Notice what's being fed and what's being starved when you're giving attention to an experience. Again, it's very pragmatic. Not some idea of how it should look, but just notice what's happening now.

He gives an example with sense desire. It's not that sense desire in itself is the problem, as we've said several times, but in how we pay attention to it. Something that we often don't notice—I often didn't notice until I read it—is that when we pay attention to something, say something beautiful that we want, if you're having what we call a "VR," a vipassana romance with somebody, whenever you see them, the mind kind of looks at them: "Oh, they look so nice," or "I like their hair, I like the way they dress, they look so self-assured." The mind focuses on the attractive aspect, and it's mostly paying attention to, without realizing it, the sense of gratification we're getting from looking at that beautiful thing.

Let's go down from relationship to the smell of pizza. Let's just keep it very basic. You're smelling—ah, that smells like fresh bread cooking. That smells so good. And there's wanting. You see, "Oh yeah, wanting," but it keeps going. Fresh bread. And you think you're there. You think you're just with smelling. But what's really going on is a sense of, "Wow, that's really nice. I really like it." And you keep focusing on the gratification.

This is kind of subtle, but just notice. If you keep thinking you're present—smell, good smell of bread, smell, good smell of bread—it's getting more and more and more until you're ready to burst into the kitchen crazed. Or you come to lunch and it isn't pizza and it's nothing like bread, and you don't know where that smell was. You smell chocolate cake all day and then it never shows up—has that happened? You just want to die or kill somebody. The transgression—that's when you're happy for the precepts. Then there's a good chance somewhere we weren't just attending with a pure mind. There was wanting in there that wasn't seen. We were attending to the gratification. It's really interesting.

Sometimes in the sitting, when we focus on rapture or sukha, the contentment, we think we're being really present until it goes away and we're so frustrated. We can't understand why, because we weren't noticing the sense of self, the sense of gratification that was going on about it. Gratification is all about the sense of self enjoying—not even enjoying, but the sense of self there.

Don't think about this too much. If it doesn't make sense, just let it go. But pay attention. If anything pleasant that your mind is wanting comes up again while you're here, just explore. If it keeps going, if you notice pleasant, liking, you really feel the liking and it goes away—great, that's wise attention. Liking, pleasant, wanting is a perfectly fine object of attention when you notice it with wise attention. But when you're noticing wanting and it's getting bigger, bigger, bigger, bigger—then check it out.

Same with aversion, and it's just the other side—developed through unwise attention to the repugnant or unpleasant aspect of something. Sayadaw U Tejaniya always uses the example: if you're really angry at someone and you're just kind of churning, you keep looking at them—what happens to the anger? Every time you look at them, it kind of gets triggered again. Or if you have one little rough tooth and all the rest of your teeth are fine, but you just can't keep your tongue away from that rough tooth. And since you're a yogi here and helpless, your mind will then start really freaking out about what you're going to do about the dentist. Unwise attention to the repugnant—it feeds the ill will. You can just notice that happening. Just notice how that can feed it. It's really interesting.

Sayadaw U Pandita says it's like a cow chewing its cud—you know how it swallows and then pulls it up and chews it over again and again. So if you've had any kind of unpleasant experience with anyone here, at work, or anything like that, you notice how later the image comes up, the memory comes up. "Yeah, that really was... yeah, that really was bad. I was bad. They were bad. This is wrong. That is wrong." Like a cow chewing its cud of the unpleasant, over and over again. Notice that.

Then don't judge it. Just notice it. Oh, that's what's happening.

That's unpleasant. And then it becomes an object of wise attention.

So those are just a couple of examples. Oh, just one thing I want to say about sloth and torpor. First, one aspect of it—of course, there's just the tiredness. But one aspect of how sloth and torpor as a hindrance shows up that I found really interesting is this quality of the mind that kind of shrinks back. It shrinks back from experience. It shrinks back from effort. It's the feeling of, "Ah, that's just too hard." My mind goes, "Oh, I just can't do that." And then this picture of getting into bed comes up in my mind. "I'll just go lie down."

But if I focus on that content, it just gets stronger and stronger. "Oh, I can't walk another step." What I don't see in that moment is the sense of identifying with the mental state. But when I realize, "Oh, 'that's just too hard, I just can't do it'—that's a mental state. It's just 'too hard.' It feels like this." In that moment, it's flipped from unwise attention—which was that I was aware of the tiredness, the sloth and torpor, but really identified with it, not seeing that, thinking, "It really is too hard. I really am too tired"—to "Oh, that's just a mental state."

I spent one really difficult retreat when I was in Burma, and this kept coming. It was a really difficult retreat—a lot of painful dukkha stuff was coming up. I'd be walking back and forth on my little porch, and that would arise. This image would come up of me just kind of getting onto the bed. That would be the first image. And then the feeling would be, "Ah, no, there's no way I can keep doing this." And it felt so true. "There's no way. This is unbearable."

And after a few days: "Oh my God, this is just a mental state like any other mental state." As soon as I see that, no problem. It doesn't mean it went away, but we've shifted to wise attention instead of believing it, and that makes all the difference. Then it's a perfectly fine object of wise attention. It doesn't have to get better.

So that's all I want to say about abandoning by seeing.

The next one—the Buddha says, "Abandon by restraining." Here, a bhikkhu, and that's anyone practicing, reflecting wisely—it's always reflecting wisely in each of these, so it's really bringing discerning attention, discerning wisdom—abides with the eye faculty restrained. And then he goes through all the different faculties. "While āsavas and fever of defilement might arise in one who abode unrestrained, there are no taints or fever of defilement in one who abides restrained."

So what do we mean by restrained? Noticing how it's a way of being that actually does not lead onward for these tendencies to arise and to be acted on.

Well, this is pretty basic. I don't have to say a lot because we've talked about it. It follows on the last one. Restraint—it's not so much that you never look or hear or see, right? That's not what we mean by restraint at the sense doors. But rather, bringing in what Buddhadasa calls sati-paññā, mindfulness-wisdom, right at the point of sense contact.

Well, this is our whole practice. This is nothing new, right? So I don't have to say too much about it.

But back to the smell of the pizza. Really, when we're fully present with smell—contact, smell, pleasant—or there's the mind thought, "I really like this," liking, pleasant. That's restraint at the sense doors. And of course, it takes a certain willingness and a certain calmness of mind. That's really why we're here meditating.

So this, to begin with, is a meditative form, but it doesn't have to be. It can actually go on into our life where we really notice how, when we're not just present with what's happening—what Sharada talked about—that whole stream of papañca just takes off so quickly, so fast. And what's papañca driven by? All these thoughts, but exactly these latent tendencies. And it's not that it's bad.

Say there's no restraint at the sense doors. "Oh, that pizza smells so good. Let me go sit in the dining room and just smell it some more and smell it some more. Let me think about all the times I had pizza. Let me imagine what they're putting on it." That's not restraint at the sense doors. It's not that it's bad—it's just that you suffer. It's unnecessary, but we think it's taking us into some kind of pleasure. That's how warped we are. So we have to look and see, to keep it simple. But it doesn't mean we completely shut down.

I have a friend years ago who was sitting here, and he decided to really practice what he thought was restraint at the sense doors, so he walked around blindfolded for three days. Everywhere he went, feeling his way around. That's not really restraint. There's no wisdom going to come from that. Sure, it's like really strong concentration—no craving or aversion could arise at the eye door because he couldn't see anything. But that's not really paññā. That's not really wisdom. You take it off, and then you're back where you started from.

So it's not the sense that all sense experience is bad, but it's a sense of really using mindfulness, wisdom, wise attention to see what's leading into more craving, more sense of identification, more becoming in the mind. What leads to more calmness, more quietness, more space, more peace? That's really why we've set it up this way here.

Thich Nhat Hanh has a way of talking about it. He says that our sense doors are like windows. Our senses are our windows to the outside world, and sometimes the wind blows and disturbs everything within us. And he said sometimes we just leave our windows wide open. He asks, "Do you ever find yourself watching an awful TV program, but you just can't get up and turn it off? There's noise, there's gunfire, it's upsetting you, but somehow you don't get up and turn it off. Why do you torture yourself this way? Don't you want to close your windows? Are you afraid of the solitude, the emptiness, the loneliness you might find?"

You don't have to use those words, but how often have we found it? When it gets a little quiet, the mind goes on some kind of rampage. Let's just whip it up. Nothing here is happening. I'll think of the most unpleasant experience in the last ten years and chew the cud of that for a while. At least I know I'm alive.

So in talking about restraint, it's seeing—and this isn't just here, it's in our life—to really look and see. There might be some simplifying that comes, not out of a "should." That's part of what we do here, and I'll talk about that more later in terms of avoiding.

Thich Nhat Hanh again: "A beginning meditator may want to leave the city and go off to the countryside"—like here—"to help close those windows. So there he or she can become quiet with the forest, rediscover, restore herself without being carried away by the chaos of the 'outside world.' The silence, the quietness helps you connect with and remain in awareness."

But when awareness is well-rooted, when it can be maintained more steadily without faltering, then you can return to the city and remain there with less trouble. But before you reach this point, you do need to be careful, nourishing your awareness moment by moment, choosing the surroundings and the sustenance that assist you most.

That's really something we can learn here. And just really small things. What assists us most? Not to hate the world and shut off to it, but to really cultivate trust, this quality of awareness that isn't feeding wanting. Really, and that's what a lot of you have been seeing—really how disturbing getting caught in wanting and aversion and "it's all about me" really is.

In our daily life, with the windows open, with so much going on, we don't even really notice that. And you'll see soon enough, but even now, some little thing happens, and all your sense of self comes up, and all your reactions—I know this happens to everybody—and it's so jarring. If you think about it, you think, wow, this is happening a million times a day in our normal life. How do we get through it? How does anyone get through it? Well, we see how people get through it. Not so good.

So here, in working with restraint at the sense doors, it's just that sati-paññā right there at the sense door. Seeing, contact—instead of seeing, judging. Instead of, "Yes, they're doing this. Yes, they're doing it. Oh, I'm judging. That's so bad." Just: seeing, judging. Seeing, judging. It's unpleasant. Unpleasant. That's okay. Just this sati-paññā right at the sense doors. It doesn't matter what, but just not jumping on the train and going. And simplifying really can help.

Shankara, who was one of the founders of Advaita Vedanta, says, "We nourish craving and feed attachment by dwelling on the sense objects and seeking our temporary satisfaction in them, in the objective world." The attention keeps going out to the object, out to the object. Wise attention is just noticing the mind that's noticing.

Sogyal Rinpoche writes, "At present our mind faces away from itself." The mind bends towards whatever we experience—the five senses and thoughts of self, past and future—the attention's bending towards that. But one is bound not by perceiving, not by any of the experiences, but by the attachment, by the clinging.

So rather than getting so sucked into the five senses and the thoughts and the mind, just noticing when there's attachment or aversion getting stronger. And just the noticing of it and being there, right there—attachment's like this, aversion's like this—that's wise attention again. You don't have to get to big mind. You can just notice it right here, moment after moment after moment. And here in our daily life is all fertile ground for it. It doesn't have to be any kind of special experience. But it does help us here to keep it a little bit simple.

Shankara again: "When you cease dwelling upon sense objects, peace will arise in your heart." And we call this liberation while living. Just a moment of liberation while living.

So we don't need to be afraid of the sense objects and don't need to be afraid of the contact, but bringing sati-paññā right there. Contact's like this, pleasant's like this, wanting's like this. Don't be afraid of anything. Sayadaw U Pandita said that to me once in an interview when I was—I don't know what was going on—but he basically said,

"You don't have to be afraid of anything." And he meant in this term of mindfulness. Mindfulness, awareness doesn't have to be afraid of anything. That's sati-paññā. That's restraint at the sense doors.

The next one I like a lot is called, as Ajahn Sucitto describes it, paying attention to the attitude with which we use things. And this is something—he says taints can be abandoned by using.

Sayadaw U Pandita said that to me once in an interview. I don't recall exactly what was going on, but he basically said, "You don't have to be afraid of anything." And he meant this in terms of mindfulness. Mindfulness, awareness doesn't have to be afraid of anything. That's sati-paññā. That's restraint at the sense doors.

The next one I like a lot is called paying attention to the attitude with which we use things. The Buddha says that certain taints can be abandoned by using. "Here, a bhikkhu, reflecting wisely, uses a robe only for protection from cold, for protection from heat, from flies. Reflecting wisely, he uses alms food, not for amusement or intoxication of vanity or for embellishment, but just for the endurance and continuance of his body, considering: Thus shall I terminate old feelings—feelings of hunger, feelings of need—without arousing new feelings of greed, of self-interest, and blameless shall I live in comfort and health."

So he's not saying you have to live in total suffering. You can live in comfort and health.

This has been a really interesting one for me—paying attention to the attitude with which we use things. Here on retreat and in our lives: how we use food, how we use clothing, how we use the resources of the environment. Not by comparing it to some model of should—I should keep the heat lower, I should use less gasoline. Not that at all. I mean, that's another question. But in terms of wise attention, we're simply noticing.

If the way I use food is that I go to the store thinking I just need this, but I better buy two more just in case I run out—or you go to the table here, and you're really not very hungry, and you take some food, and then you notice: What if I'm hungry later? I better take more. It doesn't matter if you take more. That's not the point. The point is what's being strengthened, what's being engendered in the attitude, in the mind, by the way you're relating to using food.

For example, times on retreat—and it's the same in our lives—I would think I might be hungry later after tea, so I'll take a banana at lunch and save it. Then I'd have all these rotten bananas back in my room and half-eaten rice cakes because, of course, I wasn't really hungry later. Noticing what was in the mind: it was tight, fearful, troublesome, cumbersome, and then embarrassed and ashamed.

When it came to the point where I could just say, "Oh, I might be hungry later—well, I'll worry about that then," it goes away. And if I'm hungry later, so what? I'm a little hungry, so what? I can feel some hunger, and the mind just notices hunger, and later it goes away. It's so simple, so much more free and easy than trying to guess and figure out every opportunity, save this and save that. When will I eat it? Now I have to walk all the way back and get it, and where can I eat it, and there's crumbs and there's mice and —never mind. I'll be hungry or I won't. I have no clue. It's not a problem. It's so free and easy, just noticing that.

It doesn't mean we don't take what we need. But just notice. It can work in reverse too. You're really hungry, but you look around and think, well, everyone else is eating so little, so I better not. So you take just a little bit, but you're actually filled with either self-loathing or hunger or fear. It looks like you're doing a very good yogi thing of not eating much, but you're actually torturing yourself. You're feeding ill will. You're feeding wanting. Not helpful.

With this attitude of abandoning these tendencies of mind, it's really about noticing how you use things. How you use clothes. I remember one retreat where I had one particular dress I was wearing. Deep in the retreat, I started to notice that whenever I put that dress on, I would want to catch a glimpse of it in the mirror every time I passed—for some reason, my room at this place had a mirror—because I liked that dress. After a while, it got really painful. It's much nicer not to even think about it. When I think about when I was a nun, you just had two or three exact same sets of clothes. You wear one, wash one, one's drying. It's so simple and easy. You're just using clothing for what it's meant for. This isn't about a should. It's about abandoning these latent underlying tendencies.

How we use things in our life, how we use things in terms of the earth and resources —it really moves from being burdensome to a kind of freedom, a simplicity, a lack of fear, less greed, less wanting. But this isn't something imposed from outside. It's from really looking. Look here at your relationship in each moment to how you're using blankets, food, anything—not as a judgment, but asking what feeds purity of mind, what feeds suffering, craving, desire. It's not always what we think. We just have to get interested in that way.

The next one, which is interesting, is patience. A lot of times when we talk about being patient with difficulty, people think we're only saying that because there's nothing else to do—that it's not really good practice.

But he's saying here that taints can be abandoned by patience, by enduring patience. "A bhikkhu, reflecting wisely, bears cold, heat, hunger, thirst, contact with flies and mosquitoes, burning and creeping things. He endures ill-spoken, unwelcome words and arisen bodily feelings that are painful, racking, sharp, piercing, disagreeable, distressing, and menacing to life." So pretty much any bodily feelings you've had come under those, to some extent.

This sense of patience—it's not gritting your teeth and just shutting down until things get better. That's not patience. That's not wise attention. It's really being present. Patience is an aspect of mettā, of acceptance, but it's really cultivating non-clinging. It's cultivating the heart and mind of non-clinging.

The story I always tell when I talk about patience, whether internal or external, is where the Buddha talks to his son, telling him in terms of equanimity: develop a mind that is like the earth. Whatever is thrown on it, or people spit on it, the earth doesn't react. It accepts everything. I know we hear that as being a doormat, and the next one we'll talk about that, which is avoiding. But in terms of patience, meeting that which is not going to harm us or kill us, meeting that which arises in our practice without feeding reactivity, wanting, ill will—this actually begins to destroy, to abandon these underlying tendencies to aversion. And I can really speak from personal experience that it can happen, they can lessen. It's really true.

When I first went to be a nun in Thailand for about a year, I hadn't spent too much time in Asia. The first two months were really just one moment of aversion after another, having to adapt to the conditions and to being in robes—all the things he said, the heat and the insects and the food. I was so filled with aversion about so many things. I remember when the hot season started, I was in Bangkok, and I'd see the sun coming up in the morning and think, "Oh, another day of sun." It was so hot in those tin-roofed kuṭis in my long, long sleeves. My mind was so reactive.

It took a couple of months until I really started to recognize, "Oh, everything that happens, aversion comes up. There might be something going on." But the sense of patience—it doesn't just happen like that. I was committed, so I kept staying there. I kept looking at my mind. The circumstances were not ones I could leave, but I'd chosen to be there. So the circumstances were just what they were: bugs and heat and forest.

I don't know if you realize that rainforests are incredibly loud. Talk about silence! Mangoes dropping on the tin roof are like little bombs going off. You'd want to meditate—bang, bang, bang all day. It's really intense. And people love to come up and snap pictures in your face when you're the farang, the farang mae chi. You just turn around and keep walking without feeding the aversion.

But being through that, after a year when I went to leave, I was so happy in the same circumstances. The only difference was that the reactions in my mind really were not being triggered. So this latent tendency means when the situation's there for aversion, it comes up. But now the situation's there and it doesn't come up. And it's not just because I was incredibly concentrated.

I know now when I go to Asia—I've been going every year—and really, I knock on wood because I know it's not going to stay that way. But I used to have to go through an aversive time of adapting to things. And the last few years, it just hasn't happened much.

I don't mean aversion never comes, but stuff that used to trigger it just doesn't happen anymore. I remember being really sick once when I was teaching up in Chazwa in Burma, thinking, "I'm really sick and it just doesn't matter." It just didn't matter. The mind was happy. So I can really see from comparing similar situations that when the circumstances are there but the latent tendency doesn't come up, it's not there in that moment. This is from patience, really. It's a very powerful aspect of wise attention.

Okay, this always happens—I'm going to have to go faster through the last two.

Taints abandoned by avoiding. This, I think, is really important for us to recognize. The Buddha talks about avoiding dangerous things as a way of abandoning these taints—not just as a way of saving your life, but as a way of freeing our hearts and minds.

So it takes discerning wisdom, and he's just so practical. I mean, he talks about things like avoiding a savage elephant, something that's charging you, or falling into a pit. He's like, "Don't be stupid," right? But he's not just saying that in terms of normal common sense that anyone would have. He's saying this can help you wake up.

Now, avoiding doesn't mean we avoid what we don't like—that's just feeding wanting and ill will. But it is practical. He's not saying that, but some people think, "I ought to be able to be totally, perfectly mindful and non-reactive no matter what's going on internally or externally." Right? You're having the most extreme terror, the most extreme rage. You're aware of it, but it's just getting stronger and stronger and stronger. The mindfulness isn't as strong. The more you try to be with it, the more you're getting lost. And then the mind says, "No, if I was a good yogi, I could just be mindful of this no matter what happens."

No. Avoiding means to skillfully redirect the mind. Pull out of that intense thing that's going on in the mind, because by paying attention to it, you're just feeding the kilesa. So it's not a failure. It's actually advice from the Buddha to direct your attention elsewhere in order to reconnect, to reestablish this balance of wise attention—awareness that's not colored with kilesa.

One or two of you here could relate to that, right? Just notice what you think when you tell yourself, "I should be able to take this no matter what." Now, that's very different from, "Oh, I don't really like this sound in here. I think I need to go somewhere else so I can have quiet to really deepen my practice." Remember, don't look externally—look internally. When you do that, what's being fed? If it's ill will or wanting, then it's not helpful. The avoidance isn't helpful when the avoidance is feeding wanting or ill will. But staying there and being mindful by gum no matter what is not skillful, is not wise attention—not if that's feeding the fear, the ill will, the terror. So this is really important.

I can't read you this passage because I'm running out of time, but there's a sutta where the Buddha is talking to the nuns and saying, "When you're doing the four foundations—really being present with the body, with the feeling tone, vedana, with the citta, with the mind, with the formations—and the mind gets sluggish or distracted outwardly, or a fever arises in the mind based on the attention to the body, based on the attention to the feelings..." What does he say? He says, "Then you withdraw the mind from that experience and redirect it to something inspiring."

Yes, the Buddha is saying this. Redirect it to something inspiring, or at least something neutral—but get out of there. Direct it to something neutral until it rebalances itself, until it's not so scattered, until the fever's down, and then you come back again to what you were paying attention to. This is avoiding in order to actually abandon these unwholesome underlying tendencies.

And the last one, very tricky, is removing.

Removing means, the Buddha says, that a practitioner reflecting wisely does not endure an arisen thought filled with sensual lust, ill will, or cruelty. He abandons it, removes it. He doesn't endure evil, unprofitable states of mind or experiences. He abandons them.

Now, this is tricky because if you're abandoning it with aversion, that's feeding ill will. So this removal really takes a balance of pañña—discernment—checking the attitude in the mind, and also a kind of resolution that comes from wisdom, a clear seeing. It's like, "No, I don't need to go there."

Say again you have a Vipassana romance or Vipassana vendetta and it keeps coming up. "They're so wonderful. They're so horrible. They did this." It starts. You see it. You feel the wanting. You feel the aversion. And after a while, it's enough already. But not with ill will. Don't have to go there. Don't have to go there. This is really possible when we're seeing clearly.

Years ago, I developed a chronic autoimmune condition. When it first began, I had really strong symptoms. No one knew what it was, it was hard for me to walk, and I had no idea where it was going to go. Thoughts would start coming up in my mind: "I'll never be able to take a walk. I'll never be able to do this." And a lot of fear would come with it. As you know, just from having a twitch in your knee, you understand where that can go from there.

So that was really starting. And I was so grateful for the wisdom and the mindfulness. After a day of that—and the condition went on for a long time before it balanced out—I saw my mind start to do that. And I could really say, "No, I don't need to do that. I have no idea what's going to happen, and that way only goes to suffering."

And that was so clear. It was so clear that to go into those thoughts was completely unhelpful and suffering-inducing that every time they'd start, the suffering was so evident, I could just go, "No, I don't need to do that," and I wouldn't go there.

That's really what we mean by removal—not hating, not getting out the pickaxe, but just with this clear seeing: "No, I don't have to go there." That's really powerful. And again, it's not feeding these underlying tendencies.

The last way I don't have to elaborate on, which is developing the seven factors of awakening, which Sally spoke about the other night. That's what we're doing here.

So I thank you for your patient attention.

With a liberated mind, I say, Sariputta, one is a great person. Without a liberated mind and heart, I say, one is not a great person.

And how does one have a liberated mind? Here, Sariputta, a bhikkhu dwells contemplating the body in the body, ardent, clearly comprehending, mindful, having removed covetousness and displeasure in regard to the world. As he dwells contemplating the body in the body, the mind becomes dispassionate, and by non-clinging, it is liberated from the taints.

Similarly for contemplating feelings in feelings, mind in mind, phenomena in phenomena. It is in such a way, Sariputta, that one has a liberated mind.

CHAPTER 36

Four Noble Truths

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson addresses a common challenge on retreat: confusion about which meditation technique is "right" or "best." She redirects practitioners to the fundamental context underlying all Buddhist practice—the Four Noble Truths that the Buddha identified as his sole teaching: dukkha and its cessation.
>
> Wilson offers a nuanced exploration of dukkha, moving beyond the limited translation of "suffering" to its fuller meaning of unreliability, friction, and dis-ease. Drawing on Pāli etymology and Anālayo's scholarship on the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, she explains how dukkha encompasses not just unpleasant experience but all experience—including pleasant states—due to their impermanent nature. She emphasizes that this first truth is "to be understood," not fought against or denied. The second truth reveals that our anguish arises from craving (taṇhā), aversion, and the endless habit of "me-ing" and "my-ing" every experience.
> The heart of the talk illuminates the third noble truth: liberation through non-clinging. Wilson shares the Buddha's teaching that the mind is inherently luminous and "free from the attachments that visit it." Rather than creating special states, practice involves recognizing awareness itself—turning attention from entrancement with objects and reactions to the knowing quality that is always present. Any experience, pleasant or painful, can become "the rattle" that awakens us to this ever-available awareness. This teaching offers profound encouragement: freedom is accessible in this very moment, regardless of how our practice appears to be going.

Listening to the questions this morning and our instructions and in the interviews over the days, I hear a lot of questions, a lot of sense that we've been giving different instructions, different techniques that various of you are doing—all of which is fine. And there's a lot of wondering or doubt about how to do it right, or which technique is best, or you hear instructions for a technique you're not doing and then you want to know how to do your technique but with those instructions. It can get a little confusing, but it's all good.

Tonight I just want to remind us all—nothing new, but remind us all—of the larger context, the reason for any or all of our methods and techniques of practice, why the Buddha taught and why we're doing it. Just to remind us of the bigger picture.

Remembering the Buddha, one of his famous statements is: "I teach one thing and one thing only—dukkha and the end of dukkha." Or as it's sometimes translated: suffering and the end of suffering. Or other descriptions of it: liberation of mind, liberation of heart through non-clinging, recognition of natural great peace, learning to see through our limiting and limited views and ideas about ourselves, about our world, about what is possible, about what happiness and suffering actually are.

This is vast. It's also accessible immediately in this moment, here and now. It's the context, hopefully the ground, the motivation which in some form is—hopefully, I'm saying, because I don't know for you—inspiring all of our practices, all of the techniques and methods, all of our journeys along our individual paths.

To get in touch for yourself, in whatever language, in whatever form works for you, with your sincere motivation and the depth and vastness of it, the breadth of it, is really helpful and essential at times. Especially when we find ourselves getting caught up in niggling thoughts about how it's not going right, or how do I do this, or is this the right way? We get so focused on what we're doing that it's helpful to just reconnect for yourself with the depth, the profundity, or the simplicity—whatever word you want to use—of your motivation. Touch it. At the beginning of a sitting, the beginning of a day, the beginning of a walking—our sincere motivation, the essential energy that keeps us going here, that helps us put one foot in front of the other, that helps us come back and be here for this next moment of greed, for this next breath, for this next unpleasant sound, whatever it is, for this next moment of bliss.

This is essential. It supports our energy and our steadiness—really getting in touch with your motivation over and over, honoring it.

And yet motivation, or wise attitude you could say, is not enough to really start us and keep us going on our path. It needs to be joined with, supported by, wise discernment, wisdom, wise understanding. Or you could even say in a very simple way: just starting with the right information.

As both Sally and Howie talked about in their talks, there's this question of what happiness is. Actually, it's said that part of what motivated the Buddha to start teaching was seeing with his all-seeing mind the fact that most people have wrong information about what happiness is. You could get a sense of that from Sally and Howie's talks—that we all want to be happy, but with our limited understanding, with wrong information actually about what constitutes true ease, peace, freedom, happiness. Happiness is a tricky word. Without that right information about what's possible, about what's really so, just how things are—without that right information, we end up looking for happiness in the wrong places. We end up floating in that deck chair over L.A., one way or another.

Such a great story, because I could really see myself doing that—maybe not that particular thing, but some version of it. That's a metaphor for what we do without the right information. We keep on feeding confusion.

As the Buddha said, his teaching, the path of awakening, runs against the stream of culture. I won't say modern culture—he said it back then. It runs against the stream of culture as to what happiness is, what suffering is, what peace is possible. And not just external culture; it runs against the stream of the habits of our heart and mind—as if we're separate from our culture, but I don't think so. What is our culture but us? The habits of our mind are also, when we just let them run without paying attention, against the stream of the Buddha's teachings.

So we really need to begin and keep referring to what you'd call right information. What did the Buddha say we need to know to begin our path, to stay on our path, to support our awakening?

This really basic context for all of our particular forms of practice or methods, what we need to know, the right information that leads our motivation into discerning awareness, into wise view, into the freedom that comes from wisdom—is what he called the Four Noble Truths. I want to speak a little bit about each of them.

The first truth, which in Pali is dukkha. I want to talk a little about that word and what this truth is. The first truth of dukkha is often translated into English as suffering. I really don't find that broad enough or helpful. I'm pointing this out so that we can see in our own hearts and minds the ideas and connotations that come up when you hear the word suffering. If you're used to translating dukkha as suffering, it'll be the same.

Dukkha—first of all, this truth of dukkha, as the Buddha said, is to be understood. It's really like a broad description of the human condition. That's just what it is. And he doesn't say this truth of dukkha is to be changed, gotten rid of, hated, or overcome. It's to be understood. It's basically: "Hey, folks, this is the way it is. Learn to be with it, and you'll be free."

Keep fighting it, and we're floating over L.A. again.

Dukkha—as perhaps many of you have read in Analayo's book on the Satipatthana Sutta. He seems to be a really interesting translator of Pali as well. He describes two possible definitions of the word dukkha based on different derivations. One of them—and I'm not going to go too deeply into etymology—would have du meaning difficulty and kha meaning something like the hole that an axle goes through in an ox cart. So basically the hole and the axle rod don't fit properly. Dukkha is like disharmony, friction, that kind of rub. It's just always kind of rubbing, not going smoothly. That's one derivation.

The other is standing with difficulty, standing uneasily, uncomfortably. So again, dukkha would mean standing badly, so to speak. It's a kind of uneasiness, a dis-ease, being uncomfortable. That's very different from horrible dukkha suffering.

Let me share what the Buddha gave as what comes under dukkha: unreliability, insecurity, that kind of rub. First is dukkha dukkha—that there's basic unpleasant experience. And that's usually what we think of as dukkha. I find myself using dukkha as a shorthand for unpleasant, for suffering, actual suffering. Like I step on a thorn, my foot really hurts, and I'll say, "Oh, dukkha." We always use that as a shorthand in this meditation scene. And it's really not helpful because it keeps reinforcing a limited understanding of what dukkha means. So if something's really going badly—ah, dukkha.

That's the first definition: basic unpleasant experience. Being born is pain. Sickness, old age, disease, death, being separated from what we love, being put together with what we don't love. Again, the basic human condition. But all of those we can really relate to—yes, that's the friction, that's not going well, that's standing badly, that's suffering. We wouldn't have a problem calling that suffering. It's part of life.

The second aspect is that everything is in constant change. But this includes all pleasant experience as well as all neutral experience. So the first noble truth is not just about things we don't like. It's that all experience, all the six sense doors, all that we experience arises due to conditions. The conditions change, and it goes away. But within that, there's plenty of really pleasant and lovely experience. It's also dukkha.

Remember Howie last night talking about sukha dukkha? That's what he means. But we mostly don't think of it that way. In our shorthand, which is inaccurate, when something really nice is happening and everything is going well, we don't say, "Oh, that's dukkha." We say, "Oh, no, finally! Finally the universe came together, the stars are in alignment," or "I finally got it, I'm a good meditator, I finally overcame, now the breath is right, now it's how it's supposed to be." Now that's dukkha. Because it isn't going to stay like that very long.

So it's to be understood—the change, the unreliability. All feelings, the Buddha said. There's one sutta where he said all feeling—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—is dukkha. It's all unreliable. It's all subject to change. It's all insecure. And that's not saying it's bad. It's just a broad statement of the human condition.

In fact, something to really be aware of: if we find, just in paying attention to our own experience and the way we relate, that when we come in contact with some aspect of this first noble truth of dukkha—the unpleasant, the pleasant, the neutral, the change—do we automatically associate it with some form of aversion? With some form of unpleasantness? Can we even contemplate the first noble truth in a really open, accepting, "oh, that's just how it is" wise way? How easy is it for our mind to slip into the habit of some kind of aversion to it?

I don't know—that's just a reflection, a contemplation to tune into for yourself, because that's a misunderstanding. We can have, and we often do have, reactions ranging from mild aversion to deep despair, to fear, to resistance, to outright, flat, total denial of many aspects of dukkha. And it's a really very profound and subtle truth. It just really touches everything.

I find in all the years of practice, first hearing about the truth of dukkha was actually really liberating. It cheered me up. It was like, "Oh, that's why."

Like when Sally was talking about going on vacation and it's supposed to be so wonderful. And we just ignore all the stuff that isn't. We come back and think, "Oh, that was great. That was wonderful." Like it's supposed to be. We're almost talking ourselves into it. And somewhere in the back, I kind of think, "You know, I'm acting out." This is when I was quite young, but I couldn't have put the words to it. It was as if I was trying to conform to what I thought everybody else was happy about. But really, internally, my experience wasn't "everything's so wonderful, everything's so happy."

I remember when I was younger, when I really kind of got this, I went with a friend—when I was working at IMS—we went to have a workout and a sauna. It was in the middle of winter. So we had to get in the car, really snowy, icy, freezing, drive for half an hour to the health club. Then we go in and we had to separate—he was a man—and it was really cold in that locker room. My body, I hate the cold, so it was really uncomfortable. Went swimming, which was freezing. I was tensed up and I don't like exercise anyway. Got out of that, got into the sauna, thank God I could relax for a few minutes. Then you start to sweat, then it gets all wet and you're sweaty and hot and smelly, and then you get a headache. So you get out and get in a cold shower. I hate cold showers, so I'm in the cold shower, I hate that. But then I can get back in the sauna, it's nice again for five minutes, then stinky, sweaty, headache—I gotta get out, take another shower, get dressed and leave. We both got together like, "Wow, that was so good." We get back in the car and go. That's the story I was telling myself.

That's really more the axle not fitting in the hole. It's always grinding. What's the problem? Things are supposed to be nice. So hearing about dukkha, it was a relief on some level.

But of course, we have to keep discovering over and over that the habit of aversion and just flat-out denial really can be so strong. I read this in a newspaper a few years ago, an article from a small town in Spain:

The mayor of this southern city has banned death. He feels the local cemetery is too crowded for a soul to get decent rest. So the 4,000 residents of this village in Granada province have to remain alive while municipal officials shop for land to house a new graveyard. The mayor issued an edict last week ordering people, quote, "to take utmost care of their health so they do not die until town hall takes the necessary steps to acquire land suitable for our deceased to rest in glory."

I'd call that denial of the basic facts of life and that they're out of our control.

I could go on and on. I'm just giving little highlights about dukkha. It is to be understood. And we understand it, as Ajahn Chah says, just by meeting it right where it arises. Not by this denial in my mind—like me going to the health club. It's unpleasant and there's just this kind of denial. You see it and just kind of gloss over it. You know it's there, but you don't really open into it. You don't really let it in. And then it didn't really happen. You kind of tough it out. It's gone. Okay, now it's the good part.

Ajahn Chah says, wherever it hurts, wherever there's friction, right there we must investigate. Take that thorn out of your foot. Just pull it out.

Wherever your mind gets stuck, you notice it. And as you look into it, you will understand it. You'll see it. You'll experience it as it is. Wherever suffering arises, look into it. Look right into the present moment. Look at your own mind and body. When suffering arises, not so much asking, but just looking—why is there suffering? Look right now. When happiness arises, look at what is the cause of that happiness. Look right there. Wherever these things arise, be aware. Both happiness and suffering arise from clinging.

I read that on purpose because often the happiness, the sukha dukkha—clinging is what causes the suffering of it. That's the second noble truth. The cause of our suffering, the cause of our anguish, the cause of our difficulty is not just the facts of life. It's often given as tanha, the Pali word for craving, intense thirst, wanting.

I'm going to broaden it here, saying that in terms of our practice, in terms of exploring our minds and the dis-ease and unreliability and confusion in the moment, the real cause of our anguish is not only the craving, the holding on to the pleasant, but also the reactions of aversion, the pushing away of the unpleasant. And there's a third reaction of mind—relating to any sense experience, seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, and mental experience, relating to any experience as me, as mine, as all about me. Greed, hatred, delusion. That in the mind, in any particular moment, is the cause of our anguish: the clinging, the aversion, the meaning.

So when Ajahn Chah says, look right there when happiness arises, he's talking about worldly happiness in that way. Clinging is the cause of the suffering around it. Because yes, there's plenty of pleasant experience, of happy experience—that's sukha dukkha. And we don't want to hate it. That's just aversion. Just as we don't want to hold away and gloss over the difficult, the unpleasant, the times that it's rough and not working, we also and equally don't want to say, well, it's going well now, and then do one of two things.

We either don't pay attention anymore—it's going well, it's equanimous, I've got it, I stop in some way, I coast. That's the habit in my mind. Okay, it's fine. And then real suffering, real suffering, wakes me up again. I don't want to hear that the pleasant, the equanimous, when everything's going well, is sukha dukkha. Did you want to hear that? You want to hear that when things are going well and your breath is nice and it's all even, that that's also dukkha? Is that what you came here for? Probably not. And so the habit of my mind is to stop really looking then sometimes.

But another habit that happens with many people, especially on retreat, is to really notice the difficult, what you're doing wrong, the suffering, and actually almost not stop looking with the pleasant, but discount the wholesome, the beautiful. So a moment of real peace arises in your mind and you think, well, that was just a one-off. Or you're really struggling with something and suddenly there's a real insight into it, and you think, well, that was nice, but now that insight's gone and I'm back in dukkha. That doesn't count. Or you're having a good time, many people when it's going kind of calm and it seems to be going well and you're really interested—you come into interviews and there's that little voice in the background: but I'm not really learning, I'm not really getting to the nub of things, I'm not really doing it. It should be suffering. It should be hard. There's a way we don't trust.

Both of those habits miss the mark. And really, Ajahn Chah says, meet it right where it is. Look. Look at the suffering. Look at the happiness. Really meet it as it is with awareness that's filled with interest, not with assumption, not with meaning. Just see right there. That's how we come to understand dukkha.

But anyway, back to the cause of our anguish, our suffering, which is to be abandoned, the Buddha says—this is really exploring these habits of wanting, of clinging, of pushing away, and of me-ing, my-ing, making everything all about me. And each of those is a talk in itself, right? So I'm just going to briefly mention them.

Because as I said, there is worldly happiness. And looking at it and seeing the insecurity in it is freeing. That's not about getting depressed. That's about freeing us to really appreciate and be more fully present in the worldly happiness without looking to it to give us something it can never give.

Ajahn Chah again: "Worldly accomplishments, happiness on whatever level, still leave you in the realm of suffering. Whatever happiness there may be comes about in dependence on external things. That's not the happiness of freedom—the happiness that does not depend on anything external."

So what is it we depend on? We depend on possessions. We depend on pleasure, on reputation, on praise, on wealth. We lean on all these things, like leaning on a rotting old tree trunk. And then as we lean on it for too long, it breaks and falls, and we fall with it. Such is worldly happiness. I love that image—just sitting here so happy, leaning on the trunk, and just clunk. And it's like that when it changes.

But remember, I said dukkha doesn't mean aversion or dislike of it. So when we hear this, notice if your mind goes, "Well, there's no point in leaning on any of these things, so forget them all. They're no good." Does it go to a kind of judgment or negativity? Hopefully it doesn't, but if it does, just notice that, because that's just aversion, that's just rejection.

Really understanding the truth of dukkha is simply, "Oh, this is how it is." This wonderful praise, this accomplishment, this lovely, concentrated, peaceful, equanimous meditation is just what it is. Just so much. If I don't lean on it to be anything more, we really fully open into it, completely. No part left out, no resistance, no me too related to, no separation. Very different from, "Oh, this is nice, but it's going to pass, so never mind. Forget it."

So opening into the truth of dukkha is actually very freeing.

What's wrong with clinging? What's wrong with aversion? We're not saying they're bad. They obstruct peace. They obstruct recognizing the possibility in this moment of peace of mind and heart, of ease, of clear seeing. Same with me-ing and my-ing. With clinging, it's like, "I want this, I want that." It just takes you, takes you, takes you. It pulls you around by the nose.

My brother has a hound dog. It's a lovely dog, a really nice dog, but he's bred for hunting, this breed. And this dog is literally led by the nose. It's painful to watch him. He comes in the house and he just sniffs any new person, any new smell, anything that comes in the house that's in my luggage that has anything to do with food or dirty clothes or anything that's had any smell of a human or a living being—he cannot stay away from it. They have to lock all the garbage up, all the doors closed. The dog just cannot stay away from it. He's literally led by his nose to the exclusion of anything else that's going on.

And it looks like real suffering. It really feels to me like the essence of craving—this and this. I mean, he's getting nothing from any of it, but just can't stop. It's painful to watch until it drives you crazy. And it's like that with us.

We were taking a walk, walking uphill, and I noticed I get tired walking uphill. Well, one does, and I do. So I was just walking uphill, and my energy was kind of going. Then I noticed a thought came into my mind: "Oh, soon we'll be at a flat point." And craving came up.

I was just watching the mind, watching the craving that arose. And I saw how we can confuse craving for happiness. Because in that moment of craving, it was kind of energizing. "Yeah, I'll get to the flat point!" It almost felt good—better than being tired. And I thought, "That's really interesting. That's how we get led by it."

If I hadn't been watching closely, there was nothing wrong. I just kept walking uphill. It didn't change anything. That craving came and went. I didn't get to the flat point any quicker. And when I got there, it lasted a second. Then it wasn't flat anymore, and we had to go up again. Big deal.

But I saw how the craving itself brought a kind of energy that, if I wasn't really aware, if I wasn't noticing, knowing the craving as it arose, I would have mistaken for a kind of pleasure. The Buddha says in the suttas, when he talks about taṇhā as the cause of suffering, he says it is "craving which comes together with delight." So often we mistake the craving for happiness. And that keeps us spinning in it.

Don't believe me. Just explore and see. As I say, there are whole talks about this.

Aversion—the resistance, the not liking what's happening, wanting it to be different, pushing it away. We shrink back. We disconnect. And again, our world, our view, our sense of things becomes really limited.

Do you notice how with that unpleasant experience, it's like you're married to it? It's unpleasant and we're resistant to it, but somehow that resistance keeps us just there with it, like it fills up the whole world. There's one unpleasant feeling in your body. There are many neutral and pleasant feelings in your body too, but what is your attention constantly drawn to? You have many, many thoughts, but that one thought about "My practice was so much better last year, what am I doing wrong?"—that thought gets grabbed hold of and it fills up the world.

Thich Nhat Hanh says, if you have one rough tooth—a little hole in your tooth and all your other teeth are fine—can you keep your tongue away from that little rough tooth? You just worry it to death. The mind, in resistance to what it doesn't like, gets really caught in it. And again, it limits completely. It's a maker of measurement, a maker of limitation.

Both of these, of course, are all about who? Me, me, me. It all starts from me. It all ends with me. It all goes around me. Any of the six sense experiences, in the moment of knowing them, can almost immediately be brought back to me when that's what's coloring the attention.

Have you noticed that? You're sitting here very quietly and someone goes out and closes the door. It's got nothing really to do with you. But if you notice that—how likely is it that the mind goes: "What are they doing? And how does it affect me?"

Or, "Oh, they're leaving, but I'm sitting here, so calm and still. I didn't leave, you know?" Someone's walking slow, and you think, "Oh, I should be, or I shouldn't be, or they're doing that, and I'm doing the new way—I'm walking fast." Or someone asks about concentration, and you immediately have to compare yourself. Good, bad, neutral—it doesn't matter.

But how much more freeing is it when there's just a sight, a sound, somebody asks a question, and it's just what it is? Space. The mind makes nothing around it. Very freeing.

Notice how quickly, though, the reference is back to me. And notice how entranced we are by all of these reactions. This is really the place that our practice is hopefully helping us learn to see through. Because we're so entranced by our reactions of liking and disliking and assessment and describing—what does it mean about me, my practice, my life, my past, my future, all of that. We're so entranced by the object of the experience and our reaction to it that that's what causes and keeps us spinning in suffering and confusion.

This is the information the Buddha is trying to give us—to see through, to recognize that this is not really the essence of what's happening, and this is not the way to real peace. Intellectually, probably we all know this, or we wouldn't be here. And the intellectual knowing does us some good. It does. Hopefully, at least it gets us to look. At least it gets us to say, "Something isn't working. Let me try."

But the habits are so strong. I mean, they're just so ingrained. This is why the Buddha talked about our practice going against the stream—because they just feel right. Doesn't it feel right when things are pleasant and things are happening the way you want them to happen? Doesn't it just feel so right that that's how it's supposed to be, that that's good? It just feels like that.

And it just creeps in that it's about me—that I'm practicing, I'm putting out effort, I'm getting concentrated, or I'm not concentrated, or I, I, I. Of course it's all about me. When I'm sitting here, who's the center of everything? Me. Who's thinking these thoughts? Me. Who's meditating? Me. It's just so familiar that we don't even recognize it's happening half the time, never mind looking to see through it.

Bankei said, "Don't set yourself into confrontation with things, with experience, and then your primary being reveals itself in its true form." What does he mean—our primary being reveals itself in its true form? What's he pointing to?

What I want to say is: the Third Noble Truth. That there's a liberation, an ending of suffering, of confusion, an ending of our anguish—namely, liberation of heart, of mind, through non-clinging. This is not talking about a specific constructed state that we work hard enough to manage to create, get there, and stay. It's not an external state, not an internal state.

But moment to moment—there's only this moment—moment to moment, this can be touched, kind of tasted. Given an intimation of the freedom, the spaciousness, the happiness—it's a tricky word to use—whatever: peace, liberation of heart and mind through non-clinging. Not through the state, but in a moment, when the consciousness, the awareness, the mind-heart—same word—is in that moment free from being colored by desire, greed, hatred, aversion, fear, me, me, me.

When these things aren't coloring and we're not lost in them, sunk into them, when we're not identifying with those, when in that moment the awareness, the consciousness, the mind is released from clinging, from aversion, from entrancement really—our entrancement with our reactions and our self-storying. They can even still be there, but the entrancement is released, the attachment is released. That's when there's a possibility to recognize the purity of our true nature, our primary being.

This famous, very well-known teaching from the Buddha: "Luminous is this mind"—remember, the word for mind is the same as the word for heart—"Luminous is this mind, brightly shining, but it is colored by the attachments that visit it. This, unlearned people do not really understand, and so do not cultivate the mind. Luminous is this mind, brightly shining, and it is free of the attachments that visit it. This, the noble follower of the way really does understand, and so for them there is cultivation of the mind."

You get a sense of how both are true, depending on the orientation, the energy, the interest in a moment.

When we don't understand the attachments that visit the mind in any particular moment, awareness, consciousness—if we're not dead, you know, in a coma—is always happening. Always. There's a moment of seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching. It's happening every moment. And in that moment of consciousness, there's awareness knowing that it's happening. Sometimes we don't know, there's not conscious awareness. Sometimes there is.

That awareness comes together with various mental qualities, such as the big three we've been talking about: greed, hatred, aversion, or fear, delusion, confusion, me, me, me. So when the Buddha talks about "colored by the attachments that visit it," it means in that moment of awareness, when one of those qualities is in the mind, if we don't understand that actually the mind, the heart, is luminous, unstained, free of those attachments—when we understand that it's free from those attachments, then there's really cultivation. When we don't understand it, that's when we're just sunk in our reactions, thinking that's all it is, that's all life is about. Pleasant, get more pleasant. Unpleasant, get away from it. Arrange, manipulate so that you can get as much pleasant as possible before you die. And don't think too much about you're going to die because that's not a happy thought.

We don't know any other way. That is such a deep, poignant sadness. That's what motivated the Buddha to teach. When that's all there is, then there's no cultivation of the mind.

But what all of our practices come out of, and what I know you all know—we've all touched it many times—is in that moment when there's the bright, luminous, pure quality of just awareness. And it isn't colored by wanting, by aversion, by confusion or delusion. It's just awareness and whatever object is arising. And it doesn't matter what the object is. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, mental activity, pleasant mental activity like bliss, really unpleasant mental activity like "I'm the stupidest jerk who ever lived." It doesn't matter. There's the awareness. Ah, awareness and object.

And what happens in the mental cultivation is that we change the direction of our interest, the direction of recognition. We change, in a way, foreground and background. We change what's important. So our focus becomes less and less on manipulating all the experience or assessing it in terms of what it means about me or trying to have different experience. And I'm not just talking about meditation—our whole life. Less and less is the energy going into the experience, and less and less is the focus on our reaction to experience. And more and more, the interest, the focus, the love really, the sense of fulfillment is on just recognizing awareness itself. Awareness of anything. We go into the anything, then turn around and just be interested in the knowing of the anything.

And that's really what we're doing. Just the quality of simplicity of wakefulness. Awake, alert, kind of intelligent. Just what it is. It's so simple.

As I said, we've all had many moments like that. Sometimes they're just kind of neutral moments. It might feel peaceful. It's just a kind of moment when you're... It's funny, we talk about mindfulness as remembering yourself, but these moments are sort of like a moment where you forget yourself. I'm not talking about some big, you know, blowing apart, anattā, unity, no sense of self experience. I'm just talking about a simple moment where you're not relating every damn thing that happens back to me. God, it's so exhausting. You're just walking down the hill. And there's seeing and hearing. You can be really, really focused or not. It's not about being really concentrated. It's not about being really blissed out and incredibly precise. It doesn't matter.

That's more about the object. But just those moments of simple—whatever you want to call it—being, presence, wakefulness. And as I say, it might be with just walking. It might be with seeing or drinking a cup of tea. It can be with feeling pain. It can be with feeling sadness. It can be with feeling fear. It can be with a thought. It can be with nothing special, because the object doesn't matter.

Awareness doesn't care. And it cares, you know, about everything and nothing, right? It doesn't care in the sense that some objects make awareness better and some things make it worse. That's what the Buddha is saying. Awareness, the mind, is free from the attachments that visit it, or unstained by the attachments that visit it.

So you've been sitting all day really lost in wanting, wanting, wanting, and then suddenly there's a moment of just, "Oh, wanting is like this." Now, in that moment, it's like a Tai Chi move, right? Wanting—but instead of being so engrossed in it, in our ideas and its media—"Oh, it's like this." That's the awareness. The shift from absorption into the object and our reactions to "Oh, wanting's like this."

Now, is that awareness somehow impaired because so many preceding moments we were lost in wanting? Did that somehow stain or sully or take something away from this moment when the awareness emerged? No. How can it? It can't. I mean, explore for yourself, but awareness isn't a thing. It's always accessible, and no experience or object makes it better or worse. It's not so much a thing of thought, but play with it.

I've been finding this is so freeing. It takes away so much sense of, you know, "My practice, my life, my mind—whatever—is in the pits. I can't do it. I'm getting nowhere. I've got so far to go to be able to get anywhere." It's like, "I need another three weeks just to have a moment of pure awareness"—instead of "Oh, self-judgment's like this." That's it right there.

And then we go, "Oh no, I've got to hold on to it. No, no, no, it's going." Oh, wanting's like this. "Oh my God, I get it!"—and it goes—"and it's so hard." Oh, complaining's like this. And it's like, "Oh, okay. Nothing is a problem." I mean, it's a problem, but being a problem isn't a problem. You know what I mean?

It all has its own flavor. All the experiences, the mind, the reactions, the senses—they all still have their own quality. Nothing is really changing. But what this third contemplation offers us is the cultivation of the mind. The cultivation is knowing that there's this other possibility for how we relate to our life, for how we relate to moment-to-moment experience as it comes and goes. And that's what basically life is—experience, experience, experience, experience. We can't really stop it. Good, bad, indifferent, me, you, whatever.

"Oh, it's like this. It's like this." Sleepiness is like this. "I really hate sitting here" is like this. "I can't do it right" is like this. Bliss is like this. "I love myself" is like this. That incredibly obnoxious noise is like this. Aversion, desire, self-interest—once the

Once the focus, the interest—none of these words exactly capture it. They're all a little too solid, a little too much doing, a little too limited. But once the interest, the love, has really moved from entrancement with objects and experience and me to simply recognizing awareness and what's coloring the awareness at this moment, then things just stop being such a problem.

And that's our cultivation—knowing that this is a possibility, a potential, not fifteen years from now, but right now. This moment, this moment, this moment, no matter what's happening. Vastly freeing.

When I realized that all of life, all of practice, is just moment to moment to moment, it made everything so much more workable for me. Whether I'm talking about recognizing awareness, cultivating more purity of mind, some kind of samādhi-focused meditation, or building up more energy to walk up hills—whatever it is. When I'm looking with my mind, with thought, into the future and some ideal of how it should be at some point, it's really demoralizing. And it's also not accurate, because who knows?

But when we realize there's only this moment, and no matter how completely pathetic our practice or our life or our reaction feels in this moment—in this moment, "Oh, pathetic feels like this"—it's so accessible. Accessible to anybody. It doesn't take a huge buildup of anything, but it takes that willingness to look, to really be here for whatever this moment is.

For me to be in the moment and say, "Oh, self-hatred feels like this"—for that to really be true, I mean, I can say it, but for that to really be the experience, it has to be a completeness of presence with self-hatred. It's not an idea: "Oh, self-hatred is like this." That's back to denial of the first noble truth. "Oh yes, I know, there's just self-hatred and awareness of it, and I'll just be in the awareness. Self-hatred is like this." That doesn't really have the taste of freedom—explore for yourself. It has the taste of delusion, which can be hard to recognize, and we can fool ourselves that it's freedom for a while.

"Oh yes, self-hatred is arising and I'm aware of it. I'm not really caught in it. Self-hatred and awareness, self-hatred and awareness." You'll notice over time there's more disconnection, more distance, more not touching, less and less fulfilling. Until you can't pretend anymore. Something always breaks through. "Oh God, I really hate myself. Oh, I really am useless. Oh, I feel the pain of it." Oh, pain is like this. Land in it.

As soon as I land in it—without resistance, without aversion, without desire—oh, it's like this.

Upandita Sayadaw said to me once, I guess when something difficult was going on—I don't remember exactly what—but he said, "You don't have to be afraid of anything." And that was so supportive to me, because I knew what he was saying. You don't have to be afraid of experiencing anything. The beautiful—don't be afraid of opening into it because you'll get attached. Attachment—don't be afraid to notice it. Aversion, the difficult—don't be afraid.

In that moment of really opening into it without the coloring in awareness of wanting, of aversion, of being—in that moment, the purity of awareness itself is accessible again. The freedom, the uplift, the peace of that.

So the purpose of all our practices, all the various techniques—the ultimate purpose is not to create some lasting state of a harder mind. It's not to create a better or more pleasing object or experience. Short term it might seem like that, and that's where our old habits come back and we get caught. But it's not about having deeper breathing, less pain, always equanimous, always blissful, always peaceful, always concentrated.

All of the practice in our tradition is really to help us see through, understand, and abandon our habits, our fascination with experience, with our assessments, with liking and disliking and me, me, me. With thinking that we can manipulate and control and get everything the way we want it. To see through and abandon those relentless habits of mind that are in themselves the cause of our confusion, our suffering, our alienation.

And we don't try to create awareness or make it pure. We do less and less. Simply get more in the habit of noticing our habits of getting so entranced by experience and our reactions to it. Just notice that's happening. And turn it around, getting more interested in looking at: Is there anything coloring the mind that's paying attention? Getting more interested in the awareness itself.

And really, that gets more and more happiness-producing, more fulfilling. We get less caring what's happening—in some way that's not a kind of disconnected, flat "Ah, who cares, it's all the same, we're just aware of it all, it doesn't matter." That's not it.

It's more like, "Oh, it should be like—no, it's just how it is."

And there's awareness of it. That purity of awareness shines through by itself. When we're not so entranced with our attention, trying to reorganize what's going on, we can just notice the awareness. It's happening. You wouldn't know what was going on if it wasn't happening. Get more interested in it.

Any experience can be—and is, I think Howie said something like this—really can be like the doorway that brings us back home to awareness. One teacher I had once talked about a two-year-old and a rattle. The two-year-old is completely distracted, running around: "I want a cookie! I want a cookie!" And you shake the rattle, and oh yeah, they come back. Well, any experience can be like the rattle that keys us back into awareness, so that we don't have to hate anything. Anything can wake us up in the moment. Sound, sight, smell, taste, emotion, thought—it doesn't matter. Dislike of the thought? Oh, it's like this. And then we're with the awareness again.

So really, all experience can become a gift. There's nothing we need to fight away. There's nothing we need to really get in a struggle with. And then if we are in a struggle, the struggle itself can be the rattle that keys us back into awareness. It's really wonderful, and that's the sense of what our practices are about.

There are lots of techniques, as I said. Without this background understanding, all the techniques are just to help us see the suffering, the futility, the folly really, of these ways of relating—of greed, of hatred, of delusion in mind. Recognize them, see how they work. Not with judging, just really see how they work. And then see if we can get more interested, really start to love awareness itself.

From that background, that context, any of the methods we use—whether it's shamatha, really trying to get very finely concentrated on the breath; whether it's doing metta, which is a kind of one-pointed meditation but also cultivating that feeling; whether it's feeling your breath as the anchor in the body or here at the nose; whether it's not having any kind of anchor but just noticing whatever's coming and going; using the whole body breath—there are many more than that. All of those, when coming from the path, are just to help us steady the attention enough to notice awareness. Awareness of this, awareness of this, awareness of this. It's fine.

But when we're not aware, when we get so sucked into the object again—and we do, because the habits are so strong—when we're doing meditation, back to what I started with in the beginning, we can all of us so easily get focused on whatever we're doing. Am I doing it right? How can I get it better? Often we get sucked into trying to have our meditation take us to some particular experience. And usually it's pleasant, right? Let's face it—how many of you are trying to get your practice to take you to an unpleasant experience? Probably not too many. Or to repeat one.

And then, to do that, we put in a lot of effort—trying, trying, trying—in order to get a particular experience. Forgetting, getting so focused on the object of how it's happening that we forget to turn around and look at what is visiting the mind. The mind is luminous, and it's colored by the attachments that visit it.

So you can really work very, very hard and get very focused on the breath right here and push and push and get to some kind of great experience—and everything's breaking apart and everything's buzzing, whatever it is. And that's a true experience. And you can completely miss the fact that craving was driving you.

Craving doesn't have to be driving us. One can also be just very present, very present, doing the technique, checking back, keeping checking back. What's the attitude in the mind? Just being here, simple patience. Fine. That's fine.

But what's more important? Getting to some great experience driven by craving? What have you practiced in that time? Basically, what's been fed? Craving.

And when, with the craving and the pushing, you finally get that experience—oh, I feel really so sorry. Because then we think, "I'm validated. I got this experience." So that validates that way of doing it. And that's how we all get caught in striving. Everyone—we all do. And we keep on doing it until we strive so hard and the experience doesn't come anymore. And then we're cast into the pit of despair.

So here, all our practices are useful, but keep turning around and notice the attitude in the mind. That's what we mean. Awareness is always available. Notice when it's colored by wanting, by aversion, by meaning. Notice when it's not. Get really interested in the awareness itself, and then all experience, any particular method or technique, is valid, is valuable, is supportive—helping us cultivate deeper and deeper trust in the luminous quality, the luminous aspect of heart and mind.

And it's really true for all of us. Yes, even you. And even in your most pit of worthlessness, uselessness, bad practice—it's still available. Because ultimately, nothing can stain or damage awareness.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 37

Seclusion

Carol Wilson · 56 min

In this profound talk, Carol Wilson examines the Buddhist concept of viveka (seclusion) as one of the three designations for nibbāna, alongside emancipation and release. Drawing from both the Pāli canon and contemplative traditions including the Desert Fathers, she illuminates how seclusion operates on multiple levels: kāya-viveka (seclusion of body) encompasses physical separation from others and restraint from the flood of sense experience, while citta-viveka (seclusion of mind) describes the heart's progressive freedom from the five hindrances.

Wilson explores how retreat practice creates conditions for recognizing the pure awareness that exists when the mind is not grasping. She addresses the challenging material that can arise in seclusion—what she calls our personal 'demons'—and emphasizes that meeting these difficult states is essential for developing genuine compassion. Through teachings from Ajahn Chah, Thich Nhất Hạnh, and Buddhadāsa Bhikkhu, she distinguishes between wholesome conditioned states and true freedom.

The talk offers practical guidance on working with sense restraint, renunciation, and the subtle tendency to cling even to peaceful states. Wilson emphasizes that the ultimate seclusion—freedom from suffering—is available in any moment when the heart is empty of clinging, and that this inner freedom becomes the foundation for authentic compassionate engagement with the world.

Someone once asked the Buddha, "Do you know, dear sir, emancipation, release, seclusion for beings?" Bhikkhu Bodhi, in his notes to his translation, makes the point that these three words—emancipation, release, and seclusion—are three designations, three definitions, three ways of talking about nirvana, freedom. I want to talk about the third of those tonight: seclusion.

Seclusion has various levels, but in terms of nirvana, Bhikkhu Bodhi says it really means seclusion from suffering, being separated from suffering.

When we first hear the word seclusion in English, the first aspect that comes to mind is physical seclusion, being separated from other people. That's certainly an aspect—that's really where it starts. Going through the history of all different religions, the hermit life has been a central aspect in many of them. Jesus spending years in the wilderness, the Buddha spending his six years in seclusion and then his whole monastic life, many ascetic wanderers. I don't have to go through it all.

I want to start by talking about this aspect of seclusion and move through how it serves our awakening. How is seclusion, how is this aloneness different from loneliness? People who don't really relate to or understand the contemplative life, or even the sense of the hermit life, often accuse it of being really self-centered, self-interested, a kind of passive turning away from the world that is unhelpful. Obviously I don't think that.

I was reading a book some years ago about different kinds of hermits. I don't even remember the author, but I want to read a few things from Thomas Merton and also about the Coptic hermits of Egypt in about 280 A.D.

This starts with talking about the Desert Fathers:

"The desert is the uninhabitable place. It is the region of desolation and solitude that surrounds and threatens the fertile plain. Along the Nile Valley, the desert is a silent presence always visible to the dwellers in towns and villages as they live in comfort. Its bare hills are the 'waste howling wilderness' of the Old Testament, the haunts of demons. Yet men and women have always been drawn from the comfort and security of their homes in the valley to the barren caves above in search of solitude."

That sets the tone. Then the book goes on to talk about St. Antony of Egypt, who is one of the most famous, one of the most well-known even now, of the Desert Fathers. There were apparently some desert mothers as well, but they had to masquerade as desert fathers. Not as well-known.

St. Antony of Egypt was the son of rich Christian parents, quite well to do. His parents died when he was young and left him well provided. But the book says that when he heard the words of Jesus to the rich—that you should sell all you have and give it to the poor—he somehow felt that they were spoken to him, and he did that. He sold everything he had and went into a life of solitude.

First he went to a local hermit to learn how to do the solitude thing. Then he went to live on the outskirts of the village, then moved further away. He finally ended up at a deserted fort on the bank of the Nile, way out in the desert. It said he lived alone here without seeing a human face for over twenty years, being brought supplies of bread and water every six months by friends. Sometimes the friends who brought these supplies would hear terrifying shrieks and groans from behind the locked doors. Eventually they could stand this no longer—it took them twenty years; they had some patience. They broke down the doors, expecting to release a wasted and emaciated maniac. Instead, Antony emerged healthy, sane, balanced, and really full of energy and advice to help people. He went to Alexandria to support Christians who were being persecuted by the Romans and spent the rest of his life alternating between retreats into solitude and emerging to help and advise others.

Something interesting was going on behind those locked doors in the waste howling wilderness. And it wasn't just for himself, because it really served for him to go out and be with and serve all beings.

So what's going on with that? What's this seclusion about?

The first aspect of seclusion is this separation from other humans. That's only the very beginning. It then moves from separation from humans—this is called in Pali kāya-viveka, seclusion of body. Kāya is body. This is the first aspect of seclusion of body, where we seclude ourselves from other human beings—not out of hatred, not out of fear, but out of allowing ourselves the space to turn inward and really understand more what's going on.

Again, he's talking about the Desert Fathers. "The search for solitude is a journey to discover the inner self. The monks fled to the desert to become ordinary. If they had gone there to be extraordinary, this would have meant taking the world with them as a standard of comparison. They lived among the rocks because they wanted to simply be themselves."

And Thich Nhat Hanh: "We've lost our taste for silence. We do not know how to be with ourselves without something else to accompany us—a book, a telephone, TV, conversation, you name it. We've lost our taste for being alone. So the first thing for us to do is to return to ourselves in order to recover ourselves, to be our very best. We need to reorganize our daily lives so that we do not allow society to colonize us."

So that's the first, most basic sense of seclusion in the way of hermits—a period of time of solitude. In a way, it's what we're doing here without communication, to give ourselves some space, some time where we're not accompanied by other people, by our distractions, to turn inward and come to see what's going on. And that's what's happening, right? We don't always like what's going on, but that's an important part of it.

Then comes the next aspect of kaya-viveka, seclusion of body. This is really the reason we would have seclusion from other people to begin with, which is actually seclusion of body from the flood of sense experience. I don't think I need to go into it at length, but in our daily life—and apparently it was the same back in ancient Egypt, apparently it was the same back in ancient India—there's just so much going on, so much sense experience: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking. And it can be so powerful. There's so much happening that, as you know, we just get lost in the habits of mind of reaction to sense experience. And because it's happening so fast, it's harder to notice.

This is how Ajahn Chah describes it. He calls it kamogha, the flood of sensuality: "Sunk in sights, in sounds, in smells, in tastes, in bodily sensations. We're sunk in them because we look at the externals. We look towards the sense experience. We don't look inwardly." We're not saying sense experience is bad—that's life. It's the sense of being sunk. In fact, similar to what Heather said last night from the Buddha, it's like being a slave when we're sunk in sense experiences. Somebody else has control over you. When they tell you to sit, you have to sit. When they tell you to walk, you have to walk. Being enslaved by the senses is the same. No matter how hard you try, you can't seem to shake it off. This is when our attention keeps being directed outward toward the senses. There's a pleasant sight—we're sunk in it. We're so flooded by it, we just move toward it. We like it. We get into liking. We get into the whole story. The next minute, there's something unpleasant. It's too hot. We don't even notice what's happening—there's aversion. I've got to do something. Throw off my robe. Open the window. Get out the door. Write a note. Do something. We go outside.

It's too cold—I've got to go up to where it's warm. It's too noisy—I've got to go to where it's quiet. It's too quiet—I've got to go to where there's some energy. We're just caught in the hound dog thing again. We've talked about this—being sunk in sense experience through the five or six senses. Again, it's not that there's anything wrong with sense experience.

This kāya viveka, this seclusion from the flood of sense experiences—we're not talking about going into a sensory deprivation tank where you don't experience anything. We're just talking about a little bit of seclusion so we have half a chance of noticing what's going on once in a while. Just how much seeing goes on! We talked about that the other day in one of the questions. The tendency is for the attention of the mind to just go out to sights, out to sights, never remembering to turn around and look at the mind.

The seclusion, the sense of simplifying, secluding ourselves from that flood we live with in our daily lives—that everyone pretty much lives with in daily life, in the information age, in the traffic age. God forbid you should walk fifty yards without calling somebody or texting somebody on your cell phone. You might be alone. You might not have any input. Somebody might not know you exist.

So we come here. There's still plenty of sense experience, and that's fine, because that's what we learn from. We'll go to that in a minute. But just the physical seclusion of body—we're not in our normal life. There is much more austerity here, I assume. I mean, it's possible you could live more simply than this, sure. But I imagine for most of us, this is somewhat simpler. You don't have control over your food. You're sleeping in a relatively simple, austere room. You only have the clothes you brought. Hopefully you're not doing what happens halfway through the three-month course at IMS in the winter, when suddenly all these mail-order packages start arriving. L.L. Bean and REI, they're piling up in the foyer. Hopefully that's not going on here. Hopefully I didn't give you ideas.

So just this—this simplicity, this little bit of renunciation, this seclusion from the flood of senses. And then there's the flood of senses in our mind, the flood of reactivity, the flood of talking, the flood of endless commentary. You all know that. You've all talked about how the mind just reacts and discusses every single thing that happens. And a lot of you are mentioning—I know it changes—but a lot of you are mentioning that it's slowing down. It's less gripping. There's more of a sense of space. The relentless chatter and commenting can slow down.

This is just the beginning of being able to see the space of heart and mind that starts to have a possibility of glimmering through when we're not so sunk—not so much in the senses themselves, but in our reaction, in being really turned outwards towards all the sense experiences. It's like a little space where something other can be noticed.

There's an article in the New York Times Book Review by a woman about a book written by another woman who was also writing about hermits. She talked about unhappy hermits—people who really go off to be alone out of aversion and hatred and fear and phobia. We're not talking about that. But she says the positive is "an elected silence"—the expression is Gerard Manley Hopkins—"that gives us the possibility of cleansing the doors of our perception so that we might even see the world as Traherne did, saluted and surrounded by innumerable joys."

And that's what starts to happen—joys and sorrows both. But our perception, the doors of perception, get a little cleansed. A lot of you have mentioned the different ways this shows up: suddenly the sounds of the frogs are so clear, the bird calls are so clear, the moon when we come out and the stars seem so vivid. Our sense of the silence and the appreciation is so much more obvious. There's just some space, a little bit of space in awareness, to notice these things when we're not so sunk in this flood of sensuality. And sometimes just this is enough. Sometimes coming home from a retreat, that's the thing we remember.

I remember one retreat, years ago, one of my first retreats, sitting somewhere as a little lizard was crawling over a stone. That was it. I remember that moment. It was thirty years ago. Because the perception was just so clear. There wasn't any reaction. It was just that sense of what it does—it points our awareness back to the spaciousness, the silence of the pure heart, the pure mind. We begin to be able to get a glimmer of this because of this seclusion from being sunk in the flood of sensuality.

And as many of you mentioned, I've certainly found it true—being in nature is an enormous support for many people. Not for everyone, but for many, it's an enormous support to this. It's one of the real blessings, I would say, one of our real privileges to be able to be on a retreat like this, and to be in a place that has beautiful nature all around us. Many of the retreats I teach in different places around the world tend to be located somewhere in nature—not always, sometimes it's in the city, but often there's nature nearby.

Just noticing, so many people here have mentioned the quiet, the steadiness, the peace, various aspects of being here—the space, the sky, the frogs. Somehow, because there's not so much to react to, there's not so much sense of "me" about it. It reflects back to us, if we can notice, that possibility of purity, of silence, of space in mind and heart.

So when you're in nature and you're experiencing that, first just let it in. But then see if your mind tends to posit, "Oh, it's because it's so beautiful, it's out there." And then come back, turn your awareness around again and notice the quality of heart, the quality of mind that's just silent at this moment—silent without all the reactions of liking, disliking, analyzing, me, me, me. Just the frog sound. Just the stillness of the stars.

Just that sense—I know you know this poem, but I'll read it—that you get from this poem by Wendell Berry:

When despair for the world grows in me and I awake in the night at the least sound in fear of what my life and my children's lives may be, I go and lie down where the wood drake rests in his beauty on the water and the great heron feeds. I come into the peace of wild things who do not tax their lives with forethought of grief. I come into the presence of still water, and I feel above me the day-blind stars waiting with their light. For a time I rest in the grace of the world and am free.

That peace isn't something that's out there in the stars, in the water, in the wood drake. That's the peace of a heart and mind that's non-reactive, non-clinging, not identified, really awake. It's wonderful we can use the experience of nature to recognize this over and over, but don't give it away to nature. Turn around and notice.

That's one of the beauties, the joys of a simple life of physical seclusion, seclusion from the flood of sensuality. It really makes awareness so much more accessible and available. And you can see, I think, just from what I've said so far, that this seclusion isn't about just creating that kind of state—oh, let me go throw myself down by the still waters and try to get peaceful again, and then hold on to it, come what may. It's not "let me get rid of everybody and then just have some peace." It's not that.

It's that this is supporting conditions to help us turn our attention away from being sunk in reactivity and sense experience and turn back and recognize what the heart and mind in a moment that's awake and free from clinging is like. That's available here and now. We just need to clear the decks a little bit so we can notice it.

So kāyaviveka also includes, as I'm saying, the simplification—which is a kind of renunciation, really. Enforced renunciation, then chosen renunciation, just getting less and less involved with needing things, wanting things, doing things.

That's one of the reasons in Buddhist countries and monasteries why the eight precepts are often practiced. I'm not advocating that one should do that, but that's really the underlying sense of it—to just free us up a little more from involvement. So the sixth precept, not eating in the afternoon, it's not to prove something. It's just to see how much time and energy and wanting and dislike goes into eating, and how much time is freed up when we don't eat in the evening.

The next precept about not wearing ornaments or jewelry or going to entertainments—that's kind of obvious. But the other aspect is not wearing jewelry, not wearing ointments. Well, we can't wear much ointment here because we're in silence and you can't smell nice. It's just noticing the time we spend tending to looking good, tending to how we feel. Not that we have to deliberately look bad—it's the same thing, only in reverse. It's just noticing.

I've seen it myself when you're trying to decide what to put on that day. Notice what's going on in the mind, not with judgment, but notice what's feeding more craving, what's feeding more aversion, what feeds simplicity and space. When I was a nun, only having three outfits and they were all pretty much the same, you just took the clean one. It was actually really nice. You just get up and you put it on. And now I can tell I'm having a bad day when I'm sitting there looking, "Oh, what can I wear today?"

Oh, this doesn't feel right. And that one… you know, it's like, oh my God, who cares? Nobody, nobody but me. And it's just all this extra hoo-ha. So there's a sense of renunciation in that.

But another aspect of this simplicity, and this is really where our mindfulness practice begins to kick in and play a part, is what's called restraint at the sense doors. There's the kāya-viveka, this seclusion of actually being separated from sense experiences, so it's not even there to pull you. But restraint at the sense doors is really the way we practice with mindfulness and wisdom right at the point of sense contact.

This doesn't mean hating sense contact or avoiding the pleasant. It just means that when there's sense contact—the five physical senses or the mental—sati-paññā, mindfulness and wisdom, are right there at that point of sense contact. We see what the sense contact is, and we notice what the mind does with it. That's restraint.

Sometimes a little bit of restraint can help—looking down, for instance—because so much goes out through the eyes. Even the Buddha said this. There's a whole sutta about the way to awakening and the perfect practitioner, so to speak. I'll just read one stanza: "A bhikkhu, a practitioner, keeps her eyes from wandering restlessly with desire."

I can really relate to that. You're doing your walking meditation, but the eyes are wandering restlessly with desire, almost looking for something to connect with, looking for something to like or dislike or judge. In a sense, when you're walking and somebody walks past, you just have to look. You just have to look. Sometimes it's almost impossible not to look, even when you're paying attention. The craving comes. You think, "I won't look. I won't look." You get really determined. And as soon as you let go, you look.

And what comes from the looking? Is it satisfying? Does it make you happy? I would say ten to one, it gives rise to judgment. "Oh, God, right. Why did I do that? I'm stupid." Or "They look better than me." Or "I'm doing better than them." Whatever. "Why did I do that?" Restlessly looking.

So that's the sense of restraint at the sense doors. It can be not just sending your energy restlessly out with your eyes, not just sending it restlessly out with the ears. But it doesn't mean doing what a friend of mine once did. He put a blindfold on at IMS and walked around for three days blindfolded. I would say that's ignorance, not restraint at the sense doors. We're not going to learn from that either.

But this sense of restraint, of renunciation—it doesn't get a good rap in this culture. How many of you thought, "Yeah, great, renunciation! I love that idea"? Maybe you did. I mean, you're already on the far side of the spectrum; you wouldn't even be here otherwise.

But this is an interesting sutta I found, because the Buddha acknowledged this same thing. It's a sutta where Ānanda comes with a householder named Tapussa to the Buddha. And the householder says, "We're householders who indulge in sensuality, delight in sensuality, enjoy sensuality, rejoice in sensuality. For us—indulging, delighting, enjoying, and rejoicing in sensuality—renunciation seems like a sheer drop-off. Yet I've heard that in this doctrine and discipline"—meaning in the Buddha's teaching—"the hearts of the very young monks and nuns leap up at renunciation, grow confident, steadfast, and firm, seeing it as peace."

So right here is where this teaching runs contrary to the great mass of people: in this issue of renunciation.

And the Buddha says, "So it is, Ananda. Even I myself, before my awakening, when I was still an unawakened bodhisatta, I thought renunciation is good, seclusion is good, but my heart did not leap up at renunciation. It did not grow confident, steadfast, or firm, seeing it as peace."

So the thought occurred to him, "Well, what's the cause? What's the reason? Why doesn't my heart leap up? Why don't I see renunciation as peace?"

And then the thought occurred to him—I actually love the way this is phrased, "the thought occurred to me," because I just get the sense of the impersonal nature of thought. The thought occurred to me. Although I know that's the English; it wouldn't play that way in Pali.

The thought occurred to him: "I haven't seen the drawback of sensual pleasures. I haven't pursued that. I haven't investigated that theme. I haven't understood the reward of renunciation. I haven't familiarized myself with it. That's why my heart doesn't leap up at renunciation, doesn't go steadfast, doesn't see it as peace."

Right there we have a real good example of the difference between intellectual understanding and real, deep, intuitive insight knowledge. And so showing that it was the same for the Buddha as it is for us. On some level, you really wouldn't be here if you didn't have some real understanding and trust that seclusion, that renunciation is somehow going to help us. Sometimes we just really love it too.

But as we pursue that theme, as we really investigate it—the joys, the rewards of simplicity, of restraint at the sense doors, of seclusion from being lost in senses—the rewards of that become clear. And as well, and this isn't with judgment, this is with interest: is it true that there are drawbacks to sense pleasures, to being so lost in that? So we explore that, and we see for ourselves.

And that's when renunciation really is—it's one of the paramis, the ten perfections, but it's also one of the three right attitudes or right ways of thinking, which is the second stage of the Eightfold Path. So renunciation is really a deep inner intention, an understanding of mind and heart. We could take everything away from us and just be sitting here burning with desire and hating it that everything's been taken away. That's not really renunciation.

But when the renunciation comes, it's just a little thing. I'm sure you've seen it here. Maybe you always have thirds at lunch or you always go down for tea, and one day you say, "You know, I really don't want that. I don't need it." It's not the "you stupid, you should." It's like, "Oh, I don't need that." The renunciation is really the seeing that the craving goes away and the space opens up. So true renunciation is actually a state of happiness, of simplicity, of joy.

But in our practice of restraint of the sense doors, it's not always, of course, that way. So the restraint is bringing in this satipañña, this mindfulness-wisdom, at the point of sense contact—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking, emotions—not to judge it or say it's bad, but to see how the mind behaves in contact with senses: pleasant, unpleasant, neutral.

We've talked about this a lot, so I don't think I have to go too much into it, but really this is, in terms of kāya-viveka, seclusion of body, where it starts to move into the next level: citta-viveka, seclusion of mind, seclusion of heart. We begin with the mindfulness of just noticing. Something pleasant comes, we notice it, and we notice what the mind does. Sometimes it just rests there—pleasant. Sometimes it appreciates. Sometimes we're not really quite there, and it goes off into that whole story, like I said before.

We notice with unpleasant. It can hit the unpleasant and just zoom off into a whirlwind of aversion and fear and reactivity. And there's a whole range in between, and it's possible with that restraint right at the sense door to notice the hearing, notice it's felt as unpleasant, notice the little leaning of aversion, and not have to go there.

Same with neutral, which is hard to even notice, never mind the delusion, the spacing out, the who-knows-what's-happened that accompanies it. But boredom is often a response to neutral.

So in this satipañña at the point of sense contact, mindfulness and wisdom, this is where the deep habits of our mind and heart—the ones that cause so much suffering in our life—begin to be able to be seen more clearly.

I know you all know this. Sometimes it's very subtle, sometimes not so subtle. But this is where the seclusion from so much sense input, the spaciousness, the silence of mind, and the awareness we begin to touch serve as support, allowing us to really see how these habitual reactions of heart and mind—aversion, clinging, delusion—how they arise, how they're conditioned, where they go, how they feed our sense of self. And how, when there's mindfulness and wisdom right there, sometimes they simply don't happen. It's fascinating. That's a big part of what our practice is about. We don't have to get obsessive about it.

Sometimes these insights are really quite subtle. The examples I've been giving are relatively subtle—seeing the habits that come from our relationship with pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. When the mental chatter has died down considerably and there isn't too much flood of input, sometimes that's just what you're knowing. You think nothing's going on. You're just having these sittings that seem painful and unpleasant, your mind a little reactive. You think, "I'm just tight. I have one sitting where I'm all tight and in pain, and then the next sitting is kind of relaxed and open and peaceful, and then tight again." You think nothing's going on.

But that's huge. Because what's happening there is really moment-to-moment seeing with mindfulness and wisdom. The cause and effect, the nature of physical and mental experiences arising constantly, the pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral constantly, and how suffering is created or not in the mind and heart, how the mind relates to it. Over and over and over. We're seeing that moment by moment by moment.

And the part of us that's impatient, in a hurry, thinks, "Well, I've seen it, I get it, it's time to move on. I didn't come here for one month just to have pleasant sitting, unpleasant sitting, pleasant walking. Something should happen, you know?" But moment after moment, this is a lot that's happening.

Part of me wants to go back to the day-blind stars and lie down. But no, you don't get to do that now. You get to walk and notice pain in the leg. You get to sit. "Oh, this is really nice and spacious. I don't have to do anything. Why doesn't it stay like this?" Oh, because I want it to. "Okay, I won't want, I won't want." And we're just watching it over and over again.

But in the space and silence, sometimes—not every retreat and not for everybody, but it really often happens—what comes up is not so subtle. The St. Anthony's demons start to emerge. The wailing, the shrieks and groans of St. Anthony behind the door. Sometimes, as the silence and the lack of our normal input take hold, as our normal conscious or unconscious ways of denial, of diversion, of filling ourselves up, of keeping these things down—as they're not there, and as we're cultivating moment after moment of mindfulness and wisdom, that accepting, receptive, kind awareness without hierarchy, just whatever's arising coming into receptive, present-moment awareness, as Heather was talking about last night—our denial systems stop being fed.

And so sometimes what comes up, and it can come up slowly about some little incident happening here, or it can come up with a huge rush and overwhelm us, but our sometimes really strong so-called demons start to emerge and overwhelm us for a while. Often the content starts out as something really small on the retreat—some little incident, something you said, some note you got. It could be anything. And your mind is going, "This doesn't make sense. I'm completely lost in terror over this little thing." And we fight with it, thinking "this doesn't make sense" for a while. But it has nothing to do with what's happening. It's just triggering our deep stuff.

So it's not only the five hindrances, which Heather talked about, but often for people it will come to whatever your really deep personal story is. It usually has a story. It may not. But whatever your demon is—self-hatred, terror, pride, fear of chaos, needing to control, sleepiness, worthlessness, helplessness—take your pick. You probably know yours, and if you don't, you will.

One of my teachers said, "In the light of awareness, all the snakes come up out of their holes." Not always, and not all at once.

Don't get into thinking that if it's not happening, something's wrong. Don't get into thinking that if it is happening, something's right or wrong. It's just that sometimes this happens. Rarely do we think, "Great, this is what practice is supposed to be like"—unless you've been really bored, and then you welcome it rather than boredom. And that's not helpful either.

But this is a really important, and when it's happening, essential part of practice. Most of us, on our journey, really want to get over this. We want to come out of the shrieks and groans, like Saint Anthony, balanced, sane, whole, helpful—but really deeply in this world. To truly be in this world, to really be able to be with other people, to be with all the suffering and confusion and hatred in the world, and the cruelty. I don't know—personally, I've got to see that in myself. If I can't meet it in myself, how am I going to be able to be with somebody else with compassion when they're manifesting it? How am I going to keep from just being beaten down psychologically just by reading the newspapers?

So this meeting, for ourselves, for our own freedom, our own ability to be with these demons when they arise without being so afraid we never even get near them—or without having them drive our behavior when they come up in our life, because they're so strong and we haven't really had practice meeting them, learning to understand them, learning to befriend them.

For me, whenever I get to a particular feeling—I usually feel it here—I don't have to go into my story; we all have our own stories. But when I start to get to the reactions of my mind, I start to get to what I call the crazy place, where I can tell my reactions are way, way, way over the edge of what's going on. And I can see that. But I believe in them. I mean, I'm not just going, "Oh yes, over the edge." I'm really feeling them. And I'm starting to feel crazy. "Oh, this is the crazy place." And I'm glad when I recognize that. Because then, when I can just feel the feelings—I don't have to find the story, but the feeling—the closer I get to it, it's like, "I'm going to die if I feel that." That's the story.

Then I'm really happy now. I didn't used to be, but now I'm really happy when I recognize that. Because I know I'm not going to die. And when the attention can just rest for a moment with that, just rest there—it doesn't fix it or anything—oh, it's like this. It's like all that crazy reactivity stuff, just for that moment, dies away, because that was all a smokescreen not to feel it. I didn't know this, but that's what it was—fifty years of smokescreen not to feel something.

So sure, we're sitting here, we're in the seclusion, there's more space for this to come up, and we won't always recognize it. But just know—just know it's an essential aspect of our journey. We need to honor it, respect the power of it, and know really deeply—I really believe this—the less we're in fear of it, the less we need to be driven by it, the more we're freed for compassionate response.

This is from Thomas Merton again, talking about the hermits: "The hermits who left the world as though escaping from a wreck did not merely intend to save themselves. They knew that they were helpless to do any good for others so long as they were floundering about in the wreckage. But once they got a foothold on solid ground, things were different. Then they had not only the power, but even the obligation to pull the world to safety after them."

So in my mind—and I'm only speaking for me—that's really the direction our seclusion is moving us in, the ability to really do that.

Seclusion of body moves into citta viveka, seclusion of mind. The classical definition of seclusion of mind-heart means secluded from the hindrances, the five that Heather spoke of. Often citta viveka is thought of only as shamatha, deep absorption practice on one object, but it's not that. Citta viveka really has different levels, but as there's moment after moment of just mindful presence, awareness, knowing what's happening—just as I've been talking about, just as we've all been talking about throughout our practice—moment after moment of that simple awareness, noticing the attitude, the pure awareness, moment after moment of that leads to this citta viveka. The mind, the heart, becomes more and more secluded from the hindrances.

Not like you're holding them away—"Oh no"—but you know those times, sometimes for a moment, sometimes lasting quite a while, where you're not putting out any effort, but you just kind of notice wanting and aversion is just not really coming up. And something comes across your field of vision that normally would trigger wanting or aversion, and it doesn't. You're even looking, kind of waiting. Where is it? Am I making this up? And it really doesn't come. Wow. We don't really trust that, but it's nice. It's definitely nice.

So that's the first step of citta viveka.

It comes from the steadiness of mindfulness. And it can deepen. It can deepen whether through one-pointed shamatha practice or through continuing steadiness of mindfulness, where it goes to a place that's not just a little bit secluded from the hindrances, but where the mind gets further and further away from them. It's like becoming more secluded. The hindrances are weak and far away. Wanting and aversion just don't come in so much.

It feels much more stable, this state of mind. And it is a state of mind. It feels much more stable, where you're not so afraid—oh my God, if I do the wrong thing, self-judgment is going to come back. There's a way it's just more trustworthy.

This could be leading into deep absorption practice of jhana, but it also arises in moment-to-moment mindfulness with changing objects, like what Sayadaw U Pandita would talk about as khanika samadhi, momentary concentration, and vipassana jhanas. It's a place where the mind, the heart, feels really light, malleable. It's very pleasant. Mostly, we really like it. And it's useful, certainly, because we get to see what it's like when the mind and heart are non-reactive. We can touch that space of purity. We can really see that it's possible to be with very pleasant experience and not get lost in craving, not even have it come up. Oh, that's lovely.

But really important: keep the light of interest, of investigation, alive and awake in these states. It's really easy for us, especially when we first start to have states like this arise at times—we can't make them come, they just arise—it's easy to mistake that silence, that malleability, that peacefulness, that non-reactivity for something else. It feels like, "Oh, now I've got it. This is it. This is what I've been practicing for." And I mean, it's very good. Most of us would think, okay, that's good enough. If I could just have this, it would be good enough.

But that's not the point. It's a conditioned state. Don't mistake it for freedom. Don't mistake it for the real seclusion from suffering that is the heart and mind of non-clinging.

I've noticed two things that can happen in that space. You look and see for yourself. One is that we subtly get attached. We're really aware: there's no desire, there's no aversion, this space is nice. We even say, "I know, this is just a conditioned space, I know." But we subtly get lost again in looking at the space and forgetting to just notice the attitude of mind. Wanting can come in. Subtle identification can come in. It's just like, okay, this is good enough. We stop investigating. We get clinging.

Or the other thing is—and this is what I tend to do—we just get complacent. Oh, great. Now it's all here. Nothing else to do. No more craving, no more aversion. I can just coast around. At first it's true, in a state on retreat where you can just do whatever arises. You take a walk. You don't sit. You think it doesn't matter because the mind is clear. There's interest. It's balanced. It's stable. If someone says something to you and goes away, it doesn't rock the samadhi. You think, well, that's it. So gradually you just do more things and more things. And before you know it, you're down in the bookstore buying trinkets and writing letters.

You check and you go, wait. It doesn't quite have that same feeling. It slips up on us. We get complacent.

The Buddha said, "Two things I never lost sight of while I was still an unenlightened bodhisattva. One was never to be lax, never to give up my effort. The second, never to settle merely for wholesome states of mind."

And that's powerful because, you know, mostly given in life, I'd settle for wholesome states of mind. But that's not freedom. It's wholesome states of mind. So he's just saying, keep looking. And that becomes our koan—not to mistake the wholesome states of mind, the peace of the non-reactive mind. Experience that. But a constructed state of citta-viveka, dependent on conditions, is going to also deconstruct when the conditions change.

Sometimes when it's peaceful and quiet, we get kind of clinging to it without realizing, and we think, we impute it to the circumstances. So when there's a noise, we get really upset because it's wrecking my quiet. And the quiet's what's giving me peace, right? Sometimes at the Forest Refuge in Barre, I won't even tell you the meetings we've gone through because there's this noise that happens when someone walks out the door near the meditation hall and bangs it. And then the people in the meditation hall hear that bang and it really upsets their samadhi. We have meetings about stuff like this. I would say that was misplacing what the real point of citta-viveka is. It's not to hold on to the silence. Don't mistake external silence for freedom or even for peace.

So our koan is to use the seclusion of bodies, seclusion from all the sense inputs, seclusion from the hindrances—to use it to keep recognizing that the silence, the space of freedom, is the silence in that moment of the heart and mind that's awake and free from clinging, free from sense of self. Clinging and sense of self pretty much go together. And that's our calling, to keep discovering that. Whenever we start to impute the peace outward, impute the freedom outward—and outward could be out to a very subtle state of mind—just turn around and notice the purity of awareness of the knowing mind itself.

This is the way Buddhadasa talks about it in his book Heartwood of the Bodhi Tree, which is a fascinating, really interesting book. He's talking about sunyata, usually translated as emptiness, but Santikaro translates it as voidness. Really he's just meaning it in two simple ways.

Sunyata in his first meaning simply means that all things and all beings are void or empty—how does he put it?—empty of a particular sense of self, just all conditions. He said that's everything: in the mind, in the heart, a speck of dust, a sparrow flying—empty of sense of self.

Then the second application—and that's one we can really look at in our own experience over and over—sunyata in its second application points to the quality of the mind, of the heart, when it is not grasping and clinging at anything. So we can turn around and notice that quality.

This is what he says: "I encourage you, in any moment that the mind, the heart has any measure of this voidness, this emptiness of clinging to anything—even if it's not absolutely or perfectly empty—keep recognizing it." Actually, on any one day, sunyata is there repeatedly. Sunyata as that quality of the heart and mind that's empty in that moment of clinging, of grasping to anything. Actually, on any one day, sunyata is there repeatedly. Even if it's not an absolute fixed sunyata, it's still very good as long as we take the trouble to notice it. If we take an interest in this sort of voidness, this sunyata, that will make it easy to practice and to sink into it, to attain it more and more.

So he says, generate a contentment with voidness. Generating a contentment with just noticing the quality of heart, of mind, when it's not clinging or grasping at anything. No big lights going off. It's not conditional actually on any kind of seclusion. But in that moment, that's the seclusion from suffering. There's no grasping, there's no clinging, there's no identification. It's just this. That sense that Wendell Berry talks about, of just lying there, the peace of wild things. A moment of wakefulness without any grasping at anything, without any sense of me or mine. Just that.

As Buddhadasa says, we all have many moments of that. Every day, if we would just get interested in noticing.

And then if you cling the next moment, just notice that—how it feels different.

Again from Merton, this second-to-last reflection about the Desert Fathers. He's talking about one who is called to solitude:

"One who is called to solitude is called to emptiness. And in this emptiness, she does not find points upon which to base a contrast between herself and others. On the contrary, she realizes that she has entered into a solitude that is really shared by everyone. And so her solitude is the foundation of a deep, pure, and gentle sympathy with all other humans. More, it is the doorway by which she enters into the mystery of God and brings others into that mystery by the power of her love and her humility."

Just a moment of emptiness.

I'll end with one other quotation that's very similar. Again, it's from another Christian, so it's using Christian terminology—a woman who was an Anglican nun. From this book about hermits: an Anglican nun whose need for solitude took her to an abandoned cabin on a cliff, which she fixed up and lived there for eighteen years. But not quite alone, because people kept coming and bringing their troubles to her. She was always welcoming and willing to meet them because of what she believed. She believed that the responsibility of the solitary is—these are her words—"to stand at the intersection between the love of God and suffering humanity."

The responsibility of the solitary: to stand at the intersection of the love of God and suffering humanity.

That's what we wake to. Seclusion from suffering.

So let's just sit quietly for a minute.

CHAPTER 38

Unity of Emptiness and Compassion

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the essential unity of emptiness and compassion as the two wings of awakening. Drawing from both Theravāda and Tibetan traditions, she explains how the pure heart-mind is empty of inherent self-existence, naturally cognizant, and ceaselessly responsive with compassion. Wilson warns against the danger of conceptualizing emptiness without embodying its natural expression of care—what the Tibetans call bodhicitta, the awakened heart.
>
> Wilson weaves together teachings from Nisargadatta, the Dalai Lama, and Pema Chödrön to show how touching our own suffering opens us to tenderness for all beings. She explains that when the contraction of self-referencing relaxes, the natural response is compassion, mettā, muditā, or equanimity—whatever is appropriate in the moment. Through personal stories, including encounters with a large spider in Thailand and witnessing suffering in a hospital, she demonstrates how shifting from "me" to "our space" transforms our relationship with experience.
> The talk emphasizes that moment-to-moment mindfulness is what allows wisdom to arise, which then naturally gives rise to the three wise intentions of the Eightfold Path: renunciation replacing greed, mettā replacing ill will, and compassion replacing cruelty. Wilson illustrates this integration through inspiring examples from Martin Luther King Jr. and civil rights leader James Lawson, showing how true nonviolence stems from a completely different configuration of power—one that emerges from the inside out through trust in our basic goodness.

Looking out at you, one wouldn't really get it that this is a practice or a path of happiness. A couple of you are smiling. I mean, I don't smile either when I'm sitting, but it just kind of struck me.

Tonight I just want to offer some reflections on the unity of emptiness and compassion. We've been talking about both of these major aspects of the truth, the way things are—especially after Guy's talk a couple of nights ago and the way we've been speaking about awareness, the sense of real emptiness, that all phenomena are empty of inherent self-existence, that in the moment of awareness any object can come and go and it just doesn't matter. That knowing is completely unaffected by whatever is happening.

There are different ways we can take that. On one level, obviously, that can be really freeing, really opening from that constriction of self. But other times that can be heard or felt or experienced, depending on what's going on in the mind, as disconnected, cold, indifferent, really. A kind of gray void. What am I doing this for if nothing's going to matter? Is that what I'm practicing for, so I don't care about anything? In a sociopathic kind of way, it can seem.

What's really important to keep remembering, to keep tuning into, is the way this sense of real freedom, of wisdom, the path of awakening, is spoken of. You know that thing of the bird with two wings—the wing of wisdom, the wing of compassion. Or the way the Tibetans speak about it, which I really like a lot. In knowing the empty nature, really knowing that, it is freeing. But that's only one aspect of the awakened heart and mind. The nature of the pure heart and mind is, yes, empty of any inherent self-existence. They use three ways of describing different angles, you could say.

The second one is the naturally knowing, the spontaneously knowing aspect—which again, when Guy was talking about citta, it's like that. There's a sound, you hear it. That's spontaneous, it happens. It's always awake and always available.

But the third aspect is really key, or we don't in our self experience the totality, the roundedness, the completeness of freedom. And that's that this empty, naturally cognizant knowing is, as the Tibetans say, ceaselessly responsive. The natural response of the awakened heart-mind in any particular situation is that of compassion, or metta, mudita, equanimity. It's responsive. It's not sociopathically, coldly indifferent. And at different times for all of us, in our practice, in our path, we may be more in tune with one than the other.

The emptiness we've talked about—and this is something I ran across from Tsoknyi Rinpoche in his book Natural Great Perfection. I find this a little funny, so don't take it as "oh my God, I'm doing something wrong." But he's talking about understanding shunyata, emptiness. He says the danger for many of us is that we hear too much too soon and we think we have understood shunyata, emptiness, and so we err on the side of the absolute in a nihilistic fashion and are obscured by concepts of emptiness. Has that ever happened to you?

He says Nagarjuna said it is sad to see those who mistakenly believe in the material concrete reality, who don't understand emptiness. But far more pitiful are those who believe in emptiness.

I think that's great. You get that—believe in emptiness. It's another concept that it's so easy to put. "Well, it's all empty, so it doesn't matter." Have you run into that in people? It's often—nobody here, of course, and none of us would ever fall into that because we're so clear—but really often it's like people who've done a little bit of reading and really haven't done much practice at all. "Well, it's all empty, so I can do whatever I want," that kind of thing.

This is again how Rinpoche went on: Those who believe in things can be helped through various kinds of practice, through the way of skillful means. It's our practice. But those who have fallen into the abyss of emptiness find it almost impossible to reemerge, since there seem to be no handholds, no steps, no gradual progression, and nothing to do.

So in some ways it's funny, but just for a moment. Remember, we're not going to fall into the abyss of emptiness and get stuck there. And nobody here is stuck there. But there are moments, you know, when it's so clear there's nothing to do. And that's really a wakeful, present, true moment. And then a moment later or an hour later, it's not like that anymore. It's a concept. We remember, "Oh yeah, there's no one here and nothing to do." But it's not the truth of our alive experience in that moment.

It's a memory. It's a concept. And we've stopped—and we all do this—we've stopped being totally present and fresh in that moment. We're remembering how free it was when there was nothing to do, but really that's not what's happening, and we need to use some skillful means.

So playing with it—see, it's very subtle. At that point, it's subtle.

This is the other way, when the wholeness comes from the compassion side, the sense of the ceaselessly responsive. It's another way of saying it, from Nisargadatta: "Once you can say with confidence, born from direct experience, 'I am the world, the world is myself,' you're free from desire and fear on the one hand and become totally responsible for the world on the other. The senseless sorrow of humankind becomes your sole concern."

It's on the other side. The emptiness is a little bit what Heather was talking about last night. Once you really, just for a moment, see you're everything, in that moment the natural response is compassion, tenderness for beings, connectedness to beings. Exactly because in that moment all the energy, the mental energy, is not bound up in this constant, obsessive, exhausting self-referencing.

So just noticing how much of our energy is in this contraction, this constriction of me, me, me. From that place—and that place is momentary, everything's momentary, remember—we're not always in the contraction of me, me, me. And most of us who are not yet Arhats are not always in the knowing of complete emptiness and natural, spontaneous caring and compassion. We fluctuate.

Emptiness and compassion are indivisible. Emptiness is free from grasping to a self. Compassion is benevolence for all beings. And we can see how those two come together, support each other in big experiences and little experiences here and in our daily life.

So when that contraction, that constriction of me, is basically seen through, released, not happening in a moment, the natural sense is of "I am the world, the world is me"—it's us rather than me.

Instead of everything being the way Tsoknyi Rinpoche described it once—I really like this—he said the original yardstick, the measurement for samsara, that which everything is measured from, is that feeling of "me here now." He said in Tibet, when they're going to start building a house, the way they lay out the footprint of the foundation is to take a point in the middle and get a string for how wide you want it to be. And from that point in the middle, you measure all the way around, sort of like you're making a circle.

So he's saying the measuring point for samsara, from our place of suffering, that center point is—and this isn't a thought so much, but the feeling sense of—"me here now." You know what I mean? When we're just sitting here, we hear a sound, and the felt sense is: What does that mean about me? That sound is disturbing me. How do I feel about that sound? Or not even the thought, but just the felt sense of me, sound over there, measured from this felt sense.

Of course it's not always present, that felt sense, but much of the time it is. And that's the measuring point of samsara. When that's there, then that self-referencing, that constriction—everything becomes about me and what does it mean about me, me and others. When it's not there, what's naturally expressed is this tenderness for life, this lack of self-centric view. And then the natural response of the mind, the heart, is just whatever is appropriate in the moment. It's more inclusive, more kind.

A simple little example that I just remembered today. A long time ago, I was staying in Thailand, in a little kuti, a little hut in a meditation center. In this kuti, it was my first few weeks there. I hadn't really adjusted to the climate, the bugs, everything. And after a couple of days, I saw a spider. I mean, a really big spider. The body—never mind the legs—was bigger than my fist. We're talking a big spider. And running around up there... I mean, I'm not phobic about spiders, but I don't love them. And this was big. And I didn't have a mosquito net.

So first, this spider—you've got to get it out of my space. You know, all the normal stuff you'd think.

And then at one point, it just clicked in my mind: actually, the spider was here first, and I'm in the spider's space. And then it shifted further to our space. Just for that moment, there was simply the release of "it's all about me." What's the spider? Oh, it's our space.

Nothing really changed externally, but the whole relationship internally transforms. You can still respond, do whatever needs doing. I eventually did take that spider in a bag and carry it out very kindly. Sorry, I'm taking over your space now. Sorry, I'm bigger than you, and I'm taking it away. But at least I wasn't doing it with hatred in my heart. You can still do whatever. And until I could catch it, I wasn't afraid and hating it.

A little thing. But you get a sense of how just that shift from self-referencing to "oh, just things happening"—this, this, this, not all about me—how the natural response to that emptiness is ceaselessly responsive kindness and compassion.

The good news, really good news, is that in terms of this natural response—ceaselessly responsive compassion, mettā, equanimity, clear seeing—these arise naturally when there's wisdom in the mind, in the heart. And as we've been hammering on the whole time, hopefully, the simple moment of mindful presence with something, aware of what's happening without buying into greed or hatred or delusion, just seeing what Heather was talking about last night, just recognizing experience as it is without a big agenda, without reactivity, without distortions in perception—that moment-to-moment mindfulness is what allows wisdom to arise.

And then quite naturally, like with me and the spider, you don't have to think, "Oh, I should be compassionate. How can I get..." It naturally happens. And our habits really begin to shift naturally through the sati, the mindfulness. That's what we've been talking about.

The Buddha talked about three wise intentions in terms of the Eightfold Path, which begins with right view, as somebody was discussing the other night. The second factor—I spoke about intentions, remember—concerns what's in the mind, in the heart, what qualities, what mental factors give rise to action. That's the seed of karma, wholesomeness or unwholesomeness.

The Buddha is rather specific in terms of the second step of the Eightfold Path, which is variously translated as right thought or right intention. He's very specific that the three right intentions arising through clear seeing represent a switch from wrong intention: greed turns to renunciation, to letting go, to openness. That can then further move to generosity, to dāna. Ill will is replaced by friendliness, by mettā. And cruelty is replaced with compassion. Clear seeing isn't listed as a wise intention because that's the wisdom which actually allows these other right intentions to arise.

So they happen organically with wisdom. But also, we don't have to just sit back and hope and pray. We are cultivating with mindfulness, and we can also consciously tune into when our response of mind and heart arises from separation, from fear, from me-ing, and recognize when it can actually begin to shift.

The Buddha has one of my favorite lines: whatever one frequently thinks about and dwells upon, that will become the inclination of the mind. Interesting. A little scary some days when we see what the mind is thinking and dwelling upon. But also recognizing why each moment of pure present moment attention is so powerful—because in those moments, we're not dwelling in the old habits of me-ing, of fear, of aversion, of greed. Even if aversion is the object of the mindfulness, in that moment of mindfulness, you're not dwelling on the aversion. And this is really very powerful.

So mindfulness is not so self-referential, and that's already naturally cultivating moments of emptiness of self. If it's real clear seeing, real wisdom, it will have that juice. It may not be compassion; it may be equanimity, because it depends on the situation. But it won't be that cold, distant, "it doesn't matter" disconnect. It won't be that. When we're in that disconnection, it's like a partial understanding of emptiness, but it's not whole. It's not complete. Something's missing. So just keep looking. Look again.

I want to talk now about other ways we can consciously tune into and cultivate these beautiful aspects, particularly compassion and mettā. The brahmavihāras offer one approach. I know compassion is described as that quivering of the heart, the natural response of an awakened heart and mind when it comes into connection with suffering—one's own or others', ultimately no different. And the ultimate expression, the—

The total awakened expression of compassion, in the way the Tibetan tradition speaks of it, is bodhicitta—meaning basically awakened heart, awakened mind.

I want to read the way Pema Chödrön describes it, which is quite down to earth:

"This kinship with the suffering of others, this inability to continue to regard it from afar, from a distance—this is the discovery of our soft spot, the discovery of bodhicitta. Bodhicitta is a Sanskrit word that means noble or awakened heart, said to be present in all beings." Yes, even us. "Just as butter is inherent in milk, this soft spot is inherent in you and me. We awaken this bodhicitta, this tenderness for life, when we can no longer shield ourselves from the vulnerability of our condition, from the basic fragility of existence."

In the words of the 16th Karmapa, "You take it all in. You let the pain of the world touch your heart and it turns into compassion."

This is really our practice. It's somewhat what Heather was talking about last night—how that willingness to be with whatever opens into wisdom. This is the other side of that: willingness to be with whatever, the beauties and the sorrows, the fragility, the basic, inherent, inescapable fragility of our bodies, of our hearts, of all of life, of everything.

It doesn't have to be scary, but it's so tender. It's so inescapable. And when we touch it, just let it touch our hearts in one moment, the natural response is this compassion, this tenderness for beings.

Pema Chödrön again: "It's said that in difficult times, it is only bodhicitta that heals. When inspiration has become hidden, when we feel ready to give up, this is the time when healing can be found in the tenderness of pain itself. In the midst of loneliness, in the midst of fear, in the middle of feeling misunderstood and rejected is the heartbeat of all things, the genuine heart of bodhicitta."

So the suffering of beings—it may be so-called other beings—also the suffering of this being is quite adequate to discover, connect with, and trust both emptiness and the tender heart of bodhicitta.

This is from His Holiness the Dalai Lama, who, as Guy said, is meant to be the incarnation of the Bodhisattva of compassion, so we figure he knows what he's talking about.

The other way bodhicitta is spoken about is that through this heart of compassion, it becomes a possible motivation—the highest motivation, really—for our continued and sincere practice: that we practice with the intention to benefit all beings. Through touching this fragility, this tenderness, this compassion for all beings, it transforms into this deep wish to awaken from the confusion that keeps us circling in samsara, and not just for ourselves but for everybody who's stuck in some sorrow. So that's the other way of thinking of bodhicitta.

His Holiness says: How does it develop? The first is with deep insight into what suffering is. Deep insight. And where do we get that? It arises by focusing on our own experience. Where else will we learn? And that's enough.

Then, as we open to our own suffering, compassion strengthens into a sense of empathy and connectedness with other beings. Interestingly enough, opening into our own suffering is a path into empathy and connectedness with others.

Many times I've experienced this—where my own particular suffering in a particular time, when it's finally really met and accepted (and we definitely go through a lot of layers before it's finally really met and accepted), it moves through from my own particular story into the suffering of beings. And sometimes that's really very touching and amazing, how that happens. I can't make it happen. I can remember times it's happened. I can try and kid myself it's happening now. But when it really happens, you really feel it.

The example that always comes to mind was many years ago. I was in the hospital for a week or so, pretty sick. I was lying there in a room with three other women. At one point, it just kind of hit me. I looked around—three elderly women. I was in the orthopedic ward, that was just where they'd had a bed. They were in all kinds of casts and in a lot of pain. And then, just from being with my own pain, I looked and thought, "Oh yes, I'm not here alone."

And then it just naturally—I wasn't thinking this—it spread out to: how many people are in this hospital? How many hospitals just in this little area of Massachusetts where I was? Not even a big city—five or six hospitals. And then it just kept going, trying to imagine how many people in how many hospitals in the world. And that's only the people lucky enough to be in hospitals. It's just vast and endless.

This is where we need the two sides. Without the understanding of emptiness, we drown in that suffering. But with the willingness to just open into "oh, it's like this," it moves from the self-centeredness into the vastness, the tenderness for beings. That's why the difficult times in retreat, the difficult times in life—really what Heather was speaking of last night—are so important.

And even though we say this over and over, and even though in the interviews we say it, and I say it to myself when I'm in a difficult time, somewhere in there it's so hard to trust when we're in the difficult time. "Yeah, yeah, I'm trying to be mindful. I'm trying to have compassion." We give lip service. We try to believe it's really important. But bottom line? We know we have to get through this time to get to the real stuff—the joy, the spaciousness, the emptiness, the jhāna, whatever the heck it is. It's really rare that we say, "Well, I know this place, this difficult place of being lost in this obsessive fear, this obsessive anger, this obsessive self-referencing, whatever the story is—guilt, whatever it is—this is the place of juice. This is where emptiness and compassion are going to manifest." Yeah, right.

So learning to trust it. And the difficult times are also important because what's arising—whether it's so-called external or internal—once it's arisen, it's the result of past karma. Our obsessive patterns, for example, are the result of all the habits of our mind. We think about something—God knows how many times. You know how fast the mind is. Think of your age and how many times you've had that thought about how bad you are, how you're no good. How many times? We think we have a couple of thoughts —"may I be free from suffering"—and it's going to go away.

So that thought coming up, very familiar, that's the result of our past karma, of our past intentions. How the mind and awareness is meeting it right now in this moment—that's the present moment karma. That's the present moment intention. And so how we meet each moment of experience, that's the path. How we meet our suffering experience and our beautiful experience, that's the manifestation. If we meet it with simple acceptance, with kindness, that's the manifestation of compassion.

It doesn't have to be that tenderness where your heart's like bursting out of your chest like they have in cartoons, and you're weeping. Sometimes it's like that. Mostly not, which is good, because how could we get through life if every time we touch suffering, we're weeping? "Oh, it's so beautiful." That's lovely once in a while. But something comes up, that sense of "you are so stupid," and the mind goes, "Oh, that's judging." Just like that. Just a little moment of accepting and judging. That's painful. That's compassion. And it's also possible because of the emptiness, the non-self clinging, not building a whole story around it. Both of those are happening then. That really is the path.

Sharon Salzberg likes to say, "To pay attention is to love." And notice, if you're really giving attention—start with someone else, because that's easier than oneself. Just really there. Someone's describing their troubles, their problems, and it's someone you care about, and you're able to just really be there, really open, really listening. In those moments, we're not self-referencing.

There's no room for that. With total attention, we're not even thinking of it. The self-referencing is simply gone. There's openness. You're just really paying attention. That's a quality of compassion, of love, of pure presence. That's what we're practicing. That's what we're cultivating. It's really very powerful.

Taking this back to yourself then, first consider how—if it's ever happened—you feel when you're really suffering and there's someone there who can just truly be there for you. They may or may not be able to do anything. And sometimes that impulse of "let me fix it, let me fix it" isn't actually the same thing as being there and really holding in their heart, in their mind, your suffering as you simply talk about it. That sense of someone just bearing witness, of someone just being able to totally be present for you—before there's something to do, or maybe there isn't something to do. That comes later. But first, just that total accepting, receiving presence. There's something powerful about it, isn't there?

So can we turn around and offer that to ourselves? In our moments of huge suffering, in our moments of little niggly discomfort—your toe hurts—it doesn't really matter. The power of bearing witness is huge in this world.

I want to read a little snippet of a poem from Anna Akhmatova. I really like her a lot. She was one of the most famous Russian poets of the 20th century, and her life spanned really the whole period of twentieth-century Russia—from before the revolution, which was sort of aristocratic, through the revolution and the civil war and vast periods of starvation, into the whole terrors of the Stalin period. She was part of all of that, watching people—other poets—starve, her husband and son both being arrested in different purges, herself almost starving, and through the Second World War when many people were starving in St. Petersburg and in Moscow. For most of that time she wasn't allowed to be published. But even before she was banned, she was very famous. Russians just really love their poets, and she was beloved. And so by dint of living through all that, that's what she wrote about. That was one of the reasons, I think, she was so cherished.

This little snippet of a poem is from Requiem, 1935 to 1940. She's talking about the terrible years of the Yezhov Terror—a period in the mid-30s. Yezhov was one of the people who worked with Stalin; at this time he was head of the secret police. It was one of the periods of huge, huge arrests. Anyone you knew could be arrested for anything, people sent off to the labor camps. Her son at this point had been arrested.

Requiem, instead of a preface:

> In the terrible years of the Yezhov terror, I spent seventeen months waiting in line outside the prison in Leningrad.

People would wait every day to get news of their loved ones or to try and bring food.

> One day, somebody in the crowd identified me, called me by name. Standing behind me was a woman with lips blue from the cold who had, of course, never heard me called by name before.

Remember, she was famous.

> Now she started out of the torpor common to us all and asked me in a whisper—everyone whispered there—"Can you describe this?" And I said, "I can." Then something like a smile passed fleetingly over what had once been her face.

It just so speaks to me of the power—the ability, the willingness—to really be in it and openheartedly bear witness without shutting down, without blame. It connects us. It's really powerful in this world.

And it's not possible without also some understanding of emptiness. Otherwise we drown. Otherwise we go under. This is the other side. Emptiness needs compassion. Compassion needs emptiness.

Again from the Dalai Lama: "Compassion must be derived from our insight into emptiness of inherent self."

This is where the vast meets the profound. The vast needs the profound.

Without the unity of compassion and emptiness, we can fall into despair. And this may sound difficult to hear, but knowing the emptiness—knowing that people's suffering is avoidable, that it is surmountable—our sympathy for our inability to extricate ourselves leads to a more powerful compassion. But without the emptiness, though our compassion may be strong, it is likely to have a quality of hopelessness or even despair.

In my own experience, it can go back and forth between the two poles. There's the emptiness that isn't quite in touch, that feels really free, but there's a little disconnect. And it can flip to the other pole, where there's that sense of real tenderness in the vastness of suffering, but it's not quite balanced in that moment by the emptiness. And we fall into despair, helplessness, hopelessness.

Big picture, it's okay. We're balancing, we're balancing. Small picture, we notice when we're in despair, when it's helplessness, hopelessness. I've noticed in myself how easily that helplessness can switch to anger.

Working with people who have a strong commitment—say, working to save the environment, or in peace marches, or just trying to help someone you really care about—you see that they're suffering, and maybe something in their environment or situation isn't fair. It seems like, why did they have to go through that and not other people? Sometimes we can touch the pain, and sometimes there's nothing we can do.

I have friends who go to a lot of peace marches over the years, and they often say it starts out really upbeat, but sometimes people end up really angry or embittered. Or people working in the environmental movement feel, "I have to really use anger in the courtroom." Lawyers saying, "How can I come into the courtroom without anger? The other people are so angry and harsh. I need my anger." And it can feel justified.

I know in myself this helpless feeling. I have friends in difficult situations, and there really is nothing I can do other than really be there, really hear, really stay open. And then when that moves into helplessness or heads towards despair, I've noticed how a feeling of anger at anything can give me a sense of power, a sense of strength.

Helplessness—I know for myself, and really from talking to many people—it's different for everyone, but for many people, helplessness is one of the bottom-line feelings we really don't like. It's one of the ones that many people have developed really strong defense mechanisms against. So I can see for myself when it's moving into helplessness, I start saying, "Well, it shouldn't be like this." And it's energizing. The anger feels powerful. And it seems like it's getting something done. "You just wallow around in this wimpy helplessness, feeling compassion. What good is that?"

So really looking at this balance—anger may get stuff done. But the real heart of freedom, of real compassion and emptiness, starts from the inside out, not from the outside in. Again, it comes back to that sense of intention we talked about the other night. In our culture, we tend to evaluate ourselves and our actions by the results. If we get good results, it was a good action. We did the right thing. We forget to turn around and see: if we're just getting more and more angry, we got the results we wanted, but we really upset a lot of people and ran over them. And that's not the point.

A peace march where people end up smashing windows and burning cars—there's something missing. There's some missing piece there. Environmental activists, deeply, deeply committed, acting for the good of the planet, and they're getting eaten up by anger—again, there's something missing in the piece of understanding. The same is true for us.

We all have, in our own way, strong defense mechanisms that have been in place for each of us around particular feelings—maybe helplessness for somebody, or a real sense of loneliness, or deep fear, or maybe deep pain from childhood. So far, everyone I've met, including myself, has some really strong defense mechanisms in place that keep our conscious mind from even touching certain aspects of pain.

I'd say for most of us, when these defenses were first created way back in childhood, there was good reason for them. I can see some of my own patterns around feeling real terror, feeling afraid and unloved and abandoned—but I couldn't go there because my mother didn't know, and I had to take care of her. As little kids, these things came up to help us deal, to help us manage, to help us keep going. So we don't hate the defense mechanisms.

But at this point, it's a different story. We learn to recognize them. For me, I remember I talked the other night about when my mind hits that crazy place. I just call it that because it feels so intense. And now I think, great, I'm getting close to one of those. That's great. Because I know, as I said, when I can feel, oh, that's that little kid terror—it's like a sense of relief. Oh, okay. I can feel little kid terror. That's okay. I'm not going to die from it. In fact, boom, back into the tenderness. Tenderness for beings, tenderness for that little kid, tenderness for all little kids, just essential tenderness, only possible because of the sense of emptiness.

Eckhart Tolle put it a nice way. He says, "Compassion arises by allowing, by non-resistance to both levels of pain." We don't resist the so-called outer pain, the madness of the world, and we don't resist the so-called inner pain, our personal reactions. Both levels. When there's non-resistance, but with wise attention, with mindfulness, with clear seeing, that's when we're really open into wisdom and compassion.

And as the Dalai Lama said, our own suffering, our own experience—that's the conduit, that's the way in, that's really all we need, our own particular experience. Gandhi said, "Almost everything you do will seem insignificant, but it is very important that you do it." So in terms of this, just whatever's arising in our experience, it may seem insignificant, but we start where we are.

And this is really where the shift happens. We want, I'm assuming, to be good people, kind people, compassionate people. I'm assuming that's probably something, in one way or another, we all share. Kind to ourselves, kind to others, as well as free—they go together. But again, the sense of working from the inside out, rather than from the outside in—"I should be kind and compassionate, it looks like this"—and then we try to make our behavior match. We know that doesn't work.

Starting from the inside out is where there's the wise motivation that comes from moments of really knowing our basic goodness. Those times when you've really recognized and touched just the simplicity, the purity of heart and mind, which we talk about a lot. No big deal, but just, oh, it's like this. The moments Heather talked about when we just stop fighting whatever's going on and open to it—the ten thousand joys, the ten thousand sorrows. Oh. It's like this. Those moments of touching with the mind, with the heart, are what begin to give us and strengthen the deep trust so that the real heart of compassion and emptiness comes from the inside out, not from the outside in. And trusting enough to act from that.

Different people inspire me in that. I just want to give a couple of well-known examples. One, of course, is Martin Luther King. There's one quotation I read from him—remember in, I think it was 1954, when there was a bombing of a church in Alabama and four little girls were killed. He said after that, "I have come to see even more, as we move on toward the goal of justice, that hatred must never be our motive. I refuse to become bitter." Really touching the heart of deep, deep suffering in a place where I know I would get angry, and justified in the anger, and overwhelmed—and he says, "I refuse to become bitter."

Another person, and this is a little longer, but I love it—this man is kind of one of my heroes, although I've never met him. I've only heard him and read about him. James Lawson. Again, it's from the Civil Rights Movement. I heard him give an interview on NPR around Christmas a couple of years ago. I didn't hear the beginning of the interview. I just came in in the middle, and this man was talking, and then I suddenly recognized from what he was saying who it was—that it was James Lawson. I got really excited.

He was one of the real leaders of the beginning civil rights movement. He's a doctor of divinity and one of the leading theorists even now on nonviolence, on the theory of nonviolence. Back in the fifties, he was very committed—he's African-American, from Ohio—he was very committed to theories of nonviolence. He actually went to India and studied with disciples of Gandhi. Gandhi was dead by then.

During the Korean War, he was a conscientious objector. He could have gotten out of going because of being a minister, but he said that wouldn't be fair, so he went to jail. And he said—this I heard in the interview—that in jail, he discovered a strength and power in himself to live out of his own conscience, to act from his own really deep wisdom and understanding. This is the power of coming from within.

So the interviewer was asking him all these questions: How do you deal with violence? What do you do when someone's being violent? And he just said—and I can't explain it more than this—it just kind of turns it on its head. He said, "You're asking the questions from the wrong angle. Nonviolence stems from a completely different configuration of power." So all the questions about people being violent and what you do about it—he's saying it's a whole other way of looking at the world.

I'll just leave it at that and read this story about him from David Halberstam's book, The Children, which is about some of the young people in Nashville in 1960 who started all the demonstrations, the sit-ins and everything. At that time, he had come down to Nashville and was giving the young college student demonstrators workshops on nonviolent action. Remember, they were deeply committed to Christian love and nonviolence. That's where this was coming out of. That's where he was coming from.

So they were marching in Nashville, and as they were marching, a few white toughs suddenly attacked and knocked down a man named Solomon at the end of the line. They were kicking him, and another young man, Bernard Lafayette—this was his first chance to really use his training in nonviolence—came over and threw his body over his friend to draw the attention of the guys beating him up. And so then they started beating and kicking him.

And then Jim Lawson came over. He'd been conducting all these workshops. He did not rush over as to an accident, or even as if to stop a beating. Instead, he walked over very calmly, as if to a long-standing appointment. His arrival shifted the attention of the whites from the fallen Bernard Lafayette to Lawson. The thing about Jim, Bernard remembered, was that he was so self-assured, so confident, as if he were accustomed to dealing with white toughs beating up fallen black demonstrators every day of his life. The leader of the whites was wearing what was the prevailing uniform of the day for toughs—a black leather motorcycle jacket and that big kind of haircut, what they called a DA haircut. When he saw Lawson, he was enraged by his coolness, and he spat at him. Lawson looked at him and asked him for a handkerchief. The man, stunned, reached in his pocket and handed Lawson a handkerchief. And Lawson wiped the spit off himself as calmly as he could. Then he looked at the man's jacket and started talking to him. Did he have a motorcycle or a hot rod car? A motorcycle was the answer. Jim asked a technical question or two, and the young man started explaining what he had done to customize his bike. Amazingly, Bernard thought, these two men were now talking about the levels of horsepower in motorcycles. A few seconds earlier, they had seemed to be sworn enemies. By this time, both Solomon and Bernard were on their feet, the line was moving again, and Jim and the young man were still talking about the man's motorcycle. In that brief, frightening moment, Jim had managed to find a subject which they both shared and had used it in a way that made each of them more human in the eyes of the other. As they walked away, Jim waved to the man, and the man remained still, neither accepting the friendship nor, for that matter, rejecting it. It had been a marvelous example of Christian love for Bernard.

It doesn't solve everything. It doesn't solve all the problems. But that to me is such an inspiring example of how compassion and wisdom work from the inside out. A real courage, and it's powerful.

The other aspect I want to mention again—of how this courage, this compassion, needs to be balanced by wisdom—is the wisdom of equanimity. Because remember, in equanimity we recognize we can't control the outcome. We can't control the results. So when Jim Lawson went and talked to that guy, he didn't know what was going to happen. When we open to our own suffering and to others', we don't know what's going to happen. Life is ambiguous. Situations are complex.

Without the vastness of equanimity, the power of equanimity—and this is the emptiness of knowing that all things come and go, that awareness is unstained by all—we wouldn't have the courage and the trust to come from compassion, from love, from equanimity, from mudita, and to let it go into the universe. We can't control. So in equanimity, we can't control others' responses. We don't always have the big picture. And yet we still need to make decisions.

You know, the eight worldly winds come and go. If you've ever had to be the health proxy for someone—like I had for my father the last couple of years of his life, my siblings and I—you understand this deeply. No matter how much documentation is drawn up ahead of time, you can't cover what all the situations are going to be. And you're in the situation: Do you put this tube in or don't you? Do you take this tube out or don't you? You don't know what's going to happen. You don't know what the person would want.

You need to come from as much equanimity and compassion as possible—the equanimity of not knowing, but also the equanimity of recognizing it's not about my fear, my dislike, my feelings. You try and do the best you can.

I remember one time my father had a tube in. He kept getting pneumonia, and the doctor said, well, he hadn't wanted anything special done, so we're going to take it out. We're sure he's going to die. So I was there, and I said, okay, do it. Of course he didn't die. He didn't at all. He got really strong. He kept doing that. The doctors would be completely amazed—how could he come back from this? So then another time they say, well, you shouldn't put in a tube because he's going to die, and it'll just make him linger. But you put in the tube and he gets better. You don't know. You just don't know. And every situation is different. So one does the best one can, with compassion, not holding to a desired result.

All life is like that. It's so complex, so ambiguous.

Sister Chan Khong, who works with Thich Nhat Hanh—I use this story a lot, but it's really touched me. Long ago, during the Vietnam War, she was an activist, as was Thich Nhat Hanh. Neither side, the South or the North Vietnamese, trusted him. So one time she was thrown into jail by the South Vietnamese for having distributed some peace pamphlets of Thich Nhat Hanh. She was in a big cell—this is from her autobiography—with quite a few other women, maybe fifteen or twenty. And there were also two young girls, eleven or twelve years old, who had just been in a village that the South Vietnamese had swept through, taking everyone there, thinking they were Viet Cong.

Sister Chan Khong got released through her family knowing somebody. That's how things work. And as she was leaving and having her outtake interview with the head of the prison, she said, "Oh, by the way, there are these two young girls here. They haven't done anything. They're not Viet Cong. They're in this terrible environment with all these criminals. They really should be released."

He said, "Oh, okay. I see from what you're saying that the prisoners are talking to each other, and this is not acceptable, so I'm going to really tighten up the conditions here."

So how would you feel? Could you walk out from that and not turn bitter? Not get angry? Not be afraid to keep on acting as best you could from the best understanding you have? It's a koan. It's a koan.

The same is true with ourselves. We meet ourselves with real compassion—our suffering, with compassion. And we try to act not just to make ourselves feel better, but to discover what is most supportive for our awakening. Sometimes we think we're really seeing everything, but there are subtle levels of fear, aversion, clinging we don't see. We're acting as best we can, but it doesn't quite work—we're still somehow feeding our denial system. That's the best we can do.

What do we do then? Say, "Well, I couldn't see clearly, I couldn't do it right, so to hell with it—I'm just not going to try anymore"? Other times we do see clearly. We simply need this trust, this willingness to keep going.

The Dalai Lama, in an interview once, was confronted by young Tibetans taking him to task—the new generation saying, "Look, basically, old man, your nonviolent approach to the Chinese is not working. They're taking over. It's not working. Something else needs to happen." As new generations always do.

In this article, it said that he was really listening, as he does, and there were even tears in his eyes. He said, "You may be right, but I cannot do otherwise. I cannot be otherwise than to act from nonviolence and compassion. That's just the truth of who I am. And you may be right."

That ambiguity. That not having the whole picture. Not getting the results. Not fixing the world. The Buddha couldn't fix the world. He couldn't even fix his own kinspeople—they kept going to war with each other over water and this and that. What do we think we're going to do?

But he also didn't say, "I can't fix the world, so I'm going to go into my pleasant abiding here and now, fourth jhana, see you later in forty-five years." He could have done that too. No, he spent his whole life walking around, sharing the Dhamma. And that's all you can do—share it. Share it with yourself, share it with the world. Meet every moment with this compassionate, clear seeing. That's all we can do.

It's not being a doormat. It's not being passive at all. When we're clearly connected with what's here and now, again, ceaselessly responsive with wisdom, the best appropriate action just presents itself.

Master Sheng Yen, a wonderful Taiwanese Chan master, says, talking about no-self: "One clearly knows how to behave or respond." As another teacher calls it, it's doing the obvious. Something happens—face it, accept it, handle it, put it down. I just love that. Any situation comes up: face it, accept it, handle it, put it down. So simple. So straightforward. No big, fancy, amazing thing.

I'll end with a quotation from Pema Chödrön about bodhicitta: "At the relative level, our noble heart is felt as kinship with all beings. At the absolute level, we experience it as groundlessness, our open space."

And this, from Chökyi Nyima:

When watching the magical display of this world as it seems to be, spontaneously an overwhelming despair and pity well up in me. But when watching its nature of innate simplicity as it really is, I cannot help but feel wonder and break out in laughter. When watching, the one who feels pity and the one who is laughing both disappear and cannot be found. Now what to do?

Thank you.

CHAPTER 39

Mingling Our Minds With The Dhamma

Carol Wilson · 1h03

> Drawing from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche's teaching on mingling our minds with the Dhamma until it permeates our whole being, Carol Wilson offers a profound exploration of how Buddhist practice moves from intellectual understanding to lived wisdom. She examines the three levels of paññā (wisdom): sutamayāpaññā (wisdom from hearing), cintāmayāpaññā (wisdom from reflection), and bhāvanāmayāpaññā (wisdom from direct cultivation through meditation).
>
> The talk illuminates how sammā diṭṭhi (right view) naturally leads to sammā saṅkappa (right intention), which then shapes our speech, action, and way of being in the world. Wilson shares personal examples demonstrating how our larger sense of purpose and aspiration can transform even difficult mind states like self-judgment, shifting our relationship to experience from aversion to wise investigation.
> Particularly valuable is her discussion of kalyāṇamittatā (spiritual friendship) and how wholesomeness is contagious—we both receive inspiration from others and offer it through who we are. She encourages practitioners to trust that wisdom does its own work when we simply pay attention, while also recognizing our responsibility to let our understanding shine forth. The teaching concludes with a contemplation from the Tibetan tradition on perceiving all phenomena as manifestations of Chenrezig's compassion and emptiness.

There's a line from Dogen Khentse Rinpoche that I really like, and it's sort of the theme I want to talk about tonight. He speaks about the importance of mingling our mind with the Dharma until it permeates our whole being.

He says that the Buddha's teachings are inconceivably extensive and profound, and to achieve an exhaustive intellectual understanding of them would be a rare and remarkable achievement. But that's not enough by itself. Until we also achieve inner realization by actually applying the teachings and mingling them with our minds, whatever knowledge we may gain remains theoretical. Leaving the doctor's prescription by the bedside will not cure the illness. So turn your mind inward and ponder deeply the meaning of the Dharma until it permeates your whole being.

I just love that—ponder the Dharma, practice the Dharma, explore the Dharma until it permeates our whole being. That's really what this path is about, in retreat and out of retreat, no different. When we talk about mingling our mind with the Dharma, in essence one way of looking at it is the Eightfold Path—different aspects of how we live our life. All of our activities, everything we do, from the smallest thing to the biggest thing, can become part of helping us mingle our minds with the Dharma. Nothing left out.

When we talk about the Eightfold Path, as you know, it's really more like a circle than a path. It begins with right view, wise understanding, and of course keeps on increasing, keeps on strengthening. So what do we mean by right view, right understanding, the beginning of the path?

The first aspect is just what Dogen Khentse is saying—the theoretical level. Learning, where we hear something, read something, learn something. That's what gets us to even think there might be another way in this life, or piques our interest, gets us to do a little bit of meditation or begin to look at our mind or even think there's another way to live. So theoretical information is very important. It actually has a word in Pali: sutamayā paññā. There are three levels of wisdom, and sutamayā paññā—suta really means what is heard, the teachings. We hear it theoretically. It begins to turn our mind in the direction of Dharma, of wisdom.

The second level is called cintāmayā paññā—the way we think about things. We've taken in, for example, impermanence. Just hearing "all things are impermanent, they arise"—that's theoretical knowledge. With cintāmayā paññā, using our mind, our reflections, our contemplation, we think about it. We can really come to some deep recognition: "Oh yes, that really seems true." We can look, we can see, we can contemplate it. We're actually using the thinking mind in our meditation, in our life, in a supportive way. Thinking is one of the six senses. We don't hate it. Let's learn to use it. This is a deeper level of knowledge. We hear it, we contemplate it, we explore it with the mind, but it still isn't really deeply yet right view, right understanding.

The depth of it is the third level, which in Pali is bhāvanāmayā paññā—mental cultivation, or what I would simply call insight. That moment when we really understand in a different way. Insight is basically a shift of perception. I love the translation "right view" because I feel like it's actually literal—we're viewing an experience more accurately than we were before.

Take anicca, which is a good example. We hear it, it makes sense. We think about it: yes, I know that. We would all probably say, "Yeah, I really know things are impermanent." But if there's really right view, deep understanding, it automatically leads to the second step of the path, which is intention, wise intention—what leads to the next steps of speech and action.

If we really understood, not just in contemplation but through insight, that everything is impermanent, that impacts our intentions of mind, how we speak, how we act. Sometimes that's how we find out whether our understanding was actually theoretical or coming from really seeing clearly—when we move into the next step of the path of intention and then into speech and action.

Because we can talk up the wazoo. "I really know everything's impermanent." And if you're sitting there having a difficult experience in meditation or in life, saying, "I know this is impermanent, I know it's impermanent"—if we really know it's impermanent, we don't get filled with aversion. We don't get filled with fear. We don't start running around like a chicken with its head cut off trying to do everything to get rid of this experience, because we know it's impermanent.

So when there's really insight, it's like just that shift of perception where we see something that's already here in a different way. The difference between knowing things are impermanent and actually experiencing a moment or period of time—and it can be in meditation or out of meditation, like someone was mentioning today—just really seeing moods, emotions, patterns coming and going, coming and going, coming and going. To the extent that there's nothing to think about, it's just so clear. That's how it is. It's the actual perception. It's not of thought anymore. That's right view in that moment. And that can happen with many, many different things. I'm just using impermanence for an example.

When it's right view in that moment, the intentions that arise, the thoughts, the intentions, the thoughts leading to speech and action—they aren't going to be that of fear or clinging. In those moments of real, accurate perception, insight, deep wisdom, for that moment of right view of impermanence, clinging to stuff doesn't arise. We don't have to talk ourselves out of it. It doesn't arise because it doesn't make any sense. Something is coming. We know—we don't have to think about it—we know it's going. Clinging to it is just laughable. Okay, next day, next hour, that's just a fond memory. And it informs our mind stream. It informs our understanding. But in the moment of the clear insight, in that moment, it's as if really quite deeply our minds are mingled with the Dharma.

That understanding is what leads to intention, is how we think about things, how we relate to experience, which leads to how we speak, how we act, the decisions that we make. It's just quite obvious. And in that sense—this is how I'm interpreting what Ajahn Chah says—in that moment, the mind, the heart, the perception, the right view, the intentions, the speech, the action, it's all mingled with the Dharma, with the truth, using Dharma in the terms of just the truth of how things are. There's no tension in that way. There's no friction. It's just, "Oh, that's how it is."

And we've all—yes, even you—we've all had many moments of that. And then later, as I said, it's a fond memory. Maybe it gets less and less fond as we struggle and struggle to have that experience again. That's why it's a path. That's why a few moments of really mingling gives us a taste. It informs our understanding. That's the beginning, the continuing of the path of right view. But that's why it is an ongoing path.

We use all aspects of our life to work with intention, how we speak, how we act, how we are in this world. It leads to our willingness to use the last stages of the path—of energy, of mindfulness, of collectedness of attention—to pay attention to the other aspects. The whole path becomes more alive, a template through which we can use that template of the path to put on the actions of our life, to help us see when our understanding, our intentions, our actions, our speech are mingling with the Dharma, when they're not. And to help us, because assuming this is something that's a deep motivation for us, to help us further align.

So as we were saying this morning, kamma just means action. And as the Buddha said, the seed, the heart of action is in the intention. So how we understand, how we perceive—that leads to how we think, the intentions in our mind—that leads to how we speak and act.

Remember when Sally was talking about the vipallāsas, the distortions of perception? Again, it's the same thing, back with right view, the beginning and the place we keep coming to in deeper and deeper spirals of mingling our hearts, our minds with the Dharma, with the truth.

So how we perceive something: We perceive permanence, really, a distortion of perception. We perceive impermanence. We perceive something as being me or mine. We perceive, "Oh, just arising and passing, no me or mine." That perception, accurate or inaccurate, distorted or accurate, then leads to how we think about the thing. How we think about it hardens into a view, what we believe. And this actually is on the level of the deep Dharma understandings, the views that we don't often even realize we have—the view that things are permanent, the view that I'm my body, or these emotions are me, or just that I am somehow separate. We don't go around with little neon signs in our mind going, "I am now holding this view that this experience is permanent."

I mean, if we did, it would be helpful. We'd know why we were suffering. But we don't really. We don't just sit there as things are arising and suddenly notice, "Oh, view coming up! I am a separate, eternal self—coming up. This emotion belongs to me." We don't get that. We don't realize we're holding the view. But the view is just a hardening of the perception, the thought, and that's what leads to intention or action.

So you see how it all can go through misperception or through perception. But it all is very logical. And we can see how it affects, how it colors our decisions, our actions in the world—really who we are, how we show up. So how does our right view show up in the world, or our wrong view? How does our mingling with the Dhamma show up—by how we speak, by how we act, but even more just by who we are, who we are as we go through life. You don't have to be Gandhi or someone and do incredible, amazing things. It's just seeing who we are, coming to understand how we perceive and understand, how that colors the intentions, and how this level of intention is really a place that we can include in our mindfulness and awareness practice—not just on retreat, but also in our life.

The subtle moment-to-moment intentions, like before I lift my hand—it's a little easier to see those in the silence of retreat. But the second step of the path, which is variously translated as wise intention or wise attitude or wise aspiration, can also be looked at in a broader application. This is where we've been getting caught up sometimes in the wording, where we sometimes talk about intention, sometimes talk about motivation, sometimes talk about aspiration.

Intention, cetanā, could just be that momentary impulse—the "about to" that comes before every movement, before every speech. Aspiration or a sense of motivation could be something larger. In the commentaries under sampajañña, clear comprehension, this is discussed. Mindfulness and clear comprehension are often talked about together. Mindfulness is the knowing in the moment what something is. Clear comprehension is the broader context—clearly knowing what you're doing and the context you're doing it in.

This is helpful. Someone was saying you can get really mindful and very concentrated, so focused on what you're doing that you're completely oblivious to everything around you. Has anybody noticed that?

I'll tell you—this is embarrassing. It was a long time ago, so I can say it. I was practicing at IMS many, many years ago. I was walking through this coatroom where you put your coats, and then you walk down a few stairs into an upper walking room, and through that room into the meditation hall. I was walking very slowly and mindfully, noting "lifting, moving, placing"—incredibly focused on the sensations. So incredibly focused that I just fell down the stairs without even noticing they were there. That was embarrassing. You think, "Hmm, there's something missing." I was mindful, and yet there's something missing. So that's the clear comprehension piece, right? One aspect of it.

In terms of working with intention, it's the aspiration or larger orientation. Remember, when I talked the other night about cultivating or getting in touch with our intention for practice, or the intention of bodhicitta, for example—that's vast. It's not that that's present every moment, but it serves as a wider aspiration that we can attune to in moments. I'll talk more about that in a minute. But just to see how we understand the situation, how we understand ourselves in the world, and what we see—whether it's conscious or unconscious—what we're holding as our larger purpose, our larger aspiration, is really going to affect the decisions we make, the actions we take.

There was an experiment that was talked about in the book The Tipping Point, which is really interesting. It has all kinds of little different examples of how we affect one another, how motivation and understanding affect things. This experiment—I don't have all the details—they called it the Good Samaritan Experiment. It was with some seminarians, men and women who were training to be ministers of some sort. I'm assuming, because they're seminarians, that they went there on purpose, and that they must be relatively good people with some sense of wanting to serve.

In this experiment, they divided the seminarians in half. One half had to go from one place to another on the campus, and they were given this very urgent mission—I don't remember what it was, but very urgent. It was really impressed on them how important it was. They had to get to this other place really quickly in order to carry out this very important mission, which seemed like a good thing to do. The others didn't have that extra purpose, but they were also told to go in a hurry to that same place.

But the real experiment was that on the way—which is why it was called the Good Samaritan Experiment—on the way there was someone they'd planted who was really in need of assistance. Not dying-level need, but really in strong need of assistance—distraught and asking for help.

And by far the ones who had been given this very urgent mission didn't stop to help, because they had this other more important urgent thing to do. Whereas the ones who didn't have that bigger goal did stop to help.

So it's just interesting to see how our mind makes priorities and makes choices based on our understanding—consciously or not—of what's really important to us, of what's really important in life. We see how our view affects our intentions, and our intentions affect our decisions about how to act, how to speak.

With right view, paññā, wisdom, accurate seeing, our intentions—both larger and smaller—naturally transform. It just happens by itself. But also, what I think I've noticed in myself is that as our smaller intentions transform, our larger purpose and aspiration hopefully begins to change as well. We may or may not consciously access that, and I'll talk a little about actually doing that, because I find it so supportive and consciously helpful in how we meet our life and how we live our life.

Do we live our life in a way that deepens our mingling our minds with the Dhamma? Or do we just kind of respond haphazardly or by habit to circumstances? Sometimes we do both. But it's possible to tune in much more consciously, with much more caring and intentionality, to what really is true for you as a larger aspiration, as a more compelling motivation. What is your view? What do you really believe is important in life, from your understanding?

Can we consciously—now, later, tomorrow, through the days—take some time to really allow that to bubble up in your heart, in your mind? Don't just start with the first superficial thought that comes up. It may not be the best thought. Sometimes that's true, but sometimes it's like, "Oh, well, I just want to do the best I can, you know, being a loser that I am." But sometimes something much more profound and touching can arise, and it can come up by surprise. It can come, and you think, "No, I don't think so. No way that's possible for me." Don't listen to the habitual disclaimers or the habitual "no." You can feel it—it feels different.

If you just give some space, you maybe already know what it is for you. And it can be changing all the time too. But giving some space to consciously allow that to come from the unconscious into consciousness—it comes again as an understanding, as a view that we can consciously turn to, call in, to work on the level of intention in our life, helping us make choices in our speech, in our action, in our intentions, in what we choose to give importance to, to pay attention to. Because that's really where the rubber meets the road. That's, as I said before, where we find out what we really understand—by how we relate to our own mind and heart, by how we relate to situations in the world, by how we relate to others. This isn't a judgment. If you're looking at this through judgment, that isn't so helpful.

You can see how this step of the Eightfold Path is a kind of template, a list, about how the Dharma, how reality, how our understanding does begin and continue to permeate our heart, our mind, our whole being. How this mingling the mind with the Dhamma, the understanding, moves from concept, idea, information, to a perception, a clear understanding, a view that's based more in reality. And how that view then becomes strong enough to inform our intentions and our actions.

That also leads us to be more inclined towards the mental cultivation, the other aspects of the path—to give more appreciation and value to the energy, the effort it takes just to pay attention to ourselves. It doesn't take growing effort, but it takes some willingness, some interest to show up, to pay attention to what's going on in our mind and heart. The mindfulness, the concentration—by concentration, I just mean the collectedness, the balance, the stability.

And it keeps feeding back, because as our understanding deepens and our intentions begin to purify and we see the effect this can have on how we show up in life and who we are, this in turn strengthens our understanding and our faith. And it just keeps spiraling, cycling deeper and deeper and deeper.

You start to see—I know you've already seen—how our habits of intention, which can show up just as a thought, can show up as how we think about ourselves, how we react internally to experience. You see how they begin to change. How, for instance, the self-judgment or the self-hating or the putting oneself down or the greed isn't always the intention of choice anymore. Sometimes the wisdom comes in and you consciously see, "Oh, I need to—no, I don't," and it's a little bit of consciously doing it. Other times you don't even need to consciously refer to your greater aspiration because—oh, it just doesn't arise.

I'll give you a little example. I noticed today how the shift of intention based on understanding really can change the whole inner climate. This is like a meditation experience because it's so small, but it makes a big difference in life.

I was noticing in my mind—I think it was in the sitting this morning—some familiar negative pattern was coming up, probably self-judgment. That's the most familiar pattern. Recognized, felt, all those things. "Oh yeah, it's not good, don't want it," all that stuff. But there was a tinge of aversion, which I didn't see at first, because the view that it was being met with wasn't really clear. The view was, "This is bad and it shouldn't be here and I don't like it"—basically, not good. And so that was aversion.

So I was sitting there, and then suddenly it just clicked in my mind—it came in, this had all happened by itself—that my aspiration was more in the moment, and through the day, to be able to really be here with people in an open and compassionate way. That just came in. And so in that moment, there wasn't aversion or clinging or greed. And also there was clear seeing. And in that moment, I said, "Oh, so this self-judgment—it's not like it's bad." I could feel how that's in the way of compassionate, open presence.

And that didn't make me hate it. Oh, that's the aspiration—to be open, compassionate, and present. Oh, I see how self-judging really is a blocking of that. Isn't that interesting? Let me pay more attention to the self-judging.

It completely shifted my attitude to it. Not that it has to go away or anything, but more wisdom was there, intelligence that wants to understand how these things work. Oh, self-judgment. I feel it as an obstacle because my motivation is understanding and compassion. It's not like getting out the baseball bat and getting rid of it because it's in the way. Do you get a sense of what I mean?

The motivation is working kind of behind things. The thought could be the same: This isn't a helpful feeling to be having. But the motivation—one was from delusion: I don't like it, it's no good, it's got to go away. The other is from wisdom and compassion based in my larger aspiration. It's a little thing, but it felt like a big thing to me. It's just an example of how that can work for anything in our life.

Our habits really begin to switch. As we begin to understand this, both on the cushion and off the cushion, we can put more energy, work more actively, take more care with this second step of the path—this area of wise intention. Not from a should. Not from judgment at all, but again from getting in touch with your greater sense of purpose.

As they say, it's part of the clear comprehension that's talked about in the commentaries—clear comprehension of your greater sense of purpose, your aspiration. It's sort of not a goal exactly, but what colors our path, what's our beacon, what's our guidepost in times when we do need to make decisions. What's important, what's not important, what choices do I want to make?

So, as I said, if you don't already have a sense of it, or if you haven't really connected with it for a while, I would suggest at some point to take some time and just make it an open, felt question in your heart: What is really, truly—not what should be most important, not what sounds good or bad or whatever—but just really, what is most important in my life? Because that will become a beacon, a guidepost, a support in times of choice. Not to make yourself crazy—should I have chocolate ice cream or vanilla ice cream? Or should I have ice cream at all? No, I shouldn't, because my... you know. But there are times, and you know when they are, if you open up, that we really can tune into this.

It's said in the commentaries that having a sense of your greater sense of purpose collects our dispersed energy. And it's really true. When we have a sense of what's really important, it's like a way of helping us align our actions and our decisions with that instead of just randomly responding.

When Sally last night talked about Greg Mortenson building schools in Pakistan, he's a great example. His story is a great example of how a sense of purpose really gives us incredible strength. It's sort of the same way concentration collects all the dispersed mental energy and focuses it on something. Again, it needs to be wise concentration—not incredible striving. But in this same way, our greater sense of purpose does help us make decisions.

For all of us, we all have that. We wouldn't be here through a whole month retreat. How many moments have you thought, What am I doing here? I wish I could be anywhere—home, somewhere else—but not here in this mind, listening to this crap. I want to be out of here. Is there anyone who hasn't had any moment like that this whole retreat? So there's some greater sense of purpose. Maybe it's just shame, you know—so that might be it. It's helpful to know. Don't kid ourselves. Sometimes public group shame is all that keeps us in a sitting or keeps us at a retreat. Hopefully we transcend that and come to appreciate that it was all for a greater purpose.

But really, I'm kind of joking, kind of not. Hopefully that's not the only reason you're here. You didn't come here out of shame, hopefully. So you see what I mean—the sense of purpose.

If this is the first time for you, perhaps you never thought you could seriously do this for a month. Remember when you went to your first retreat? You thought, who could do this for two days, or ten days? And now maybe you're thinking—some of you are here for two months. Some of you have already done lots of long retreats. And the rest of you who are leaving, I know, are saying, "Oh, I so wish I had another month here. Let me sign up for next year."

But that sense of greater purpose—you see what I mean? We call on that all the time. And sometimes that's all we can call on. We don't have the clear seeing that this really difficult thing is impermanent. I know it, I can sink into it. Sometimes we can't access that. But sometimes we can access just this sense of purpose. I don't feel like I'm doing the meditation. I don't feel like I'm getting anywhere. But somehow I know and trust this is really what's important to me—whether it's understanding, or developing compassion, or whatever it is for you. And there's some trust that this is helpful, so you keep doing it.

We all have this really strongly, and we can call on it even more. It's like that guy Greg Mortensen—he had incredible resolution, incredible resolve. We all have the power, as Sally talked about, differing strengths at different times. But calling on this sense of purpose is something I have found so helpful. Sometimes I forget about it, and then it will come up when I'm thinking, "Well, should I do this? I don't want to go teach that retreat. I just want to take a vacation." Sometimes you need a vacation. Sometimes a vacation is what's going to help you balance and relax in order to keep on serving. It's not a sense of what's right or wrong in that moment—it's the big picture.

I remember when I first thought of this, and then I forgot about it. And somewhere later, out of nowhere, came up this idea: I just want to love and serve the Dharma. And I thought, who, me? I don't think so. That immediate dismissal. But it kind of came up from somewhere else. You know how that is. These insights, these deep intuitions, they come up and you really can't ignore them without trying awfully hard.

So I advise you: don't ignore it. Don't buy into all the stupid habitual stuff your mind says. Let yourself resonate with it. Let yourself feel whatever it is—it doesn't have to be any particular thing. Let it give you strength. Let it give you courage. Let it give you inspiration to really do things we never thought we could do, and to go in a direction where we never really know what's going to happen.

For me, if I thought ten years ago what I'd be doing now, or twenty years ago, or when I made different choices—did I know where they were going to end up? No way. No clue. In fact, that's one of my favorite things I say to myself all the time: I don't have a clue. It's really helpful. I just have no clue. You let go of trying to have a clue. And then you just make the best decision you can based on the clearest intention, based on the real wisdom that you can access—the wisdom of heart, the kindness of mind. We don't know where it's going to go. So we just do the clearest intention we can. Align with your reference point, your deep motivation.

In terms of living our life from this place, aligning over and over with what's really our deepest purpose, trying as well as we can to remember to access our purest understanding, our kindest and most accurate intentions—this mingling of our mind and heart with the Dharma is, minimally, a lifelong task. That's the least it is. If we have any sense of belief that perhaps it goes more than one life, well, this mingling of our hearts and minds with the Dharma, with the truth, just seems endless and opening. But not endless in a depressive way.

Because it's endless anyway. So it might as well be endless and opening to the truth rather than endless in the ping-pong back and forth of greed, hatred, and delusion—liking, disliking, going this way because I want it, going that way because I don't want it. What kind of life is that? That's what we call samsara. Ping-pong, ping-pong, over and over, endless. It feels like that sometimes, doesn't it?

But when it's really this opening to the depth—how deep can compassion get? How wide can wisdom get? How vast is impermanence? How big is emptiness? It's endless. There's always more to see. How subtle is the mind? What's the nature of consciousness? You think you're going to answer that with one talk? I don't think so.

It's opening into endless questions. And that's exciting. If you don't have a clue and you don't need a clue, it's really exciting. Maybe that's my purpose now, just not to need a clue. I know that might not sound too inspiring. But the sense of the vastness, the subtlety, the beauty—that there's always deeper to go in mingling our hearts and minds with the truth—that's lovely.

So you don't have to feel like, "Well, this is my goal, my deep intention, and I haven't done it yet. I'm already seventy-two years old. I've already sat three three-month retreats. What's the problem?" When we just throw that out the window, it's like—just right now. What's in the mind and heart? What intentions are arising? Why am I saying and doing what I'm saying and doing?

Now, that's not a judging question. It's really interested. "Oh, how does self-judging work in the mind right now?" It's interested. It just wants to see and know.

That kind of interest has so much trust—trust that wisdom will do the work itself. We don't have to figure it out. Just get interested. Meet what's happening and trust that right view arises because it's simply the way things are. You don't have to make it be that way. It already is. When our tightness and holding and views are not so in the way, the way things are reveals itself.

Naturally, the intention purifies. Naturally, our speech and action starts to reflect that. Who we are in the world starts to reflect that. We can't stop that. But we can trust it, that wisdom really does that work.

This is where we use, though, the energy, the mindfulness, the samādhi, the collectedness—to keep noticing, to keep paying attention. So we have some choice there, some energy, some effort, but just to pay attention. And really trusting that wisdom opens by itself. And the manifestation, as we've talked about, of compassion or of equanimity or of muditā or of mettā—that shows up by itself as well.

There's one other aspect I want to explore tonight in terms of this path we're on, this mingling of our hearts and minds with the truth. It's the clear comprehension of purpose within the Eightfold Path, but also the recognition that while we can totally trust this process, it is also difficult. It's hard.

As the Buddha said, practicing the Dhamma is like swimming upstream against the main current of the culture. It was the same back then as it is now. We'll have our perceptions, we'll really have some wise understanding, some wise views, some purified intentions. We act from kindness, from understanding, but it's not always met. The rest of the culture doesn't necessarily stand up and cheer and say, "Yes, I'm so glad that you're here. You're renouncing that greed. Yes, I'm so glad that you've stopped acting in that way." It doesn't necessarily happen.

So what's really helpful is what the Buddha called kalyāṇamitta, or spiritual friend—really realizing that we don't have to do this path alone. We aren't on it alone. Here we are all together, and there are many other beings—and I'm not even talking about Buddha Dhamma here—but there are many beings here and in the world who are committed to understanding, to compassion, to honesty, to generosity, to all the aspects of how we are in the world, including wisdom.

We need to tune into how much we affect each other, in both wholesomeness and unwholesomeness. Basically, who we are and who other people are is contagious in a way. We catch things from each other.

Part of being on this path is tuning into both truly wise, awakened beings and the aspects in each of us that offer inspiration. One of the reasons we tell stories about different people that inspire us—people who have done wonderful things or come to awakening—is because when I read about or think about any of these people, like the story I told about James Lawson the other night, it brings up such a deep sense of love, courage, inspiration, a kind of pīti, a kind of joy. That's really important.

You see, someone can only inspire us because it awakens those qualities in ourselves. So touching into inspiration is really important, but then we mustn't leave it as all being about the other person while we feel so unworthy. It can only be inspiring because those qualities are touched and awakened within ourselves.

This is why we talk about all these people—look for that in life, whether it's teachers, reading, listening to Dhamma talks, gathering with other people, articles in newspapers. I love reading about anyone like that.

But it works the other way too. This is why it's like swimming upstream. The power of the media is appalling to me—the power of affecting the mind. I remember so long ago when Iran went through their revolution and they held the American embassy people hostage for four hundred and something days. During part of that time, I was somewhere watching the news on TV every night, which I often didn't do.

The TV news in this country—and this is a personal judgment—really amps things up. It's sensationalist, playing on emotions with those little sound bites. It doesn't have much subtlety. By the end of two or three weeks of that, listening to the news every night, I was becoming terror-filled. I was convinced World War III was about to start. It was affecting my mind states and my judgments and how I thought and felt about things.

When I stopped watching the news, that level of fear and intensity also diminished. I could still read the paper, stay in touch with the news, but without that amount of bombardment. I saw then, and I see now, how much what we hear and see can affect us if we're not aware, if we're not mindful—how it shapes what we think, our mind, our heart.

Both wholesome and unwholesome influences work this way. I remember reading about a big nightclub fire in Rhode Island a few years ago. A lot of people died in it.

I read sometime later that a survivor said at first everyone was filing out quickly but orderly. And then this person said a couple of people really panicked, and their fear and their panic was so immediately contagious that everyone panicked. The reason people died is because they panicked—they were trampled, people couldn't get out the doors. How contagious that fear is, that panic.

Just seeing that, but then seeing that who we are in a wholesome sense, in a beautiful sense, is equally contagious.

In terms of kalyānamitta, in terms of inspiration, we both need to tune in to receive this inspiration from others, but also to recognize that who we are and how we live our lives, how we live our understanding—you're kalyānamitta. Often you're the one inspiring others, and you may not even know it, but it's just as contagious. And it doesn't have to be, as I said, you don't have to be Gandhi out there doing big things. Just in the middle of a conversation.

I remember a few years ago having a conversation with a very wise friend, but for whatever reason, she was in a mood and was just really sniping and putting down a mutual friend. And I just happened to have a moment of clarity—I don't claim I always do in conversations. It's so easy, isn't it, to fall into that? And then you feel kind of dirty and kind of bad later. But for some reason she was doing it, and suddenly I realized. And my moment of clarity was not to say, "What are you doing? Don't you know better?" That's not really so helpful. But I just slipped in something really positive about this person in a nice way. That's all I had to do, because she was a very wise friend. As soon as I did that, it stopped the whole flow. She completely stopped and turned around, and we went into a more wholesome and kind way of speaking.

It doesn't take much. It just takes clarity—understanding what we're doing, what's being fed in my mind and heart, what's being starved—and just to offer, just to be that wholesomeness, that goodness, that kindness. Not with any result needed, but just being that. You being the kalyānamitta, the spiritual friend to others at that point.

And I really feel like we can't wait till we're arahants, or we're St. Francis, or we're Gandhi, or Dr. Martin Luther King. We're going to do lots of stupid stuff—maybe you aren't, but I find I do lots of stupid stuff, lots of stuff from ignorance, from not such helpful motivation. But more and more and more, you're going to do a lot of kind, loving, wise intention, a lot of generosity, a lot of wholesomeness. Shine that out.

I really feel like it's our duty. Buddhadāsa used to say, "Dhamma is duty. Duty is Dhamma." I feel it's our Dhamma duty not to shrink away and say, "Well, I'm not good enough yet to say anything or do anything." I don't mean you have to stand up and proclaim the Dhamma in Hyde Park on a box. I mean just honoring your deepest motivation, tuning into it, and being who you are. Let your light shine, really seeing how contagious it is.

Sally was talking about the pāramīs last night, and really seeing how contagious those are. Generosity, for example—I really learned that from the times I go to Burma, which has been about once a year these last few years. Sure, there's plenty of really horrific stuff that goes on there in Burma, no question. But there's some way that mettā and generosity, in a very natural way, is a part of many of the people in the culture. Along with other stuff—I'm not trying to say it's all magic—but there's some way it's there. And it slips up on you. I know it's not just me. In the beginning, you don't notice it. "Oh, isn't that person nice? Isn't that person nice?" And after a while—"Isn't that taxi driver nice? Isn't that lady in the store? They're so generous."

A friend just told me they came back from a couple of weeks, their first time in Burma, saying, "My heart's so full." This is what you come back with—your heart's so full. You can't pinpoint what it was. It's not like one amazing person, but generosity of spirit, generosity with things, generosity of kindness, just being so happy to see you. And whoever, if you go to see a friend and you bring along someone they've never met —

They're always welcome. There's never this kind of inclusion-exclusion dynamic. I've never run into it. And whenever I come back, no matter what's been going on, I'm happier. I'm happy from that generosity. And that happiness spills out of me and touches other people. Whenever I talk like this, I can see in the room people who've experienced something similar because their faces light up. That's the contagion. And it doesn't have to be Burma—I'm just using that as an example.

Someone told me the other day about how something one of us said reminded them of a really generous act they had done, and it brought so much joy. Don't sit on that. I don't mean you go around saying, "I'm the generous person of the ages, appreciate me." I don't mean that. But as Sally said, feel the joy and let it shine out. Because when you're generous and you're doing it from happiness, that's contagious and it spreads.

Another friend of mine came back from Burma and said, "I was just so filled. I wanted to spread it to the people I met. I wanted to keep that cycle going." Not in a conscious way, but it just spills over. It's a beautiful thing. I find that immediacy not so accessible in our culture, although we're all really generous. But there's some way we don't let the contagion of it out, or we don't appreciate it. So I just hope you can let that in and let that out—not just generosity, but mettā, compassion, sīla, non-harming conduct.

The Buddha often talked about the power of good friends, the power of our companions, how much it's catching. A friend of mine was sitting for several months, and she told me she'd noticed when she came back from that long retreat that when she was with people who were relatively pure—people who had pretty good sīla, pretty wholesome actions, who didn't engage in a lot of negative behavior—she felt it drew that out of herself. She felt more inclined toward that kind of purity of behavior, that appreciation, that subtlety, that honesty.

But when she hung out with people whose behavior was a little more muddled or a little less honest, or just a little more distracted—not evil or bad, but just choosing things that lead to confusion and distraction—she would find that it colored her consciousness, and she would more easily get drawn into confusion and distraction herself.

This isn't a judgment; it's just noticing how we affect and are affected by each other. Sometimes we're the muddled one, and we can look for friends who inspire us and can pull us in their wake a little bit, reminding us, "Oh yes, that's important to me." Other times we're going to be the clearer one, the loving one, the honest one. And not with self-righteousness, but just as a modeling, as a sharing, as a gift to your friends and the world.

"I don't think I want to do that right now." You don't even say it, but in your heart: "I just don't want to engage in putting this person down right now." Or someone says, "Let's go out drinking," and you think, "No, maybe let's not go out drinking." Not saying, "You're so bad," but just, "No, let's not do that. Let's do this other thing instead."

There's a way that who you are—coming from your right view, from your understanding—begins to color your choices and actions. And that feeds back into purifying your heart and mind more and more. We begin to appreciate the wholesome more and more over the years of our path. Until we had moments of experiencing clarity, we didn't even know how murky it feels when our mind is clouded with wanting or aversion or confusion or doubt.

When we have those moments where that's not there—no fancy or great things going on, because then we get into wanting again—many people have said that just moments of quiet, of purity, nothing special happening, calm or not, and the heart just feels like it's getting cleaned a little bit. I get that feeling sometimes, like you've got Windex and it's just getting clearer and clearer, getting washed out in a nice way. And it's like, "That's nice." We incline toward it a little more. We didn't even know before that this was possible.

And that just naturally happens—our heart and mind mingling more deeply with the Dhamma just by itself. Because wholesomeness, compassion, wisdom, beauty—they naturally call us, they naturally inspire us.

Wisdom calls itself. Beauty calls itself. Compassion calls itself. And again, we can really trust that if we're willing to let it in. Just who we are is enough.

I heard an interview with Desmond Tutu—the archbishop in South Africa who was part of the whole reconciliation process after apartheid ended. He had been giving a talk in Boston, and I heard this little snippet where he was talking to some students from a really rough area, high school age or a little older, young men from neighborhoods with a lot of crime, a lot of guns and weapons, a lot of drugs.

He was telling them, "We're not born hating. We learn to hate." He was saying that really, goodness, love, wisdom—that's our truer nature. We learn to hate.

And one of the students said, "How can you tell us, in the midst of a culture of violence, where we grow up with violence, we need to protect ourselves—how can we learn to love?"

And he said this with so much force and emphasis. I could just imagine him really talking right to these young men. He said, with such emphasis: "You—you can make a difference. You, just like you are. One person can make a big difference. Start with you, right now."

It's powerful. Saying "not me, I'm not good enough"—that's delusional. That delusion that I'm not good enough is the delusion of the small, separate self. You can make a difference when you shine forth, when you let the truth shine forth in whatever way it manifests in your mind, in your body, in your personality. Just let it manifest. You can't make it manifest, but we can allow it to when it comes up. Don't shut it down with our little thoughts of "not me, I'm not good enough, blah, blah, blah." Let it come out, because it's nothing to do with you, really. We're only getting in the way. Me, me, me—getting in the way.

I want to end with something that has been a little practice inspiring to me, again from Dilgo Khyentse, talking about—I'm just giving you a taste of it, because it's a whole huge Tibetan practice that I haven't done and don't have the right to be teaching at all. So I'm just giving you a snippet that's been inspiring to me.

He talks about Chenrezig, the bodhisattva of compassion, who simply manifests and embodies the great compassion of the Buddha, inseparable from vast wisdom. And he talks about empowerment where, in his words: "Through the blessing of Chenrezig's body, you perceive the whole universe as Chenrezig. You perceive all matter as Chenrezig's Buddhafield. Through the blessing of Chenrezig's speech, you perceive all the sounds in the universe—the sounds of water, fire, wind, the cries of animals, human voices. Any sound is the reverberation of Chenrezig's own voice, the voice of compassion. Through the blessing of Chenrezig's mind, you experience all thoughts as a display of awareness, as Chenrezig's own mind. Through these blessings of Chenrezig's body, speech, and mind together, you realize that in reality, body, speech, and mind are not three separate entities, but are Chenrezig's one nature—voidness and compassion, inseparable."

Play with that. Imagine every thought is just the manifestation of Chenrezig's mind. Every thought, every sound, every sight is just Chenrezig speaking or manifesting in form or making sound. It's a lot harder to get upset at things. I was playing with this on a self-retreat once and it was really interesting. Just all thoughts, all experiences, the manifestation of Chenrezig—compassion and emptiness—all here teaching me in a way. It really changes something. The union of compassion and emptiness.

As Dilgo Khyentse says: "What you might formerly have perceived as evil and obstructive forces, you then see as manifestations of the bodhisattva of compassion, through which you strengthen loving-kindness and compassion. In this way, suffering fades away, and the negative forces, obstacles, and difficulties actually serve you to make progress on your path."

Let's end with this from Nisargadatta: "Once you can say with confidence, born from direct experience, 'I am the world, the world is myself,' you are free from desire and fear on the one hand and become totally responsible for the world on the other. The senseless sorrow of humankind becomes your sole concern."

And from Rumi: "On a day when the wind is perfect, the sail just needs to open and the world is full of beauty. Today is such a day."

CHAPTER 40

Perception & Awareness

Carol Wilson · 59 min

> In this profound retreat talk, Carol Wilson investigates how trusting in awareness leads to freedom from confusion. She begins by examining perception (saññā) as the Buddha described it—the moment of recognition that arises with each sense contact—and how what we perceive shapes our thoughts, which then solidify into views and opinions we mistake for reality.
>
> Wilson illustrates how quickly papañca (mental proliferation) can overwhelm us, using vivid examples including a meditator who discovered the annoying footsteps she heard were actually her own breathing against a creaky wall. She explores how mental states like aversion or desire color our perceptions without our knowledge, and how attachment to views—even those we don't recognize we hold—creates suffering in ourselves and the world.
> The teaching addresses the three perversions of perception identified by the Buddha: perceiving permanence in what is impermanent, happiness in what is unreliable, and a lasting self where none exists. Wilson emphasizes that insight (vipassanā) is not about creating new experiences but about allowing perception to shift through steady, non-judgmental awareness. Drawing on teachers including Ajahn Chah, Sayadaw U Paṇḍita, and Ajahn Sumedho, she offers the reassurance that awareness can receive anything—we need not fear any experience. The talk concludes with the understanding that when the mind is not colored by greed, hatred, or confusion, wise and compassionate responses naturally emerge.

We've been talking often about trusting in mindfulness, trusting in awareness. Jack mentioned it this morning. And how is this going to help? Not that I can answer this all in one talk, but how is trusting in mindfulness, how is moment-to-moment mindfulness going to help us unravel this whole confusing mass of concept that we find ourselves in, maybe without even knowing it? Where do we think we need to go? That's the question. How is moment-to-moment mindfulness going to free our heart and mind from confusion?

Often people might think—I often used to think and still do sometimes, maybe without even realizing it—having the expectation that awakening, insight (this is insight meditation after all) is going to take me to some new world or create some new and better self. Not just personality, like someone said the other night; I also always thought I'll get a better personality. It doesn't work that way. But we expect some new experience or something different, something definitely ecstatic or pretty significant and far out.

Actually, insight and awakening work in quite a different way. I don't want to say mundane, but on a much more simple and direct level. I want to talk about that very simple moment-to-moment level of experience where awareness can come in and actually shift our relationship to life because it shifts our understanding. That's what insight is.

This basic moment-to-moment level of experience where I want to start is perception, which was brought up a little bit this morning in the questions and answers. It's really interesting—insight isn't about something new being created. It's simply a shift of perception and the resultant understanding of our experience. When we perceive inaccurately, all the stories we make up are inaccurate. Well, that's basically our position. And so insight begins on the level of perceiving our moment-to-moment experience accurately.

I want to talk a little bit about perception, which is really fun to explore. In terms of the way the Buddha described our moment-to-moment experience, perception is a mental experience that he says is arising in every moment whenever there's sense door contact. The senses are seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, physical sensation of the body, and the sixth sense is the mind—thinking, emotions, mental states. Basically, the way he describes experience is that these six sense experiences are happening over and over and over.

You might have noticed in your meditation: you're seeing, hearing, thinking, seeing, hearing, feeling, thinking. What's the point of this? When is something new going to happen? Seeing, hearing, thinking. We don't notice that something new is happening every instant, but it's just within that range of seeing, hearing, thinking, feeling.

Perception is this: when there's sense contact—an eye that works, a visual form, consciousness—those three come together; that's contact. If we're not conscious, we're not going to see. We're asleep. So they come together, that's contact. And then the very normal, natural thing that arises in contact is this quality that the Buddha called perception—that recognition. It's what Meredith asked about this morning: there's a sound, we hear it, and automatically the mind just kind of knows it's a bird call or the bell. It may say the word, it may not, but the perception is simply that quality of recognition. That's based in our previous experience and in the habits of mind.

A sound arises—a bell. We know it's a bell. What we perceive, we think about. And this is where it gets both interesting and wild. What we perceive, we think about. And through those thoughts, if we're not aware that these are just thoughts, we're constructing our world.

For example, when you heard the bell a little while ago, first, in some way, through perception you knew it was the bell. You knew whatever time it was—7:20 or whenever—it's time to go to the talk. Implicit in all of that is the construction of the world: that you're here, you're being a yogi, you're on a Vipassana retreat, we're at Yucca Valley, it's evening, you're coming to a talk. A whole bunch of stuff, just coming from that perception of bell—it constructs our world.

And that's useful. Nothing wrong with that. This is what we call conventional reality, and conventional reality is extremely useful. If that sound went off and every single time, if you didn't have memory, if you didn't have perception—what is that? It's not even memory; you don't even know it's a bell. Bell, but what does it mean?

What do I have to do? If we had to go through that process every time, it would be unbearable. So perception is useful.

But we're so used to it, and it happens so fast, that without really cultivating moment-to-moment awareness—without getting interested in how the mind works—we don't really recognize all that's happening, do we? We just kind of come and sit down, plunk down and wait for the talk, which is fine. I'm glad I'm talking and you're listening. That helps; it places us in a context.

But a couple of things arise here. Sometimes we perceive what's happening, and the thoughts that come—we take those thoughts to be the actual, accurate, total reality, which may or may not be the case.

So you're sitting here, you're feeling the breath, and you're accurately perceiving pressure, tightness, a little difficulty taking a deep breath. It's an accurate perception. And the thoughts that come from it are: the breath should be deep and relaxed; it's not; it's tight; it's unpleasant. Maybe you don't notice the unpleasant part. Then comes: there's something wrong with me; I'm stressed; I'm too type A; I can't do this right; I'm hiding; I'm suppressing some emotion; there's something wrong with me. No, never had that experience.

And maybe we might recognize frustration, but not actually realize that all of those thoughts and descriptions—guess what—they may not be true. It's just a slight possibility that those aren't the accurate descriptions.

The Buddha said what we perceive, we think about. What we think about, we then complicate with associations and memories and likes and dislikes. And that happens in the blink of an eye, right? We don't realize that's happening, and we take it all to be an accurate description.

So just in this simple breath example, the power of awareness lies in simply receiving the experience. Tightness is like this. That's it. Just awareness that is not making pre-assumptions. You might notice it's unpleasant. You might notice a thought arises: I can't do this right. But awareness receives that thought.

Without moment-to-moment awareness of the thinking, the mood, the sense experience of the tightness, we might notice the tightness and then all the—papañca is the word the Buddha used for these thoughts and assumptions, these notions that we add on to every sense experience. He says they then assail and overwhelm a person.

So we start from some simple sense door experience: tightness, unpleasant. A few thoughts arise—it's tight, I'm too stressed, I can't do this right, what to do, how can I fix it, I shouldn't be—boom, we're assailed, we're completely overwhelmed in that amount of time. This goes on more than once or twice a day. And not just here, not just here.

But the power of mindfulness lies in the willingness to simply meet what's happening. Oh, tightness. Not liking it. That's what's happening. It doesn't have to go anywhere else.

So that's one big complication that can come from perception when we don't see how fast the whole thing is moving. But even more—or in addition, or along with the whole package—perception itself, the recognition itself, sometimes it's not so accurate. Have you ever noticed that? That moment of perceiving—you know, there's a sound, there's the contact, there's the consciousness, the knowing of sound.

But why do we keep talking about noticing the attitude in the mind that's being aware? Because in that moment of perception, the perception can really be colored, affected by the qualities that are in the mind at that moment.

So for example—and I know at least one or two people have had this experience since they've been here—you start to notice that maybe not everybody here, but a whole lot of people coming through your line of vision, there's something wrong with them. They just bug you. They're walking funny. They're eating funny. You don't like their clothes. They're too close. They're too far. They're too good yogis. They're too bad yogis. And this can go on for a while. And suddenly—oh, maybe there's aversion in the consciousness. And when that aversion is there unseen, it just colors our perception. When we don't recognize that, we take the perception to be accurate.

Or if you're really falling in love with someone—or as we call it here on retreat, we won't dignify it by "falling in love." On retreat, you develop being drawn to somebody who you know nothing about, so they're a great field for projection. And through that desire, they look beautiful. They look fascinating. Even their shoes, even their shirts are so interesting. The Tibetans have a saying that desire puts feathers on the object, kind of paints it up. Then at the end of the retreat, you talk to that person and you go, "What was that all about?" It's gone. And you just see a lot more accurately.

So there can be, and there often is—this is why we're so much pointing to what's in the mind—this misperception based on the qualities that are in the mind stream at that moment. And then that misperception leads to the same thoughts and assumptions, and the whole show is created, but it's not even accurate to begin with.

A friend of mine told me this great story. I've used it a lot, but it's so perfect. She was many years ago in Switzerland—a Swiss woman. She's on a meditation retreat like this in Switzerland, I think with Ajahn Sumedho. And at that time, they would rent facilities like this. In Switzerland, they have these big old camp houses that kids go to for summer camp. So they're really big with a lot of rooms, but they're just wood, no insulation, very kind of old and creaky. So they were having this retreat in a house like that, the kind where the walls creak with the wind and the floor creaks when you walk on it.

She said the room they were using for the meditation hall was on the second floor, and immediately beneath it was the room they were using for the walking hall. So of course, in the walking, it made quite a racket with everyone walking back and forth. But this being Switzerland, when it was sitting time, you sat. When it was walking time, you walked. And people just do that.

So she was sitting in the sitting time, being with the breath—in, out, in, out—being with the breath, getting really concentrated, having a really good sitting. And then she started to hear this creaking. Somebody walking downstairs. And it was really ruining her concentration. I'm sure you can relate. So she'd be sitting—creak, creak—instead of just bringing mindful awareness with sati-paññā, mindfulness-wisdom, to the sound of hearing, which could be no problem.

It was annoying her, the sense of, "This is the sitting time. What's that person doing walking? They know you can hear every single creak up here." In, out, in, out—creak, creak, creak. And she was really getting worked up, going into a whole spin about how she had to go down and tell the person. They needed to start announcing the whole thing. We've got to regulate this better.

And then she said, "Okay, let's just try receiving my moment-to-moment experience with awareness." And she just dropped her thinking, came back to the breath, and really felt completely surrendered into the unknown of this one breath, totally present with that. And as she breathed in and her chest expanded, she realized that she was leaning against the wall. And whenever she breathed in, it made the wall creak. And that was the sound.

Well, as you can imagine, the whole story and all the anger just vanished with that accurate perception, right? You could call that an insight, but that's really the way it works. When the perception is accurate—just what's happening now—all the confusing mixed-up stories and our reactions and our emotions, our engagements, they fall away because they don't make sense based in reality.

That's the shift that happens. When we recognize in a moment ourselves, experience what's happening more accurately, then the reactivity, the dislike, the wanting, the self-blinding—all that stuff doesn't make sense in that moment.

It's not like we have to surmount it, dig it out, root it out, do all kinds of things to become a better person. A lot of our pain and confusion and reactivity is based simply on not perceiving accurately. And so the power of correct perception is huge.

Even on the deep levels—impermanence, no lasting sense of self—it's not as if things are permanent and then you have some big experience and suddenly everything starts to be impermanent. It's not that. You're sitting here with it already. There isn't a lasting, solid self that somehow, if you have the right experience, is going to break into pieces, and then you won't have a self anymore. That's why people get scared: "How am I going to function without a self?" Well, guess what? It's already like that.

To me, this is hugely reassuring. Hugely. The problems are really like a round peg in a square hole—they exist because we're not recognizing accurately. And so this process is at the heart of our spiritual practice, certainly of our meditation here: cultivating moment-to-moment receptive awareness.

It really isn't about getting the right object of awareness or the right experience. That's just based on what we know and what we think, on the assumptions we've made, the views we've created. It's about opening into receiving the unknown experience of each moment, because we never know what's going to arise next. We assume, "I'm going to pay attention to the breath for this sitting." Well, you already know that's a joke if you think you're going to sit down and just be with the breath, right? But we still hold that idea. And when something else happens, we think, "I did something wrong because I decided only the breath is going to arise in this sitting. There should be no sounds. There should be no pain. I should have no emotions coming up because I've decided I'm going to just be with the breath."

Instead of settling in and letting awareness receive all the different things happening, we glom onto this idea of how it should be, and all this other stuff arises. We don't even let in the perception that there's constant change, things rising and falling. "No, this is all wrong. This is all a mistake because I think this should be happening." Do you ever notice your mind doing that in the practice here? And what's the effect? Suffering, right? It doesn't bring a sense of harmony with the world. It doesn't bring a sense of confidence in awareness or in oneself. It's a sense of struggle, a sense of square peg in a round hole, or vice versa.

So this power of perception—really getting interested in how the mind works and noticing what's coloring the mind in moments of perception—it's fascinating. And it's a huge aspect of freeing us from confusion.

Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche, who was a wonderful Tibetan teacher, said: "When our sense organs encounter an object, the only part the object itself plays is to initiate the process of perception in your consciousness. From then on, as your mind reacts to the object, influenced by all your accumulated habits and past experiences, the whole process is entirely subjective. When your mind is full of anger, the whole world seems to be a hell realm. When your mind is peaceful, free from any clinging or fixation, and whatever you do is in accordance with the way things are, you experience everything as primordially pure."

Now, have you had experiences of that? I think you probably have, because it's normal, it's natural. In any moment when the mind, the awareness, is not distorted by greed, by confusion, by hatred or fear—when there's just present moment receiving, pure conscious perception—we do experience the world as primordially pure. You might not use those words. But when you're just standing looking at the desert, it's like, "Oh, it's so..."—whatever word you use. Peaceful, beautiful, lovely. Just that. Isness.

We tend to give the power out to the object. "The desert's so peaceful. The desert's so beautiful." We forget to turn around and notice: Oh, the mind is pure right now. The heart is pure. Just for a moment.

Well, my heart isn't pure. Five minutes ago, I was filled with rage. Next week, I know when I get back home, my heart isn't pure. We shrink away from using that word in relationship to ourselves.

But what if it's moment to moment? What's arising in the heart and mind in this moment?

So go out, look at a cactus, just look at the sky, and when you notice that feeling of ease, wakefulness, cleanness, purity—whatever the heck—turn around and notice: in this moment the perception isn't distorted by these states. Get familiar with that, because it happens all the time.

Ajahn Chah, who was so pragmatic in the way he described things, held up a vase and said, "Look at this vase. You think it's nice or beautiful or ugly, but the vase itself is just indifferent. It's we who are making ourselves insane."

Sogyal Rinpoche describes how all this papancha, this proliferating thought, works. We get into so much confusion by letting ourselves get lost in thoughts about whatever happens. It's fine that the thoughts are there. We can recognize them as thoughts. It's when we get lost in them.

He says we project a thought—like that thing with the breath, there's tightness, and we project the thought, "My breath is too tight, there's something wrong." Then the second thought believes the first. "That's true. There is something wrong. And what is it?" Then the third, fourth, and fifth thoughts are projected. The first thought is by this time already a reality. By the time the tenth one comes, it believes that the fifth thought has always been an actuality.

That's how it works.

But starting to see that, you also see we can play with it. We can see what it's doing and shift around the stories we tell about a perception. It's kind of fun to play with this malleability when you're on retreat and see that as the story changes, the mood changes, the whole thing changes. It's not so solid.

I'll read you this poem that speaks of that to me, by Billy Collins. The title is "Another Reason Why I Don't Keep a Gun in the House":

The neighbor's dog will not stop barking.
He is barking the same high rhythmic bark that he barks every time they leave the house.
They must switch him on on their way out.

The neighbor's dog will not stop barking.
I close all the windows in the house and put on a Beethoven symphony full blast, but I can still hear him muffled under the music,
barking, barking, barking.

And now I can see him sitting in the orchestra, his head raised confidently as if Beethoven had included a part for barking dog.

When the record finally ends he is still barking, sitting there in the oboe section, barking, his eyes fixed on the conductor who is entreating him with his baton while the other musicians listen in respectful silence to the famous barking dog solo, that endless coda that first established

Beethoven as an innovative genius.

We don't have to feel so gripped. We can notice when we're really locked in. But the understanding of what's happening—just, "Oh, this is how the mind works"—sometimes we can play with the story. Sometimes we can come back and really notice with simple awareness: what is coloring the perception in this moment?

When we say, "Just check your attitude," this is what we're talking about. It's as if you're wearing red-colored glasses or blue-colored glasses, and you forget they're on, so everything you see is blue and you start reacting to the world as if it's that. You like it, you don't, you get frustrated. But then when you bring your attention in a little closer, you go, "Oh, blue glasses. That's what's going on." Everything still looks blue, but you're understanding what's happening.

And in fact, with turning around and noticing the distortions of greed—"I've got to have this"—or aversion or fear or confusion, sometimes just the noticing... well, it stops being so strong. It's not that you're trying to get rid of it. You're just noticing it. But sometimes in the noticing, it's as if the glasses start to come off. Very interesting. And we see more clearly.

The next step, the next solidification of these thoughts—as Sogyal Rinpoche said, the fifth, the tenth—by the time of the tenth, you totally believe the fifth. This is what the Buddha talked about as views and opinions: what we perceive, we think about; what we think about, we complicate.

We complicate. And without realizing it, there can be a clinging.

As the Buddha described, one of the four fields of grasping that really causes us to get very lost and brings about a great deal of suffering is this description of reality. "My breath is tight, therefore there's something wrong with me." Or "That barking dog is driving me crazy. The neighbors are sick. I'm going to go nuts if something doesn't change." Whatever it might be. "That sound in the hall is completely ruining my practice. It shouldn't be here. That person should be told to shape up." Because that's how it should be.

And we don't even recognize that the thoughts have solidified into a view, into a description of ourselves, the world, the way things should be—something we absolutely believe, take to be the truth, the truth of how things are.

It's insidious, because mostly the descriptions, the views we take to be the truth, they're so familiar. We so believe them. It's not like we know we're holding them. Some of them we know. When my friend recognized that the sound was her leaning against the wall, that was so clear. That view went away—the view that there was a guy downstairs walking, making noise. Now, her view that nobody should be walking during a sitting period might not have gone away. But maybe.

We use these concepts, you know, like the way I said earlier: the bell rings, and there's that whole perception. It defines and conceptualizes and contextualizes ourselves, our day, our whole world. If we know that's a concept, a conventional reality, that's fine, that's useful. But if we don't recognize it, so often the descriptions harden into views that limit us, that define us, define our world, that bring us into conflict with ourselves. When my breath is tight and my view is that this means I'm not doing it right. That brings us into conflict with others.

I mean, look at the world. How much of the struggle, the prejudice, the suffering, the war is based in different people absolutely knowing "this is how it should be, this is how people should behave, this is how people should believe, this is what I own, this is what you should own"? How much of cultural misunderstanding is based in the way we're brought up, the views and the ways that we imbibed as children—how you relate to people, what this means, what that means—and then you come into another culture that is different? If we don't even know we're holding the view, there's so much suffering, so much struggle.

It really is the basis, I think, for so much of the pain and confusion in the world. Racism, religious fundamentalism, cultural differences. Look at politics. Let's not go down that road too far, but opinions are fine. Views are fine. We need views. We need to vote. We need to make choices. And I won't go into any specifics, but politics is a gripping one, right? Can you even really openly listen to someone holding in a very strong way the totally opposite view from yourself? Can you listen and be open?

I have a lot of trouble. I remember back—I won't talk about this time, but back years ago—there were certain politicians that would come on the TV and I couldn't stand to listen to the person. I didn't want to know one good thing. There couldn't be a good thing about anything that person said.

This is what happens when there's attachment to views. It's as if our perceptions snap shut. It's so interesting. It's like we don't even know we're holding to this view. And because any alternative view is troubling, shakes our ground, our certainty, it's almost as if we don't even let it in.

This example happened on a retreat some years ago. It was a big retreat like this, and we were going along. It was about the fifth or sixth day of the retreat.

A woman came up to me during that retreat. I was sitting in a chair then, as I do now. She told me it was her first big retreat, and she had been in agony—absolute agony—sitting cross-legged on the floor. We had said the same things we say here, yet she was just dying inside because it was so clear to her that you couldn't meditate if you couldn't sit cross-legged on the floor. That was the only way to do it, and she was suffering terribly. All her sittings weren't about any kind of balance or learning from pain. It was just aversion and dying.

Then on the fifth day, she's sitting there, and suddenly she goes, "Oh. Carol's sitting in a chair." Literally, that perception hadn't made it in. It's amazing. Truly amazing.

This is the kind of insight where steady moment-to-moment mindfulness does its work. The continuity of mindfulness breaks down our unconscious selective perception. You see, unconsciously we choose to pay attention to perceptions that feed and support the beliefs we're holding. And we don't even realize it because we think those views are true.

For instance, on retreat, often the prevailing view is deeply self-judgmental, self-negative. So many of us carry this—a sense of worthlessness, a sense of "I'm not good enough," or "I don't deserve to exist on this planet," or fear of bothering people. All that stuff. And what will we notice? We'll notice perceptions that feed that view. We're completely oblivious to all the times when nothing like that is going on—when we're doing fine, not bothering anyone, or even receiving positive cues. That doesn't count. Only the perceptions that fit our view are let in.

On retreat, in our life, in the world—this is what's going on. So can we even hold the possibility, on a very deep level, that there might be views, assumptions, descriptions of myself and the world that I'm holding without even knowing it?

Sometimes when you get shaken up on a retreat, it's because some of those views are being challenged. And that's great. When you feel confused, when you feel ill at ease, when you feel a little scared—I don't mean lost in terror, just a little scared—that's wonderful. Something's getting pushed at, something that seems so solid, where we think we know how it all is. Well, if this really were how it all is, what we think we know... my goodness, let's open to something new.

A friend of mine told me this story. Just listen and see if we can open to the possibility. He was with a Tibetan teacher many years ago, Lama Gendun. Lama Gendun was giving a talk to a group of Western students, speaking about the different realms of existence. He was describing the pure land, Dewachen, a realm of gods where Amitabha Buddha resides. He went on with this very long, intricate description of this happy realm of practice—what it looks like, what the devas are like, what the Amitabha Buddha is teaching.

After quite a while, he stopped and looked at his skeptical Western audience. And he said, "If you think I'm making this up—I've been there."

That's all. What does your mind do with that?

At another level, I heard on public radio that they just had elections in Bhutan, which is a Buddhist country and a kingdom. The king decided to try bringing in more of a parliamentary system. So they held elections, and one person being interviewed said—let me get this right—"I was really surprised at how aggressive democracy can be. It's not in our way to criticize one another publicly." And that's what the parliamentary system is all about. Well, that's really interesting.

Our deep habits of clinging to views we don't even know, descriptions of the world we totally abide by and then move and act and react from—not seeing these is truly one of the greatest sources, as the Buddha described it, of our confusion and suffering. It's the source of the confusion and suffering we cause in our relationships, in our reactions, in our responses to other people.

What awareness does—the steady, simple continuity of moment-to-moment awareness of whatever presents itself—is allow us to begin to see, to even recognize, "Ah, this view is here." To see it being constructed in a moment, to see it going away. To begin not to get rid of it, but to see through it.

At the very subtlest level of our moment-to-moment experience in the mind, in the way the Buddha talked about it, some of the most subtle, insidious, deeply-felt-to-be-true views we hold are perceptions—starting with misperception. He calls these the distortions, the perversions of perception.

Three perversions of perception in particular I want to mention, and you'll recognize where they are. One is that in what is constantly changing and impermanent, we perceive permanence. We perceive permanence. Remember, what we perceive, we think about. What we think about, we complicate and turn into a view. And so on an unconscious level, when we perceive permanence, it moves just like that to a kind of unacknowledged view that, yes, things are not changing. I'm talking about this on a deep level. We might say in our mind, "I know things are changing," but what are we really acting from?

The second is seeing in what is unreliable, in what cannot give us any long-term lasting pleasure, seeing happiness, seeing pleasure. Of course there's pleasure in the world, but it's like thinking that this donut is really going to do it. This relationship is going to solve everything, whatever it is.

And the third is seeing a lasting, separate self where there's not one.

These perceptions—and a perception is just in a moment—lead to how we think about things, lead to the view, and that view leads to how we respond, how we are in the world.

So this is really where awareness begins to show up in all its simple beauty. It's incredibly simple. It's just: what's happening right now? Awareness just receiving whatever's happening on whatever level, open to the mystery, not assuming. Not looking to see through the perception of impermanence, thinking "Now I'm going to see impermanence. Now I'm going to understand not-self. I'm not going to see self." That doesn't work. That's just another view.

But when we can trust enough—this is what the Dalai Lama said, that all of our difficulties stem from mistaken perceptions. That's a big statement. All of our difficulties stem from mistaken perception. That's why there's so much emphasis on direct experience, on true knowledge. That's the power of awareness.

As Ajahn Sumedho likes to talk about, just awareness receiving. The language he uses is, "It's like this." So in the moment, not saying "I want to look for no-self," just: what's happening right now? It's like this. Sadness feels like this. Anger feels like this. "I don't know what the heck's going on"—confusion feels like this. Subtle sensation of pressure feels like this. Coolness feels like this. Purity feels... just whatever's happening moment to moment to moment. The thought, "Oh, now that's a moment where the perception's really clear and this feels like purity"—oh, thinking is like this. Wanting is like this. Constructing an incredibly elaborate story and you're lost down there—oh, being caught up in a story is like this.

It's like a little Tai Chi move, I like to say, where it's not that awareness is changing experience or manipulating it or fixing it or trying to move it in the direction of impermanence or not-self or purity. When we talk about trusting mindfulness—and I'm using awareness and mindfulness synonymously at this point, meaning that moment of awareness is that knowing, that conscious perceiving of what's happening, the knowing of it—it's not colored in that moment by greed or confusion or hatred. Awareness receiving.

We trust it. We learn to trust it. We don't have to manipulate or fix or understand or figure it out or come to a conclusion or have an insight. We don't have to do anything. Which is so great, because basically whatever we do most of the time is stemming from misperception, confused thought, and wrong view.

Trusting awareness is something Sayadaw U Pandita spoke of. He was a very fierce Burmese meditation teacher. He could be very demanding, but I always felt a tremendous trust when I'd go into interviews. In one interview—I can't remember the specifics—but you would describe very carefully what's going on, and then you'd start to interpret.

You're out of there.

If I went into him and said, "I had a really good sitting..." Out. What are you talking about? Just describe what's happening.

Well, that's an amazing training because you're just trusting awareness. There's pressure. There's tightness. There's aversion. There's thinking. I don't like it. I notice aversion. I'm feeling tight. There's sadness. I'm crying. I'm noticing crying. You're just noticing each thing. That's awareness receiving. No comment. No problem. No hierarchy. No preference.

And he said to me—I was having something difficult going on, I don't even remember what—he said, "You know, with awareness, you don't have to be afraid of anything." Because awareness—now I'm moving to Tsemedo's language—awareness is a point that includes. Awareness can receive anything. There's nothing that can't be received in awareness, in our experience.

But mostly we're so focused on what's happening and our reactions and the stories and what it means about me. That's the third misperception: what it means about me. Notice, just notice over the next day or so, if such a thought should arise, how quickly does the thought bring anything that's going on back to what does it mean about me?

Somebody drops something all the way across the cafeteria. "Oh, good thing it wasn't me." Or you do something. "Oh, I hope nobody saw that." Or you feel like you're having this great sitting and you get up and you're in the flow and you're walking out. "I hope they're seeing me." Or somebody else is walking by and you can tell they're really with it—yesterday they were all jangling, today they dropped in. "Wow, how can I get like that?"

Just notice. The tortoise. I know a lot of you probably saw the tortoise. And it's beautiful. It's so great to see. Well, I'm seeing the tortoise. Just noticing that. It's a hoot. It's incredible. What does it mean about me?

But awareness just receives all of that. No judgment, no problem, no trying to pull away. And through that, steadiness—steadiness and non-preferential noting. Awareness can receive anything. We don't need to be afraid of anything.

And through the steadiness and the kindness and the willingness to just surrender into the unknown in this moment, in this moment, in this moment—actually, that's what allows our mistaken perceptions to begin to shift. It happens by itself. We can't make insight happen.

So real insight is simply a shift of perception. It's not that the world changes, but how we perceive it and how we understand it—and thus how we respond and act in the world—does change.

An example I like to use often, in terms of how this works, even with something like anattā or impermanence: you know those Magic Eye books that were very popular a few years ago? They would have graphic designs of two or three different colors that were completely abstract. If you just look at it, it's just abstract. There's nothing there. But if you stay with it steadily, in a kind of unfocused way—so it's steady but gentle—and you just stay with it for a while, somehow the perception shifts and a design emerges that looks three-dimensional. It's an elephant in the jungle or a spaceship or whatever. It really doesn't matter what the image is. But that experience is very obvious. You can really see it.

Now, was that not there before, and then something happened and it appeared? No, it was there all along. And then your eyes kind of go into staring, and you look away and look back, and it's not there anymore. So in a way, both of those ways of perceiving exist. Just the abstract design and colors is there. Or you perceive in a different way and the three-dimensional thing springs out. And after you've seen it, it doesn't have to stay as the three-dimensional thing.

It's rather like how we normally experience everything with a sense of "me" experiencing it. Time all comes from me, space all comes from me, I'm the one seeing, I'm the one meditating. And then there's just a sense of—oh, in the perceiving, there's only perceiving. In the hearing, there's just hearing. In the knowing, there's just knowing. And then, trust me, the next minute it's me perceiving, me knowing, me wanting to have that insight again, me needing to think about it, me needing to figure it out, me needing to tell all my friends.

What's changed? The way reality is hasn't really changed. But knowing it—knowing that the three-dimensional image springs out—even when you don't see it, you understand. It changes something in your understanding, and you can relate differently.

If you've never seen it, and you've tried and tried and tried—my mother was like this, it drove her nuts. She could never see it. And it would make her crazy. So doesn't it, when somebody's talking about some insight they've had and you haven't—doesn't it make you crazy? "I want to see that. I want to see that." We get tight. And the tighter you get, the less likely you're going to see anything, except tightness.

But that's the answer, you see? Oh, tightness is like this. The way into the awakening of insight is simply to relax into what's actually happening. "I can't see this goddamn thing"—that tightness is like this. That's awareness receiving.

And as Ajahn Sumedho likes to say, awareness is the doorway to freedom. Just that simple, steady awareness, on its own, without our forcing, without our effort, without our willpower—the awareness shifts.

It's okay if it shifts back. I mean, the perception shifts—it's okay if it shifts back. But that knowing, it changes something in our mind stream, in our relation. And that's why just a little moment of awareness, compared to a lot of moments of just plodding along on retreat, has a huge effect. Have you noticed that? One of my teachers used to say, a spark of truth burns up a mountain of lies. So it doesn't have to be time equal, which is good news also.

So insight really happens on its own through the steady, kind, non-judging awareness—the real trusting of awareness, that the way things really are will reveal itself on all levels, our psychological problems, on the level of Dhamma. And we can't make it happen. We don't need to make it happen. But something that we didn't even know we were holding to gets released. And it's like, ah, that's how that is. That little aha moment—that's insight. It's not a thought, and then yes, we'll think about it. That's sort of how we know things, but the thought isn't the same as the insight.

From Thich Nhat Hanh: "Understanding does not arise as a result of thinking. It is a result of the long process of conscious awareness. Sometimes understanding can be translated into thoughts, but often thoughts are too rigid and limited to carry much understanding."

Thoughts are great. Thoughts are useful. We need them, and we can understand them and use them. But not let them define and constrict and confine our idea of ourself, our views of the world. Thoughts are useful, but insight and awareness—they're bigger than thoughts. Thoughts are included in awareness. They're fine. We don't have to fight them, but we don't have to be them.

And so, really, in this way, through the trusting of awareness, we get first to recognize just that simple knowing of whatever's happening. Recognize, get interested in: is there anything coloring the awareness at this moment? Just gently, gently, gently. And the trust that comes is that we get more and more content with the awareness itself, less and less looking to a particular experience to do it for us—because we know every experience that comes is going to go.

And this, again—when we don't perceive impermanence, we think we know impermanence, but we don't. Talking to a lot of people, you know, they have a beautiful emotional state, and one part of the mind, the thought says, "Oh, I know it's going to pass." But on another level, quietly, the mind's thinking, "Oh, this is how it's going to be now, finally." And the next day is really difficult and painful. We go, "Oh no, how am I going to get through the rest of the retreat with this state of mind?" Then when we settle back and look, we've had fifty-seven states of mind in the last two hours. And each one was it. Each one was going to last.

But we get more and more interested in the awareness. It matters less and less which state of mind, because awareness can receive all of them. And when it's like that, it's interesting—awareness is just so accessible. Again, it can be no matter what's going on. As much as you've got yourself worked up, all worked up is like this. You don't have to go anywhere else. It just takes that willingness, a total commitment really, to surrender to the unknown in this moment, and the trust that awareness can receive that.

It's really what we're practicing moment to moment. We're not trying to figure it all out and get the knowledge and get the answer and wrap it all up in a nice little box. We're seeing there is no box. That all it is is just: What's happening now? Awareness can receive it. And that whole definition and sense of me and who I am and what I am and how it has to change—in that moment, not even there. It's not relevant or irrelevant.

It's just not there. Sure, next moment it's there. Don't worry. You can retrieve it when you need it, and it'll come when you don't need it also. But you can recognize, "Oh, that's right. That's just a description right now. It's what's happening now."

Awareness is the doorway to freedom, as Ajahn Sumedho says. And any experience in any moment is the doorway to awareness. Anything. The sound of the doves cooing, the heat of the sun, the pain in your back, the frustration arising, the peacefulness of clear seeing, the gurgling of your stomach. Any experience is a doorway to remind us to move into awareness. And the awareness itself is the doorway to clear seeing and the freedom that releases our heart and mind from the need to struggle and fight and react and contend with experience.

And we don't lose the conventional. We don't get into some kind of airy-fairy "who knows what's happening." In fact, when we're just in that purity of awareness receiving —"Oh, it's like this"—when the mind isn't colored in that moment (and it's all just moments) by greed, by hatred, by confusion, then if it's a moment that calls for response, the wise, compassionate response naturally emerges. The natural response of the non-tormented, non-distracted mind and heart will be metta or compassion, whichever is appropriate, or wisdom, or equanimity. It's not that we have to create those. They naturally emerge. So we don't lose the conventional reality. We still function—better, if anything. And we can kind of move between the worlds.

So I just want to end with this little passage from Chökyi Nyima Rinpoche, speaking about both aspects, the conventional and the ultimate. He says:

"When watching the magical display of this world as it seems to be, spontaneously, an overwhelming despair and pity well up in me. When watching its nature of innate simplicity as it really is, I cannot help but feel wonder and break out in laughter. When watching the one who feels pity and the one who is laughing, both disappear and cannot be found. Now what to do?"

So let's just sit for a while.

CHAPTER 41

Shifting The Paradigm

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson examines the radical teaching from the Dhammapada that all experience is preceded by mind, led by mind, and made by mind. She explores how our deeply ingrained habits of liking and disliking—practiced millions of times daily throughout our lives—color every moment of consciousness, keeping us trapped in cycles of suffering even when we think we're meditating skillfully.
>
> Wilson draws on teachings from Ajahn Sumedho, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, and Ajahn Buddhadāsa to illuminate how the three kilesas (lobha, dosa, and moha—greed, aversion, and delusion) operate beneath our conscious awareness, shaping our perceptions and reactions before we even recognize what's happening. She offers Sumedho's simple yet transformative practice of meeting each experience with "it's like this"—whether it's craving, aversion, confusion, or peace—as a way to step out of our habitual self-referencing and judgment.
> The talk emphasizes that purifying the mind doesn't mean attacking our defilements with aversion, but rather developing a steady, continuous awareness that recognizes both confused states and moments of natural peace with equal interest. Wilson explains that awareness of awareness is surprisingly simple—as simple as feeling your hands touching and knowing that you're feeling—and that this quality of relaxed recognition, maintained throughout daily activities, allows wisdom to arise naturally. She encourages practitioners to notice the many moments of "voidness" or non-clinging that occur every day, generating contentment with awareness itself rather than endlessly chasing pleasant experiences.

So tonight I want to talk about changing paradigms, or stepping out of samsara. We wish.

Last night James spoke so beautifully about the Buddha saying that he taught suffering and its end. He asked, with a show of hands, how many people here actually come to practice because of suffering, somehow wanting to end suffering, to be happy. And of course I said in the metta meditation that I led that the Buddha also said it's our natural birthright, really, to be happy.

The whole point of the meditation, though, is that this understanding of suffering and happiness starts to change, hopefully begins to change. What we think when we come into beginning our practice, and what we may think as we go along—usually we don't even realize what we think—as to what happiness is and the way we go about trying to achieve that and to end suffering, doesn't work. Just as it doesn't work in our daily life, the same motivations, the same understandings that we have in our daily life, of course we bring to meditation, because that's how we see the world.

And when the meditation really starts to light up, take fire, start to cause us trouble—when everything's exploding and falling down on me today—that's when it's getting good. Because that's when the ways that we unconsciously hold our assumptions about who we are and what the world is and what happiness is are starting to show that they're not working. And of course we don't like that, so we're suffering. But that's really where the rubber is starting to meet the road.

I'm sure you know the very famous quotation from the Buddha in the Dhammapada, where one translation is: refrain from the unwholesome, do good, purify the mind. This is the teaching of all the Buddhas. This is really essential, and especially what I want to talk about tonight is this last one: purify the mind.

This is essentially the whole work, the whole point, the whole thing that meditation practice, that spiritual practice is about. Whether you want to say purifying the mind, or understanding what pure mind and heart is and how we get seduced away from resting in the natural possibility of pure mind and heart—either way, that's really the place where the whole practice lives: what's going on in the mind.

And this is radical. Even though we may agree with it intellectually, it doesn't really do us any good. Don't believe me. Look and see for yourself.

Again, this is very famous from the Dhammapada, the first two verses. This is Gil Fronsdal's translation: "All experience is preceded by mind, led by mind, made by mind. Speak or act with a corrupted mind and suffering follows as the wagon wheel follows the hoof of the ox. All experience is preceded by mind, led by mind, made by mind. Speak or act with a peaceful mind and happiness follows like a never departing shadow."

Mind, heart, citta—translated into English it's the same word. Guy kind of likes the translation "psyche," our whole sense of what's happening in consciousness and awareness in a moment. The whole seed of happiness and suffering is not at all the suffering that the Buddha is talking about when he's teaching what suffering is and what the ending of it is. As James said last night, we're all going to experience pain, we're all going to get old. If we don't get old, it's because we experience greater pain first. Things are going to go wrong. Stuff happens. The Buddha wasn't teaching freedom from that. But he's teaching freedom from suffering, and the suffering and the freedom from it is all what's going on in the mind, in the awareness.

And this is radical, you know? It's really saying that that's where all our practice is, that's where all our interest, our investigation, our growth, our freedom lies—in this insubstantial, nothing you can hold on to, changing every single moment, mind. And all of our focus on what we like and what we don't like, on our practices and what we're getting in our life and how we're living and our personality and you name it—it doesn't make any difference whatsoever. Whatsoever. It's radical. Freedom and suffering is all in the mind, all the work of the mind.

And really, in my experience, all the different meditation techniques, in various ways—I'm not going to go into that tonight—but in various ways, they are ways of accessing, recognizing the purity of mind or heart, as well as recognizing how we get seduced away from the purity of mind and heart, how we tend to take refuge in what is a corrupt mind. There's no great translation that we feel good about for that word. But corrupt mind basically means when the kilesas, the corruptions, the defilements—forms of greed, hatred, aversion, fear, or delusion, confusion, not knowing, not recognizing accurately—when some form of any of those mental factors arise and pass like everything else, present in the mind, the heart, unrecognized, unseen, that's what he's referring to as a corrupt mind.

Unseen, unrecognized, it leads to how we view the world, our perceptions, our thoughts, our explanations of the world, our views, what we believe is true, the assumptions we make without even knowing that they're assumptions, and then the decisions we make, how we act, how we relate to ourselves, to our own experience, to others.

So I think this is why in the Noble Eightfold Path, the path we follow of practice, the first step is wise view, wise understanding. Not, of course—it's the first step, so it's not totally, completely purified understanding, obviously—but a sense of just beginning to tune in, to notice how we understand the world, how we understand ourselves or experience, because this is so key. Not that we have to change it, but we just need to know, to recognize, to get interested, just to begin with, in the assumptions, the attitudes, the views we have about ourselves and the world. And these are what are so challenged, really, by dharma practice, by spiritual path.

I sat a retreat with Ajahn Sumedho here at Spirit Rock this past summer, and in a group interview—I forget what we were talking about—he always talks about trusting or having confidence in receptive awareness, natural awareness, which I love the way he talks about it, and I use his language a lot.

But anyway, in the interview, somehow we both just kind of fell into it together. It was a kind of transmission moment where we were both simply feeling it, falling into that sense of purity of awareness, to say. And he just kind of chuckled and said, "It's really the opposite of everything we've ever been taught, isn't it?"

And it's true. It is.

Now, that doesn't have to be a problem once we recognize what we're believing and what we've been taught. We don't have to dump it, but we can just have a little space around it. Just maybe have the sense: maybe this isn't the only possible way.

Just a little example of how our assumptions and our views color the way we describe and explain the world, a little story. I was just in Burma, and we were staying at a meditation center with Sayadaw U Tejaniya. We had brought in some money, so we were doing a lot of very formal offerings of food and rice and this and that in different locations. Maybe I'll talk more about that later.

But it's a very photogenic kind of thing. Every time you're doing offerings, someone's taking photos. And most of the people love to have their photo taken and see it. So I was taking photos and two of my friends were as well—three different cameras. Then one of the friends put her camera on the other friend's computer and she was looking at the photos. Several of them, quite a lot actually, had these kind of circular bright spots in different places. There was one that was all over the lungi I was wearing.

My friend who had taken the photos has lived the better part of seventeen years in Burma. She's a nun there, so she's very much in the culture. And the Burmese culture is a Buddhist culture, very traditional Theravada Buddhist, with a strong sense of faith in the traditional Buddhist teachings, which include different world systems. So right away, she thought, "Wow, those are devas." Not that those are actually devas, but the reflection of the devas' energy.

My other friend, who was on the computer, is also a nun, but she was a scientist with a very scientific mind. She just looked at me and rolled her eyes, then said, "Of course there's some kind of moisture in the camera," and offered all these explanations.

Then they brought Sayadaw in and he was looking at it and laughing. I really don't know what he thinks, but he started teasing us all about the devas and how I was bringing devas with me. Anyway, yesterday I looked at the pictures from my camera on my computer and there they were.

Who knows? Who knows? But it's just—we don't have to know. We can simply see in each case that it's a very complete worldview explanation of what it is.

So the first attitude that it's very helpful to bring to our practice is that willingness to not know. Just the willingness to not know. If we could just keep meeting each moment of experience with "I don't know"—what should happen, what this means about me, how it could be better, how my practice is going, how it compares to last retreat, how it compares to the instructions, how it could be better, yada yada yada.

Oh, this is Sayadaw Tejaniya's language: "It's like this." That's all. Burning is like this. Self-judgment is like this. My breath is so tight, I can't stay with the breath for two seconds after all these years of practice. Judgment is like this. Nothing to do or change or fix. No need to construct a story about what it means.

Oh, we almost can't stand it. We want the story, we need the story. Where would we be without the story? Who would I be without the story? Even though—how often is the story a suffering one? How often? Still, though, it's my story. And without that story, it's like, "But... what? Can't be... what?" You know, I have to have some certainty. I have to know.

When we can just begin with that very first attitude, just that sense of not knowing, the willingness to just rest in this moment as it is without needing to add anything to it—that already is cutting against our lifelong habit of wanting, of disliking, of it's all about me, me, me. You know that very clearly.

Let me see what Sayadaw Tejaniya said about this, if I can find it. He describes it kind of pithily.

He says the automatic habit of our mind is that we basically spend every day of our life as sense objects come in and out. And you know sense objects—the six sense doors are seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, feeling or sensing with the body. And the sixth sense door is the mind, mental objects. So that would be thoughts, emotions, mental factors like, say, concentration. It's not an emotion exactly, but it's a factor of mind. Wisdom. Ignorance, greed, love—mental factors coming and going.

We've spent every day of our life as the sense objects come and go: like this one, don't like that one, like this one, don't like that one. It's just automatic. Notice sometime when you're just a bit relaxed, just noticing your mind, not trying to control it, not trying to focus. Play with it sometime. When you're walking down to the dining room, or walking through the dining room as you're lining up for the meal, and you're not trying to make your mind do anything—just notice, as you're with the process, how the mind tends to relate in each moment.

It may not be so clear, but I've really noticed it in myself. I'll walk through the dining room and my mind's going: like, don't like. They look nice, they don't. Recoil, go forward. This is pleasant, this isn't. It's not that clear, so we don't notice it. But it's basically forward, back, forward, back. Eh, not worth noticing. Forward, back, forward, back. Eh, nothing. Forward, back, forward, back. And then the next minute: what does it mean about me? What does it mean about me? It's exhausting, for one thing. Exhausting.

And then we see it's exhausting, but we haven't stepped out of the paradigm. We see it's exhausting, we decide it's stupid, so we hate it. Right? That helps. That really helps a lot. But that's the kind of staying within the same paradigm and trying to meditate from that. We bring this liking, not liking, it doesn't matter. Liking, not liking, I don't care. Liking, not liking, it's all about me. We bring the same orientation to the meditation. And then we wonder why it's a struggle.

Because really ingrained there—and I know maybe I'm making it a bit simplistic just to talk about, but I don't think it's untrue for being simplistic—that's why we can laugh. It's good you can laugh. That means there's a little space to see, oh, it isn't always that way. But it's so deeply habituated that when something is slightly pleasant, the mind experiences something as slightly pleasant—that vedana, the second foundation of mindfulness—and without awareness, this habit of liking, disliking, just the liking, wanting, leaning forward ever so slightly, just naturally kicks in.

And it feels so familiar that it feels just natural, doesn't it? So of course I like what's pleasant. Don't tell me not to like what's pleasant. And then it goes off into whichever way your mind wants to go with that. Unpleasant—not even painful, just slightly unpleasant—that subtle recoiling, the subtle not liking, the subtle preference for the pleasant, that's just natural. And as Tejania says, we're practicing that ten million times a day, our whole life. Of course it feels natural.

And then so-called neutral, or something that doesn't make much of an impression—we often just don't notice much at all, or we go off into a story. Or the third way—so that's greed, hatred, or dosa. I like the Pali word that's usually translated as hatred, the second of the kilesas.

The Pali word is dosa. I like to use that personally much better than "hatred" because it's broader and not so charged. Dosa means not just hatred—it includes hatred, fear, or even just that subtle recoil of not liking. Dosa in the mind.

As I get into talking about how our practice is really not about changing experience but just getting interested in watching what's going on in the mind that's observing, without judgment, it gets fascinating. If I'm noticing what's in the mind and I recognize self-hatred, and I label it "hatred"—if somebody walked across my path and I note "hatred"—then right away the mind goes, "That's disgusting. You hate that person?" Well, I did. But if I note "dosa in the mind"—oh, dosa in the mind, okay, I can be with that.

This is just a sense of how language is actually very interesting to explore. How often the words we use can carry a huge charge or a lot of associations that we don't quite realize. We can end up in a struggle, and if we shift the words—oh, dosa, I can be with that—whereas "hatred," that's a whole story about me.

The third one, delusion, as I said, is kind of spacing out, not noticing. But the actual way that I notice delusion that is much easier to notice is the confusion, the misperception, that sense of me, me, me. It all refers back to me. This is basically the underlying corruption, confusion, defilement, kilesa—whatever word you want to use—that keeps the other two going.

Because who wants the pleasant? Who likes the pleasant? Who wants to be happy? Who's recoiling from the unpleasant? It's all about me. If there was no reference back to me, pleasant and unpleasant would come and go—well, they do anyway. But pleasant and unpleasant would come and go without it being a problem.

The deep view, which isn't wise view but the view we so often hold of life, is that pleasant equals right, good, happy, and unpleasant equals wrong, mistaken, unhappy, suffering. Even though I talk about this until I'm blue in the face, my mind gets into that habit still a lot. I'll be suffering in terms of feeling like I'm in contention with something that's going on. I can just feel that sense of struggle. It can be subtle—I don't even know what. But as soon as I feel it, I just stop a minute. I don't have to be on retreat; it could be anywhere. Just stop a minute, not trying to figure it out, but just kind of checking what's going on in the mind.

And almost always, when you see something the mind is pushing away, it's almost always a little on the unpleasant side. There's almost always some sense of: it would be better, or it would be right, or I would be happy if this was gone and this was here. Or if this didn't go away and this never came. It can be really gross, like James is saying—we get into just piling up pleasant experiences, whoever gets the most pleasant things strung so closely together that there's no gaps, wins.

We laugh. We know that's ridiculous, right? On some level, we know. We all know things are impermanent. We see the fleetingness of vedanā. How long does that pleasant feeling last? Like that.

Ajahn Buddhadasa, who was a wonderful Thai forest meditation master—both Guy and I were at his monastery, Suan Mokkh, when he was there—he would talk about the fleetingness of pleasant feeling. So just notice: if you really start noticing pleasant and unpleasant, just the feeling tone, how long does it last in a moment? How long? Put that pleasant-tasting food on your tongue, and if you're really just with the pleasantness, for me it lasts about a tenth of a second. There's a burst, and then I'm just masticating kind of tasteless food, and the mind is reaching for the next pleasant, right? Why do we overeat? More, more, more, more.

Whatever it is that we do. The pleasant, the pleasant, the pleasant. How long does it last? Not much.

And he says—this is Buddhadasa again—"Just look at all the decisions you've made in your life. See how many of them, your major decisions, were based on going for pleasant feeling." You know, "If I do this, then I'll be happy." But you can't stop at happy. What does that mean? I'll feel good. Things will be nice somehow. We'll get all the furniture arranged on the Titanic just perfectly so that we're happy. We can spend our whole life doing that.

So these are really, really deep habits. It's really quick. And sometimes, yes, pleasant is pleasant. There is gratification in the pleasant. Sometimes people get confused because they say the Buddha says even pleasant feeling is dukkha, the first noble truth. So how can pleasant be dukkha? Pleasant is pleasant. I like it. I'm happy. I do feel good. I like it better when I don't hurt than when my knee is killing me. I like it better when the food tastes good than when there's something I'm really allergic to. So how can you tell me that's dukkha?

But dukkha means unreliable—can't be counted on for any kind of lasting satisfaction or happiness. So there is gratification in the pleasant, and that's often how we get seduced.

The other aspect of the view—and again, I'm really simplifying—is to look in your own experience at what the views are of what brings happiness, what brings suffering in your own life. Not just the conscious ideas, but the ones you really act on, the ones you really take refuge in in times of stress when things aren't going the way you want.

So for instance, the idea: everything comes and goes, it's impermanent, knowing this is the way to peace. Okay, that's a nice thought. Is that where you really take refuge? Absolutely the knowing, when something difficult is happening? We can't kid ourselves. We might try, and that wisdom on the intellectual level can be helpful. If something's difficult and we think, "Oh yeah, it does change, things do change, everything's impermanent," that might give the wisdom to just relax into what's happening. So that's true. That is, in a little way, taking refuge in it.

Really taking refuge in it is absolutely knowing it's impermanent. We just open, it comes, it goes. But then notice, like I say, the times that it slips in underneath. I think I'm just being with what is, but ever so slightly—or not so slightly—I'm leaning towards "it just has to feel good." It just goes down. It's so embarrassing, really. You just want to feel good, for God's sake. It's just so simple. I don't want my back to hurt. I want to be able to feel good about myself, so I want to have some really deep, concentrated, unitive states. And it sounds like so that I can really know anatta, and I want to know anatta so I can feel good about myself, like I'm getting somewhere in my practice. And then I don't have to struggle so much, I can relax. It slips in, it slips in.

Where was I going with this? Oh yes, the third aspect I wanted to mention of the views we may hold is again that sense of me—that sense of me as a separate agent, either being acted on by experience and circumstances and environment and others, or being the agent that's doing the acting. As in meditating: I'm doing the meditation. I'm focusing on my breath.

In a conventional way, of course, this is true. I'm not saying we should lose the sense of who we are as compared to other people, or awareness of our effect on the environment. But deeply held, it's such a strong assumption, such an ingrained felt experience, that it's on the level of not even knowing that it's possible our perception might perceive things in another way.

Often it can happen in meditation—an experience where there just isn't that sense so much of me and other. And it doesn't have to be some huge blowout experience. Sometimes people are just focusing on the breath or just being with pain, and suddenly, boom, something opens up. Just in that moment—it could be vast, it could be focused—but there's simply no sense of me and other.

And very often in that moment, the next thing that comes is a really strong fear. Then people come and say, "I got afraid and I ruined the moment." Again, immediately we own it. But the fear is just that sense of, "Whoa, this doesn't fit the paradigm. I don't know where to put this." In the moment itself, it's actually not suffering, it's not scary—it's just kind of the next moment. But that reaction is just a habit: "This isn't me and others, safe, safe, protected."

Our mind doesn't really like when these deep views are challenged. So when you're feeling in some way uncomfortable in practice or in life—not killer uncomfortable, not overwhelmed, not like you're going to go crazy—but a little uncomfortable, a little fear, that's not a bad thing. Let it spark curiosity: "Oh, this is interesting. I'm kind of interested. What's going on here?" Don't think about it too much, but get interested.

So how does this work? It's obvious, but I'll bring it into meditation terms. These habits are so deeply habituated that of course that's what we bring to meditation. We do something in order to achieve a result. That makes sense. We don't do something for no reason. If we said, "Come here for a month and work really hard for absolutely nothing. Nothing will change, you'll be just the same before as after—you won't really be the same because you're never the same, but really it's not to get a single thing"—even if our mind might say "cool," really deep down we wouldn't show up.

Why do we come to the hall? There are times when you come just to be in the presence of the moment. And that's sublime. That's wonderful—that sense of nothing to do, nothing to have, nothing to be. We love those moments. And then we turn it into something to try and have again the next time, the next time, the next time. Because that's what our mind trusts: "That was right. That was good. That felt pleasant. Now I've got it about how to meditate and know not-self. How can I keep it?"

You see how they come in again? It just comes in again—the wanting of pleasant, the fearing of unpleasant. It's all about me. And the "all about me" also tends to mean I then have to do it. I have to figure it out. I have to do the meditation correctly in order to purify my mind.

Even that language—purify my mind. How many of you, either consciously or not, have felt this: "Oh, my mind is impure"? How many of us start to kind of own it: "Corruption in my mind." Or, "Yeah, of course my mind is corrupt. It's infinitely corrupt. There's no way this mind could ever be purified." Instead of seeing that none of it's personal.

These habits—the greed, the dosa, the confusion, the me-ing and I-ing—it's just the nature of mind. When pleasant comes, the unaware mind just leans towards it. It's just nature manifesting. It's normal. It's natural.

It's not the only way, though. Actually, the mind in a moment that's just open, relaxed, accepting, willing to just be without knowing, without having to make a story, without needing to judge or recoil—that also is really natural. But mostly in our daily lives, in our busy lives, that's not the quality of pure mind that we notice so much. It's not the one we've been trained to see. As Sayadaw was saying, it's the opposite of everything we've been taught.

How many of you were taught to notice that in school? How many of you were taught that in a moment when you're just sitting, someone would say, "Oh, that's great! You're just sitting there really present and aware without trying to impress, without trying to get it right. Just being awake. Wonderful." How many of us was that ever even pointed out as a possibility?

Much more in our culture we need to do, we need to achieve, we need to have some kind of result in order to confirm ourselves or to have other people confirm us, to have a sense of doing okay, of existing.

So taking a simple meditation experience, we can see how the mind moves so quickly. Say you're just sitting and you have a pain. Okay, that's no big deal. Pain in your butt, pain in your knee—it doesn't really matter where. In the normal course of things, the pain comes up, it might be recognized, and there's just that little pulling back right away. Our tendency is, even in meditation, to keep on focusing on the pain and not to so much notice, not be quite tuned in to just that quality of the knowing. So you don't quite see when that simple "oh, this pain is like this" turns to recoil.

The pain gets more tight. And immediately, what we perceive, we think about: "Oh, this cushion is so hard. Why didn't I bring that soft foam cushion? I can't believe I forgot that ear pillow that I always use. How am I going to bear another three and a half weeks of this? And besides that, that person next to me is making so much noise moving. How can I possibly come to any kind of peace?" And then you start self-chastising and wanting and the whole thing, right? Just in that amount of time.

And at that point, which has taken no time at all, how can you even know what's actually happening? In that moment, that pain has obviously become a block to peace, a block to meditation, a block to ease. It's not really questioned—it's just obvious.

Maybe you've heard this from Sogyal Rinpoche. This is a process of reaction and thought. We get into so much confusion by letting ourselves get lost in whatever happens. You project a thought: "Oh, this pain is unbearable." Then the second thought believes the first: "How will I ever last two and a half months?" Then a third, fourth, and fifth thought are projected. The first thought is by this time already a reality. "This pain is unbearable." By the time the tenth one comes, it believes the fifth thought has always been an actuality.

And we just wonder why we don't actually recognize the true nature of peace, the true nature of the heart-mind of non-clinging. Why don't we even recognize how available, how accessible it is? Because we're all caught up in our stories, our projections of mind. It just happens so, so quickly.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya, again talking about how this works, said that when we look at pain, it's natural that this dislike comes up in the mind. That's just kind of a natural expression. But when there's aversion in the mind and we don't really see it, how can you understand what's happening? He uses this example all the time: If you're angry at someone and you keep on looking at that person, what happens to the anger? Does it stay the same? Does it get worse? Does it get better?

Does that person suddenly transform into incredible beauty? No, you know, when you're annoyed at someone and you keep looking at them, it just feeds the whole thing. The annoyance gets stronger. And that's what happens when we're with pain or with anything else and we don't notice the aversion in the mind. We can't recognize accurately when the mind is reacting—we need to see that, otherwise our perception is distorted. The aversion colors our whole experience.

So when we're talking about impure mind, so to speak—the mind colored by greed—greed is like thirst. It's this "I've got to have it" kind of energy. It's not the same as a wholesome wanting to do good. The word "wanting" in English covers a wide range of mental states that aren't actually the same. The Pali word lobha, which we translate as greed, really refers to this thirst, this leaning forward, this "I have to have it," with the promise that this is going to make me happy. It's a truly deluded kind of state.

When we talk about it coloring the mind, let me try to explain. Andy Olenski, who is the director of the Barre Center for Buddhist Studies and a Pali and Sanskrit scholar, loves to examine the quality of mind. Citta is the word I'm using, translating as mind or heart. He says that in Buddhism, the mind is not a subject—it's not some thing that has objects as content. Rather, citta is the activity or process of cognizing, a flow of events.

You could think of citta as a moment, though even describing it as a discrete moment is just a way of talking. It's a moment of activity. My friend in Burma once described how she always thought of citta as this little round thing—a moment of consciousness with mettā, or delusion, or wanting, or concentration inside it, like little bubbles, like cartoon bubbles over someone's head. But really, mind is something else entirely. It's a moment of consciousness with various mental qualities arising together with it. There's no "in" or "out" of it. There's no consciousness here and then you over there that I'm cognizing. It's all arising together.

Consciousness—that moment of citta—includes the viññāṇa, the sense consciousness, the seeing or hearing. It includes whatever mental qualities are arising with it: attention, mindfulness, mettā, greed, hatred, confusion, whatever wholesome or unwholesome mix is present.

So in U Tejaniya's example, there's a moment of consciousness arising, and the object being cognized is painful sensation—unpleasant, strong, unpleasant sensation. Immediately with that, there's a kind of flinching back, the aversion. And when it's not recognized, the aversion just colors everything. It's like a dye. It flavors that whole moment of consciousness. From within it, the aversion colors how we think, the conclusions we draw, how we relate to that experience. "Of course I hate this pain. I have to do something about it. My knee's going to break. I need to go to the hospital. Of course that's normal."

When I was recently in retreat—a light retreat—I had the same experience with craving. I was just doing some walking meditation, and craving came up for something. I don't even know what it was for, but there was this sense of wanting an object. Then the next moment of consciousness really noticed the craving with interest, not with aversion, and I was seeing how from within the craving itself—this is why it's so seductive—the quality it lends to that moment of mind is this promise that "this is really going to make you happy." It just feels like you could slide into this and everything's going to be okay. And it colors everything.

From within craving, even if the mind can say, "I know this—maybe it was a hot shower—isn't going to make me happy forever," that's just a little voice up here. But the craving in the moment is so powerful—it's its very nature to promise. As one yogi said to me during the three-month course, "It's this empty promise, but we keep believing it, the empty promise."

Sometimes, even when we start to see that getting this object or having this experience isn't going to do it, and we think we're renouncing, we just renounce one object for another. We don't see that it's really the belief in the promise of craving that needs to be seen through. It's not even that we have to stop craving, because that would be aversion.

Meeting craving with aversion isn't really any better. But to just really feel the seduction and simply be watching it. Just watch it. "Yeah, I get this." And feel the whole thing. Then watch it fade away. And keep on watching and notice—oh, this is a moment of clear, pure mind-heart. This is a moment of non-clinging. This is just a little bitty taste of the peace of the Buddha.

What the promise of clinging really is—when we get the thing, the clinging stops and we're at peace. As long as we're focused outward on experience, on objects, on getting, and we forget to turn around and notice what's going on in the mind, then we're just going to stay in this endless circle of samsara, of getting and wanting and trying and doing. But turning around—oh, craving is like this. Nothing to do about it. It's so much more simple in a way. Craving is like this. You don't have to hate yourself for craving. And certainly don't expect it to stop—that would mean you're an arahan if it stops. So cut yourself some slack. But be willing to simply recognize: craving is like this. Dosa—that's my favorite—is like this. This has been really, really important for me. It's like this.

Then it may not be any of those. It may just be hearing, seeing, smelling, pain, quietness in the breath, jaggedness in the breath. "What should I do? How should I meditate?" Worry. It's like this. That's Ajahn Sumedho's language.

The real work of meditation is not so much about getting any technique perfect, acquiring an experience and holding to it. All the techniques are just to help us turn around and notice what's going on in the mind. And in that noticing, the steadiness—the steadiness of noticing and its continuity—of course we space out, but the intention to be steady, I cannot say enough how key that is. Because in the long steadiness of mindful awareness, wisdom arises naturally.

Like that example I gave of seeing the craving—that's just a little piece of paññā, wisdom arising. Not "Oh, craving, I need this," but rather, "Oh, wow, look at the nature of craving. It's like this. It's an empty promise." It doesn't seduce when you see that. And there's a moment of purity, a moment of peace. That didn't come because I decided I had to cultivate a moment of wisdom and get to peace. It came because there was simply: craving's like this, wanting's like this, peace is like this.

Thich Nhat Hanh has a great line. He says understanding—paññā, wisdom—does not arise as the result of thinking. It's the result of the long process of conscious awareness. The long, steady, ongoing process of conscious awareness. Sometimes understanding can be translated into thoughts, so we have an insight and think about it a little bit. But often thoughts are too rigid and limited to carry much understanding. The main point I wanted to make there is that understanding arises as a result of just the long, steady process of conscious awareness.

And conscious awareness doesn't care what the object of awareness is. That can be so incredibly freeing. Because it really means we don't have to be so worried or controlling about what is arising in our experience—how focused I am, whether I'm experiencing bliss or pain, whether I'm thinking, whether the quality of my fantasies is really disgusting, whether I'm still sleepy. Awareness doesn't care. A long process of conscious awareness. Sitting, walking, eating. Of course you space out.

I'm not saying that. But the willingness to not be so entranced by the objects, by what's happening, by our reactions to them, and to just get more interested in the mind that's observing—this is the key.

This is from Wang Po, who was a Chinese Chan master: "This pure mind shines forever with the radiance of its own perfection. But most people are not aware of this. They think the mind is just the faculty that sees, hears, feels, and knows. So blinded by their own sight, by their hearing, by their feeling and knowing, people don't perceive the radiance of the source."

As Sakyong Mipham Rinpoche says, most of our life our attention is turned out, out, out—to other people, to experiences. Or even when we're here in meditation, it's out in a way to how is the breath, how is the sensation, what's happening in the experience, how can it be better? Turn around and notice the mind that's noticing. And in that, the natural state is actually non-clinging, is actually peace. It's just important for us to be willing to recognize that. "Honor" is perhaps too fancy a word, but just to acknowledge those moments when there's wakefulness, sense of presence, and no big pushing, pulling, or "me-ing" going on. It could feel sublime. It could feel just kind of neutral. It could be peaceful. It could be alert. It could last for a while. It could just be for a second. It doesn't matter.

As Ajahn Buddhadasa says—he calls this voidness, voidness of sense of self—generate a contentment with voidness. Just notice it. Because when we bring to our techniques of meditation, whatever technique we do, when we do it with what Tejaniya calls right attitude, which is a mind that is just willing to be with what's happening with the intention to understand rather than to judge—or to use Ajahn Sumedho's language:

"Oh, frustration is like this. Hating my practice is like this. Aversion to the sound of that person stomping up the stairs and hating their guts and writing a letter to the management is like this"—there's nothing that awareness can't notice.

And when you say, "I don't know, I can't figure out what's going on in that confusion"—it's like this. You just step back. To me, actually, I quit trying to name it so precisely when I realize I'm all caught up trying to figure it out. I just get big. Oh, dosa. Wanting. And that's plenty, because it's moved the entrancement from involvement with the object to "Oh, what's going on in the mind that's aware?"

And so our meditation is really—all our techniques are really—about helping us tune in more to both the mind that's confused and suffering and the moments of mind that's pure, that's peaceful, that's non-clinging. It's about access to freedom and recognizing and trusting that potential. It's not always having to be some incredibly deeply concentrated state. It doesn't have to come from some incredibly breaking-you-open anatta experience.

Again, as Buddhadasa says, we all experience many, many moments of this voidness every day. Every day. Just notice. And then notice the next moment: "Aha, 232 moments of voidness." Okay, that's a moment of being. "Okay, another moment of being—7,256,000 moments of being." But it's not, luckily, about numbers.

Luckily, one of my teachers years ago said, "A spark of truth burns up a mountain of lies." And it's true. That's why just a moment of insight is just a shift of perception, stepping out of that limited view, out of the assumptions we don't know we have, and just seeing in a different way. And that has far more power than the amount of time the mind spends in that perception. It just breaks something open.

Many people have talked about insights they've had—some sense of real anatta or some sense of really knowing impermanence. They say, "Well, it's not here right now, but there's a way I can access the memory that isn't just intellectual." It's really like we can kind of re-remember, viscerally, cellularly: "Oh yeah, you know." And that's a useful thing, because we spend plenty of time re-remembering the other way. So that's actually very helpful.

So our practice—we use the techniques. We need to focus sometimes, because how do you watch the mind? How do you even know you have a mind? You're talking about noticing pleasant and wanting. How do you even know that you're here in this room, never mind these subtleties we talk about seeing?

So sure, sometimes we need technique. We need to be with the breath or the body or hearing to bring in some focus, to bring in some stability. We might deliberately talk about opening and being with changing objects. We use technique—but not to perfect technique and not to achieve experience. Technique is just a way to ask, "Oh, what's going on in the mind?" It's like we get more interested. Almost like we fall in love with awareness, rather than being so in love with experience. In fact, love and devotion is sometimes a wonderful way into this opening. We'll talk more about that another time. But learning to trust it is really huge. Really huge.

And this is what we call cultivation of mind. So purify the mind—that doesn't mean get out the pickaxe and start digging away at the aversion and the clinging and start judging yourself. It's not personal. None of it's personal. We're just watching how nature manifests. When this happens and there's no mindfulness, when the mind is wanting, this is where it goes—into clinging. But when all clinging is like this, that awareness is always available. It isn't dependent on deep shamatha or samadhi. It isn't dependent really on anything except remembering. And that's why the continuity is so helpful. First we just remember, "Oh yeah, oh yeah," and then it starts to take on a momentum of its own.

So just a couple of things, a couple of hints in practicing in this way, to make it seem not so esoteric, hopefully. The way Sayadaw U Tejaniya talks about being aware of awareness, often that can sound like something really esoteric. We're looking for awareness to be aware of, and it can really get very frustrating—and also become a kind of infinite regression.

So I just want to share the way he talks about it, which is incredibly simple. Someone says to him, "I don't know how to be aware of awareness, I don't know where to put my attention." He says, the mind cannot be found anywhere. Trying to find it is a futile exercise. It's like trying to find your glasses when you're actually wearing them. The mind isn't something you can take hold of and look at. You're getting confused because you're looking for something other than what is there—sort of like my friend looking for the mind, the citta, some kind of thing, some bubble you can get hold of.

So this is his example for awareness of awareness. He says to this person, just put your hands together like this. So try it, if you can bear it. Just put your hands together like that. Okay, can you feel the sensations where they touch? Yes? First, how much effort does that take? Not a lot, right? Just feeling the sensations.

Okay. Now, do you recognize that you're feeling the sensations? Don't double-think it—just, do you recognize you're feeling the sensations? Stay simple, for the love of God. Yes? Okay. That's awareness of awareness. How hard is that? You're aware of the sensation and you know it. That's awareness of awareness—not looking for a thing. Just awareness of awareness, very simple.

So he says, don't try hard to look for awareness. You relax and see that it's already there. We find being aware of the mind difficult only because we lack practice. So that's what he's talking about—being aware of the mind. It's not that hard, right? So when we're being with the breath, or being with the sound, with whatever—there's hearing.

When you know that you're hearing, that's awareness of the awareness of hearing. The next piece is that this just becomes more natural. That quality of effort that was there when I asked, "Do you feel the sensations and know it?"—it doesn't have to be a really precise, driven focus, just a relaxed recognition. That's the quality he talks about maintaining.

Now, the other important piece of this is twenty-four seven, not just once in a while. Once in a while, as we always say with continuity, when it gets difficult or we space out, you don't see change. The steadiness is what allows for reality, for nature to reveal itself, for wisdom to arise.

So in the in-between times—in the walking, in the sitting, in the eating, in the yogi jobs, whatever—sometimes the mind might be more focused and really precise, other times not. It doesn't matter. The key is just this remembering, remembering yourself.

So you're trying to be mindful and feel and do the pots, and you're getting all lost in the mind's irritation. That's it. You don't have to go in there and take it apart and see the pleasant and the unpleasant. In a sitting, in a quiet time, yeah, that might reveal itself. Other times, it's much more general. But it's not the object that matters. It's that knowing. Just that awareness of knowing.

And as we go on with that, it gets a little momentum itself, and then when there's aversion in the knowing or wanting in the knowing, it actually becomes more and more obvious. So then it moves from knowing the sensations to knowing wanting. Fine, fine, fine.

And in this way, it's the same with the samādhi. It's always just like this. It's not about trying to make it different. It's not about meditation as a way to confirm myself, as a way to make myself feel better, as a way to get somewhere. It's just this sense of shifting the paradigm, stepping out of the habit of experience and liking and disliking and having experience make me happy and confirm me and getting somewhere and putting in effort to achieve a certain result and me doing the doing—to just recognizing nature's happening all the time, awareness is happening, noticing it.

It really gets to where—oh, aversion in the mind?—I feel happy to notice that. There's just this sense of ease of noticing whatever it is that's happening. Life stops in these moments. I'm not saying it's steady state, okay? But notice, just like Buddhadāsa says, generate a contentment. He says with voidness; I'm saying with awareness. Awareness that's with right attitude, awareness that's just this being with what is, not driven by wanting, by striving, by aversion—generating a contentment with that, almost a love of it.

And then whatever is happening, whatever is happening, is our practice, is our door to awakening, is a door to non-clinging, the heart of peace. Whatever is happening, there's no way your practice can't be good enough. Because it just doesn't matter. Awareness can meet all of it.

That quotation from Sayadaw—I wanted to end with it: when something arises in consciousness and it's seen with awareness, seen as "it's like this," that breaks the habit of self-referencing, of judging, of clinging. So any experience can introduce us once again to awareness. It's always available. That's the miracle of mindfulness, as Thích Nhất Hạnh says.

CHAPTER 42

Perception of Impermanence

Carol Wilson · 58 min

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson examines the Buddha's teaching that when the perception of impermanence (anicca) is truly developed and cultivated, it leads to complete liberation—eliminating sensual lust, lust for existence, ignorance, and the conceit 'I am.' She emphasizes that the key word is 'perception': intellectual understanding of impermanence, while helpful, doesn't free the heart and mind. True insight operates on a cellular level, shifting how we actually experience reality.
>
> Wilson explores why we habitually fail to perceive impermanence despite its obviousness. She identifies several factors: our mind's craving for stability and familiarity; resistance to the sadness and grief that can accompany recognizing change; misperception that assumes stasis between moments of attention; and simple inattention that prevents us from seeing the constant flux. Drawing on the Dalai Lama's teaching about 'momentariness,' she illustrates how we're surprised when things end because we perceived them as steady in the meantime—like a time-lapse film of a flower that reveals there is never any stasis, only continuous opening.
>
> The talk offers practical guidance for cultivating accurate perception through steady, moment-to-moment bare attention—what Wilson calls 'the ultimate renunciation.' She shares the touching story of Ānanda weeping at the Buddha's impending death, showing how even grief at impermanence is natural and human. Rather than leading to fear, she suggests that truly perceiving anicca opens us to tender appreciation for the fragility and beauty of life, allowing us to love 'what is lovely and will not last.'

Tonight I want to talk about one of the famous three characteristics of existence that the Buddha spoke of so often: impermanence, or anicca.

If you read any of the suttas at all, you see how incredibly often the Buddha speaks about the importance, really the centrality, of coming to understand and truly to have insight into this truth of impermanence. One way he says it: "Bhikkhus, when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated, it eliminates all sensual lust. It eliminates all lust for existence. It eliminates all ignorance. It uproots all conceit of 'I am' when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated."

So those four things are basically saying that's complete liberation of heart and mind: eliminating lust, lust for existence, uprooting ignorance, uprooting all conceit of "I am."

But what I think is really interesting about this particular quotation is the way he says it's the perception of impermanence that we need to develop and cultivate—the emphasis on perception. So I want to talk a little bit about perception, and how accurate perception is really the nature of insight. Then we'll explore the perception of impermanence and ask: why don't we perceive it, if that's how things are?

Perception is one of the five aggregates that arise in every moment, which the Buddha talked about as comprising a human being. The aggregates are a whole other talk, but briefly: rupa is form, and then the mental qualities arising every moment are consciousness, perception, vedana, and sankhara.

Consciousness is simply the knowing. When there's an ear and there's a sound, consciousness—the knowing of the sound—comes together. Perception is that moment of recognition based on memory and experience. So say, if you hear this sound of a bell: there's hearing, and just "bell"—knowing it's a bell. That's the perception. It might be stronger: "Oh, that's the bell in the meditation hall, that's the Spirit Rock bell," or just knowing "bell." It may be in words or not, but that knowing of what it is—that's what's called perception. This arises, as the Buddha said, with every consciousness.

The third mental quality is vedana, this feeling tone, this feeling experience as pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. It's a mental feeling activity. And then the fourth is all the other mental formations—sankhara.

So perception arises in every moment of conscious experience, and perception is really key. Remember the other night I mentioned how the Eightfold Path begins with right view, often translated as wise understanding. But personally, I really like the way it works in English as "right view"—like actually seeing. We use "see" to cover all the senses when we mean to understand: seeing accurately, perceiving accurately.

So right view—for example, the perception of anicca, the perception of impermanence—would be when in a moment we're actually perceiving the constant flux, the constantly changing nature of things.

Of course, we're not constantly perceiving this, are we? We're not always even aware of what we're perceiving. Often the perceiving is just assumed in the background, because it's happening every moment. But when we talk about the nature of insight—after all, this is translated as insight meditation, so some of you might be waiting, "When's it going to happen?" It's happening all the time. It's not such a big thing.

Insight isn't that, for instance, until you have it, everything is kind of static and unchanging, but when you finally achieve a certain depth of practice, then impermanence opens up to you and everything starts moving and flowing where before it was static. You know that doesn't make sense, right? The perception shifts, but reality or the nature of things hasn't changed at all. We're just perceiving differently.

So the nature of insight is not a thinking about, not intellectualizing, but it's on the level of "Oh, it's like this." You know when you've been mulling over a problem, trying to figure it out—whether it's in math, or how to do three things you have to do in your day, or any kind of problem? You're thinking, you're figuring, you're writing it down, you just can't figure it out. Then you let go, you put it down, and that's when all of a sudden something goes on in the background, and suddenly you see a possibility that never came to the thinking mind. That's an insight.

A Dharma insight works in the same way, but it's just seeing the nature of things as they really are. It doesn't have to stay, but it changes at least a little bit how we think about things and our view of things—like those trompe l'oeil images, the classic kind of drawing where if you look at it one way, it looks like a vase.

The vase is dark and the outlines around it are white. And then when you shift the other way, it's a profile of two faces looking at each other. Both are there, aren't they, in the thing? It just depends how you look. When you've only seen one and the mind hasn't kind of relaxed, the eyes haven't relaxed and you don't see the other, you only see the one. Once you've seen them both, you've seen them both. And even if you can only look at one at a time, you know the other one's there. It has an effect on how you think about that drawing, how you understand it, the assumptions you make, the decisions you might make. I mean, no big decisions from that, hopefully, but you get a sense of what I mean. So that's how it is with insights.

Taking insight into impermanence as an example—these will be just on some moments, and they can arise in a gross way or in a subtle way in your practice. It's no one way. These kinds of shifts happen all the time. But suddenly you just notice, oh, my moods are changing all the time, things are changing all the time, there's nothing really solid here. When you're really seeing it as an insight, on a deep insight level, there's not fear because it's just, oh, that's just how it is. There's just not a question about it. That's just how it is. When we're first intimating into it—and I'll talk about that later—but when the insight isn't quite there, then sometimes fear does come.

But this level of perception is so key. The Buddha also talked about how it affects our thought and our views. He talks about inverted or perverted, upside-down perceptions that we have a habit of. One of which is the inverted perception that uninstructed worldlings—which is a word they use a lot, puthujjana, uninstructed worldlings, not completely enlightened yet—have a tendency to perceive what is anicca, what is constantly changing, as unchanging, as steady.

This distortion of perception that we think about leads to distortion, inversion of citta, of mind—how we think about it. Maybe not even consciously, but we're kind of assuming permanence and then that's how we think about stuff. Oh, in two years this is what I'm going to be doing next May. I mean, we do that. Now, we can do that by assuming permanence, or we can do it knowing, as Ajahn Chah says, "This is not certain." Two different ways of relating. But when we're assuming permanence, we're perceiving permanence, we think about it as permanent, and then how we think about things leads to diṭṭhi, or view.

Remember, the first step of the Eightfold Path is sammādiṭṭhi, wise view. Wise also compares with micchādiṭṭhi, wrong view. Wrong in that it's mistaken, thinking that there's permanence.

So in a moment of insight, even a little moment of seeing the face and the vase and seeing, oh, there's two different ways of looking here—that shifts how we think about that picture, and that'll shift our larger view. You wouldn't get into an argument with someone, "No, it's only this way, I know it's this way," because you know it's both ways.

And so when insight arises in this way, it's not that that particular way of viewing, say, impermanence, is then with us forever. Because why is it not with us forever? Nothing is forever, including us. But it has an effect on the thinking, on the mindstream, and on the view. It changes something fundamentally.

But that's also why those of you who've been in practice quite a long time, after a while you think, "I keep having the same insights. When am I going to have an insight into something new? All right, I've seen impermanence, I've seen anattā, let's move it along." And there's not really that much new to have insight into. Our personality, please, it just keeps on cycling. But again and again, from different angles, it goes deeper. It cuts through the wrong view, the wrong conceptions, the mistaken perceptions more and more. And the more accurate perceptions become more accessible.

So, on that level, when the Buddha is talking about how it's the perception of impermanence that really liberates our hearts, our minds, from clinging—clinging to sense pleasures, clinging to wanting to become, wanting to become a certain state, wanting to have a certain thing—that eliminates ignorance, that eliminates māna, the conceit "I am," which can be very, very subtle. Just, "I am the one who sees impermanence." You know? The mind does that.

And then we go, "Oh, my mind does that." It's just the conceit "I am." The perception.

And this is why practice is so important—because this perception is not something we can talk ourselves into. And we've all, I would imagine, of the three characteristics—of impermanence, of dukkha, of unreliability, of anatta, of not-self—the most intellectually accessible seems to be impermanence. We've all heard ten million talks on it. We could all give ten million talks on it. We could all make a million lists of how everything's impermanent. How much difference has that made in terms of freeing our hearts and minds?

It doesn't work on an intellectual level. That's helpful information. Everything's impermanent—I know that. How come I don't live from that? Maybe you do live from that. How come I don't live from that? Because on a cellular level, I don't always get it. Sometimes I do. But sometimes that perception of impermanence isn't accessible, and the mind is acting and making decisions from—not really recognizing it—the wrong view of assuming permanence.

So we can't talk ourselves into it intellectually. But the intellectual information might give us the stimulus to keep looking, to see what's going on. So I'm not going to give you a million examples about how things are impermanent, because I think we all know that. I just want to talk about other aspects that come up in my mind.

One thing that's always interesting to me—and I'm not trying to tell you anything, I'm just hoping that if any of this is interesting, it sparks investigation, a moment-to-moment investigation into your own experience. You don't necessarily believe anything I say. But what's always of interest to me is: even intellectually knowing everything's changing, sitting and walking and being in our life with so much change, why do we cling? Why is there this habit in the mind of clinging?

We know the classical dependent origination, the one of vedana—when there's not mindfulness and there's pleasant feeling, the mind tilts into it, begins to cling. That's true, that's on one level. But I'm talking on a little more psychological level, maybe, just from my own experience. Because I find it really poignant.

I think Sally said something like this last night—it kind of all blends for us, just like it does for you. It's something about how even if what we're doing doesn't really lead to freedom from suffering, on some level the motivation for our thoughts and actions, and really the motivation for clinging, is this deep yearning for happiness, for peace. We're not setting out to make ourselves suffer. We don't say, "How can I spin in samsara a few more endless eons?" The clinging is an expression of our deep yearning for happiness, for peace. It's an unfortunate expression, but that's where it's coming from. It's not because we're stupid jerks—it's because somehow we're really trying to find fulfillment and peace and ease in this life. And it's so poignant, because of course it's the thing that keeps the dis-ease going.

Something I've seen in myself—you might see different things in yourself—but someone brought it up also in an interview, just mentioning how the mind likes a feeling of stability. The mind likes familiarity. The mind likes comfort. It doesn't like the sense that everything's constantly changing and there's nowhere to land, and as soon as you notice one thing, the next thing, and the next thing. This sense of everything so erratic and nowhere to land and everything so up in the air—the mind doesn't really like that. Unreliability. You want something to land in. You want something to just take a breath and say, "Let's just stay like this for a few minutes."

Even if it's an unpleasant personality pattern—I think Sally said this too last night—at least, my God, it's familiar. Let's just hang out here for a few minutes. Our response to the unreliability of life is to hold on.

And of course, a lot of our practice is just to turn around and explore how the holding on actually strengthens the sense of dis-ease and the sense of fear. Holding on—"it better not go, it better not go"—clinging and fear, they're right close together. But I find it not a judgment, but really quite poignant. Clinging to any moment, as if for a sense of something to hide the passing, to hide the impermanence.

We actually don't want to see that—the passing of things, the impermanence. Or we cling to our illusion of control, the sense that we know what's going to happen, that at least we know the next thing. We don't want to have this constant opening into the unknown. Give me a break. Let me just know what's going to happen next. Look at the schedule. Know what we're going to do.

Have you kind of sussed out how you spend your day? What's the best time to go to lunch? How's it going to be? When do you take your shower? And it gets totally thrown off if someone gets off rhythm and they're in the shower at the time you decided to take yours. It happened the other morning—"No, no, this is my shower time. No one's supposed to be in." Everyone gets their little sense of familiarity. We do it in life, and we do the same thing in practice.

There's a quotation I love from somewhere in the suttas that I've not been able to find now. People always ask me, and I'm just telling you I can't find it, but I didn't make it up. Somewhere, the Buddha says: "The search for a resting place is burning. Not to need one is cool and peaceful." The search for the resting place is burning. Not to need one is cool and peaceful.

There's a lovely poem by Galway Kinnell—I'll only read a little of it because I just love how he phrases it. It's called "Little Sleep's-Head Sprouting Hair in the Moonlight":

You scream, waking from a nightmare. When I sleepwalk into your room and pick you up and hold you up in the moonlight, you cling to me hard, as if clinging could save us.

As if clinging could save us. That's how it feels, isn't it? As if clinging could save us. But really, it's more that clinging creates us. That's actually the thing. I have a good friend who said, "I want, I need, therefore I am." Look and see.

So when I examine why we don't perceive impermanence, why this perception is so hidden from us, one reason is what I was just talking about—a kind of denial, a discomfort with constant change, and looking to the wrong thing for security, looking to clinging.

Another factor, and this is just something I've noticed in myself, this isn't some Buddhist list: When we completely die into the perception of impermanence, then it's just freedom. It's no problem. But when we're perceiving it a little, kind of back and forth, then for many of us at times there's fear. Or even more often, when something we were really counting on, something familiar, goes away—someone dies, things change—there's often a real sense of grief, sadness, poignancy. And our general habit of resisting unpleasant or painful emotions comes right into the experience.

You see things changing, there's a sense of sadness about it, and then right away comes the micchā-diṭṭhi, the wrong view: "Oh, it must be wrong, because I feel sad. It can't be right. There's something wrong with this scenario." Sometimes we can get caught in that, hiding a little bit from the sadness rather than opening and seeing, "Yeah, it's ending. That's how things are."

But sadness is just part of life too. It's just another arising emotional, physical experience. When we're not afraid of sadness—and I think for most of us humans, until we're really completely free from clinging—many times when some major aspect of life goes away, a person, a situation, or sometimes even an aspect of our personality we were really comfortable with, there's almost a sense of grieving, a longing, a sadness. If we simply open to that, it's fine. It doesn't have to block our perception of impermanence. But if we recoil and shut down attention when the sadness or grief comes, then we've shut down noticing.

I want to read a couple of examples because this is really normal. It's what happens to everyone, this sense of sadness at great change. There's a lovely passage in the suttas when the Buddha has announced that he's going to die in three months.

Ananda was the Buddha's devoted attendant for twenty-five years. He's a lovely figure in the suttas—partly enlightened, but not completely enlightened. Yet he's always with the Buddha. He's the one who remembers verbatim all of the Buddha's sermons. In some of the suttas, if you read them, whenever the text begins "thus have I heard," it's said that that's Ananda's voice, actually, speaking after the Buddha died. Perhaps I'll talk about him another time. I really like Ananda. He's very human. He kind of humanizes things.

So at this point, the Buddha has announced he's going to die, and he's sitting giving a talk when he notices that somehow Ananda has disappeared. He says to the other monks, "Where's Ananda?"—although of course he knew where Ananda had gone. The text says, "Ananda, overpowered by grief, went aside and clasped the doorjamb and wept." He was weeping, saying, "My teacher, who I've been with so long, is leaving. My teacher is leaving us. How will I go on without my teacher?" It's really very touching. This famous scene is often depicted in Buddhist art.

Of course the Buddha called him back. "Ananda, come back." And then he said just what you'd expect him to say: "Do not sorrow, Ananda. Have I not told you many times that everything changes and vanishes? How could something that has come into being not be destroyed? It is not possible."

But it's not like he's chastising him. He's just telling him this is really how it is. And then he goes on to deeply appreciate Ananda: "For a long time you've attended on the Tathagata gladly, sensitively, sincerely, without reserve, with deeds, speech, and thoughts of loving kindness. You've made great merit, Ananda, and you will soon be free." So he's not saying Ananda is foolish, but rather, "Ananda, how many times have I said?" There are other examples of this too that I might mention later.

It's just human nature. When confronted with loss, when confronted with change, sorrow and clinging and fear may come up. We don't need to be afraid of that. That's not a problem. And when we can allow and open into the sorrow, into the fear, a kind of tenderness comes—a tenderness and appreciation for the fragility and vulnerability of all of life, and for ourselves. At times, it transmutes from sorrow into this tenderness that is open to all of life. All of life.

That's only possible when clinging isn't trying to pick out one thing and say, "This one has to stay. The rest can go, but this one's got to stay." That kind of grasping shuts us down, hardens our heart.

So for me, when I notice sadness, I try to let it be a wake-up call. What's not okay in this moment? What's changing? What am I resisting? Not to say, "Oh, you should know better"—not like that. But more like the Buddha said to Ananda: it's not possible that any conditions that came together won't go apart. That's how nature is. And sadness also will come together and go apart. It's just another arising aspect of nature. I use that as a way to help me wake up.

Another way that we don't perceive accurately is just plain misperception—just perceiving wrongly. This isn't always due to clinging, but sometimes due to not really careful presence, not careful moment-to-moment presence. Like I was saying, if we're not used to perceiving impermanence, then the thought that things are permanent operates as a view in the background. We're not consciously thinking that, but for instance, there's an assumption that when I get up in the morning—which is already an assumption, that I'm going to get up in the morning—this hall will still be here. And we walk up and it's still here. Mostly stuff like that happens.

I do have my schedule for 2010. It's a trip. And very often, maybe more often than not, things actually happen as planned. That kind of blows me away. I remember once making an appointment to meet my friend at the Bangkok airport at midnight on some date. And it happened. I flew from Hawaii and he came from God knows where, and we met at the airport in Bangkok at midnight.

How does this happen? Knowing that we don't know it's going to happen is very different from assuming permanence.

So we don't notice—this is the point I was trying to get to—that there's something the Dalai Lama said once in a talk I was hearing: we don't actually notice moment to moment the momentariness of change. So even when we are thinking, or thinking that we're noticing change, it's more like, "Well, this came into being, it lasts a while, and then it goes away." Right? That's change. Okay, this lasts a while—time in the middle? No, there's no "lasts a while." Nothing lasts a while. There's absolutely no stasis. That's what the Dalai Lama was saying. We're really surprised when something ends because we were perceiving it as steady in the meantime. And that's misperception. That's not really seeing the perception of impermanence.

I was having a conversation with someone today just about this. It was a lovely conversation. And the person was saying that they were really noticing there's absolutely no stasis. And what they were remembering—it was like a metaphor for this—was having seen in the past a time-lapse film of something like a flower beginning to grow, and growing, and opening, and budding, and dying. When the film is speeded up, you get to see the whole process. But what was so obvious in that process is it's not like it grows a little and then it stops. Then it's bud, and then there's bud. And then all of a sudden it goes from bud, and then it's flower. So there's bud and stability, then flower and stability, then dead. No—completely opening, opening, opening, opening every single moment. There is no stasis whatsoever. And in every opening you could say that's the ending of something else, but you can't even say "this is the ending and this is the beginning." That's too solid. That's too separate. It's just opening, opening, opening, opening. That's what really is the perception of impermanence.

And the sense of watching the time-lapse film from here is also not quite accurate. We're watching everything changing, right? What's wrong with this picture? A friend said—I remember quite some years ago, someone who'd been doing a lot of practice for many, many years—she said, "Yeah, for years I've been seeing that everything around is changing. And suddenly, this time I suddenly got it: Oh, I'm also part of that constant opening flow. There's no me standing outside watching it. It's just this. This. All of us, every moment."

When I was trying to describe a moment of citta the other night—just a moment of consciousness, mind arising and everything that's happening within it—that's it. It's just this. There's no inside, there's no outside, there's no this watching that. It's just constant opening, opening, opening, opening. That's it.

From that perception, in that perception, there's no problem. How could there be a problem? What's the problem? What's to want? Wanting doesn't arise at all because it just doesn't make any sense whatsoever. Aversion to what? And what is there solid to have aversion? You're not thinking these things. It's just so obvious how it is.

That perception of anicca really does shift something. Yeah, it goes away again, and then there's me, and there's you, and it's solid, and it's time, and "Is she going to go over time talking?" and "I need my shower," and all of that. And there's wanting again, and there's aversion again.

But then there's the recognition that it was a real perception of nature as it is. This too is nature as it is, but it's not the only way. And that perception—we can't make it happen, but we can remember it. Sometimes just the memory is enough. This is where faith comes in, where verified faith comes in. When it's not like that anymore, when you can't perceive it that way, if your mind starts going, "I made that up"—well, you didn't make it up. You didn't make it up. Just remember: oh yeah, sometimes it's like that. And it's always like that, but sometimes we perceive that it's like that. And that starts to have an effect on the mind stream, on the solidity of our views and assumptions.

So that's part of how we misperceive—by not seeing that there is no stasis, the absolute absoluteness really, of change, of opening.

The third thing I wanted to mention that supports misperception, that supports not perceiving impermanence, is actually inattention. Just how we are. We pay attention for a little while, we're mindful for a little while, and then we're not. Then we come back again, and then we don't. There's a reason we're all talking all the time about continuity, continuity, continuity. It's not just because we want to keep you quiet and working hard. Continuity doesn't mean you don't space out—of course we can't control that. But it's more that willingness to just notice. Notice, notice, notice, very steadily. Because it's lack of continuity of mindfulness—not continuity of slowness, not continuity of any particular experience, but continuity, steadiness of mindfulness—lack of that continuity is what hides impermanence. It's what feeds the perception of permanence, because we don't really notice so much.

Let me give some examples. And again, explore this. Don't believe me or not believe me—well, you do whatever you do—but explore it. Please, I beg you, explore it.

Take emotion. You're having a day, or a couple of days, where a really difficult emotional knot has been coming up, as does happen in practice. Maybe some memories come and you start to open to a particular feeling of rage or pain or memories that hadn't come before—or maybe they had come all too often before, so you couple the emotional knot with total self-judgment and disgust that it's still here. Or maybe it's some kind of happy feeling, some real lightness. It doesn't have to be difficult. But something's coming, quite frequently arising.

And you come in to talk, and sometimes it'll show up—it often can show up when you're talking in an interview. You say, "The last day was just so filled with negativity and self-judgment. The last day I've just been spinning in arrogance and pride." When we think about it back, we really feel like that's an accurate description, because it was frequently there. And then as we think of it—oh yeah, arrogance is like this—as if it's the same way all the time.

Arrogance comes up, some thought comes, and then a different thought comes, and we'll say, "But it's still—don't get into the content, it's all still arrogance." We'll say that, right? But it is different thought, different conditions, different feeling in the body, different intensity, different way it comes, different way it goes. Even if we're really mindful of all that, at some point we get distracted, or we get bored, or we get fed up with it. "I think I just—this is enough with the arrogance. I really need to calm down. I need to shift my attention." Sometimes we do need to, but sometimes it's just: eh, enough already with this. And then we go for a walk, or we open to seeing, or it's meal-time and we go and eat. And we didn't really have this moment-to-moment steadiness of awareness.

So we're eating, and we're back, and during all that time there was no arrogance, but we're not really paying that much attention. Then we come back, we sit down, and after two seconds—oh, there's that arrogance. My God, all day with the arrogance. But we didn't really notice. If you stay steady, you'll see at some point it really fades, it really goes, and it's really not there. It's really not there when it's not there. Instead, there was hunger, or greed, or happiness, or neutrality, or just hearing. And if we're really present in that moment, we see: others hearing. You don't have to think "there's no arrogance"—you don't have to think that—but you might just notice: oh, that's not here now.

And sometimes we're almost afraid to look. "Oh no, if I look I know it's really lurking underneath." Don't you think that sometimes? "I didn't notice it during the meal, but that's just because I was avoiding it. It was sitting there in a big lump, and as soon as I came and sat again, there it was." So then we assume it was here all day.

Does this sound at all familiar?

And so if we're staying steady, you'll notice actually when you were eating or whatever, it wasn't there. And the thought, "oh, there's arrogance there"—that's a thought, that's not the arrogance.

So with steadiness, we really see the conditions come together, the arrogance comes, but it's a little different every time. It starts to fade away, and we're afraid to look because we don't want to see it again, so we space out. But if you kept looking, you'd notice it really does go away. And when it's gone, it's really gone. And then it comes back. That's okay. The more you know it comes and goes, the less horrific it is when it's there, because you really know it's going to go.

Even though with mental states—I think James kind of talked about this, and I've noticed it myself—one of the qualities of many mental states, really pleasant ones too, but the strong ones, is that from within that mental state, it feels as if it's going to last forever. Doesn't it? I have a certain mental state where I just feel overwhelmed. I just can't. I can't do this another minute. It comes up in my life or it comes up in practice. And the quality of that mental state is that it's really unbearable. Whatever it is, I can't. And I used to totally believe it. It just gave such a good line. It was so convincing. And now when it starts—"oh no, it's unbearable, there's no way"—my mind goes, "oh, this is a mental state." It still feels the same, but as soon as I can say this is a mental state, I do absolutely know from all these years of watching that no mental state stays. I mean, really. You just have to reflect on one day. How many mental states have you had today?

Although I have a joke with Joseph, I have to say—it just came into my mind, it's so here. Once we were teaching together at a retreat, and we just have very different temperaments. Joseph and I were talking privately, and he said—we'd just been sitting—"So how many mental states or how many moves did you have in that last sitting?" And I thought, well, I don't know, maybe fifteen or twenty. And he goes, "Oh my God." He said, "Maybe I had one." And so we have this joke. If I said, "No mental state lasts—how many have you had all day?" he would have cracked up because he would have thought, "Maybe none. I don't really have any mental states today."

So maybe you didn't have many mental states today. Maybe you're like that. But look back over the last year. Even he, over the last year, right? You had some mental states. Definitely some mental states came. Have they lasted? That's my point, anyway. Have they lasted? Has any mental state lasted your whole life? Even a week? I want to challenge you to say if it even lasts a day, if it even lasts an hour, if it even lasts five minutes without changing.

And so the steadiness, the willingness to keep coming back, keep coming back just to this moment, the steadiness of mindfulness, the continuity—that's when I said the wisdom arises, paññā comes by itself. It does. It's not like you have to spend every minute thinking, "Let's see the beginning, let's see the end, let's see the change." That drives me crazy. But if you just stay steady, steady, steady—what's happening now? What's happening now?

What's the mind noticing now? Anicca is simply how things are. That's how nature is. We can't help but notice it—that's just how things are, if we give awareness a chance by cultivating the steadiness of it.

When I talk about awareness, about mindfulness, it's that sense of not looking for impermanence, not looking for anything, but that bare attention that's willing to just die into this present moment. Whether it's burning, whether it's arrogance, whether it's thinking, whether it's fear, whether it's joy, whether it's boredom, whether it's just sensation, whether it's hearing—just now, free of concept, free of the story. If there's story, it's all about me. That's the next arising thought. So nothing's extra but just that immediacy of present moment bare experience.

Sometimes I think of that as actually the ultimate renunciation, moment to moment. Just renouncing all the stories about me and our descriptions and what's more interesting and what I should do—just burning. Just lifting if you're walking. Just rising if you're breathing. Just hearing. Just that. Just that. Just that.

That quality of present moment, open, surrendered attention is what allows nature to reveal itself. When we're looking for something, when we think we know, all of that just gets in the way. You know Krishnamurti's famous line—that's really what awareness practice is about. In any moment, freedom from the known. Just that willingness to die into whatever's arising now and let nature reveal itself.

This sense of continuity and the willingness to look can show us—using arrogance as an example—but it can be very interesting when we come to see the ideas and the views and the opinions we hold about ourselves, our whole personality belief system. That's called identity view, sakkāya-diṭṭhi in the Pali. I think it was Sally who was saying how often we hold on to even a negative or suffering idea about ourselves just because it's familiar. Often I've seen people wonder, who would I be without my restlessness?

As I said, I've seen often in practice over many years that there are times when a particular view or image or idea I'm holding about myself—that I didn't even know I was holding—becomes visible. "Oh, I'm this kind of a person," or "I'm that kind of a person," or "I couldn't possibly ever be awakened because I'm too hopeless." That's a big one. And when some certain view, just through the steadiness of attention, you see how often it's not there, and it starts to fall apart. At times I've really felt like it's a series of small deaths, really, and it's like a mourning—back to that sense of sadness or poignancy. Mourning some stupid idea I have about myself that only causes suffering, but still, it's who I am. You know—who I am. The steadiness of mindfulness can reveal this stuff.

A friend who was working here one time gave us a great example. A person who self-identified as being an aversive type person, an angry type person. And not only did she self-identify that way, other people said, "Yeah, it's true. You are an aversive type person. You are an angry type person." A long, long-term meditator. She said one time she actually came in here and was sitting during one of these retreats, and it was just this: I'm just going to watch my thoughts. And it was in the back of her mind, "Yeah, I'm really an angry, aversive type person."

So just through one sitting, she just stayed very steady without blaming herself or judging, but just watching moment to moment to moment what was coming up in her mind—the emotions, the thoughts, the moods. And she said, yeah, there was aversion, maybe ten percent of the stuff that came up. There were also many thoughts of generosity, many just kind of neutral thoughts, many thoughts of kindness, of mettā, of compassion. And she came out saying, "Well, that self—I'm an aversive person—completely inaccurate. Limited, wrong view." That's a kind of assuming a solidity, a permanence that just isn't there. We write these stories for ourselves and put ourselves in like the cage of this idea of who we are based on selective perception.

A lot of people, not everybody, but a lot of people, especially in this culture, tend to notice there's a lot of self-judging. I don't know if any of you have ever noticed that, but sometimes we can really get into self-judging. And that's like being hypervigilant for whatever particular thing your mind has decided to judge yourself about. Every time anything remotely touching on that comes up—"Oh yeah, jerk again, oh yeah, again, again." Then you walk out and there are moments of peace, moments of joy.

You go, well, that was nice. That was a pleasant little fluke. But back to the self-judging—that's who I am.

That's what we call selective perception. Picking out the perceptions—not consciously, of course—but picking out the perceptions that fit the unconsciously held view while completely ignoring or overlooking or discounting other ones.

This is the power of moment-to-moment bare attention. We're not picking and choosing, because we can't trust how we would pick and choose. It's just what's happening now, happening now, happening now. That willingness to be present, the insight, the shift of perception, the wisdom—it comes by itself. It really does. We have to do so much less than we think we have to do. But what we do have to do is keep showing up, keep being willing. Can I just meet this moment? And sometimes we can't. That's okay.

Another way we perceive permanence—and this comes about through lack of continuity of awareness, but also because some of the constant change is very subtle and fine. Mahasi Sayadaw speaks of a word in Pali called santati, which refers to the continuity of phenomena. He says we mistake a series of successive phenomena for a single phenomenon. Things happen so fast that they seem like one thing, not changing. We think we're seeing one thing and don't recognize that it's constantly changing.

I'll give an example. If I'm not really making seeing the main focus of my interest, of my awareness at a certain time—just walking around—seeing seems kind of steady state. Seeing, seeing, seeing. It appears fairly continuous. But if I tune into seeing, like we sometimes tune into hearing, actually every single second the visual field is different. It's like a different seeing arising in every single second. It's not the same for two fractions of a second together. But we mostly don't look that closely. It's kind of in the background, taken for granted. And so the assumption we're not even aware of is this steady state of seeing.

Or with sound—this is one you can really notice—where a sound might seem very steady and lasting. When we really tune in, you can feel how it breaks up, rises and falls. You hear the vibrations, feel the vibrations, and you really hear. It's a completely changing, moving phenomenon, even as it seems to be the same sound lasting.

So explore where you might notice this: the sense of phenomena happening seemingly so steady that we don't notice—because we're not looking that carefully—that it's changing.

How do we cultivate the perception of impermanence? The main thing is what I just said: the moment-to-moment willingness to just meet this moment with bare attention. You might also notice, sometimes with a little reflection—not too much thinking, but a little bit reflective from time to time—when we're assuming permanence.

You might look back over the day. How did your mind relate to different experiences? If something comes up and we get locked in fear or dread—oh no, this is going to be going on all day, I can't do two more weeks of this, no way—in that moment, we're assuming permanence. Or we cling to something pleasant and assume ownership of it. Now this is how my practice is. Now this is who I am. Now I'm the person who can concentrate. Assuming permanence. And even if we don't think we're clinging, if when it goes away we suffer, then we know: clinging was there. That's okay, but just knowing what's happening.

Or do we try to repeat a particular experience? Now I've figured out how to meditate. If I come into the hall early in the morning before everybody's here and sit down, then when they come in I can really tune into the hearing and go into this peaceful place, and if no one turns on the lights and if no one coughs, then I can get back into that real... you know what I mean?

As if you could ever replicate all the conditions. Conditions are constantly changing because it's that endlessly opening flow.

And again, even this happened in the time of the Buddha. There's a sutta where a monk who was quite well practiced, named Asaji, was very ill to the point of being about to die. The Buddha went and asked him—it was kind of a common thing they asked—"I hope you're not troubled with remorse or regret in terms of your sila, in terms of your morality."

And he said, "No, not my sila, but I am troubled."

"What are you troubled by?"

He said, "Well, formerly when I was ill, I could keep on tranquilizing the bodily formations. In other words, I could get really concentrated. But now I cannot obtain concentration. And as I cannot obtain concentration, it occurs to me, 'Oh no, let me not fall away. Let me not fall away from the path.' I can't get concentrated." It's really upsetting. The guy's dying.

And the Buddha basically said, "Haven't I told you that conditions are always changing? If you think awakening is based on concentration, it's not." I'm paraphrasing here, but this is basically what he's saying. "Is form permanent or impermanent? Are mental factors permanent or impermanent?" Basically, the conditions are different. Now you can't get concentrated. That's not the point. Insight is the point. So notice the conditions are always changing. Can we just die into this moment's conditions with awareness? Oh, now it's like this. Now it's like this. Now it's like this.

Chokyi Nyima Rinpoche says, "Watch the changeable nature of the mind." Using vedana is a good example. Just notice how much vedana changes—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—and watch how a pleasant vedana can come along and sweep us so quickly into a whole world of thought and pleasure and imagination. Just notice that. And notice how an unpleasant vedana can come along and we're swept into a whole world of judgment and recrimination and disappointment. All just based on this little moment of pleasant or unpleasant.

Now if you can not judge it but just watch how that happens, the constant changing—that's samsara. But you really see there's nothing steady state.

Ajahn Chah has a great practice: to just go through your day gently saying to yourself, "This is uncertain. This is uncertain." Okay, tomorrow I'll get up and I'll come here and sit early in the morning—and this is uncertain. Not to get all intense about it, but just, yes, this too is uncertain. You really never know.

When I was going to Burma, I got an email from a good friend. He said he was really sick and in the hospital, but he'd be better soon and go to Hawaii. I got home and got an email that he died. You know, this is uncertain.

A good friend, long-term marriage, very happy. His wife went out shopping. Her car skidded on ice and she was killed. I mean, you just wake up in the morning and go shopping. This is uncertain.

We all know a million stories like this. Not that we get lost in fear, but just the knowing of we don't know.

So the last question might come up: Why would we want to perceive in this way? Why would we want to live a life where every time our partner's going out shopping, we think, "What if they skid and die?"

No, that's with fear. That's with negativity. But opening to the reality of this perception is not opening into fear and trauma and nowhere to land and "I can't bear it." It frees our hearts and minds to really land with openness, with appreciation, with love—as I said—for the fragility of life, for the beauty of life, for whatever it is that's arising in this moment. Because this is all there is. This is life, in this moment.

It's a kind of radical trust that just right here is the only place truth can be. It's actually a much more alive and tender and connected way to live. Of course it's connected, because there's nothing separate. It's the clinging and the fear that makes it so hard. So we need the willingness to go through that. But really, it's not opening to some horrific "oh my god, everything's just going to die." It's opening to a great appreciation for life as it is.

I want to end with this poem that a yogi reminded me of at the three-month retreat, by Mary Oliver. It sort of gives the feeling—it's not exactly, but it gives the feeling:

Oh, to love what is lovely and will not last.
What a task to ask of anything, or anyone.
Yet it is ours,
and not by the century or the year, but by the hours.

One fall day I heard above me, and above the sting of the wind,
a sound I did not know,
and my look shot upward.
It was a flock of snow geese, winging it faster than the ones we usually see,
and, being the color of snow, catching the sun
so they were, in part at least, golden.
I held my breath
as we do sometimes to stop time when something wonderful has touched us, as with a match which is lit and bright

but does not hurt in the common way, but delightfully,
as if delight were the most serious thing you ever felt.

The geese flew on.
I have never seen them again.
Maybe I will someday, somewhere.
Maybe I won't.
It doesn't matter.
What matters is that when I saw them,
I saw them
as through the veil, secretly, joyfully, clearly.

Let's just sit for a moment.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 43

The Joy of Generosity

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this heartfelt talk, Carol Wilson illuminates why the Buddha consistently taught generosity (dāna) as the first of the three pillars of practice—dāna, sīla, and bhāvanā. Drawing on Bhikkhu Bodhi's scholarship, she explains how dāna serves as the foundation for the entire path to liberation, appearing as the first topic in the Buddha's graduated teachings, the first of the ten pāramīs (perfections), and the precursor to the Noble Eightfold Path. The essence of generosity lies not in what is given but in the purification of intention—cultivating non-clinging, connectedness, and the weakening of greed, hatred, and delusion.
>
> Wilson shares deeply moving personal experiences from monasteries and nunneries in Burma and Thailand, where generosity permeates daily life in face-to-face, joyful exchanges between monastics and laypeople. She recounts stories of Burmese nuns caring for orphaned girls with boundless dedication, villagers immediately offering back rice they had just received, and a young boy solemnly presenting her with a tiny flower. These encounters reveal how generosity becomes contagious—brightening the heart of giver and receiver alike until the distinction between them dissolves.
> The talk also draws on canonical sources, including the story of Anāthapiṇḍika, the Buddha's foremost lay supporter, whose generosity flowed from profound faith rather than expectation of reward. Wilson concludes with the Buddha's teaching on recollecting one's own generosity as a meditation practice that purifies the mind, bringing joy, calm, and collectedness—preparing the heart to receive the deepest Dhamma.

Sally mentioned last night how in the way that the Dhamma has been taught largely in the West, we tend to focus on kind of the end of the three pillars: Dana, Sila, Bhavana. We've tended to focus more on Bhavana and kind of throw in Sila and Dana later on. So I thought tonight I want to actually talk about generosity, about Dana, and the way that the Buddha brought it into his teaching.

I read the short refrain in one of my talks: "Refrain from the unskillful, do good, purify the mind. This is the teaching of all the Buddhas." And of course we think of meditation practice—both insight and shamatha absorption meditation practices work towards purifying the mind, which means changing the habits from greed, from aversion, from hatred, to purifying those habits. But really everything the Buddha taught was towards awakening, towards purifying the mind. As far as I can tell, nothing was extraneous or just for the heck of it or about something else. Everything is about purifying the mind. It's not only meditation.

As Sally said, the three pillars are Dana, generosity; Sila, conscious non-harming, virtuous conduct; and Bhavana, mental cultivation. I want to talk about generosity tonight.

Bhikkhu Bodhi, who is one of the great scholars and translators of the Pali into English of our generation, just knows all the suttas, basically. He talks about the practice of giving and the special place it has in the way that the Buddha speaks about it as being, in a sense, the foundation, the seed of our spiritual development. And it really is the foundation. It says in the suttas, which we read over and over again, that talk on giving was invariably the first topic that the Buddha talked about to people. There are many suttas—and I'll read part of one later—where when he first meets someone, he gives what's called a graduated exposition, basically bringing their mind into enough clarity and upliftment until it's actually ready to hear the deepest dharma. And he always starts with generosity.

The aim of it isn't to say, "You should be a generous person." We all think, "Yeah, that's good, help people in need, let's give, that's good." But it's not just that. It's really a way—the foundation of the pure-hearted mind—that allows us to open, to unfold into freedom, into liberation.

Bhikkhu Bodhi points out that giving, generosity, Dana, is not one of the steps in the Eightfold Path, which seems more the actual moment-to-moment practice of looking at the mind. But he says it is actually the precursor, the foundation, the preparation that underlies and quietly supports the entire endeavor to free the mind from confusion. And then he just goes through the lists. It's not on the Eightfold Path, but it's the first topic in the graduated teachings, which the Buddha always gives. It's the first of the three bases of meritorious deeds. It's the first of the four means of benefiting others. And it's the first of the ten paramis, or perfections.

These paramis or perfections, as you know, are the virtues, the beautiful qualities of mind that are cultivated in the Theravada tradition. They're cultivated by all beings who have the aspiration not only to awaken but to come into birth as an awakened Buddha who can then so benefit others. And generosity is the first. I just wanted to point out how the intrinsic importance of generosity is talked about so much.

Bhikkhu Bodhi says—and I also wanted to point this out—that generosity takes the form of giving of material things, of our time, of our care, lending an ear, whatever form of giving. But the perfection of generosity, the quality of generosity that brings in this brightening, this uplifting of the mind, isn't about the action. Of course all action comes from the motivation, from the intention. And so it's this intention of giving that cultivates non-clinging—I mean, obviously—but it actualizes non-clinging. It also cultivates, and I'll talk more about this, non-separation, a sense of mutuality, the experience of connectedness. And just in the doing of it, it's weakening the habits of greed and hatred and confusion or separation.

So generosity may be the foundation for the Eightfold Path, but also in the practice of it, in the doing of it, in the opening to generosity, it is an actual practice of non-clinging, of connectedness, of non-delusion.

What I also want to talk about from my own experience—if there were secret teachings of generosity, I mean, it's probably obvious, but to me, I didn't really understand this on a personal level—is that it's an absolute practice of joy and happiness. It's such a happy way to be in the moment in the world. It's such a joyful way to be with other people, this generous heart and mind which naturally moves into metta, into connectedness.

In this culture I grew up in, and I think this is a very generous culture in terms of offering, taking in, whether we're in a church or a synagogue or a temple or a mosque in our religious traditions, but also just in the lay culture. We all get seven billion requests from organizations a week in the mail. And most people I know really give a lot in that way. So that's generosity. And I feel good about it, but it's not that same quality of real joy that I've experienced over and over and over in Thailand and in Burma. Because it's like a face-to-face immediate quality of being that really permeates the culture, that permeates simple interactions between people.

Of course, it's not just in Thailand and Burma. That's just where I've done a lot of practice. And being Buddhist cultures, the sense of generosity as the foundation for the whole of Buddhist practice is very deeply inculcated in the culture. But of course, generosity is everywhere, and Buddhism doesn't own generosity. I'm just talking from this perspective.

I'm sure you've heard a million times how the Buddha, when he set up his Sangha of monks and later of nuns, really based it on generosity, on the mutual nature of generosity, so that the Sangha, the ordained ones, depended on the lay people, and the lay people depended on the monks and nuns.

Neither side could just kind of exist in isolation. This is from the Buddha himself, speaking to his monks:

"Brahmins and householders are very helpful to you. They provide you with the requisites of robes, alms food, lodgings, and medicine in times of sickness. And you monks are very helpful to Brahmins and householders, as you teach them the Dhamma that is good in the beginning, the middle, and the end, and you proclaim the spiritual life in its fulfillment and complete purity. Thus, monks, this spiritual life is lived with mutual support for the purpose of crossing the flood and making a complete end of suffering."

Just the sense that we're all in it together.

From our Western mind, the idea of monks and nuns going out every morning with their bowls and begging for food—I mean, that's the word we have, begging—it has a whole different context, doesn't it, than this sense of mutual support and respect, this understanding that we can't exist without each other.

Even now in Burma and Thailand, every morning in a monastery, the monks line up early, always barefoot, always in order from the most senior to the most junior, carrying their alms bowls. In silence, they go out into the local villages and walk in line barefoot for an hour, an hour and a half. They just have their route. They don't look up. It's not about going someplace and asking. They just walk with their eyes down, and if someone comes and wants to offer, they open the lid, the food is placed in, and they keep going.

I don't know what it is—early morning, just after dawn, something about the stillness in the air—but so often when I see that lining up and going out, sometimes it makes me cry. I feel like it's 2,600 years ago or something. It's timeless. It's a beautiful thing, and begging doesn't have anything to do with it. It's not begging. People who give, they give because they're happy to give. There's that sense of mutuality.

So generosity is very, very present in the culture. But the sense of happiness, the joy really, the feeling that after a while you don't know who's giving and who's receiving because it's just joy and metta all around—this hits me and strengthens in me every time I go to Burma or Thailand.

I first noticed it when I was a nun in Thailand for about a year, a long time ago. I just went la-di-da, I want to be a nun, practice in the woods, not have to pay anything, see what it's like. And that's how we are. But I was so struck from the beginning with how generous people were to me as a Westerner. In Thailand, at least where I was, there wasn't such a sense of poverty. Burma is a whole other story. But people were incredibly generous and so happy to be able to do anything to support my practice.

The remembrance I have in terms of the joy of generosity and the way it opens the mind and heart to freedom, to letting go, is from a forest monastery I was staying at for a while where there were monks and nuns. I was on one side of the river with some little kutis for nuns, and the head nun there was a young woman, a very sincere and dedicated practitioner, that was clear. There weren't that many kutis, little huts, for nuns. And the way it is in these monasteries or meditation centers is you can let them know when you're coming and they'll have a place for you, but at any time, any day, people can just show up. That's just how it is.

So in this little nunnery in Thailand, you could be settled in your little hut, and one day ten women could show up. You just never know. I would notice in my mind—and I came from having been on staff at IMS and Barre—there was always this little fear: Oh no, people are coming. I'm going to have to share my hut. I'm going to have to give up my hut. I have it, you know. And I would just notice that tightness in my mind.

But if anyone, any woman came, the first person to give up her hut was the head nun. Absolutely. I was never even approached to share, never mind give up. As soon as people came, she would move out into the cave, share with another nun, whatever—happily, joyfully, immediately. That letting go, that sense of community, that sense of connectedness. And I would see how I was: No, don't come here.

I think about how we did this whole room game at IMS, where the more senior you were on staff, the more you got to have the room you wanted and keep it. You get there, you dig in, you hold on. That's what seniority is about. And over there, the more senior, the more generous, the more open. Hmm, which way is the Dharma practice going here?

When I was in a good space, it was inspiring. When I was in a bad space, it was like, "Oh, you're stupid." But anyway.

The last seven or eight years or so, I've been spending about a month a year in Burma. The first time I went, I was doing a retreat at a meditation center for about six weeks. I knew some people who were there—the nun who was taking care of foreigners, a Swiss woman who's been a nun there for years, a friend of mine. So it was all very nice, very well taken care of. And it took a while for it to surface in my consciousness. Something was going on, but I couldn't quite put it into words.

After some weeks, I began to notice. I was having a hard retreat—just stuff that was going on for me, not the environment. The way they do the meals at that place is you go into the dining room and all the meditators—Burmese men and women, laymen and laywomen, foreigners from all over the East and some Westerners—the women and men sit at different tables, but you have little round tables that hold three or four people, and everyone has an assigned seat. The monks, of course, eat separately too. You could pick a table, you could be vegetarian or not, which is already huge generosity. At your seat, as you sit down, the places are set, and then little bowls of food are put on the table for whatever there is that day. The food was lovely, there was always plenty—really, it was like a great restaurant in a way.

I was at a table with a couple of nuns, Indonesian women I believe, and one of them just kept asking for this and that. "I want some hot chilies." And the women who were working in the kitchen—some were laywomen, some were nuns—they would come running and say, "Oh, you want chilies?" And they would go running out, I don't know where, to the garden or somewhere, and they'd come running back with the chilies. I'm thinking, "She's a nun. You're not supposed to want extra stuff. That's what renunciation is about." And every day she'd be complaining. She'd ask for this, she'd ask for that, she'd want more butter on her bread.

And unfailing kindness. Not just with a pretense of a smile, but happy. They were so happy they could bring her the extra butter. They were so happy they had some chilies they could find wherever they found them and bring to her every day.

It kind of slowly sank into me as I came out of my grouchy self-involvement that this generosity of heart in supporting the practice, and the happiness it was bringing the people who were offering the generosity—it starts to rub off on you. You can only sit there grouchy and grumpy for so long. "What's the matter? They're so stupid." Finally you realize, "They're really happy. Who's grouchy? Who's grumpy? Who's separate? I'm just sitting here eating."

It starts to rub off on you. I started to see—I was in silence, a yogi, so there wasn't that much I could do to interact. But even just in the silence, the generosity and the mettā start to brighten one's heart and mind. They start to support one in one's practice. You're having a gloomy day, you could just look around and see the ladies working in the kitchen and how generously they were serving, and the nuns and how generous they were with their time and energy. And it starts to soften the heart. It starts to brighten the mind. Okay, take a breath. I can keep going with my practice for today.

So that was my first experience where I consciously began to notice it. And since then, I've seen every time I go to Burma that it's both in the monasteries and nunneries between the ordained Sangha and the laypeople, but it's also just deeply imbued in the culture. And yes, this is a culture with probably one of the worst, most horrific, violent, hateful governments in the world, so I'm not saying everything is all peaches and cream. I'm saying that within this culture there's this spontaneous generosity and the joy that comes with it that is absolutely contagious. After a while, as I said, you really can't tell who's being generous and who's receiving. You give and give and think, "Wow, I'm just so happy. I wish I could give some more."

Just some small examples. When I went this year, because of the cyclone in May, there was huge destruction of many villages down on the lower delta, southeast of Rangoon, Yangon. Mostly foreigners can't go there these days. Some NGOs can. I don't want to get into all the politics of it, how the government didn't want to let people help, but there's still huge need down there—food, shelter, rebuilding schools, all kinds of things.

So this small nunnery we went to visit—again, a tiny little bamboo house. You walk in and half the floor is so rickety that a couple of big guys who came with us one time to visit basically broke the floor. I'm not kidding.

There are two nuns there, Ma Uttaratangi and Ma Uttamatangi—two sisters, one in her early forties, the other in her mid-thirties. They were telling us about their life when we went to visit them. These two sisters are running the nunnery. There's another grown nun, and then there are about ten girls ranging from a teenager down to six years old.

When you see these children—they're orphans, or they have one very poor parent. They all came from the Delta two years ago. These two nuns, and there are many, many nuns in Burma doing this, have basically taken in either orphan little girls or little girls from such poor one-parent families that the family can't provide for them. Since it's a nunnery, the girls become nuns. And they wear pink.

So there are these little ones—you can't believe how cute they are, you can't bear it. They're this tall, in their little pink robes with their little pink sash. And they sit there, and they're so cute you just can't stand it. They're all over Burma.

The first time we went, Ma Uttamatangi—she's very outspoken, very bright—was describing their work. Ariyañani could translate, and she spoke with so much passion. She said, "These little girls, I just really want to give them a better chance in life."

So they're educating them. She's teaching them Burmese. She's teaching them Pali. She's teaching them the Abhidhamma. You walk into this crummy little bamboo shack and there's a blackboard covered with Burmese, Abhidhamma, and English lessons. The girls get up at four, start studying at six, study all day—but they're happy, you know, they're having fun. They're not beaten down.

And she was speaking so passionately: "Little orphan girls in Burma just get abandoned, or they get sold into servitude. I know what it's like to be poor. I want them to have a better chance in life."

She and her sister have completely devoted themselves to taking care of these little nuns, educating them. She was explaining, "If someone offers us a robe, a pink robe, that's really good—because if we cut it up, we can get fifteen little blouses for the little girls." You could just see how practical and tender it was. She talked about how they lose their slippers, they lose their umbrellas, so you have to be offered many more slippers than you would need for grown nuns. Just day-to-day stuff, but spoken with such passion.

Turns out later, it seemed like maybe she'd taken that on as her mission in life. But later, when she was telling us her whole story, it really wasn't that—that wasn't how she started. There's a whole other story of how and why she became a nun, which if I go into, I'm never going to finish this talk.

But she and her sister became nuns when she was really sick. Her parents were about to sell everything they had to take care of her. She heard this in her mid-twenties and said, "No, that's no good. What can I do?" She said, "I'll become a nun." And her parents, far from thinking, "Great, get rid of her," vehemently opposed it. No, no—even though they would have had to sell everything. But she insisted. Her sister agreed to ordain with her. Turns out her sister had always wanted to be a nun.

And she said she was so sick when she ordained that she would be lying there, and if she had her hand on her chest, she couldn't move it off. Or if her hand was lying down, she couldn't move it onto her chest. She was that sick. Two days after ordaining, she was all better. Stories like this all over—who knows?

Anyway, she and her sister came from the Delta up to Yangon, and they were in a study monastery for a few years, which is what nuns do. They really study very deeply all the Pali scriptures, and there are tests all over Burma where nuns and monks take examinations. Once they've passed these tests, there are some really very educated nuns, and they come and teach other little girls.

They were doing that, but then the two sisters decided they really wanted to go meditate. They wanted to just dedicate themselves to awakening. So they were going to go to a meditation monastery. That's what they wanted to do. But just at that time, the Sayadaw from their home village who'd been supporting them died. And I didn't quite get how this followed, but there were a bunch of little poor orphan girls—this was only two or three years ago—and he sent them all up to these two sisters. "Now you have to take care of them."

And totally, they turned around. They dropped what they were going to do, found this piece of land, built this house themselves with their own hands, and are completely dedicating themselves—with passion, with love, with affection. You can see it when you're talking to them, the affection in taking care of these little girls, without any resentment, with total mettā and dedication. You just feel it hanging out there.

When you go and offer—so we were visiting nunneries and offering some of the money—you do it in a very formal way, face to face. You turn, you offer the money hand to hand. There's usually a photograph taken. So it's very formal. And then just as you're doing that, the nuns all chant, or monks would do a mettā chant, a long mettā chant and a kind of blessings chant—even the tiny little ones. And they all know it. It's so moving. There's this sense of real communion, of being connected. You go away feeling like, "Wow."

Like I said, who was giving, who was receiving? It's just this flow, this mutuality of mettā and dāna. Everyone is giving, everyone is receiving. It's not that sense of "me offering so much." Your heart lightens, it makes you happy, and it just keeps on going. It keeps on going. It's just how the culture is.

So when the cyclone hit and the government doesn't do much, you can see how so many monks, nuns, and lay people—anyone who had the opportunity—their spontaneous movement was to find how they could go and help. It's just in the culture.

Just a couple other examples—I could go on forever. I mentioned how Sayadaw U Tejaniya organized some rice dānas, some food dānas. One place was right in the village around where we were staying at the meditation center. And the way it worked was very structured: each house would get a little chit, and then people would come in, give their chit, and get the rice. But it was, again, in this real formal, loving way. People came kind of dressed up. It was a big event.

And for the people offering, it's not like you just say, "Here's the rice, take the rice." They really—Sayadaw would say, when I was taking a photo, he goes, "No, give me your camera, Carol. You go offer the rice." He hardly even speaks English, but suddenly he said that, because if you're the one giving, part of the giving is the actual face-to-face offering. It's so different from sending a check in the mail. I can't tell you. People were kind of dressed up, and you come and offer the rice.

didn't even have a crummy little plastic bag to put the rice in—some crummy plastic bag that had been used a hundred times. Some people came and they were putting it in their shirt or their lungi. That's how poor people are.

So then they went away. That was just it. And then the next day, a friend of ours—a Mexican man who was a monk there, so he spoke English—he would go out on the bindabat, the alms round, every morning. He had been doing that for some months. Going on the alms round, you go the same route, you get to know the people and who offers. There's a regularity to it.

So he told us the next day after the rice offering, he said it was so, so touching. He said there were people who had never offered before—really a lot of them—who were out offering rice the next day. Because now they had rice to offer. Immediately they turn around and offer it back. It's just so beautiful. And he said there was a little line of children, which he was sure someone organized, but still—the little kids, very formal in their giving. He was just full when he came back. And we were so happy that he could tell us, because we wouldn't have known. It's just there in the culture.

A year and a half before, when there were the demonstrations and, as my teacher said, the government was shooting monks as well as other people and throwing them in jail, the biggest insult the monks could do was to refuse to accept offerings from the generals or from the military. That's a huge insult. There were times during the worst period when, in the totally state-controlled newspapers, there would be big pictures of the high generals offering something to some prominent monk. You knew it was just for show. But many monks, for a long time—they called it a strike, I don't remember the exact term—they refused to accept offerings. That is so damaging to those who are refused. Some of the monks were even arrested for it. But it's a huge thing to do—to stop the flow of mutuality, to not allow someone to give.

So as I said, it's not just wealthy people giving to poor people. Everyone wants to share, like the people sharing back the rice.

I was walking down a village road between one meditation center and the other—about a ten-minute walk. There are lots of different kinds of little houses and cottages. It was late in the evening, about six o'clock, so the children were all out playing. The little ones would see me and laugh and run away—just kids being kids.

But as I was walking, a little boy came up to me. A very nicely dressed little boy, very solemn. So sincerely he came up to me with this tiny little flower and bowed and handed it to me. It was so touching. That was all. He didn't want anything else. I just said thank you and he went off. This is what the children are learning. It's really so beautiful.

A friend of mine who had spent some time in Burma said it creeps in. You don't quite notice how the generosity and kindness work their way into you—just in little ways like that. It's no big deal, just offering a little flower. But it's still with me now. I felt so happy, so touched. It was kind of the high point of my week. And I'd had a nice week. Still, when I think about it now, it brightens my mind and heart.

I'm going to get to this—that sense of recollection is really important. It creeps in, but then you start to notice how it enters you, and you start sharing that, wanting to share, coming more from metta, from generosity, quite spontaneously. It really is contagious.

My friend was saying that when she got back home to Massachusetts—where people are kind, but it's not quite in such an open, spontaneous way in the culture—she noticed something. You come home in this open space, and it fades a little bit. You have to look harder to find ways to be generous. You don't just drop in on people. Over there, you just drop in. Anyone drops in. No one is going to walk up to me if I'm walking in Fairfax—a little eight-year-old boy handing me a flower. I'd fall over in shock if that happened. It's just a different way. People are kind, but people are busy. We're all so busy doing our things. We send our checks. I'll call you up—you're on my list. I really should call my friend who's suffering. Maybe I can get to it in five days. I'll have five minutes.

We mean well, but there's not quite the flowing. It's not quite so alive. She was just saying she noticed that, and I do too.

But I want to say, it's not just Burma. It's absolutely not just Burma. Notice whenever you hear of someone being really generous.

Let it in and notice how it affects your mind, how it affects your heart. It brings happiness. It doesn't have to be us doing the giving—just hearing of generosity lights something up inside.

But again, the most important aspect isn't what's given or how we give, but the motivations behind our giving. Those generals having their pictures taken while offering to the monks—that's not the power of generosity. It doesn't matter how much you give. It's not about that.

This is from the Buddha: "Even if a person throws the rinsings of a bowl or a cup into a village pool or pond, thinking, 'May whatever animals live here feed on this,' that would be a source of generosity, a source of blessings." So it's not what we give—it's how. It's that open-hearted connectedness, that generosity of heart.

This shows up very clearly in some of the stories from the time of the Buddha about a layman, a very wealthy man named Anathapindika, who was the foremost supporter of the Sangha during the Buddha's time. I want to read a couple of short stories because they're very much to the point about the importance of motivation.

If you've read suttas at all, you've noticed how many of them begin with "Thus have I heard"—which means Ananda is telling it—and then continue, "On one occasion the Blessed One was dwelling at Savatthi, in Jeta's Grove, the monastery of Anathapindika." So many suttas begin this way. Out of forty-five years of teaching, the Buddha spent nineteen rains retreats in Anathapindika's monastery.

Anathapindika met the Buddha in the third year of the Buddha's teaching life. I want to read just a brief synopsis of how they met, because you can see that his generosity came out of a huge faith—a huge brightening of devotion and love—not out of a should, or because it would be good, or because people would think well of him, or because he'd have a better life in the next world.

The Buddha does talk often about generosity in terms of merit. It's frequently spoken of that way: if we do wholesome deeds now, we will experience the results of wholesome karma later in this life and in future lives. He talks about it that way quite a lot. But if you spend time in Burma or Thailand, or even with Anathapindika's story here, you see that while it might sound mercenary, the actual movement of generosity isn't about thinking, "Oh, if I do this, if I offer to the Buddha, I can be reborn as a deva." That's not where Anathapindika was coming from. It was this welling up of faith.

So the story goes that Anathapindika hadn't even heard of the Buddha when he went to his brother-in-law's house. His brother-in-law, who was also wealthy, was preparing some huge feast. Anathapindika asked, "What's going on?" And his brother-in-law said, "The enlightened one is coming for tomorrow's meal."

Anathapindika stopped. "The enlightened one? Did you say the enlightened one?" He just got so excited. It hit him right there. He felt, "Oh, even the sound of that is rare!" He just became so happy. He asked, "Can I go see him now?" And his brother-in-law said, "No, no—tomorrow would be good."

So Anathapindika went to bed, but he was so excited he kept waking up all night. Is it time? Is it time? Finally he got up way in the middle of the night and started walking in the dark, far out into the country where the Buddha was staying. It was dark, and he became overcome with fear and started to feel doubtful, thinking, "I should go back, I should go back." But the story says a spirit came and whispered in his ear, "Go forward, householder, go forward. Going forward is better for you. Don't turn back again."

Whether it's a spirit or our inner intuition, sometimes something tells us we have to go forward. And he went. The light began to rise, and he saw the Buddha walking in the distance, and his heart just opened. He fell at the Buddha's feet, so overcome he couldn't think what to say. Finally he just blurted out, "Did the Blessed One sleep well?"

What do you say to this person? And the Buddha, of course, gave him a beautiful verse in response: "Always indeed he sleeps well, the brahman who is fully quenched, who does not cling to sensual pleasures, cool at heart, without acquisitions. Having cut off all attachment, having removed care from the heart, the peaceful one indeed sleeps well, for he has realized peace of mind."

You see, it really doesn't matter what you say—you're going to receive something precious in return from the Buddha.

Then he taught Anathapindika, and this is an example of what the Gubboni was discussing: the gradual, step-by-step teaching. The Buddha spoke to him on the virtues of giving, on sila—virtue—on the perils of attachment to sense pleasure, on the benefits of renunciation. And then, as is often said, when he saw that Anathapindika was ready in heart and mind—the mind was pliable, uplifted, serene, unobstructed—and he saw he was ready, then he gave him the teachings special to the noble ones: the Four Noble Truths. And Anathapindika understood: whatever has the nature of arising, all that has the nature of cessation. He had understood the truth of the Dhamma. He had overcome doubts.

He was now self-dependent in the master's dispensation. He had realized the path and fruit of stream entry. That's how it's described.

You get that sense, and it takes us back to the giving, that the recollection, the bringing of the quality of generosity to our heart and mind, is one way in that actual moment of purifying the heart and mind, of its becoming unobstructed, uplifted, serene. Really very helpful—both the giving, the actual service, the generosity, the receiving, the metta, and even just recollecting, which I will come to in a moment.

From that moment, Anathapindika became the most generous supporter. He invited the Buddha and five hundred monks—it's always five hundred, just as Andy Alinsky says, that means "a lot." Whenever they say five hundred, it means a lot of monks, a lot of nuns. And then he said, "Let me offer you a monastery." He went back and searched and found this Jeta's Grove, bought it at a humongous price, and offered it. He became the biggest supporter.

But then—and this is again about the importance of motivation—his motivation was real faith, upliftedness of heart and love, with no self-involvement or self-return at all.

There's a story later that after he established the monastery, when the Buddha and monks would be living there, Anathapindika was always completely supporting them. He would send rice gruel in the morning. He would send them medicines and clothing and supplies in the evening. And every day, every day for the main meal, he would have several hundred monks come to his house. So his place was always filled, it says, with the saffron robes and the perfume of saintliness.

He lived in the realm of King Pasenadi, who was also a devotee of the Buddha. When King Pasenadi learned of Anathapindika's generosity, he wished to imitate him. So he also began to supply alms and food for five hundred monks every day. But one day, he learned from his servants that the monks would come and be offered the food, but then they would go into the village and hand the food that was offered from the king to their supporters, and then the supporters would give it back to them.

King Pasenadi said, "What's going on? Why is that happening? There's nothing wrong with the food. I'm supplying the best, most tastiest, most refined food you could have."

But the Buddha explained. He said that in the king's palace, his servants, his courtiers, distributed the food without any inner engagement. They were just doing it as a job, like cleaning out the stables. And some of them, in fact, even thought, "These monks, they're just parasites, and we're doing the work." He said, "Nobody can be comfortable accepting anything given in that spirit."

So the monks would take the food—not to do the harsh thing of refusing it, because that's not generous—but then they would give it to their devoted supporters, who would give it back with faith, with real generosity, and then they could accept it. So even the richest, most generous person—it's not about how much he gave. It was about the spirit, about the heart. That's really the practice of generosity.

Once I heard a talk from a Nepali monk, Upannika, who was teaching with Sayadaw U Pandita at IMS one year. He gave this lovely talk on generosity, and he offered about seven little points of practice—how you actually practice bringing awareness to times when you're offering, whether it's service or time or material goods.

The first is obvious: attention to the volition, attention to your motivation in giving, so that you really purify it before giving. "I should give this here"—really purifying it. The generous act of the bodhisattvas is: "With this act, may all beings be free from suffering." It can even get broader, but really tuning into that. And also, whatever you're giving, really be in the giving. That's the same thing—you're purifying the motivation, really abandoning the clinging to it. Really be happy that you're giving it. If it's your time, if it's money, whatever—be happy that you're giving.

And then U Pandita said—and this is what I've really learned from times in Burma—if it's at all possible, directly giving and receiving, face to face, in person. It brings such a more powerful sense to it. It increases the awareness of your interrelatedness.

He actually gave me a personal lesson in this. Sometimes I would be almost embarrassed to give someone a gift—either it's not good enough, or you don't want them to... you don't know what, just kind of embarrassed. I had bought him a gift when I was on retreat and had someone else give it to him. When I came out of retreat, he called me over and said, "No." He made me give it to him hand to hand so that he could really receive it wholeheartedly. And he said also, so that you're giving it with confidence, with real faith, with real generosity. It brings a real power of confidence into the act.

And again, as I described with the nuns, when you give something and they all stand there and chant for five minutes, you just get goosebumps. It's beautiful.

Give with the mind—this is obvious. When you're giving or talking or sharing, do it with the mind, with the heart focused on the giving. Just being mindful, being present. That's obvious. And as I said, there's a way in the formality of how it's done in Burma that really enhances this, that really helped me see: when you do it, you really are doing it with this real sense of the beauty and the power of the whole act—the giver and the receiver, the power of it for both. You don't just say, "Well, here's the money, see you later."

And it's taught. It's taught to the kids.

In one of the dānas that we did, we went down to some small villages in the upper delta. In one of these villages, we went to the small schoolhouse, because Sayadaw U Tejaniya apparently loves to give what he calls "candy dāna." He loves to buy candy bars and then give one out to each of these little kids. So he was getting a total kick out of it.

The schoolhouse was this crummy little wood structure with nothing in it. There might have been sixty or seventy little kids, from tiny, tiny little ones to maybe eleven or twelve years old. There were three or four young women teachers. We went in, and the kids were all sitting in sort of an age order, sitting very carefully. We would line up—one of us would have a little sucker candy, another would have a little candy bar—and then we'd rotate so that everyone had a chance to give and receive.

The teachers would have each kid come up one at a time, and you could see this is really where they're learning it. Even the tiny little kids would come, and some would be all distracted, just wanting to grab it and run. The teachers would very gently correct them. Others came up so sincerely—they'd approach very solemnly, look at you, take the candy, and go away. But you could see how they were teaching it.

Another place we went that same day, the same kind of candy dāna, but it was offered just in the monastery, and all the village kids came running in. It wasn't under the auspices of the school or the teachers. And somehow the whole town felt a bit wilder. So it was the same thing—first we couldn't even get the kids to line up. Finally we got them to line up, but it was like this fever of greed over just a lousy little candy bar. They'd run to the back of the line and get in line again. There were so many of them, we couldn't tell. Some had these little rubber bands around their wrists, and my friend would say, "I've seen that rubber band before. He's been here before." We couldn't tell. Finally we had to make them all sit down and stay sitting down, and then go down the line. And you could see they hadn't really learned it. It was different—just kind of a mob scene.

This brings up another point: there needs to be clear comprehension of the giving in the broader context. Giving what doesn't hurt oneself or hurt another. What's really of value. What the giving and the receiving is in terms of fostering wholesomeness, not unwholesomeness.

At the end of this, we had a few little candies left, and somehow the structure broke down. And it wasn't the kids—it was the adults. One of my friends was standing there holding this little bag of hard candy, just nothing. And the adults, they started by kidding, but then it wasn't kidding, and it just felt like this frenzy of greed. It felt awful. It really felt awful to me. I felt like this isn't really right generosity, because what it's feeding is greed. And you could just see it didn't feel the same at all. No mettā. I mean, no big deal—it's just a sucker—but the difference between the two feelings was palpable.

And so the sense of formality and the sense of understanding, the clear comprehension from the Buddha again: how a person of integrity gives a gift. These are five qualities of a person of integrity's gifts. Which five? A person of integrity gives a gift with a sense of conviction. A person of integrity gives a gift attentively. A person of integrity gives a gift in season. A person of integrity gives a gift with an empathetic heart. A person of integrity gives a gift without adversely affecting himself or others.

A gift in season—just to tell you what that means. Five seasonable gifts: one gives to a newcomer; one gives to one going away (which I've noticed—when you leave a monastery, everyone comes with little gifts); one gives to one who is ill; one gives in time of famine; and one sets the first fruits of field and orchard in front of those who are virtuous. These are the five seasonable gifts.

Lovely, isn't it?

And not adversely affecting oneself or others. There's another story from Anāthapiṇḍika, who was incredibly generous to the Buddha and the Sangha. Also, because he had so much faith, he was really virtuous and lived a very pure life.

And as I said, it really affected his whole family. It affected all the people he came in contact with. The whole sphere around someone who's generous starts to affect the people around—purity, happiness, love. It's contagious. And so it infected his family and his friends, and he was generous to all of them.

But he also had this sense of giving where it's appropriate, where it's useful, at the right time and not to the detriment of others. So there's one story of how, out of all his family, he had one nephew who inherited a huge fortune but squandered it all on drinking and gambling and womanizing. Then he came to Anathapindika and asked for a thousand gold pieces to start a business. Anathapindika gave it to him—and he squandered it all. Then he came back again a second time, asked for more, this time without a single condition. Anathapindika gave him five times as much—and he squandered it all again, completely squandered it all.

He came back a third time with no shame, begged for money. This time, Anathapindika gave him two pieces of clothing, but he squandered those too, sold them for everything. Then finally, the fourth time he came, Anathapindika told him to leave and gave him nothing. If he'd been just a beggar, he would never have left the house without anything. If he'd been just a hungry person—but the money wasn't for alms, just to squander.

And so his nephew just kept on that way. He wasn't willing to beg, and he died wretchedly outside the gates of the village. Of course, Anathapindika felt terrible. What should I have done? I should have been able to save him. He went to the Buddha, told him this whole story, and asked, "Should I have done differently?"

I think it's interesting. The Buddha said, "No, no. You couldn't have done anything different. That nephew belonged to the fortunately small number of insatiable people who are like bottomless vats. He perished because of his reckless behavior. You wouldn't have been able to save him."

I find that quite striking. It's just interesting how even someone as generous as Anathapindika and as powerful as the Buddha—generosity can't save everybody. There's that sense that at some point there's discernment in generosity. I just find that quite interesting.

So just to end, the last thing I want to say is about this contemplation, this way of using the contemplation, the practice and the recollection of generosity to brighten, to uplift, to purify the mind, and then to support our discerning practice.

There are a couple of suttas that point to this. The Buddha said that if the heart is corrupted, then all actions, words, and thoughts get tainted also. At one point he's talking to nuns and then to Ananda, and he gives this example—I'll condense it—where if a person is abiding contemplating body as body, this is the four foundations of mindfulness: body as body, feelings as feelings, mental states as mental states, mind as mind—ardent, fully aware, mindful. So this is straight from the Satipatthana Sutta.

But as this is happening, it can occur with body or any of the four that an object arises, or a bodily distress that's unpleasant, or mental sluggishness, or some unpleasant experience that scatters the mind outward. Have you ever noticed that? Then the monk or the meditator should direct her mind to some—this is translated as "satisfactory image"—and I'll say what that means. It doesn't mean just, "Let's think about eating chocolate cake." It means something wholesome.

And from this directedness of mind to a satisfactory image, happiness is born. From the happiness, joy is born. With a joyful mind, the body relaxes. A relaxed body feels content. The mind of one content becomes collected. And then the meditator reflects, "The purpose for which I directed my mind to this satisfactory image has been accomplished. So now I will withdraw."

It's basically calling in a particular wholesome, uplifting contemplation to help collect and uplift and bring serenity to the mind when we're just lost—not that we just don't like what's happening, but that we're lost in what's happening. And then, no longer focusing on that, inwardly mindful of whatever arises, content. Not directing the mind outward, understanding, not focused on before or after, just present with what's arising right now: "I am mindful. I am content." That's undirected meditation—more like what we're calling choiceless awareness here.

So take that sense of some satisfactory image and put it together with this other sutta where the Buddha talks about six very helpful recollections: recollecting the Buddha, the Dharma, the Sangha, your own sila or morality, your own generosity, or the devas. I'm just going to talk about generosity—just say what he says about it. It's this exact same thing of calling up the satisfactory image.

When you recollect your own generosity—and even the generosity of others will do the same thing—you think, "It's a great gain for me that among people overcome with the stain of possessiveness, I live at home." So this teaching is for lay people, not just monks and nuns. "I live at home, my awareness cleansed of the stain of possessiveness, freely generous, delighting in being generous, responsive to requests."

At any time when a disciple of the noble ones is recollecting generosity, her mind is not overcome with greed, not overcome with aversion, not overcome with delusion. Her mind heads straight, based on generosity. And when the mind is headed straight, the disciple of the noble ones gains a sense of the purpose, gains a sense of the Dhamma, gains joy connected with the Dhamma. In one who is joyful, rapture arises. The body grows calm—the same progression. One experiences ease. In one at ease, the mind becomes collected.

So you get a sense how powerful this is. The recollection of your own generosity is not an ego trip. It's actually, in this moment, purifying the heart and mind, making it pliable, uplifting it, ready to open to the true Dharma.

The Buddha concludes by saying, "So you, Mahanama"—the layperson who asked him—"you can develop this recollection of generosity while you are walking, while you are standing, while you are sitting, while you are lying down, while you are busy at work, while you are resting in your home crowded with children." In other words, no excuse not to do it. And why would we want to not do it? It brings happiness. It opens us to the purity of the Dhamma.

I'll just end with a story. The man who would cook for us at these retreats in Chazwa worked so hard—getting up at two in the morning, cooking all day, traveling an hour into the market and back just to get special food for the Westerners on retreat. Not a spiritual guy; he was a cook for a big bakery in the city. But he was so filled with metta.

And we'd say, "Don't work so hard, don't get up so early, take some rest." And he'd say, "No, everything we do is from dana intention, from metta intention—everything we do." And that gave him and the kitchen staff so much energy and so much love.

So it brings virya, it brings this open-hearted uplifting of mind, and it brings happiness to oneself and others. A great source of joy and goodness in this world.

CHAPTER 44

Exploring Craving

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson reframes our relationship with craving (taṇhā) and clinging (upādāna), inviting practitioners to explore these mental states with curiosity rather than aversion. She emphasizes that craving is not something to hate or fear, but rather another avenue for bringing wise attention and developing insight.
>
> Wilson carefully distinguishes between different Pāli terms for desire—taṇhā (thirst/craving) versus chanda (wholesome motivation or zeal)—clarifying that Buddhist practice isn't about eliminating all wanting, but understanding the specific quality of mind that constitutes suffering. She explores the Buddha's teaching on liberation through non-clinging, the four types of clinging (to sense pleasures, views, rules, and self-identity), and the three-part framework of gratification, danger, and escape. Drawing from the Sutta on the Two Darts, she illuminates how untrained minds seek escape from painful feelings only through sense pleasure.
> The talk offers practical guidance for recognizing craving's seductive quality—how it "puts feathers on the object desired," narrows perception, and promises exactly what it cannot deliver. Wilson discusses sakkāya-diṭṭhi (personality view), showing how the sense of self arises moment by moment through grasping at experience. Throughout, she encourages direct investigation with satipaññā (mindfulness and wisdom), revealing that the peace we seek is always available when clinging releases itself.

So last time I spoke, I talked about generosity. I thought I would talk about the opposite this time, which is exploring the experience of craving and clinging.

The whole point I want to make is not that we hate craving, not that we're afraid of it, not that we're some kind of failure if you happen to notice it on the odd occasion arising in your mind. It is actually simply another avenue of exploration to which we can bring wise attention, right attitude. It's just as much an object of exploration and a possibility for opening into wisdom as anything else, if we meet it with right attitude. That's the way I want to frame it and, hopefully, inspire that in you.

It's true that the Buddha talked about the experience of awakening. He said, "The sublime truth has been discovered by the Tathagata, namely liberation through non-clinging." That's really quite a profound and powerful statement: liberation through non-clinging. I just love that way of speaking about liberation or awakening because it's not pointing to a specific state. It's not as if non-clinging is some static state. It's more a moment-to-moment activity of mind and heart where clinging either doesn't arise or is released. It's a moment-to-moment experiential possibility. It's not about thinking of some state of bliss and holding on, trying to get there. No, that's not liberation through non-clinging.

Liberation through non-clinging is not so sexy sounding, really. It doesn't sound so exciting. In fact, it's hard to actually make up in our minds what that might feel like or look like—which is great. Because when we make up in our minds what something should feel like or look like, we're immediately caught in trying to make that happen. Clinging. Forget about it. Liberation through non-clinging.

So I want to talk about specifically what, in my understanding, we mean in Buddhism by the experience of craving and clinging, and what we don't mean by it, and how we can explore it with sati-pañña, with mindfulness and wisdom, right at the moment of its arising, at the moment of seeing it. Not that we have to throw up our hands and hide in the corner thinking, "It's hopeless, I'm hopeless, all I'm seeing is so much craving, forget it." A moment of non-clinging is only as far away as that. I don't want to say there's hope because I don't think hope is particularly helpful—that's looking into the future. But the potential is in any moment if we're willing to really explore, to get interested.

The moment clinging kind of releases itself, or when our mind just stops making sense of it—the wise intention the Buddha spoke of that's the opposite of craving, of greed, of clinging—is renunciation, which of course moves into generosity in a more active way.

In our culture, our regular secular culture, it's funny: if you talk about wanting or craving and renunciation, it's almost as if, without exploring, we hold backwards views of both of them. Wanting—well, of course I want this and I want that, that's normal, that's where happiness lies. We can almost imagine or impute, without looking, a kind of pleasure inherent in wanting, which is of course sick, as we know when we look at it more closely. But when we don't look, it's as if it's leading us in. And renunciation is like, "Oh, you know, dried up old stick, avoidance, aversion"—as if that's the best you can do, some kind of penance, suffering basically.

That's exactly the distorted perception the Buddha was talking about. Because it's the craving, the clinging, that in itself is the source and experience of suffering if we look at it. You don't even have to say it's going to make us suffer. It in itself is actually a state of suffering. This is my opinion, and I hope it inspires you to just look for yourself.

And renunciation, which isn't like, "Oh bad, I can't have something," pushing it away with aversion—renunciation is the opening into non-clinging. It's actually an experience of great simplicity, joy, peace, release. It's a very wholesome, happy moment, renunciation. In a way, the culture has it all backwards, and that's kind of what we've grown up with.

In some of the interviews, a question that comes up often is a kind of conceptual confusion about what we mean by wanting, what we mean by craving. We might say, "Well, if craving's bad, if clinging is the source of suffering, what's wrong with wanting to have a better job? Or what's wrong with wanting to take care of my family? Or even what's wrong with loving to be in nature?"

You see in those questions, the first thing is all the focus is outward, on the object. "What's wrong with wanting this particular object?" The answer is: nothing. It's got nothing whatsoever to do with the thing wanted. That's one thing.

The second thing is that in English, the words "want" or "desire" actually cover various mental states. In Pali, the language the Buddhist texts were originally written in, the words are much more specific, talking about really particular states of mind.

The word that is usually translated as "craving," as in the second noble truth—the source of suffering—is described this way: "Just this craving, which brings renewal of being and is accompanied by pleasure, by lust, finding delight now here and now there." I love that description because that's how craving is. It's accompanied by pleasure, finding delight now here and now there. That's how we get seduced into thinking the craving itself is the thing bringing us into happiness.

That word translated as "craving"—the Pali word taṇhā—is a very specific mental factor. The closer translation is "thirst."

So when we're talking about the wanting or desire as a form of suffering in the second noble truth, it's this quality of mind of thirst—leaning into what comes after pleasant experience. The mind leans into it. I want it. I need it. I've got to have it. That quality.

And clinging—there's a description somewhere in the suttas that craving, this tanha, is like a thief entering a dark house at night and searching for an object to steal. And the clinging, upadana in Pali, grasping, is like actually grabbing the thing. So when we talk about craving and clinging, craving is that thirsting, that got to have it, leaning into it. And the grasping is holding—now I got you—holding on for dear life, which leads to a sense of becoming, the person who has this thing, renewal of being, and then suffering.

So the craving, which I just read in the second noble truth, continues: with the arising of craving, there's the arising of clinging. With the cessation of craving, there's the cessation of clinging. And then the Buddha talks about four areas, four big areas of clinging that we can explore. Just one of his nice ways of breaking experience down.

I'm only going to talk really about three. Clinging to sense pleasures, to sensual pleasures—that's obvious, maybe. Clinging to views and opinions, which is huge. Clinging to rules and observances, which I'm not really going to talk about too much, but this refers to things like bathing in the Ganges to purify all your past bad karma. The Buddha is saying that's not really worth clinging to. So don't go bathe in the Ganges and think it's going to help. And the fourth is clinging to a doctrine of self, basically clinging to sakkaya-ditthi, which is identity view, personality view. So clinging to views and clinging to personality views. I'll talk about that more.

But first I want to elaborate a little about the attitude that we hopefully bring to all of our mindfulness practice. If already, just in hearing me read this about craving and clinging, or the different kinds, you notice any reaction or recoiling from it, or a sense of I can't ever understand this, or just any kind of reactivity like that—just notice it, that's all.

But hold the open possibility that we can really bring the spark of interest, investigation, to what it's like when there's craving, when there's clinging in the mind, in the heart, in our experience. What it's like when it's not. So that we can actually get interested in seeing for ourselves. Because that's the only way wisdom really arises—seeing for ourselves. Is it true that craving and clinging is a source of suffering in your mind, in your heart, in your life?

Just taking it on because the Buddha says it must be true, as we know, might get us looking. But it doesn't really cut it in terms of freeing our heart and mind from the habit, the seduction of craving—this going with pleasure now here and now there, landing with delight now here and now there. That is so seductive, and it gets so subtle, that we keep getting kind of tricked by it again and again, even when we've seen for ourselves. So it's really worth exploring.

And the way to explore it—I think it was Buddhadasa, the Thai teachers often talk about meeting any moment of experience with sati-pañña, mindfulness-wisdom, at the sense door. Mindfulness is just that bare recognition of what's happening. Wisdom is that attitude of mind that's interested, without judging, without assuming, without craving or aversion. Oh, clinging. It feels like this. Oh, clinging again. Clinging feels like this. Not clinging and I like it, so we're not going to look too closely. No. Clinging feels like this. This is the whole wise attitude that is our entire practice.

We can actually meet even the so-called source of suffering, craving, with mindfulness-wisdom, so that it simply becomes our practice of freedom. It's not like we have to get rid of it. We can bring that awareness so that we're actually practicing non-clinging in the very moment we meet the experience of clinging. That's where our freedom lies—right here, right now, in how the mind and heart is meeting experience.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya, the last time I saw him, he gets on different rants. So this was a particular rant he was on, because every time I saw him this last month, he kept saying the same thing. He does that. But this is a clear little thing. What's the difference between someone who practices and someone who doesn't? Someone who practices, a practitioner, meets or regards every object, every experience that happens as: What can I learn from this?

Something to learn from. And he was in the middle of a very ongoing, complicated, very difficult, very painful situation about his whole life in his monastery. So he wasn't just talking through his hat—well, they don't have hats. He wasn't just saying it for the heck of it. He was in the middle of a very difficult situation, saying, "I'm really interested to see how my mind reacts to this. I'm really interested to see." He said, "It's like an exam. It's an exam. It's a really difficult situation to see how free my mind is." And he meant it. He said someone who's not a practitioner, someone who's not really used to looking, they meet or respond or react to every situation with greed or hatred or delusion, or a combination. So that's really the attitude we bring—the interest.

When we begin to explore and continue to explore craving, the main thing is to recognize, to turn the attention around. It's about the state, the mental state, the emotional state in the mind and heart—not about whether this object is worthy or appropriate to cling to or not. That's how we get completely sidetracked. Then we get into those discussions: "Well, but it's appropriate to take care of my family. It's appropriate."

So again, back to different words. There's another word in Pali: chanda. It's ethically neutral, meaning dependent on how it's used, it can be a kusala—wholesome, skillful—state of mind, or an unskillful one. Chanda is complicated—there are two huge pages in the English-Pali dictionary—but I'm just cutting it down. It roughly translates as excitement, as willingness to do, the energy to do something. So it can be just kind of neutral. There's chanda to do what you need to do. That's not the same as craving or clinging.

In a wholesome way, chanda is one of the four bases of success, and it's translated as zeal—this real energy and willingness to do, together with concentration, together with virtue, to really explore. That's a wholesome quality, this zeal.

Now, in an unwholesome way, the same word chanda is put together with kama—not karma, but another kama, which means sense pleasures. And so this kama-chanda is translated as the excitement of sense pleasures. So guess what? That's not particularly skillful or wholesome. It's actually the first hindrance—kama-chanda. It's not just huge desire. The first of the five hindrances is actually this excitement of sense pleasures, the craving that comes from that.

But this word chanda, I think, can cover a lot of the times when we're thinking, "But what's wrong with wanting to enjoy the beauty of nature? What's wrong with it?" Nothing's wrong with it. No one's saying there's anything wrong with it. But even as there's chanda, or just a simple motivation to act, to do what needs to be done out of compassion, out of generosity, out of wisdom—the same object could also be related to, in a moment, with huge craving or clinging.

So take dinner. Take enlightenment. Either one. Yes, there's chanda—the body's hungry, it's time to go eat. And there could be a sense of it being pleasant; that's fine. It doesn't have to be thirst, it doesn't have to be craving. The body needs to eat; that's normal. But of course it could be craving, couldn't it? And in that situation, I'm imagining that you can all even call up in your mind what the difference would feel like, right? When you're really craving for the meal versus when it's just hungry and time to go? You can feel the difference—yes? That's not too esoteric, right?

Now, take the idea of enlightenment, because that's all it is—an idea in the moment. Sometimes there can be a huge craving, like a real craving, and it's huge suffering. Believe me, I've been there—the suffering of "I really want to be enlightened." And you come in and talk about it, and I say, "Well, what's wrong with wanting to be enlightened? That's why we're doing this whole stupid practice."

How can you say that that's a source of suffering? And you see then it's not about enlightenment. It's not about following the teachings. This is where we turn around and look at what's the state in the mind and heart right now. That's when you see the difference between chanda, between interest, between motivation—and craving or clinging.

So we really want to explore. And to explore, it really is to bring in this mindfulness with wisdom. If you're exploring while already judging—"Oh no, I'm craving for enlightenment, so forget it"—there's no way to see clearly. That's one of the drawbacks. That's one of the dangers, you could say, in craving. When it's coloring the mind that's observing, we don't see clearly.

In terms of the opposite of craving—the natural state that it transforms into—is the wise intention of renunciation. Again, it's not something that we need to force through aversion. "Oh, I have to give up everything." Renunciation is the natural expression of wisdom in the moment when the mindfulness, the wisdom sees through. Say it's wanting enlightenment. You see, "Oh, that's craving, craving, craving, craving." It drops away. It's got nothing to do with whether you get enlightened or not. The craving just drops away. And there's a renouncing. You're not renouncing enlightenment. You're not even renouncing—it happens by itself. That's what's so great about wisdom. It sees through, and when the delusion drops, it sees accurately. The Tibetans like to say things self-liberate. The craving vanishes because it doesn't make any sense. It's just, "Oh, right, there's no need to crave that." And there's peace. The natural peace and ease, as Sylvia likes to quote Ajahn Amaro, that's always available.

What's so poignant about craving is that it hides this peace. If we weren't caught in the craving—"Oh, it's just like this." But then, "How can I hold it?" And it's gone. "Oh, it's gone. See, it couldn't stay. That just shows I've got to work harder. I've got to hold on to it. I've got to practice." Or, "It's just like enlightenment. I've got to just let the question go." And there's peace and ease. And then the mind goes, "But that didn't solve it. I'm not enlightened." And it all starts up again.

So, continuing to be willing to bring in this quality of interest, of exploring, of investigation. "Oh no, craving again—it feels like this."

The Buddha often speaks in terms of exploring craving and the suffering and the ending of it. Bhikkhu Bodhi described it as three movements in an unfolding process of insight. The Buddha talks about this a lot, and I think it's really helpful to explore it in our own experience, on retreat, off retreat. He talks about seeing with wisdom, as it really is, the gratification in clinging to sense pleasures, views, sakkāya-diṭṭhi—the gratification in clinging, the danger in the clinging, and the escape from the suffering. Not to hold this as a view or an opinion, but to really look, because it makes a lot of sense. The Buddha says, "If, monks, there were no gratification in the world"—and here he's talking about sense pleasures—"if there were no gratification in the world, beings would not become enamored with the world. But because there is gratification, beings become enamored. If there were no danger in the world, beings would not become disenchanted with the world, would not suffer. But because there is danger, beings become disenchanted with it. If there were no escape from this suffering, beings could not escape. But as there is an escape, beings can escape."

It sounds obvious, but it's really quite a useful template for exploring our experience. Especially when we start talking about clinging to sense pleasures—we tend to jump right away to the danger of sense pleasures, which the Buddha talked about endlessly. This skips over the fact that of course there is gratification. And if we haven't really acknowledged to ourselves, really felt the gratification, then when we start looking at the dangers we somehow don't completely buy it. It doesn't completely sink in, because—but, but, but—it is nice. It is lovely to have chocolate ice cream, unless you're allergic to chocolate and don't like ice cream, and then you can have soy coconut or whatever. It is lovely to go out in nature and appreciate it. I don't have to enumerate the sense pleasures; you all know them well enough. Including pleasant states of mind, including all the wonderful things in life.

The Buddha's not saying that stuff doesn't bring pleasure. It does. It gratifies us. And so part of bringing mindfulness, wisdom, and really exploring is to start right there with the gratification—to see how and why the clinging starts, because it feels good. We've talked about it. It feels good on that very basic level. So being willing not to jump over it—thinking, "No, it shouldn't feel good," or being afraid to feel good because then we'll get caught in clinging. You can't skip that piece. It's really just seeing as it is, the gratification. Yeah, it feels good. Then the danger, the escape.

The gratification I will leave you to explore by yourself. I'm sure you can figure out how to do that.

The danger is—again, I'm saying this stuff so it's conceptual, but in your experience, not. Don't bring in some idea of danger. "Yeah, it's bad, it's going to go away, so therefore I shouldn't enjoy it." That doesn't help. That's a view. That's an idea. That's a description. I'm talking about just moment to moment, bare attention to just what happens. What happens as you're really enjoying the gratification of something?

There are different dangers. The one that's always mentioned is, of course, the one we've talked about before—that nothing lasts. So there's gratification. It's lovely. It goes away. Now, if the mind is completely free and at ease, there won't be clinging around the gratification when it goes away. That's not a problem. The danger is just to the clinging, to the suffering mind. When there's no clinging, change isn't a problem.

So that's one danger—that we tend to rely on feeling good. And when we don't feel good, as we know, maybe we at least have a little hissy fit, if not worse.

But actually—and this is me now, what I see for myself—what I think is really more of a danger, more subtle, more broad, more comprehensive, is the addictive, delusory aspect of craving when it's not seen in the mind. It colors the moment of awareness.

Just what I was saying about reading the definition of the second noble truth—craving, coming together with pleasure, delighting in this, delighting in that—without just noticing wanting as it is, it bears the promise that it's going to be the avenue to happiness. And then we tend to focus outward on the object desired and think, "Well, that one didn't do it." So we think, "Okay, I'll renounce this or I'll renounce that." But that seduction of the wanting, of that being the path leading us onward—to me this is one of the delusory aspects that leads into the addictive quality of it.

The other thing it does—the Tibetans have a lovely phrase for how it colors our perception. They say that wanting, clinging, "puts feathers on the object that's desired." It kind of colors it up. When you really have this desire for something, doesn't that thing, or person, or job, just seem so wonderful? How many expectations and fantasies have you had about some future thing since you've been here? Not even way far in the future—it could just be lunch. Or it could just be how nice it's going to be to take a bath at a certain time.

And if you've really gotten into how pleasant a fantasy can be – you may have had unpleasant ones too, but just staying with the pleasant – if you really get into it, and then you get to do the thing, does it really, really, does the thing at all come up to the promise of the fantasy? You probably keep looking, right, until you find one that does. But keep looking, don't believe me.

I know now when my mind starts saying, "Oh, it'll be like this, and then it'll be like that, and then this will be so wonderful," painting it out in twenty-five different ways – I know that whatever way my mind makes it up, it's going to be other than that. It never, ever comes out the way my mind has made it up. But that sense of the desire itself makes the object or the experience desired look so incredibly wonderful.

Even deep meditative experiences. You're waiting for pīti to arise, rapture to arise, and then it starts, and it's on and on and on, and finally it's like, "Please, God, make it stop." That may sound like I'm exaggerating, but not really. Everything gets old by repetition. And so you need something new if we're under that promise of clinging making us happy.

And even more, there's the delusion, because craving and aversion only arise in a moment of mind and heart when there's delusion. I talked a little about delusion today. Delusion always goes with craving or aversion, which are like two sides of the same thing. Aversion is like not wanting something to be happening. Because there's the delusion of me – without me, there's not anything to crave, right? Or to be aversive to. And also the delusion that it will make me happy.

So the real poignancy of craving, I think, is what I said before: it actually hides the peace, the ease, the freedom that the heart and mind is really looking for, although maybe it doesn't know it.

Huang Po wrote: "This pure mind shines forever with the radiance of its own perfection. The one mind is the Buddha, and there's no distinction between Buddhas and ordinary beings except that ordinary beings are attached to forms and thus seek for Buddhahood outside of themselves. By this very seeking they lose it."

Even take it away from Buddhahood – just non-clinging, just a moment of freedom, of ease, of peace. We really do look for it outside of ourselves, don't we? To people, to objects, to experiences, to a different mental state, to anything. And by that very seeking, by that even very subtle leaning into something else, it hides the natural peace and ease. And so to me, that is the real danger of clinging. It promises us exactly what it cannot deliver because in its own essence, the essence of the mental state is that it hides peace.

What I love about the fact that experience is just this moment opening up, just this moment opening up, is that whatever this moment is like, now it's opening up. And so there's always the potential – you can be totally caught in craving, and then in this moment, "Oh, craving is like this." Always that potential. It doesn't have to be ten years from now or when you've cultivated a certain level of absorption. It's just that recognition: oh, craving is like this.

The escape in a moment – not the escape of the arhat, who has so thoroughly seen through the seduction of craving that it just stops arising because it doesn't make sense – but we can know moments of that. And how do we know it doesn't make sense? When we notice clinging.

This is what's great to experiment with on retreat. You start going, "I shouldn't want this," or "I'm not going to look around," or "I shouldn't go eat." Not feeding the craving is helpful. But it's not like a friend of mine who decided to really practice restraint at the sense doors on retreat, so he walked around blindfolded for three days. That's not really seeing through the dangers of craving.

When it arises and you recognize it, never mind what the craving is about. Never mind, it doesn't matter. Turn the attention back around. See: oh, craving feels like this. Notice how you even know it's there in the mind, in the body. Notice what effect it has on your mind, on your perceptions, on your choices, on how you feel about things. Just really explore it.

Sometimes in walking meditation, sitting meditation, eating meditation, working meditation, you can just watch it arise and get so strong. It's so strong that it's telling you if you don't have this, you'll die. Some people have brought this up – it can be as simple a thing as wanting to look at the person walking next to you. Have you felt that? It's so strong you want to look. Like, you just can't not do it, right? For what?

So you can judge, right, basically. So you can look at them and have a judgment. That was really good. I'm glad I did that. The wanting though—it's killer. So it's understandable to see why we're driven by it.

So explore it. Wanting. "I'm going to explode!" You just stand there with it and watch it. At some point it ebbs. I'm not saying how long, but at some point it ebbs. At some point it really goes away. Notice it's really gone. Sure, another one's going to come because that's the nature of the habits of our mind. But we can really see, oh yeah, this is really interesting. What does it do?

And one of the things it does that I've noticed, besides putting feathers on the object and making the thing look so—if I just look at that person, everything's going to be so much better. It doesn't make sense, but never mind. If we just had, I don't know, some certain thing for lunch, then you have it. You don't even like it. You're not even hungry that day, but never mind.

But another thing wanting does is really narrow. It really constricts the mind so that what we see is the object of desire and everything else is in the way, sometimes. So again, it engenders a displeasure, a discontent with the perfection of now, with now at all. Now isn't good enough.

And this example I've used often, because it's funny and it's easy to see. I was once sitting on a plane—I travel a lot—and it was an overnight flight to Europe. I was sitting on the aisle with two seats empty next to me. I can't sleep on these flights where you sit up all night, and I'm a wreck when I don't sleep. So I was waiting, people getting on, getting on. And it was getting close to the end, and I noticed no one was in the two seats next to me. That was just a perception. I just noticed that. And immediately, the thought arose: maybe I'll get to lie down. And with that thought, I really saw this incredible clinging, a craving to lie down and the clinging to the idea.

Before, I had just been sitting and watching people come in. And from that moment, everyone who came through the door of the plane—I was looking at them. I was feeling, you know, not hatred, but definitely aversion. Then they'd go past me. Oh, may you be happy! And this is true.

Actually, I noticed I really don't remember what happened. I probably didn't get to lie down. I really don't remember. But watching what the craving did to my mind, the effect it had on my experience, on the people, on how I related to everything in my experience—there's no question that it's suffering, much more suffering than lying down or not. That may be debatable. You have to explore that for yourself.

Ajahn Chah says, kāmogha, a flood of sensuality. We're sunk in sights, in sounds, in smells, in tastes, in bodily sensations. And we're sunk because we look only at externals. We don't look inwardly. So our whole practice is this learning to look inwardly, not to judge, not to try and make it different, but to understand, to get interested, to explore, to see how it works.

Shankara, who was a seventh-century Indian philosopher, one of the main teachers of Advaita Vedanta, said—and it's really true—he said craving is intensified when we let our thoughts and our attention dwell upon sense objects and seek temporary satisfaction in the objective world. The Buddha says the same thing. He says what feeds unwise attention, what feeds the growth of the hindrance of sense desire, is to keep focusing our attention—and this is why it's unwise attention—to keep focusing our attention on the gratification, on how good it feels, basically, of the sense pleasure.

So, just a simple example, like my thing with the airplane seats. As long as I'm thinking, "Oh, that would be so nice to lie down," then immediately, "No, no, no, you can't!" Every person who came in becomes the enemy. Yeah, it really would be nice to lie down. But if you don't focus on that—you had that thought, "it would be nice to lie down," but you just withdraw your attention from focusing on that—it doesn't feed the sense desire.

It doesn't mean you can't lie down if you have the option. It doesn't mean you can't go choose what you like to eat. But we don't have to keep focusing: "That would be so nice. This tastes so good. Let me have more." So explore. That's what the Buddha calls unwise attention—it feeds it.

This habit of unwise attention is what has fed and so deeply made these deep ruts of aversion to the unpleasant, of clinging to the pleasant, and just spacing out with delusion in the neutral. We can see this in our present moment experience.

There's a sutta on the two darts that has so much profound teaching in it. The Buddha is talking about how if you're hit with a dart—an unpleasant feeling—an awakened person is just hit with that dart, that unpleasant feeling. An unawakened person beats and screams and yells and laments, adding a second unpleasant feeling, basically mental distress to the physical.

But then he goes on from that. Having been touched by a painful feeling, an uninstructed, ordinary worldling resists it and resents it. So then, in one who resists and resents a painful feeling—can you relate to that at all?—the underlying tendency, the habit of resistance to the painful, comes to underlie the mind. It becomes a habit.

And under the impact of that painful feeling and the habit to resist it, the person proceeds to enjoy sensual happiness. Why? Because an untaught worldling does not know of any other escape from painful feelings except the enjoyment of sense happiness. I think that's really quite profound to explore in ourselves. When there's an unpleasant feeling, we go for sense happiness because that's all an uninstructed person knows.

So then the underlying tendency to lust for pleasant feelings comes to underlie the mind. The person does not know, according to facts, the arising and ending of these feelings—not saying they're bad, just knowing that pleasant feelings arise and end. Does not know, according to facts, the gratification, the danger, and the escape connected with these feelings. So in one who lacks that knowledge, the underlying tendency to ignorance regarding neutral feelings also comes to underlie the mind.

I've found that in my own exploring so useful—just to see, and again, not with judging. All of this exploration is really to see how the mind works, how these habits get fed, how they get starved, and whether we really experience suffering, disconnection, confusion as a result of them. If we're judging them or ourselves, there's no way to see clearly.

So look in simple ways. The body hurts and the mind goes into a pleasant fantasy. Right there. Painful feeling—let's check out, let's go take a beach vacation. You're home and you go to the refrigerator. You go have a cup of tea. You go make a phone call. No one's saying any of those things are bad. See how our mind goes, "Oh, that's bad. You shouldn't do it. I should renounce." That's just aversion. Explore.

You go and get a bite of ice cream—I must want ice cream tonight, it keeps coming up. Well, how does it unfold? You start with one bite and you end up eating the whole carton of Häagen-Dazs because when you finish that bite, the body hurts again. So you have to have another bite, and the body hurts again, so you have to eat the whole carton. Then your stomach really hurts and you can't eat anymore, so there's something else to do.

Just explore. Is that true sometimes? In the face of the unpleasant, the mind—the uneducated mind—knows of no other escape than to go for the pleasant. So what we're saying is: turn around and look.

There is an escape, and it isn't about going for the pleasant. It's simply bringing clear attention. "Oh, wanting is like this. Desire is like this. Burning, burning, burning, burning." And then, "Oh, okay, now it's gone." Then notice—ah, the peace and ease.

Really, you know, when we get what we want, there's that sense of relaxation, that peace and ease. But we mistakenly think it's because we got what we wanted. Actually, it's because the wanting went away.

It's a lot easier not to have to run around. My brother has a hound dog with such a finely developed sense of smell. The poor thing is just driven by his nose, absolutely driven by it. He comes in the house, and any piece of food, anything that's ever touched a human body—they have to hide the garbage, they have to hide everything, because he just can't stay away from it. It's painful to watch. Sweet dog. That's what it's like. He just can't stop. Sense pleasures.

Well, I don't have so much time for views and sakkāya-diṭṭhi, so I'll move through them briefly. Attachment to views, and then sakkāya-diṭṭhi as personality view.

A view is really a formation of thought, and on one level it's pretty obvious. We can start with, say, a political view. It doesn't take a rocket scientist to see how a certain political idea gets held as right or better, while another one is deemed wrong. My god, this last year—it was inescapable in this country. Look how much vehemence, how much anger, how much hatred really goes into the supporting of one's view and the attacking of the other view.

So this is not subtle or esoteric. It's really easy to see. We're all different in terms of politics, but I know many people in this country, including myself, who knew it was a view, yet were sincerely and deeply attached to that view as being right. That's attachment to a view—a description of how things are, what it means to me, what's right.

We all have views about many, many things. That's not a problem. The attachment, as it's described, is thinking "this alone is true, everything else is false." But of course, it doesn't quite present itself that way. We just think this is how it is.

In terms of obvious views—philosophical views, religious views, political views, views of your family, views of how other people should behave, views of what's appropriate behavior in your partner, views of who's right and who's wrong—you can sense how much suffering there is when there's attachment, when there's holding to a view as absolutely right.

So that's the big, obvious picture. But views also form out of thoughts based on perception. Not even getting to personality view yet, but just subtle views of what's happening right now—views of the solidity of the body, views of what causes suffering or not.

I'll give a very simple example. A friend of mine—and it's a good example of perception, the construction that our thoughts make of it, clinging right away to that construction as being true, and then all the thoughts and reactions and suffering that come from that.

She was sitting on a retreat in a rented facility in Switzerland many years ago, in an old creaky wooden house. The retreat was with Ajahn Sumedho, I think. On the second floor was the big room that served as their meditation hall, and right below it was the walking hall. It was one of those houses with no insulation, and you could hear everything that went on.

They were in a sitting period, and she said she was getting very concentrated, very quiet, just with the breath. In and out. One of those really peaceful sessions where it's going really well. Then someone started doing walking downstairs, and it was just all this creaking. You know how we are—god forbid there should be a sound when we're meditating. Also, this was Switzerland, so during the sitting period, you sit; during the walking period, you walk. You don't walk during the sitting period. My Swiss friends would be okay with me saying this, right?

So she was getting really agitated. "They're ruining my concentration, and they shouldn't be doing it. It's really clear what you should do." Okay, back to in, out, in, out. But she was getting more and more angry and distressed. Back to in and out. Finally she thought, "Okay, I'm just going to be really present with my breath." So she really zoomed in on it.

And then she widened her field of awareness and realized that she was sitting leaning against the wall. Every time she took a breath in, her back pressed against the wall and made it creak. That was the sound she was hearing.

So you get a sense.

There's perception. We think we know what it is. We make up a whole story. We then have moods and emotions that go with that, and a sense of me, and we can get quite distressed.

Now in that case, with clear seeing, the whole thing dissolves. The anger—she could have made up another story about how stupid she was, I don't know, she didn't say that—but the whole thing dissolves with accurate perception.

That's how views are formed: from a perception, a thought about it, not recognizing that thought, another thought, a mood that goes with the thought, then selective perception. We just notice the perceptions that fit the view that's been formed, and it just goes on from there.

So I just want to drop this in, in terms of noticing self-judging whenever it comes up in your sittings or your walkings. First noticing it—that's helpful. I would say almost always there's some view operating in the background that is feeding the judging. The judging is comparing something to something, right? And whatever you're comparing, it isn't good enough or you wouldn't be judging. So there might be a view of what good practice is, or how the breath should be, or "I shouldn't be clinging," or "my life should be more about service," or whatever.

So you might just notice—it's so often there are views operating in the background that we're not even recognizing. This is one place where awareness of thoughts can be really useful. I'm not saying think about it, analyze it, go to your room and write seventeen pages about what your views are of proper sitting. But just have a sense—when the self-judging comes, you might just notice one or two of the thoughts that feed it. "Oh, I'm just spacing out. I'm not with the breath as much as I used to be." That's a sign right there. There's a view: how often one should be with the breath, how the breath should feel, a comparison to the past, and selective perception. Because how many times have we said it doesn't matter how much you're with your breath? But the mind doesn't remember that. The mind remembers the discussion about absorption and never moving from the breath. All the other teachings it doesn't remember. Because that's selective perception. That's attachment to view.

Do you get a sense of what I mean? This is happening all the time. We don't have to hate views, just like we don't hate clinging. When we see them, we don't have to cling to them. "Oh yeah, there's that view, that it should be like this"—and the mind opens up.

But also, there are other times when they say practice just has so many different things arising, and you're just noticing that. Oh, yeah. But then the mind says, "If you should notice it every single second, and I'm spacing out, so that can't be right." Just notice the views when there's judging.

In terms of sakkāya-diṭṭhi—diṭṭhi again just means view, sakkāya-diṭṭhi means personality view—it operates in exactly the same way. The perception of my friend, the perception of the sound, the interpretation that somebody's walking, the aversion to that, the view that everyone should follow the schedule, the view that this is spoiling my meditation, the sense that it's unpleasant and not recognizing that. There's a whole sense of herself in that.

Sakkāya-diṭṭhi is basically that picking up of any particular perception. As we sit, as we walk, as we go through the day, as we've said, it's just a whole flow of nāma-rūpa, of the six sense doors. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking, or emotions. If you really look, that's all that's happening, over and over and over. Sometimes people say, "Is this all?" Yeah, actually. Seeing, smelling, tasting, touching, sensing, thinking, over and over. That's what's happening.

Once I went in to see Sayadaw U Pandita, who was a very tough teacher. I don't actually remember what I said. That's noting—that's a noting practice. You just note everything that's arising. So you're just noting seeing, hearing, thinking, touching, seeing, hearing. And I must have been complaining. I remember he just looked at me. He was really good at busting me. I kind of liked it.

He goes, "So what do you want? Other objects to note?" Because that's all that's going to happen. You can change these objects for those objects. It really doesn't matter.

So sometimes people have mentioned here it feels like they're in the flow. Things are just going and just noticing, and yeah, that feels great. Why does it feel great? Either because it's pleasant and you're attached to it and not noticing it and it's delusion—that's one way it feels great. When it changes and you're suffering, then you'll know that's why that felt great. Or because things are just coming and going and there's no clinging in the mind. There's no making up a story. There's no making a sense of self. It's just how things are. Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. Going, going. That's all. From the time we're born until the time we die. Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. Over and over and over. When there's no clinging, it's no problem. Suddenly, though, it's a problem, right?

So Sayadaw U Lakkhana described it as sakkāya—his description of sakkāya just means this stream of experience. And when at one moment any particular perception, any particular experience is suddenly grasped, it's as if the mind suddenly goes, "This one is me or mine." Right then, there's the sense of personality identity, personality view. This is me or mine. Unfortunately, the mind doesn't usually say it quite that clearly, does it? It's like, "Oh my God, this pain is unbearable." So right then, something's become me or mine. And we can't always tell exactly—is it the pain? Is it the unpleasant feeling? Is it the thought, "This is going to lead me to the hospital"? Is it the aversion? Sometimes we can't tell because all that stuff happens so quickly, so altogether. But right there, you can feel that contraction, that glitch, that ball of twine of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, personality view.

So we can explore it. Just notice when it's there and when it's not. And any sense impression grasped can lead to the whole arising of the sense of self, the sense of personality, just like that. If you explore it with interest, it's really fun and funny and pathetic. And then it goes away.

So you can be walking, and a memory just comes. How many memories just come and go with this one? Some memory of embarrassment in the third grade. So a memory comes of how embarrassing some horrible thing you did in the third grade, and there's clinging to it, and that sense of shame goes over you. "Oh, God." And then right away, all the other memories that contribute to proving that that's really true—suddenly you're just doing walking meditation and you say, "I'm not even walking right, people are probably looking at me," and you know how you teeter a little bit, you lose your balance, you think, "Oh God, they're all seeing me, I can't even do walking meditation right." All of that, just from a memory that was grasped. Whole sense of self coming and going in a moment, right?

This goes on, as I'm sure you know, all day long. But if we don't look, we keep thinking it's the same sense of self, but it's not. Different ones are coming. First, there's that embarrassing one in the third grade. Then there's the one who went to lunch and ate too much, and now their stomach hurts, and you're like, "God, I'm pathetic, I can never control myself." There's that one. Then there's the one who goes and has a pretty quiet sitting and says—

Even though I was tired, I came and sat. I have a lot of virya. I have a lot of faith. It's really going well, you know. And then you remember all the times it went well. That's another one. And then there's the bored one walking out. And then there's the really calm one. And then there's the one who feels old and the one who feels young and the one who feels—it's endless. It's endless. But they're all different.

So Ajahn Buddhadasa said the self is merely a condition that arises when there's grasping or clinging in the mind. A ball of gunk in the mind—it comes and it goes. You can just look at it. Come, look at it, go. What's the big deal?

We hate it. That's one big deal. The other thing is we don't see it, and we're back like that hound dog, running after pleasant, running away from unpleasant, trying to gratify the sense of me. We're rearranging the deck chairs on the Titanic, trying to have a better sense of me.

Fine. Use your meditation to have a better sense of me. That's what we do in the beginning because that's all we know. If I could get concentrated, I can feel better about myself. If I can really have some insights, I can go out of here and astonish everyone with how open and compassionate I am. I was waiting for twenty years for everyone to get astonished, but now I've given it up. It's a lot easier when you give it up. That's the freedom. I used to just really want to understand, and now I don't anymore. And that's the freedom.

The Buddha talks about agitation through clinging. Explore and see if that's true. Agitation through clinging. We're just sitting here minding our own business. A thought arises, a pleasant sensation arises, a memory arises, a sound arises, there's a thought that's clinging to it. The whole sense of me right there. Agitation.

Ajahn Sumedho says we're constantly creating our sense of self by thinking about it all the time. And you can't create a peaceful self. Explore and see. But whatever arises dissolves. So that's why it's actually fun just exploring.

Attachment to view—see it clearly. Ah, that's releasing. Sense of self—sometimes you can see what it's about, sometimes not. Just, ah, sakkāya-diṭṭhi is like this. I do that a lot in my daily life. I can feel a sudden grip. What is it? Is it aversion? Is it clinging? What am I clinging to? Oh, sakkāya-diṭṭhi. It's like this. The personality, feeling of shame or whatever. It's like this. Not pushing it away, but just stepping into the awareness, stepping out of the constricted mind of clinging into the unrestricted mind, as the Buddha says, of non-clinging. Non-clinging even to sense of self.

It doesn't have to go away. A sense of self is like this. Clinging is like this. For just that moment, there's a taste of what the Buddha was talking about—liberation through non-clinging. Just a taste.

Luckily for us, just that little taste of the Dharma is enough to really spark the trust, the faith, to keep us looking. One of my teachers said, "A spark of truth is enough to burn up a mountain of lies." It's true. Because when we touch it, we know—oh, that really is the peace and ease that's accessible. Even when we forget it, we know we've forgotten it. We're caught in our stories and all of that. But it's always there—oh, it's like this, sakkāya-diṭṭhi—that potential is always present.

I just want to end with a short reading from Master Sheng Yen, who died just a couple of weeks ago. He was a really wonderful Chan master from Taiwan. I sat a couple of times with him. He was a lovely man.

He says: "One does not practice to become enlightened, but when it happens, it's like waking from a dream. True liberation does not come from wanting to be liberated. In true liberation, there's nothing to want, nothing to discard, no place to go and no place to avoid."

And this is Adyashanti: "Those who are free don't want anything. They don't want anything from their mind. They don't want anything from their emotions. They don't want anything from anyone, and they don't want anything from life. They don't want anything. If you don't want, all that's left is an incredible sense of being free. Not wanting is not the same as aversion. Not wanting is freedom."

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 45

Compassion and Emptiness

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson investigates the essential unity of wisdom (paññā) and compassion (karuṇā), presenting them as inseparable aspects of the awakened heart. She explores the central paradox of spiritual life: how to remain open-hearted in a world of both extraordinary beauty and unbearable suffering, while simultaneously understanding that everything is simply arising and passing away.
>
> Drawing on the Noble Eightfold Path, Wilson explains how sammā diṭṭhi (right understanding) naturally gives rise to sammā saṅkappa (wise intention), which manifests as non-harming, goodwill (mettā), and compassion. She references teachings on bodhicitta—the awakened heart—through Pema Chödrön's description of it as 'tenderness for life' that emerges when we can no longer shield ourselves from vulnerability. The talk includes Nisargadatta's powerful insight: 'I am the world and the world is myself,' pointing to how this recognition frees us from fear while making us wholly responsive to suffering.
> Wilson offers practical guidance on cultivating compassion through deep insight into our own dukkha, emphasizing that every moment of mindful awareness is itself an act of wise intention. She warns against both drowning in suffering (compassion without equanimity) and falling into emptiness (wisdom without engagement), illustrating through inspiring examples from Martin Luther King Jr., James Lawson, and Aung San Suu Kyi how authentic practice manifests as courageous, non-violent action rooted in purified intention.

I want to talk tonight on the broad theme of the unity of wisdom, of emptiness and compassion. I often talk about this because the questions it raises in my mind are really the heart of my practice, the heart of the conundrum or the paradox of life for me in spiritual practice. So I'm always looking at it.

It's the question of how to open the heart and mind, how to remain or keep opening the heart and mind in this complex and painful and sometimes really insane world—with both incredible beauty and love and unbearable suffering to even hear about, never mind witness or participate in.

On the one side there is this. On the other side, the absolute knowing that everything's just arising and passing. As someone said today really beautifully—I'm not going to get her words exactly right—it's all just part of one arising and passing flow.

There's nothing separate. From that place where there's almost nothing to do, nothing to have, nothing to be, from that knowing: how to continue to respond in this world? How to respond when the motivation isn't fear or greed or self-interest?

In a way, to me, those are the two questions. How to stay open in this world, how not to drown in the suffering—that is the compassion that can't really be deep compassion without the wisdom of emptiness. They have to come together. The second question—how to respond from the place of knowing everything's just coming and going and there's no separate anything and it's all just happening—that's the wisdom of emptiness that manifests quite naturally as compassionate, kind action. They go together.

Of course, they're not always equally strong. They're not always even accessible at all. But that's, to me, the deepening koan. Sometimes it seems completely unintelligible to me. Sometimes it's so obvious that they arise together and there's no question whatsoever, nothing to even talk about. It's just so clear how it is. And then all the shades in between.

I'm just offering some reflections and not in any way saying I've got the answers here. But to me it cuts to the heart of the whole reason for spiritual life, for any life, really.

The wisdom of no self, of emptiness, of no separate self, of nothing being more important and lasting than something else, the wisdom of not needing to have preferences—you can have them, but not being attached—the freedom of the heart and mind, of non-clinging. That's one side. The other side naturally arises when the mind and heart isn't clinging: the natural response will be one of wholesome, skillful action.

Just how I was thinking about it tonight—you know those moments we talk about a lot, and you all have them. I call them moments of recognizing the purity of heart or mind, just a moment of simple presence. You know those moments. It's often in nature because nature's easier, especially here. It's not bugging us. In fact, there aren't bugs and nobody's telling us anything. It's easier to just open without our own defenses and sense of self.

I read a book once called Alone, and the only thing I remember from it is a line that said: it's easy to be with nature because nature has no subconscious. There's not this subconscious stuff bugging each other. Just walking in the dark now and seeing the stars and hearing the frogs—those moments when you stop, and there's no particular self-referencing at all. You're not sitting there going, "Oh, a moment of purity, no self-referencing." You're just in that place of whatever you want to call it—perfection or love or simplicity or completeness.

In that place, in that moment, a thought of harming could not arise. It doesn't compute. In that moment, in that place, if a response was called for, it would be one of what the Buddha talked about as the wise intentions—I'll talk about them in a minute—that is the natural manifestation. Non-harming, compassion, goodwill, generosity: the natural manifestation of the pure heart and mind. They go together.

This is what could be called bodhicitta, the awakened heart, the awakened mind. I want to read a little from Pema Chödrön because I love her very down-to-earth description of bodhicitta, the awakened heart, the noble or awakened heart—what bodhicitta means. Guy spoke about it the other night. She calls it the soft spot inherent in all of us. She calls bodhicitta simply a tenderness for life that awakens when we can no longer shield ourselves from the vulnerability of our condition, from the basic fragility of existence. In the words of the 16th Karmapa: you take it all in.

You let the pain of the world touch your heart, and it turns into compassion. Compassion, tenderness for life, the appreciating from the touching without separation, the knowing of the fragility and the beauty of life. Compassion or kindness or non-clinging is the natural response. It's not even like, "Let me think about how to respond." It just naturally flows. They're two sides of the same coin.

Nisargadatta: "Once you can say with confidence, born from direct experience, 'I am the world and the world is myself,' then you are free from desire and fear on the one hand and become totally responsible for the world on the other. The senseless sorrow of humankind becomes your sole concern."

Responsible for the world—not meaning that you personally have to fix it all. That's where we go with our self-cherishing: "I'm responsible for the world, and I'm sure not doing a very good job." That's not what it means. But once we know with confidence—and just for a moment, not once and for all. Don't wait for the once and for all. It goes back and forth. So in those moments when you can know with confidence, "I am the world, the world is myself," in that moment we are free from desire and fear, and the senseless sorrow, the sorrow of humankind because of ignorance, does become our sole concern. That's the tenderness, the fragility, the beauty that touches our heart and elicits a natural compassion, a natural expression of connectedness. I love that particular quotation, actually.

So this is really what I want to talk about in different ways—these two sides of the same coin, just different ways of going in. Another way of seeing how they need each other, how they have to be together, is often when we talk about anatta, which we've talked about quite a bit this retreat: the sense that there's no intrinsic separate self, and all the myriad of questions that the questioning mind comes up with that I do not need to recap, because you all know.

But one of the fears, one of the ideas the thinking mind throws up—an idea that's not based on actual experience, but that arises in many of our self-centered thinking minds—is that the idea of a life of non-clinging or of no separate self doesn't really sound appealing. And all the "what about" and "what if": "What about pleasure? What about love? What about preferences? What about just knowing who I am? Why would I want to live like that?" It's almost as if the idea is that the epitome of wisdom, of emptiness, is some kind of dull, cold, gray void—void of everything, void of happiness, void of everything. That obviously, hopefully it's obvious, isn't true.

Because as I was saying, it's not that at all. It's just the potential for response when response is called for. And the response that naturally arises—and this is the beautiful part in the way the Buddha breaks things down. I mean, he was certainly an organizational genius in terms of organizing how the mind works. Amazing, really. Can you imagine sitting down and coming up with all this stuff? It's amazing.

So in terms of talking about how this penetration of the truth of no separate self, of not self-cherishing, of non-clinging—how that manifests in the world is right there in the Noble Eightfold Path. The first step in some ways is samma ditthi, right view, right understanding, which would be this wisdom piece. Really seeing there's nothing separate, knowing that in a moment. Samma ditthi leading to the next steps, which are translated variously as wise thought or wise intention. And intention, remember we've talked about that—intention being that urge, that mental movement that leads to thought, speech, and action. So wise intention leading to the next steps of the path, which are wise speech, wise action, wise livelihood. And then into the meditation piece, although it's not really separate.

And the really cool thing, if you really look in your experience and hopefully see that it's true for you sometimes, because that helps us trust it more—the really cool thing is that with the deepening understanding, just those little purity moments I was talking about, you don't have to have the big flash-bam-it's-over. Just the little purity moments. And you don't even have to have a really brilliant thought that lets you know you own it. You can trust. In those moments, what starts to happen, what actually does happen, is the habits of our mind, the intentions, the unwholesome ones—our big friends greed, hatred, and delusion. But in terms of intention, he speaks more about greed and hatred.

They naturally start to transform. The wise intention—or the intention of greed—naturally transforms in the light of wisdom into non-greed, which manifests both as renunciation and as acts of generosity. And hatred is broken into two things. There's ill will, which naturally transforms in a moment of purity into friendliness, into goodwill or metta. And the other aspect is cruelty, which can take place internally. Cruelty can be a kind of anger, a striking out, all the way to real cruelty and hatred. And that transforms into compassion, into non-harming, into really caring for and wishing to alleviate our own and other people's suffering.

It's remarkable because this is the natural movement. You'd have to fight not to have this happen. And it makes sense, really, even on the intellectual level—which is useful. I'm always talking about dropping under it, but using our thoughts, as Sally talked about last night, thoughts aren't to be hated. If we can just understand what a thought is, we can use it quite helpfully, instead of having it run our lives, which is more what happens.

On the intellectual level, it even makes sense when you consider the energy that is bound up when so much of our thought, our selective perception, our motivations, and what we do is caught up in self-referencing. You've noticed that, right? Once in a while, how much of our thoughts are about me, how much of the day is about me, how much of whatever happens in the dining room is about me—and then we have to have all our reactions and our responses and then our self-judging for our reactions. No wonder we're exhausted at the end of the day. It is exhausting. It's really exhausting.

So in those moments, have you wondered why, when that's not going on, the energy's better? There's more because all that energy is released into presence. It's released into awareness. It's available, instead of being bound up in this junk that we call our self-story and our life.

So just explore, just a tiny little way. I'll give you a tiny little example that isn't even anything judgmental or bad—just a small illustration of how the shift works. Here at mealtime, there's a sign for dana where people can offer for the meals, which they do in Burma really every day. It's quite nice to see. At IMS we have that too, but the way it works there is you walk into the dining room and there's a wall where you get your plates, and right on that wall there's a big whiteboard calendar with maybe half the month, the dates up, and then if there's a donation that day, it shows who made it and the dedication. So you walk up and you see about fifteen days at a time. Half the time, I never even look at it. Other times I glance. But this one time, a couple of years ago, I had made a donation for some day. And I remember walking in, and as soon as I walked in,

I immediately looked at the board, and I didn't see anything else. I just wanted to see my day. Where's my day? What does it say? Just that sense of the narrowing and the tightness and the self-referencing.

And then I saw, "Oh, yeah. Oh, look at all these days. Look at all these lovely dedications. Look at all this generous stuff." As soon as that was just let go of, naturally there was the expansion and the appreciation of people's generosity, and a kind of friendliness. Goodwill came, quite naturally.

That's a lot of our practice, right? Just the tightness, experiencing it. "Oh"—there's a piece of wisdom, a piece of seeing it. How many times have you noticed, please say at least once, that it naturally kind of opens up? You see that. You have to see it, by God, after three weeks. At least once. But it does happen.

So the thing about intention—and what I'm sure Guy will be talking about a lot more—is that intention is really the seed of the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness of action, thought, speech, and action in the way that the Buddha understood it. And as we've said before and will say again, that goes a little counter to our normal societal ways of assessing the benefit or the usefulness or the success of an action. Usually it's based on whether that action achieved the desired result, which is typically some kind of measurable or observable result. Of course that's reasonable, but that usually determines whether something was a good action—what I wanted to happen, happened.

But what we may forget to look at—or I was certainly never really taught to look at—is how the Buddha understands the purity, the wisdom, the deepening compassion, the habits of our mind and heart. What's being fed? What's being starved? The whole seed of the action is in the intention.

So something may achieve a seemingly good result, but we were driven in the doing of it by total greed or total anger. In terms of looking at what's being cultivated, what's being fed—it's greed, it's anger. Now, take away "feeling greed is bad, anger is bad, so therefore I'm bad." You have to not go there. But just be exploring: does greed and anger, as it gets stronger, increase my sense of happiness or unhappiness, suffering or unsuffering? Does it increase the ability to be present with myself and others in difficult circumstances? Does it increase a sense of separation? Does it open to more of that place of connectedness and beauty?

This is to explore for ourselves, not just to say, "Greed is bad, I'm not going to do it, I'm so bad." That's separate, separate, separate. But this is a really interesting place of exploration—that the natural result of wisdom, of clear seeing, of non-self, of emptiness, is that these wise intentions of non-clinging or generosity, goodwill and compassion naturally grow and strengthen. Our habits of mind and heart really change.

And again, even in little things. I know if you contemplate back—not when your mind is filled with judging, because we can't trust any assessment that's made with a mind colored by greed and aversion. You can't. You can't trust any thoughts that come as a clear assessment. But when your mind is relatively balanced, just contemplate, reflect, and I'm sure you'll come up with moments where somebody was driving you crazy. You were filled with anger or blame or judgment, or you turned it against yourself—wherever we go with those things. Really in it. And something just shifts. It gets down. You really look at the person.

So many people say this. You just look at the person and something about them goes in. You open to them and feel their pain, and the whole story of me and them and their being bad and anger—it's gone. It's gone for that moment. Just the willingness to move out of the self-referential state, where it's all about me and this is bothering me. Oh wow, look at that. It's another angle. It's us, not me and you. I mean, that's saying it verbally, but it happens on another level. That piece of non-separation—immediately, cruelty changes to compassion, ill will changes to goodwill, wanting to keep my things for me changes to a letting go.

Yeah, it might be only for a second. We're not talking about steady state. But just notice this. See if this is really true for you at times.

I think Sally—somebody read this quotation from the Buddha—that whatever one frequently thinks about and dwells upon, that becomes the inclination of their mind. That's just common sense. This is why, of course, the brahmavihāra practice is so valuable—it's obvious that we're actually substituting verbal thoughts. So that's good. That's when I think Sally quoted me at some stupid thing I said one time about fake mettā being better than real aversion.

But what I meant, if I think back—I'm not really sure what I meant. But if I think back, it's like even saying "May I be happy" when I don't feel it. But I don't mean "You stupid jerk, you scum of the earth." At least I'm saying, "May I be happy." A friend of mine was talking about a Tibetan teacher who was discussing acting compassionately, and one of his students said, "But I don't feel it. I don't feel compassion." He said, "I'm not telling you to feel. I'm just saying act compassionately." And sometimes—it's not hypocritical—but sometimes it actually can go that way.

Anyway, where I was going with this: the brahmavihāras are more obvious on the level of actual thought. But even more powerful and profound is every moment of mindful awareness. Because mindfulness, those moments of clear seeing, is pure citta in a way—pure mind. Real mindfulness isn't colored in that moment. It's not corrupted by aversion and greed and confusion, just recognizing what's happening.

So you're just sitting and there's earth element in your butt. And it goes from being some whole story to, "Oh yeah, hardness." That's a simple moment of mindfulness. That's a moment of wisdom, of non-self-referencing. That's a moment where the intention is shifted from unwise, suffering intention to wisdom, to non-harming, to friendliness.

That's why the steadiness, the continuity of mindful awareness has so much power. But it's also why we often don't notice what's happening.

Because it's not any big bells and whistles, but it's steady, steady, steady—opening us to wisdom and changing the habits.

And habits are powerful, right? Habits are powerful. I won't go into it a lot. I'll just say that in the last maybe four or five years, I've been spending quite a bit of time in various nursing homes and assisted living facilities because of my various parents in various places. And so you really get to see a lot of different people, basically in various stages of dementia.

One of the things I would say that goes on in dementia—and it's different for different people—but one of the things is that your personality defense systems, where you're trying to put on a good face but it's not really your big habit, you can't quite remember that one anymore. And so the real habits just start coming out. And you can really see.

There are some places I go in—and there are more women than men usually in these places, but men too—where someone is just really very friendly and affectionate and kind. And every time you go in, she's saying, "Oh, I'm so happy to see you!" And it's not about me. I mean, she doesn't know who the heck I am. But there's just this friendliness. You can tell this is a kind, friendly person.

And then there's someone else sitting there, and you're trying to say something, kind of saying, "Leave me alone." You say, "Do you want to go to this meal? Do you want to go eat now?" And they're all just, "No, I don't want to go eat, you can't make me." And I say, "You're right, you're right. You don't have to eat if you don't want to eat, sorry."

But you never know. And you really can see the habits of a lifetime. What we've cultivated.

I want to set aside certain things—I think Alzheimer's can actually affect the brain in a way that changes the habits, and that's a different thing, right? There's nothing we can really do about that. Parkinson's too, and things like that. But I'm talking about—and I'm including my mother in this—I can really see that the organic kind of mind is still there, and her personality is still there. I've known her, and if anything, her sweetness has come out more. Luckily, my mother's sweetness has come out more. But it was always there in ways.

I want to tell you, for me, it puts the fear of God into me. What's it going to be like? I better get working now.

It's not so funny. Think about it. It's not so funny.

So while these qualities—and I'm going to use compassion as sort of a stand-in for all three of the wise intentions, because in some ways compassion or non-harming, caring, kind of includes all of them—compassion in the way the Tibetans speak of bodhicitta, this tender, awakened heart whose highest manifestation is the sincere wish to practice and awaken so that one can help awaken all beings. I feel this tenderness for life can manifest in many forms.

This happens naturally through our growing understanding and insight and wisdom, through growing trust in awareness and less trust in the painful habits. And also, we can consciously incline the mind with wisdom, with interest. What are we feeding? What are we starving? Sometimes we can't make a choice, but sometimes we can. There's some book called Choose Love. Sometimes we can. Choose compassion.

Sometimes we'd like to and we just can't. But even in those times, we can usually choose mindfulness. We can usually choose awareness of the fact that I totally hate everybody and everything and I can't change that right now—but I'm aware of that.

I'm not kidding. No, no, I'm not kidding. That's something.

Awareness, as Sayadaw U Tejaniya says, is the point that includes. It includes everything. Awareness is not colored or stained or damaged by anything. Awareness can even include hatred. And when awareness includes it more and more, and we begin to take our trust and our stand in awareness, hatred's not being fed anymore.

It may seem really strong and overwhelming, but there's a back and forth. Something starts to shift. It really does.

The Dalai Lama, speaking about cultivation—cultivating compassion—said something that's really key. He said compassion develops through deep insight into what suffering is. And that arises by being present with our own suffering experience. Where else is it going to arise?

We think—I often think—I should be working in a refugee camp, I should be somewhere where there's really suffering. But look at your own mind and heart. There's plenty of suffering and confusion and pain. This is the place we can start to bear witness. This is the place we can learn what compassion and kindness and being present in the face of suffering really is. It's our best laboratory and workshop.

This is why—and I mean this, I know people don't believe us when we say this in interviews, but it's really true—the really difficult aspects or times on a retreat are so key. Because this is the place where the deep suffering, habits, and confusion are really coming up in the light of awareness. As I think I said, one of my teachers used to say, in the light of awareness, all the snakes come up out of their holes. That's what happens. But there's more awareness, there's a little more trust, and there's a commitment. It's in our life too. It isn't just on retreat at all. But retreat is such a valuable opportunity. It doesn't mean we're going to fix it all. That's not what compassion's about. But it means we can bear witness with kindness, with presence. That's really what learning about compassion through our suffering is.

So that's the first piece he says: compassion awakens through deep insight into suffering by opening to being with our own suffering. And then, through this opening to suffering, to dukkha, compassion strengthens as it moves into a sense of empathy or connectedness with other beings and with all beings.

That can also start right here. People give examples of this—just little examples. Having back pain, or having a sense of deep grief, and really struggling with all of it: the pain, the reaction, the aversion, the frustration. But at some point—and for many people this happens—it's not that the pain lessens, but the sense of it being all about me somehow drops. And there arises this recognition: so many people in the world have back pain, or worse. It's not a finger-shaking thing, but it's like, oh, my back pain, my grief is a stand-in, a representative for the grief of the world. It isn't my grief or my back pain. It's like, this is the world. I am the world, the world is myself. We all take turns manifesting different aspects of suffering and beauty.

In this way, what's going on here in retreat—and we can bring the same attitude into our life, of course—it's just more structured here. We have less to distract us. That's why the pains and difficulties seem so big. We have less to distract us. That's done on purpose.

What's arising? That's what's arising. You could say that's the vipaka, the result of previous karma, previous cause and effect ripening right now. How that's being met in the moment—that's the intention being cultivated. So when what arises, no matter how beautiful or difficult or how lost we seem, just that conscious intention to be mindful of it. You don't even have to think "compassionate," just mindful. Just, as Sylvia keeps saying, being friendly with whatever's happening.

That's huge. Every moment, how we meet what's currently arising now is the cultivation of compassionate intention. It's the cultivation of wisdom and it's the manifestation of wisdom. It's really extremely powerful.

So we get so—just like with intention and action—we tend to look so much into the result of action and miss the intention. And similarly, on our retreat, hard stuff is happening, physical, emotional, dukkha in whatever way, and we tend to either focus on what's happening and how to fix it, or how we can't fix it, or how we're not meeting it properly. Instead of just looking at what's the attitude in the mind that's meeting it. Just to have the potential.

I was reading a book recently about nonviolence, different aspects of nonviolence through the ages in history. And there's one line from Dr. Martin Luther King that I really liked. It says, "Nonviolence means avoiding not only external physical violence, but also internal violence of the spirit. You not only refuse to shoot a man, you refuse to hate him."

Compassion, this cultivation of compassion as an expression of deep wisdom, it's that level. Not just refusing to shoot a man, we refuse to hate a man. It's refusing to hate any aspect of our experience. It doesn't mean you have to love it either.

So I want to balance that with Ajahn Sumedho, the same thing in his very down-to-earth way. If you're being very idealistic and you hate someone—or yourself, or you hate something that's arising in your experience here, just to keep it on that level—then you feel, "I shouldn't hate anyone. I shouldn't hate anything. I'm a Buddhist, and Buddhists should have metta for all living beings, and I should meet everything with metta. I should love everybody if I'm a good Buddhist." He says all that comes from impractical idealism. Instead, try having a little metta for the aversion you feel. Recognize aversion for the pettiness of the mind, the jealousy, the envy. Metta meaning peacefully coexisting, not creating problems, not making it difficult or creating problems out of the difficulties that arise in life, in our minds and bodies. It means the stuff happens, and we hate them, all of that happens. We don't have to go the extra step, or when we see we're going the extra step, just let your awareness get a little bit bigger and include that too. Oh yeah, look at that habit of hating the hate. Look at that habit of just, "This shouldn't be happening and I should know better." Look at that.

And in that moment, that's a shift of wise intention, of wisdom—from hating the hate, blaming, to "Oh, it's like this." I love that saying, "It's like this," because you can't really go there without somehow dropping the deep identification and resistance. Oh, it's like this. What do you do with that? Nothing. It's just like this. Okay. A step back into that, at least in the direction of that natural purity.

I'm not saying—and you know already, right—that this is easy or simple in any way. In any way. We wouldn't have to practice so hard, we wouldn't be so... spiritual practice wouldn't be both so central to our lives and so difficult, and we wouldn't have so much inspiration, really, and be so deeply touched by people who can manifest this if it was just run-of-the-mill easy. On the other hand, I feel if we didn't really know, already know below the level of thinking, the truth of this, then we also wouldn't be deeply touched and inspired by people and beings and acts of compassion and wisdom. We just wouldn't even recognize it.

But I'm not saying in any way that it's easy. Our denial systems—well, that's what you've all been seeing, part of what you've been seeing: our particular personal denial systems, our personality denial systems when we come in contact with certain aspects of personal suffering. And in a few interviews today, people were kind of laughing where we go, "Oh, this habit of my mind, I never saw it before." Well, actually, I did see it, but you kind of go, "Oh, I see it, but I'm not really doing that. That's not really happening." And we come back. And then suddenly some veil drops and you go, "Oh, I've been completely blaming myself. I've been completely filled with guilt all the time." And there's a part of your mind that goes, "Yeah, I know. I've been seeing that forever." But not really. The denial, delusion—it's an amazing, fascinating force, really, I think, the force of denial.

So I'm not in any way saying it's easy. One way of denial is just absolutely pushing away physical, emotional suffering altogether, right? The denial of what I read the other night—going for the pleasant, running away, doing something.

We all know that pattern. And that's part of what the structure of retreat doesn't let us do as much. But there are many other forms of denial.

Self-judgment is a huge form of it. This shouldn't be happening. In fact, it's not happening. It's only happening because I'm a loser. If I could do it right, this wouldn't be happening. Or blame or anger. Find your own denial systems. They're really strong. Some is just plain, outright denying that suffering is even happening, because it's too painful to touch.

I've told this story before, but I'll tell it again. I was in the hospital once, many years ago, and I'd been there a while. I was having to get a lot of IVs, where they have to stick the needle into your vein. After you've been there a while, your veins kind of start depleting, and it gets harder to get the thing in. So this one day, a nurse was trying to do it and she couldn't. They tried two or three times and couldn't get it in. It's not killer pain, but it's not nice. And I wasn't in the best space.

Finally she said, "Okay, I'll go get the doctor." And I thought—no disrespect to any doctors—but I thought, now I'm really in trouble. Because the nurses are the ones who do it all the time, not the doctors. So she went and grabbed some doctor walking by. I didn't even know the guy. He comes in, and it's the same thing—poke, poke, poke. A little tear came down, because I was being a good girl, but it really did hurt. And he goes, "What's the matter with you? This doesn't hurt."

At the time, I didn't think, "Oh, that'll make a good story." But it has. I've gotten much more use out of it than those couple of minutes of pain.

But that level of denial—I really could actually understand it. His intention was not to hurt. He wasn't being cruel. That's where you can see that stabbing someone could come from many different intentions. His intention was trying to help. And trying to help, and seeing that you can't control the result and you're hurting someone—that's hard to deal with sometimes. We want it all to be nice. We want it all to be good. We want our good intentions to manifest. But it's not so clear-cut. Life isn't like that. It's ambiguous.

This is where compassion really needs the wisdom of equanimity. The vastness of emptiness. We can drown in our own suffering. Then try just reading the newspapers on a bad day and you think, I can't bear that. I go through periods where I listen to the news every day, and on some days it feels like I'm drowning. I can't possibly open to this.

That's when—and just being here in your own stuff when it's really strong—that's when the compassion is touching the suffering, but you're getting sucked in, drowning in it. It's too much. It's overwhelming. And there's still the me, the me in there. This isn't a judgment.

It's just seeing that the compassion isn't balanced at this moment by the wisdom of equanimity.

Equanimity functions in many ways—there's the vastness of no particular self, the recognition that it's all coming and going and that we can't control outcomes. But equanimity too can fall out of balance. It's not exactly denial, but more like a delusion, what's sometimes called falling into emptiness.

You know those times where there really is a sense, when you're sitting or walking, that everything's just coming and going, coming and going. Nothing lasts. Nothing seems more important than anything else. And you think, out of this, how would you act? What difference does anything make? In this place, nothing really makes a difference. And then that's the place where we find the impulse to act disappearing—falling into emptiness. It can turn into a long period of delusion. It's not our main problem, but it can happen.

Nyoshul Khenpo, the teacher Guy spoke about the other night, warned about this. The danger is that we hear too much too soon. We think we have understood emptiness or sunyata, and we err on the side of the absolute in a nihilistic fashion, obscured by concepts. "Everything's empty." Nagarjuna said, "It is sad to see those people who mistakenly believe in material concrete reality, but far more pitiful are those who believe in emptiness." Those who believe in things can be helped through various kinds of practice, through skillful means. But those who have fallen into the abyss of emptiness find it almost impossible to reemerge, since there seem to be no handholds, no steps, no gradual progression, and nothing to do.

Don't misunderstand this. You can hear the difference when we say "there's nothing to do, nothing to have, nothing to be" and that comes from real wisdom in the moment—there's a natural response if there's something to do. But we can sort of know it intellectually and sort of get lost in the ideas. Somebody comes, somebody's suffering. "There's nothing to have, nothing to do, nothing to be." Disconnect. So that's when wisdom needs to be balanced with compassion. This is why they really, together, are the strength of awakening.

I'm not saying it's easy. And in some ways what it really calls from us is what I think everyone here already has, or you wouldn't be on this path, you wouldn't have been doing so much practice in so many different ways, you wouldn't still be here. But it's really about tuning into your deep aspiration, a commitment really, tuning in over and over and committing ourselves over and over to whatever form the aspiration takes—whether it's a commitment to awakening or to compassion or to integrity or honesty or wisdom, whatever form it takes for you.

We need to sometimes consciously call on it, because the denial system and the overwhelming capacity of so much pain and suffering, so much in this world—and so much of it clearly needless—make it so easy, from what seem like the best intentions, to engage in action. And there's so much, you know, it's endless what any of us could do that really starts from the sincere intention to help, to serve, to come from wisdom, to cultivate love, whatever it is for you. There are a million different ways.

But if we can't keep coming back to staying in touch with that deep inner intention, springing from wisdom, springing from non-self-cherishing, then however wonderful the things we do, it starts to be that the good intention is from the outside in rather than from the inside out. And it starts to get a little off, a little twisted. This is really where the Buddhist emphasis on the purity of intention matters—it starts from the inside.

We all know stories about peace marches where people are marching for peace and the thing turns violent. Where it gets so lost in frustration at people being clearly vindictive, harmful, angry, and the only way we can think to affect change is with anger, with hatred. It's kind of sad that sometimes the main way we know to call up energy is through greed or anger. Sometimes people have said to me, "If I give up greed, what am I going to do, just sit in my room the rest of my life?" But that's the thing to learn. Action can come from other intentions. Real compassion is a great source of action and courage when it comes from the inside out, from not just an idea but from our understanding. When understanding supports compassion, it's so transformative.

But this is really, I think, the koan part, the part that's the whole practice of a lifetime for me. The world is so complex, so ambiguous. Even coming from the inside out, even if we can really get in touch with the depth of our wisdom and motivation, it doesn't mean there's any guarantee that our actions are going to affect the result we want. Can we still take refuge in the depth of our understanding and our commitment to nonharming or compassion? It gets really hard, doesn't it? To trust enough to keep coming back to that.

And then there are times when it's just ambiguous and you don't have all the information. You don't have all the information, and it's so painful.

You just might want to shrink away. How do you stay open in that?

Have you ever had to be the medical proxy for somebody who can't make decisions for themselves, and you have to decide whether the doctor should do this intervention or not? Keep them alive or not? And believe me, whatever things they said to do, something different always comes up. You make the best decision you can. You think, "Well, they would want this to happen," and you do it. And then there's so much suffering that comes from that which you couldn't have known. You think, "My decision put them through these extra three weeks of this suffering."

Can we stay open in that without blame, without judgment, and without needing to say, "It's too much. I don't want to be here"? It's not personal. But we can't control the results of anything. And we don't have all the information a lot of the time.

Can we make a resolve, over and over? Ajahn Sumedho—I was on a retreat here last summer, and he was talking, maybe to the teachers afterward—and he talks so much about having total confidence in awareness. Just trust in this thing. That's his confidence in awareness: awareness can be with anything.

Then he was talking about a really difficult period at his monastery at Amaravati, not so long ago, maybe a few years before. He's the head of the monastery, so he was coming under a lot of criticism. They were having long meetings. It was just one of those long, organizational, really painful periods. And he was getting all the blame.

He said, "I hate being blamed. My personality hated it. I'm thinking, I'm trying to do the best I can. Don't you get that? And everyone's hating me." He was really starting to get caught, he said. And then he stopped. After this had been going on for weeks, months, he said, "I just stopped and I saw I was really getting sucked back into fighting it, resisting it, blame. I thought, I just have to make a determination—an absolute determination—to trust awareness."

This is not an idea, but a deep, heartfelt intention to really trust it, even when you're doing the best you can and everything's going to hell and everybody's blaming you and you know you're just trying to come from wisdom and compassion. Even then, can we take that deep refuge? For him, it's trusting awareness. For each of you, it might be something else. But to keep trusting, to have confidence in the truth of how things really are, to spring from that, and not to get so sidelined into thinking, "The way I want it to be isn't happening, so this must not work. Let me try something else."

For me, it calls up everything, and I fail in it a lot of the time. That's why I get so inspired by people who can model that for me.

One, of course, is James Lawson, who has been a Christian minister for many years but was also a very strong leader in the civil rights movement along with Dr. King. Before the civil rights movement, in the early fifties, he was very deeply committed to nonviolence, and he was a conscientious objector in the Korean War. Because he was a minister, he could have been excused from going to jail. But he said, "No. If other people have to go to jail, I will too." So he went to jail for it. After that, he went to India—Gandhi was dead by then, but he studied there.

This is the point I want to make: afterward, he became one of the teachers of the civil rights movement, teaching how to carry out all the really powerful demonstrations and civil disobedience from a deep understanding of nonviolence—which is, as Martin Luther King said, not just not being overtly violent, but not letting yourself hate.

Lawson said, "When I was in jail, I discovered a strength and power in me to live out of my own conscience." That's really what I'm talking about. How do we find that strength and power in ourselves to live out of our own conscience? And it leads not to being a doormat, but to incredible acts of courage. It doesn't always get what you want, but it really can bring out that inspiration, that sense of possibility in other people.

And Aung San Suu Kyi, who has been under house arrest in Burma for going on seventeen years now—she's a very potent symbol in Burma of the democratic movement.

People really love her – all normal people love her – but they can't even say her name. But she stands for nonviolence. And she says over and over, "My purpose is to purify the mind and heart." She said, "I never meant to become the leader of the democratic movement in Burma. I just try to do whatever's right in the name of love or in the name of justice." She says the motivation is its own reward.

You can't say that what's actually happening is good, or that it even looks like it's going in a good direction. But out of this place of commitment to what seemed true and just, and purifying her own heart, she's been willing to stay. She could leave the country at any time – she could just never go back. So she's been willing to stay there while her husband, who was English, died of cancer, while her two adolescent sons have grown up. She really has no contact – she's really under house arrest. But she knows in some way that she's the heart of inspiration to so many people. And she really is.

One year I was teaching up in Chazwa, in this monastery up in North Sagaing. We visited some little nunneries nearby. We went into one where we often go – it's a poor little one, and they have a little outside patio. Then they took us upstairs in their crummy little building. They have a room where they roll up their mats in the day, and maybe all fifteen nuns sleep there at night. Very crummy, falling-down wood. They took us around, and they had this tiny, crummy little bookcase with the doors closed. They opened it up, pushed aside some books, and whispered, "Look." They had a picture of Suu Kyi, of Daw Suu Kyi. And they were so proud – just these little, almost uneducated nuns. They had to hide it like that, but they were so proud of it, so happy. It's like that with everybody.

So she knows it in some way. But she's not saying, "Oh, I'm the leader." And also, it's not, "It's not working, so I'm out of here." It's finding that sense of deep commitment from wisdom and compassion. Not a doormat. But just knowing that who we are and how we act has an effect, whatever the actual thing that happens is.

And even in very simple ways – I'm not saying we need to be Martin Luther King or James Lawson or Aung San Suu Kyi. Just little actions. All our actions, where we're coming from, has an effect.

I heard this on the radio – John Sununu, who was the chief of staff to the first President Bush. He was talking on the BBC about presidential transition after the last election, choosing team members, and how important it is to choose team members. About foreign policy, he said people may think that the work and the interaction in the State Department and with foreign diplomats is all based on the greater vision. But really what it comes down to is personal interaction. That's the driving force. So it's really important who you get on the team.

And that does matter. It's like the world is just people. Where people come from ends up showing up in what they do, how we act over the long term.

So in terms of cultivation, mindfulness is our strongest tool. It's our strongest reliance, absolutely, because moment after moment of awareness opens us to see the truth clearly. No question about that. But also, just small, simple acts have a huge effect for us. Just the willingness to have this commitment to our deepest aspiration, and to just do a small act of kindness, just a small act of non-hatred towards ourselves, towards others. Either way, you see that we're not separate.

So I think I'll just end with a story that I heard on the radio – one of these people giving their stories.

And it's from a prisoner who'd been in jail for 20 years, convicted of second-degree murder in 1985. He's saying, "Caring makes us human."

I won't read the whole thing, but he's talking about how a small, scruffy cat showed up in the prison yard one day. "I was one of the first to go and pet it. I had not touched a cat or a dog in over twenty years. I spent at least twenty minutes crouched down behind the dumpster as the cat rolled around and luxuriated beneath my attention. What he was expressing outwardly, I was feeling inwardly. It was an amazing piece of grace to feel him under my hand and know that I was enriching the life of another creature with something as simple as my care. I believe that caring for something or someone in need is what makes us human.

"Over the next few days, I watched other prisoners responding to the cat. Every yard period, a group of prisoners gathered there. They stood around talking and taking turns petting the cat. These were guys you wouldn't usually find talking to each other. I even saw sometimes an officer in the group—not chasing people away, but just watching and seeming to enjoy it along with the prisoners. Bowls of milk and water appeared, along with bread. The cat was obviously a stray and in bad shape. One prisoner brought out his small blunt-tipped scissors and trimmed burrs and matted fur from his coat. People said that cat came to the right place—he's getting treated like a king.

"This was true. But as I watched, I was also thinking about what the cat was doing for us. There's a lot of talk about what's wrong with prisons in America—we need more programs, more psychologists, treatment of various kinds. I think what we really need is a chance to practice kindness ourselves. Not receive it, but give it. After more than two decades here, I know that kindness is not a value that's encouraged. It's often seen as weakness. The culture instead encourages keeping your head down, minding your own business, and never letting yourself be vulnerable.

"For a few days, a raggedy cat disrupted this code of prison culture. They've taken him away now, hopefully to a decent home. But it did my heart good to see the effect he had on me and the men here. Simply by saying, 'I need some help here,' he did something important for us. He needed us. We need to be needed. I believe we all do."

Ashanti Davis said, "When I do something for the sake of another, no feeling of conceit or amazement arises. It's as if having fed myself. I look for nothing in return."

Let's sit for a minute.

CHAPTER 46

What If... Shifting the Paradigm

Carol Wilson · 54 min

> In this opening retreat talk, Carol Wilson invites practitioners to question deeply held assumptions about the nature of suffering and freedom. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching that "I teach suffering and its end," she suggests that liberation isn't about escaping to a different world where suffering doesn't exist, but rather about shifting the paradigm of how we understand ourselves.
>
> Wilson explores the Dhammapada verses on mind as the forerunner of all states, reframing the concepts of "pure" and "impure" mind without judgment—simply as moments colored or uncolored by greed, hatred, and delusion. She poses a radical question: What if the natural peace and ease we occasionally notice—during a simple cup of tea or an unremarkable step in walking meditation—is actually our baseline state, while our habitual patterns of craving and aversion are the aberrations?
> Through teachings from Bhikkhu Bodhi, Ajahn Chah, and reflections on Gandhi's concept of satyāgraha (truth force), Wilson illuminates how mindfulness practice is really about the quality of heart and mind meeting experience, not about the experiences themselves. She emphasizes that awareness practice is an active, engaged nonviolence toward our own experience—meeting each moment with honest, non-judging interest rather than resistance or grasping. This quality of open investigation, she suggests, is where wisdom can reveal itself and where true refuge is found.

You've all seemed really settled, and it's been remarkably quiet and still in the hall, which is unusual for the first day of a retreat. Not that we expect it to stay that way—it doesn't need to stay that way. But I'm just commenting and appreciating all of your sincere commitment in being here. I know sometimes the first day can be a little long, and sometimes by the first evening you can be a little tired. That's okay. It's just normal.

I want to talk a little tonight about meditation practice. The Buddha famously said—I'm sure you will have heard this—"I teach suffering and its end." I used to wonder, well, why does he have to teach suffering? That part seems obvious. The ending, of course, we do want. We sign up for that.

But really, the angle I want to explore tonight is the sense that what he was talking about, and what our whole spiritual path is about, isn't about getting to somewhere else where suffering is not—changing our circumstances, getting to a different world, basically. That doesn't happen. If you look at the Buddha's life, even after he was awakened, he couldn't stop wars. He couldn't stop death. He couldn't stop his kinsmen from fighting. He couldn't even stop one of his cousins, a monk who was jealous, from trying to kill him. His awakening didn't stop all the rotten stuff that goes on in the world.

Teaching suffering and its end is about shifting the paradigm of how we understand ourselves in the world, so that we recognize what suffering actually is, how it's created, and how it comes to an end. Perhaps it's a different kind of suffering and a different idea of freedom than we might have assumed from our normal context.

The Buddha said over and over that suffering and its end arises and ceases in our mind, in this mind and body, nowhere else. So our practice of understanding, of freeing the heart, isn't specifically about reorganizing structures in the world. Although when we think and speak and act from clarity, from compassion, then the way we interact and engage will have the effect of changing structures. We won't be feeding the normal paradigm.

There are two famous stanzas: "All states of being are determined by mind. It is mind that leads the way. Just as the wheel of the ox cart follows the hoof print of the animal that draws it, so suffering will surely follow when we speak or act impulsively from an impure state of mind. All states of being are determined by mind. It is mind that leads the way. As surely as our shadow never leaves us, so well-being will follow when we speak or act with a pure state of mind."

Mind is the forerunner of all things. This is really a powerful possible realigning of the way we may consciously or unconsciously think we understand ourselves in the world, and what brings us happiness and what brings us suffering. Our meditation practice here is the work of the mind.

These words "pure" and "impure"—they're not usually a big hit in our culture, to talk about having a pure mind or an impure mind. Our habit is to jump on these words, just like "good" or "bad" or "good" or "evil," with a kind of judgment, a criticalness, a self-judgment. If we think "I have an impure mind," already there's something a little disgusting, a little recoil. Or if "I have a pure mind," it has some quality of—I don't know—Ivory Soap, 99 and 44/100 percent pure or something. Although I used to wonder as a kid, pure what?

I want to redefine what he's talking about when he speaks of acting with an impure mind or heart. Take away negativity or judgment and bring in, in listening to this, just the quality of interest. Oh, what does that mean, pure and impure? How does that function to cause suffering or happiness? That quality of interest without judging is the seed of awakening, is the seed of our whole practice.

When he talks about speaking and acting with an impure mind, it's very straightforward. It's when our thoughts, our speech, our actions, our states of mind are motivated by greed; by its reverse, negativity, which could be hatred, fear, aversion—that whole range; or by confusion, delusion, basic denial—just getting everything all wrong. We're acting as if it's this way, but it's really that way.

Or the deepest level of delusion, confusion, is thinking that it's all about me. That's all it means. And it's not like we're bad if we're doing that—it's just a habit of all our minds. But it's not always present.

So what if our whole meditation practice is really about cultivating, recognizing, coming to trust, almost taking refuge in—as we talked about the refuges last night—this so-called pure heart-mind? Which is simply a moment of awareness, of consciousness, of wakefulness, when our awareness, our consciousness, the heart and mind is not colored by one of these difficult states. That's all. That's all.

So what if the real thrust of our meditation practice is not to create some kind of pure state of mind, but rather to actually recognize that this is the baseline—the more natural, normal state of heart and mind? Innate purity, goodness. What if we could learn to recognize and trust that, and also learn to see how greed, hatred, self-judgment, and confusion arise based on misperception, based on misrecognition of experience, and then telling ourselves stories or having views of what life is about that don't match the way things actually are?

So what if the real truth, and our more natural self—not self, okay, that's the bad word in Buddhism—but our more natural sense of being is actually the pure heart and mind, the mind that's free of craving, of clinging, of aversion, of self-judgment? And so in some way, what if our work in practice isn't to create some other amazing world and get rid of all this gunk, but rather to recognize—along with recognizing the suffering, "I teach suffering and its end"—all the moments, because experience is only moments, all the moments when this pure mind and heart is manifesting, is recognizable, when we can learn to trust it, to feel it?

I'm pointing out that it's little moments, little moments that we tend to overlook so easily because they get hidden by the intensity of something pleasant or the intensity of how unhappy we feel—or just intensity, period. Those little moments when you're just having a cup of tea and there's nothing special, but there's a sense of peace or contentment or ease. Or you can pick a word. It could be happiness. It doesn't have to be happiness. It doesn't have to be joy. It could be joy. It could be peace. It could be calm. It could be just a simple sense of is-ness. It's like this. In that moment, you're not analyzing it. There's no leaning into the future or connecting to the past. There's no big story about, "This is the most amazing cup of tea I've ever had." Then it's not like that anymore, right?

Or you're just taking a step in the walking meditation. Maybe the last step you were bored out of your mind. Maybe the next step you're saying, "Get me out of here." But this step is just a step. There's just space, nothing created around it.

Notice those moments. We all experience many of them in a day. Natural peace and ease of the heart and mind.

And then the habits—the habits, which we tend to take more for granted, think they're the baseline—is to jump in. "Oh, natural peace and ease of mind and body. Now I've got it. How can I keep it? How can I have this step again? How can I have this tea again?" Or, "Oh, now it's gone. Oh, I blew it. That was just a fluke." And of course, this one—which one do you trust? I mean, bottom line, which one do we really think is me?

The Buddha also said that his teachings go against the stream of society, like swimming upstream against the natural current—even in his time. So same here. In some ways, any kind of profound awakening path, not just Buddha's teaching, tends to run against a society of consumerism, a society of greed, a society of having and doing and being and comparing and achieving.

And I'm sure most of you know, coming on a retreat—maybe your family and friends have gotten used to it if you've done it a lot—but the first time, it's rare that the people we know go, "Great!" unless they've been doing it and they're the ones dragging you. But if your friends and family haven't been, and you say, "I'm going on a week of silence"—"What?" I was telling someone, a friend's mother, last year, and she goes, "Silence? You mean like... you don't watch TV in the evening?"

You really don't talk the whole time? It simply does not compute.

So in that way, retreat practice obviously runs against the culture. And that's just the retreat form itself. But on a more subtle, yet actually much more profound level, our path of exploration, of interest, of awakening, is helping us step outside or move upstream against the habits of our own mind and heart, our own assumptions. Not even our conscious ways of thinking, but the assumptions themselves—how we perceive ourselves in the world.

This is part of what made the Buddha so brilliant: he understood that how we perceive something leads to how we think about it. How we think about it constructs the views we have of the world and what makes sense. And often we don't even realize we have those views. We just think that's how it is.

So our awareness practice, our mindfulness practice—instead of just running along with the stream of our views, the way it's set up with the sitting, the walking, just noticing what's happening every moment—gives us a structure to simply not be carried away by the views. It's almost like you step to the side and look: How's the mind working right now? What's causing discontent? What's causing dissatisfaction? What does this experience of non-dissatisfaction, non-clinging feel like?

I actually love this sense of just recognizing how perceptions and explanations define our worldview while we don't realize how we're carried along. I'll give you a recent example that I found amusing.

I was in Burma in January with some friends. We were doing different things—offering food and supplies to different villages in different places. This was organized from a monastery, very traditional Burmese Buddhist worldview. Two of the friends I was with were European and American women who are nuns over there.

So we took a lot of pictures. One of the formal ways generosity is offered is when someone's offering and there's a receiving. It's a very formal, happy occasion, and there's always a photo. We have like a million photos.

One of my friends who's been a nun there for seventeen years, a European woman, was putting some photos from her camera onto the computer. On some of the photos—on different people's skirts or in certain situations—there were these perfectly round, bright, shiny circles. They looked like circles of light all over.

She looks at them, and really being immersed in the classical Buddhist worldview, which talks about different realms of existence and what we might call angels—devas is the word in the Pali language, beings living in more ethereal, happy realms—she right away goes, "These are devas. These are the manifestation of devas." Which I would never have thought.

Then my other friend, who's also a nun there but is a scientist—she has a PhD, she's a biologist with a very scientific mind—she immediately goes, "That is some moisture that has gotten caught in the lens and is having this effect. That's what it is." Boom.
