And this brings me to the third part I want to read, from Ajahn Chah. He talks about the flood of sensuality—just the flood of sense experience that we encounter throughout our days in daily life. We've talked about this, but I just like the way he says it. He says: "Sunk. We are sunk in sights, in sounds, in smells, in tastes, in bodily sensations." Just sunk in it. Sunk because we look at externals and we don't look inwardly.

He says it's like being a prisoner. Somebody else has control over you. When they tell you to sit, you have to sit. To walk, you have to walk. So being imprisoned by the senses is the same as that. No matter how hard you try, you can't shake it off.

Do you get a sense of that, or does it bring up a kind of resistance? "No, no, no—I'm not sunk in senses." Here, that's part of what we're doing. We're actually setting up conditions to allow us to pull out of this flood, this flood of sensuality. Not because it's bad, but because there's so much going on. As all these teachers say, we don't have a chance to just stop and look inwardly and even see what's true. What's going on for us?

And so the sense of kāya viveka isn't only about pulling away, creating some space from other people, but about stepping back from all the expectations and all the sense experience that we're just rolling in, day in and day out.

I don't know if you've ever noticed—I notice myself more and more in the last few years—whatever I've read or watched on TV or read on the computer, it can be something just stupid and passing the time, or something really useful. It doesn't really matter what it is. But when I get quiet, when I sit, or if I'm just going to bed, or just sitting quietly, whatever that was, it's just rolling around in my mind. In my heart, in my mind. If there were emotions involved—I really don't like watching big emotional movies anymore, because who needs fake emotions? There's enough going on in life. It's bad enough. I need to go suffer over somebody who never existed, and they lost this other person, and blah, blah, blah? Give me a break.

But I go to bed and that's what's rolling around in my mind. I think, why am I doing this? So we just need to get a little bit quiet to see this. We might resist: "I don't want to be quiet and see that, thank you very much." But this is what's just going on when we're sunk in this flood of sensuality—to the next thing, to the next thing, to the next thing. We don't have a chance to even see what the effect is.

So this kaya viveka is pulling out of being around people a lot, but also out of this overwhelming flood of sense experience. But I hope you know, when I say this and from what we've talked about all along, I'm not—the Buddha wasn't—saying that sense experience is a bad thing. It's life. It's what's happening. But he just said, let's set up some conditions so we can actually know what's happening instead of just being swept up with the next thing, the next thing, the next thing. When he says we're imprisoned by our sense experience, I think what he really means is we're imprisoned by our habitual reactions, which marry us to the sense experience—reactions we don't recognize.

Now, this we've talked about, so I don't need to go into it too much. You've seen in the early days of retreat how maybe the first couple of days are nice and then it starts to get a little more awkward—or maybe it goes the other way. But there's a sense of having to fit into the schedule, the things that you miss, the things that you want, that noise. You're walking and there's a sound and it's unpleasant and you don't want to walk anymore. Your body hurts. We just react—the body hurts so you stop. It feels good, so you eat more. You're having a nice sitting, so you keep sitting. It starts to hurt, you get up. We are simply run by the reactions of mind to sense experience. Liking it, not liking it, making up a story about what it means about me, how can I fix it.

You may even remember the first few days when you spent time—maybe you don't, maybe you're past all this—getting your little nest arranged and figuring out your schedule. When am I going to eat? When am I going to shower? What works for me? What are these other people doing? I don't know if I want to sit here. I don't like those people. Let me find the right place. It takes up a lot of mental energy. Again, maybe you're past it, but it takes up a lot of mental energy. Even now, when I first come to sit myself in a new place, I've got to suss it out, got to figure it. After a couple days, you settle down, you get your drift going. But those first two days are kind of great to pay attention to because that's the mind imprisoned by reactions to sense experience, wanting to get it all copacetic so we don't have to deal with that anymore.

But it's not that sense experience is bad. It's just when we're sunk in the flood, we don't have the chance to even see what's happening. There's just too much.

So this kaya viveka, as you've seen—there's still plenty of sense experience going on, right? We're not unconscious. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, and thinking—let us not forget—is still happening every moment. You might think, "What? We're still in the flood of sensuality, aren't we?" Maybe. But even so, hasn't there been—and be real about this, don't just automatically say no in your mind—haven't you noticed some more space and some quieting down in the mind, in the thoughts, even just a little at various moments? All the movies and stuff you've seen—hopefully you're not having to rerun them now. Your mind is running on what's for lunch, what's for dinner, what the person upstairs is doing, but it's not the same. There's more space. It starts to quiet down and we're starting to see the patterns, aren't we? Sometimes. Yes. Say yes. Sometimes.

But there's still a huge amount going on. So the other aspect of kaya viveka—what I want to talk about a little—is restraint at the sense doors. I want to talk about this especially because one of the instructions, one of the attitudes we've often been pointing to, is this sense that awareness can meet whatever's arising. Not needing to choose, not thinking that one thing is better than another thing, right? You've picked up that we've been saying that. This doesn't sound completely unfamiliar—just checking, you never know. And so from that point of view, now here I am coming in saying restraint at the sense doors can be really supportive for clear seeing. And you might think: what the heck?

You just said whatever's going on. So this is where we can look and see what is skillful practice, how we can use particular techniques to support our deepening in awareness and wisdom. And it all comes down, of course, to what's the motivation. Was that this morning when James did intention as instructions? It was like a year ago, wasn't it? The sense of checking what's the motivation.

So restraint at the sense doors. What we mean by this in terms of practice is a kind of renunciation. But renunciation as we often think about it—in our culture here we have so much—can come together with a certain negativity. Maybe that's too strong, maybe not. But as the Buddha said before he was awakened, he would hear about renunciation and how good it was, and he would say, "But my heart did not leap up at the thought of renunciation. It felt like a sheer drop-off." That's a quotation from one of the suttas. Because he didn't understand the benefits of it.

So when we think of renunciation as an aversive cutting off, that's not renunciation. That's—guess what?—that's aversion. Restraint at the sense doors really means seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching. We're not saying it's bad to see and hear and smell and taste and touch, but we just restrain, become a little more inward.

For example, seeing is a good illustration. The sense of restraint at the sense doors would be just kind of renouncing that impulse to be looking around all the time. You know how you're walking and you're looking and you're thinking—and you can pretty much tell now when someone's a little spaced out, because when we're spaced out, looking is a way the energy just goes out through the eyes. You say, so what? You can be aware of it. You can. Sometimes. But restraint at the sense doors, in terms of support for the mind at peace, support for our heart that's more present, is to check it out. Restraint doesn't mean refusing to look. It means bringing—as Ajahn Buddhadasa, who I think one of us mentioned, this great Thai forest monk meditation teacher—he talked about restraint at the sense door simply meaning bringing together sati, mindfulness, and paññā, wisdom. He would talk about bringing sati-paññā to the point of sense contact.

So say restraint at the eye door. The first would be just to have a sense of renunciation: I'm just gonna maybe not look around so much. Not out of aversion, but to see: does this help me be more present? And then sati-paññā at the eye door would simply be being present and noticing what happens with eye contact.

Some people have mentioned to me after years of practice, you know, we think, "Well, I shouldn't look around," and that's just kind of a "should" and you get reactive and we get all tight and then we don't look around. I have a friend who thought of restraint at the eye door and walked around blindfolded for a couple of days on retreat. That's not really it. You can walk around blindfolded and be just filled with aversion and greed and not see it.

But noticing—if we aren't looking around all the time, then it's easier to be present when seeing really calls the attention. And noticing what happens when we go off into looking around.

A friend told me some years ago she was doing retreats, she'd been practicing a lot, and she was doing a long retreat on Maui. It's beautiful, you know, it's up high so you can look out, there's a beautiful view of the ocean. She said when she first went, whenever she was doing walking meditation, always outside, she was always looking at the view, almost like, "I have to look." You should look, here I am on Maui, you have to enjoy the view. And then she just started noticing all that lack of restraint at the eye door was just feeding craving. She was getting more and more unsettled, agitated.

So then, out of wisdom—renunciation comes from wisdom, and it's a renouncing of experience that brings us into more agitation and suffering—she said she just started walking along the side of a building and not looking up. Not out of tightness, but out of understanding. And it brought ease. It brought happiness.

It brought open space to her heart.

Later, people would say to her, "What's the matter with you? You're in Maui and you're not even looking up." And she said, "Because it was so much easier. So much peace."

So that's the wisdom of renunciation and restraint at the sense doors. But you could do the same thing, and it could be from aversion.

Another example, another story of friends. Quite a long time ago, they opened a retreat center—I won't say where it is, you'll know who it is—but anyway, opened a retreat center in Switzerland. And again, an even more beautiful spot with lakes and mountains right outside the front. You can't not look—you can't.

The year that they first opened it (I teach there every year), it was really funny because one of the people who was sort of running things said, "Everyone's just sitting outside, just staring at the lake and the mountains, staring at the lake and the mountains." And again, it's like, "I want to put up a big wall so they can't look at the lake and the mountains." It was really funny—I was cracking up. There was this sense of, "No, it's bad. Don't look. Don't look." That's not restraint. That's aversion. It's not necessarily a helpful attitude that the beauty is bad.

So restraint at the sense doors is really about bringing mindfulness and wisdom to the point of contact—whether it's hearing, seeing, smelling, tasting, thinking—when we can, and noticing the effect.

You can see this with unpleasant experience. When the Buddha talks about what causes ill will as a hindrance to keep growing, he says: unwise attention to the repugnance of an object, to whatever it is that's creating and bringing up ill will in your mind—you keep on focusing on that thing.

Have you ever noticed? Ayya Khema always gives the example: if you're really annoyed at someone and you keep on looking at them, what happens to the annoyance? It feeds it, doesn't it? You look at it—okay, that's lack of restraint at the eye door, and no sati-paññā at the eye door. And that keeps on feeding the ill will.

So the restraint—"let me not look"—might feel a little hard, might really feel like a renunciation at first, because you just want to look. Because you want to suffer more. "Let me look and get really worked up. Let me look"—and it just turns into a cycle. So wisdom may come in and just say, "Okay, just don't look. Just try not to look." You want to look, but you don't. That's restraint.

And noticing how, over time, with the not looking, the heart and mind come back to peace. They come back to ease. And in this case, restraint and renunciation are not a giving up of something wonderful. They're a choice for our happiness and well-being, for greater understanding.

So that's what I mean by restraint at the sense doors—it's really fed by the motivation and the effect. And I'm not saying that sense experience is bad at all.

Even from the Buddha, a very short little couplet: "A bhikkhu keeps her eyes from wandering restlessly with desire. And her ears are deaf to chatter and gossip. She has no longing for new sweets to taste, nor has any desire to possess things in the world as her own."

Okay, that's pretty high, what he's saying—a strong statement. But the next line is: "Where she is in contact with sense impressions, she does not become sorrowful or sad. She should not begin to wish for some other kind of life, or tremble when confronted with fearful things."

So in other words, how I read that is: don't let your eyes and mind run restlessly with desire, but on the other hand, when you meet experience, don't tremble or wish it were different or be sad.

It's just what it is. Both of these perspectives are supportive of practice. And so our subtlety of practice, our flexibility of mind, our skillful means, involves seeing how seclusion—kāya viveka, seclusion from the flood of sensuality and from people—is supporting a clearer seeing of just what's going on. How is it supportive of inward looking, of more peace, more ease, less reactivity in mind and heart over time? We make choices based on that understanding.

Thich Nhat Hanh speaks to this beautifully. He talks about how we like to have our windows open, but if we leave our windows open all the time—and he's really talking about our sense doors—everything is coming in and just disturbing us. It's simply too much. So he says, "Sometimes a beginning meditator may want to leave the city and go off to the countryside to help close those windows that would trouble his spirit if left open. There he or she can become one with the quiet forest, rediscover and restore herself. The fresh and silent woods help you remain in awareness. Yet when awareness is well-rooted, when it can be maintained without faltering, then you may wish to return to the city and be there less troubled. But before you reach this point, you must be very careful, nourishing your awareness moment by moment, choosing the surroundings and sustenance that assist you the most."

This is really just as the Buddha is—very pragmatic. For many of us, I would say for most of us, unless you're extremely unusual, seclusion of body and seclusion from a lot of interaction and seclusion from this flood of sensuality is extremely helpful and important to support clearer seeing, understanding, and greater peace.

And you may start to notice—hopefully you have—as the flood of sensuality and reactivity in the mind begins to slow down, doesn't it? Sometimes it's just a trickle. There are moments when there's not much at all. There are moments when there's sati-paññā at your sense door contact and there's really just nothing created around it. Silence. Space. That's really what I was alluding to, what I was feeling when I walked up and said, "Ah, the moon." That was sense contact. It was seeing. It was pleasant. But then the mind didn't have to do anything else about it. Ah, a sense of peace. We can notice that more.

And so this space, this silence, this more balanced awareness does grow as we give ourselves the opportunity to explore, to renounce, to have some restraint.

But—there's always a but—you may have noticed it's not like one-way traffic. As the flood of our habitual thinking and reaction and sense experiences begins to quiet down and there is more space and less reactivity in the mind, sometimes that actually leaves space, not just for the hindrances, but really for even more unexpected wild stuff to come up and be seen. Have any of you noticed that at all?

I want to read a story from the Desert Fathers, those early Christians in the centuries after Jesus. Saint Antony of Egypt was the most famous of the Desert Fathers. His life inspired thousands to leave their homes and follow him. He was from a really rich family. He heard the words of Jesus that you should sell all you have and give to the poor, and he actually believed it, did it, and went off way out into the desert. Finally he moved to a deserted fort, fifty miles south of Memphis in Egypt on the east bank of the Nile. He lived alone without seeing a human face for over twenty years, being brought supplies of bread and water every six months.

Sometimes the friends who brought these supplies would hear terrifying shrieks and groans from behind the locked doors. Eventually they could stand this no longer and broke down the doors, expecting to release a wasted and emaciated maniac. However, Antony emerged healthy, sane, balanced, and full of advice on how to lead an ascetic life. He went to Alexandria to support the Christians who were being persecuted there and spent the rest of his life alternating between retreats into solitude and emerging to help and advise others. Really, the more I read, the sense of the retreat into solitude is balanced by the emergence to support and help others.

But the point I was making is this: being visited by what you could call demons is, unfortunately I'm afraid, a pretty inescapable part of our retreat from daily life into what comes up in our mind and heart as it becomes more quiet. So it's not that something is going wrong. It sure feels like something is going wrong because we hate this stuff. But that may be the reason we didn't really want to go into solitude in the first place. Seriously, you know?

So the demons are going to come up—the shrieks and groans of Saint Antony. Here it could be huge self-hatred, giant fear, patterns of mind like self-judgment, guilt, or greed. You know what your ones are by now. And deep down, you probably know them all. That's one thing. All these years of practice, they come up in different formations together. But mostly, we get the same old ones, the ones that come up and we think, "Oh yeah, I thought I worked through that one. Fifteen years ago." Hello! Let them in. They come up in a slightly different way.

Rage, guilt, pride, worthlessness—the shrieks and groans of St. Anthony. That's part of it all. And often we can miss it because the content may be all about how we're relating to the practice. It isn't good enough, it isn't deep enough, or it's too filled with this, or not enough of that—whatever the particular flavor. Because we're focusing on that content, we miss the fact that here's that demon of total worthlessness. Here's that demon of fear. Here's that demon of pride, whatever it is.

Just knowing that the seclusion may give space for these things to arise—but it's also allowing the mind and heart to grow in wisdom and depth and steadiness of awareness, sati-pañña—so that becomes the very tool and refuge we bring to meet the demons. Instead of thinking we're going to get rid of it by jumping to another sense pleasure, which is what we can do in our daily lives, never quite feeling it fully. Here it's like, "Oh no, I really need to get on the computer right now." Ever notice that? Suddenly it's so important. Or, "I've got to talk to someone right now." No. Just sit with it and see what's happening.

This is why it takes so much courage to come into a period of seclusion like this. Seclusion from our life, seclusion from our friends, seclusion from so much sense pleasure. It takes, I think, enormous courage. Some days more than others. Some days it's like, "Oh, this is great. I could do this forever." But the next day is another story. Just respect that in yourselves, in each other.

And one of the reasons we want to keep a sense of supporting each other's seclusion, of really not interacting with each other, is because you never know what's going on with another person. We don't even know what's going on with ourselves half the time, right? So whatever we think is going on with the other person is pretty much going to be projection. Just leave them alone. It's this great gift we give one another—to meet our demons in our own way, on our own terms, with the support of our own mindfulness and wisdom.

So that's kāya viveka. The next is citta viveka, which is seclusion of mind. A friend of mine says that kāya viveka means no body bothers you, and citta viveka means your mind doesn't bother you. It's just a shorthand, but I like that.

Citta viveka, seclusion of mind, really means the mind is secluded from the hindrances. Sometimes it's taken as meaning deep states of absorption, which is one form of citta viveka, but I want to talk about it not only as deep states of absorption but as when the mind is not being caught in kilesa—greed, hatred, delusion arising as a reaction to sense pleasures, as a reaction to experience.

In states of what you would call deep absorption, where the mind is really collected in one experience, states of jhāna—one of the main reasons it feels so onward-leading, why the mind feels so pure, is because when the mind is so absorbed, there's like no space for the kilesas to get in. They just don't even come in. It's not like you're fighting them off. They just don't come up, or something starts to arise and the mind goes, "No, I don't think so," and goes back.

Well, who wouldn't like that? It's nice, the sense of touching what the purity of mind and heart can feel like in a moment. It's not a steady state, it's not enlightenment, it doesn't last, it's conditional. But just to feel that is an expression of citta viveka.

But another way I want to talk about citta viveka is the silence of the non-reactive mind. Not the silence of nothing happening. As our mind quiets, and as the mindfulness awareness is getting a bit more steady—and it is getting more steady, right? In spurts. But there are times when it's more steady, when it's moving with its own momentum. It's not so much effort. And it can really be with different sense experiences, the six sense experiences coming and going. Have you had moments like that? Steady times like that?

In the times when awareness is getting more and more steady and the chatter is quieting down—though there can still be thoughts and such—this silence of the non-reactive mind begins to reveal itself. We start to experience, again like when I was looking at the moon, sense experience or thought or whatever, and the mind is simply quiet, with space around it, not needing to create anything around that experience. It's also a real experience of peace, of purity, that perhaps we don't often notice.

There's a word in Pali: atammayatā. Ajahn Buddhadasa, again in some of his writings toward the end of his life, said this is the ultimate Buddhist concept—atammayatā—which means something like "not being made up of this or that." You could say it's the state of heart and mind of non-concocting. We simply experience what's arising without concocting anything around it. I love the word "concocting" because it has that sense of just making something up out of nothing, on and on and on. Do you have any sense of what I mean?

The highest peace of mind and heart would be complete seclusion from the reactions of greed, hatred, and delusion—where they don't arise at all. But in this citta viveka of non-concocting, we can start to explore sense experience, both when the mind is not concocting and when it does concoct, seeing how each unfolds and what it leads to. This is where we can begin to experience citta viveka.

I read this from a Thai Ajahn—I think it was in The Island, though I encountered it somewhere else as well—from Luang Por Dun, a disciple of Ajahn Mun. This is his re-wording of the Four Noble Truths. For me, this speaks directly to the mind, to citta viveka, the mind that's free from concocting:

The mind that goes out in order to satisfy its moods is the cause of suffering—the Second Noble Truth. Something happens, a sight, a sound, and the mind goes out. There's a whole story. That's the cause of suffering.

The result that comes from the mind going out in order to satisfy its moods is suffering—the First Noble Truth.

The mind seeing the mind clearly is the path leading to the cessation of suffering. This is that sati-paññā at the mind door—just watching this concocting, how it comes up, how it leads to trouble, how it drops away.

The result of the mind seeing the mind clearly is the cessation of suffering.

Do you get that? This sense of... And this isn't rocket science to notice, is it? We're not talking about incredible subtlety here—the mind going out and making trouble. Just very simple, the difference.

Here's an example I wrote down. Just walking. There's a cold wind blowing. There's a sense of coldness and the perception of wind. It's unpleasant. The mind goes, "Ugh." The mind going out to satisfy: "I don't like this. It's cold. I feel disgruntled. Why is it cold like this? There aren't enough good walking places here at Spirit Rock inside, and I can't walk inside with my shoes on because I need to walk in my shoes," and on and on. That's the mind going out, fueled by—it's not rocket science—aversion or greed, creating a whole story.

The mind of non-concocting, citta viveka: Walking. Cold wind. Coolness. Unpleasant. That's it. The mind just doesn't do anything with it. That's citta viveka.

Now, what is truly normal and natural? This isn't some incredible esoteric state that we create. But by bringing sati-paññā, mindfulness and wisdom, just to watching—the same thing, sati-paññā at the mind door—watching the mind that concocts and the mind that doesn't, and just seeing the effect of each, simply keep noticing, keep watching with awareness. The wisdom comes in by itself.

But what I'd like to point to, and this is also from Buddhadasa: recognize those moments. The translation Santikaro uses of suññatā is "voidness," but recognize those moments, I would say, of just the peace, the space of non-concoction. Because often we'll go, "Oh, that's nice"—like looking at the moon—"Ah, the moon, that's nice, it's so pretty, I feel so... ah, it's nice." But we don't really recognize the quality in the mind that's awake, present, alert, where there's just the space of not creating anything around it.

So it can be really helpful to recognize—as Buddhadasa says—to generate a contentment with this kind of emptiness. At that moment there's no sense of anything particular, no sense of self. Just generate a contentment with that. Recognizing first when it's happening, instead of getting sunk again in the sense experience.

I use the moon as an example, but nature is one of the reasons, I think, that having retreats in lovely natural settings is so valuable. Partly we're just privileged to be able to be here—most of the retreats I teach are in some lovely settings, though some aren't. Some places in Burma, not so pretty, but some are. Nature can be really supportive in this way for us, if we can recognize how it works to incline our hearts and minds toward being really present but without any concocting of wanting or aversion or making up a story.

I mean, we can also make up a story—don't get me wrong. We can make up a story about anything, and we do. But nature can be so helpful.

I'll give a couple of examples. I know from your own experience people often mention this, but the point is how we can consciously use nature to recognize citta viveka—the stillness of the non-reactive mind-heart.

Yesterday I went out to the Point Reyes seashore just by myself, simply to take a walk to the ocean, be there quietly, and walk back. And yes, there's much less sense bombardment than doing errands or being at home on the computer. So there's a sense of peace and spaciousness in the environment. Yes, it was mostly pleasant sense experience. It's a lot easier to talk about the non-reactive mind when it's pleasant and you're not being bombarded. I acknowledge all of that. But you can still get lost.

Still, I was noticing, sitting at the seashore—you get that sense of space from looking at the sky and the sea. But then you can notice that it's kind of like a metaphor for the internal space in the mind and heart when the mind isn't fixating on something and reacting. Just tuning into that citta viveka—the mind wasn't going off into wanting. It could do that with pleasant experience: "Oh, this is so nice, how can I have a vacation by the beach, how can I do this more, how can I live..." You could go off that way. But when it's just, "Ah, this"—notice, not just "this is nice," whatever. Notice that quality of vibrant, wakeful stillness, if you can put it that way, of the non-reactive mind and heart.

That's citta viveka. That isn't dependent on taking away sense experience. And it's easier to tune into—and lovely—when we're not too caught in craving, but it's certainly available as we begin to recognize it no matter what's happening.

So here's an alternative experience, also from my own life—being in Burma, where I was again this year for several weeks. I've been going there every year for quite some years. Those of you who've practiced in Burma, India, Asia, or have heard the endless stories about it, know it's noisy. Extremely noisy. Often at night there's just noise everywhere. There's not a sense that it should be quiet. Even in meditation centers, people will come by walking and talking at the top of their voices as they come and go. And we're like, "What? This is a meditation center. It should be quiet." That's something we made up, really.

But the noise I'm talking about here is the loudspeakers in villages all around—at any wedding or any event. They come on. It can be all day and all night. Sometimes I've been where it's day and night for three days and nights without stop. Loud, really loud. If you walk right by it on the road, it literally hurts your ears. This is just part of life there. Everyone has that.

One time we were staying in this village way out in the country—there was hardly any electricity. We had offered some solar panels, which was the only electricity. People have generators. So we're staying there, and at 3:30 in the morning this huge loudspeaker comes on with some Dhamma talk in Burmese. Apparently they do this every night. 3:30. And then at 4:00, across the river, another one started. We asked someone, "Why? Doesn't it bother people? Not everyone's getting up at 3:30." They said, "Oh no, it's nice to lie in bed and listen to the Dhamma." We said, "Really? Okay."

So that's not my example of citta viveka. That's the opposite of citta viveka. But that kind of noise... I've noticed the last couple of years—I'm there, going to bed, and it starts. It's not every night, so you can't get regular, you never know. It starts, and it's like, "Whoa, this is really loud tonight." And the worst is when they start with karaoke—I can't tell you.

It starts really loud, and my mind will have a little reaction, and then I've really noticed the last couple of years, it's like, okay. And the mind just doesn't do anything with it. I didn't believe it at first. But now I don't even notice. It's like someone will say, "God, it was so loud last night." And I'm like, "Oh, was it?" And there's just the same quality of mind.

Now, it could be delusion. That's not citta viveka—that's delusion. You don't notice what's going on. That's not citta viveka. You may feel at peace, but there's not quite the aliveness, you know. But this is more that I can really see it. The mind does nothing with it. And every now and then, something particularly loud reaches out and grabs attention. And the mind goes, "Oh my God, if that goes on all night, I..." Let it go. Just let it go.

And then to really see—citta viveka grows as our wisdom grows, as our practice with seeing this grows. The mind inclines towards the peace of non-concocting because we're so much happier. This is really moving in the direction of the deepest seclusion, which is the ultimate seclusion from the kilesas, where they don't arise at all. Okay, that's down the road. But citta viveka is really something that we can experience—little, big, moment to moment—with pleasant, with unpleasant, with neutral, with big experiences, with little ones.

And in a way, I would just point us to recognizing the quality of it. "Oh, great, thank God, everything's okay." Why is everything okay? Notice what the mind and heart feel like at that point. Notice that wakefulness. At first there might be the thought, "I don't want to look too closely because I might get caught up in aversion and wanting again." At first it's like that—notice. But then you'll start to trust it. You'll trust it more and more because this is really taking refuge in awareness, taking refuge in the peaceful mind, in citta viveka, really coming to see that more and more.

Ajahn Chah's student Ajahn Jumnien, another Thai forest master, said: "At some point, the mind becomes so clear and balanced that whatever arises is seen and left untouched with no interference. One ceases to focus on any particular content, and all is recognized as simply mind and matter—an empty process arising and passing away on its own. A perfect balance of mind with no reactions. Then there is no longer any personal doing."

That's an expression of the seclusion of mind and heart that's really emancipated, that's freed from the arising of kilesas. But we can experience this in moments. One ceases to focus on particular content, and all is recognized as mind and matter, arising and passing of its own. As Greg said earlier tonight, it's just nature. We just give it back to nature. And we're nature too.

I think our koan in terms of how we relate to seclusion—the choices we make around solitude, around seclusion from the sense doors, around restraint at the sense doors, around recognizing when the mind is balanced enough that we can really explore citta viveka without needing to shut down the sense doors, or when we need to support ourselves that way—is to recognize and trust more and more what the silence of the non-reactive mind feels like. And to tune into the motivations when we try to restrain or shut something out. Is the motivation from aversion or fear? "Oh no, this is so peaceful. If people start talking, if there's sound, that's going to wreck my peace." That's not citta viveka. That is holding on to a state.

Ramana Maharshi said: "Solitude is in the mind. A person might be in the midst of the world and yet maintain serenity. Such a one is in solitude. Another may stay in a remote forest and still be unable to control the mind. Such a one cannot be said to be in solitude."

Those attached to desire are unable to experience solitude wherever they are, whereas those who are not attached to desire are always in solitude, even when they are engaged in work and connection with people. That's the Buddha.

In the same way, there's a sutta that many of you are probably familiar with called the Elder Sutta—or in Thich Nhat Hanh's translation, "The Better Way to Live Alone." In this sutta, a bhikkhu comes to the Buddha and says there's an elder who only wants to be alone, and he says how wonderful it is to be alone. The Buddha goes and talks to this elder Thera about it. The Buddha asks the monk Thera, "Then how do you live alone?" And he replied, "I live alone. No one else lives with me. I praise the practice of being alone. I go for alms alone and I come back from the village alone. I sit in meditation alone. That is all. I am alone."

And so the Buddha said—this is Thich Nhat Hanh's translation, which tends to be a little softer—"It's obvious that you like the practice of living alone." He's not saying that that's bad, but he goes on to describe a better way, a more wonderful way to be alone: the way of deep observation, to see that the past no longer exists and the future has not yet come, and to dwell at ease in the present moment, free from desire. This is the same as what Ramana Maharshi was saying. When a person lives in this way, free from desire, just sunk in the present moment, there's no hesitation in his heart. He abandons anxieties and regrets, abandons binding desires, and cuts the fetters which prevent him from being free. This is called the better way to live alone. There is no more wonderful way of being alone than this.

So the kāya viveka, the bodily seclusion, and the citta viveka, the mental seclusion, are in support of our experiencing that purity of heart and mind—a better way of being alone, really secluded from craving, from the wanting, from the creating of the sense of self, the concocting, this endless concocting of a sense of self out of every sense experience.

And so our koan of what's supportive is really in service of moving in this direction of citta viveka that then leads to this deepening sense of abandoning clinging and the concocted sense of self, rather than an idea of what it should look like.

Seclusion isn't just about being isolated. If that isolation is leading to fear of people, resistance to noise, over-reactivity to experience, then what's being fed? What's being fed is aversion and fear and wanting. If you're in the middle of the world and your mind is getting more calm, less reactive, less given to concoction, what's being fed is wisdom and liberation.

So that's what we look at. What's being fed? What's being starved when we make our choices?

I want to say two things to close. The Buddha said, "Two things I never lost sight of while I was still an unenlightened bodhisattva. One is never to be lax in my effort"—in other words, not push, push, push, but never give up. Never give up. And the second: "Never to settle merely for wholesome states of mind." I love that one because it's so easy to do. We think, "Wow, this is so lovely. This is good enough. What more could I want? A little clinging—okay, so what? It's not really a problem." So just watch that—never settle for wholesome states of mind.

I'll end with one story, going back to that sense of how going off to live a life of real seclusion isn't to deny humanity or cut oneself off. Rather, the wisdom that comes out of that so often—as with Saint Anthony—expresses itself naturally, because the natural expression of wisdom is compassion.

This is from a review of a book about hermits. I don't even know the name of the book because I just cut out the review a few years ago. But this part describes a visit to an Anglican convent where the author meets a nun whose need for solitude had taken her to an abandoned cabin on a cliff way off somewhere in some remote place. Having repaired it, she lived there for eighteen years—but not quite alone, because people brought their troubles to her. However, rather than resisting that or feeling like they were intruding, she believed that the responsibility of the solitary one was "to stand at the intersection between the love of God and suffering humanity."

To me, that's a beautiful expression of the wisdom of the really secluded heart and mind—that it manifests as compassion. We stand at the intersection of the wisdom of God and suffering humanity. But along the way, we do what helps support us, even if it means meeting our demons.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 137

Investigating Sense of Self

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this dharma talk from a month-long retreat, Carol Wilson offers a demystifying and practical exploration of anattā (not-self), one of Buddhism's most challenging concepts. Rather than approaching it philosophically, she invites practitioners to investigate directly how the sense of self is concocted moment-to-moment through perception, feeling tone (vedanā), and grasping. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching that consciousness is like a magic show, she demonstrates how turning toward and examining the sense of self reveals its constructed nature—and how it vanishes when seen clearly.
> Wilson weaves together teachings from multiple traditions, including Ajahn Buddhadāsa's insight that 'the sense of self is merely a condition that arises when there is grasping and clinging in the mind,' Ramana Maharshi's ghost analogy, and Suzuki Roshi's image of getting soaked in fog. She illustrates these points with accessible personal stories—from discovering her handwriting in a book to the drama of a favorite mug—showing how I-ing and my-ing (ahaṅkāra and mamaṅkāra) continuously create birth and death of self throughout each day.
> The talk emphasizes that insight comes not through thinking but through sustained conscious awareness and unbiased moment-to-moment mindfulness. Wilson encourages practitioners to notice the contraction of grasping, explore how the magic show is constructed, and recognize the natural spaciousness between births of self. She concludes by pointing out that realizing emptiness of self isn't disconnection but rather the doorway through which mettā, compassion, and wisdom naturally arise.

As Jaya said last night, this is the requisite talk on anatta. But as it happens, I really enjoy exploring and talking about this—let's say concept, though it's not really a concept. It's just a pointing to our direct experience, the whole sense of not identifying with experience as a lasting sense of self.

The idea of anatta is often one that people's minds can get kind of stuck around. Just as Jaya said last night, the perception of impermanence leads to freedom. So too is the perception of anatta, of not-self. But our minds can get so caught—maybe yours not—in this whole idea of: if there's no self, who's driving my car? If there's no self, how will I know where I live? If there's no self, will everything fall apart? All of that kind of stuff.

Or you're struggling. Every time you notice a sense of self, it's "Ah, another failure." Again the sense of self—will it ever go away? You're waiting for the big explosion of emptiness and then it's all over. You never have to deal with this self again, right? You see what a burden it is, you're ready for it to go. And somehow that didn't happen yet, did it?

We get caught in philosophical thinking about it. And this one, if you start believing it, I want to say—endless. Endless.

This is why I love talking about and exploring sense of self. I like to talk about demystifying the sense of self, investigating the sense of self. Because everything the Buddha taught, as far as we can tell, isn't to introduce us to new philosophical concepts to discuss. That really wasn't his point in choosing what to share. Rather, it was to point us to accurate perception of our direct experience, to see what frees our hearts and minds from confusion and suffering. He's not pointing to anatta to drive us crazy—"See if you can get subtle enough to really see it." No. He's pointing to an obvious truth of how things are that, when we begin to recognize it, frees us from confusion.

The way I look at it, which is fun, and that's the angle of this talk, is hopefully from a very practical exploration of the moment-to-moment experience of sense of self arising, sense of self passing away. Not about thinking about it right so that we'll get the big bang. Also, I'd like to point out it's not always like that—one big explosion and you're completely free. It's often the way Suzuki Roshi talked about. You know how he talks about getting wet in a fog? He talks about how if you go walking out in a huge thunderstorm, you get really soaked and you know it—there's no secret.

So we're waiting for that, the big boom. But if you go walking out in a fog—and we get that here a lot, fog—and if you go really walking in it for a couple of hours, you don't quite notice when, but you get soaked. Soaked to the skin, soaked to the bone. But it's a gradual process.

And I know in my experience, for myself and for many, many people, that's how insight, that's how our understanding develops. Little blips moment by moment, accurate perception moment by moment, and we don't even recognize a lot of the time that that's what's happening. Because we're looking for the big thing, and also a lot of these moment-to-moment insights are not so pleasant. And so, you know, that's kind of, "Oh God, what a drag, this is coming up again." Anyway, so that's really how it works.

So I want to talk about really demystifying anatta, exploring the sense of self. Just some ideas that come to my mind, some tips—not in any way covering everything. But first, to talk about what's really the nature of insight. What is understanding, really?

There's a famous quotation from Thich Nhat Hanh I use a lot: "Understanding does not arise as the result of thinking." Did you hear that? Did you believe it? "It is the result of the long process of conscious awareness. Sometimes understanding can be translated into thoughts, but often thoughts are too rigid and limited to carry much understanding." From Thich Nhat Hanh.

I know you all experience that. Sometimes you'll come into an interview and you'll really have, you know, a very real experience you want to talk about, and the words just don't really do it. They're too rigid and limited. So we can't think our way into insight.

But one way I like to describe it—the way I experience insight—is like a shift of perception. It's not that reality suddenly changed. But the perception, the way we see and understand it, suddenly shifts. You know what I mean? And this is not just dhamma insight, but just in our life. I think I talked at the very beginning—right view is really literal. Suddenly we recognize—we're using seeing as a kind of metaphor for all the senses—more accurately. We suddenly see a situation differently, or a problem. Suddenly you see what you could do about that problem, or your personality, from a whole new angle.

So, in a way, the recognition of a sense of self not being a real entity is very similar. It's like the optical illusion—when you see a picture, you know that very famous one that looks like a line drawing of a vase. And you see a vase, but if you look at it another way, it's two faces in profile. That's a very famous one. Or those magic eye things that are just geometric colors, and if you look for a long time in the right way, suddenly a 3D image springs out. They have whole books of those where people just sit and stare at them.

So you see, once you see the other way—both ways—it's not like the first way of perceiving went away, but we also perceive there's another way of recognizing the same set of circumstances. See what I mean? And both then, both ways of perceiving might be accessible. It didn't change reality, but it expanded. It really changed how we can perceive and understand in more than one way. And also we might see more accurately.

So when in those magic eye pictures, when suddenly you see like two hockey players—now this is a trick question. Are there really two hockey players in that flat sheet? Is there really a three-dimensional picture in that flat sheet? No. It's a shift in perception. But you've seen the picture. If someone else came to you who never saw it and said,

"Well, you're just a fool. There's no other thing in there. It's just these blue and yellow geometric patterns"—you don't have to get into a fist fight about it. You don't have to prove anything. But you know for yourself. That's really what we call verified faith.

You've seen it for yourself. You may not always be able to see in that way again, but you've known that there's another possibility. Just that simple shift in perception is like an example of what insight is like. Once we recognize that perception shifts, the perception leads to how we think about the world, how we view, how we respond, how we act. And I'll say more about that, though we've talked some about it already. So that's the basic of how insight works—this shift.

To come to the sense of self: there's one sutta, which I didn't write down where it is—I read it years ago—where the Buddha describes our mind and consciousness as being like a magic show. He gives the example, as I recall, of a magician who comes and sets up his stall on the crossroads. The magician has a stage and he's doing all the magic tricks. And you know how it is when you first see it—it's like, wow, that's amazing. Now, of course, we're all so cynical and sophisticated. We know there's no real magic and we assume it's a trick. I'm thinking back then the Buddha was imagining people would go, "Wow, that's amazing! How does he do it? Oh, it's magic."

But then he says, once you go behind and you see how the trick is done, all the sense of magic falls apart, doesn't it? We see, oh, that's how it's done. Very logical cause and effect. There's no mystery about it. So he says the same thing for how consciousness, how perception and thinking can construct our view of the world.

I'm going to use that image of the magic show in terms of how the mind constructs a view of ourselves as being a separate, steady, lasting entity. And even if we say in our mind, "Well, I know it's not," the way we respond, the way we react, is often from the sense or the assumption that there is. Or am I wrong about that? Does anyone have a sense that you sometimes react to things in the world as if it was all about you and you're the center of everything? Yeah, that's how we look.

This is from Ramana Maharshi. It's my favorite quotation from Ramana: "The idea of self is like a ghost caused by the play of shadows. If you look closely, the ghost vanishes. Because the ghost was never there, so also with a sense of separate self. So long as one does not look closely at it, it continues to give trouble. But when one looks for it, there's nothing to be found. It's found not to exist."

What I think is really interesting—and I love doing this in my own life, not just in formal practice, but in ordinary life—is really noticing, bringing awareness to when the sense of self arises. Because certainly, I would say we experience a sense of self, experientially. I mean, it seems to be there pretty much all the time. That's our assumption. But the felt sense—physical or mental, emotional—that felt sense of "me," of self... is there anyone who never experiences that? You know what I mean? Just that very basic sense of me. This is something that we experience.

And I think sometimes the confusion comes when people are thinking, "Well, I shouldn't be experiencing this," or "I'm not experiencing this."

Or something that has to stop being experienced. You know, we get all crazy about it, instead of just noticing whenever a sense of self arises, and turning ours into another arising experience we can notice. We don't have to make it some big special thing. It's really a lot of fun to explore this because it does come up a lot.

When Ramana was saying to turn and look at it—I think what happens a lot in terms of perception is that when something is so familiar, like the sense of me, when it comes up it's almost not even recognized as something arising. It's just kind of like an assumed backdrop for everything that's going on. And we don't think to look at it. It's almost like our perception, our awareness just snaps shut and we assume it and keep on going and act from it, instead of stopping to see, whoa, what is this?

So how is it a magic show? A sense of self arising in a moment is really—back to my talk of last week—it's really concocted out of moment to moment aspects of our experience. And it's a concoction, a cocktail that's arising over and over and over all through the day with kind of different elements. But not looked at closely, it feels like it's always the same.

The way I want to talk about it tonight is that often—I don't want to say always, but often—the concocting begins with a moment of perception. We've talked about perception quite a bit. You know what we mean by perception in a moment? That sense of when there's a sense object, a sight, a sense door that works, an eye, and the two come together—sight, eye—and there's consciousness. That's called contact. This is happening every moment of our being alive, fast, so fast.

When contact comes together, one of the five aggregates, as someone mentioned—I think Andrea or Brian—one of the five aggregates is perception. This quality, it's a mental quality that recognizes the experience. So seeing, and perception is based on memory. It might be a person, or if it's someone you know, it might be the name, or it might be red, recognizing it as a color, recognizing it as a bowl. This is going on all the time.

Obviously—although it's not so obvious—it's pretty subjective, because the particular perception, the recognition, is of course influenced coming out of our particular life experience, isn't it? But first to say: perception arising every moment is certainly very useful. It's how our whole world is constructed and explained. Of course, half the time it's constructed and explained inaccurately, so that's the problem. But we need some perception, and when we're all in more or less agreement, it helps things to run.

Like you heard the bell gong out there fifteen minutes ago. You know bell, you know, oh, it's time to come into the hall. You know the perception is you're yogis and I'm the speaker—you're quiet and I talk. It's helpful. If we all didn't have any perception of who's doing what, it'd be chaos, and we hate chaos. So perception is really very useful.

But it's also interesting to see how quickly the whole world, our whole description of a world, forms around perception. Just to see how it works is also a very fun thing to play with here on retreat. Some people have been talking about it.

A simple example happened to me a couple weeks ago, but it just struck me because it was so clear. I was looking for a book for something about my talk a couple weeks ago, some quotation, and I don't have my books here. Andrea found the book for me down in the staff yurt. So I was looking through the book—it was a thick book—and I opened it to the page I wanted, and someone had already marked it there, a little note. I looked at the note and there was this immediate—it was my handwriting. Oh great, some things don't change. It's been two years since I was here. But there was this immediate sense of me. It's just a piece of paper with pencil scrawls on it, and me—this felt sense of me. It was really funny. Wow, here I am. And then my whole life—when was I last here? I guess I was using this, I do like this quotation, I guess I do use it a lot. But what was really funny was how just some pencil scrawls could evoke my whole sense of self, past and future. Very interesting. Not bad or good, just really kind of fun to watch that.

So, as I think Andrea was talking about, perceptions are of course influenced by whatever qualities are arising in the mind, as well as memory. When perceptions are influenced by delusion, as she's talking about, we recognize inaccurately—or by greed, or by hatred. Sometimes we just see with another person and we recognize differently from each other, and there's not necessarily a sense of right or wrong. But just to see how implicitly we assume our perceptions are accurate—yet just from different personal histories and different cultures and different ethnicities and different countries and different languages, we're going to recognize differently.

Even when there seems to be a lot that's similar. There's a simple example with a good friend. Actually, Sally, Guy's wife—I was at their house once, and there was a throw over the couch. I said something about, "Oh yeah, it's on that blue throw over there." And she said, "What are you talking about, the blue throw?" I said, "What do you mean? The blue throw on your couch. Big, big blue blanket on the couch." She said, "That's not blue, that's green."

And we really talked about it. I could not see green. She could not see blue. It's really interesting. Then you could get into a whole thing—who's right? Who's wrong? Like there's an absolute blue, and I'm right. You can get nuts about it. Okay, we didn't come to blows over the stupid blue-green afghan, but that quality of perceptions that don't match can lead to war. It leads to a lot of arguments.

Think of a close relative that you have a disagreement with about a particular situation. How much of that's based in differing perceptions of what went on? It's really powerful. And so when the perception is inaccurate, the whole world we create isn't reliable.

The Buddha said—this is his definition of papañca, of complication, of concocting—"Dependent on the eye and forms, eye consciousness arises. The meeting of the three is sense contact. With sense contact as condition, there is feeling tone, vedanā." So that's another aggregate, as well as perception. "What one feels, one perceives"—so you feel it right away, then perception. Beautiful blue throw. Green, not so pretty. Blue, nice. "What one perceives, one thinks about. What one thinks about, one mentally proliferates"—one complicates with associations, memories, and so forth. "And with these proliferations as the source, the mind, the heart, is beset. It is assailed with mental perceptions and notions." Like the story someone told about the monk painting the tiger on the wall and then getting afraid.

So there's a perception, we make up all this stuff, we concoct all this stuff, and whether it's about me or something else, there's a sense of me at the heart of it, and then we really believe it—until we can have a more accurate perception.

A simple example, just to see how this happens. A few years ago when I was in Burma, I was at a meditation center. There was a little flagstone path leading to a Bodhi tree that's surrounded by a concrete wall, just a little thing, and people walk in a circle around it. I was walking up, and there was a Burmese nun walking around it with her hands in añjali. Right away I recognized—okay, that was my perception—walking around, hands in añjali. I thought, "Oh, isn't that lovely? There's such faith here."

I know a lot of the Burmese nuns have very deep faith, and a lot of their practice is buddhānussati, really recollecting the qualities of the Buddha, which is both a samādhi collecting practice and also really lights up the energy, the faith. So that was my historical information that led to that perception. "Oh, isn't that nice? Oh, so much faith." So that was the assailing. Then other memories come up, and the mind makes memories and associations. But it's just a tree, for God's sake. It's just a tree. It's not the Buddha. It's not even the same tree.

She's walking around, you know, so faithful to a tree. What the heck is that all about anyway? And I guess I'm not a devotional type. Blah, blah, blah. All of this in the space of about ten seconds as I'm walking up. When I get close enough to actually see her, she was walking around texting on her cell phone. Oh, okay—so much for all of that.

As soon as you see it, as soon as the perception is accurate, all that story is gone. Just gone. It vanishes into thin mist because it has no relationship to anything. I'm sure my mind went off into some other story after that, but I don't remember what it was. I just thought it was quite amusing.

But that's perception leading to our whole world—what we perceive, we think about. When the perception is inaccurate, we get way far away. When we recognize accurately, the whole magic show falls apart for that moment. You don't have to tear it apart. It's gone because it doesn't make any sense.

Nisargadatta Maharaj says, "The world appears so real to you because you think about it all the time. When you stop thinking, it will vanish into thin mist." And you think, "I don't want it to vanish into thin mist. As much trouble as it gives me, I'd rather have it than not." And as long as that's the case, you'll have it.

Talking more specifically about the perceptions that lead to this concocting of sense of self, I want to quote Ajahn Buddhadasa, who had such a pithy way of putting things. There's a book of his writings that Santikaro Bhikkhu translated, very much exploring sense of self, called Heartwood of the Bodhi Tree. It's really very accessible, fun to read, not abstruse and scholarly at all, although he was a great scholar.

So he says—just for your reflection, not to believe, but to bring us into exploring—when you notice sense of self: "The sense of self is merely a condition that arises when there is grasping and clinging in the mind." That's it. All this huge trouble-making thing that we're at such pains to get rid of, that we suffer so much from—just a condition arising when the conditions come together, when there's grasping and clinging in the mind.

A friend of ours says, "I want, I need, therefore I am." And it's true, but look and see for yourself. This isn't about some kind of judging of wanting; it's about exploring and seeing. We can see it on really strong levels, like Andrea was talking about—how we can get really attached to a view of ourselves, or when she was describing being angry about something and really attached to that. It operates on strong levels, but it's also arising in relation to quite little experiences, hundreds of times every day. That's why we don't really notice it so much. That's why it feels so ongoing.

Merely a condition which arises when conditions are there for it and passes when they dissolve. Just with accurate perception, the whole thing is gone. You don't have to do anything about it. Wisdom does it. Clear seeing, wisdom—when the perception isn't distorted by kilesa, by greed, hatred, confusion.

So it's a condition. He really says it's a sense of self, not a thing but a verb, an activity. There are words in Pali—ahaṃkāra and mamaṃkāra—that are translated as something like "I-ing" and "my-ing." That's what's going on in relation to something. There's grasping and clinging in relation to some little perception or feeling tone or feeling in the body or thought. I-ing, my-ing—boom, birth of self.

Rather than thinking about this, it's really—I swear—it's fun to explore when you're somewhere like this on retreat, where you have the time and space and you're not too involved in complicated interactions. You can kind of see it coming in little ways. This isn't about getting demoralized—"Oh my God, every time I turn around, a sense of self! That's too much." No, it's great that it's too much, because that's how we get to see it. If it just came up once a day, you'd have to be so alert to catch it. But luckily, you'll have many opportunities every day. How fortunate we are to explore this in this way.

So I'll give this little story. I always use this same one because I like it—why make up a new one when I have this? It hasn't happened since then, ten years ago. It's the last time sense of self arose. Why are you laughing? Luckily I'm not a monk, because laying claim to false attainments is a pārājika offense—but I am not ordained.

Anyway, very simple. Just to give a sense of how we can explore this.

I was on a long retreat like this at IMS in Barre quite some years ago. And I know it was quite some years ago because the setup is similar to here—you go into the dining room and eat, all hundred people crammed in there, the same kind of deal. It was a long time ago because at that time we didn't have so much uniformity of dishes and mugs. Now everything's the same, but then it was all the mugs that had collected over twenty years of IMS that people had left there. So you'd walk in to eat or have tea and there were just shelves of mugs, all completely different.

I was deep in the retreat, and for weeks I would just go and take whichever mug, have my tea, and it was simple and easy. Whatever was going on was just going on.

But one day, I went and took a mug as usual, and as I was sitting there drinking my tea, what I realized now is that it just felt very pleasant. The color was pleasant. The way it felt—you know how some mugs just feel good in your hand—was pleasant. And the thought arose: "This is really... this might be the perfect mug. It's just so nice. I like it. I wonder if I should take it back to my room and keep it."

In that moment, that was birth of self. I-ing and my-ing. Me and my mug. Right in that moment—boom—jati, birth of self, right then. The grasping to the pleasantness, the grasping to the idea of the mug. In terms of the dependent origination, which I think Guy will talk about a bit tomorrow, another way the Buddha describes the concocting—the middle part really being, you know, there's contact, there's feeling tone, the pleasant arises. When there's not clear seeing with pleasant, the mind naturally moves into leaning into it and then grasping. Or if it's unpleasant, leaning away and grasping at something different. So that's the grasping and the clinging—ah, me and my mug. And the next is becoming, turning into birth, birth of self.

It's all really fast. But from that first sense of the mind grasping, sense of "me" is a condition that arises when there's grasping and clinging in the mind. So instead of just the mug—that very quick movement of grasping—it's seeing the perception, the pleasant feeling, and then all the birth of self, and then all the attendant thoughts that come with it, all the concocting.

I saw that. And you can feel—this is where you can really notice when that grasping comes in—it's almost like a physical or mental contraction, however it is for you. The world contracts around. I can just feel it. It's like, "Ah, me and my mug." As long as we're focused on the thing we want, we don't notice that. But really, when the Buddha talks about grasping as a maker of measurement, instead of just the awareness, the field of awareness where things are coming and going, it all narrows down to me and my mug.

So in that moment, I saw it. Put it down. Never mind, I'm not going to save it. And that was the death of that self. That's where the dependent origination goes—from birth to suffering and death. In that moment, that was the death of that self. It was over.

As Ajahn Chah describes the dependent origination with its twelve links, as I just described the middle ones, he says it happens so fast. It's not like you have moments to explore. "Wait, there's the clinging. There's the grasping. Wait a minute, I know birth is about to come. I can feel 'me' coming." He said it's like if you fall from a tree—it's really fast and you hit twelve branches on the way down, but boom, you just land in dukkha. You don't really have time to stop and reflect on each branch. There it is. Birth of self, death of self.

He's so funny.

Okay, so that was it for then. But the next day, I came into the dining room, and I looked for that mug.

I pretended to myself I wasn't looking, but you know—I'm not really looking, but let's just look instead of taking the first available mug. Oh, there it is.

So right then, noticing the constriction of wanting, the taking it, the sitting down—this really is a good mug. And so I started thinking maybe I should take it to my room. I started plotting the complications.

I thought, well, my room is all the way at the other end of the building. I'm walking really slow. That means every meal I have to schlep for half an hour walking down to get it, schlep for half an hour back, so I have to start an hour early to get my mug to drink my tea. Okay, maybe not. Put it down. Put it down.

And then it really died. It didn't get born again. But to really see—that's the complications that come from the birth of self, from grasping at something so simple.

So you see, it's fun to watch, right? You don't get all upset about it. Don't take it personally. Every single person on this earth—except maybe our Hans—the mind is concocting like this all the time. And then we beat ourselves up because our mind is doing it. If we had a choice, would you do this? No. It's just what the habits of mind are doing. So we bring in our moment-to-moment mindfulness and explore it.

And seeing the difference between what's effortless—you know, the times of awareness when you're just noticing what's happening. There's interest. It may be clear. It may be vague. That doesn't matter. It may be subtle. It may be gross. That doesn't matter. But there's just a sense of effortless being with what's happening, however it is, until some grasping at some experience comes up and there's a sense of self which just kind of freezes everything. Several people have said that it's so exhausting—the thoughts, the emotions, the moods, what to do.

Here you may not notice immediately what's grasped, whether it's a perception or a feeling or a physical sensation or a mood. But we can at least start to notice when there's that glitch, when there's that sense of narrowing, constricting, when everything's gotten complicated. Not so much thinking your way in, but just—ah—re-connect with the where. Ah, okay. All tight and complicated feels like this. And you bring in awareness and start exploring it again. See what's really going on.

This is where we can really start to notice the power of simple moment-to-moment unbiased awareness, which we've been talking about the whole time. If we're looking for something, that looking for is already narrowing the field of possibilities, putting on blinders. But when we're just moment to moment, whatever's arising, this willingness to just meet with unbiased awareness—that's what allows for a shift in perception, for recognizing something in a way that we didn't before, for maybe seeing how sense of self is constructed, noticing how it vanishes, how the whole magic show can fall apart.

Okay, just quickly. Someone who's inspiring for me in the sense of giving me the felt sense of this kind of freshness of moment-to-moment unbiased awareness—just the newness, the willingness to be present without an overlay of concept or idea. You know, like I think James showed a picture of a baby, right? Just that newness, that freshness, that willingness or interest to learn.

And it's so tricky because of our perceptions feeling so true and being so subtle, like the blue-green thing. I mean, who knew until you meet it? And how willing are we to just not hold on to the perception and go, oh, maybe it is green—and even trying, you can't see it.

Anyway, someone who inspires me in that way, who just gives me that feeling, is the cellist Yo-Yo Ma. I haven't ever seen him or heard him play in person, but I've seen various videos and movies about him over the years. And I know in the last few years he's been quite involved in a project called the Silk Road, which brings together musicians from all over the world, mostly from along the Silk Road in the Middle East and Asia into China. They get together and compose and play with all the different instruments and all the different kinds of music.

And it's vastly different, you know—he's a trained classical cellist in the Western classical music tradition, and he might be playing with musicians from China or Kazakhstan, from Iran, with different scales and different ways of using tone and music. And they get together and compose together and play together. It's really far out—this whole sense of incredible openness and curiosity. Not just "I play mine and you play yours and we try to appreciate each other," but actually doing it together.

I have to say, when I listen with my untrained ears—ears whose perception is really based on what I've grown up familiar with and liking—I can't get there. I try. I have a couple of the albums and I'll really listen because I love the idea, and my mind is like...

it's far out, but I can't really relax into it. Let me put on my Chopin nocturnes again. And I can see, okay, that's not good or bad—that's just my perception. But his openness is so far out, and I take that as a quality of the freshness of moment-to-moment mindfulness awareness that's possible.

The other video I saw of him was actually in Germany years ago on TV, where he was flying in by helicopter to a small tribe in Africa. They showed him getting out of the helicopter—it was in German, and I really couldn't understand much of what was said, but I didn't really need it. He gets out of the helicopter, and it was prearranged—he was meeting the really old man who was the chief musician of this tribe of bush people. They're getting together, and he has his second-best cello, like a million-dollar cello, that he pulls out of the helicopter. And this man has his instrument, which is literally like a round metal oil can with the top and bottom gone, a long wooden pole, and two strings on it. So he was playing that and singing, and then Yo-Yo Ma would play his cello—they're playing for each other. And then Yo-Yo Ma says, "Oh, let's trade." So they trade instruments, and he's trying to play this thing, going, "I can't play it nearly as well as you." Just such a freshness. It's so far out to have that openness to discover.

And so that's really what we're cultivating here with our moment-to-moment mindfulness. Just notice those moments of, "Wow, look at that—completely identified with this thought. Isn't that amazing?" That's the quality of awareness. "Oh, I thought this is what's happening. It's not what's happening at all." I was sure that person who's driving me bonkers is the one walking across in front of me, over my walking path, and all those thoughts. Finally you look up, even though you're trying not to—it's not that person at all. Cool. Isn't that amazing how that works? And the whole magic show falls apart.

So that's why there's this freshness—this mind of mindfulness allows wisdom to come in when it's not distorted by kilesa. And moment by moment by moment, our willingness to just remember mindfulness is what's strengthening the condition for the next moment.

In terms of other aspects of experience that we grasp and create the whole concoction of self from—obviously this is a huge topic; I'm just going to name a few so you can notice in yourself. Perception, as I mentioned, is so easy to grasp and have a sense of self about—like seeing my handwriting, "Oh, my handwriting," the whole world in a second. Fun to watch that.

The sense of body—now this is a huge one. I'm talking about not so much the idea of body; that's an idea. Notice the difference between idea and what's the actuality of the moment's experience. This is what gets really interesting in terms of mindfulness and perception. We all have ideas about our body, a sense of identification, of grasping to body as self. But explore here: when you feel that, when this is me comes up about the body, don't just end there.

Let your awareness tune into what's the experience in this moment that's being perceived as body and being held to. Because when you start to see that, the magic show breaks down at a moment-to-moment level.

I'll just give a couple of examples. You look for yourself—don't agree with me, and she's full of it, okay? Just look and see what's true for you.

So if I'm sitting with my eyes closed in meditation and my knee's killing me—we all know the difference, I'm sure, between the concept "my knee is killing me" and the sensations of burning. We've talked about that. It's not easy, but it's not rocket science. But often seeing how that sense of identification works with the eyes closed, my knee—what's the actual experience that's being perceived as "my knee" in that moment? And then whether it's pleasant or unpleasant.

So often there really is just sensations of vibrating, for example. I'm calling it my knee. When I think "my knee," there's a mental image that comes in my mind—and it's totally different for any of you. There's a sense of my body, or a mental image of my knee that I don't notice as seeing. And the sense of that mental image, which is just a visual thought, and the particular sensation of vibrating, and a concept of space—like locating the sensation down here, and the mental image is here—and it's all, "that's my knee." And not even questioned, you know? That's my body, that's my knee, and it's causing a ruckus, and then we go off into the concoction of "me."

Just explore. Not to make it go away.

I remember many years ago I was doing a vipassanā practice, Goenkaji style, where you sweep your attention through your body. At one point—I wasn't sitting with Goenkaji then, I was with a different teacher you could actually talk to about stuff—this was a long time ago. I was sweeping through my body, but there would be this overlay of image, an overlay of the image which wasn't the sensations, and it was driving me crazy. Because there's the thought: that's an image, it's in the way of the sensation, I can't feel the knee because there's the image of the knee. You know how that is—you get this idea that this is wrong and it drives you crazy? Did that ever happen to any of you here in your practice?

And I went to the teacher, and thank God, he goes, "Yeah, okay, the image is the image, the sensation is the sensation—what's the problem? You just notice what's happening." Sound familiar? It's like, oh, right, image, sensation, fine. We don't have to put it together into some big show. Just look and see.

You look in the mirror and there's this whole idea of me, my body—it's horrible, it's beautiful. It's just a seeing. It's just an image, that image in the mirror. It's just a sight, you know? Is it me? And then we start thinking about it and construct it all. But just with moment-to-moment awareness—not to get all woo-woo and falling apart, but just being in the moment—what's the perception? What's being held to in the moment? How is the mind concocting a whole story, a sense of me?

And notice: you turn away from the mirror, and say you've had all these horrible thoughts about how you've aged ten years in the last three weeks and you're never going to do another retreat, you look like hell. And you turn away from the mirror—that whole concoction falls away. You think, oh, it's time for lunch—it's all gone. Notice that. Just notice that. It's really interesting.

Another big one—big one—vedanā, this pleasant, unpleasant, neutral feeling tone. It's a mental experience of how the mind feels an experience. And often it's the vedanā, the pleasant feeling of something, the unpleasant feeling of something that the mind is clinging to, and often that's not quite noticed. An example: say you've been having a series of good sittings.

Really pleasant, really calm, really peaceful or light, whatever it is. And you know it's pleasant and you like it, but after a while you're really being mindful, you're aware of liking it. "I know it's going to go away," you're telling yourself, and you really believe it. "I know this is conditioned, I know it's going to go away. I'm not clinging." Right? "I'm not clinging." We really think we're not clinging. We know it's going to go. It goes away, and by gum, somehow we're really bummed out.

So there was clinging, but you really don't think you were clinging to the experience. Often it's that pleasant feeling quality arising moment to moment with perception that the clinging is to, and we don't quite recognize that.

Or clinging to the unpleasant. Yes, why would we cling to the unpleasant? Because we're nuts. But we keep, like I said the other day, we keep focusing on the repugnant aspect of something, and that marries us to the thing just as much as holding on to the pleasant.

So all we're saying is just bring that fresh awareness and notice it—not get rid of it, just notice. What's the magic show? How's it concocting us? I mentioned the other night, Buddhadasa often talks about how much pleasant feeling we base our life on. He's saying more just notice the wave-like nature: pleasant, unpleasant, pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, arising and passing every moment. When we start to just notice that, well, I guess it's crazy to base our life around wanting pleasant. But we know it's crazy. It happens anyway. There's no point in saying that. But just noticing this.

The third level—and this, again, yes, I'm going through the Satipaṭṭhāna, the four foundations of mindfulness—is mindfulness of mind: emotions, moods, states of mind. And of course this is a huge area where we perceive and there's a sense of grasping to a particular mood, a particular description, a series of thoughts about ourself. This is really a big area.

And what's interesting, the Buddha says in terms of experiencing the sensations of body and bringing awareness to the movements of mind, the mind is changing so much more rapidly than the body. It's so much more obviously impermanent that if you're going to—he didn't exactly say it this way—if you're going to identify with something, it makes more sense to identify with the body.

But really, maybe—this is me, not the Buddha—because the mind's changing so rapidly, to me that's really a much stronger place where I don't notice that subtle grasping to a particular perception, a particular mood. And we really—that's me, right? This happens so much more quickly.

I mean, I'm sure you've noticed how when a mood comes, even though you can say to yourself, "This wasn't here yesterday, probably won't be here tomorrow"—but it's a difficult mood—isn't part of it telling you, "But this is really how it is. And this is really who I am, deep in the depths. Even though I didn't know it before, I wasn't aware of it yesterday, but it was there, waiting to come out. It was really there. I just was ignoring it in my delusion."

But really just noticing how and what is being clung to, and how that concocts a sense of self.

From Ajahn Sumedho: "So then the self arises. I start thinking about myself, my feelings, my memories, my past, my fears and desires, and the whole world arises around Ajahn Sumedho. It takes off into orbit. My views, my feelings, and my opinions."

Right? And you see how that can happen from any sense experience? This is also a really fun thing to explore, sort of in the way of the stories that Andrea was talking about the other night. From anything. The most innocuous sense experience. You see a deer. "Oh, yes, see. Ah, the cute deer." And Bambi, and the fifth grade, and Old Yeller, and it's endless. Pretty soon I go to Old Yeller and I'm in trauma. Really, I mean, that really did a job on me when I was five years old. And if you're too young to have seen the movie, it's just as well. It's about a dog.

Or something beautiful comes and you're, "Oh, beauty in my life," and then something difficult comes, "Oh, the horrible things in my life," and it's just flipping back and forth every two minutes. But without noticing that each is a new concoction, birth and death of self. We don't really get that. We think it's a steady state.

Ajahn Sumedho then: "But if I recognize that I'm taking off—it's my taking off into orbit—if I recognize that, then my refuge is no longer in being that person."

I'm not taking refuge in being a personality or my views and opinions. So then the world of Ajahn Sumedho ends. Just noticing that.

This whole huge world of Carol can come up around seeing a deer, and then you turn around, the whole thing drops away and it's gone. Notice that. Notice the gone-ness. Notice the seething power of these emotions and stories and thoughts, but the absolute emptiness of them when we don't keep buying into the grasping, when we just notice how the magic show's working.

This is from Dilgo Khyentse, and I'll read it: "I, the sense of I, is just a thought. Thoughts and feelings have no intrinsic solidity, form, shape, or color. When a thought of anger arises in the mind with such force that you feel aggressive and destructive, is that anger in the mind actually holding a weapon? Is it at the head of an army? Can it really burn things or carry them away like a violent river? No, that actual anger, like any other thought or feeling, has no lasting self-existence. It's just like wind roaring in empty space."

I love that. With any strong emotion—beautiful ones too—we don't have to damp it down. It's just like wind roaring in empty space. We don't need to grasp it, we don't need to fear it, we don't need to do anything about it. Just let the wind roar in the empty space and it blows itself out. No problem. When there's not that grasping sense of self—when there is, just let it roar and notice when it falls away again.

So we're just tuning in when there's this contraction of grasping. And of course, I can't go into even more subtle experience like motivation, volition. We always talk about that—who's the one deciding to move? Just a mental factor arising. Or the sense of knowing, of consciousness itself. Because it's arising every moment and it's so subtle, again, it can feel like me. There can just be this subtle grasping, tightening, contracting around it.

So just noticing whenever you feel that little or gross—incredibly gross or subtle—sense of the contraction of grasping and experience that sense of self. Notice the birth of self. Get interested in how the magic show's concocted. Notice when it falls away. As Ajahn Buddhadasa says, birth and death of self happens hundreds of times in a day. So just as we notice the birth, notice the death, and notice the times in between.

He says—this is Buddhadasa again—it's truly normal and natural that the nature of the mind is just to be aware. The times when there's no birth of self after death of self is just awake, calm. Spacious is a metaphor that's often used—spacious as opposed to the narrowness of fixation, of clinging. But space can be an idea that we also cling to.

He says, in any moment when the heart is not clinging or grasping at something and creating a sense of self—in any moment when that's not present—this is Buddhadasa's language—we truly realize emptiness. Because just the emptiness of sense of self, it's truly normal and natural. It's not like some huge endpoint that we've got to get to. It's just the way things are.

Understanding or recognizing anattā isn't like something that's here driving the bus goes away. We just recognize differently. It's not like everything falls apart because now we're not holding it all together. I mean, we're not doing such a great job trying to hold it together, let's face it. It's that, in fact, the burden of trying to hold it together falls away. And it's just truly normal and natural to notice the time between births.

That's why, as we were seeing, periods of calm can be interesting. But you see how uncomfortable calm is. The mind is what Buddhadasa calls "volunteering for suffering." It's calm, nothing's going on. All of a sudden—oh, let's get something going on. Let me think about this horrible thing that might happen in ten years. I'd rather be a suffering self than just this calmness in between taking birth and death of self.

Just notice it.

And the last thing I want to point out is that while reality does not change—the sense of emptiness of self, this natural state of things—this is not the emptiness of disconnection or the calmness of just not caring, of nothing matters. That's not clear perception. That's not the liberating truth the Buddha is pointing us to. It's not passive, unfeeling, or uncaring.

It's really the doorway that opens when our mind and heart isn't all caught up in this obsessive self-referencing. That's when metta and compassion and wisdom naturally become our responses.

The Tibetans said, once you realize emptiness, it would be absurd to do anything negative. It just doesn't make sense. When you realize emptiness, compassion arises with it simultaneously. Just in a moment, in a moment.

Two other quick quotations. From Dogen Zenji: "To study the way is to study the self. To study the self is to forget the self. To forget the self is to be enlightened by all things. To be enlightened by all things is to remove the barriers"—I would say the seeming barriers—"between oneself and others."

And the last, from Mary Oliver: "Love yourself, then forget it, then love the world."

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 138

Wise Intention

Carol Wilson · 57 min

> In this profound talk, Carol Wilson addresses a question central to Buddhist practice: how does the quiet, inward work of meditation relate to our actions in the world? Drawing on the Buddha's teaching that "a wise person is characterized by her actions," she explores the critical relationship between awareness, intention (cetanā), and ethical conduct.
> Wilson distinguishes between macro-level aspiration—our overarching sense of purpose that guides our lives—and micro-level intention, the moment-to-moment impulses that actually lead to speech and action. She emphasizes that good intentions alone are insufficient; what matters is the quality of mind present in each moment of action. The same words spoken from compassion versus frustration carry entirely different karmic weight. Through the example of a young man in prison who wished he could take back "three to five seconds" of reactive violence, she illustrates how unexamined mental habits can manifest in devastating ways.
> The talk draws on the Buddha's teaching that "intention is karma" and explores clear comprehension (sampajañña) as a framework for understanding our motivations. Wilson shares how visiting Dachau deepened her commitment to examining even subtle mental habits of aversion, fear, and greed—recognizing that ordinary people, not uniquely evil individuals, participate in collective violence when seeds of unwholesome intention remain unexamined. She concludes with the transformative power of steady awareness: how ill will naturally transforms to mettā, cruelty to compassion, and greed to generosity when met with wisdom. Quoting Martin Luther King Jr., she affirms that true nonviolence means refusing not only external violence but the internal violence of hatred.

Tonight I want to talk a bit about—well, this sounds grandiose—how do we manifest embodied awakening? Or more specifically, something that I've heard in a couple of questions: what's the relationship between the meditation practice we're doing, this very inward, quiet, subtle practice, and actions in the world? Does it relate at all? Is it some kind of esoteric, isolated, disconnected activity? Obviously the answer is no, but I want to talk a bit about that.

The Buddha was very clear that the way our awakened mind and heart manifests is in our actions. This is a quotation: "A wise person is characterized by her actions. It is through the activities of one's life that one's discernment shines." He also says a fool is characterized by her actions as well. In other words, how we act in the world is reflective of the understanding, the wisdom that's been cultivated, that's grown in our heart, in our mind. So it's obvious, but just to say that what we're doing here is not somehow isolated in any way.

Not that it's an immediate cause and effect—as soon as you see something, you're perfect in the world. But in the big picture, if there's someone you know, or you hear of teachers or whoever, claiming all this wisdom, and you see that they're really acting in unskillful, inappropriate, harmful ways, that's something to really look at, something to really pay attention to.

So I want to talk about this sense that our wisdom manifests in our actions. It's not so straightforward though, is it? The wisdom that manifests isn't just the ideas that non-harming is a good thing—I mean, we could probably sign up for that. That greed causes suffering—maybe you're ready to sign up for that. But the wisdom isn't just the idea that it would be a good thing not to do certain things and to do other things. I think we know that, right? "I'm not going to get angry anymore." Good luck. We can sincerely mean that. We can sincerely mean it. But it's not enough wisdom—moment to moment wisdom—to truly transform how we respond, how we act in the world.

When we don't deeply, truly understand how our minds are working, the habits of our mind—and we've been going on about this the whole time, really emphasizing that the steadiness of awareness allows us to see all the habits that occur, the habits of the kleshas of greed, hatred, and confusion, how they manifest, how they arise, how they act, how they bring us suffering—not as some kind of esoteric exercise just for the hell of it, but because when we don't really know, when we don't really watch and we don't understand how these habits work, and also the beautiful habits, how they transform in the light of awareness—when we don't understand, then even with the so-called best intentions, we find ourselves doing something completely opposite.

I heard this on the radio sometime last year. It really haunted me, on public radio. It was an interview with two men—I came in in the middle of it, so I can't tell you who they were or the whole of what they were talking about. I can only give you this little snippet that haunted me. They were talking about some project they have, working with people in prison for violent crimes, some project of working with interrupting violence. That was the name of it. I missed everything else, except for this little quotation they mentioned from some young man who was in prison for an act of violence. The quote from him was: "I wish I could take back that three to five seconds" of his life when he reacted in a situation with violence that has completely changed and informed the whole rest of his life. Three to five seconds—when we just don't know, we just don't see what our mind and heart, how it's reacting in that moment. It's amazing.

We can see that in ourselves. It may not be a violent crime; it may be that I've had enough cake and you find yourself up there with your hand in the cake again. How did that happen? How could that have happened? That's little, that's not a horrible thing, but it's that same sense of not really being aware of what the mind is doing in that moment.

So that's what I want to talk about: this sense of bringing awareness to the intentions in the heart, in the mind. The Buddha said very clearly, over and over, that the seed of action, the seed of karma, is intention—that motivation in the heart and mind that leads to speech and action.

So in this level of intention, it's that cetanā, the word in Pali, that about-to movement—not the macro, which I'll talk about as well, but the micro, the moment-to-moment impulse in the mind and heart that leads to speech and action.

In our practice here, we say over and over that mindfulness, unbiased awareness, doesn't care what's arising. Our job of awareness is simply to see. Whatever's coming up in the mind, whatever mood or emotion or train of thought, we simply need to be present for it. With pure awareness, watch it. Don't try to suppress it. If greed comes, watch it. If fear comes, be with it. If ill will is arising, be present with it. Ill will is like this. We're not saying act it out, but we're not saying suppress it. It's all equal opportunity for awareness.

So then the question comes: when does it matter? Does it ever matter? Does it ever make a difference? And this is where, when we're not completely aware, it does matter. Whatever qualities are in the psyche, the consciousness in a particular moment—whether it's greed or ill will or compassion or equanimity or mettā—they cohere in that moment to form an intention, that about-to movement that leads to speech and action. It matters.

The Buddha was so clear that the seed of action isn't the result, which is how we tend to evaluate it, but it's in the quality of the intention itself, in that internal moment, which makes it wholesome or unwholesome, karmically. So learning through the steadiness of mindfulness practice, really cultivating an interest, a commitment—not just as an interesting practice, but truly seeing how we understand the workings of our mind, how wisdom comes in and understands what leads to suffering and what leads to freedom in our own mind and heart—is going to impact the way we respond and act in the world.

This is why it takes such a commitment, a willingness on our part to keep showing up for the whole show. It's not in our control. We know that. We space out, we come back. But the willingness to keep looking—I find for myself that over the years the commitment keeps changing, keeps deepening, keeps changing form.

Recently, what re-inspired my commitment was something I've mentioned before, but it had quite an effect. A few years ago, when I was in Germany, I decided I really wanted to visit Dachau, which is set up as a museum—one of the concentration camps. I went there, and I was grateful I went by myself, because I had time to simply walk through and reflect.

It's set up quite skillfully as a museum. They had some of the original buildings, and others were no longer standing—just the foundations. One sense I got was how huge it was. German friends later told me, "But that was one of the small ones."

The museum was arranged with large plaques and posters describing different aspects of the whole situation—the internment camps, the concentration camps, the people who worked there, the things that went on, the different people who were interned. There might be a poster showing all the different nationalities of people in the concentration camp, or people of different sexual orientations, or the Roma, or others—not only Jewish people, but all kinds of people. People who worked there, things doctors did, people who brought in the bread, people in the community who did this and that. They described all these different aspects. So it's huge—so many people involved.

Then often there would be a specific person whose story they would tell. This made it quite immediate for me—it takes it out of the vastness to the personal. We can relate a little better when it's this one person who was the baker, or this one person who went through this particular difficult experience.

In a strange way, what it really did was deepen, really deepen my faith in the Dharma, in our practice, in the depth and power of awareness and steady wisdom to truly transform our hearts and minds. It re-deepened my commitment to keep looking, because the vastness of it took me to the place of recognizing: this is just people. You can't say this is a few really evil people. It's normal people, like me.

And then you look around the world. How many horrific scenarios are happening right now—I don't need to take you through them all; I'm not here to do that—but one could. Horrific scenarios, now, in the past twenty years, throughout all of history, involving thousands and hundreds of thousands of people. They can't all be evil people different from me.

I do not know. I do not know how I would react or respond if I were in a particular situation of genocide, in a concentration camp, or if someone in my family was being threatened unless I did something I felt was wrong. I do not know.

And so the sense that it took me to is a deepening of my willingness, my commitment—and I keep revisiting it—to really look and see: what are the habits of my mind? How will I act in a situation I haven't been in before, one that's scary or difficult or pressured? Just thinking, "Well, I'm a good person, I wouldn't do that"—no. Forget it. Like this young guy in jail, three to five seconds. When the conditions are there, if there are still tendencies to greed or ill will or fear or aversion—yes, there are still tendencies to all of that. And so far, everyone I know has these tendencies.

If we don't want to see it, or if we take it as not personal—this is just the habits that have been cultivated through how we've grown up and what we've learned, what we've been talking about the whole time—if we're afraid to see it or we're not in the habit of looking, if we don't really have that faith in the steadiness of awareness and trust that wisdom really does transform the habits, then we're either going to drown and not look, or we're going to delude ourselves. We just really don't know. We just really don't know.

And so this is where we bring our practice in. This is a laboratory here on retreat, but your mind here—do you think it's a different mind from the one you have in your daily life? No. Maybe you're having some nicer states than you get in daily life. Maybe you're having some really whacked-out states that make you think, "I don't have those in my daily life." Yeah, right. It might be about an orange. It's not about something really important. But the state is similar. This is what we're here to discover.

This commitment to really look, to really look in our mind and heart and see—it's why all the aspects of the path that the Buddha taught, as far as I can understand, of metta, the brahmaviharas, the generosity that Greg talked about, sila, non-harming behavior, meditation—it's not like you do one so you can do the next. All of them are different angles to come in and purify the habits of our heart and mind.

When we talk about the pure mind, moments when it's not acting out of greed, hatred, or confusion, it's not just because it feels good. It's not just, "Oh great, something to get to." It's because the more and more these habits change, the more we can learn to really recognize and rest in the pure heart and mind instead of taking refuge in ill will or fear or greed. I mean, we don't consciously say that's what we're taking refuge in, but where do we go in times of stress? That's what starts to change when the heart and mind begins to be purified. That's what we're doing here.

All those moments where nothing is happening, it's just calm—these are really important moments. Those moments when it's calm and you watch your mind, as I said last time, volunteering for suffering. It's calm, and you'd rather make up something to get upset about. At least then you can explore it. That's the habit of mind, of "me" and aversion popping up.

All these moments of moment-to-moment mindfulness of the mundane. Okay, it's not calm, but you just feel sensation in your foot. You're watching yourself want a third piece of cake. You eat it or you don't eat it, but you pay attention to why you're doing it. Why is sitting, the breath, hearing—so what? It's not "so what." Every moment that's a moment of pure awareness, not filled with greed, hatred, or confusion, is really important. This is the beginning of purification, which just means switching habits. The habits begin to change. And this is what's going to change our whole life and the way we relate and the way we are with other people—so that we don't have our own three to five seconds of unaware, really violent, really harmful, really selfish behavior. Or not too often.

I want to talk a bit about mindfulness of intention, both in the macro and the micro, because sometimes we get confused in that way. In some of the commentaries, they talk about clear comprehension—sati sampajañña. Sati is mindfulness. Sampajañña is the word often translated as clear comprehension. One way to talk about it is recognizing that our mindfulness practice isn't just a narrow focus but includes a broader range of appropriateness.

And really, what's our purpose? Why are we doing what we're doing?

In the broad, macro sense of intention—and in English we use "motivation" and "intention" somewhat interchangeably, which can be confusing when we apply these terms to both macro and micro levels—I want to offer some clarification, as this has come up here.

When we talk about aspiration, like at the beginning of the retreat when you had your small groups discuss your aspiration for practice, or like the Tibetan practice I mentioned the other day of clarifying your aspiration at the start of a practice period—that's more macro. It's a sense of what's really important here, not just in this moment.

Aspiration, in terms of wholesome aspiration, in terms of what's onward leading, what really brings us energy, brightness, faith, and confidence—what got you here? What keeps you here other than social pressure? That's micro-intention: "I'm here out of fear." But the aspiration... in some moments that's true. We just notice that. That's okay. Social pressure can be useful at times. But the bigger aspiration, whatever that is for you—and that might change from time to time—is really this sense of: What's truly important in my life? It's important to take time to tune into that and see.

I think this story is funny. Lama Surya Das was writing about an incident with one of his teachers who has since died, Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche, who was really one of the most profound Dzogchen masters around. Rinpoche had gone to the ocean in France, and Surya writes: "It must have been the first time that Khenpo had seen the beach"—he comes from Tibet, right?—"and observed exactly what Westerners do there."

When he came back to the monastery, he was giving a Dharma talk and suddenly veered off and started talking about the beach. He said, "It was so big!" Then he excitedly described what he had seen: "There were these people there, and instead of sitting and meditating or doing yoga, they were just lying there, almost naked, doing nothing. And then when they were tired of lying there, instead of doing something, they just turned over. And then they lay there again for another few hours."

Khenpo was truly, genuinely perplexed. Why were they doing that? He couldn't understand it, but he had so much compassion for them. And this reflects his sense of: How could they waste their precious human existence? This life is so short, so precious, so valuable—not to be squandered, but to be used impeccably, usefully, for the benefit and welfare of all.

You get a sense of what was important to him. Don't take that as a judgment, but to me it's inspiring. "Not just lounge around all day in the hot sun like a big sleeping lizard!" He got really impassioned. He said, "I just wanted to go wake them up." And he saw this big white chair—obviously the lifeguard's chair—and he said, "But there were two people sitting there, so I couldn't go up. But I wanted really badly to climb up there and announce to everybody that it was time to wake up."

It's funny, but take it as a reminder. And again, this isn't from judgment; this is from really touching in deeply in your heart and mind, honestly—not what you think you should or ought to feel, because that's just disconnection, but what's really important to you. Then, whether every day or once in a while, really take the time to tune in and see what's truly important. Use it as a guideline. This is called clear comprehension of purpose or aspiration. This is the macro level.

But as I've said, while it's really important, it's not enough. Because what really leads to behavior is the moment-to-moment micro intentions that I've been mentioning. As the Buddha said, "Intention, I tell you, is karma"—the movement, the quality in the mind or heart that leads to speech and action.

I know you've all heard this, and it may not be how we normally tend to think. We tend to think—compassion is a good example—that we do something to help.

That's a compassionate action. It may be. It may be. But it really depends on what the motivation is in the mind. We tend to judge by the result, or how it looks. But that's out of our control. Or we judge by the situation around it, but we often don't know the situation. The only thing that's in our control—and if there's mindfulness we do have a moment of choice—is to learn how to get in touch and notice why we're doing what we're doing.

The same action could arise from so many different intentions. I always use the same example because it's just a really easy one. Say you have the idea that there's someone you care about who has a particular kind of behavior that's bringing them suffering, and you really want to help them with that. That impulse could arise in the mind really from a place of caring and compassion. But they're not around then, so you're not saying it then. Our tendency is to just have that thought—oh, that's a good idea—and then we don't pay attention. When the time comes, we just say it. But we're not noticing that just because the idea was coming from compassion three days ago doesn't mean it still is. We assume it's steady state until we do it, and we stop paying attention. That's not the case at all.

So when the time comes to say this compassionate thing, the same phrase could be said from frustration, impatience, hostility, or just complete ignorance. The poor person comes schlepping in at the end of the day, totally exhausted, the kids are screaming, they're trying to make dinner, and you say, "I really have something important to tell you. You've been doing this bad thing for fifteen years and people hate you for it. It would be good to change. Out of all the love in my heart, I'm sharing this"—completely oblivious to what's going on. The same words. Or one day you could say it and really take the time to stop and connect, and it really does come from compassion. It's the kind of thing we see in the compassion practice—you're saying those phrases and noticing all the different feelings that come with it. That's what we're practicing to see: to really see why we're doing what we're doing.

It's these little moment-to-moment movements that, if we're not aware, the habits of mind will tend to surface. As the Buddha said over and over, what we frequently think and ponder upon, that becomes the inclination of our mind. Which, you know, is a little scary sometimes to think about, but it's really important to see. And that importance can bring in this willingness to really look.

Now, the beauty of the willingness to keep noticing, what we've been saying all along, is that the natural effect of clear seeing, of wisdom, when the mindfulness has momentum—say, going back to wanting to say that compassionate thing, but you keep paying attention, you see how the idea was compassionate, but now you're just ticked off at the person. You can see that, so you don't say it. You don't say it. The wisdom allows us to see the ill will, not flinch away from it, not take it personally, and it gives us this moment of choice.

From the space of wisdom, the habits of greed, of holding on, of ill will, hostility, cruelty—those habits naturally transform in the light of wisdom. That's what's so far out about this, what really lends, in my mind, the sense of trust and confidence, the willingness to look, the willingness to see. Because when we do—and I know you've all been seeing this here at times, and then it rebounds and we get lost again—but there are times when you're really just watching craving, watching craving, even watching the mind act on it, but you still watch it without a lot of judgment. And at some point the wisdom, the paññā, just comes in: I really don't need that. You've had that moment where the mind just puts it down and you think, "Oh, I let go," but you didn't let go. Wisdom saw, and craving stopped arising because it didn't make sense. It's so much easier than thinking you have to figure it out and let go. All we have to do is be willing to trust the awareness enough to keep being steady, to keep looking. This stuff naturally transforms. It's really amazing.

Guy likes to say—maybe he said it in some of his talks here, I don't know—he talks about thinking that it's really a beneficent universe. When he first said it, I thought, with my aversive mind, "Beneficent universe? Are you reading the papers? Are you paying attention to history? How can you say that?" But what he means is this: when there's clear seeing, the natural effect of wisdom is yathābhūta, seeing clearly things as they have come to be in this moment. In the heart-mind of purity, in that moment, a thought of harm does not arise. The thought of "it's all about me, more for me and less for you" doesn't arise. You don't have to let go of it. It is dissipated by itself.

That's the trust. That's the sense of beneficent universe that's so far out. It really gives me the faith and the willingness to keep on looking at all the relatively unpleasant moments when the other habits are popping up. We really need to see them.

So this sense of the macro—having clarity within yourself about what is truly important to you. What is your sense of purpose or aspiration? And that can change, you know, as we go through life and as we go through our practice. That's wonderful if it changes. Just keep checking in.

The way it's described is that it gives us a kind of collectedness—it gathers our dispersed energy. It serves as a guideline, as a reminder. If we don't have an overarching sense of what's really important in life, then even when we're paying attention, we just respond haphazardly. We make this choice, we make that choice, not necessarily in a harmful way, but there's no direction, no focus. Whereas if we have a sense of what's important, it can inform our choices. It collects the dispersed energy.

For example, think of having a family. There are probably many sacrifices and many choices you make where you don't do something you want to do, where you give up all kinds of activities in order to support your kids, to be there for them, to be with the family. And it doesn't even—well, it may sometimes—but generally it's not a resentful thing. It's a choice out of compassion, out of metta, out of generosity. You're just doing the obvious, as one teacher said.

You get a sense of how the family gives collectedness, gathers the dispersed energy. It doesn't mean every moment is filled with total compassion, loving-kindness, and generosity. But when there's a choice to make, the sense of what's really important is something we can reference that truly supports us.

In terms of our practice—which is our whole life, not just sitting here—in terms of continuing to cultivate wisdom and awareness, tuning in to your aspiration can give us great determination, resolution, which is one of the paramis. It's the sense of willingness to keep going even in the face of difficulty.

One example of this was the Chinese Chan master, Master Sheng Yen. I don't know if any of you knew who he was. He died just a few years ago. I had a couple of retreats with him in Taiwan. He was a very inspiring, wonderful being—quite realized, very kind, very relational, a great teacher. In Taiwan, he was kind of like the Dalai Lama of Taiwan, with this huge following, tens of thousands of people. But when he would come and teach here, he was just very simple and relational. It's like being around the Dalai Lama—people around just feel good because he's so kind. He manifests compassion and simplicity and kindness. And it's contagious. Wholesomeness is contagious because it's true for us too.

Anyway, Sheng Yen was wonderful that way. He wrote in his autobiography, describing his life, and this quality of aspiration leading to resolution and clarity in his decisions was very inspiring to me.

He was born in mainland China, way before the revolution, before World War II, into a very poor farming family. He became a monk, a Buddhist monk, when he was quite young out in the country. It was very difficult—not much food, very harsh conditions all over. He basically struggled most of his growing up and his young period of being a monk. It was always a period of deprivation.

After World War II, during the time when the Civil War started going again very strongly, he was in Shanghai, I believe, in a monastery. Just when the communists, when Mao, seemed to be winning in 1949, and the nationalists went to Taiwan, he said he knew his commitment was to be a Buddhist monk. That was his life. That's what he was. And he realized that if he stayed in mainland China, he wouldn't be able to do that. They were destroying the monasteries, and he'd either be killed or forced to disrobe. So he wanted to get to Taiwan in order to continue being a monk.

Well, he had nothing. He was poor. The only way he could get there was by signing up with the nationalist army, Chiang Kai-shek's army, and then they would take him over. So he did that. He signed up and was enlisted, and he got over to Taiwan. But it wasn't like he could arrive and say, "Okay, thanks a lot. I'm now withdrawing from the army." Fat chance. So he was there at least ten years, serving in the army.

And he said, you know, the whole time he lived as a vegetarian. Often he didn't have enough food. He said only would he ever eat meat if he was actually really starving, but then he would if he had to. He said the whole time, "In my heart, I was a Buddhist monk." But he was in the army and he had to live and do what you're told in the army, right? But somehow, luckily, he got some kind of a job where—well, they weren't really fighting too much—but he didn't have to do any kind of fighting or any kind of violence. But still, he said it was extremely difficult. Extremely difficult.

And then it was through a whole series of really unexpected events that things began to shift. He says it was extremely difficult, almost impossible for anyone to get out of the army ever—not just like in a few years. But somehow, after time, he managed to meet some other Chan masters on the island. And just through a series of events born from his deep commitment, he would take whatever time off he had and go off and do very strenuous practice in caves with these masters. Just really tough.

And at some point, finally—I don't even remember how—through meeting a couple of masters and someone knowing someone in the government and someone writing a letter, he finally got out of the army after ten years. But the thing is, he said he never in all that time ever abandoned his deep aspiration and intention: I am a Buddhist monk and this is what I'm doing. And when he got out of the army, the first thing he did was go on a six-year retreat. A six-year retreat. And he was just this lovely, lovely guy.

So the sense of the power of aspiration, of touching into it—we don't know what will unfold. And then it has to inform our moment-to-moment actions and decisions. You couldn't just say, "I'm a Buddhist monk," and then sit back and let it happen. You have to do all these actions, and you don't ever know. We never know how any action's going to turn out. So we have to be as clear as we can in the moment. And then in this moment. And then in this moment. We never can be in charge of what's going to happen.

So that's where, for me, this sense of recommitment from being at Dachau—it keeps coming up these last few years, and it's been quite alive. Sometimes it's a little demoralizing when I'm really looking, but other times it's really inspiring because it makes me want to look and see, okay, what habits are still showing up? And it's in the little things.

I noticed last year, I think, I was on a kind of self-retreat—just relaxed, simple, quiet, very peaceful. And I remember at some point I was doing a little walking and some little aversive thing came up. No big deal at all, just a little bit of aversion, and then it was gone. And I could see how my mind would go, "That's no big deal, no problem." I mean, it wasn't a problem. It wasn't bothering me or anybody. But I thought, no, wait, come back a minute. That's the habit of aversion showing up in a really mild way. But you know what? That's not acceptable. In the big picture. I mean, in the moment, yeah, it's just what it is. But in the big picture—remember, I think I quoted, or one of us did, the Buddha saying, "Do not settle merely for wholesome states of mind."

Not like, okay, there's a little bit of aversion, a little bit of greed, it comes, it goes, there's a lot of awareness, it's manageable, it's good enough. It's good enough, but no, it wasn't good enough. It re-inspires me to keep looking, to keep seeing, okay, what are the little habits? Let's see them instead of going, "Well, it's good enough," and then stopping paying attention.

So with little things—when you suddenly slam down the phone or get a little annoyed with that person on the other end calling from Social Security, or not answering, or not even a person, that voicemail, the three and a half hours of voicemail. Still, aversion comes up in the mind. Noticing that. Not with judgment, but with interest, with care, with a willingness to see. Because these are the habits that are going to manifest.

I notice for me sometimes when I go to make a compassionate offering to a homeless person, I just feel a little bit of fear—whether I offer or not. Notice that little bit of fear. Just begin to see where the habits are arising, because this seeing with wisdom, with caring, is what allows for their natural transformation. Otherwise, if we don't see these seeds, they can sprout, given the appropriate circumstances.

And probably many of you are aware that I go to Burma. I've been going every year for the last thirteen years or something. And in the last two or three years, I'm sure you're aware because it's in the news, that there started being more violence—Buddhist and Muslim violence—which is really heartbreaking to read about and see. And again, it's like little pockets here and there, and one can have all kinds of ideas about how it's being fomented and how seeds are being planted and directed from external forces, and all of that. And that could all be true—I think it is true—but still, it's like lots of people, decent people. Not people I know personally, but I know a lot of Burmese people, just people like us. And all of a sudden there's some kind of mob violence that sweeps through. What's that about? And that can't happen if there's not a seed to be triggered.

The seed might be fear. The seed might be fear that's been fed by propaganda, fed by fear of losing your family, fed by all kinds of circumstances. But if we're not aware of how fear comes up in our own mind and heart, how it gets triggered, and we're not able to hang out with it—which fear is a hard one to hang out with—but we haven't had practice hanging out with it, then that's the seed for acting out of it. Get rid of those guys, because if they're gone then I don't have to be afraid.

So this isn't about judging other people, but looking and seeing in my own heart, in my own mind: what are the seeds that still show up? And they're little. It's not a judgment. That's the whole point I really want to make—this commitment to be interested, to see for ourselves. And then we see how naturally, and this is really what's so amazing, how the unwholesome habits, as I mentioned before, really do transform.

I want you to also notice not just the unwholesome habits, but how the wholesome ones are coming up. Not just the purity, but for instance, Greg talked about generosity the other night. The habit—and this is what the Buddha talks about—wise intention. The unwise intention of greed, of holding on, naturally transforms in the light of steady awareness, first to renunciation. Not the renunciation of "oh, good things, pleasant things are bad, put it down." That's called aversion. But a simplicity: okay, I don't need this. And then that transforms to generosity.

The renunciation and the generosity, the wholesome intentions—one way you can tell they're wholesome is because the state of mind and heart is expansive, even joyful. When I touch real renunciation, when the mind just puts down something, there's a sense of simplicity, of ease, of openness. It's not a sense of deprivation at all. And I'm sure Greg talked about generosity, and I know he told stories about the happiness that comes from giving. Really, if you're giving something and thinking, "Oh God, I've got to give this away, but I really wish I could keep it," it's not really generosity. But the sense of, wow, just the happiness that the open-handedness gives us—that's the purified intention, that's the wise intention. Notice it.

It's not feeding the ego to notice the wholesome. I know James has gone on about this a lot, so I don't have to go into it. But it's not feeding the ego to feel the happiness of generosity or the simplicity and ease and openness of renunciation. And in the same way, ill will transforms to friendliness, to mettā, and cruelty or harshness transforms to the wise intention of compassion.

I want to say just a little bit, because there's not much time, about those two, kind of mixing them together, how that happens.

Ill will or cruelty, the unwise intentions, obviously arise when we're in contact with something painful or difficult. The difficulty with compassion—someone mentioned it this morning—is when some really difficult, painful situation with someone else comes up and we feel pain, connected to that. Or difficulty in our own hearts and minds, and we beat ourselves up about it, thinking it shouldn't be there. That's cruelty.

Ill will, which transforms to mettā—ill will comes from really focusing on the unlovable over and over. Whereas mettā comes from the connection of really letting our attention fully connect with the being, starting by seeing the good, but then widening out to connect with them just as they are. Unwise attention to the repugnant aspect of a person or a thing breeds ill will. It's just cause and effect.

So our habit of mind that feeds ill will, the lack of mettā and compassion, is this "get me away from this." I was sharing with somebody in an interview—Larry Rosenberg, who's really funny. He's a teacher in Cambridge, grew up in Brooklyn. He's like eighty now, hard to believe. Anyway, he used to watch a lot of old movies, and I remember him years ago saying—I have no idea if it's true, but he said it—that he'd read somewhere that they'd done some kind of study about what's the most frequent line in all movies. I mean, who has time to do studies like this? But anyway, one of the most frequent lines was: "Let's get out of here." And so, that's what ill will and cruelty, non-mettā, non-compassion is saying: let's get out of here.

Wisdom and mindfulness are saying, "Let's just be here for a moment."

As Joko Beck says, "Can I find in myself a willingness to rest in this confusing and painful situation?" That's just mindfulness. Can I find in myself a willingness to rest in this confusing and painful situation? That's not the same as "How can I fix it? How can I make it go away? How can I feel better about it?" It's just: can I find the willingness to rest?

That's just the start. That's the start of mindfulness. It hasn't quite transformed yet, but actually it is transformed in that moment when there's the willingness to rest with full presence in the difficult situation. Ill will or cruelty are not arising. The sense of connection—which is really how I think of metta and compassion—is arising. That's a moment of friendliness, of acceptance. That's a moment of wisdom transforming the habit of mind.

If one can stay with that situation in this way of just resting there with awareness, and there is something that can be done to alleviate it, that will be seen more clearly when it's not distorted by fear, by ill will, by needing to fix it so I don't feel pain, or by just not being able to bear another's pain. Then we might jump in and try to help, and maybe we'll see clearly and help—and maybe not. Sometimes compassion is just the ability to be there when there's nothing we can do.

One of my favorite examples of this comes from the beginning of a long poem by Anna Akhmatova, one of the most famous Russian poets of the 20th century. She lived in the Soviet Union through the whole period from before World War I, through the Communist Revolution, and all the terrors of the Stalinist regime where twenty million people were arrested and put into the gulag camps. She knew many people—her first husband, her son—who were arrested and imprisoned. She had originally been from a kind of aristocratic class, and many of her friends, when they saw what was coming, emigrated to live in France or Paris. But she made the decision not to leave, in order to bear witness to what was happening in her country.

This is the beginning of a long poem called Requiem, about the years from 1935 to 1940, the height of the Stalinist terror, when so many people were being arrested. She writes:

Not under the protection of foreign skies or saving myself on wings of alien birth,
I was then there with my whole nation,
there where my nation, alas, was.

And then, instead of a preface, she writes: "In the awful days of the Yezhov Terror"—Yezhov was one of the heads of government under Stalin, and there was a period of a few years when they were indiscriminately arresting all kinds of people—"I passed seventeen months in the outer waiting line of the prison in Leningrad."

This was the line where anyone whose relatives had been arrested would wait. Their loved ones would simply be disappeared in the night, and they would go and wait in this line outside the prison, hoping to reach the authorities, to offer a care package, or even to find out where their relatives were. You'd go every day, every day, every day. She did this for seventeen months because her son had been arrested.

She continues: "Once"—she was already quite famous at this time; poetry was very celebrated then—"somebody identified me there, called me by name. Then a woman who was standing behind me in the line, who of course had never heard me called by name and so hadn't known who I was, awoke from her torpor—the torpor typical of all of us there—and asked me, whispering into my ear. We all spoke only in a whisper there. 'And can you describe this?' she asked me. And I answered, 'Yes, I can.' And then the weak shadow of a smile glided over that which had once been her face."

That just gives me chills—the power of compassion. Incredible courage. Incredible willingness to bear witness when you can't change it, when you can't fix it. If there is something to do, hopefully it will be clear, but if there's not, we still don't run away. This is the power of wisdom: not wishing things were different, but the willingness to rest in the dis-ease.

The Dalai Lama was once asked about what looks like a lack of compassion in human society. He said, "Perhaps we just pay less attention to compassion and caring. We reinforce it less. Whereas in some sense, we fully embrace hostility and anger as an emotional state." In other words, we kind of trust it. "If we were to give the same amount of energy, attention, and trust to compassion and caring, they would definitely be stronger."

So it just starts by resting where we are. Resting where we are and really seeing how that begins to transform our intentions and our actions.

I'll end with this quotation from Martin Luther King, speaking to this clarity of intention. He says, "Nonviolence means avoiding not only external physical violence but also internal violence of the spirit. You not only refuse to shoot a person—you refuse to hate him."

He was talking about the periods of the Freedom Rides and the bombings of the churches in Birmingham—horrible, violent stuff. And it's amazing that he could say this: "I have come to see even more that as we move on toward the goal of justice, hatred must never be our motive. I refuse to become bitter."

That's really the force of wisdom. It's possible. In just a moment, we can refuse to become bitter—if we have the willingness to keep showing up and watch, and the trust that if we just stay steady, the wisdom will transform this by itself. We don't have to figure it all out. We just have the willingness to hang out with it as it's going on.

Thank you for your attention. Let's sit quietly for a moment.

This is from the Buddha:

I do not see a single other thing so inclined to cause the arising of wholesome states not yet arisen, or if arisen, to cause wholesome states to further develop and increase, as right view. For one with right view, wholesome states not yet arisen do arise, and if arisen, wholesome states are inclined to further develop and increase.

CHAPTER 139

Brahmavihāra Practice Day 2

Carol Wilson · 47 min

> In this second day of brahmavihāra practice during a month-long retreat, Carol Wilson provides detailed instruction on mettā (loving-kindness) meditation in the Burmese tradition. She addresses common obstacles practitioners face, particularly the tendency toward self-criticism and the misguided impulse to rush toward difficult categories before establishing a genuine foundation of self-acceptance. Wilson emphasizes that mettā is not about achieving grand emotional states but rather a simple, repeated inclining of the heart toward friendliness and non-separation.
> The talk explores the dual nature of mettā practice as both a samatha (concentration) practice when done intensively and a cultivation of wholesome heart qualities. Wilson explains how mettā serves as an antidote to ill-will, referencing the Buddha's teaching to his son Rāhula about how loving-kindness frees the mind from aversion. She offers practical guidance on working with the classical four phrases—safety, happiness, health, and ease—while maintaining a relaxed, non-striving attitude.
> Particularly valuable is Wilson's discussion of the benefactor category, explaining how to choose a being toward whom well-wishing comes naturally, whether a teacher, grandparent, or even a pet. She guides practitioners through connecting with their own goodness and that of the benefactor, emphasizing that the practice is about shifting deep unconscious habits of separation and judgment rather than forcing feelings or achieving results.

As has been mentioned, each day we will give sequential instructions at this particular sitting in the particular style of practicing brahmavihāras that we've learned from our teachers in Burma. There are, of course, many different styles of practicing, of cultivating loving-kindness, compassion, appreciative joy, and equanimity. I'm not in any way saying this is the only way or the right way, but it's a particular style of practice, of cultivation, that we've found really helpful and that one can learn and practice on one's own. That's why we're sharing it in this way.

I'm just wondering how many of you are familiar with or have practiced this mettā practice. Almost everybody—good. That makes our work easier. So I'll just introduce it lightly and we can start.

As you know, in this form of really simply cultivating the quality of mind, of heart—and you know in the Pāli language the word for mind and heart is the same, so if we say mind, if we say heart, we're not actually making a distinction, it's both—cultivating this particular quality, this beautiful quality of mind, of heart, of loving-kindness, friendliness, acceptance. In this form, it starts with ourselves and moves sequentially through different beings standing for different categories. Classically, each category is meant to be a little more difficult to quite easily feel the sense of friendliness and acceptance. But of course each of us is different and it doesn't work the same for everybody. What may be a difficult category for some may be easy for you. No problems, no worries, doesn't matter. Just exploring and seeing.

I want to say a couple of things. Even though we're teaching this as a fairly structured form of meditation, of practice, I want to again remind us, emphasize—this is not like another way of practice that you've got to get right. Another thing to conquer. And when you can't, when loving-kindness isn't what comes up, another way to feel like a total failure on the face of the earth. That's really not why we're sharing this, and that's not what it's about. It's not about getting it right and getting quickly to the difficult person—which for some weird reason seems to be, not for all of us, but for many people that I know and have talked to, kind of deeply embedded. The faster we can do it, the better we're doing.

And so, "Never mind myself—that's completely selfish, a total waste of time." Never mind the fact that self is sometimes the hardest person to actually feel simple, kind acceptance for. We're not saying you have to swoon with love. Simple friendliness, acceptance, just not hating the fact that you're sitting here existing. Never mind that you can't do that—we want to start with Hitler. And if we can't do that, it's another sign of the fact that we really don't deserve to exist. And we're back to where we should have started in the first place with moi.

So that's not the practice.

What it really is about is a simple cultivation, a simple practice of this wholesome, beautiful quality of mind—simple acceptance, non-separation, inclusion, really. It's the counter to the separating, exclusionary, suffering quality of mind of ill will. Of not liking, all the way to hatred, but just simple ill will.

The Buddha originally, it says in the suttas, taught mettā as an antidote to fear, which is a form of ill will. But he also said, in talking to his son Rāhula, "Cultivate loving-kindness. It frees the heart, the mind, from ill will."

So, not to have grand expectations, but simply recognize that every moment we simply incline the heart, the mind towards "May I be safe and protected, may I be happy"—just using the phrase...

to incline the intention—never mind trying to feel, as that turns into wanting—but just inclining the mind in that direction is the shifting of the habit.

When we come and say, "Well, I'm not worth it," boom, that's the old habit of ill will directed towards oneself. "They're not worth it"—directed towards them. Simply shifting the habit by the simple repetition of the phrase with the intention to mean it. You can't make yourself feel it. You just have the intention to want to mean it. That's good enough. That's shifting the habit.

And so an aspect of metta is patience, as with all of our practice. Patience is essential. So it's not helpful or useful or even relevant to be looking for results. How good am I feeling about this person that I'm sending loving kindness to? And have they felt it yet? Let me go call them up and see how they're doing. Never mind that.

Just the willingness to not simply follow our usual habit of sinking into, "Oh God, I'm hopeless," or "Oh, they just bug me, to heck with them." Just not landing in that. That comes up and you go, "You know what? May I be safe and protected." That's all. That's all.

That doesn't seem like much. But our willingness to keep connecting to that again and again and again—and yes, ten million times—is what's actually the practice. That shifting of the deep, unconscious habits of our heart and mind: of greed and ill will, of wanting and judging and separation, of "these people are okay and these people aren't," and "this part of me is okay and this part isn't."

As it is, right now, I love and accept myself. Can you even stand to say that to yourself? Just as I am, I love and accept myself in this moment. And then don't think about it, don't analyze: "Well, I would love and accept myself if I wasn't da-da-da-da-da." It's just the quality of open, connected friendliness. That's really what metta is.

Sometimes the quality of heart-mind of metta—the mental state, to use the terminology that the Buddha used—has a wide range. It doesn't necessarily have to be what we would call emotional, like a big emotional feeling. And so sometimes it can be on that range. It's nice when it's this big sense of oneness and inclusivity and love for all beings. Yeah, I mean great, we'll take it. But don't land in "that's what we're aiming for" or "that's what metta is." Metta is also just that simple movement from separation to, "Oh, just like this, may you be happy and peaceful."

The willingness to connect—whether it's a sense of ourselves, or a sense of the other person, what we'll call today's so-called benefactor—just to connect to a sense of that person just as they are, without saying, "You'd be worthy of my friendliness if you would just clean up your act a little bit." Just as you are. Just warts and all. May you be safe and protected. May you be happy. May you be healthy. May you live with ease.

And those, as you know, we begin this practice by bringing up in your mind, in your heart, a sense of the particular subject we're including. So we'll start with ourselves and then the so-called benefactor.

And here, the way we're doing it this week—which is an hour a day or more if you feel it—we're not doing this practice in the form of cultivating deep samadhi, deep shamatha. The way this practice is structured is different from vipassana, in that we are continuing to come back to the same thing: to the phrase and the sense of the person. So the structure of the practice is one that, if we were doing it only this, all day every day, it becomes a shamatha practice that can lead to absorption. And so that's one aspect, and that's part of why the structure is so specific.

So it's a sense of the person, and repeating—in the case of metta—there are four classical phrases you repeat, and I'll say how to do that. If we were doing it all day, every day, to cultivate samatha, the staying with the form without changing it a lot would be a little more helpful, supportive.

Because changing it around a lot can increase restlessness. But the way we're offering it here, once a day in the afternoon, is to more highlight the other aspect.

It's kind of a double-edged practice, this. There's the shamatha piece if you do it all the time, but the other edge is just what I've been talking about—actually cultivating this kindness, this inclusivity, this accepting, friendly quality of heart and mind, this opposite of ill will.

And so while the form of the practice is not vipassana—it's shamatha because we don't explore what else comes up much; we come back to the phrase, to the sense of the person in a very gentle way—here, what we're cultivating, what we're leaning into, is this friendly, accepting quality.

Because we, most of us teachers, have found—and nothing's for everybody; it may drive you nuts, you may want to run out of here screaming, okay? Just notice it. Try not to actually run out of here screaming. But you may hate metta. I hated it for years. A little bit of ill will there! I hated it for years until I did it intensively.

But the reason we offer it is because for many people, they find it a real support for the attitude of relaxed acceptance that really is the essence of mindfulness.

So if you find you've been approaching practice like, "Let me notice the breath, feel the breath—in, out, in, out. I notice that pain in my back—burning, burning, burning." Right? "I'm being mindful—burning, burning, burning." That's mindfulness, right? You might notice a little sense, just a subtle sense of aversion going on there. We laugh, but I've spent days like that. And all of a sudden it's like, "Oh god, that's aversion." Duh.

So sometimes just the practice of metta—you start to feel when that harshness comes in. "Oh, well that's interesting. It's actually different." Okay. Burning is like this, with that softness. So it's just to explore for yourself. That's why we're offering it like this.

But still, I'm going to say how the practice is structured while giving you a little bit of leeway here to see what's supportive for you. So it's not about getting somewhere or getting it right. And certainly, practice this, cultivate it, in as relaxed a way as possible. It's that balance of always, yes, we stay with the form, but relaxed moment to moment. It's a dance we're always kind of finding our way in.

So today we'll start with self and then the being called benefactor. As most of you have done this retreat, you know what that means, but I'll just remind us. This is from the old classical teachings, where benefactor was meant to be—first of all, they thought back in the old days of the Buddha that metta to self was the absolute easiest, which I guess just shows a cultural difference, a historical difference. Because at least I know from my own mind, and all these years of sharing practice with people in all different countries, I'd say—this is a conservative estimate—ninety-five percent of people have a really strong self-critical, self-worth, self-hatred mindset. A habit of mind.

And so that's just a different thing that makes it a little difficult for us to cultivate metta, which is why when we offer it the first day, we offer self and benefactor. Because for some people, if you find you're just getting all knotted up trying to say, "May I be safe and protected"—"I don't deserve to be safe"—"May I be happy"—"Happy? How can I be happy when there's so much suffering in the world?" You know, all of that. That can happen a little in the beginning. But if you're lost in that, go to benefactor, where it can be easier.

So benefactor is meant to be—classically they say your parents. Okay, here again we run into another difference for some of us. Not all, but some. But a person—a teacher, a grandparent, a mentor—someone that can be someone you know. It's easier. But some of us don't come up with someone, so we think of someone who inspires us.

Someone who's helped us, or who inspires us, or for whom we easily feel a sense of natural well-wishing, a natural connection. It could be a teacher or a mentor. We often say now that people may think of a niece or a nephew. Or if you're old enough, a grandchild—skip a generation where it's a little bit easier.

"Easy" doesn't mean that this person you should love more than your parents or your child or something. There's just less complications. And notice your mind right now if it goes to, "Yeah, but I ought to be able to go right to my parents," or whatever. That's our trip. Just look at how it is. Someone less complicated.

I heard there's a Tibetan saying which I love: the teacher that's easiest to send metta to is one who lives two valleys over—because you don't know so much about him. This isn't to support delusion. It's simply to support the ease of connecting and well-wishing.

That's why when we move to a good friend, it's someone you would naturally wish well for, but there's just been a little more rubbing, a little more stuff going on. So while you're sending metta, suddenly you think, "But what about that time they borrowed that thing and never gave it back, and I said I didn't care. Why do I care? I do care." And then all of that arises. So just coming back to the simplicity.

For the benefactor, see who comes up for you. Maybe you already have one, and that's fine. You can keep using the same person. It's not that you have to go through everybody who's ever been kind to you. Pick one. Keep it simple. Because it's not about sending metta to everyone. It's about cultivating this quality—the ease, the recognition of this quality in our heart and mind. So it becomes more familiar. So it becomes more of the default mode instead of criticism, instead of separation, instead of self-judgment.

It really can happen. I'm here as living proof. It comes and goes—I'm living proof of that too. Nothing's steady state. But we can learn to trust it a bit more.

So start where it's easiest. Whenever it starts to get complicated, go back to where it's easiest. And that's not just for today. That's not just for these next two weeks. That's for the rest of our lives. Because what we're doing is cultivating this quality of mind and heart, and whatever helps us do it is the most helpful.

I could keep going, but I actually want us to have a little time to practice. Back to the benefactor though—even if you can't find someone, a pet is fine. A pet is a living being. Unless you have a pet rock; I don't know about that. But a living being, anyone that you can tune into, just as they are.

The aspects of the formal practice: take a moment to get a sense of the person. We'll start with ourselves and then the benefactor. If you're visual, a visual sense memory can be helpful. For yourself, some people like to just get an image of themselves in a mirror. That might be a little tough. So often people use a memory of themselves when they were younger—more innocent, before you turned bad. When you can actually have some sense of meeting yourself. You know I'm talking tongue-in-cheek, right? You haven't turned bad. Well, I don't know. I mean, I don't know you. Whatever helps.

Now, if you're more kinesthetic, which I am, I find loving-kindness to myself is actually easier because I feel a felt sense of my body sitting here now, just as it is. If your body is a painful body, that can be a little harder, because it's important to feel as comfortable as you can. If touching your body with your awareness brings up pain and aversion right away, that's going to be too hard to cultivate metta to begin with. You really can't push through pain. So sit in a way that's comfortable. If the body part doesn't work for you, then do try to go to a memory of a happy time, or whatever helps you connect with yourself.

When we get to benefactor, again, think of the person, the animal. And if it's someone you don't know, some people use a being in the world who's really inspired them, even if they don't know the person, but they can get a real sense of them. Maybe they've seen them someplace or heard them, where you get some living sense of their goodness, or some aspect that inspires you.

With yourself, when you tune in, actively take a moment to feel into your own goodness. The sincerity of your intentions, for example. Just being here for this month manifests huge qualities of integrity, of purity, of wisdom and compassion. Because someone who's really lost in a harsh way of life, really suffering, really violent, really not having a sense of living in an ethical way—trying to sit here for a month would be so much suffering. So just appreciating your goodness. And we all have other stuff too.

Metta begins by tuning into the goodness, the wholesomeness. You might find your integrity, or times you've been kind, or your sincere intention. But metta is not blind. It starts by acknowledging, "Just as I am, may I be safe and protected." It connects and then spreads out to include our whole being, just as we are. So as you're doing loving-kindness to yourself, if anger comes up, fine. "Okay, just as I am. This anger too, it's painful. May I be happy. May I be safe and protected." It's not a rejection of anything. But it's triggered by tuning into the wholesomeness, the goodness. We do that with ourselves and then with benefactors.

So let me guide us briefly now. Sitting in as comfortable a way as you can. There's no perfect comfort, but relatively comfortable. Awake, of course.

Just take a breath and let your mind and body relax. Not make it relax—let it just relax. Stop fighting whatever's going on. If it's tense, and you notice it's tense and it stays tense, you relax. Let the mind relax around that. Just as the body is right now, it's fine. Just as your heart and mind is right now, it's fine.

Right now maybe you're not feeling friendliness. Maybe you're tired, maybe you're bored, maybe you're pissed off—whatever's going on, it's like this now. Notice how that accepting movement is actually the movement of metta. Just as I am in this moment.

Let your attention connect with your body-mind. If an image is more helpful, experiment with that. Just relax, let it come. Nothing to push, nothing to achieve.

Take a moment to reflect on or tune into whatever aspect of wholesomeness arises—sincere intention, kindness, honesty, generosity, whatever comes up for you. Don't push it away saying that's not good enough, whatever it is. Just let yourself say, "Yes, that's an aspect."

Just as I am in this moment, may I love and accept myself. Not to make it so, but to feel that softness, that connecting quality of heart and mind to ourselves in this moment. You don't have to change one bit to be worthy of friendliness, to be worthy of loving-kindness in this moment. We all are, by virtue of simply being.

When you tune in, don't try to make yourself feel anything. Just tune in. And I'll offer the classical phrase, which you gently repeat in your heart.

Don't try to make it so. The phrase is like a carrier for our intention. We say it, we offer it to ourselves, we let it go into the universe. Don't look for results. And if these phrases don't work, you'll find your own—but don't spend the whole time trying to get it right. That's one of our sidetracks.

So classically: May I be safe and protected from inner and outer harm. Or in short form, may I be safe and protected. May I be happy and peaceful. May I be healthy, or may I live with physical ease. And the fourth one: may I live with ease of well-being, which means may my life not be such a struggle. May I live with ease.

And so then we just keep gently repeating in your own time, your own rhythm. Connect with the sense of yourself, your goodness, and simply offer this next phrase as a kind of movement from the heart area. Let it go. Connect again. Offer the phrase. Sure, it will become rote sometimes—that's okay. Sure, you'll get lost in thought—that's okay. When you recognize that, we simply go, all right, come back to yourself. Offer the next phrase. That's the practice. Just simple, relaxed, accepting, just as I am, right now. May I be safe. May I be peaceful. May I live with physical happiness. May I live with ease.

So now, if you'd like to experiment with bringing in a sense of a benefactor—whatever being you've decided to use or who comes to heart, to mind—just let yourself be and take a moment to get a sense of this being. Whether it's a memory, or a memory of a photo, or a time together, whatever helps you connect. Just for the moment—you don't have to hold on, just for the moment. And again, consciously tuning into some beautiful, wholesome aspect of their heart, their mind, their actions. Something easily accessible to you, to think of, to connect to. It doesn't have to be anything big.

And starting from that moment of connection, that appreciation, just simply offering the same phrases we offer ourselves. Not to change them, not even to make them happy—you know, we can't actually do that. But it's an expression of this quality in our heart that holds this friendliness. May you be safe and protected, feeling what meaning that might carry. May you be safe and protected from inner and outer harm.

And no rush. Have a sense, connect again, because you'll probably lose the sense of the person—the mind wanders. Lose the sense, connect again. May you be happy and peaceful. May you live with physical happiness, or may you be healthy. May you live with ease in this world.

And whatever else comes up in your mind—different things, different emotions—no problem, don't struggle with them. But if it's possible for now, we don't investigate much either. Just let them be and reconnect with the benefactor and offer the next phrase, just as it is. Just staying very simple and relaxed. Just relax. Offer the phrase without looking for result.

May all beings everywhere live in happiness and freedom from suffering and confusion.

So we're, as I said, just offering this for you through the days, if you find it useful.

CHAPTER 140

Extraordinary Seeing: Simplicity, Honesty, and Mindfulness

In this foundational dharma talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the essence of vipassanā practice by reframing what 'extraordinary seeing' truly means. Rather than pointing toward otherworldly experiences, she reveals that extraordinary seeing is simply the accurate recognition of our moment-to-moment mental and physical experience—something we rarely achieve in ordinary life. Drawing on Sayadaw U Tejaniya's teaching that meditation is 'experiencing the mind and body directly from moment to moment with right understanding,' Wilson presents the three essential jobs of a yogi: mindfulness of whatever is arising, right understanding (not distorted by greed, hatred, or delusion), and continuity of practice.

Wilson explores how suffering arises from our habitual tendency to appropriate natural phenomena as 'I' and 'mine,' referencing Ajahn Buddhadāsa's teaching about 'throwing everything back to nature.' She demonstrates the simplicity of sati through direct inquiry—asking practitioners to notice the shift between merely seeing and being aware that seeing is occurring. This subtle recognition, she emphasizes, is mindfulness itself: effortless yet easily forgotten.

The talk offers practical guidance for working with the deeply ingrained habits of liking and disliking that keep us trapped in saṃsāra—the endless cycle of leaning toward pleasure and away from pain. Wilson encourages practitioners to trust in the power of simple awareness rather than getting lost in analyzing or fixing experience, recognizing that nothing in our mental-physical process needs to be excluded from mindful attention.

One definition of Vipassana, a very often used definition, is that of extraordinary seeing —seeing in an extraordinary way. And the main agent or the main tool that we have for this so-called extraordinary seeing is, of course, the mental factor, the experience of mindfulness, of awareness.

Now, what's actually quite amazing to me about this so-called extraordinary seeing is that when we first hear that definition, my mind tends to think that to look for something extraordinary would be something incredibly amazing, otherworldly, something really elsewhere, blow your mind. That's where my mind goes with extraordinary seeing.

But meditation—this is Sayadaw U Tejaniya's definition of mindfulness meditation—is simply experiencing the mind and body directly from moment to moment with the right understanding. That is what extraordinary seeing is. And what's amazing to me is that it could be called, and it is, extraordinary seeing to actually recognize our moment-to-moment experience accurately. That's extraordinary. Because so much of the time, we're not recognizing our experience accurately at all. In fact, to put it in a silly way, we don't have a clue half the time what's really happening. And we don't have a clue that we don't have a clue. We think we really know what's going on.

And so the experience, the practice of this simple moment-to-moment mindfulness, experiencing our mind and body directly, just as it is, is amazingly enough the process that conditions the wisdom that frees our heart and mind from suffering, from confusion.

The Buddha shared, in my understanding, that his motivation for sharing what he had understood and experienced was not so that we could have a new complex philosophy to embrace. It's turned out that there is a very complex philosophy with a lot of lists we could embrace and memorize, and maybe that's helpful, but that's not the point. The point is to help us, to show us a path, to give us tools, really, to recognize for ourselves—only I can recognize for myself, no one can give me that, same for each of you—to recognize for ourselves the seeds of suffering, the potential of freedom from that suffering, how these seeds of suffering are created and arise in our own mind and heart in a moment-to-moment way. Not some big monolithic something out there, but just by this extraordinary seeing of simple moment-to-moment presence with our mind-body experience with the right view—and that's key—we start to actually recognize for ourselves how the seeds of suffering and confusion may sprout in a moment and lead to more suffering in our mind and heart, but how also in a moment that can be released. That cannot happen. With clear seeing, with accurate understanding in a moment of what's going on, the confused responses that bring us into further suffering just don't need to arise.

That's how the clear seeing leads to wisdom. When we understand accurately, we respond appropriately. And that, to me, is like the miracle, really. Thich Nhat Hanh has this phrase, "the miracle of mindfulness." The miracle of the way things are, the miracle of freedom, is that it's not about becoming somehow different from who or what we are—good luck with that. But actually coming fully into presence in this moment, one hundred percent present, without the distortion of greed, hatred, delusion, and recognizing what's actually going on. The accurate recognition of reality is what frees us from suffering and confusion.

It's not that reality needs to change. It's changing every moment. But it's not that extraordinary seeing is going to take us to some other plane where we can get out of this mess. I mean, we'd like to. I'd like to. But it doesn't work like that. It's landing in the middle. We see how much of this mess is completely unnecessarily created by the response of our heart and mind based on just not seeing clearly.

So that's really how the process of mindfulness works—this is our Vipassana practice. And I know we've referenced once or twice in the beginning of the retreat, in terms of instructions, that there are various techniques of Vipassana. I'm talking about Vipassana mindfulness insight practice here, not specifically absorption samatha practice. I'm talking about Vipassana insight practice.

And so, as we've said, this moment-to-moment simple presence—there are various techniques and instructions, some of which we've talked about. I'm not going to go into them all, but like having a single focus and coming back quite rigorously for some time to one single focus, or having a more broad noticing of whatever's occurring, using mental noting, being really precise and connecting very precisely to the particular sense object that's arising, or being more receptive, more relaxed, more open, sweeping the attention through the body—all kinds. I'm not even going to name them all. All useful.

But what I want to reference tonight is that each of these, all the different techniques, are skillful means in service of and coming out of this kind of broader field, broader understanding, which is what I just said: mindfulness of whatever's arising in our mind-body moment to moment, with the right understanding. And the third aspect is continuity—the steadiness, the perseverance of that from moment to moment to moment.

Those three aspects, one of my teachers, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, calls the three jobs of a yogi. Mindfulness, moment to moment—you've probably figured out that's one of the jobs. With right understanding, which I'll talk some about, and we do our best to see that. And the third job is the continuity, the moment-to-moment.

Not that you're going to be perfectly mindful moment-to-moment—it's not that you're doing it wrong unless you're absolutely mindful from the first moment your eyes open in the morning to the last moment you go to sleep. That's not what we mean by continuity. It's simply the intention, the willingness, whatever you're doing, whatever posture you're in, to recognize: this is a moment for awareness. Whether it's been two seconds since your last moment of awareness or three days, it doesn't matter. I mean, it matters in some way, but the fact that you have the intention in that moment of awareness again—it's fresh, it's new. It's not a lesser moment of awareness because it's been longer since the last one.

So continuity is not about another way to be perfect. It's about really getting it that whatever is happening in this moment, whatever you're doing, whatever activity you're engaged in, this is the only and the perfect moment for sati, for mindfulness. There is no other moment. There's no better moment to wait for to be mindful. And the wisdom that comes, comes from the steadiness of mindfulness. That's what allows for a clearer seeing of cause and effect and what's going on.

So these are our three jobs, and this is what's at the heart of awakening. We all have subtexts, our reasons for coming, our reasons for practice—of course we do. Don't think that there's something wrong with that. But it's helpful to recognize that really the essence is these three things: the moment-to-moment awareness, the familiarity, the cultivation. So as I said the other day about metta, but it's the same for awareness—that moment-to-moment awareness becomes our default. It becomes our refuge. It becomes our home. It becomes more interesting, more fulfilling than all the endless hoo-ha that our mind goes through about every sense experience that arises.

So it's not about having a particular experience, getting a particular experience, and then you've made it. It's not about fixing yourself, although of course we all have aspects we'd like to fix. It's not about having a better sitting. It's not even about getting concentrated. It's about this cultivation of moment-to-moment awareness. And that can only ever be done in one moment, in this moment. You can't do it in the last moment. You can't be mindful now for the next moment. All there is, is this moment. And whatever particular sense experience is presenting itself, that's the perfect object for awareness. It's the only one, because that's all that's happening. There's nothing better to wait for.

Mindfulness doesn't care. It's not like mindfulness is only really good when it can be mindful of something really sublime, something really subtle—the heart of boundless metta—and then, okay, we can call up mindfulness. But this nagging, irritable, grumpy mind that makes some really negative judgment about everybody that walks past? "Look how they walk. Look how they eat. Look how they dress. What are these people doing here?" We don't want to be mindful of that, right? But that's what's happening. And awareness doesn't care. It's the same pure mindfulness as it is with a sublime experience—when we have right view, right attitude, when we're recognizing that simplicity of awareness for what it is, not getting lost in evaluating the content of experience.

Which is mostly how we spend our lives. Well, I notice that's how I spend my life. Maybe not you, and if that's the case, I bow to you. But mostly, that's the habit of what our mind does.

So in terms of this mindfulness with right understanding, with right view—in a simple way, at the heart of awakening, as best I can understand it, which is of course limited—the most profound level of right view, right understanding where the Buddha was talking, is a really fundamental shift in the way that we recognize and understand reality. The way that we recognize and understand our moment-to-moment mental and physical activity, because that's the particular representative of reality that we have the most access to. But it's a fundamental shift. And how we understand ourself, how we understand a moment of experience—that's what's going to lead to how we think about it, how we describe it, how we respond, how we react.

It just makes sense. If you think somebody did something—say you're in the dining room, and you think somebody picked something up, and you believe they're taking something that belongs to someone else. Whatever you do or don't do, that's the thought you have. You think that's describing reality. And whether you say something or remain silent, the way that you think and feel about that person is going to be informed by that perception and that description of what's going on.

Then if you see the same thing, but someone informs you, or somehow you realize that actually that is not what was occurring—the person was working in the kitchen, doing their job, which was to come out and pick up this plate and clean it—suddenly you have a whole different explanation of what looks like the same action. Your thoughts, your feelings, your possible response to that person are going to be different. This is just normal. This is just normal cause and effect.

So when we don't recognize or understand accurately, our responses are a little bit askew, and our responses and reactions to our responses are a little bit more askew, and it just keeps cycling. We're all kind of banging against each other's ideas of what's going on. We don't even know what's really going on for us. Then we project what's going on for the other person. They don't know what's going on for them either, and they're projecting what's going on for us. We're trying to have a conversation here, and we wonder, how come we don't understand each other? That's just how it goes.

So the Buddha is really saying that at the heart of freedom is accurate recognition. That's where our practice of simple moment-to-moment mindfulness, which seems like nothing much in any moment, is so transformative, so extraordinary—this kind of accurate recognition, accurate seeing.

There's a phrase I like to use a lot. It describes in some of the texts a so-called advanced insight, though it's not as if it's linear. We see something, then we bounce to another, and we don't see, and then we see again. But the phrase is translated as "knowledge and vision of things as they have come to be."

I like that because what it really helps us see is recognizing accurately in this moment just how the mental and physical experience has come to be in this moment. In this moment, it could not be otherwise. All the conditions that have come together—which we can't even trace, can't even try to trace—create this moment that cannot be changed. Just how this moment is, mentally and physically, recognizing that accurately: knowledge and vision of things as they have come to be.

And then all the different conditions arising in this moment, some of which would be the quality in our mind and heart of how the mind in this moment responds—this then becomes again a cause and condition for the arising of the next moment. So this sense of accurate recognition through the steadiness of continuity is what allows us to really begin to recognize differently.

And it's not that then the wisdom arises—the wisdom of clear understanding, the wisdom that allows the heart and mind to just put down greed. Not to give rise to clinging to something that's already changing before the mind has even started to cling to it. It just doesn't make sense.

It's not like we have to sit and say, "I think I won't cling to this sunset because I know it's going to change, and the moon's really beautiful, so the moon will be pretty, so let the sun go, and I can do that because I know I have a new thing to cling to..." We don't have to do that. The sun's going down. It goes down. It's lovely. We appreciate it or not. It's gone. You don't have to drill yourself not to cling, do you? It's just obvious.

It's like that with everything. We really can put down trying to figure it all out, trying to control, trying to create wisdom. It's such a relief. It's so amazing. To me, it's amazing.

It keeps on being amazing. Through the steadiness of mindfulness with right understanding—which is mindfulness not distorted by confusion—through that steadiness, wisdom naturally arises. And the wisdom then responds appropriately, and the potential for peace in this moment can naturally arise. In this moment. The next moment it can all go to hell again, but in this moment it can arise. Knowing it's all moments is also incredibly freeing to me.

So let me start by talking a little bit about the simplicity of sati, of mindfulness. As someone said, I think it was Sally, mindfulness is just knowing that you know what's happening. But let's keep it really simple.

Right now, most of you have your eyes open. Are you aware right now that seeing is occurring? Are you? Were you before I said that? Probably not. Maybe you were, but probably not. Now, do you get a sense of the subtle different way it feels? Before, you were seeing. You were seeing. But then when I say you're aware that you're seeing, aware of the seeing process, it's a subtle shift of how it feels. Do you get a sense of that?

That's mindfulness. How difficult is that? How much energy does that take? How special does the experience you're mindful of have to be? Not at all. How easy is it to completely forget about? Easy, right?

So that, in a way, is the simplicity of mindfulness. Oh, awareness of seeing. How long—like now, are you still aware of seeing? That seeing is occurring? Other things may come to the forefront, becoming more predominant, because that's how it is. But are you aware of it? Suddenly hearing became more prominent, or how long does seeing last before thoughts arise? Perception, which would be recognition—maybe you're recognizing Carol, or you're recognizing the statues, or you're kind of glomming onto what the object is.

And then, as Greg talked about last night, pleasant and unpleasant. We may notice that, but we may not notice it, yet it's happening. And then suddenly, "Ah, no, it's not so nice. Look at this. It's kind of messy up here. Can't they get their act together? I like the Zen style when it's all black and everything's the same. Look at this—there's schmutz all over the place." Or the other way, either way. How soon before that's occurring and we don't recognize that that's occurring, and that becomes what we think is happening? "I'm sitting here not liking blah, blah, blah." Really quickly.

Now, it's not that the thoughts or the pleasantness or unpleasantness, the liking or the disliking, the judgment—it's not that any of that needs to be a problem or that it's wrong or that it's in the way of mindfulness. It's simply that with steady mindfulness, we would recognize the next arising experience is this thought. Or this feeling of, "Uh, it's just kind of messy up there." You'd recognize that, oh, that feeling's occurring. You'd recognize a thought, you'd recognize a judgment. You might then come back and recognize seeing again. Do you see what I mean?

That the steadiness of mindfulness with right view is simply recognizing just barely what's occurring, without confusing all the assessments—the liking, the disliking, the greed, the aversion, the "what does it mean about me?"—without confusing that for the simplicity of the process. "What does it mean about me?" as a thought or a feeling can be the next arising object of mindfulness, and that's fine.

But I'm hoping you already get the sense of how fast the mind moves and how much we don't recognize that that's what's occurring. And that's how we get a bit askew from reality. If I'm sitting and recognizing seeing, then I feel sensations in the body, then I notice a sense of subtle discomfort arise, I notice a kind of aversion come into the mind, then I'm aware of seeing, then I notice the naming of what I'm seeing, and the associations in my mind, and that I don't like it—all that stuff's still going on. But awareness just moment to moment noticing it, that's the practice. That's the practice. And that awareness noticing grumpiness and judgment is just as beautiful and pure awareness as noticing anything else.

So our job in cultivating the steadiness of mindfulness is to keep on recognizing what's really happening now. Seeing, hearing, thinking, feeling, tasting, assessing—whatever the particular habits of mind. This is the simplicity and the honesty, really, of mindfulness. Not, "Oh, that's really kind of nasty. I don't really want to notice that in my mind. Let's go do some metta." Rather, "Okay, nastiness feels like this. That's okay." Awareness isn't stained. Awareness doesn't have a problem with anything.

Seeing how these habits of our mind work, getting interested in them, is how the understanding of how suffering and freedom arise grows. These are habits of mind. That whole example I gave of the grumpiness—that's just a habit of mind. We all have different habits. There's only so many different permutations. So that's the grumpiness habit: seeing something that's a little bit unpleasant, or feeling something in the body, and then you get a little grumpy about it, and then you make up a story about it, and then off to the races—somehow thinking getting that all organized is going to make me happy.

We're really happy sitting here criticizing everybody and everything up the wazoo. That really makes us happy, doesn't it? But has it stopped? Has it stopped any of us?

Or thinking of all the things we don't have that we want, and how happy we'll be when we get those things—has that made us happy? It's actually more insidious, the wanting one, because somehow it gets in there and we think it's making us happy. You sit there wanting whatever—a new relationship, a chocolate chip cookie, or just for this talk to end so you can go to bed. That could be a big one. You're just sitting here wanting it. And we get lost in the wanting, even mistaking the wanting for happiness. Have you ever noticed that?

How nice it's going to be when I get in the bed. I just spent seven or eight weeks in Burma. You get up at 3:34 in the morning. You guys think you have a tough life—you have no clue. Even when I wasn't on retreat, you get up at 4 in the morning when you live in the monastery, breakfast is at 5:30, lunch is at 10:30, and that's it. That's it for the day. And the bed's not comfortable. Talk about not lying in luxurious beds—a mattress like that. But actually, I'm usually quite happy there.

Still, there would be times in the middle of the day, a really busy day, and the mind's just so tired, you start thinking, "Oh, how nice to be in the bed. I can't wait till it's time to go to bed." And it's so—all I can say is stupid—because it's having the illusion that that's making me happy. All it's doing is cultivating wanting, cultivating dissatisfaction, disconnection with what's really going on. This is called samsara, really.

The sense of this leaning into the next thing that's going to really do it for us. Or if you're on the aversion side, it's the leaning away from this thing here that's not doing it for us. And that can be anything—a sensation in the body, a sound that we're hearing, the habits in our mind, anything.

The simplicity and honesty of sati, of mindfulness, is just simply: oh, what's happening now? Wanting feels like this. I hate how it feels. Unpleasant. Wanting feels like this.

And, you know, that's hard, difficult, as someone—several of you have said already just in two days—but it's not news to any of you, I don't think, that the simplicity of sati in that moment of recognizing, seeing, is really easy. It's not effortful. But to actually continue to do it moment to moment is incredibly difficult—to keep remembering, or to actually come into the simplicity of what's happening. Because all our layers of association and wanting and aversion and comparison and distortion are happening so fast, and we're so entranced by our reactions to things, that sometimes we just really don't even know what it is that triggered all these reactions.

So in terms of mindfulness with right understanding, mindfulness with right view—I mean, right view is a huge topic, all the way to really understanding all the ways that we don't recognize accurately, to freedom. But just keeping it simple for our practice here, thinking of mindfulness with right view as just the simplicity of a moment of clear presence without the distortions of putting onto it aversion, greed, or really the bottom line one: it's all about me. Me, mine. What does this say? What does this mean for me? How does this affect me?

And I think Greg talked some about this last night. It's just such a deep habit for all of us. And it's how we've been taught. So deeply ingrained that what is pleasant, what feels good, is right, is good. It's how it is. And when it's pleasant, we're right. What's unpleasant is wrong. Need to get rid of it. And at the bottom of both of those is that it's all about me. And my happiness depends on getting more of the pleasant and less of the unpleasant.

And it's kind of like—it just seems as though somehow it's so ingrained in us that we don't even recognize it, even when you know it. And many of us here, we've experienced this quite deeply, you know, in practice, in life. Because it's not a different mind in practice than in life—it's just that we kind of clear the decks a little bit when we come on retreat so we can see a little bit more the subtlety of how the mind's working. But it's working the same way in more complex situations in life.

So we may have really experienced the truth of that many times. I know I have. But then there are other times when I'm tired or the mind isn't very clear, or I do get entranced into the object and what I think about it and how it's going to affect me and what it means—and it just slips back in again. I go, oh, right. I'm totally caught up in it. I've got to get rid of this unpleasant experience and get to this pleasant experience, and then it'll be okay.

For me in particular, with emotions, that happens a lot. Having sadness, or discomfort, or a headache, or whatever. And it doesn't mean we can't act in an appropriate way. If you're ill, you act in an appropriate way, but it doesn't have to be from aversion and fear, if you see what I mean. But what slips in is the sense of: I don't want to feel this unpleasant emotion. It's too unpleasant, so let me do something to get away from it. And not even recognizing that's what's going on.

So in retreat, there's not so much you can do to get away from it. That's what's helpful. What can you do here? We kind of take stuff away. But you know, that's the thing with cell phones. My God, you know—I'm a little bit bored. Let me go look online at something. How often has that made me happier? Really, like one in ten thousand times. But we still do it. Or you go wash your socks, or you go have a cup of tea—not that those things are bad. But it's more about bringing awareness to seeing: why am I doing this? Because this feeling I'm having isn't pleasant, and it would be better to be somewhere else.

When we don't have, in a moment, the trust or the habit of this mindfulness that's just willing to die into this moment, then the old habits take over and drive the bus, basically. We run from the unpleasant, we go towards the pleasant, we evaluate all life in that way, and we get more and more confused.

The Buddha described experience—I don't know if Greg talked about it last night—that really all we experience in our mental and physical process is six things. There's seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching and physical sensations, and then the whole mental world: thinking, emotions, visual images—the entire mental realm. Each of these arises moment to moment and passes moment to moment. Check it out. There's no solid thing here. Arising and passing, arising and passing. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking. Well, not quite that obvious.

And then it's pleasant or it's unpleasant. We don't notice that. We're right into liking and disliking and analyzing and thinking and discussing and describing—just like that example I gave with the seeing. That's just what our minds do. I'm not saying this is a problem. This is what our minds do. Mindfulness with right understanding, with wise view, is simply having the willingness to be with this too, so we start to recognize what the mind does.

In a way, a lot of what our practice is about is, as someone said, an investigation. We're really looking: How does the mind and heart work? Moment to moment. How is suffering being created? How is it being released? Moment to moment.

So now when I see how fast it can go from hearing a sound—just hearing a sound—to a whole world of my entire past and future, all based on what's just a bell ringing, instead of going, "Oh no, I lost mindfulness," I bring mindfulness in and go, "Wow, that's amazing. Look at that." You're back in mindfulness. But these habits are so, so strong, and it moves so, so fast that we get entranced by the particular object, by our descriptions and reactions to it. Because again, it's all about me.

What are we really entranced by? Bottom line: me, me, me. How I feel, how I think, what's happening to me, what's going to happen to me, what other people think about me, what do I think about other people, how does everything relate to me? How does that deer standing out there in the field—is it looking at me? Does it see me? Is it scared of me? It's really like, duh. But it's just to see that, you know? That's really kind of the bottom line. This is what keeps us entranced by objects and our reactions to them. This is what we call samsara.

And we lose—we just don't recognize in that "what does the deer think about me"—the simplicity of awareness, which is always available. Oh, seeing. Oh, thinking about me. See, it's not that awareness has to get rid of this stupid thing our mind is doing in order to be aware. We bring it in, no matter what's happening. There's nothing, nothing that needs to be outside the field of awareness. There's nothing that occurs in our mind and body that shouldn't be known with awareness. Not "we've got to get rid of this so we can cultivate mindfulness." Nothing. We may not want to see it—right, that's another thing. But there's nothing that's outside.

So we're standing there feeling like a fool, thinking all about the deer. Look at me. Ah, feeling like a fool is like this. That's Ajahn Sumedho's terminology—I love it. Instead of analyzing everything, what am I doing? Oh, feeling like a fool is like this. Awareness just lands in it. You don't have to make a big analysis. You just kind of feel the mental and physical gestalt in that moment, and that's it. You landed here.

You're back with awareness. That's our job. Not to figure out the whole story. Just land in the awareness again. Over and over and over.

So another way of talking about how not to take experience so personally—Greg mentioned it last night. It's funny, because I had the same quotation, and I'm going to use it again. It's from Ajahn Buddhadasa, who was quite an interesting Thai forest monk and scholar. I spent some time at his monastery ages ago, when I was a nun for about a year in Thailand. And he was quite... for a monk in Thailand within the system, which has a lot of limits on it, he was a little bit radical. A little bit. But he was quite a scholar.

He's talking about this in his book, Mindfulness of Breathing. And Sayadaw U Tejaniya uses the same language. When we take everything that's occurring so personally—particularly the patterns and habits of our mind—but it's all nature. The physical experience coming and going is nature. The mental experience coming and going is nature. Whatever arises in this moment—physical pain, mental states, even if it's a strong mental pattern of yours, say, of shame or of grief or of greed or of self-love, whatever it is—it's arising due to all the previous causes in a lawful way. This moment couldn't be otherwise. It's also nature. This moment couldn't be different.

Ajahn Buddhadasa says that the Pali texts use the phrase "throwing back." He says when the mind is free—and I'm going to say when the mind is free, not meaning you have to wait until absolute freedom, but in any particular moment—he says, "We have been thieves all of our life by appropriating the things of nature as I and mine. We have been ignorant and we suffer for it." It's not that we're bad or good. It's just that we suffer for it. "But now, in a moment of freedom, we become wise. And at this last step of practice, we realize, oh, it isn't mine. It isn't me. It belongs to nature. So we throw everything back to nature and never steal anything again."

That's just it. Whatever's occurring is just an aspect of nature. Yathā bhūta—things as they have come to be, couldn't be otherwise. And my getting in there—it's not even a "my"—but the idea, "Oh, this shouldn't be, and I've got to fix it," is just an appropriating to some sense of me, stuff that's just natural and couldn't be otherwise.

Even our really painful, difficult personal patterns, which we all have—they're not something separate, just belonging to us. We can trace, for all of us, our patterns, our responses to life, our personalities. We come in with something, but they also are informed by the environment we grew up in and our family and the experiences that we have and the people we know and the stuff that we go through. There's no way to separate all of that. It's all part of nature. It's all in a way lawful—not like good or bad—but we can kind of see when certain particular patterns of mind come up that are difficult, that are suffering, and I don't like them. "I don't like them" is really kind of the bottom line.

Having understood to some extent some of the environmental and familial conditions that gave rise to them—and I'm not even talking about anything really intense or traumatic, but just stuff, you know?—understanding that, I don't have to, every time the particular pattern comes up, sit and go, "Okay, let me go back, and my mother was like this, and my father was like this, and because of them I'm like this..." Thank God, I don't mean that. It's like looking at it and saying, "Yeah, that's why. It was completely lawful. I understand. Great." Now it's like this. It actually releases any sense of ownership or needing to fix it. This is how it is in this moment. Just relax into nature.

It's like going out and wishing the moon wasn't full. What's the point? This is how it is at the moment.

So this sense of learning to trust the simplicity of awareness, rather than getting distracted and completely absorbed in the reactions and habits of our mind—liking, disliking, looking for something a little bit better. It's going to happen. We learn to recognize those as the next arising mental experience.

But this is a huge shift, because so much of the time we've just learned to believe all these reactions and responses. The habit is to really get absorbed into what's happening—the object, the physical or mental experience, our thoughts, our emotions, whatever—really absorbed into it and our responses to it.

There's a subtle Tibetan definition of samsara: the urge to correct. Just somehow we could get it a little bit better, couldn't we? Of course this doesn't mean we give up and never do anything to improve life. I'm not saying that. I'm talking about our moment-to-moment experience, that sense of "this is how it is." Rather than landing in it with open-hearted, kind, interested, friendly attention—that's mindfulness, "Oh, it's like this"—we think, "But only if it could be like that, it would be better." Right? That movement forward, that movement toward something—that's what keeps us on the wheel of confusion. "It would be better, I will be happy with this next thing." That's really what you could call samsara.

In my experience, it keeps me locked in that sense of separation, of isolation. It's about what can I do, keeps me in the sense of "me," leaning forward either away from what I don't like or toward getting what I do like, or the next big thing. And so that sense of "I" or "mine," that kind of stealing from nature, is an isolating tendency. You don't see the big picture. You don't see the process of what's happening. We get lost in each specific experience, and it's never enough. There's always going to be something better.

And I don't know if you've noticed, but for me, it's like we're jerked around by liking and disliking and liking and disliking, and the next thing, and this emotion and that emotion. One thing you may notice here—you have a lot of thoughts, right? Thoughts come up frequently, telling you what to do, what you like, how you're going to do this, how you're going to do that. Have you had times when you have completely opposite thoughts and feelings about something within five minutes? And you believe in both? It's crazy, isn't it? Think if we acted on all these thoughts—it would be insane. But what's scary is how much in our life we do act on moods and thoughts.

So just to give an example. James pointed this out to me from the Super Bowl the other night. I won't say much in case there's somebody who's taping it and waiting until they go home in a month to watch it. I won't say anything about which team or whatever. But anyway, it was very close to the end, like a couple of minutes, and one team had the ball. It looked inevitable that they would score. The team that was about to score was behind, but if they got a touchdown, they would win. Two minutes to the end. That's what was occurring.

But anyway, that's not the point. The point is, it was close to the end. So this was going on, and they had the camera on the quarterback—not the quarterback of the team with the ball, but the other quarterback, who had been doing a really good job. He'd gotten his team in a winning position, and now he has to sit there and watch the defensive team blow it.

So anyway, they had the camera on the quarterback, and he's just sitting there looking like the picture of total dejection. Just completely, totally collapsed. And then—I won't give you details in case you're saving it—but they messed up the play in an unbelievable way. And it was clear that they weren't going to win and the other team was going to win. They cut back to the quarterback. He's leaping up and down, throwing his arms around.

It cracked me up—within two seconds from total, total dejection to leaping around like a maniac. Oh my God, this is saṃsāra. This is saṃsāra. It's a game. It's a game. And then it's over. Those minutes are over. And now he's got to get all revved up for the next season and the next game. And it's endless until he retires. And he'll probably never remember anything because he's probably had so many concussions from all these years of being a quarterback. And then you have to suffer from that. This is so saṃsāra.

But anyway, that was to me the perfect example of life. This is what we do. And we believe it all. We believe it, and we wonder why we're exhausted. We wonder why the world is nuts. We wonder why retreats are so hard. We say, sit down and look at your mind—this is what we're looking at.

The only refuge that makes sense is awareness. If you take refuge in activity, this is what you get. But awareness can watch the whole show with interest, not with judgment—to see how suffering is created, how freedom is created, in this moment, in this heart, in this mind and body.

And so that's like the three jobs, the overarching jobs, within which all the techniques are supportive of this simplicity and honesty of mindfulness, moment to moment, with the right understanding—not taking it personally, not liking, not disliking, just what's happening now. Simply six sense experiences, and the continuity, the steadiness—just remembering: am I aware now? Okay, great. Whatever you're doing, nothing is more or less important in terms of what you can be aware of.

So I'll just end with two things. One, in terms of the continuity: Joseph, our friend Joseph Goldstein, had a great little way to help get a sense of whether there's a way we're prioritizing sitting, which many of us do. He said, just imagine throughout the day—we say it's all equal: sitting, walking, daily activities. But in our mind, we really think first there's sitting, then there's walking maybe, daily activities okay. We give it lip service, we try. He said, so imagine reversing those priorities. The most important place to bring your mindful awareness is your daily activities—taking a shower, work meditation, going to the toilet, walking out of this room. The second is walking, the third is the sitting meditation. Just explore that, see what your mind does with it.

And so, in a way back to saying what I find has been most vivid for me over these years: what becomes more and more real, not tangible but accessible, is this sense of trust in the power of simple awareness. However difficult something is for me, when something is going on and I'm struggling and working and trying to figure it out—and this is in life too, not just on retreat—at some point when I realize I'm all caught up and confused: What's happening now? Oh, confusion. And the awareness of just what's happening—it's like everything just relaxes into this moment. Awareness doesn't need to push this moment away. You don't have to figure it all out. The next moment will take care of itself.

More and more, I trust that. That's our practice here. Whatever technique you use is in support of that.

So thank you for listening to the Dharma.

Let's just sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 141

Brahmavihāras Day #7

Carol Wilson · 44 min

> In this seventh day of brahmavihāra practice, Carol Wilson introduces working with the neutral person in mettā meditation while emphasizing that loving-kindness practice is not about achieving or conquering, but simply inclining the heart toward friendliness moment by moment. She explains how all Buddhist practices—vipassanā, samatha, and the brahmavihāras—work from different angles toward the same purification of our habitual responses of greed, hatred, and delusion.
> Carol addresses common experiences that arise during mettā practice, including encountering difficult states like self-loathing or aversion, and offers practical guidance for working with these challenges through gentle recognition and returning to connection. She clarifies that the 'neutral' person isn't neutral in themselves, but rather someone we don't have strong feelings about—perhaps someone behind a counter or a fellow retreatant we haven't formed stories about.
> The teaching emphasizes flexibility over hierarchy in practice: when connection is difficult with one category, practitioners should return to where mettā flows easily, whether that's the benefactor, friend, or self. Carol notes that any moment of pure mettā—regardless of the recipient—cultivates the wholesome quality we seek. The guided meditation moves through self, benefactor or friend, neutral person, and finally expands to include all beings, demonstrating how this gradual progression opens the heart beyond personal preference.

So today in the offerings in the formal progression of this loving-kindness practice, we'll bring up the so-called neutral person. I'll talk about that a little bit.

But first, a reminder which probably has been said every day: just remember that we're cultivating this loving-kindness practice not to achieve anything or prove anything or get somewhere or do it right. And it's not about moving quickly through all the categories to get to the difficult person or all beings or anything. Simply, moment to moment, as Kate was saying yesterday, we are inclining the mind, the heart, towards this state of mind and heart, this quality of friendliness, acceptance, patience, inclusion, kindness. All of those are words that express some angle, some part of loving-kindness.

My belief is that in terms of all these different practices offered by the Buddha, they all, from different angles, are cultivating and working towards the same end, which is this purification of the suffering, confused habits of our heart and mind. The habits where we respond to whatever situation by either greed or hatred, fear or delusion. Deep, deep habits that we think make sense. It's basically what we talk about every night in one way or another.

All the techniques of vipassana are working in that way to purify a moment of the mind stream, the heart stream, and then we can recognize accurately. Concentration, shamatha meditation, is doing the same thing. And all the brahma-vihāras are, from another angle, offering us a different direction to come in to simply shift the habits of the inclination of our heart and mind. So that's what the loving-kindness practice is doing. And technically, it's kind of like the opposite of ill-will, the opposite of anger.

You'll also see often, in terms of the so-called purification that comes up when you're practicing mettā here or on your own, you may have noticed once in a while other states than mettā arise in your mind and heart. States such as aversion, or self-aversion, or ill-will, or fear. Besides just the regular boredom and wanting and daydreaming. Sometimes you think, "I'm practicing mettā and I'm just filled with self-loathing. That doesn't really seem like what we're trying to do here."

But that's kind of how the old habits get highlighted. And our practice of this mettā, again, isn't to stop self-loathing and immediately feel boundless love. We would if we could, but we can't, so we don't, and it's better not to try. But recognize: this is self-loathing, it's not mettā. That's already good. And then gently come back and see if you can just incline the mind, the heart, to connection, to friendliness, to well-wishing. As Kate was saying, it doesn't matter if you don't feel it. But just that inclination—each time, in a moment, we incline towards this friendliness, this acceptance of ourselves, of friend, of benefactor, of neutral, of all beings. It really doesn't matter which category, which being. That moment of inclining the mind, the heart, is a moment of shifting the habit.

That's why often we think we're practicing and practicing and nothing's happening. And then at some point, now or having lunch or three years from now, suddenly in a situation where you would normally get really averse or annoyed or react in some way, suddenly friendliness and mettā arises instead. And you think, "What's going on? This can't be me. I didn't do this on purpose. It's just happening."

And that's really what happens. We think anger is just happening, but it's just happening because we've practiced it for a really long time. So the more we practice this loving-kindness, the more that comes to be the inclination, the habit of mind.

I'm saying this in terms of why we're going through the different categories—because they highlight maybe different aspects of where it's easy, where it's difficult, or different specific habits may come up in our heart and mind. Perhaps for some people the being you're using as a benefactor is more easy to naturally feel friendly, connected, accepting than oneself or friend or whatever. But that's why we also say we offer the different categories for you to see, for you to practice, to explore—not to conquer.

And when in any category you're really getting lost in the reactivity, or there's no connection at all and you're just lost in thought, or the energy has just dropped out, then go to where it's easy. If you spend the whole retreat just with benefactor or self, if that's easy, that is cultivating the loving-kindness.

As I think I said the first day I was talking about it: any moment that there's just a pure moment of mettā—it doesn't have to be the big feelings, but just that purity, that wholesomeness of mind, heart, mind stream, rather than the fear or aversion—in that moment, whoever might happen to walk in front of you, the heart-mind would accept them with mettā. So you're not wasting your time if you can only send mettā to benefactor or yourself. That's great. For yourself, some people—we've talked about that. You think it's selfish and all of that.

So wherever you can feel the connection, that's cultivating it. That's great. Don't think of it as hierarchy, please. Or should.

Sometimes, as we say, self is the most difficult. We have the idea that we need it, that we should do it for ourselves, but in doing it to ourselves, we're just running into a brick wall over and over. Go back again to wherever it's more connected. Stay there a while. And then you can slip yourself in through the corner and see what happens. Just not to think of it as a hierarchy, and really have this flexibility to see right now what's helping to reconnect the heart, the mind, to incline the intention in that direction of friendliness, inclusion, well-wishing.

So-called neutral—and most of you have done this, I know from the first day, so you know, but I have to say it anyway. It's not that the person we pick is a neutral person in themselves. It's someone we don't really know. You know them enough to be able to remember them or somehow bring up a hazy image, but it's someone you don't have much to do with, most likely, because it's someone you don't have very strong feelings about one way or the other.

Some people find there's no one who's absolutely neutral. Fine, don't go crazy. Some people come and say, "Well, I picked someone, but I'm starting to feel a little bit of liking towards them, a little bit of metta, so do I need to stop now and find another neutral person?" No, no—that's how it's supposed to work. It's good. Stick with them. But you might find a person where there's a little bit more on the pleasant side, a little bit more on the unpleasant. Pick the one a little bit on the pleasant.

Some people find it's hard to think of someone who's neutral because right away our mind has formed opinions. So just be as mellow as you can with it. Occasionally someone will say they were shocked to find how many people were neutral—almost like people we didn't really pay much attention to. Don't go on a trip about that either. Just pick someone you don't have a big story going on about or a lot of experience with.

If it's still possible after a week here that there's someone in this retreat who's relatively neutral, someone you haven't got a whole story playing about, that's helpful because then you can catch a visual as you're walking around. That may be too late for that. You could pick the person behind the counter at the supermarket where you always go, something like that. Just see who pops up.

It's meant to be a bit more difficult simply because we don't know much, if anything, about this person. If there's someone here, we can impute to them being a human being. We can see: just as I want to be happy, just as I deeply want peace, so too do you. And just wishing that for this person as a representative of humanity. Just as I feel, so may you be happy.

You may know what their work is. You don't know anything about them, but you can see it's the guy working in the dry cleaner and he's friendly when you come in. Or it's somebody in the gas station and they're always there doing their job, the best they can. Don't go into too much story-making. Just find a way to connect. If anything, you can just get a hazy visual and a sense of just being with them, remembering them as a human being. Offer them the phrases one at a time: just as I want for myself, so too may you be safe and protected.

We'll start with self and then go to whichever has been easiest for you—benefactor or friend—just to kind of get the mind and heart a bit collected to start. Because to start right off with neutral, one of the ways you may experience it if it's difficult for you, it may not be so much the opposite coming up, but just the energy falling out. No real connection there, and the mind just goes off into wandering.

That's why I said don't deliberately make up stories. That's one of the ways the distracted mind fools us in metta practice. It goes off on endless stories about the person we're supposedly sending metta to. Have you noticed that? You kind of half feel you're doing the metta—oh yeah, the guy in the dry cleaner, and he goes home and he has a nice dog and he must be happy and I wonder if he's got kids. Oh, sending metta. You're not sending metta. You're just thinking about stuff.

So notice that. Notice that with all the metta in your heart. It's not bad. It's just not metta. We just want to know what's what. That's one way neutral gets difficult. We kind of lose the thread.

So then again, pick it up if you can. But if you just keep getting lost, again, return to where you can connect a little more steadily, a little more easily. Spend some time there—self, benefactor, friend. And then again, experiment with this so-called neutral person. Just see how it is. In a way, it's not exactly all beings, but I find it kind of a beginning entryway, because we don't have the personal connection to hook onto—just that they're a being, worthy of love and acceptance, just as we are, just as we all are. No better, no worse, no different.

So let's practice together for a little bit, purifying, cultivating the wholesome in our hearts, in our minds, sharing that with ourselves, with our friend, benefactor, neutral, and ultimately all beings.

Finding your comfortable posture, much as you can. And you know what we always say, what I hope you often do, is just take a moment to relax into how it is right now with this body, with this heart-mind. We're just including all aspects of your present moment experience, not starting metta in some kind of struggle with what's going on. It's like this right now. Just relaxing into the sitting position. Receiving the sensations of the physical sitting posture. Just into this field of acceptance, of non-judgment. It's like this now. May this body be happy and healthy.

Feeling whatever's occurring in the heart, the mind, whatever weather system's going on. It's like this now. Sleepy, restless, bored, happy, frightened, lonely. It's like this now. And however it is, it's one momentary aspect of states of mind-heart that we all share, we all participate in. How my mind is expressing in this moment is this particular representation of all beings, of life, of nature.

Just as the heart-mind is in this moment: May I be happy, safe, healthy, living with ease.

And so if spending time with yourself has been accessible or useful, then please let your awareness just completely come into a sense of yourself, whether it's physical—feeling yourself sitting here—mental image, sense in your heart, your memory. If self is really, really difficult, don't fight with it right now, but go to benefactor or friend where it's easy. We can't really be doing this fighting with experience. It's like this now.

So if you're doing self, just tuning in: just as I am in this moment, may I love and accept myself just as I am. Consciously tune into any aspect of your sincerity, your goodness, total worthiness as a human being—which is true for all of us, for everyone. The sincerity of your intention, of your practice, whatever comes up for you. Nothing is too insignificant an aspect of your goodness to appreciate.

And just gently keep on connecting the sense of acceptance, friendliness, and using whichever phrases have been useful for you. The phrases are not to change anything, but as an expression of this warmth, this tender inclusion of all aspects of heart, of ourselves.

May I be safe and protected. May I be happy and peaceful. May I be healthy and may I live with physical ease. May I live with ease, may I be able to care for myself happily in this world.

Sometimes we're the offerer, sometimes the receiver of this simple, friendly, kind energy. And don't worry or get upset if you get lost, if the phrases become rote, if some other feelings are going on. Just simply recognizing that's happening now—that's already a shift from reactivity to friendly acceptance. It's like this now.

And then see if you can just gently connect again with yourself, however you're feeling, feeling the body, connecting with your goodness, and start again, simply offering the next phrase. Just very simple, like a gift. We offer the phrase—may I be happy and peaceful—without looking for any result, just an offering of the heart, and it goes off into the universe. Connect again with the sense of myself. Offer the next phrase in the same way.

And then if sending to yourself, receiving for yourself seems to be flowing, if it's easy and you want to stay there right now, great—please do so. If you'd like to instead bring in either friend or benefactor, this could be a time to do that. Just whichever one naturally seems easy. The sense of getting a sense of the being is simple. You can connect to their wholesome, lovable aspect and just relatively simply feel inclusive, friendly, accepting, and just offering each phrase.

So whichever being comes up for you, friend or benefactor—the easy one: May you be safe and protected from inner and outer harm. May you be happy.

May you be healthy. May you live with ease in this world.

And now I suggest, if you're interested in exploring, offering friendly, kind acceptance and well-wishing to a neutral person, you could bring that sense of that person in now—a memory, a visual sense, whatever works for you.

Just give it some time. No need to push or try. Be a bit patient with this if it doesn't connect. Some people find that neutral is actually the easiest. We never know. We're all different.

Stay steady for a little bit. As best you can, get a sense or image or a felt sense of the person, or remember them in some place where you've seen them or heard them. Connect, just knowing that as a human they also want to be happy and living in peace.

And just offer: May you be safe and protected.

After that, if you've lost the sense, take a moment to connect again and then offer again. Connect to the image or felt sense or hearing, and then offer. If you lose the thread, simply start again—very patient. See how it goes. This too is an aspect of metta: patience.

But if you find you're really getting lost, as I said, simply switch back again to where you can connect with a bit more steadiness. And then you may try neutral again. We're just exploring here.

For the last few moments of the sitting, only if you want to, sometimes I imagine the metta as a simple warm glow in the heart area, the chest. And I just imagine spreading this out to include all of us in this room—moving from neutral to a sense of just including all of us without preference or exception. All our fellow travelers on the path.

May we all be safe and protected. May we be happy and peaceful. May we be healthy. May we live with ease.

May the fruits of our practice be shared with all beings in all walks of life. May all beings everywhere be happy, be freed from suffering and confusion.

CHAPTER 142

Understanding the First Noble Truth

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this dharma talk from a February Insight Meditation Retreat, Carol Wilson offers a nuanced exploration of the First Noble Truth (dukkha), emphasizing that it is to be understood rather than merely endured. Drawing from the Dalai Lama's teachings on right view and the importance of examining reality directly, she clarifies that dukkha—often mistranslated as "suffering"—more accurately points to the unreliability, unsatisfactoriness, and incompleteness that characterize conditioned experience.
> Wilson unpacks the three traditional aspects of dukkha: dukkha-dukkha (the obvious pain of illness, loss, and death), viparināma-dukkha (the unsatisfactoriness inherent in change, even of pleasant experiences), and saṅkhāra-dukkha (the subtle stress of conditioned formations constantly arising and passing). She addresses common misunderstandings, particularly the notion that accepting dukkha means passive resignation. Using the Buddha's own engaged life after awakening as an example—including his active mediation in conflicts among his kinsmen—she demonstrates that understanding dukkha actually enables clearer seeing and more compassionate, skillful action.
> The talk explores how delusion manifests through denial and inattention, keeping us caught in reactive patterns of aversion to the unpleasant and craving for the pleasant. Wilson emphasizes that steady mindfulness allows us to meet each moment's experience without contention, revealing the interdependence of all phenomena. She concludes by connecting this understanding to compassion and nonviolent action, reading from James Lawson's principles that guided the civil rights movement, showing how deep insight into suffering naturally gives rise to courageous, loving engagement with the world.

Talking last night about the quality of freedom of heart-mind—call it Nibbana, nature of mind, whatever—and how it's only visible here and now in the immediacy of this present moment. Although I would imagine for many of us that our practice is really to come to understand this with sincere intention and enormous effort—certainly not just this retreat but, if we're on the path, it becomes our whole life.

But still, there's a kind of catch-22. As hard, as sincere as we may be, if we keep looking through the same set of deluded, confused lenses on our perception, everything we do to try to understand things as they are, to try to free our heart and mind, just keeps us going in the same round, and we can't really get it. We can't see what we're doing because we're only seeing in the same way. And then, when those moments come—and it can just be moments—when suddenly, "Oh, yeah, that's how it really is," it's so immediate.

I remember reading years ago about some famous Tibetan teacher who was saying to his own teacher, "Oh, why didn't you tell me it was like this? Closer than my own eyelid!" Does that help us? No. Closer than my own eyelid—got it? No, because we keep on looking in the wrong way.

This is from the Dalai Lama: "All things, including nirvana, arise from causes and conditions. To find happiness, it is indispensable to have a correct view of the nature of mind and the world. What is meant by right view is not faith or believing in a particular dogma, but a clear understanding that is reached through thoroughly examining reality. This kind of examination will refute the belief in the independent existence of things, which is the root of our distorted vision of the world and vision of ourselves, and replace it with the right view—the right view which implies a recognition that the nature of Buddhahood"—this is Tibetan language—"the nature of liberation is the essence of our own mind, our fundamental cognitive ability, luminous and pure without confusion."

When we say "our," that's just a way of speaking, but this natural purity of cognition is luminous and pure. Right view also involves identifying the factors that keep us from perceiving this nature, so that it becomes possible for us to abandon them, or at least to stop feeding them. A lot of our practice of mindfulness is about seeing and identifying these factors. And the seeing itself is what's liberating.

Tonight I want to talk about the first of the Four Noble Truths. I'm hoping to have one talk on each of the four, but you never know how it goes. Things get sidetracked, other things happen, but we're starting with the first tonight.

From my limited understanding as not being a scholar, all different schools of Buddhism share the Four Noble Truths as the essence of the Buddha's teaching; they are central to all of them. It's sort of like when he had to distill it all down: What is it? Perhaps it's a little longer than just "nothing whatsoever is to be clung to," but that's at the heart of the Four Noble Truths. These are the four facts of life.

The Four Noble Truths are: the first, the truth of dukkha, which is what I'm going to talk about tonight, and I'll unpack that word; the second, the cause of dukkha; the third, the ending of or freedom from dukkha, the cessation of dukkha; and the fourth, the Eightfold Noble Path—the path of walking, of life, of practice.

I want to talk about this first one, the truth of dukkha. Each of the truths has an action associated with it. The truth of dukkha is to be understood. That's all. The Buddha said: What do we need to know to free our hearts and minds from these habits of misperceiving that keep us from being so immediate, closer than our eyelid, that keep us looking elsewhere? The first thing is simply to know and understand this truth of dukkha.

Certainly I can't offer a comprehensive understanding tonight, and it's something that we keep understanding and learning with more and more subtlety, more and more depth. In my experience, my whole life, it just keeps on going. There keeps on being more to see in my own mind and heart.

Again, as the Dalai Lama said, this isn't about understanding conceptually a dogma, believing that if we can understand and remember it, that's what's going to do it. Understanding dukkha is an invitation to this investigation into the nature of reality that His Holiness was talking about. And as Greg said, the nature of reality that's accessible to us is this mind-body process that each of us experiences moment to moment—our own, so to speak, mind-body process.

How amazing that all the confusion, but also all the truth of the way things work, can be experienced and revealed by exploring with open-hearted interest this mind-body process. What we come up against when we start, and as we keep going, is this truth of dukkha. So let me offer some reflections, certainly not comprehensive, but some reflections on the first noble truth.

I just want to share that dukkha is often translated as "the truth of suffering," but I don't want to translate it that way. Because when we hear the word "suffering" in English, how closely related is aversion? When you hear that word... yeah, it's pretty hard. "Oh yes, the truth of suffering. That's what people say about Buddhists—they're really downheads. Everything is suffering. Life is suffering." Have you heard that as one description of the first noble truth? Life is suffering. Well yes, let's embrace that. And how does understanding that free our heart and mind? It's like, please, I think I need to go somewhere else.

Suffering as a translation is often used, but perhaps it's not so helpful, not so useful in terms of understanding the real subtlety of what the Buddha is trying to introduce us to. And remember, understanding this—if we really understand it, even just in a moment—in that moment it is freeing us from unnecessary suffering, the suffering of reactive mind and reactive heart, because we're not recognizing accurately.

So I love talking about this first noble truth because the more I understand it, the more ease and peace and contentment I feel with life as it is. This doesn't mean life as it is has suddenly taken on a rosy hue. Anyone who really knows me knows I am not the world's biggest optimist. And it's not like, "Yes, I just see everything moving along and it's all going to be perfect in a perfect world." You're never going to hear me say that. But the understanding, the sense of understanding what dukkha means—really getting it—means not being in contention with reality. And this is incredibly powerful. We'll talk about it in many different ways.

So one way of describing the word dukkha comes from the Venerable Anālayo, who is another really preeminent translator. He's a German monk in the Theravada tradition, but he's done a lot of translating into English. He talks about the word itself—dukkha—and one way of breaking it apart is that the "du" part is like difficulty. Difficulty, not standing well, just difficulty. And one definition of the "kha" part—remember this is from 2600 years ago in rural India—involves an ox cart with two big wooden wheels, just solid wood with a hole in the middle where the axle goes through. So the difficulty of standing badly, the way this cart wheel rolls with this hole and the pole going through it—not smooth, not relaxed. And still today, I've ridden on an ox cart. I'm here to tell you that's a really good definition. It's just not comfortable. It's just not easy. A kind of disharmony, a little bit of friction.

As Ruth Denison, a great teacher who is quite old now, once said, "That little leak in the canoe..." There's always a little something that shows up.

Bhikkhu Bodhi describes it as the basic sense, arising from time to time—not every moment—of unsatisfactoriness or incompletion that runs through our lives. It's not that every moment is horrible suffering. It's not that. So this is one way of thinking about dukkha: this unreliability, as Greg uses a word we often use, this kind of incompleteness, this unsatisfactoriness.

And then the Buddha, as he was wont to do, being quite precise, talks about it in three different aspects. And this is where it becomes a challenging, very challenging teaching—both to talk about, to hear, and then to keep looking at in our lives in all these three aspects.

This is Sariputta, the Buddha's chief disciple, describing: "There are, friend, these three kinds of dukkha. The stress, the discontent that arises just due to pain, due to difficult things that happen. The second is the discontent that arises due to change—viparinṇāma dukkha. And this is really when beautiful, pleasant things are occurring, and they do. They're also included within dukkha, not because they're not beautiful and pleasant, but because they're unreliable. They go away. And the dukkha due to formations, which is saṅkhāra dukkha—saṅkhāra being any fabrication, coming together, going apart, this sense of endless coming together, going apart."

I'll talk about each of the three.

In a way, it's the most obvious, and in another way, in terms of really opening to understanding, it's immensely challenging. I find this in our practice here, in our daily lives, and just in our minds—even being able to wrap around it enough to be willing to look. Not that we can totally understand, but even to meet it.

So this is how the Buddha describes this dukkha dukkha: Birth is dukkha, aging is dukkha, illness is dukkha, death is dukkha. We wouldn't argue with this, right? It's unsatisfactory. Sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief, and despair all occur. Separation from what is pleasing is dukkha. Union with what is displeasing is dukkha. Not to get what one wants is dukkha.

Probably, I'm guessing, up to now we could all be on the same page. No one's saying, "Yeah, I don't think that's dukkha. That's great. I love not getting what I want." But what the Buddha is saying is that this is simply a fact of life. This is what occurs at times to everybody. Everybody. No one here gets out alive.

And so this is where people go, "Okay, well that's really inspiring." But mostly what I'm here to talk about—my way of approaching this—is not to try and convince you, or me, that this stuff really happens. Rather, it's to look at why we need to understand, why the Buddha thought, "I need to tell you this so that you can understand it," because that's how our mind relates to it.

In terms of this first dukkha, the dukkha of pain, the dukkha of loss and despair and lamentation, what the Buddha's talking about—where we can explore, where we can investigate—is in our personal, moment-to-moment experience in our mind and heart of dukkha dukkha. I'm going to use "suffering" for dukkha dukkha: unpleasant, painful, difficult things occurring in our own mind or occurring to us from the so-called outside. Maybe it could be grief. It could be sadness. It could be illness. It could be job loss. It could be someone externally really treating us badly. It could be systemic. It could be cultural. The teaching is not saying that bad stuff doesn't happen—and I'm using "bad" in our normal way.

But when the Buddha talks about understanding, about not being in contention with reality, I want to say that in terms of the bigger world—the sense of the incredible amount of violence, hatred, injustice, homophobia, racism, poverty, economic inequality, you name it—the freedom really comes from our being able to truly be with this dukkha without fighting with it. Remember, he's talking about the immediacy of what's occurring in this moment. What's happening in this moment.

Two of the ways we get really lost in reactivity: One is the obvious one of aversion, anger, fear—moving into some realm in our reaction either to what's happening or to ourselves, blaming ourselves or hating others, or just all-out denial, so that our heart and mind is overwhelmed by anger, fear, aversion. That's perhaps the more obvious way.

Another way we sometimes hear more intellectually until we really get it on a cellular level—and then we understand differently. But often when we talk about how freedom comes from not being in contention with this moment of reality, we hear it as a kind of passivity. That the Buddha is saying we can't respond or try to change anything in this world or in our life. Have you sometimes felt that that's what the teaching is? When we use the word "acceptance," it's often heard in that way. "I just have to accept." And this can lead into either a kind of self-blame—whatever bad happens is my fault—or else it's hopeless, a kind of victimhood, or else a reactivity to that: "What do you mean we can't change? That's crazy."

That's not what the teaching is saying at all. Understanding in a moment, not being in contention with this moment's experience, is what allows for clear seeing, the clear recognition of what's occurring. And that can allow, in the next moment, if a response is appropriate or possible, for that response to occur. How the mind-heart is awake and present in this moment becomes a cause, a condition for what arises in the mind-heart in the next moment. So if we're filled with aversion, feeding aversion, feeding anger and confusion, that's much more likely to lead into the next moment. But when just in a moment we can drop into "this is what's happening now"—and yes, it's horrible, we're not saying it makes it nice, this is horrible—the immediacy of presence, not the concept, then that moment of non-aversion, of clear-seeing wisdom, allows for clearer recognition and a more appropriate response.

So I'm saying at the beginning—hopefully I'll have time to talk a little at the end—but I just want to really make it clear as I move into talking more about the freedom that only comes from total presence with this moment: that acceptance, that non-contention, is not passivity into the future. It's not stupidity, or rolling over like a doormat and not responding at all. It allows for really clear seeing and a strong response.

One way that this not being in contention—this not-passivity—works is by recognizing that we all, at different times, will experience to different degrees all that stuff the Buddha mentioned. And we each, to differing degrees, have our personal experience, our cultural experience, our familial experience, our community experience—whatever it may be. Different for each of us.

The Buddha is talking in terms of these Four Noble Truths, of this First Noble Truth, and all of that is true. And it's not at all a justification or an apology for the injustice and the violence in the world. It's not that. But the place we can start to free our hearts and minds is right here. And that takes a willingness to drop in right now, when I feel—you know—"I can't bear to be with this." Okay, what is it I can't bear to be with? Just exploring it with kindness. Not in contention.

A place I find really instructive to look at in terms of this balance is the Buddha's life itself—little parts of his life after he was enlightened. What did he do with the forty-five years of his life after he woke up and became the peaceful one, free from suffering, free from confusion?

He made choices. He did not live forty-five years of passivity, hanging out in some realm of heavenly beauty. The suttas tell us maybe he could have done that—that was a choice he could have made. I mean, who knows? I don't know. But that's in the suttas: that was a choice he could have made.

But the choice he made was to tune in to the beings, the humans in the world. And this is part of the vastness of a Buddha's mind—it can empathetically feel what's going on. And seeing the suffering, he didn't say, "Well, yeah, that's just how it is. Just be with the suffering. That's how it is. Not in contention with reality." No. His clear seeing, the heart—the jewel in the heart of freedom, in the heart of understanding dukkha—is compassion. It is this ability to bear witness to the difficulty, the unhappiness, the dissatisfaction in our own mind and heart, and to be present with that in others.

When our mind, our heart, our response is not clouded or distorted by aversion, by ill will, by clinging, then we can make choices. We don't make them—intention makes them. Let's not even go there any further than that. But choices are made. Choices arise due to causes and conditions arising in the mind, and they coalesce into an intention in a moment. And then the Buddha had the intention to share what he knew, out of compassion for the world. That intention would keep arising for forty-five years.

So certainly not passivity, but quite ongoing engaged activity for the good of beings.

If an understanding of dukkha meant "it's all hopeless, nothing can change," he wouldn't have bothered, right? I figure he wouldn't have bothered. If the understanding of reality meant "it's like this in this moment, and it'll always be like this—change isn't possible, so heck with it"—he wouldn't have gone teaching, walking up and down India barefoot, begging for his meals every day.

Think about it. Does that sound really very comfortable? When you think about waking up, do you think about how you're still going to have your backache? He did. There are suttas where he had to lie down and he goes, "Ananda, you give the talk. I have to go lie down. My back hurts." Or he'd have a headache. Stuff happened. You know, his kinsfolk on both sides—his mother's and father's families—went to war over water rights. His awakening couldn't stop the stupidity and the violence and the greed in the world.

He couldn't change the world. I mean, here we all are, 2,600 years later, really sincere, really wanting to cultivate wisdom and kindness and compassion. And that's beautiful—what a great thing that this is a path that's still alive. There are many paths, but this one is still here. Yet he couldn't fix the whole world. He couldn't even fix his own kinspeople.

But he didn't just sit there and think, "Well, they're killing each other. What to do?" He did what he could do. He went and talked to them. He really mediated. He did help them come to some conclusion. He did stop that particular moment of violence based on greed and water rights and fear.

So he was active. It wasn't a life of passivity. It was action based on compassion, based on clear seeing, from an ability to be with all these painful things happening and then to respond in a way that's sensible, that's appropriate—that isn't put off by the suffering but isn't lost in it either.

When we perceive correctly, the heart-mind is free, it's open. There's that moment of purity, the potential, just for a moment, to be here so fully that whatever's occurring is simply recognized as it is. It doesn't become a source of suffering for us. We don't then act out of it in ways that cause suffering for others.

I'll stay with dukkha dukkha—talking about why this is so difficult for us. Because again, it's obvious that all this happens. And yet still, so often, moha, delusion, shows up in our minds in various ways. One way is this kind of denial: this isn't happening, or it's not going to happen. Or we know it intellectually, but we don't really let it in.

That we're each going to die is the classic example, right? I know it. The older I get, it's a little closer than it used to be, I have to notice it—but not really. Not yet. There's like twenty more years, whatever. There's a way it's just not quite in there.

How often when something goes wrong in our immediate life—a loss, an illness, we hurt ourselves, or something really appalling happens to us from outside while we were just minding our own business—the sense of denial, the feeling that this is not supposed to happen, is often so strong. Even just with illness, which I have a lot of personal experience of, it's quite easy for the mind to slip into thinking, "Yeah, I know, but if I was really pure enough... if I was practicing correctly, if I had enough understanding, this illness, this bad thing wouldn't have happened. Somehow I did something wrong."

There's often, when someone is ill or suffering grief or loss, a sense of shame. The dukkha dukkha, the suffering, can take us into a sense of alienation. In a way, we each suffer alone. If I'm really having a migraine, there can be empathy, but no one else can really have it with me. Not that I would wish someone to have it with me, but no one really can. So in that way, it's true—you're experiencing what you're experiencing in this moment.

But the next moment, someone else is experiencing their suffering. We all experience all these aspects: loss of what we love, being together with what we don't like, old age, birth, sickness, death, the stuff that goes on in the world, the violence, the injustice. We're all impacted in different ways.

What's so fascinating is how, at times, there can be this sense of "no"—when bad stuff happens, it's a mistake, it's wrong. And often our tendency is to turn it against ourselves. It becomes this kind of self-judging: what did I do wrong to be experiencing this?

That's aversion, right? You're aware that's aversion. That's the habit of mind: unpleasant leads to aversion. Push it away.

Blame inside, blame outside. Because this isn't supposed to be happening.

This is one of the places where this becomes challenging when we think of the injustice in the world. Because if we say in the moment, whether it's supposed to be happening or not is a moot point—it is happening. In this moment, it is happening. This particular moment can't be any different because it's already here, happening. That's what not being in contention with reality means. It doesn't mean saying it's right, it's appropriate, let's support it to continue. It's saying: this is what's happening. And when the heart, the mind, is meeting it with aversion, fear, blame—any sort of aversion—it pushes away the experience such that we can't recognize accurately. It keeps us in that cycle of more delusion, not recognizing accurately or being able to respond appropriately.

And it's amazing, though, the power of denial. Sometimes I think I should give a whole talk on it. It's an amazing power in the world. Have you ever noticed—if you've been in a relationship that lasted some time and then broke up, probably no one here has had that experience—and at the end of it... In the beginning, everything's so lovely. That's why you get in the relationship, right? You don't get in it going, "Oh, this is going to be horrible." You really think it's going to be great, and the person's so wonderful.

Then at the end, when it ends, whichever way it ends—good, bad—you can see, I mean, I've seen for myself, the things that really came together to make it break apart, that wasn't new information. That was something I knew the day I met the person. Me and the person, we knew, but oh no, no, no, that's not even happening. It's like, I don't even know that. That's not really true. I'm not even going to look at that. It's almost like my mind can almost see itself doing that: I'm just not going to go there. And that'll just make it not be true. If we ignore it enough, it won't be true. It doesn't work that way. But denial is amazing.

I read years ago a little article in the New York Times about some small town in Spain. The mayor said the cemetery was getting too full—there was no more space to bury people who die. So the mayor proclaimed a temporary moratorium on death until they could find more land for a new cemetery. I mean, this was serious. This was not funny news. This was a serious article in the newspaper.

So we can go to this place of feeling isolated, when in fact the opening into these aspects of dukkha-dukkha, as Ajahn Sumedho likes to point out, actually can be something that unifies us as human beings. He used to start his talks with, "Welcome, sisters and brothers in old age, disease, and death." Like, we're all going to go through it. We are. Why be ashamed when we're sick, or something is falling apart, or we've lost our job, or one of our really unpleasant mental habits has suddenly come out our mouth and now everybody knows what a mess we really are? You think they didn't know. We're the only ones pretending we don't know.

But this is life. We're all sharing in it. Really, it doesn't have to be a way to be ashamed or alienated, but a way of connectedness, of unity, of inclusion. Not non-inclusion—inclusion. This is really the heart of empathy that arises from a deep understanding of suffering in our own experience. And this heart of empathy is the heart of compassion. The Dalai Lama talks about this a lot.

So this quality of denial—just, this isn't happening, it's not supposed to be happening, only good things are supposed to happen, and if something bad happens, it's wrong—however way our mind works with it, that's one basic element of delusion, of moha, that serves the purpose of keeping us from recognizing accurately. It comes from the belief, as I think Joko Beck said, the belief that I can somehow hold myself separate from this unpleasant and difficult experience. Have you noticed that? Just in practice here.

This is what I love about being on retreat—you can have simple examples. Someone will come in and say, "Well, I'm all upset, but the thing I'm upset about is so stupid." And we go off into how stupid the thing is. Never mind that it's stupid. Turn around and see. This is how the mind works. This is a great place to observe it.

We think we can hold ourselves separate from this unpleasant experience, which might just be a recurrent sound that we hate. We experience it as unpleasant, and the last thing we want to do is simply open with awareness into the experience of hearing. "I don't want to hear that sound. I don't want to hear that sound." We do all the things we do precisely so we don't have to just open into hearing what's unpleasant.

When there's a moment that we can do this—and you can't do it by an act of will; you try, but you're still caught in the unpleasantness—but the moment when something lets go and you just drop into, "Okay, unpleasant sound is like this"... you get a sense, "Oh, that's just what's happening." Unpleasant doesn't have to morph into pleasant for everything to be okay. That's just how it is. Unpleasant is like this. But we can't hold ourselves separate. We think we can rearrange the world to stop it.

Because I know we've talked about this, but secretly, way in the back—and I find it comes up in my mind all the time too, despite everything I know, even cellularly—secretly it'll come up: it's all about heading for pleasant. It's all about moving in the direction of more and more pleasant experience.

No one comes in and complains when they've had a really pleasant sitting. Do you? You don't come in and say, "My practice has gone to hell. I was just sitting there and it was bliss and there was no pain. It's really horrible." It's a rare being who comes in and complains about that, right? But you can spend days lost in that, cultivating wanting.

So this is a really deep habit of our mind, this aversion to the unpleasant.

One of the suttas I was mentioning in a meeting with someone the other day that I love, where the Buddha talks about this habit, is the one about the two darts. What he says is so poignant to me: a normal worldling, an unenlightened person, the only escape they know from unpleasant feeling is to go lusting after a pleasant sense experience. Does that sound familiar? That's like, in the world, without opening to understanding our mind and heart, he's saying that's the only escape people know.

So something's unpleasant—it could be vastly unpleasant, or just a little bit unpleasant. Just a little bit unpleasant at home, and you jump up and go to the fridge, or get on the phone, or turn on the TV—just to not feel it. Or here on retreat, you go into a fantasy. Have you noticed that? A pleasant fantasy. You come back and ask, "What's going on?" Well, my little finger's a little tight, you know. It's unpleasant. I mean, I've had that experience, really. It's just the habit of mind.

So the only escape a worldling knows is to lust after pleasant experience. This becomes a habit that underlies the mind, the Buddha says. The avoidance, the resistance to unpleasant, and the lusting after pleasant, and not understanding what's going on. This is so deep.

But the willingness to just, with our steady mindful awareness, meet each experience equally—that's what breaks this habit. And it's what lets us start to see how that habit is working. It's like, "Wow, look at that."

We can do it the other way too, not always going for the pleasant. But this is one of the ways we sometimes get into, kind of dharmically, in our practice, a misunderstanding of dukkha. We think, "Well, okay, it's not about chasing after the pleasant."

And this is another aspect of the truth of dukkha—the fact of change, viparinama dukkha. Sariputta, who was the Buddha's chief disciple, in one sutta gives what's called his lion's roar of awakening, where he declares, "Yes, I know this to be true." And one of the things he says is that all feeling tone—all feeling, whether pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral in our mind—all feeling is included within dukkha.

Now, if you think of dukkha just as suffering, that's, again, we're into, "Oh my God, he's saying there's nothing pleasant, there's nothing beautiful. It's all just suffering, it's all just horrible."

This is the misunderstanding. But the second aspect of dukkha—unreliable, nothing to hold to—is that it changes. There is beauty in this world. There is happiness in sense pleasures, in beautiful experiences. The Buddha is not denying that at all. It's only when we ask from them something they can't give—a reliability, a lasting happiness, a sense of self-gratification—when it goes, as the Buddha said, separation from what is loved, that will happen. It absolutely will happen to every single thing, any moment that we love. The same will happen with the moments we don't love, because no moment lasts. Nothing lasts. We don't like that too much when it's pleasant. It's that unreliability, that nowhere to take a stand.

So the Buddha is saying, or Sariputta is saying, all feeling, all vedana, is included within dukkha in that it's unreliable. He's not saying there's nothing beautiful. In another place, a poetic translation of another sutta, he says, "What is beautiful in the world remains so, but the wise one no longer strives after it." Do you get the difference?

So we're bringing in the steadiness of awareness. Mindfulness meets the unpleasant, meets the pleasant, meets the neutral. Just being with what's presenting itself. This is not being in contention with the reality that's presenting itself in this moment—any of the changing sixth sense experiences.

This is why we emphasize steadiness, continuity. The more and more mindfulness starts to get its own momentum through all the activities of the day, there's no way you cannot notice: pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—just changing all the time. They're all happening. And if we are avoiding the unpleasant, glomming onto the pleasant, we're never going to see accurately. We keep spinning in this cycle of unsatisfactoriness.

So this sense of just landing in this moment, as it is. And then this moment, as it is. Not trying to explain it all—just here, here, here. That steadiness of awareness reveals the way things are. And then that sense of "I can hold myself separate from this unpleasant experience" starts to drop away.

But we're so deeply conditioned, with really a lot of fear of the unpleasant and of pain. I certainly am. And I'm not saying we should now be able to say, "Okay, now I'm just going to open to all the suffering in my life, all the suffering in the world in this moment." We can't do that by an act of will. And there are definitely many times when the degree of emotional pain or physical pain or mental pain arising in my heart-mind, in my body at this moment, is occurring more strongly than the strength of awareness to meet it in that moment.

But that's a momentary thing. We tend to go, "Well, that's just too much. I can't be with it. It's over." But I'll go back to migraines, because I get them. I remember years ago when it was just so unbearable. I would just roll around. It was unbearable. I just wanted to not be conscious at all, or just out of it.

I'm still not saying I like them, but I can see a real shift at times. Everything's just moment to moment, nothing steady state. But there are times when there's that pain and instead of the mind going, "Oh my God, this is unbearable, I can never be with these moments"—it's just what it is. I'm not analyzing or trying to do anything, or trying to get compassionate. The habit of heart, of mind, of total aversion and fear toward the unpleasant is much less strong than it used to be, at moments.

And then there are times when you can say, "Okay, it's like this." I'll be going around doing what I'm doing, sometimes having fun and talking, and then there'll be a lapse where it's like, "Oh my God, shoot myself"—and that'll come in. And then there'll be times when the mind can be with it again.

The bigger picture knowing—this seeing how the mind works—is also part of awareness. Not having some idealistic view, which we can also get lost in through practice. "Okay, now I know I should be with everything that's occurring, and if I get into aversion, that's bad. I'm wrong. I didn't do it right." We're back to the same old, same old—taking it personally.

Aversion is unpleasant. "I did it wrong. I should be able to always be perfect." It's so slippery, isn't it? It's so slippery how these things come in.

One way I've noticed this kind of misunderstanding manifest in a dharmic context is when we start to hear that all feeling is included within dukkha. We taste for ourselves the pain that comes with attachment to pleasure. We start to see—perhaps for the first time—how the habit of mind goes chasing after one pleasant experience after another. There are times when we simply recognize: this is going nowhere.

But rather than just noticing that, the mind flips into aversion. And I wouldn't be surprised if everyone here has had this experience—we have it a million times. We start to see craving and go, "Wow." Then we start to see it ten billion times a day. Anyone have that experience? And then we think, "This is horrible. This is hopeless. This is endless. Oh my God, I have so much craving. I'm a horrible person."

That's where we go. Self-judgment is just aversion—denial of the first noble truth. Stuff's not supposed to happen.

Some people then almost start to shy away from connection with the beautiful, with the pleasant when it's happening. Almost deliberately noticing more the unpleasant in practice and thinking somehow that's a kind of wisdom. "Well, it's all going to end anyway, so there's no point even bothering with the pleasant, with the beautiful."

I've been through stages like that in practice. We used to call them dukkha stages. I thought it was a sign of cleverness, but it wasn't. It was a mark of ignorance.

For example, there's one stage in practice where you're really seeing a lot of endings. You see the beauty, the pleasant—you see it go. You see the unpleasant come—you see it go. There's just nowhere to stand. I remember walking into my room where I was practicing on a long self-retreat. I had a nice plant hanging up, and my mind goes, "It's just going to die." No appreciation whatsoever—just, "Oh, that's going to die." I remember a couple had just gotten together on staff at IMS. They were walking down the driveway holding hands. My mind said, "Give them six months." That's just how the mind kept operating, thinking it was a sign of cleverness. "I'm not getting attached because I know it's all going to change."

It's a phase. If you can skip it, may you.

So it comes back to steadiness—appreciating the beautiful, but the wise one does not strive after it. Recognizing the unpleasant, but the wise one doesn't have to run from it. Recognizing the neutral, not making anything of it. Steady, steady, steady. And we learn to recognize—this is where we really start to see the nature of our mind and heart, the nature of reality.

The Dalai Lama again: "Buddhism essentially consists of two things. The view, which means a definitive understanding of the interdependence of all things. And action, which can be loosely defined as nonviolence. But if one were to summarize the Buddha's teaching in one word, we would have to say that it is universal interdependence, of which nonviolence is a natural consequence."

We start to see things as they really are when we're not so caught in the unconscious habits of preference and fear and denial. Unfortunately, the only way to that is through the practice of really opening wholeheartedly into this moment as best we can.

And this moment and this moment—whatever, however subtle, however gross, it doesn't matter what's happening. That moment where we just meet experience, not to fix it, not to have a great insight, just to be here. That's a shift in that moment from the habit of aversion and clinging and delusion to that open-hearted, clear mindfulness.

The Buddha said, "When one dwells with a mind obsessed and oppressed by ill will, one does not understand as it really is the escape from arisen ill will. On that occasion one neither knows nor sees as it really is one's own good, or the good of others, or the good of both."

One's own good, or the good of others, or the good of both. That's another poignancy in our habitual response to the difficult—and I mean the really difficult, and even the little nudgy difficult. That sense of keeping separate: bad, wrong, get away, not seeing. Whether it's all the way to fear, hatred, revenge, or just the subtle "ah, no, let's pretend this isn't happening"—these are all forms of dosa, forms of ill will, that keep us from being able to recognize as it really is the interdependence of all things. We can't see even our own good, or the good of another, or the good of both.

That's why there's so much emphasis on direct knowledge, direct seeing, and then response out of a mind and heart freed, just in a moment. We can't always tell whether it's filled with ill will or wanting or not. But that's what we're learning here, in all these simple little moments. That's why, if we just fixed things every time we were uncomfortable—well, we try that. That's our basic way of going through life. And that's part of the structure of retreat: you sit, you walk, so that we have to look at this stuff. Not as a forcing, but to really understand.

So don't believe anything you read or anything I say. I'm just trying to encourage us all to keep looking, to keep seeing, so that we're not blinded. The truth reveals itself moment after moment after moment.

This noble truth, when it's understood—this noble truth of dukkha, of this unsatisfactoriness running through—recognizing it just in a moment, that moment has the potential to really release our heart and mind from this cycling confusion of suffering and hatred and isolation and alienation. It doesn't have the power to make everything okay in the world. It doesn't have the power to make everything okay in this mind and body. By okay, I mean pleasant, nothing going wrong. But it has the power to shift our whole understanding of what peace is, what freedom is, what suffering really is.

Let me say just a little bit about the third type of dukkha and another aspect of delusion, which is inattention. Again, this is why we emphasize the steadiness of awareness. Inattention—where we just don't notice things.

The third aspect of dukkha is sankhara dukkha, which you could describe in different ways. This is kind of subtle, so don't go wacko thinking about it, but one way to put it is the perpetual incompletion—things come together and go apart. Another way of describing it is the relentless nature of life. You have to get up, and you have to brush your teeth, and then you eat, and then you have to brush your teeth. You get up and you have to pee, and then you have to drink something, and then you have to pee. And then you have to drink something, and then you have to take a shower. It just keeps going like that. That's what life is like, every day. And there's a lot of inattention to that.

Now, when people hear this, there's often a misunderstanding: "Okay, so I should notice every moment? Oh, it's unpleasant, I have to pee, and you have to go." It's not that. But it's about stopping the habit of making things up and then wondering why we're not satisfied with life.

Have you ever gone on a vacation to a lovely spot, and some of the moments are beautiful, and some are nice, and some moments you don't feel good, and some moments you go out to dinner and you really weren't in the mood, and the conversation isn't great, and you didn't like the food—but you're in Italy, for God's sake! And so you feel like you've got to really appreciate it. You're in a beautiful spot. It doesn't matter if you're really unhappy that day. You just gloss it over. You don't know. You come back and say, "That was a great vacation. It was a great vacation."

So what you can do here is just explore eating. Eating's a great place to investigate, unless you have huge issues around it—then don't use that, use something else. Explore sleeping or whatever. But choose something that in our mind we think, "Oh, that's great, that's really where I find happiness."

So chew. Next time they serve a chocolate brownie or something, notice how long, when you're chewing on it, does it really taste good? Chew, chew. There are two chews, and then it's just mechanical movement. Do we keep paying attention then? No. We start thinking about the next bite, don't we? And we think about the next bite until this massive glob is gone, and then we go for the next bite. We say, "That brownie was great." And we wonder why we're not quite in alignment with reality.

Then you might think, "I don't want to look that closely." No, we may not. But believe me, that's really more freeing. Then you can eat as much brownie as you want without needing it to give you more than it can give you. It can give you what it can give you. And then you can put it down when you've had enough. That's sankhara dukkha. And the delusion part is that we just don't pay attention. There's this inattention.

This is what keeps us believing we can have pleasant, pleasant, pleasant—because we're just not really noticing the alternation, the ceaseless alternation. But it doesn't have to be a problem. It frees us. It really does.

When I first started my first three-month retreat, I remembered—I don't have a big thing about eating, but still, I was always on time for lunch, put it that way. There was one guy who would come strolling in twenty minutes after lunch started, and some things would be running out, and I thought, "God, he must be enlightened." I was so amazed. I never really knew who he was. I didn't talk to him ever after. But I just had this sense of, "Wow, how amazing. He must be enlightened."

Then, twenty years later, I just noticed that without even thinking about it, I would come into the meal whenever I came into the meal. And if it was late and the beans were gone—hey, no big deal, the beans were gone. It just really didn't matter. I could like it or not like it, it really didn't matter. It was pleasant or unpleasant, but I wasn't looking to it to give me more than it could give me. There's such freedom around that. We still appreciate, but you're not looking for it to provide something beyond what it can.

That's a simple little example of how the steadiness of attention frees us. It doesn't erode our enjoyment of life. It allows enjoyment to be more true, more natural, more connected.

So I have two minutes to mention again that opening to dukkha is not about passive resignation or non-action in response to our own particular circumstances or in response to the world. The seed, the beautiful jewel in the heart of understanding dukkha, is compassion.

The Dalai Lama says compassion develops through deep insight into what suffering is, and this comes from being with our own experience. Where else can we learn? And this naturally widens and strengthens with a sense of empathy that gradually spreads to all beings.

When we're able to just be present—just for a moment, don't make it your whole life—in that moment, without the need to correct samsara, that experience, just in that moment of the purity of heart-mind, allows for clear recognition and seeing. It allows us to recognize that if the appropriate response is perhaps there's nothing compassionately one can do, then we can bear witness. This is a deep expression of compassion. Just to be with yourself in your suffering. To bear witness to it, to be present with it. That's something many of you are talking about—rather than hating and blaming ourselves or trying to run away.

Yeah, this really... sadness is sad. This is painful. This is an expression of the sadness that we all at times experience. Can I just be with it, with kindness? That's an expression of compassion.

And when we can bear witness with ourselves, sometimes that's all we can do with another. But there's a difference between being able to be with someone as they're going through or expressing their suffering, and the need to fix it because we're uncomfortable. These are two different things.

And then, if there is appropriate action—when we're not caught in reactivity, the response can be one of enormous activity, courage, wisdom, strength. Compassion is not at all passive. The understanding of dukkha without needing to be in a reactive stance actually allows for whatever way our personality wants to express itself as an expression in the world.

I'll end by reading something written by James Lawson, who guided the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee in Nashville in 1959 and 1960. These were kids in college—African-American young men and women who organized and carried out the Freedom Rides through the South in the years after. Incredible actions of courage and bravery based deeply and profoundly on love, compassion, and nonviolence. As the Dalai Lama said, when we understand our interdependence, nonviolence as a way of action is the natural response.

James Lawson wrote:

"We affirm the philosophical or religious ideal of nonviolence as the foundation of our purpose, the manner of our action. Nonviolence, as it grows from Judaic Christian traditions, seeks a social order of justice permeated by love. Through nonviolence, courage displaces fear. Love transforms hate. Acceptance dissipates prejudice. Peace dominates war. Faith reconciles doubt. Mutual regard cancels enmity. Justice overthrows injustice. The redemptive community supersedes systems of gross social immorality. Love is the central motif of nonviolence. Such love goes to the extreme. It remains loving and forgiving even in the midst of hostility."

Knowing that this deep understanding and commitment to love, nonviolence, and interdependence—which needs to be renewed moment after moment after moment—led to incredible actions of courage and bravery, and in essence, to change injustice. Based not in anger, not in hatred, but out of this understanding, this love and compassion that comes from understanding.

And the way the Buddha teaches, it begins with simply being willing to have the intention to try to land in this moment. That's all. You don't have to do it. You don't have to be perfect. Just the intention, in this moment, to be nonviolent towards your own experience.

Brahmavihārā Day #12

Carol Wilson · 44 min

> In this final guided mettā session before transitioning to compassion (karuṇā), Carol Wilson invites practitioners to explore loving-kindness in whatever way feels most natural and connected for them. Rather than providing structured instructions, she creates space for a "free mettā period" where participants can discover their own authentic relationship with this brahmavihāra practice.
> Carol shares several approaches to extending mettā to all beings, including the directional radiation method (north, south, east, west, above, below) and a beautiful visualization taught by Venerable Anālayo. This technique involves imagining a warm, gentle energy like a lantern in the heart center, then simply lifting imaginary screens to allow the loving-kindness to flow outward in each direction—a practice of allowing rather than forcing. She also describes her own approach learned from Goenka, radiating mettā simultaneously in all directions like an expanding circle.
> The talk emphasizes flexibility and personal discovery in meditation practice. Carol acknowledges that while phrases can be helpful, sometimes they create too much mental activity, and practitioners should find what genuinely connects them to the quality of friendliness and warmth. She encourages returning to simplicity when the vastness of "all beings" causes the energy to dissipate, then opening up again. The session closes with a beautiful dedication of merit, extending loving-kindness to all fellow retreatants and support staff before radiating outward to all beings everywhere.

This afternoon is the last afternoon that we'll be guiding the metta. We move to compassion tomorrow, just so you know.

I thought today we would, of course, formally continue with all beings. But I had the feeling not to give any new or different specific instructions about that. Rather, since it's the last day we'll all be doing this together at this time, I wanted to let you find your own way. You can start with all beings if you like, but more than that, just let yourself play in the realm of metta in the way that calls you—the way that feels the most energized, connected, and easiest for you.

Even as gently as it may be, you may try to bring your experience along as we're saying in the instructions, even though we keep saying, "Find your own way." Just the fact that someone's up here saying "Now, radiating metta to all beings" is, in a sense, asking you to try that—which is great. That's why we say it. We want you to try it. But I thought today I would mention all beings and then give you the space where you don't have to even have a little sense of trying to match any instruction. Just use this as a free metta period. Hopefully you can do that at other times too.

All I'll say about all beings is that there are many ways of doing it, both formally and informally. One of the most accessible to many of us is the way Brian offered it, which is really just sending or radiating or allowing the metta to move in the different directions —north, south, east, west, above, below. I like that myself.

There are other ways, depending on how your mind works, where you just keep saying, "May all beings be happy. May all living beings, may all creatures..." and you go through a whole list. I'm going to spare you because it gets very wordy, but in a longer period, sometimes it's useful.

For many people—and I know it's come up—sometimes saying the phrases and the words is useful, but sometimes it's actually just too much action. I remember hearing about Venerable Anālayo, the German Theravāda monk, describing his way of doing metta. He said he disliked the word-heavy way of doing metta. He described something which I thought sounded lovely as a way to play with it: just beginning a metta period by imagining in your heart, in the center of your chest, a kind of warmth—a gentle, friendly, warm energy. This works for people who don't get all tight around trying to visualize. Just a warm energy, almost like a gentle, warm lantern in your chest.

Then just allowing it to come out, as if you want to send it, letting it go out in one direction. He had the image of a lantern or lamp, the old-fashioned kind that has screens you can put down. When you want to allow the loving-kindness to move out to the front of you, you just lift the screen, the little wall, up from that side, and it just goes out. This is different from you having to make it happen. You're just lifting up the wall and letting it go out. And then the same for each different direction.

Just playing. Playing with the sense of sending out this energy of friendliness and warmth.

For me, when I'm thinking of all beings, sometimes I just say, "May all beings be well, happy, and peaceful," and imagine it going in all directions simultaneously, just radiating out in a circle. I learned that from Goenka in my first retreats. Sometimes I do the specific directions, like north—I forgot to check before I came in here. I am really directionally challenged. Brian probably helped you, right? If you know, that's all that matters. I don't have to know. In front, behind, right, left.

Then I'll imagine to the north different beings that pop up in my mind, like polar bears, or humans I know who live to the north, or ones that I've read about. Ones that are happy, ones that are sad, things that are going on—don't get too far down that road—but animals, whatever. Overhead, of course, people going over in planes, or hot air balloons.

I actually love teaching this where I teach in Switzerland because it's about 4,000 feet up, and it's a place where hang gliders are just going off all the time. There are literally people drifting over your head most of the day. So it's a very literal "those above me, safe and protected"—literally, may they be safe and protected. It's kind of fun.

I'm just throwing out ideas because I don't want to guide the whole thing. I want to let you see and be with your own way of accessing loving-kindness.

So, go.

Finding for yourself—I'm sure you already know, but doing it consciously. What helps you relax into this moment? What helps you come out of contention with this moment?

If all beings is easy for you, as for some people it's the easiest, go ahead and start there. If it's difficult or too abstract, then of course starting where it is easiest—self, benefactor, neutral, whatever's easiest.

When you're ready, just start letting it go out to all beings, finding your own way in this, however it connects and is meaningful for you. If you find you're losing the thread or jumping around too much, then come back to simplicity. Always supportive. Just get clear to whom you're offering this well-wishing in this moment. Sometimes with all beings we kind of lose the energy—it's so vast. So get simple and then open up again, if that's helpful.

In the last few moments of this sitting, if you would like—you certainly don't have to—but I just invite anyone who'd like to, instead of all beings, to extend this warmth, this friendly, accepting kindness first to all of us here in this room. And just imagine it expanding out to include all of your fellow retreatants and all of the retreat support staff here—the managers, the cooks, the whole Spirit Rock, office workers, the caretakers, maintenance, housekeeping, teachers—just everybody. All of us together, coming together to make this particular time be what it is.

May we all be well, happy, and peaceful. May we all love and accept ourselves just as we are. May we all be safe from inner and outer harm. May we all be able to care for ourselves and one another happily in this world.

And may the merits of our wholesome intentions, our sincere practice together, be shared with all beings everywhere, in all phases of life.

May all beings be safe and protected. May all beings be happy. May all beings be healthy and well. May all beings know ease of well-being.

CHAPTER 144

Exploring The Second Noble Truth

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this dharma talk, Carol Wilson offers a detailed exploration of the Second Noble Truth—samudaya, the origin of suffering. She carefully examines taṇhā (craving/thirst) as the Buddha identified it: craving for sense pleasures, craving for being (bhava taṇhā), and craving for non-existence. Wilson emphasizes that taṇhā cannot be abandoned through willpower alone; only wisdom arising from steady mindfulness can naturally release its grip.
> Wilson distinguishes between taṇhā and chanda (ethically neutral desire or zeal), clarifying a common confusion in English where both are often translated as "desire." She explains that the problem isn't the object of craving but the quality of craving itself—that leaning, thirsting quality that narrows our perception and creates a sense of insufficiency. Using the Buddha's framework of gratification, danger, and escape, she illuminates how craving seduces us with promise of satisfaction while actually perpetuating the cycle of suffering (saṃsāra).
> The talk offers practical guidance for investigating craving in meditation: noticing its physical and mental qualities, watching how it arises around any experience to create a sense of self, and observing its dissolution. Wilson shares accessible examples—from wanting cookies to searching for desert tortoises—to illustrate how taṇhā distorts perception, causes us to miss what is present, and imagine what isn't. She encourages practitioners to explore these subtle movements with curiosity rather than judgment, recognizing that each moment of seeing craving arise and pass offers a glimpse into the peace of non-clinging.

So tonight I want to talk about the second noble truth, the truth of the cause of our suffering, Samudaya. You remember last time I spoke about the first noble truth, that of dukkha, the unreliability, the unsatisfactory nature. And so then when the Buddha decided, you know, the four things he wanted to tell us, the facts of life, that if we understand will free us from unnecessary suffering—out of everything, what he picked as the cause was, as I'm sure you know, this isn't like a surprise, but I'll read it to you.

This is the noble truth of the origin of suffering. It is this craving—craving is an English translation that's usually used for the Pali word tanha, and I'll go more into wording in a minute. It is this craving which produces renewal of being, which is bound up with delight and lust and seeks pleasure now here and now there.

I love this definition because it kind of gets to the seductive quality of it. Bound up with delight, seeks pleasure now here and now there. Namely, craving for sense pleasures, craving for being, craving for existence, craving for bhava tanha, which is like states of being, and craving for what is usually translated as non-existence, but which is often described as kind of not wanting a particular experience to be happening, which could move into aversion.

So I want to talk about this tonight, this second noble truth, this quality in our experience, in our minds, our hearts of tanha, and hopefully invite us to explore in our own experience to see if it's true for yourself that actually this experience is a cause of suffering. And then I will hope to point to some ways I see that, but to invite you to explore.

Now, as with the first noble truth, the Buddha says it is to be understood. The second one is to be abandoned. And when we talk about tanha, craving, a way you can look at it is, again, not just what we call the wanting of greed, but also that craving for non-existence, kind of the pushing away of what we don't like. So both of these aspects, with delusion underneath, of course. It never comes without delusion.

I can't answer this, but just to put out: why did the Buddha pick tanha rather than delusion as the cause of our suffering, as the thing to explore? I'm not claiming I can answer that, I'm just putting that out.

And it's to be abandoned. Now, the reason I really like exploring and talking about this craving, which leads to clinging, which leads to grasping so fast it's almost not synonymous but close—because in some ways it's rather obvious on the grosser level. I mean, craving for sense pleasures, when we're really caught in wanting, craving, desiring a sense pleasure, we can notice, right? And sometimes we don't notice, which is amazing. But it's not that subtle. And if you really look, intellectually you could kind of understand how that could be a cause of suffering.

But even that we can get really lost in. And I would say, in my experience, that's the most gross level of the way that tanha leading to clinging just seduces us into confusion and suffering. So I love exploring it in my practice, in my life, because it goes to such subtle aspects of our experience where it has the effect of leading us into confusion and suffering. I just want to point to some of those as we go along.

So it's to be abandoned. But even if intellectually we could agree, yeah, okay, I intellectually think that could be a good thing to get rid of craving—many people have come and said, okay, I'm ready now, I'm putting down craving, right? Or even just pick one thing you decided to stop craving. Did it work? You could maybe really force yourself not to go—even a sense pleasure—not to go get that thing. But just sitting down and saying, okay, I've thought about it, I heard it, it's to be abandoned, I take a vow and abandon craving—we can't do it as an act of will. So don't think if you haven't done it as an act of will, it's because you're weak.

It's because only wisdom works. Only wisdom sees and understands. Craving arises through ignorance, through not understanding, through not recognizing accurately. And it's only wisdom—this is what I keep going on about, seeing accurately. I didn't realize I say that so much until I hear Brian keep referring to what Carol says. So now I think, I guess I say that a lot. But it's okay. I mean it.

The steadiness of mindfulness leads to wisdom. When wisdom recognizes a situation accurately, craving doesn't make sense. It's not abandoned in a particular moment from an act of will, but it's the natural response of wisdom. Which is good news. But our job is to set up the conditions for wisdom to arise.

What I want to do tonight in this talk—because there are so many ways to talk about this second noble truth—one approach, which Sally will do tomorrow night, is the whole train of dependent origination, the twelve links. How in a moment you can experience the middle part of it, which is the most salient for our meditation experience. To see how from the point of contact, the feeling tone arises, and from the feeling tone—this pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—how the habit of mind can move. Just that moving of craving into pleasant and pulling away from unpleasant, and then into the whole train of becoming, birth, and death, just like that. That's a really interesting and very useful way to talk about it, and then to explore in our own experience. But since Sally's talking about that tomorrow, I don't have to.

So what I want to do tonight—it's just the way my mind works—is to offer an invitation and some pointers from my experience to turn our attention inward and explore, investigate: What is this mental, physical experience—really mostly mental with physical concomitants sometimes—that is called craving? How do we learn to recognize it as it comes, as it goes? How does it arise? How does it behave in the mindstream? What is its nature? And when we're in the grip of craving, how does it behave? And then how do we behave when we're not aware, or we can't shake loose of its grip? How does it pass away again?

There's no way wisdom is going to abandon craving if we can't even recognize when it's happening. And when we do recognize it, a tendency—again, often—is first we decide it's a good idea to abandon. Then we see that doesn't work. Then we say, okay, I'll pay attention. And then we start to see how frequently craving, wanting, desiring, clinging arises in our experience.

Has anyone noticed? Have you noticed that the more you're paying attention, the more frequently it seems to come? Because you're practicing wrongly? No—because we're seeing what we mostly don't see.

So my invitation here is not to think of craving as something horrible, not to approach it as, "I've got to go see all the craving, and it's going to be awful, because it's bad, and the more I see is more proof of how bad I am, and it's hopeless." We don't want to see it that way.

I remember, it popped in my mind tonight, years ago I was talking to a good friend who's a meditator. It was an interview, but we're also friends, and we were just talking. She was seeing a lot of craving, a lot of wanting, and I was just kind of—I get excited by that. I don't think, "Oh, that's horrible." I get excited, because that's what we have to see. Sati, mindfulness, has to see what's happening. That's how wisdom comes. See how it behaves.

So we were talking, and I was pointing things out, and I was all excited. And then she says—with all the love in her heart, she says to me, "Well, it's like you're saying to me so lovingly, 'Dear, you're just covered with green slime.'"

That's not what I mean at all when I invite us to explore this. Freedom comes from recognizing accurately. So seeing what's going on is the beginning.

There's a place in the suttas where the Buddha talks about three levels of wisdom, three kinds. All three of these play together and intertwine, but only the third level is truly transformative—yet we need them all.

The first level is called in Pali sutamaya paññā, which means wisdom from that which is heard. So it's basically acquired wisdom, and this is the beginning of right view, the Buddha says. When we talk about impermanence, or I'm talking about craving, or anything we hear—we come in, and that hearing is the first access to wisdom. We may or may not know anything about it from our own experience, but we hear it.

That can be the catalyst for us moving into the second level of wisdom, which is cintāmaya paññā. You could call it our own natural intelligence, where maybe we're pondering—say, what I'm talking about tonight, craving.

We might be pondering, remembering times in our experience where we could see how wanting this particular thing and not getting it caused a lot of suffering, and when the wanting went away—we're just thinking, "I could see how that makes sense." We're pondering and coming deeper in, and it motivates us to keep exploring, but it's not truly transformative.

This is the level that we're all at much of the time. And it's really important and useful, because so many of us have grown up with such a deeply conditioned habit of giving power to thought—to thought as the way to understand everything, to think our way through, to figure it out. You know what I mean? And then we keep on thinking, keep on thinking. So often we can feel like we're a little bit stuck there. We've thought it through. We see it. We really understand. You come and say, "I really understand impermanence. I do really understand." We could all give a discourse on impermanence. And then we turn around and get all upset when our good sitting changes.

Because we understand it on that intellectual level. It really makes sense. But it hasn't reached the third level, bhāvanā mayā paññā, which is insight wisdom—where we get it in ourselves, as I like to think of it. In terms of anything, we have what we'd call an insight. It doesn't change us forever necessarily. But you've all experienced this in different ways. You've had an insight into something. Oh. Oh, I see. This craving went away, and I really get it. It's peaceful, and I didn't get the thing I wanted, and I didn't need to. Here's the peace. It's right here.

The difference between hearing me say that—the first level—nodding to yourself, "Yeah, that makes sense"—the second level—and actually experiencing that below the level of thought... it's like, wow. An aha moment. A shift of perception, really, is what insight is. We recognize in a different way.

So these three levels are bouncing around, working together. It's only steady awareness that allows this third level, this shift of perception, to arise. And we keep on paying attention, and then we understand more what that shift of perception was bringing to us.

Now I want to talk about this word taṇhā. The literal, the closest translation I've heard of this word—and I'm not a Pali scholar—is actually "thirst." So when I talk about taṇhā, I'm referring to a quality, a mental factor really, a quality in the mind-heart that arises and passes like everything else.

This quality of thirst is, I find, really helpful to understand as a leaning into or leaning away—this need, this thirst for something. And when it strengthens, when we kind of grab hold of something, it intensifies from craving, from the leaning in, the thirst, to clinging, to grasping. It's the same thing, just a little more gripping.

Now, in English, the word "craving" is often used interchangeably with the word "desire." And this can get very confusing. This is only in English. I've been mulling about languages, because when Brian was talking in his talk a couple of times ago about views—and how we don't even know what our particular perceptual influences have been from our whole upbringing, influences that inform the perceptions we have that lead to views—I think the language we grow up speaking and thinking in is really an interesting part of how that happens.

For English, there are certain constructions and ways of talking about things. "Desire" is one word that is very confusing, where Pali has a very specific word—taṇhā—for this thirst, and a different word, chanda, for a different kind of thing. Both of those, in English, we call "desire." But being a native English speaker, I have no clue how these words fall and what the habits of mind and thinking are for the many other native languages represented here. I can never know what it's like to be a native Spanish speaker or Hindi speaker, or French or Swedish or Finnish or Persian, or various forms of Chinese. There are so many different languages represented here. And for each of them, there's a whole different way you think in that language. It's really interesting. No wonder our perceptions are all different, and that's going to inform the view and how we understand.

That's a little aside. But just to say, when I'm talking about words, of course I'm coming from English.

And it may or may not quite correlate with the language that's natural for you. There's no way I can do it other than in English, but I just want to acknowledge that.

So, we use the word "desire," which is too broad for this state of taṇhā. And then, many times, people get into confusion. They come and say, "Well, what's wrong with desire to take care of your family? How can you say that's the cause of suffering?" And then we get all kind of reactive, really confused. "What's wrong with desire? I'm hungry and I have a desire to go eat. That's just normal life. How can you say that's the source of suffering?"

So there's two things going on. One is the word taṇhā, thirst, which is this yearning, this needing that takes us out of being able to recognize accurately in the present moment. The second is that when we talk about taṇhā as the source of suffering, it's about the quality of that state itself in that moment in the mind—it's not about the object that the taṇhā is leaning into.

This is a pet peeve of mine. Other teachers may say something different—just honesty in advertising. Sometimes I hear people talk about wholesome desire and unwholesome desire, and I find that so incredibly confusing. Because what that's doing is focusing our attention onto the object. So you could say desire for nibbāna is a wholesome desire, and we're focusing the attention on the object, nibbāna. But taṇhā is a state of heart or mind arising in the moment that then focuses the attention onto whatever the object is in a way that's moving out of balanced, open, present in this moment.

You can feel it, that subtle pulling forward or pulling back if it's aversion. "Ah! Only if I got to nibbāna, everything would be okay." So nibbāna, which is certainly a wholesome object—whatever we know about it, it's a wholesome object—it could be an aspiration that's motivating us to land here in this moment, or it could be the source of incredible suffering because we're lost in taṇhā about it.

Have you ever experienced that? What's wrong with nibbāna? But you're ready to just tie yourself up in knots. "I came here for nibbāna, and I'm just sitting here feeling knee pain." That's taṇhā, expectation, frustration. It's suffering. Not too hard to spot, but we get lost in it.

So it's not about the object. It's about the quality in the mind of this thirst, this leaning in.

There's another word in the Pali language: chanda, which is also variously translated, but it is ethically neutral. It's translated as a kind of excitement, a desire to do, the energy to do something. And it is ethically neutral, meaning that whether it's wholesome or unwholesome depends on what other mind states come with it.

So for instance, the sense of, "I really have the energy, I need to go get a better job because I'm about to have a child and I want to really be able to take care of my family." Now, that's a complicated thing, so a lot of different emotions could come in at different times. But the sense of, "Yes, I want to care for my family" could be compassion and chanda, this desire to do. That's different from craving. It's different from the source of suffering. Do you get a sense of that?

But chanda can also—the actual word for the hindrance of sense desire, not all desire, but that's often translated "sense desire"—the word in Pali is actually kāmachanda. It's like excitement about the pleasures of the senses. And so in that way, it's not such a wholesome feeling because it's leading us into suffering. Not good-bad, but leading us into suffering.

So the word we translate as "desire" in English could often be used as chanda in Pali. It's also one of the four bases of success in terms of meditation qualities, sometimes translated as "zeal"—this energy that gives us real energy to practice. Chanda, willingness to do, a really wholesome thing.

So do you get a sense of what I'm meaning about when we want to explore taṇhā? Don't let yourself get all lost in what is the object. Because that's one of the ways that taṇhā, this craving, actually leads our mind into delusion, confusion that keeps us from recognizing what's happening accurately. This zoning into the object desired and not noticing what's going on here in the mind and heart.

What I'm really doing tonight is trying to bring us into an interest in exploring how this actually works.

I want to use as a framework something the Buddha talked about. Bhikkhu Bodhi, the translator, describes it as the three movements in the unfolding process of insight. This is something the Buddha discussed: noticing the gratification, the danger, and the escape in particular areas of experience. I'd like to use this as a framework for exploring craving.

The Buddha spoke about how, before he was enlightened, he was pondering: What is the gratification in the world? What is the danger in the world? And what is the escape? It occurred to him that whatever pleasure and joy there is in the world—this is the gratification.

And I love that. He's not saying, as I mentioned in my last talk, that everything is horrible, hate it all, and then you'll be happy. He's saying there is gratification, pleasure, and joy in the world. The danger is that it's impermanent, mixed up with unreliability and subject to change—this is the danger. And the escape is the abandoning of desire and lust for the world.

The Buddha said: If there were no gratification in the world, beings would not become enamored, would not become enthralled, really stuck to things in the world. But because there is gratification, we become enamored. If there were no danger in the world, beings would not become disillusioned; beings would not suffer. If there were no escape from this, then beings could not escape from this disillusionment. But there is.

I want to use those three as a light reference point.

In talking about desire or craving that leads to clinging, the Buddha talked about four areas of grasping. I'm not going to go through them all, but the first one is sense pleasures, which is, as I said, everywhere, very seductive, but in some ways the most obvious. Then there's grasping at views, which Brian talked about quite clearly. There's grasping at rites and rituals, misunderstanding them as a way of purifying people—for instance, at his time in India, there was a belief among the Brahmins that if you went to certain rivers and washed yourself, it would wash away all your previous bad actions and all your bad karma. Which would be great. But he's saying, yeah, not so much. And the fourth is grasping at sense of self. So you can see they get increasingly more subtle.

I'll start using sense pleasures as an example and talk a little bit about sense of self.

In terms of the gratification, I think it's important to be able to recognize the gratification—the joy, the delight in sense pleasures—because that's true. Sometimes people think, well, because craving leads to suffering and sense pleasures lead to craving, I should actually not even notice the pleasant or move towards the pleasant. There are certainly plenty of suttas where the Buddha talked about the dangers of sense pleasures in very graphic terms. I'm not going to go there tonight because I really want to talk more about how the craving itself distorts our perception and leads us into confusion.

But start by seeing that sense pleasures are pleasure. Great. Pleasant sights, smells, tastes, touches, and all of that. So that's not so hard to see.

The danger is the obvious one the Buddha talked about: that whatever the sense pleasure is, it's going to change, and you're left falling flat. But another way to understand the danger—and this is something we can experience over and over if we keep remembering to notice the craving—is the addictive quality of going to sense pleasures for gratification. Because we have access often to so many, when one falls flat, we don't notice that we move into the next one, right? And the next one.

And that's exactly samsara. This round of birth and death of self and suffering. Okay, that one didn't work out—what about this next? That good sitting went away, but now I can go walk. Have you ever seen that? You're sitting and it's difficult. Okay, forget that sitting. I'm going to walk. It's going to be so good. You go walking and it's just as difficult.

Okay, forget this walking. I'm gonna go sit. It's gonna be so nice. That's it. I'm gonna go eat. Then I'm gonna feel good. Well, no, but now I'll go have a nap. That'll do it.

And we don't quite notice the process. We're just going from one thing to the next to the next. There's a seductive quality to it—a seductive quality to the craving itself. The definition I read, you know: "accompanied by delight, seeking pleasure now here, now there." And so there's almost a way at times that the very wanting itself becomes associated in our minds with gratification.

If you really turn around and look at the experience of wanting, well, in my experience, it really isn't so pleasant. It isn't gratifying. But we don't turn around and look at it. We just keep leaning into the next thing. And so in our minds, the wanting becomes associated with getting the thing we want. It's like the only way an untaught worldling, as the Buddha says, knows to get away from the unpleasant. Remember, I used that sutta the other night: the only escape an untaught person knows from unpleasant experience is to lust after sense pleasure. This becomes what we think is the escape, but it's really the danger. This way we just keep getting pulled by the nose from one thing to the next to the next, and we don't even notice. And then when we do notice, we go, "Oh, but that's okay. I'm in charge of it all. And it's not that unpleasant."

This is my favorite little story that to me exemplifies samsara—when we don't really want to look at the suffering of it. And we can do this a lot. A good friend of mine, a dear friend, very wise person, has the habit of really liking particular cookies. Just in a very restrained way: two cookies after lunch, two cookies before bed, certain cookies, very restrained. So we were hanging out one day, and we were talking about craving, dependent origination, and such. I was saying, "But this is exactly it, you know? Craving. There's the craving, this discontent, this leaning in, having the cookie."

The person said, "No, there's no suffering in this."

I said, "What do you mean?"

He said, "No."

I said, "Well, wait—when you don't get the cookie, then what?"

He goes, "I always get the cookie."

And that's really what we think. A lot of times in our life, we just substitute something. I didn't get that cookie, but I get something else. And so we never stop and look at the process. We keep looking in the wrong direction. It keeps us looking to the gratification instead of turning around. We're always looking for the cookie instead of turning around. You say, "But as long as I can get a cookie, what's the problem?"

This is what keeps us bound to samsara: the unwillingness to turn around and look at this craving for sense pleasure. Sometimes people are almost like—I mean, I've had people say, no one here I don't think, but say almost like they don't want to look that carefully. Just feeling how that craving feels, that leaning into the cookie, because there's almost a fear: "But then I won't really enjoy the cookie anymore."

Have you had that sense? If I really look... You know, if I'm out in nature and it's so beautiful—the nature and the buds and the magnolia tree—and oh, I'm so wonderful and I feel so great. I don't want to look at the craving. I want to feel like I'm incredibly one with nature. It's so happy. And I don't want to just go: seeing, seeing, seeing, seeing. Pleasant, pleasant. So we don't want to look because we're actually—first of all, that's not how it goes—but we're attached to

It's really so poignant to me that we're conflating, mixing up this craving with the gratification. The thing that we're looking to for our happiness and ease is the very thing that keeps us spinning in wanting, in a sense of insufficiency and not being enough. Because what is wanting? It's looking to something else to fill us up. And as long as we're buying into that, we're always going to be experiencing in that moment a sense of being incomplete. The cookie's going to do it, but not for long. So then we have to crank up another one, crank up another one. Go out and look at that bud again. Well, the bud doesn't do it today, so maybe I can find a lizard and maybe the lizard will do it. I wish the frogs would start croaking again, but it's not as nice as last night.

Not being lost in the wanting doesn't mean there's no appreciation. We still appreciate the beauty of nature. We can still appreciate a meal, but we're not looking to that meal to do more than be what that meal can be, which is pretty limited, no matter how good it is.

This is Thich Nhat Hanh: "We need to distinguish between indulging in sense pleasures"—what he's calling indulging, I'm calling just being lost in the tanha, the craving, not seeing it—"and the joy and happiness that we experience when we are mindful and at peace. This attachment to sense pleasures, or just one sense pleasure, the cookie, brings about suffering and entanglement." Look to that. It brings about complication, entanglement, both in the present moment and the future, for ourselves and others. "But the joy and happiness of a peaceful mind brings neither suffering nor attachment in the present or in the future, for ourselves or for others."

So that's something you might explore if you're outside and you're thinking, "Well, this beautiful sunset—oh, but what if that's tanha? I can't tell if it's craving or not. Should I look at it?" How does tanha feel? "I don't know. How can I tell?" Okay, right then, that's doubt. Just notice that.

But when Sally talked about papañca, papañca in the mind, I like to talk about papañca of action. And craving will really lead you—this is where you see the complication. You're just appreciating the sunset. It's lovely. It's gone. No craving. Fine. If you find you're planning your whole day to get out there for the sunset the next day, there's a little bit of craving going on. Everything starts to get complicated because we somehow have to set it up to get that thing again. Not bad, just noticing the complication that comes in. So this is part of the danger, the danger of craving.

Another danger—and I'll stay with sense pleasures and then move into some of the others. The Buddha described greed, hatred, and delusion as makers of measurement in our mind, in our heart. In other words, when there's this craving in our mind, in our heart, not recognized, when we're being led by the nose by it, it puts limitations on the range and depth of the mind, of the heart. Basically, it narrows our experience. Have you ever noticed that? When you really are into wanting something, have you noticed how everything else becomes irrelevant? The breath, the feel, the limitless nature of mind and heart suddenly becomes all about the cookie, or whatever it is. And everything else is either in the way or irrelevant. That then affects how we actually perceive experience and how we respond to experience.

Sayadaw U Pandita was a quite profound meditation teacher, a Burmese teacher now in his nineties. Very tough teacher. He talked about—and I really like this—he said, under the influence of tanha, when it's happening in our mind and heart and we're not recognizing it, turning around and recognizing it, the way the delusion manifests is, one, we don't accurately recognize what is here, and two, we actually perceive what is not here. So we're doubly disconnected at times under the influence of tanha. And this can be rather subtle.

I'll just give a simple example, but you can explore it for yourself and see how it works. I've used this example quite a lot because it's simple yet accessible.

When I was teaching in Yucca Valley years ago, there was this lovely desert that you could walk out into, and every morning I loved to walk out into that desert. You just walk out and it's desert—some trees, yucca trees, various animals, not too many. Some birds, a little jackrabbit sometimes, once in a while a snake, and once in a great, great while, a large land tortoise.

So I was walking one day, just very present, the way you'll be here, simply with the isness of things. When there's not taññhā, when there's not wanting in the mind, it's just present. Kind of like big mind—whatever's occurring is occurring. There's no to-ing and fro-ing, no problem.

And suddenly the thought came in—which in itself wasn't a problem—"Maybe I'll see a tortoise today." The thought came and didn't go. This is how the whole sense of self and everything gets created. Some experience comes and taññhā leans into it, then grasping just grabs it and makes it a solid thing. So that thought became, "Maybe I'll see a tortoise," and the wanting came up, just like the wanting for the cookie. Not noticing the wanting, what had been just vast and present and simple and easy became really narrowed down, and I was just looking for that particular experience, looking for tortoise.

Walking through the desert—boom. Then I noticed I was going, "Not tortoise, not tortoise, not tortoise," looking, looking, looking. That was really my experience. And it actually wasn't a very pleasant walk anymore. It was just, "No, no, I want this. That isn't it, that isn't it, that isn't it." I never saw one.

Luckily, at some point I noticed it, which is good, because then I could use it for a dharma talk. But truly, I noticed it. And this is what I want to invite us to do: notice what's occurring then. Not jump onto, "Oh, I'm so bad, I shouldn't be wanting." Just notice what's occurring.

You can really feel for yourself—mentally, because craving is a mental thing—how it comes up in your body and in your mind, how you experience it. We want to learn to recognize it, to know it's present. This is great—this is mindfulness coming in. For me now, I'm so familiar with it. Sometimes you don't recognize it, but I can just feel it. It's a kind of physical contraction, almost like mentally leaning forward. Sometimes you're just pulled. So I could notice that.

Notice the limitation, the narrowing of attention and the narrowing of the mind and heart, focused just on wanting this thing. And notice the sense of rejection or disinterest in anything else. Just to see that.

And then when we notice wanting—not hating it, not judging ourselves—but just exploring it. If it's some little thing where you don't actually need to do much, here on retreat is a great time to do it. Just stick with the wanting, the taṅhā, the craving. Notice how it feels. Notice what kind of thoughts come up. Notice what behaviors arise.

If it's so strong you can't not act on it, as Sayadaw U Tejaniya says, okay, wanting's just doing its job, but you bring awareness along with it and let awareness do its job. So you notice how the wanting is working, how it's driving us. It's really fascinating.

And at some point—I promise, I don't know at what point—it's going to drop away, because everything that comes together from construction dissolves again. Absolutely everything. If you can hang with it and actually watch as it dissolves, and then keep on being present, you may notice the quality of ease, the quality of peace that we usually associate with getting what we want. But it's actually because the wanting itself has dissolved. We don't have to be driven by getting that thing.

When we really learn to understand this, wanting is simply another experience—mental, physical experience that comes a lot, and goes. As often as it comes, it goes. It's not like it's going to come one more time than it goes and never leave again. Every time it comes, it's going to go. And we can really get to explore it so it doesn't become something to be afraid of or hate, but we can really understand how it works—the seduction of it for us, the gratification, and the dangers of it for us.

And this is just with sense desire, which is the most obvious one, but you see how really quite subtle it can get. The way it causes you not to see what's around—like I'm in the desert looking for tortoise and just oblivious to everything else.

We do that. You want to get to the meal on time, and you're ready to walk over people—even your best friend. "Get out of here! There's only one more corn muffin." And then you sit down and think, "May all beings be happy, may all beings be happy."

So our job is just to notice these things, these subtle movements that come up in the mind with wanting and not getting what we want. But craving can also distort perception. In a simple way, say I'm looking for a tortoise and I see a rock in the distance. The mind goes, "Oh, tortoise!" And I go running over—oh, it's a rock. There's a Tibetan saying that craving puts feathers on the object, makes it look really much more attractive. I give all kinds of examples of that. But just noticing it—really interesting.

So we can't really see what's here. Both of these ways of not seeing accurately—this narrowing of the mind and heart, not recognizing what is here, seeing what isn't here—this is also the way the dangers manifest in craving's attachment to views. We're all going to have views; Brian talked about that, so I don't have to go into it. But the attachment to views, that "this alone is true"—the craving for it. And the sense of self, which in some ways is the most subtle and most pervasive view, comes and goes, comes and goes. Brian talked a lot about it. I only want to mention the way we can use exploring our internal experience of this thirst, this craving, this grasping, to explore how the sense of self arises and passes in a moment.

Ajahn Buddhadasa, whom we've mentioned quite a few times—a great Thai meditation and forest monk master—has a wonderful line. He said the sense of self is simply a condition that arises when there is grasping and clinging in the mind. Not some big solid thing we've got to chip away at and try to understand. For me, this is helpful because I'm kind of kinesthetic, practical. Not through ideas trying to understand and through that idea then let go of that idea—that's the way some people process and learn. We're all different in the way we take in information and learn. For me, it's very practical, moment-to-moment. And so Buddhadasa's way of describing it really works: the sense of self is simply a condition that arises when there's grasping and clinging in the mind. Or what's called sakkāya-diṭṭhi, identity view.

What we can simply notice, as we get more and more familiar with how craving, taṇhā, feels when it comes up in our mind-body—sometimes I couldn't say exactly what, but I can kind of tell it's hanging around. As you get more familiar with it, then you'll see the way it's described in terms of sense of self. Anything that arises in our experience, any of the six sense doors—a sight, a smell, a sound, a taste, body sensation, a thought or emotion, the five aggregates that Brian talked about, another way of talking about the same thing—you'll see how there are times you're sitting or walking and sounds are coming and going, or someone was describing today how thoughts were just coming and going like wisps, no problem.

But suddenly a thought comes and it's like, yes, everything in the mind and heart comes together, collects around that, and grabs a hold of it. This is how it is. Whether it's "my back hurts," or "I want a cookie," or "that sound is not acceptable"—whatever it is, something in the constantly changing experience, this movement of leaning in, taṇhā, grasping, has grabbed a hold of that experience and made it me or mine. The sense of me arises very strongly with that. Me and my back pain. Me and my cookie. Me and the sunset. You get a sense of what I'm saying?

And then it's often a thought. When we don't notice it, of course it leads to a whole series of thoughts. Usually we wake up in the midst of that series of thoughts, and it's become that particular me. The me—and I know Brian gave a lot of different examples, the different stories of me. The me who's very clumsy. The me who's an incredible yogi. The me who went through all those things in third grade. The me who really feels out of it today. All of those different ones.

But because we don't stop and explore, we don't stop and look at it—as Brian said in his talk, you know, the me in third grade is the same me that's sitting here, right? Doesn't it feel like that?

Because we don't really just stop and notice that sense of self arising. It's just another experience that comes and goes. It's the same as being able to explore taṇhā. The sense of self really is just a lot of thoughts that begin from a moment of taṇhā, a moment of craving connected with any particular thing. It can be anything, any stupid thing. The particular chair you want to sit in in the dining room—craving for that can be the source of a huge story of self.

Someone else is in your chair. Your chair. What are they doing there? I've been sitting there every meal this whole retreat, and now they're there. Don't think I'm making this up—no one on this retreat has told me this, but I've been on a lot of retreats at IMS. Believe me, this is not something I'm completely inventing.

And people will tell you, mostly after it's over and they've really seen it, because in the midst of it, we don't recognize this as craving and sense of self. We think that person is out to get me, sitting in my chair. The whole sense of offense, of being wronged.

But what we can do is start to feel that craving. So you walk into the dining room, you see that—it's a sight. The perception is just seeing. Then the whole story of me comes up around that. The suffering one, the craving. And then whatever goes on—you turn, you walk out—that whole thing falls away. That me, that's birth and death of sense of self around craving. Another sense of self will arise, no doubt, quickly. But that's okay. We can just, with our awareness, with our interest, explore how this happens.

And this is one of the really subtle ways that this movement of taṇhā, this movement of craving, is the cause of so much confusion and suffering. It's at the heart, the seed, of the moment-after-moment-after-moment creation of story of self. Unseen, it is the source of suffering.

I'm not saying, actually, that the stories creating sense of self need to be a problem. I'm not saying that. They're thoughts driven by craving, and when awareness recognizes that's what's happening and sees through it, we don't have to get rid of it. It's just another arising mental and emotional construction that comes and goes like every other mental construction. It doesn't need to be a problem. But we can really get interested in seeing how the craving comes up in relation to anything—a sense experience, a view, a memory—and then off to the races, as someone said. Or not.

And instead of judging it, just explore and see. Bring the steady awareness to see. Whatever arises, dissolves. The craving arises and dissolves. The sense of self arises and dissolves.

So the escape—I'm talking about gratification, danger, and escape—I want to talk about again in our moment-to-moment experience here, in a simple way that we can practice. So I'm not at the moment talking about the big escape forever, but just in a moment of seeing.

The escape is this ability, this steadiness of awareness. Awareness itself does not uproot clinging, does not uproot craving. But awareness—the steady awareness that allows us to see this whole chain of cause and effect, like I've just been describing with sense of self or with wanting a cookie or whatever—to see it all, to see the craving come and go, the steady awareness is what sets the conditions for the wisdom to come in.

So after seventy-five times of walking into the dining room and that whole sense of self around the person sitting in my seat, finally wisdom comes in and says, "Why don't I sit over there?" So easy. The craving was abandoned by wisdom. With an act of will you could say, "I'm just not going to do it. I'm going to sit over there. I'm sitting over here. I'm not craving." It's not the same. "Why don't I just sit over there?" And the craving is abandoned. That's from wisdom.

But what we can do is set up the conditions by really taking our refuge in the steady awareness, by getting interested in this process rather than judging or fearing it.

So I'm going to give a really, such an insignificant example that you're going to wonder why I'm picking it—but that's exactly why I'm picking this example, because this is what we can do so often on retreat to really see. Because it's the same, it works in the same way with the big things. So one day, I wasn't on retreat but I was teaching.

I got up in the morning and had a mystery novel sitting next to the bed. I get up in the morning, I'm getting dressed, whatever, and just this strong craving came up. "Oh, let me just pick that up and read a little bit." Which—so what? I mean, this is hardly a horrible thing to pick up and read.

So I was watching, just watching, except doing it. And I said, "No, I'm not going to do it. I'm just going to watch the craving." And as I say, this is so trivial because people would say, "So what if you pick it up and read? Who cares?" Nobody cares. There's nothing wrong. Again, it's not about focusing on the object. The interest is in looking at what's going on. It's easier to look at the craving when the object isn't very important to you. It's easier—so pick the little things. Start with the little things.

So I said, "Okay, I'm not going to pick it up. But I'm going to sit here and really be aware of the wanting and the thoughts that come up in my mind about it." So I sat there for a few minutes. I didn't just say, "Oh, forget it," and go brush my teeth. I sat there and just watched the whole process, noticing the wanting and the thoughts and what I should do—"Oh, it's okay"—all of that. No big deal.

And then the craving just went away. Completely went away. And I could just sit there and see it completely go away. And then don't just get up and run. Feel what I was saying—the absence of craving. How that limitation, that narrowing of the depth, the breadth of mind and heart, is gone and it's just... peace. Just like that. It's such a little thing. We can do this hundreds of times a day. And it gets really interesting.

In that little moment, that wasn't a big "Aha! Now I'm liberated, the mind is forever free from clinging." But it was a moment where the heart-mind was free from clinging. And that moment comes and goes, but in that moment we get the intimation—a little beginning glimpse into what was the Buddha talking about when he says, "What does one know?" I think Greg said this, that one enlightened knows that nothing whatsoever is worth clinging to, worth holding to. It's not a put-down of things. It's saying that this relationship of grasping onto something to make the whole complete for gratification is the source of our suffering.

By not seeing it, by continuing to give all the energy and focus to the object—ours to the object—that process continues to strengthen the sense of self and other, of separation. We don't see the emptiness of self-existence in any object.

This is just the last thing I want to point to—the way, an even more subtle way I think, that craving really distorts perception and keeps our suffering going. In a moment of craving, it keeps us zoning in, moving into whatever the object is, whether it's a cookie or a particular chair or a mood or a memory or a way I want to think about myself. As soon as there's that craving, it's like the mind—and this can be very subtle, we're not talking huge—this is very subtle, where the attention fixates on the object.

Now, you can be really focused, focus attention really on one object. That doesn't mean it's craving—don't get me wrong. We can be very relaxed, sinking into just the breath. The mind is not craving. Learn to recognize that contraction of craving. We can be really concentrated on one thing; that doesn't mean it's craving. But the craving is just a kind of zoning into the object: "Oh yeah, there's that, there's that."

So we can also be with the breath, be with the breath, be with the breath—and what's really getting strong in that, which we don't notice, is the sense of me wanting object. You see what I mean?

And so the sense of me gets strong, the sense of object gets strong. This is another thing with language—with English anyway. We say, "I see the bowl." Just the way the English language works, there's always me separate from the object. So that just tends to be the habit of our mind. And craving, even so subtle, perpetuates that.

That's really all I wanted to say about this. Don't go all crazy about it, but just notice how craving tends to isolate things out and keep us in that sense of separateness, of isolation.

The escape? Simply the willingness to be steady with the awareness. Not trying to make the experience be what we think, but just that willingness to be steady with awareness.

I'll end with a couple of quotations. This is from Ajahn Chah:

Worldly accomplishments on whatever level still leave you in this realm of suffering. Whatever happiness there may be comes about in dependence on external things. It's not the happiness of freedom, the happiness that does not depend on anything external. What is it we depend on?

And by depending, he means craving.

We depend on possessions, on pleasure, on reputation, on praise, on wealth. We lean on all these things like leaning on a rotting old tree trunk. After we lean on it for too long, it breaks and falls and we fall with it. Such is worldly happiness.

This is from Adyashanti:

Those who are free don't want anything. They don't want anything from their mind. They don't want anything from their emotions. They don't want anything from anyone. And they don't want anything from life. They don't want anything. If you don't want, what's left is an incredible sense of being free.

So let's just sit for a moment.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 145

Brahmavihāra Day 19: Muditā (Appreciative Joy)

Carol Wilson · 46 min

In this nineteenth day of brahmavihāra practice, Carol Wilson offers guidance on muditā—appreciative joy or sympathetic joy in the happiness and success of others. She begins by addressing a non-traditional but valuable approach from Ajahn Sumedho: cultivating appreciative joy through recognizing beauty in nature and our surroundings as a gateway to understanding the non-personal, non-clinging quality of true muditā.

Wilson introduces gratitude practice as a foundation for muditā, suggesting practitioners consciously acknowledge simple blessings—health, food, access to the Dhamma, safety, clean water, friendship. She notes how Ajahn Sumedho teaches that gratitude and contentment are supportive states for awakening, opening and softening the mind. This gratitude practice helps recalibrate our habitual perception away from noticing only what's wrong.

The guided meditation progresses through the traditional sequence: beginning with an easy person whose happiness we can appreciate without triggering envy, then moving to the benefactor, a friend, and finally the neutral person. Wilson emphasizes that we need not focus on grand achievements—appreciating someone's simple joy in gardening or walking their dog is sufficient. When difficult mind states like envy or comparison arise, she recommends bringing kind attention to these feelings before gently returning to muditā. The practice reveals how appreciative joy, as one of the four boundless states, can be accessed throughout daily life, transforming even difficult days through small moments of genuine appreciation.

Today we continue with Muditā, Appreciative Joy.

I know Greg yesterday introduced it well, beginning with the so-called easy person—someone whose happiness or success you can easily connect with without it tweaking your deepest inner jealousy. That's meant to be the easiest person.

Since we only have four days for this and for equanimity, I've got to move things along. And as Greg probably said, and I'll say again, technically in the way it's taught, we don't include ourselves in the formal muditā practice. Since it's happiness in the happiness of others, that's why, I think. Or maybe they just assumed that we would naturally be happy with our own happiness without it being a grasping thing. But all of us in teaching this have found that's not always so true for us in these cultures. Sometimes, sure, we're happy for the things we have, but with a lot of grasping and fear that it's going to go away. Or sometimes—I don't know how it is for you—but sometimes I know I overlook little things that I could really appreciate or be grateful for.

Ajahn Sumedho, in different writings of his, has a way of talking about just beginning to tune the heart, the mind, into this sense of appreciative joy in a way that is completely not traditional in terms of how it's taught. He talks about thinking of muditā as appreciating the loveliness and beauty in our own experience, in things around us. So he includes appreciating nature, appreciating the beauty of nature. And I've actually found, since we're in a place where it's quite lovely at different times, that this is a really nice way into this sense of non-personal, non-clinging, non-jealous appreciation.

For me, I don't get too envious of nature. It's beautiful. I don't think I wish I could be as cute as the deer. You just kind of appreciate it. I'm not thinking, "I wish people looked at me like they look at that flower." If that's happening, you pretty much know, okay, there's definitely a kilesa distorting the perception at this moment. It's not too hard to find.

So I'm just dropping that in. I'm not going to guide us in that, but I want to mention it. When you're walking around here, especially after my talk on craving, and you have a sense of "this is beautiful," and then you start thinking, "Oh, but if I really like it, is it craving?"—all of that—if we start to feel what this non-clinging appreciative joy is, both in the formal practice and in walking around, it's something we can really tap into all over the place.

I've found this to be one of the beautiful qualities, one of the boundless states when our mind is really open. It's a wonderful thing to tap into in just little ways going through the day, going through a difficult day, or walking through a city. It could just be a beautiful church that you walk by. Take a moment to appreciate the architecture. You don't have to go into some big story. Or small things that happen in our own lives that we can consciously be grateful for.

I mentioned the part about nature so you can get a sense of the non-personal quality to that appreciation, that appreciative joy. And now what I'm going to suggest is this: let's start by taking some moments to tune into your own self and life and consciously go through a few things you could be grateful for.

Gratitude, as I think I mentioned—and again this is from Ajahn Sumedho—gratitude and contentment are very supportive states of mind for awakening. And that's really sweet, because we're open, we're present, we're receptive. And you can't force it.

I do quite a bit of gratitude practice, especially when I'm in grumpy mind at the end of the day. I don't know if that ever happens to any of you here. You hit the bed and you're like, "Thank God that day is over and tomorrow will be new. I have not had one useful, mindful moment this day." Should you ever have a thought like that—maybe it's only me—whether you're in bed or you just take a moment, I've really done this a lot: just tune in. What is there I could be grateful for? And grumpy mind finds this very phony at first.

It's like this with muditā as well. It can just be little things. When we're choosing someone to tune into their happiness, it doesn't have to be that they just won the Nobel Prize. It could be that they love to garden and they're able to work in the garden. Something as simple as that, that you can appreciate their happiness, their joy.

So let's just take a few moments. Just let yourself come back into presence.

Let my words fall in gently, but be more with yourself than with my words.

Take a breath and, the usual—relax into presence, mind and body. Before we begin with the easy person, just tune into yourself. Very simply, don't try to make yourself feel "I should be grateful." It's not that.

I'll narrate what my mind does with this practice. In the beginning, as I said, it feels a little forced. And soon it starts to come in. It just starts with something: I'm grateful I had enough to eat today. I'm grateful that I'm healthy enough to be here practicing. I'm grateful that in this lifetime I met the Dharma and I was interested enough to hear it. I'm grateful that I have some friends. I'm grateful at this moment I'm not living in a combat zone under threat of imminent violence and attack. I'm grateful I have clean water to drink whenever I want it. I'm grateful for the beauty of the world, that I can be here on this sunny day.

Just see whatever comes up in your own particular stories—not to hold on to, but just to open to the small and the large joys, happiness, success that come. It's a kind of recalibrating the habit of perception so we don't just notice what's wrong. Take some time with that if it seems connecting for you.

When you're ready, or if gratitude doesn't connect, bring up where you started with mudita yesterday—a friend that you can easily see and appreciate something successful or happiness-producing for them, and tune into that. May your happiness and good fortune continue. May your happiness never end. I'm happy for your happiness, for your success.

So for some minutes now, be with yourself and then with this easy-to-see happy friend.

When you feel ready, you might include the benefactor—the same one you've been using is fine. We're not trying to force any feeling at all. Just get a sense of the being you've been using and tune in to some aspect that's fortunate for them, successful or happiness-producing. As I said, it doesn't have to be a big thing. That's our avenue into connecting. Just as with karuna the suffering is the avenue into connecting, but in that moment of connection, the awareness spreads out and includes the whole sense of the person.

So explore this benefactor. If you'd like to stay with the easy friend or yourself, of course that's fine. Use the same phrases as an expression, a carrier for the connecting, the appreciating of their happiness: I'm happy in your happiness. I rejoice in your success. May your happiness and good fortune continue.

As with all our meditation, other states of mind and heart will arise. Greg talked about the near and far enemies, so particularly envy, longing, comparison can come. Of course they will. When they come, notice it without judgment. See if you can reconnect with the sense of the benefactor, some happy aspect, successful aspect. If the envy is too strong, then take a vipassana moment and bring kind attention to it—envy is like this. Then as it lessens a bit, return gently to the mudita.

If you'd like, bring in a different friend—not the easy first one. Perhaps the one you've been using for karuna, for metta, or another friend who comes to mind. Just to begin to get some flexibility. Again, tune into some successful, happy aspect of their life at this time. And if you get lost, go back to where it's more connected for you.

Be with this friend for a few minutes: I rejoice in your happiness, in your success and good fortune. May your good fortune continue. I am happy with you and your good fortune.

Now, if you'd like, explore connecting with the neutral person you've been using. Because we don't know so much about this person, we don't know what happiness or success they're enjoying. So perhaps just imagine them being happy.

Or some small thing you've seen about them. Maybe you've seen them walking their dog, and you can be happy for them that they have a dog.

This is where the Buddha said that just as we all share times of suffering, we all share times of happiness and joy in our lives. Not in equal measure, of course. But just some small happiness. See if you can experiment, explore, connecting with the sense of the neutral person for you in this way.

And as always, giving it patience and time. If energy just drops away, if you get lost in thought, put it down. Return to connect with the friend where it's easy to see their happiness, or the benefactor, and reestablish a sense of appreciative joy. Take your time. And if you want to explore neutral again, do so. But there's no urgency. Just simply a way to explore for ourselves this beautiful quality, this natural quality of our heart and mind when we're not lost in confusion and fear.

May your happiness and good fortune continue.

May all beings know happiness and the causes of happiness.

May our practice be a cause for the happiness of beings.

CHAPTER 146

Brahmavihāra Day 22: Cultivating Equanimity (Upekkhā)

Carol Wilson · 49 min

> In this guided meditation session, Carol Wilson introduces the practice of cultivating upekkhā (equanimity) as the fourth brahmavihāra. She explains that equanimity corresponds to the Pāli mental factor tatramajjhattatā—literally meaning 'standing in the middle of all things'—a quality present in any wholesome state of mind. Unlike the previous three brahmavihārās where we actively wish something for beings, equanimity practice involves cultivating a connected, non-reactive presence while recognizing that beings' happiness and suffering arise from their own actions (kamma), not from our wishes for them.
> Wilson carefully distinguishes genuine equanimity from its near enemy, indifference. True equanimity is rooted in wisdom and maintains full connection and caring, while indifference involves subtle disconnection—a distinction she illustrates through honest reflections on her own practice. She references the eight worldly winds (gain/loss, pleasure/pain, praise/blame, fame/disrepute) as conditions that equanimity allows us to meet without reactivity, and shares the Buddha's teaching to his son Rāhula that upekkhā practice abandons the habit of aversion.
> The session includes practical guidance on working with traditional and contemporary phrases, beginning with the neutral person before moving to oneself. Wilson emphasizes that this practice develops an 'unshakable balance of mind' that serves as the culminating quality bringing vastness and unconditional openness to all four brahmavihārās, allowing practitioners to remain present with joy and sorrow alike without drowning in reactivity.

We'll use this period to cultivate the quality of equanimity in our own hearts and minds. I want to talk a little bit about equanimity and how it works as this kind of practice.

First, by equanimity, what we mean is a specific mental factor in Buddhism—a quality of mind, just as compassion is a specific mental factor and muditā is a specific mental factor. Mettā comes under non-hatred, under a broader realm, but equanimity is a specific mental factor. The word in Pali—one I really like—is tatramajjhattatā, which basically means keeping in the middle of all things. I have this image of the human standing in the middle of heaven and earth, all things in equipoise. This mental factor, which goes into upekkhā equanimity, is considered present in any wholesome state of heart and mind. There are quite a few mental factors that are always present in such states, and equanimity, tatramajjhattatā, is one of them—this perfect balance of mind. It's associated with pure consciousness. It affects the balance of the mind that's really present but not pulled into reactivity by whatever circumstances are arising.

In terms of cultivating this as a brahmavihāra, what we're doing is calling up that quality, inclining our mind in that direction, and then strengthening it with the same focus we've been doing with the other three. As we keep bringing attention to that inclining, to that quality, it gets stronger and stronger until it can begin to, as they say, radiate in all directions. It becomes boundless in that way. As it strengthens into brahmavihāra, it becomes what is called an unshakable balance of mind.

So equanimity, tatramajjhattatā, being something that arises whenever there's a pure heart-mind, is something we all experience. But this strengthening into the unshakable quality—where it comes to the forefront and we really experience it—is something we focus on in the equanimity brahmavihāra. Of course, in vipassanā practice or other one-pointed practices, it would also be arising and strengthening. You'll hear tonight when Bonnie talks about the seven factors of awakening—equanimity is one of those as well. So it shows up in different ways in how we talk about our experience.

Here, as brahmavihāra, it's a little bit different in the way my mind conceptualized doing it from the other three. We go through the same beings in slightly different order, but it's not so much that I'm wishing you equanimity. When I was first doing it and trying that approach, it didn't make any sense. What we're doing is cultivating that quality of really loving connection that is standing in the middle of all things, that's non-reactive—towards ourselves, towards any being. To be honest, it sometimes is a little bit challenging.

Let me read something from Nyanaponika Thera. He says equanimity is the perfect, unshakable balance of mind. It's rooted in insight, rooted in wisdom. It's not disconnected, heartless, "who cares?" That's not equanimity—that's the so-called near enemy: indifference. When you really feel equanimity and then go into indifference, you can tell the difference, just like with all the near enemies and the beautiful states. It's really obviously different. But until we recognize it, it's so easy to slide into indifference and still be thinking it's equanimity.

I've noticed this actually in my life, even more than as a brahmavihāra practice. There will be a period, however long, where equanimity is rooted in wisdom. The heart is open. The mind is connected to oneself, to whatever's occurring, or if it's about a being, to that being. There's definitely that sense of connection and a tendency to feel what's happening—it's not like, "Oh yeah, that's kind of tough that happened. Well, we're all the owners of our karma." That's the phrase, and it's easy to slip into that. But there's this radiant calm, really connected. The subtle disconnect can come in at first without noticing.

I've had periods in life where I'm feeling really connected, and all the joys and sorrows of my life and the people I'm connected with come, and you feel it but don't really get thrown off balance—really equanimity. As time goes, it changes. That's always going to happen. And maybe the wisdom factor goes down, the energy goes down. I start to think, "Yeah, well, the mind's equanimous. It's all cool."

I'm just flowing with it. And that little extra awareness, the living awareness that always accompanies wisdom, starts to fade. It's like you're coasting—coasting on the wisdom of the day before. Can you relate to that at all? Yesterday, it was all happening without any effort. So that's how it is now. But it isn't like that now.

As it starts to slide into indifference, I often wouldn't notice it. Then suddenly I'd realize—not so suddenly. Maybe after an hour. After three months, really. I'm not exaggerating. Sometimes everything is mellow and I think, "Oh wait, it's really disconnected." It's moved into a state where I'm not really touched by things anymore. That's not equanimity. That's indifference.

So it's subtle. We explore this in the Brahmavihara practice and in our broader practice, because equanimity is really the culmination of wisdom. It's rooted in wisdom. The far enemy of equanimity is reactivity. And one of the effects of this practice—what can sometimes make Brahmavihara practice challenging—is that the far enemy often gets highlighted. You may have noticed that in the other practices as well.

Sometimes I'll offer certain phrases and you'll see how reactivity could get triggered. And sometimes it does. "What do you mean, you're the heir to your actions and my wishes can't make you happy? What do you mean by that? What's the point?" And the mind goes off into reactivity.

This is where it becomes really important to recognize: this is the practice of cultivating equanimity in relationship to ourselves or another being in a particular circumstance. But it's really about seeing that quality in our own mind and heart—not so much "I wish it for you," but rather seeing how I am with you in this experience, recognizing that I can't control your happiness and suffering.

I have found that coming to touch this in intensive practice, at times it's fantastic, it's so beautiful. And at other times, it really brought up in me a kind of reactivity, or almost a fear, which is a kind of reactivity. It seems so bald, perhaps. So this is how it is. The classic phrase is: "I, you, all beings are the heirs, the owners of your actions, of your karma. Your happiness and unhappiness arises from your actions, not from my wishes for you." It's a long, drawn-out phrase, although I came to really appreciate it. I'll offer you a few others, and on the notice board there's a list of different equanimity phrases, so you might find one that connects for you.

Nyanaponika describes equanimity as the perfect, unshakable balance of mind rooted in insight—but it is not dull, heartless, or cold. The perfection is not due to emotional emptiness, emotional disconnect, or not caring, but to the fullness of understanding, to its being complete in itself.

In a way, as James alluded to this morning, when we talk about the four Brahmaviharas, one way of thinking about it is that equanimity is the factor that brings the vastness and the unconditional all-beings nature to the other three Brahmaviharas.

With metta, for instance, people often say, "How can we wish 'may all beings be happy'? That's impossible." You've all thought that as soon as you start thinking about it. Equanimity doesn't make it possible that all beings can be happy. Rather, it's seeing the vastness. We can't understand the vastness, but at some point, any being has happiness. At another point, any being has sorrow. At another point, we wish well for all beings. Equanimity brings in this vastness, knowing we can't control it. It's not going to ever all be the same for everyone. But there's this vastness of seeing.

From the Buddha's point of view, he's seeing aeons and world cycles coming and going in incredible vastness. We don't have to go there. I suppose if one could really see on that level, it gives a kind of vastness to our momentary sufferings and happinesses. But it's not that. It's just knowing that we're all going to experience all of it at different times—not the same for all of us and not in equal measure, God knows. But that equanimity brings the vastness.

The knowing rooted in wisdom allows us, at times when there's so much suffering that we're opening to, not to drown in sorrow or reactivity. Equanimity gives us that vastness of "this is how it is now," which allows the heart and mind to be present.

With appreciative joy, again, it's equanimity that allows us not to just get totally lost in "woo-hoo, isn't this fantastic?" and then plummet the other way. Instead we can hold the awareness that this person's happy, but that person's not—just that vastness. I'm saying many different things here. I don't want you to think about it too much. I'm just trying to paint a different picture of equanimity, of its vastness.

The wisdom that's often described, or the experience that's often talked about with equanimity, is in very simple terms the recognition that we all go through, at different times, what the suttas describe as the eight worldly winds. Probably many of you have heard of this. The eight opposing conditions: gain and loss, pleasure and pain, happiness and suffering, praise and blame, fame and disrepute—being really well thought of, or being completely dismissed with everyone saying "oh yes, they're so bad."

You can see how these can flip back and forth for any one of us, and sometimes really quickly. And again, it's back to the first noble truth. When we're having praise and it flips to blame, it's so shocking. How could that happen? But it happens all the time. We don't even have to go to Twitter and online platforms to see this. I feel so sorry now for famous people, because as soon as they're famous, it's almost like they're set up to be shot down. Who can find something bad to say? And then it's all over the internet.

But it's useful—fun may not be the right word—but when you tune into watching this in your own life without taking it so personally, it really starts to bring in the equanimity. In terms of being in this seat, with our job being to teach and share things, there are times... I remember years ago doing an interview group in another country, and for some reason the people in the group were feeling quite free to share their opinions. One started, "I really didn't like your talk. I really didn't like the humor." They went on and on, and I'm going, "Okay." And then the next person said, "I really loved the humor"—the very thing the other person was hating. You can't land on any of it. This is equanimity. You don't land, you don't make praise and blame, pleasure and pain into something solid. It can flip just like that.

So equanimity is the vastness of wisdom, the vastness of heart that can recognize it all and can be with the joy and be with the sadness and be with the flatness and be with the beauty without falling into reactivity. That's just what we're cultivating.

There's one more piece. There's a sutta where the Buddha is giving advice to his son Rahula, who became a monk at a young age. He's giving him advice about these four brahmaviharas. He said to Rahula: the practice of mettā abandons the habit of ill will in the mind; that of karunā, compassion, abandons the habit of cruelty; that of muditā, appreciative joy, abandons the habit of discontent; and upekkhā, equanimity, abandons the habit of aversion. I don't actually think it's that limited, but it's interesting to see these subtle differences.

So that's all I want to say in introducing it. The way we practice equanimity as a brahmavihara follows the same form. We start with the neutral person, then we go to ourselves, and then we go through the same groupings—self, benefactor, friend, difficult person, and all beings.

When I first was doing it, I'd been practicing intensive mettā and then the other three brahmaviharas, and then equanimity. So I was trying to radiate to that person "all beings are the heirs of their actions"—trying to radiate that wisdom out to them. It didn't fit, because that's not what it's about. It's really connecting to the person, to the sense of the person, just like we've been doing. And then, rather than thinking about it conceptually, it may be easier to hold the whole person with the awareness: "Your happiness and your unhappiness arise from your actions, not from my wishes for you."

It depends on my wishes for you. And so when I was doing it, at first that was a really long phrase. I'll say it again: All beings are the owners or the heirs of their own actions or karma—karma just means action, intentional action. Your happiness or unhappiness springs from your actions, not from my wishes for you. That's the classical phrase.

So that's one that often triggers reactivity. We offer other phrases because if you go right into reactivity, it isn't helpful. Of course, reactivity may come up later, and we play with that, we explore that. But anyway, when I first started with that phrase, I found it long. But then—and this may not connect for you at all—I came to love it because I found that one phrase included all four Brahma Viharas in it.

So when I'd start with "you"—that's the neutral portion—"you're the owner of your actions," that was the connectedness of metta, just connect. Yes, you're the owner of your actions. But I'm not saying it as a punishment; I'm actually feeling in my own heart, you're the owner of your actions, your happiness—and then I would feel mudita. Or your unhappiness—I would feel compassion. It comes from your actions, not from my wishes. "Not from my wishes" is like the letting go that somehow I can control or fix, but it's not the letting go of disconnect. Do you get a sense of what I mean? Just play with it. I know I'm saying a lot. Don't overthink it.

So it may be that you connect and feel a sense of the whole person. That's fine. Another way could be, whether it's neutral—where you may not know so much specific—or when we come to ourself and then benefactor, if we get that far today, you connect to yourself, connect to that person, and there may be a specific aspect going on in their life that pops into your mind. It may be a suffering aspect, a happy aspect, or something you wish they would kind of clean up their act. You know, whatever it is—you've been through all of that with a person in all the other ways. So let that come up, and then we're holding the sense of really connecting to them, including this aspect. But the equanimity is like really knowing: your happiness and unhappiness, I can't control by my wishes; it arises from your own actions. Still, I'm here with you.

I wrote down a couple other phrases. "I care for you, but cannot control or keep you from suffering." But equanimity also includes happiness—it's not just about suffering. "I wish you happiness, but cannot make your choices for you." These are more modern ones. Some people find this works: "Things are as they are right now." Just this simplicity of being fully present with the sense of the person, whatever's going on, staying really connected. Things are as they are right now. "However I might wish otherwise, I cannot control your suffering. I cannot change this for you."

This is not about what we do or don't do. This is cultivating this quality of radiant, connected presence that isn't pushing and pulling, but that's really there in connection with someone. "I care for you, but I cannot control your happiness or unhappiness." "May I accept things as they are right now." "May I be—or may we be—undisturbed by the comings and goings of life." "I care for you, but cannot keep you from suffering." "I care for you, but cannot make you be happy." You get the idea. Those are the main ones, and there are some others out there. Find what works for you.

So it may be that you have a sense of the whole person or your whole self. Or when you come to self, maybe it's a particular thing going on. And notice, it doesn't have to be a suffering thing—it could be a happy thing that we're getting all attached to. And that's also reactivity.

So, you know, just okay—may I be with things as they are. I care for myself, but... And it's a little trickier when it's with ourselves. It's more like, may I accept things as they are. Even for ourselves, our happiness and unhappiness arises from our actions, not from our wishes—which is what we've hopefully been seeing really clearly here.

Now, that's going to make you confused. When we're saying with metta, "may I be happy," it feels like a wish, right? But it's an action of mind. It's actually inclining the intention of mind away from "this is hopeless" to "may I be happy." That's an action of mind. A wish would be sitting down and saying, "I wish I would just quit liking chocolate. I just wish I would." And then we go and eat as much chocolate as we want. "Oh, I wish I would quit liking chocolate." We don't do anything about it. That would be about my wishes. It's not about my wishes—it's about my actions. But anyway, don't overthink it.

All right, so let's just start simply. We start with the neutral person, and then we'll come to ourselves. Just have patience with it, because it's not such an immediate big emotional feeling. We're looking for this radiant calm. Find the way that you have been just landing here in this moment.

Of course, starting with simply however the body feels, however the heart and mind feels. It's like this right now. It's just like this. That cool connectedness of non-reactivity is what takes us into the deepest peace of awakening. It's what allows for that. So just simply connecting.

We do start by bringing to mind whoever you've been using as the so-called neutral person. Whatever helps you connect—just connecting with them as a whole being in metta, or focusing on some aspect of their happiness, or their suffering, and the other two. See what comes up for you now in terms of bringing into heart, to mind, this person, this so-called neutral.

What we're cultivating is this even-mindedness—really connected and even, able to be with all aspects. I care for you, but I cannot control your happiness and unhappiness. You are the owner of your actions, the owner of your kamma. Your happiness and unhappiness springs from your actions, not from my wishes for you. May I be with things as they are.

So now, just taking some time exploring what it's like to do this for a little bit. Remembering, though, the first step is that connecting. It's not a disconnected "ah, whatever." Really connecting. You're the owner of your actions. May I be really present with you, knowing your happiness and unhappiness does not depend on my wishes for you.

If you feel like exploring, move to yourself. Maybe go back and forth if you get too involved, but just see how it is. With ourselves, it may be something particular—maybe there's a particular incident going on in our mind or in our life. Don't go looking, but something that pops up, or maybe just the way you're feeling right now, whatever.

Connecting with yourself, whether it's the classic phrase—"I am heir to my actions, my happiness and unhappiness springs from my actions, not from my wishes"—or "May I meet this with balance, may I be with things as they are," or just simply, "Things are as they are."

Exploring meeting this sense of ourselves with this connected balance of mind. Just playing with it, exploring. If you get lost, if it doesn't feel energized enough, if you're just lost in thought, take a moment to stop, reconnect. You could go to the neutral person again if you get lost in stories about yourself. Come back, just exploring this possibility of being really present with this steady, accepting wisdom quality of heart, of mind.

May I accept things just as they are right now.

May all beings know peace and the causes of peace.

CHAPTER 147

Expressions of Freedom: The 3rd Noble Truth

Carol Wilson · 57 min

In this profound exploration of the Third Noble Truth, Carol Wilson reframes our understanding of Nibbāna from a distant goal to an immediately accessible experience. Drawing from the Buddha's own words in the Aṅguttara Nikāya and teachings from masters including Ajahn Buddhadāsa, Ajahn Chah, and contemporary teachers like Mingyur Rinpoche, she illuminates how freedom from dukkha is not a far-off attainment but present in countless moments throughout our day.

Wilson examines the Buddha's teaching that the mind is naturally luminous and brightly shining, only temporarily obscured by the kilesas (defilements) of greed, hatred, and delusion. She emphasizes that these torments are conditioned phenomena—what comes together can come apart—and that the mind's intrinsic purity remains undisturbed even when obscured. Through the lens of Ajahn Buddhadāsa's concept of 'temporary Nibbāna,' she points to the cooling moments between afflictive states that we typically overlook.

The practical heart of this teaching lies in shifting attention from the content of awareness to the process of awareness itself. Rather than being absorbed in objects of experience, Wilson invites practitioners to notice the 'squeaky clean' quality of pure awareness—moments of simple presence free from craving, aversion, and delusion. These ordinary moments of uncontrived awareness, she suggests, are the doorway to liberation. The talk concludes with Mingyur Rinpoche's letter from his wandering retreat, affirming that recognizing our true nature of timeless awareness and vast compassion is the essence of practice—available here and now, closer than our own eyelids.

So tonight, as I promised, I will talk about the third noble truth. I'll be using words from different masters and teachers, just to give different flavors. But this is from the Buddha:

"What now is the noble truth of the extinction of dukkha? It is the complete fading away and extinction of this craving. It's forsaking and abandonment, liberation and detachment from it. The extinction of greed, the extinction of hate, the extinction of delusion—this indeed is called Nibbana. And for a disciple thus freed, in whose heart dwells peace, there's nothing to be added to what has been done, nothing more remains to do. Just as a rock of one solid mass remains unshaken by the wind, even so, neither forms nor sounds nor odors nor tastes nor contacts of any kind, neither the desired nor the undesired, can cause such a one to waver. One is steadfast in heart, and one who has considered all the contrasts of this earth, and is no more disturbed by anything in the world, the peaceful one, freed from rage, from sorrow, and from longing, has passed beyond birth and decay."

What I love personally about that definition is that it's very experiential, accessible by the wise, moment to moment—and that includes us. He's describing a state of heart and mind freed from craving. That's what he's calling freedom from confusion, from suffering: the cessation of craving. I really like that because that's the angle from which I want to speak about it tonight, rather than trying to describe some state that we can really start looking for. It's basically saying what we've said all along: turn around, look at your heart, look at your mind. See what's going on. See if this is true.

Because when we hear about freedom from craving, from hatred, from delusion, minds tend to think ahead along the end of a path. We think, "Well, that's down the road, some other lifetime, never going to happen to me," and we just throw it into some idea. But what's so cool about the nature of what we call mind and heart in our moment-to-moment experience is that he's not talking about a distant state at all—a state other than this moment of the heart, mind, consciousness, awareness being free from these torments. I'm going to use "torments" or "kilesas" rather than saying greed, hatred, and delusion every time. That's what I mean by torments.

So it's not like some distant steady state. What we're calling mind is, as Ajahn Analayo describes it, not a steady state. The mind is not a self-existing steady subject that takes objects as content. When we say "the mind," in English it sounds like one steady thing, doesn't it? Just like when we say "the body," we think of a solid, unchanging thing, and the mind too. But the mind is not a subject—it's an activity. It's the process, the moment-to-moment arising and passing process of cognizing the flow of events. Just as the events and objects at the six sense doors are arising in every moment, the cognizing function, which is the function we call mind, is also arising and passing in every mind moment, of which there are ten million in the blink of an eye.

So when we talk about a moment of mind, of heart, free from greed, hatred, and delusion, this is what makes it accessible to us. Because the so-called mind isn't some solid thing we've got to somehow transform and make other than it is now. We can actually use our practice to look into the quality of the heart-mind in this moment. Does that sound familiar? It's what we've been talking about the whole time. Because it's changing all the time, this means that—not the final never-arising of the torments again, we're not saying that—but in any moment, a kind of taste of this freedom is available to us, accessible to us. There are many moments in the day, believe it or not, when there's not greed, hatred, or delusion, not craving in the mind, in the awareness. We often don't notice it.

So Nibbana is directly visible. This is from the Buddha: Once a Brahmin approached the Blessed One and asked him, "You say Nibbana is directly visible, immediate, inviting one to come and see." He's not saying down the road, ten lifetimes from now. Immediate, inviting one to come and see. "What does this mean?"

The Buddha said, "When a person is impassioned with lust, depraved through hatred, bewildered through delusion, overwhelmed and infatuated by delusion, then she plans for her own harm, the harm of others, the harm of both, and experiences in her mind suffering and grief. But when lust, hatred, and delusion have been abandoned, he neither plans for his own harm nor the harm of others nor the harm of both. She does not experience in her mind suffering and grief. In this way, Brahmin, Nibbana is directly visible, immediate, inviting one to come and see, worthy of application, to be personally experienced by the wise."

I would really invite us to listen to what the Buddha is saying, not get caught up in concepts, but just take it in. Directly visible. Immediate. Immediate means only right now—immediately here, nowhere else.

Not something that we have to get. It's not something at all. But if we really are interested, if we look and begin to see what is worthy of application, exploring what is the quality of heart and mind in a moment when there's wakefulness and it's free from craving—just start to explore and see. What does this mean? What is this experience? Is that something you even know?

And I want to say it is, but we overlook it so often.

This is from Ajahn Buddhadasa, the Thai forest monk and meditation master we've spoken of often. He was quite a scholar. He died in the 1990s. This is from a long talk he gave to Thai people called "Nibbana for Everyone." He was specifically—he was a bit of a radical, I think, as we've said, radical within a very constrained context of Thai Theravada Buddhism. But still, in that place he was a radical. And he's speaking to Thai people who had come to think Nibbana just means when a completely enlightened person dies—that's Nibbana. That Nibbana has no relevance to any of us, or to lay people, or to anybody these days. That's something they talked about in the old days. So that's why he's talking about Nibbana for everyone.

I'm not going to read the whole thing—lucky you—just a few things I picked out.

He says, "Nibbana is a natural condition. It is the cool state of mind without any kilesa, without any torment. Nibbana is cool." Now he's punning here, because from what I understand, in Thai they use the word Nibbana to mean actually to cool something off—like the rice is Nibbana-ed, for example. So he's punning, but he's also making a good point.

Nibbana is a natural condition, the cool state of mind, of heart, when it's free from kilesa. Buddha termed this the cessation of suffering, which means the extinction of the heat from the kilesa, from the defilements. And just as you hear this, don't think about it so much—take it in. When you're impassioned with lust, bewildered by confusion, doesn't it feel like burning, burning in the mind? Anger—that one's even more obvious.

He goes on (I'm skipping): "When you look further, we will see that the defilements also—greed, hatred, delusion—are also conditioned things, compounded things, coming together from conditions, going apart when those conditions cease. Things that have birth and death." And so this shows that the kilesas occur, and when the conditions that cause them are not present, they simply become extinct. They just become extinct. And although the extinction is temporary—in other words, the coolness takes place temporarily—the phenomenon has the real sense of Nibbana even though it's not the lasting one.

Can you relate? Does this make sense?

"Hence, temporary Nibbana does exist"—this is the Thai master—"for those who unavoidably have some impurities that still arise in their minds."

But he goes on to say, "Anyone can see that if these torments were with us all day and all night, every second without ceasing, who could ever stand them?" You take that in, and now you may be thinking—if you have a cynical mind—"They are with me all day and all night, every second without ceasing." But I think his point is a good one. It's not the case.

He says, "Under such conditions, living beings must either die or really go crazy. So let us consider well the fact that one survives because there are periods when the fires of kilesa, of defilement, are not burning. And as a matter of fact, we can say that these periods last longer than when the fires are burning. We survive because of the nourishment from this kind of Nibbana. This nourishing condition is thus normal to what may be called life, mind, heart."

"So why don't we know or recognize or feel thankful for this type of Nibbana?"

That's the million-dollar question. Why don't we even recognize?

So that's one reason I like to talk about this third truth from this angle—because I know in my own life, my practice, whatever, in all the reading and talking about the sense of freedom and the nature of mind and Nibbana, the habit of my mind is craving. Looking for the missing thing that's going to bring me to completion. Not noticing, not turning around and noticing that what's occurring in my mind at that moment is craving—even though the object is some idea of Nibbana or freedom. And then suffering so much from trying to understand what that could mean.

Does anybody relate to that?

So no, no, you have no idea what I'm talking about. Lucky you. There's a lot of suffering going on there. But then you turn your head and go, "Oh, this is crazy." And then there's the voice of Mara: "It may be craving, but you've got to really crave to figure out nibbana. You can't just go, 'This is craving,' and walk away. You can't do that."

So I want to come from this angle, and I'm reading from a lot of teachers. It's not just me throwing in the towel of defeat and saying the best we can do is notice craving in our mind. This is really about starting to see that when craving is not present, that absence is the intimation of freedom. So can we even let it in? Can we notice what Ajahn Buddhadasa called "temporary nibbana"? Why don't we?

And again, the most simple ways—just the simple moments of what I would call now, in my current language, purity of consciousness. When the awareness is there, not distorted by greed, hatred, delusion. We've talked about this a lot, right? Mindfulness. But we still tend to kind of focus on the object of the mindfulness. So it's like starting to shift the field of attention so that we can actually begin to notice what is occurring that we tend to overlook.

I'm sure many of you have heard this really well-known, famous sutta of the Buddha's from the Anguttara Nikaya: "Luminous is this mind, or heart, brightly shining, but it is distorted, it is colored by the attachments that visit it. This unlearned people do not really understand, and so they do not cultivate the mind, the heart. Luminous is this mind, this heart, brightly shining, and it is free of the attachments that visit it. This the noble follower of the way does really understand, and so for them there is cultivation of the mind."

What was for me kind of an aha moment in my own practice was realizing these two descriptions—luminous is the mind, but the brightness, the natural luminosity of mind is covered by attachments, and then the mind is brightly shining when it's free of attachments—the aha moment was when I got it: that's not necessarily sequential. Even when the luminous quality, the brightness, the radiance of heart and mind is not recognized because of the attachments, the kilesas, that radiance is completely undisturbed. Both can be going on simultaneously.

And the simple way I think about it in my own experience is this: our habit, you know, the kilesas, it's like they make a lot of noise when they're present, right? Greed, hatred, confusion is going on, and all the papañca kicks up, and all the stories, and all the "me." We really notice that stuff. Maybe we're aware of it, maybe we're not, but our attention really gets sucked in. Meanwhile, there's the shining quality of mind noticing that. But the kilesas just make so much noise that we're in the habit of getting completely entranced and involved and reactive to whatever particular object it is that's occurring at any of the six sense doors. That's kind of where our attention tends to bend, whether it's pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. What do I think about this? What am I seeing? What am I hearing? It's kind of how we talk about our lives.

Even when you come into an interview and I'll say, "What's happening?"—really, that's the wrong question. Big picture, it doesn't matter what's happening. You saw this, you heard that, you felt this, you thought that, another thought, another sight, another sound. That's all that's going on, all day long. This one or that one, what difference does it make? But that's how we talk, and we miss the luminous quality of the heart-mind when it's not distorted by the attachments. We forget to even look in that direction.

I'm not saying we should see some incredible, brilliant nuclear sun. I'm just talking about a very simple quality of the mind, the heart, in those moments when we're not obsessed, distracted, blinded, caught up, seduced—whatever word you want to use—by whatever particular sense object, including mental ones, is occurring.

So it's sort of like we learn to shift the direction of interest, or expand the direction of interest, so we're not just staying, relating and reacting to every single object that comes.

I remember one time I was sitting with Sayadaw U Pandita, very tough teacher, very demanding, very great master. And it's the practice where you're noting every moment whatever's arising. I can't remember what I was reporting in the interview, but clearly I had some kind of complaining tone in my voice. I mean, one wouldn't dare really complain, but clearly I was dissatisfied with what was occurring. And he just says to me, "So what do you want, different objects to note?"

I was like—that was so right on. That's exactly it. Yeah, I want better ones. That's how we're spending our life, wanting better ones to note. And we just keep on spinning, spinning, spinning, and we miss this luminous quality of the heart, the mind, when it's free from attachments, because we don't even think to notice that.

So very simple, when you're here these next days. Now, I don't mean turn around and be looking for some experience—not that. But what we're cultivating here is the quality of awareness, consciousness knowing what's happening, and then the awareness knowing what we're knowing. And as we've said like ten million times, wise attitude: mindfulness, just that complete presence without adding anything extra, without wanting, without aversion, without the overlay of concept or "me."

And this is what Ajahn Buddhadasa is talking about—moments of coolness. Just start to notice them. It's often little moments when anything could be happening. It's not a fantastic sitting, necessarily, at all. It can be a time when you're just walking up to the dorm and there's just no sense of any problem. You're just quite present.

Even then we tend to attribute it to conditions. We often attribute it to the particular object: "Oh, but just then, the bud on that bush was so lovely, and I just felt this moment of peace appreciating the bud and the softness of the breeze and the sun." And so again, we're throwing all the peace outward to the conditions and not noticing that what was going on is just a moment of pure simplicity of presence.

Kind of like in Zen they just call it the is-ness. Just this. "Just this" could be like the moment I described. It could be taking a step and your toe hurts. It could be coughing. It could be drinking tea. It could be having what you call a great sitting or having what you call a horrible sitting, or just before you fall asleep at night. Many, many of these moments of just the simplicity of presence. Notice that.

Yes, craving will come in, or aversion will come in, or something else will happen, or some yogi walks by and ruins the moment for you. But if you keep the awareness going, you can just notice the change. And if you can notice what made the change—did that yogi walking by really make the change? What's the difference in the mind?

So we notice the difference when the heat from the defilement is again arising. And if you can manage not to take it personally, but just be exploring this difference, this is beginning to recognize. This is the coolness, this intimation of freedom from suffering—immediate, inviting one to come see for oneself.

We look too hard for the big blast, blow it all off, and we never have to deal with this stuff again. Sorry. But more and more and more moments—it becomes more trustworthy. And when we get sucked back into the reactivity, that's much more noticeable.

"Oh, wow, this is a defilement, this is the suffering nature again." But we start to know more and more that this coolness—mini-Nibbāna, whatever you want to call it—this coolness, this heading in the direction of the peace of mind and heart that's not disturbed by conditions, we start to get a sense of it, an intimation of it, beginning to trust that it's immediately accessible here and now.

You don't need to be different. I mean, there's nothing different—every moment you're different—but it's not something to gain. Starting to really explore this, that sense of—I don't know, we use the word purity. One friend described it once, these moments of just the simplicity of kind of pure awareness, pure meaning not distorted by kilesa. She described it as feeling squeaky clean, you know, like when you're cleaning a window and you can't see anything and it just squeaks with cleanliness. I somehow like that—just squeaky clean, nothing in the way.

So we can start to explore this, recognize this, see why it is that we don't. Sogyal Rinpoche said—again, this is why we don't—"At the present moment, our mind faces away from itself. Our attention bends towards whatever we experience: sight, sound, smell, taste, or texture. The mind leans towards it."

Do you get a sense of that sometimes? I was talking about craving just at the end of my talk last week—just that subtle movement of mind to kind of fixate on an object can be craving. The attention, Sogyal again: "The attention is also caught up by thoughts about the past, about the future, about the present, when in fact everything takes place in the present."

This is from Huang Po, Chinese Chan master.

This pure mind, this pure heart, shines forever with the radiance of its own perfection. But most people are not aware of it. We think the mind is just the faculty that sees, hears, feels, and knows—just a kind of functioning. We notice the functioning, not the purity of the aware mind itself. Blinded by their own sight, hearing, feeling, thinking, they don't perceive the radiance of the source.

Not to make this into some big "source thing" to look for, but just to notice from time to time, with interest, when whatever's arising, that way the attention tends to bend towards it. We don't notice the awareness that's noticing. That's what we've talked about so much—just noticing the knowing, that's all. We're talking about radiance, purity. It's not some huge nuclear sun. It's just this purity of the capacity for knowing, arising out of nothing, going to nothing, nothing you can hold to, no thing—but this radiant source.

And this is the poignancy, really, of craving, of aversion, of reacting to experience: it keeps us so busy and engaged with experience that we don't notice where it's arising from.

Even our mindfulness practice—I mean, whatever we do, however we practice—you've noticed this: the habits of our mind show up in how we practice. The way we act in big situations in life, after a while you realize that's coming up exactly in how you're relating to feeling the breath. It's really amazing. Something so simple as just noticing what's occurring, and all the major traumatic habits of our life show up.

So, even in the choiceless awareness form of mindfulness practice, where we're just noticing whatever's arising by itself—we talk about this because you really begin to get a sense, a little less sense of "me doing" and more just receiving. Stuff's occurring, stuff's occurring. There are times when the awareness is what's obvious, not so much the object.

But even this approach can become meeting, meeting, meeting, meeting—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, noting, noting, noting, noting. That's mindfulness, and it can be quite balanced mindfulness, sammasati. But it can—and I'm speaking totally from personal experience—have just this subtle sense of "me doing," which is craving. Any sense of "me" is a craving. "Me doing." So it seems incredibly mindful. Every moment is mindful, but the sense of "me doing" is just so strong by the end of the day, by the end of the retreat. You go, "What? I don't quite get what's going on here."

So then I'm going to try and not do. I'm going to just receive—things are coming, things are coming—but it's not very clear. "I should be better." And all the while, we're focusing on technique and focusing on object. That's all skillful means. I'm not saying we can throw that stuff out. But let's not forget to keep noticing the awareness that's doing that, the mind that's turning towards—that it's not a thing, but just that activity—not quite so caught up in the objects.

Bhikkhu Anālayo, that very brilliant German Theravada monk and translator, has a theory. He says one of the reasons Western meditators may progress more slowly than their Eastern counterparts—now, I don't know if that's true, but he did a lot of his practice in Sri Lanka, so this is his opinion; I'm not necessarily endorsing it—but this is the point: our tendency to become absorbed in the content of awareness rather than continuing to attend to the process of awareness.

That's exactly the point I'm making. When you come to an interview and I say, "What's happening?"—I'm making that same mistake. I'm going into the content of awareness. But really what we want to attend to is the process of awareness, over and over and over. And that gets more and more interesting, more and more obvious.

You have to think about it; it just becomes more obvious. And then you'll notice when the process of awareness is really distorted by kalesha.

A lot of people have been describing now, in our meetings, how all of a sudden they realize there must be aversion in the mind because they were having these really negative thoughts about everything they saw and people who walked by. And it's great, because maybe a year ago we wouldn't have even noticed that it was the process of awareness getting distorted. We would have just really thought there's something wrong with everybody and everything—the sun and the bushes—or something really wrong with me. Instead of saying, "This is a momentary arising of aversion that's distorting perception in awareness." And what comes together can go apart.

If we get interested in the process of awareness rather than doing battle with the aversion, we're back in a moment where awareness is like this, aversion is like this. There can be that squeaky clean process of awareness even with aversion or wanting as the object, when it's not all mixed up with the awareness, when we can see it.

This is from another Thai forest master, Ajahn Tate. He speaks of "the mind"—and again, even though it's just this changing process that awareness comes from, just saying "the mind," my mind goes back to solidity because of how we're used to thinking. So just to remind you: the mind is the process of knowing.

He's saying the mind and the defilements, the kalesha, are not identical. This could be good news. If they were, purification of mind would be impossible. The mind makes up imaginings. It imagines things that harness the defilements to itself—meaning it imagines things that hold the defilements to itself—and then becomes unsure as to exactly what is the mind and what is defilement. Do you get a sense of that? Like you can't tell the difference.

So this is his metaphor: Water in its natural state is a pure, transparent fluid. But if dye is added to it, it will change color accordingly. If red dye is added, it will turn red. If blue dye is added, it will turn blue. But even though the water may change color in accordance with the substances introduced into it, it actually never forsakes its innate purity and colorlessness. So if a wise person is able to distill the colored water, the water resumes its natural state. The dye stuff can only cause variation in outer appearance, not in intrinsic nature.

When we say awareness doesn't care what it's aware of—or someone said to me, "What about if awareness cares equally about what it's aware of?" I said, okay, that works too. Awareness cannot be stained or damaged or harmed in any way because the object of awareness is some really disgusting thought or mood. And it's not made better by being aware of really subtle movements of piti. Its natural moment of pure awareness is just what it is.

This is the beginning of that sense of luminosity, of radiance—not always huge, because there's so much subtle confusion covering it—but just begin to get interested. Intimations of this. You begin to really see it's not some far away possibility. If you're looking for the big bang, yes. But if you're willing to just touch into the simplicity of isness—of just standing here hearing the wind, before it goes to "I'm standing here hearing the wind"—just hearing, just seeing, just being with. Taste the quality not only of the object but of the awareness itself.

Ajahn Sumedho says something I love. It isn't exactly, I would say, kosher Theravada teaching, but he says the practice of freedom is awareness. Consciousness is the doorway to liberation. Now, I'm not equating consciousness and awareness—he might have been. I would say consciousness is just that quality of knowing, the natural quality of knowing. Hearing just happens by itself. Awareness is recognizing that knowing is happening. But he's saying awareness is the practice of freedom. And consciousness is the doorway to liberation, meaning when anything arises in consciousness and is known, it ceases. And then there's freedom again.

This is what's occurring moment after moment after moment, all day long. The Tibetans often have a phrase: all difficult thoughts, emotions, everything that arises, self-liberates in the nature of mind. To me that's exactly the same thing Ajahn Sumedho was saying. Something arises in consciousness, is known by awareness, and is left just as it is.

The conditions change, it vanishes, it dissipates. And again there's peace. It's what you could call self-liberating. We didn't have to get in there with hammer and tongs and fix it. But resting at ease in whatever arises, with this purity of awareness, trusting the awareness, seeing what occurs—it self-liberates.

Nyoshul Khenpo Rinpoche speaks about this same understanding. Again, this is Tibetan language, but it's the same teaching. He says this is one's birthright, one's nature. It is not something missing to be sought for and obtained elsewhere, but is the very heart of our original existential being. And this, I think, is important: it is actually inseparable from our uncontrived everyday awareness.

So Dzogchen says sometimes in the heart of our everyday moment-to-moment awareness is this potential to be just pure, free. In that moment, there's no problem. Beyond willful alteration, free from conceptuality. Unfabricated, ordinary awareness. That's just what we're practicing here. Unadulterated by effort and modification. Naked, fresh, vivid, and totally natural awareness. Totally natural. Stop trying so hard, because awareness is just natural. We've given so many examples of that. What could be simpler than this—to rest at home and at ease in total naturalness? They ask, what could be simpler than this? Then he says, get out of the construction business. Just rest at ease in whatever arises and stop constructing all this stuff.

The point I'm making here is that our natural, ordinary, everyday awareness is the doorway in. And it's these simple moments when nothing special is going on that we can actually recognize and access it. I don't know if it's just the way things are speeding up, so intense in our culture—I guess not, because this goes back to the Buddha—but we're looking too much for something really shocking, something really incredible, something to really notice. And so in these little moments, it's not enough of an anything. We don't trust that recognizing that purity of awareness, just our natural awareness—not supermundane, super concentrated—our natural awareness is a doorway in. This is really a place we begin to explore the third noble truth, over and over and over.

This is from the Dalai Lama, saying the same thing in his own way: that when the mind is free of negative emotions and tendencies, it understands and knows all phenomena. It is only because there are obscuring veils between the mind and its object that we are unable to know all things. This is the point. Once these veils have been removed, no new power is needed. Seeing and being aware is the nature of the mind itself.

It is amazing that it ought to be so simple. Just seeing and being aware—that's going on all day, and we get so caught up and complicated. When I said in some talk ago to Ben, "Why didn't you tell me it was this close—closer than my eyelid?"—I'm always looking way out for something much more. And this is so ordinary, so completely accessible, arising in our experience every moment, that we just overlook it completely.

Our ordinary everyday awareness is not separate. Not removed from life. The practice of freedom is awareness. What I want to say is the more we appreciate just this coolness—just think of it as this coolness, just simple awareness—the heart and mind maybe not plunging quite so much into objects, we start to actually recognize ourselves and the world in another way.

As His Holiness the Dalai Lama says, when the mind isn't obscured, when awareness isn't obscured, we see and know things clearly. That's the nature of the mind itself. When I've been talking about recognizing accurately, the real, the deep freedom that comes—more than just the little moments—doesn't come from going somewhere else, but from recognizing more and more deeply and accurately just the way things have always been. And are now.

It's not something else we have to achieve.

Remember when Greg, quite a few talks ago, read that line from the Buddha? When someone asked the Buddha to distill everything he knew into one sentence, he said, "Nothing is worth clinging to." Remember that? It's a test: nothing is worth clinging to.

This teaching is furthered in that same discourse. Having directly known everything, she fully understands everything. And having fully understood everything, she sees all signs differently. She sees the eye differently, forms differently, and so with all the sense bases. Whatever feeling arises connected with seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, with mind contact as condition—that too she sees differently. When a bhikkhu knows and sees thus, ignorance is abandoned and true knowledge arises.

Seeing signs differently means seeing without the distortions. Seeing, you could say, the impermanent quality, the not-self quality, the unreliable and unsatisfactory quality. Not something we have to click through and see, but rather it becomes so clear that all arising experience has this ephemeral nature—whatever is conditioned comes apart. Ephemeral, not lasting, but also not self-existing.

This is sometimes called emptiness, but as Ajahn Amaro points out in his book The Island, the Buddha didn't talk about emptiness as a thing or a state. Rather, he spoke of all experience as being empty of inherent self-existence. This seeing signs differently, this opening into the empty quality of nothing being inherently solid and self-existing, is actually one of the deeper aspects of freedom. It releases even more fully the tendency to get sucked into and reactive to objects.

Ajahn Jumnian, another Thai forest master who is still alive, describes it this way when speaking about meditation: "At some point, the mind becomes so clear and balanced that whatever arises is seen and left untouched with no interference. One ceases to focus on any particular content and all is recognized as simply mind and matter—an empty process arising and passing away of its own. A perfect balance of mind with no reactions. And there's no longer any personal doing." This is a moment of balanced mind.

But people often think that this sense of emptiness, empty of self, moves into "who cares"—the indifference aspect of equanimity. What Ajahn Chah describes is true equanimity. It's not a divorcing or separation from our life, from activity, from anything. Emptiness is right in the heart of it all.

Pema Chödrön speaks about this empty quality of the sense of self, of permanence—how any experience is recognized simply when the mind is not clinging. That's all. When the mind is not clinging, not making something of anything, not resting or holding to any experience, she says, "Keep on going. Everything is a verb."

Then she tells this story. Some people have heard it, but I share it because it's funny. Chögyam Trungpa and Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche, two great masters, were sitting under a tree somewhere in Bodh Gaya together, just so happy to be in each other's company. They sat there beaming, silent, grinning for hours without saying anything. After about three hours, Chögyam Trungpa broke the silence. With a huge smile, he pointed and said, "They call that a tree." And they both just cracked up laughing.

It's a subtle thing, but you see—they know we call it a tree. Yet they see all signs differently. We can recognize tree, we can use tree, and we know it has no inherent self-existence.

Another Tibetan teacher puts it this way: "The experience of emptiness is not found outside of the world of ordinary appearance, as many people mistakenly assume. In truth, we experience emptiness when the mind is free of grasping at appearance." And yet we fully know all appearance. We fully relate. And the natural response of this heart-mind of non-grasping is compassion.

I want to end by reading two passages from beings who experienced this directly. The first is from a Tibetan wandering monk called Shabkar, who lived from 1781 to 1851. He was very, very famous.

He was sort of like Milarepa in that he wandered all through Tibet, simply practicing his whole life—practicing and creating these beautiful songs of compassion and awakening. What's interesting about Shabkar is that they say he was very poor and uneducated. All of his practice came not from intellectual study or understanding, but purely from his own direct experience. He was also deeply compassionate. He didn't eat meat, which is very rare in Tibet because there's not much else to eat. And he would often try to buy animals that were going to be slaughtered in order to save them—that kind of really profound compassion.

So this is a little bit long, and I'm sorry, but I just love this. It's called "The Fruit." This is one of his songs about his experience of emptiness and compassion:

When one looks at one's own mind, the root of all phenomena, there is nothing but vivid emptiness. Nothing concrete there to be taken as real. It is present as transparent, utter openness, without outside, without inside—an all-pervasiveness without boundary and without direction. The wide open expanse of the view, the true condition of mind, is like sky-like space, without center, without edge, without aim. By leaving whatever I experience relaxed in ease, just as it is, I have arrived at the vast plane that is the absolute expanse. Dissolving into the expanse of emptiness that has no limits and no boundary, all vision, all sound, my own mind, and the sky all merge. Not once did the notion arise of these being separate and distinct.

Now this is interesting:

In the absolute expanse of awareness, all things are blended into that single taste, but relatively each and every phenomenon is distinctly, clearly seen.

This is the paradox that keeps going back and forth. Wondrous.

Toward all the beings under the skies who have failed to realize this, all-pervading compassion spontaneously dawned. The urge to sing this song arose of itself—without entering the narrow rock gorge which is mind watching for stillness and movement, without being caught in the snare of view and meditation created by the intellect, without flying into the dark clouds of dull states of mind, without plunging into the storm of agitated thinking. The great Garuda, my own mind, flew freely into the wide open sky of the absolute expanse.

In this expanse of sky-like evenness, all phenomena, all appearances and sounds of samsara and nirvana are apparent yet empty. They are empty and yet they appear. Although they appear, phenomena are empty, free of the limiting concept "truly existent." Although they are empty by nature, phenomena do appear, free of the limiting concept "non-existent." In the vast space of the view that is itself spontaneously free from the two limiting concepts—belief in permanence or belief in nothingness—this joyous song burst forth by itself.

Even more vast than the sky is the view of emptiness. There the sun of love and the moon of compassion arose. And again and again I made boundless prayers to benefit the teachings and beings. May all disease and epidemics, all famine and all wars be ended, and may all have happiness and joy.

And this last piece is from a letter from Mingyur Rinpoche, written about a year and a half ago. He's the younger brother of Tsoknyi Rinpoche. Many of you probably know that he went off for three years to do retreat, and he just vanished—simply walked out from Bodh Gaya, didn't tell anyone where he went, didn't take anything with him. He said he didn't even take a toothbrush. He just went off. So really, he's doing today pretty much the same wandering practice that Shabkar or Milarepa was doing.

After about a year and a half, one of his most devoted disciples, Ramatashi, happened to run into him in Nepal and begged to be allowed to come with him. So he went with him for a while. Then Mingyur gave him this letter and sent him away again. I'll just read a few passages, not the whole thing:

"I myself am wandering without any fixed location, staying in isolated mountain hermitages and other such places. I have experienced feelings of happiness and suffering, rising and falling like waves on the surface of the ocean. At times, food and clothing have been hard to come by, and I felt cold, hungry, and thirsty."

And you know, he doesn't mean a little bit cold, a little bit hungry. He's wandering around in Tibet without a coat.

"At times, food and clothing have been hard to come by, and I have felt cold, hungry, and thirsty. Even when I have begged for alms, I receive nothing but insults and harsh words. At other times, I have received food and clothing effortlessly, without even asking for them, and in my mind it felt as though I were enjoying the pleasures of the gods.

While I have experienced both happiness and suffering, the most important thing is that a deep and heartfelt sense of certainty has arisen in the depths of my being, such that no matter what happens, I know that the true nature of these experiences, their very essence, is that of timeless awareness and vast compassion."

This natural clarity of awareness has been with us from the very beginning. It is the essence and nature of our minds. Therefore, one must maintain this flow of pure awareness to the best of one's ability—exactly what we are doing.

While all beings have great wisdom and compassion, this is not always apparent. This is simply because they have not recognized what they already have. Thus, aside from merely recognizing our own true nature, there isn't the slightest thing to meditate on.

"Recognizing the importance of this, I have passed my days feeling joyful and content, wandering through the mountains and valleys and staying here and there. From my heart, I sincerely encourage all of you to practice diligently in this manner as well."

I just love it. It's like today—that's happening today.

This is the last paragraph from the Buddha's description of the third noble truth:

"Hence, the purpose of the holy life does not consist in acquiring alms, honor, or fame, nor in gaining morality, concentration, or the eye of knowledge. That unshakable deliverance of the heart—that indeed is the object of the holy life. That is its essence."

Unshakable deliverance of the heart. Rather like what Mingyur Rinpoche was speaking about.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 148

Introduction to Awareness Practice: 3 Jobs of a Yogi

Carol Wilson · 57 min

In this opening retreat talk, Carol Wilson offers a practical introduction to vipassanā meditation through the lens of what Sayadaw U Tejaniya calls "the three jobs of a yogi." Drawing from a definition of vipassanā as "experiencing the mind and body directly from moment to moment with the right understanding," she unpacks these three essential elements: beginning with right view, cultivating continuous awareness, and maintaining steady perseverance throughout the day.

Wilson emphasizes that the fundamental misperception we bring to practice is taking all experience personally—appropriating the things of nature as "I" and "mine." Drawing on teachings from Ajahn Buddhadāsa and Sayadaw U Tejaniya, she explains that whatever arises in mind and body is simply nature, arising due to causes and conditions, not because we are bad or failing. This understanding transforms our relationship to difficult mind states like greed and aversion, allowing us to observe them with curiosity rather than judgment.

The talk highlights that awareness is not something we create but something we recognize. Wilson shares practical guidance on working with the "very, very now"—the immediacy of direct experience before interpretation takes over. She encourages practitioners to explore what supports balanced awareness in each moment, whether sitting, walking, or engaging in daily activities, rather than following rigid schedules. The continuity of this simple, honest awareness is what allows wisdom to naturally arise and recognize how suffering and freedom unfold in our own hearts and minds.

Looking out at you all on the first night, I feel a lot of empathy, having done many retreats myself. I can see how peppy you're all feeling. One time, many years ago, I was teaching a retreat with James Baraz. It was the first night, there were about eighty people, and the room was arranged in a semicircle. We hadn't said, "Please don't lie down when we're talking"—we forgot to say that. Literally, I'm not exaggerating, halfway through his talk, I was sitting with my eyes closed while he was speaking, and when I looked up, two-thirds of the room had completely downed out, lying down. Luckily, James has energy and could keep going, but it was an uphill battle. So you may be lying down in your minds—that's okay.

Tonight, I'm going to try to keep things simple, which is not my strong point, and talk about an introduction to this way of practice. I'm basing this on something Sayadaw U Tejaniya likes to say, somewhat tongue-in-cheek, describing what we're doing here in practical terms as "the three jobs of a yogi."

These three jobs are contained in this description of Vipassana meditation: Vipassana meditation is experiencing the mind and body directly from moment to moment with the right understanding.

So those are the three jobs. The first is to begin practicing with right understanding. The second is cultivating awareness—experiencing the mind and body directly, which is what mindfulness is. And the moment-to-moment part represents continuity: not just a couple of moments and then kicking back, but moment to moment to moment through the day.

Right understanding is the attitude, the understanding we bring from the beginning—some sense of knowing why we're doing this. Then we cultivate and remember awareness with right understanding, which means awareness not distorted by wanting and cockamamie ideas. The third job is steadiness, perseverance, continuity.

What's amazing—Thich Nhat Hanh often talks about the miracle of mindfulness, the miracle of awareness—and it is beyond amazing to me, over and over, that by experiencing through mindful awareness what's happening in our mind, in our body, in this moment, directly, not through the filter of all our interpretations, we begin to understand deeply. The more we practice, the more continuous we are, the more we understand why the Buddha taught this: to understand how suffering and happiness and freedom arise in our own heart and mind, nowhere else. Mindfulness, awareness, continuity—this is the condition that allows wisdom to arise, that allows us to recognize accurately. It's really amazing.

What I loved about the Buddha's teachings when I first heard them, and all along, is that he was eminently practical. Even though there's a great deal of philosophy and very specific, fascinating stuff to study, the core is simply seeing why we tend to feel as though we're living in contention with life so much of the time. And I know I'm using the royal "we," but probably if you felt everything was really great, you wouldn't be here.

The Buddha says, let's really look and see. It's not about looking out there and asking what's wrong with life. It's looking and seeing why we are living in contention with life. How can we come to live with ease, with peace, with wholesome qualities of loving-kindness and compassion? What can bring this about?

This moment-to-moment direct experiencing of our mind and body is the key. We begin to experience things as they are, not as we think they are or think they should be. And then we see, over and over, how confusion, suffering, contention, aversion, wanting—whatever arises in this moment in the mind stream, in the heart—arises due to causes and conditions, not because we're bad people or stupid, but due to habits, conditions, misunderstanding. We see how it arises, and by continuing to pay attention instead of running away when it gets unpleasant, by continuing to notice how it is with this awareness, even that becomes a support for awareness. By noticing how the confusion acts, we start to see how suffering is created.

This recognizing accurately is the wisdom that allows for change. That's what's coolest to me. It's not that we have to personally figure it all out and then consciously make some kind of change, because we don't really have a clue. But when the clear heart and mind of wisdom recognizes how things are, we naturally respond in an appropriate way. This is how wisdom works. This is an incredible key.

Let me give a very simple example. I have a little nephew who's just over two, the only child in my family right now. I'm having fun watching him grow. It's wonderful to watch—I'm sure if you have kids, you know—how they just naturally learn as they go through stages.

So I just thought of this simple example. You know how kids get these blocks with a thing that has a triangle and a square and a circle, and they're supposed to put the right shape block in the right hole? At first, when they're too young or just starting out, it's impossible. One goes in right, so then they think they should all go in, and they're trying to force them. So he's trying to force the triangle into the circle or the circle into the square. It doesn't work. He doesn't know why and just keeps pushing and pushing, getting frustrated, getting angry. And then that anger—not only with kids, right?—can escalate and turn into not liking what's for dinner or getting mad at me. It can turn into a whole thing.

Keep on trying. Keep on trying. Come back later when the anger isn't completely distorting attention. Because once anger is distorting attention, we can't see accurately. I don't imagine a kid would be thinking this way, but this is how we would: "What's wrong with the people who made this stupid thing? It doesn't work." Or, "What's wrong with me? How come I can't do it? They're doing it fine. What's my problem?" On and on and on. The more we don't recognize the anger, the more it's distorting our perception, and we just start to either send it outward to the world or inward to ourselves. We're in contention.

But say he comes back, or he's a little older, and he's able to have enough steady attention that's not all angry—just picking up the blocks and really noticing, just seeing what's going on and actually seeing how it works with the shapes. He really gets it. Once you get it, you get it. The anger's gone. All those stories are gone. You quit trying to put the triangle into the circle. You really get it.

What made that possible is just steady, calm awareness. And when it sees how things work—just kind of like the laws of nature—oh, that's how it works—the whole problem falls away.

That's a pretty simple example, but that's the process. That's the process we are entering into: exploring our whole life, the whole process of our mind and body, how it works. Because without recognizing accurately, it's like we're fighting gravity. Something's wrong, I can't fly. Something's wrong, I feel heavy. We're fighting aging. There's something wrong—I get older every year. We do feel like there's something wrong when you start this. Really, who made this up?

But at the heart of awakening, at the heart of what really frees our heart and mind from this contention—what I would say is the essence of right view—is this deep fundamental shift in how we perceive and thus recognize and understand and respond to our mind and body experience, to how the mind interprets experience, and to life.

Not a one-time thing, okay? Just forget that. Just totally put it down—the idea that you're going to have one moment of a fundamental shift and it's all just going to be clear and you're going to float out from this retreat filled with compassion and love for all beings and wisdom. You'll have moments. I can't tell you—and it's very embarrassing actually—how many retreats I have done thinking, "I've got it now."

But it would sneak up in the background. I'd be going along, going along, and halfway through the retreat I'd realize I was suddenly feeling frustrated, which meant I had an expectation I hadn't seen. Somewhere in the background: "All right, I thought this one was going to do it. And then we wouldn't really have to be aware all the time anymore. We wouldn't have to do this stuff anymore."

Just forget that, and you'll find it a lot easier. Because what we're really learning to do is shift our refuge—shift the refuge from the habits of mind, of self-centeredness, of wanting, of aversion. That's not like a should. I'm not making a list.

I'm going to stop being self-interested now. Okay, from now on, greed is out. No more greed. Hopeless, you know? Don't even think about it.

But what we're doing is bringing awareness to understand how greed is when it arises and how it works. Don't believe anything we say, or anything the Buddha says, that greed causes suffering. Instead, recognize when it's present and keep being aware moment to moment. See what occurs. See what kind of thoughts come up. See what kind of behavior comes up. See how you feel. See how you relate to the world. That's where the wisdom comes—from the awareness and the steadiness, the continuity.

We really do start to see. And it's amazing that the seeds of suffering and the seeds of freedom and compassion arise in a moment and pass in a moment. There's no solid state, which is sometimes unsettling and scary, but actually that's what allows for change. That's what allows for wisdom. That's what allows for shifting refuge from these old habits, from this confusion.

At the heart of awakening is right view, and Steve is going to talk much more about the specifics of right view because it's the first of the Eightfold Path—the first step. And it kind of goes in a circle, so it's also the last. How can I possibly start my practice, or even continue in the middle, with right view when it's so complex? But we can start very simply, and that's what I want to talk about tonight.

In terms of right view, bringing this to our moment-to-moment simple awareness, the misperception or confusion—the thing we don't understand—is a little deeper and a little more complex than not getting that a triangle is a different shape than a square. It's a little closer to home and a little more complicated.

But I would say the way both Ajahn Buddhadasa and Sayadaw U Tejaniya use similar language here is helpful. Ajahn Buddhadasa was a very famous Thai forest teacher and scholar in Thailand in the last century—he died in the 1990s. I was lucky enough when I was a nun there to spend some time in his forest monastery. So did Fran—you were there some too.

So the basic misperception I want to point to, just to simply begin our practice—we're not going to understand it in depth, but this is taking in information—it's the first level of wisdom: heard wisdom. Things that we've heard, things that we've read. We don't know it in our cells, but we're listening, we're learning, we start to learn. This is important because without hearing something or reading something or having a point of view we never encountered, it's a lot harder to discover it on our own.

And for many of us here, you're already in the second level of wisdom the Buddha talks about, which is really using our intelligence, our understanding, where you think about it, you explore it, you're really getting it on a deeper level. Yeah, this does make sense. I can see it. But it's still a bit prompted. You know it, but when the chips are down, no, that's not what you know.

And the third level, bhāvanā-mayā-paññā, is really the insight level where—you know, like when my nephew suddenly goes, "Oh, yeah, right, that's how it works"—you don't have to think about it anymore. You know that's how it is.

So we're bouncing around between those levels in a lot of different ways all the time. It's not linear. Nothing's really linear.

Anyway, the way Tejaniya describes it is just to say that in this first wise attitude, whatever's occurring in our mind, in our body—our thoughts, our moods, hearing, seeing, smelling, tasting, physical sensations, the whole range of moods—it's just nature. It isn't personal.

We take it all so personally. It's my fault or it's your fault. You're making me feel bad. But we take it all so personally. Instead, we can say: no, it's just nature.

So when I said a minute ago, "Notice when greed comes up and just really notice how greed arises, how wanting feels and how it..." if you're taking it personally, that's not possible.

Right? It comes up and it's either, "This feels like crap, let me go get whatever I want so I don't have to feel this anymore." Did you ever notice that's really what greed is doing? Or it's like, "Oh no, here I am, I'm so committed to practice, I'm really working, and here's greed, greed, greed. And the more I think about it, the more I see it—greed, greed, greed. Greed to look, greed to hear, greed to eat, greed to sit. I'm sitting and I want to walk. I'm walking and I want to sit. I'm sitting and I want to lie down. I'm lying down and I want to get up. Greed, greed, greed—it's hopeless."

That's taking it personally. It's not so helpful. Does that sound familiar, though? Can anyone relate to that?

It's just the way nature works. Greed arises—it's a habit, but it arises due to causes and conditions. We'll talk a lot more about this as we go on. Mostly, something pleasant comes up in the mind, or there's something pleasant, and the mind just leans in. It wants more. It's a habit. We don't notice, and it turns into greed. Aversion is the reverse. And then it goes into a whole story. It's just nature.

When you're not taking it personally, awareness can come in and go, "Oh yeah, look at that—greed. It feels like this. It feels like this in the body. These are the kind of thoughts that are coming up. What action does the mind want to do?" Watching it with awareness, you don't have to act on it.

It's really—I'm serious—fun to explore this stuff. Because in that moment, just that moment of simple direct awareness, "Oh, greed is like this"—greed is just as valid a support for awareness as a sensation of breath or walking or hearing. "Oh, greed is like this." Awareness of greed. In that moment, just for that moment, there's a sense of freedom. We're not so locked into the story, and it's just, "Oh, this is what's happening."

Mingyur Rinpoche says—and I hadn't thought of it this way, although it's kind of obvious—that whatever's going on, whether greed can be fiery or wanting, or we're in some story, or we have a pain, it can be very fiery and wild. But awareness itself in the moment is inherently calm. And so that's why when there's this kind of—call it like a Tai Chi move—a shift of refuge from "Oh no, my back hurts, what am I going to do?" to "Sensation is like this, the pain is like this," and there's a recognition of the awareness of the pain... the pain is still pain. We think, "Oh no, it all goes away, la la la." No, the pain is still pain. But when the refuge is in that awareness, just for that moment, that's inherently calm, and it really feels like, "Oh, right."

Then we try to hold on to it, and there's wanting—until we recognize, "Oh yeah, wanting is like this." And there are times when the steadiness of awareness is really beginning to get momentum, and whatever comes, the awareness just starts to have its own momentum, and there's that recognition. When it's like that, it's so easy. It's so simple.

I can say that. I feel that sometimes. And then the next hour, or the next five minutes, you have the first level of wisdom about that. You remember, "I just have to be aware of this sensation and recognize it's unpleasant and awareness is calm—everything's going to be great." Fat chance, right? Because that's not what conditions are present right then. It's not because you're failing. That's taking it personally again. It's because the conditions for clear seeing aren't quite present. Either the wanting or the aversion or the delusion, the meaning-making—it's still there in the mind that's aware, kind of distorting the awareness, but we don't quite recognize it.

That's why we talk about this when you're practicing sitting, walking, eating, whatever. I said today: when you feel some tension, some struggle, just gently check—what's the attitude in the mind? Not like an analysis checklist, but sometimes you can just kind of feel, "Oh, what does it feel like?"

Nothing. It's really calm. Or it's like, oh, I really want this to go away. And you just feel that. You just feel that.

And then there are other times when—I was just doing a self-retreat and I could feel the tension in my body. I knew intellectually that there was some wanting, some resistance that was influencing the awareness, the being present. I knew it intellectually, but I couldn't quite feel it. Awareness couldn't quite touch it. It was just kind of subtle. Like when you're pretty present, but your glasses are just a little bit wavy—they're not quite the right prescription. You're looking at it, you just can't see clearly. And you can't see it till you see it.

But we continue moment after moment with the simplicity of awareness, because then you know: Oh, I know something, there's some tension, and I don't see what it is. That's what's happening now. Tension feels like this. There's nothing outside of awareness. Nothing that we need to get rid of or push through in order to make the awareness correct. But remembering that is so hard. That's just dropping the me-ing, the doing, the ideas, and just—ah, it's like this now. That's Ajahn Sumedho's language, and I use it so much. It really helps me.

In sitting, I find my mind tends to get a little more convoluted if something's going on like that. I find that when I'm doing walking meditation, it just kind of eases out a bit. I don't know. But we're all different. There's not a right way. It could be lying down for you, or eating, or whatever.

But anyway, what I can tell is when it's convoluted, and there's this subtle trying to figure it out, just—oh, it's like this now. It's a dropping, a surrendering into the simplicity and honesty of awareness of just how it is now. You don't need to know how. It's like this. And then there's awareness again. That doesn't mean it fixes anything—it's awareness. You can learn to recognize how that feels.

A friend shared with me something one of her teachers said—a Tibetan teacher. He was describing just the immediacy of awareness, how it feels, to a group he was teaching who weren't particularly practitioners and didn't have the language they use in that Tibetan scene. I loved it. He called it "just being with the very, very now."

And I love that because I can think, oh, I'm feeling my emotions, I'm feeling my step, you know. But this—you can tell there's just something like, oh, the very, very now. Just totally here without a pulling back or a "so that," or a needing to understand, or a subtle fear. If I feel this, it's really going to feel lousy, and then what's going to happen? Where's my mind going to go? From just—ah, the very, very now. To me, that's taking refuge in the Dhamma, in the way things are. And that is the simplicity of awareness. That's why it's such a miracle. The steadiness of that is what actually starts to allow wisdom and accurate recognition to arise.

So Buddhadasa—I mentioned him a while ago and got off onto Utajaniya—but he talked in his book Mindfulness with Breathing. The book itself was just about working with ānāpānasati, but he had a very broad way of teaching and understanding. He wasn't just talking about samatha, one-pointed practice. He was talking about wisdom, awakening practice.

He said, again, it's all nature. All arising experience is nature. And he was really big on nature. He had a forest meditation center way down in the eastern mid-Thailand, and he didn't give a lot of instructions. The monks would just go and live, for weeks, for months, for years, in tiny little huts in the middle of the forest. He was really about that—just being silent and aware in nature. After a while, you start to see it's not like "I'm in nature." This, it's nature. It's all nature.

And then he went on to say: when it's nature, whatever's arising in this moment is the result of an inconceivable train of causes. This is the effect. We can never understand all the causes in one moment. And essentially, this particular moment right now can't be different.

How can this moment be different? It's here. There's no way it can be different. As Jack always says, give up all hope for a better past. This moment can't be different. But with accurate recognition, with wise attention that isn't putting an overlay of blame or confusion or interpretation—it's just here, the very, very now—with that wisdom that can arise, the response that arises within this moment, well, that's what really can be very different.

When there's just the habit, you keep trying to throw that square block into the triangle and you never succeed. But when there's this very clear seeing—oh look, that's how it goes—quite naturally, it's also nature. The understanding shifts. The response shifts from aversion, from clinging, to one of wisdom, to one of metta if that's appropriate, to compassion if that's the appropriate thing. It's not an act of personal will. That's what's so cool. It's nature. It happens naturally.

The steady learning to have some trust in awareness, practicing—that's what we're doing. We're just practicing recognizing this simple awareness over and over and over. The retreat gives us support to do that because when there's so much coming in, our habits are so strong, even when we want to do it, it's just harder. It's possible, but it's harder. So we need to give ourselves some energy, some practice in shifting the habit.

Back to Buddhadasa—he could be kind of funny. He says we're always appropriating the things of nature as "I" and "mine." And this is the basic misunderstanding that wise view starts to see through. He says we've been thieves all of our life by appropriating all the things of nature—whatever's occurring—as I or mine. He says we've been ignorant and we suffer for it. But when we become wise—and he's talking about this last step of practice—we realize, oh, it isn't mine. It belongs to nature. And so we just throw everything back to nature and don't steal anything anymore.

We don't have to wait until it's always like that. We can have moments of that, just in very simple experiences. Explore that here.

I noticed again, just this last month—I was doing a self-retreat at home—this wasn't new information, it was just a different way my mind looked at it. We always see different angles that spark the interest, and interest is really such a key motivation to help us keep exploring in this way.

I noticed how with all the different experiences, all the perceptions that come in—what's happening? Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, feeling, sensing with the body, and the whole mental world, which includes all the constructs, the thoughts, moods, the mental states. All these things are happening and being perceived by the mind. I started to notice how certain experiences or certain perceptions were privileged in a way as being me or belonging to me. There were tons of other sensations and perceptions, pleasant or unpleasant, mostly probably kind of neutral. Maybe I noticed them, maybe I didn't. They just kind of go by. It's whatever. Oh yeah, that deer—there's seeing. You don't even notice seeing. There's hearing. There's warmth. It's neutral.

Then all of a sudden the warmth gets really hot, and there's a little aversion, a little unpleasantness, and the mind goes into aversion. What's the matter with my body? Why is it so warm? Why don't they turn on the air conditioning? What kind of—on and on. That particular perception has suddenly been privileged as me, as mine, without wisdom, leading to all kinds of responses, all kinds of contention, one way or the other.

Or it's really pleasant and we think, this is great! Finally, something's happening. I had a few moments where I really felt aware. I got it. I'm finally—how can I keep it? How can I get it back? So it's pleasant, but we're privileging that as mine.

And once we do that, that steady awareness that can look at what's happening—what are the causes, what are the conditions that bring this about, and how does it change—we can learn if we can watch like that. But when we start to clamp down around anything as me or mine, the awareness gets distorted. It may not completely snap shut, but it's not recognizing accurately anymore.

So we spend a lot of our life like this. But again, this isn't something you have to figure out intellectually. This is what's so cool to me. The steady simplicity of awareness is what we're learning. We recognize how things are. It's how things are. It's not like if you really get clear, then you'll stop being yourself. We're just like we always were—which is maybe not good news. Ajahn Sumedho says, "It's not your personality that gets enlightened." I kept waiting to get a new personality. Forget about it.

But we get more friendly, because it's nature. You can see the causes and conditions. And the parts that come from really reacting out of confusion do start to lessen and ease away.

Again, my friend passed on another thing her lama said. I liked his way of putting it. He's talking about how all experience is nature—whether it's hearing, whether it's thoughts, whether it's moods, whatever it is. It's just all aspects of nature, cause and effect, natural law. And he says, when we hold on to and solidify any particular experience as me, we suddenly get locked back down into what he called "the narrow bandwidth of a sense of personal identity." I love that. And we lose the connection with the vastness, we lose the connection with the whole, with the whole range.

One easy way to play a little bit with this—not if you're in a big struggling mode or in a lot of pain or aversion, but when you're calm yet awake—I find playing with hearing meditation helpful. Now, it doesn't work for everybody. For some people hearing has too much story or sense of personal stuff with it. But for me, just sitting and being present with hearing—not listening, not reaching out, but just sitting. Okay, feel sensations. I'm not blocking anything else out. But allowing hearing to be at the forefront of what's received. Not listening, just hearing.

And over some time, just hearing sounds come and go. There's a natural recognition—the mind recognizes. It might recognize a bird or a frog or whatever. That's fine. But that's not hearing. That's a perception. That's thinking. That's not a problem. But just know it's not hearing. That's going on, but you're not getting caught up in it. Just hearing, hearing, hearing, hearing.

And after some time, when the mind is calm, the hearing could be a lovely bird. The hearing could be the turkeys. The hearing could be someone stomping into the hall in the middle of your sitting and slamming the door. The hearing could be someone breathing really loudly near you. And it's just hearing. It's just nature. The hearing could be your stomach growling, and you normally would get all embarrassed because it's me—but it's just hearing.

So there's a sense of not privileging something as me. There's not that narrow bandwidth of me and everybody else, me and the other. It's just what's occurring. Just playing with that from time to time might be interesting.

Often it's thought that we shouldn't be talking about this sense of sakkāya-diṭṭhi—this personality view, this tendency to privilege, to go through life from the center of "it's all about me or mine"—in the beginning of a retreat or early in practice. Because intellectually it's very hard; we can't really totally understand it intellectually. And it's a subtle and ongoing experience. Plus it makes some people frustrated to try and figure it out. You can't figure it out, so just forget trying to figure it out. No, no, that's got to wait till later in the retreat or whatever.

But this is what Sayadaw U Tejaniya says, and Buddhadasa too, and Ajahn Sumedho as well. No, this is where we start. Because we want to begin and continue our practice with the right understanding, with the right attitude.

Ajahn Sumedho would say, you know, some people he knew practiced for twenty years very, very sincerely—but without even looking at this. Not that we can totally understand that we're not a particular separate self, but they practiced without even examining it. Or as Sayadaw Tejaniya would say, we're practicing from a sense of me. It's all about me trying to get something. There's the striving, there's the effort. You could try, put in so much effort, so much trying, so much sincerity, push to really deep states, and it could still be coming from this delusion of it being all about me getting something to be better. He said, so why wait twenty years until you finally can get some insight? I'm not talking about just words—let's start with at least having that intellectual understanding and looking at it.

Because it's natural. You'll notice the times when everything kind of coheres and it's all about me. You notice it because it starts to feel kind of yucky. Except when it feels good. Because sometimes it feels good—that's why we keep going. It's just comfy, like an old blanket. Yeah, me.

I would notice sometimes all these feelings of real sadness, nostalgia, thinking about my dead parents. It would come in, and I could see a habit of mine, almost wanting to really sink into it. And I'd think, why? There was nowhere to go with it. It wasn't like there was something I needed to think through or figure out. Oh yeah, we're so sad, it's all gone by. What's that phrase? Alles vorbei—they say it in Germany all the time. It's all over, it's all bye-bye. And I could see my mind wanting to go there. Why? That's so crazy. But it does, because it's just comfy.

So the simplicity and honesty of awareness is really what we're here to learn and practice. This is our amazing ally, the amazing tool that really begins to allow us to see all of this. Again, from Ajahn Sumedho—and I think this line is extremely important to remember: we don't create awareness. We recognize it.

How much of the day have you, subtly or grossly, been trying to create awareness? Giving the attention or trying to find it. It's really because that's what we know. I have to try and make something happen. That's the me-ing and the my-ing. That's what we know, what we've learned. It's incredible. I find it very hard to trust that just, oh yeah, trying feels like this—and to see that that's awareness. You might say, "I came here to sit and 'trying feels like this'? I came here to walk up and down sweating in the heat, and 'sweating and feeling aversive feels like this'? And they tell me this is good practice? I don't think so. Complaining in the mind feels like this?"

But when I say "it feels like this," that implies awareness is actually there with it. The very, very now. Just for that moment. And day after day, what we're doing here is moment after moment, simply practicing.

This simplicity of awareness, this honesty of awareness. We don't try to create it. We start to see that as soon as we remember—oh yeah, am I aware?—it's right there. Am I aware? How can I get it? Am I aware? As soon as you ask yourself that, you're aware. And it doesn't matter of what. It doesn't matter if it's gross. It doesn't matter if it's some incredibly subtle thing. It doesn't matter if you don't even know what—there's just some feeling. Am I aware? We get more and more trusting. As soon as we think, awareness is available. It's so simple that we keep thinking we have to do something. We'll keep falling into that.

The simplicity of awareness—what I mean by that is this landing in the bare experience without confusing that for all the interpretations. You know what I mean by interpretations? And it's not that the interpretations are bad. We can recognize that's a thought, that's a memory, that's a mood. That's fine. That's, again, bare experience. But then—oh, look at that little deer with its velvet horns. I wonder if that's the little Bambi that was born in our driveway last year. It looks so cute. I wonder if it's lonely. Oh, isn't it great being in nature, and so happy, and yada, yada, yada.

What's happening there? Seeing. Thinking. There's a particular mood in the mind. Liking. It's pleasant, or whatever. That's what's occurring. That's the simplicity of awareness. We can be aware of anything. We tend to get lost in the overlay of interpretation.

And that was a simple one. When your knee hurts, the interpretation is quite different. When the person sitting behind you is making a lot of noise and they're ruining your samādhi, the interpretation is quite different. When you were doing really well and suddenly you lost it and you think you're going to scream and go home because you can't bear to be here another minute, the interpretation is quite different. And so the simplicity of awareness is just learning how to recognize the bare experience.

Seeing. Utejāniya talks about seeing a lot, and I've been playing with it more and more. I find when I can be aware of seeing as a process, it somehow just—nothing's always, okay—just clicks my mind into awareness and out of believing interpretation right away.

We see a lot. We use seeing to function. That's fine. But everything we're seeing is a concept. It's useful. We can tell each other apart. We can tell what's going on. We can tell the dining room from the toilet. All that's helpful. We can see. But the actual seeing is when you are aware that you're seeing. Do you get a sense of how that's different from just being in the looking? And then how we forget. So now I bet you're kind of aware that you're seeing, right? Doesn't it feel different? Just a subtle shift, but doesn't it feel different?

There's something different? That's awareness. That's all. That easy. Just practicing over and over.

So I like playing with seeing. It really has been very helpful. It gives you a kind of clue. Oh yeah, that's all it is. That's all it is. Not to change anything. Not to fix anything.

And this is the honesty of mindfulness, of awareness that I talk about. It's just the simplicity of being with it as it is, just as it is. The honesty is: okay, it's like this. And to see how the mind might subtly try to make it a little bit better so it reflects well on me. Even though nobody knows what's going on in your mind, it's like, "Well, this isn't really... I'm not really feeling this selfish and vengeful. There are good reasons for it. It's not really vengeful." But no—this is how it feels right now. That's what's happening. Just honest. Because even vengeful, ugly thoughts are a support for awareness right now. It's just thoughts.

So the simplicity and honesty of awareness is what we're practicing over and over and over. And because the habits of interpretation and reactivity and self-blame are so strong, because our habits of focusing on the object of attention, the object of awareness, are so strong—have you noticed how we just get sucked in? Whether it's seeing or hearing, or definitely with mental experience, with thinking. We start by being aware of sadness, and the next thing we know we're back in the whole story. And then again: oh right, all right, this is sadness. Not to get rid of it, but just to recognize what's happening.

Because those patterns are so strong. We've practiced them our whole lives. And this is the natural law, cause and effect. How many mind moments? Have you noticed how fast the mind moves? How fast things change in your mind? Have you noticed that today? Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, thinking, thinking, thinking, pleasant, unpleasant—so fast. And we can't stop it because that's what life is. That's how it's occurring.

So imagine how many mind moments in our life we've practiced me-ing and wanting and blaming and aversion. That's just what we know, what we learned. We keep trying to put that triangle block in the round hole because that's just what we learned. We kind of don't quite get why it doesn't work.

So that's why the third job of the yogi is this persistence, this continuity, this moment-to-moment quality—that whatever we're doing, whatever activity we're doing, becomes the ground of awareness practice. That's why this schedule: awareness with everything.

And this is only possible—I mean, it's not possible in the beginning anyway—but it's only possible if we're bringing this relaxed, settled-back quality, trusting that we just have to recognize awareness, not trying to create it. If you're trying to create it, you're going to burn out really fast, right? It's just pushing, pushing, wanting. Instead it's like: oh, what's happening now? Awareness. It's been two hours and you haven't been aware. Oh no, I haven't been aware! Well, now I'm aware. Here we are. There's awareness.

When that's the attitude, it's natural. We're just starting to understand how it works moment after moment. Then with this relaxed quality—just whatever's occurring is okay, we're not trying to veer it in another direction—that's when the perseverance, the wise effort, the continuity, the momentum of awareness begins to start coming in of itself. It takes a little time. It really takes some trust, and it takes some patience.

Sayadaw Tejaniya says patience is technically an aspect of metta, of loving-kindness, a wholesome state. It arises from wisdom. But greed, as he points out, is looking for a result. You can be working really hard, trying to be aware, and greed is driving the bus. That's when you're going to flame out. You're really sincere, really trying to be aware so that you feel better or whatever—but it doesn't work. And patience won't really be very accessible, because patience is an aspect of wisdom. Wisdom, that sense of settling back, trusting awareness, and investigating: What are the conditions that support my recognizing awareness? What are the conditions that seem to starve it?

The Buddha used that metaphor a lot—feeding and starving. What feeds wholesome mind states? What feeds the hindrances? What starves the hindrances? What starves wholesome mind states?

So here, really seeing this, we're not here for nine days in a short-term push for some big experience that's going to do it. We're really here to spend nine days and nights practicing recognizing awareness. I know, it's not very exciting. You're not going to be able to show a lot for it. But it really, really deeply shifts and strengthens and changes our habits. It's not that it stays, but we remember. Every time you can remember and trust, that remembrance and trusting becomes available in daily life—because it's not dependent on a certain position or a deep level of concentration, or on having everybody quiet, or on feeling good. It's not dependent on any particular experience.

You may find that the thing that most supports you in remembering awareness tomorrow is taking a walk in the woods—or not the woods, this is Massachusetts, in the fields. Then the next day you say, "Oh, that was really good. That's what supported my awareness, so I'm going to go for a three-hour hike"—which I'm not recommending. You go for a three-hour hike, but you're not really looking at what's supporting awareness. You're back in memory, and you completely blow yourself out.

One of the reasons we have the open schedule is because, as Tejaniya says, it actually allows us and requires of us that we tune into what's going on in our mind and body with wisdom, and see what's feeding recognizing awareness now. So it's not that sitting an hour is somehow better, for example. You may think that sitting an hour is good, but really after half an hour you're filled with pain. The aversion to the pain is so strong that awareness can't really recognize it. You're just spinning, spinning, spinning. So you're sitting there for half an hour feeding aversion. Much more useful to stand up, make yourself comfortable, or go out and do some walking and rediscover balanced awareness. What's supporting your balanced awareness?

Or it may be the reverse. You sit for five minutes and you think, "Oh no, I've got to go walk. That'd be better. Nothing's happening." And you're walking, thinking, "Well no, this isn't really juicy. Let me go sit." And then you start to see, "Oh, this is just wanting, wanting, wanting." So let me just stay in one posture for a while and explore wanting. And that brings in the balanced awareness. You see what I mean?

This is like really making the practice our own, from our own understanding, our own wisdom—and this is what we take into our life with us. Understanding how it works. Understanding and trusting that awareness is to recognize, not to create. That all aspects of the day can be supports for awareness. Not all day every day. It really takes a lot of patience.

So just relax. Relax. Observe. And no matter how long it's been since you remembered awareness, as soon as you remember—

And we're only ever here right now.

So that's the three jobs of the yogi. Right view—it's all nature. Just play with that. Don't force it. Just play with it. It's all nature. Then simplicity and honesty of awareness—mindful attention to whatever's occurring, just as it is. And finally, this persistence, this willingness to keep showing up, to keep remembering.

One last thing I want to say. What really supports this willingness, this persistence—not that we can always access it—is to reset our intention, our motivation. We have to keep remembering, keep retuning into: why the heck am I doing this? Sometimes it's just intellectual, but sometimes we really can reset it.

As I mentioned when taking the refuges, for me that often will do it. I'll remind myself—for me, trusting the Dhamma. Oh yes, this potential, the Buddha, the potential for awakening. Maybe I can't understand the direct link between being aware of knee pain and awakening, but let me trust it. This is why I'm doing this. Or whatever's true for you—I'm not trying to say what your motivation should be.

And then trusting even simply—this is again from Mingyur Rinpoche. He says, in terms of patience and strengthening the intention: we're using our attention to any object of meditation to support recognition of awareness, which is what I've been saying. Since our intention is not to get completely absorbed into any object—so absorbed that we lose touch with everything else—the intention is that whatever's occurring helps us recognize awareness. We'll forget that, we'll get absorbed, and then we'll remember.

This is what I really like, the way he said it. As we set this intention to recognize awareness—why we've been talking about it day and night—every time there's just that moment of setting the intention to recognize awareness, that's all, every time we do this, the mind will start to incline in that direction. It's just natural. And so the steady practice will itself begin to bring about the natural recognition of awareness. That's when the recognition of awareness starts to have momentum.

In the beginning, we have to keep consciously remembering, consciously setting the right intentions to recognize awareness. My intention is to recognize awareness. We forget. We set the intention. But that's inclining the mind. That's changing the kind of rut that it moves in. And it really does start to do itself after a while.

Thank you very much for your kind attention.

CHAPTER 149

Sallatha Sutta: The Dart

Carol Wilson · 54 min

In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson offers a detailed exploration of the Sallatha Sutta (SN 36.6), the Buddha's discourse on the two arrows of suffering. The teaching reveals a profound distinction: while both awakened beings and ordinary people experience pleasant, painful, and neutral feelings (vedanā), the untaught person compounds their suffering by shooting themselves with a second arrow of resistance, grief, and lamentation. Wilson explains how this reactive pattern operates so quickly that we rarely notice the initial feeling tone before we're caught in a tornado of reactivity.

The talk illuminates how our unexamined habits of craving pleasant experiences and resisting unpleasant ones create an underlying worldview that keeps us perpetually dissatisfied—always leaning toward the next moment, never fully at ease with things as they are (yathā bhūta). Wilson shares practical examples, including her own discovery of how a small pain in her toe triggered an entire storm of negativity, and a friend's transformation in relating to difficult family dynamics through sustained awareness practice.

Central to the teaching is the understanding that freedom comes not through an act of personal will, but through wisdom that arises naturally from clear seeing. When we cultivate steady awareness and become interested in the process rather than entranced by each experience, we discover what the Buddha called 'an escape from painful feelings other than enjoying sense happiness.' This escape isn't withdrawal from life, but rather the capacity to experience pleasure and pain without being fettered by them—responding with appropriate compassion and wisdom rather than habitual reactivity.

This morning I was enjoying the discussion and the questions answered with Steve, talking about how the qualities in the citta—I'm going to use citta, meaning mind or heart—the wholesome and the unwholesome, and really how the practice involves the different ways that these habits of greed, confusion, and dosa (the word in Pali that covers the whole range of resistance) are seen through, not acted on, and eventually uprooted or abandoned. These are the three roots, you could say. And this abandoning happens not by an act of personal will, but through wisdom. Wisdom does the work, the ultimate abandoning.

This made me want to talk tonight about a sutta, one of the discourses of the Buddha. It's one I often refer to—I've gone back to it over and over in my own personal practice, and I bring it up frequently in talks. But tonight I wanted to actually use the discourse itself as the main theme. It's called "The Dart," where the Buddha talks about his subtle but accessible discovery, his understanding of how in a moment these habits of mind arise.

The citta, the mind-heart, is changing every moment. There's nothing just sitting there like a lump. Even when we say "the latent tendency" for greed to arise, that it's a seed—that's a way of talking. Because the citta, the mind, heart, mental energy is changing every moment. It's more that there's a propensity, given certain conditions, for something to arise. There's no steady state in that way.

In the sutta, the Buddha is describing how these tendencies arise in the moment, how he's seen it, how then it develops so quickly into habit. This is the second foundation of mindfulness: mindfulness of vedana, of feelings. This is something arising for us every moment, but it's so quick we tend to overlook it. We end up in the tornado of reactivity without quite seeing how we got there. Awareness provides the conditions we cultivate that allow wisdom, clear seeing, to arise.

So the Buddha is really answering the question: What is the distinction, what is the difference that exists between a well-taught noble disciple—that's the translation for an awakened person—and an untaught worldling? I always have trouble with that word "worldling." The word in Pali is puthujjana, which I actually like. Sayadaw U Pandita, who was a great teacher, gave us a series of about fifteen talks in a row on puthujjana. He'd come in and say, "Tonight we will talk about puthujjana"—meaning we were going to be talking about the defilements.

So what's the difference between them? That's an interesting question, something we can look at.

The Buddha says: An untaught worldling, puthujjana, experiences pleasant feelings, experiences painful feelings, and experiences neutral feelings.

Now, just a clarification about why "feelings" is the translation of a specific Pali word. In English, "feelings" is very general—it could mean moods and all kinds of things. But here it's a translation of the Pali word vedana, which means specifically this feeling tone. We tend to say "feeling tone" to distinguish it from moods. It's the quality of pleasant, painful, or neutral that's felt mentally, associated with each moment of sense experience, including mental sense experience.

So when the Buddha says "experience a painful feeling," if there's a sharp stabbing in my leg, there's the stabbing, and the vedana, the mental experience, is the feeling tone. That's what he's talking about. It's subtle—we tend not to see it, as you'll see. But he's saying it's arising with every sense experience; the mind can notice that.

So: an untaught worldling experiences pleasant, painful, and neutral feelings. A well-taught noble disciple likewise experiences pleasant, painful, and neutral feelings.

Already this is uniting something. Somewhere deep down, don't we think the painful feelings are supposed to stop? That's really the essence. He's saying no, they don't.

So what's the difference that exists between an awakened one and an ordinary worldling?

When a puthujjana is touched by a painful bodily feeling, she worries and grieves, laments, beats his breast, weeps, and is distraught. He thus experiences two kinds of painful feelings: a bodily and a mental painful feeling. It is as if a person were pierced by a dart, by an arrow, and following the first piercing—the painful physical feeling—is pierced by a second arrow.

How could this happen? It's similar with the puthujjana. When touched by a painful bodily feeling, she worries and grieves, laments, beats her breast, weeps, and is distraught.

So she experiences two kinds of feelings, a bodily and a mental one. And I want to say also that a mental and emotional unpleasant experience can itself be experienced as pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. The second dart—the grieving and lamenting and beating our breasts—could also arise in response to the first dart being a mental experience, say of sadness or whatever.

Do you get a sense of how quickly that happens? There's something, and it doesn't even have to be very unpleasant—just a little tightness in the body—and the mental feeling of unpleasantness arises really quickly. I've always been in awe of how the Buddha noticed that, and noticed how it's happening all day long, because it's so quick.

Often when we discuss this, people ask, "What's the difference between unpleasant and aversion?" Because of course it's unpleasant, and it moves right into aversion. In case you didn't pick it up: grieving, lamenting, beating the breast—all of that is aversion. And I like that he exaggerates it, because it doesn't just go, "Oh, unpleasant, a little bit resistant." We're off in the tornado! Within no time, without mindfulness, without awareness, we're just off. And many times one thing leads to the next, to the next, and we're way down the road. You couldn't even notice what started this particular storm, what unpleasant feeling triggered it.

Sometimes when I could trace it back, when I'd be on retreat, it would be something so innocuous. I remember one time doing walking meditation, feeling fairly present—I wasn't just spaced out—but suddenly I found myself in a storm of negativity and self-hatred, with all the selective memories of bad things I'd done and people who'd been mean to me. Where did this come from?

I applied what is always the way to wisdom: It feels like this right now. It just feels like this. Just landing in the present with the storm, but with the body. Then I kept walking. And what I saw—this is really true—I had a little pain in my big toe. That was it. A little pain in my big toe that I would feel when I walked. When I was aware of it, you couldn't even call it pain, just a little unpleasant feeling would come and boom—tornado. One thing leads to the next to the next.

That's our problem.

Then the sutta goes on, and this is the part I find very poignant, very subtle and interesting. Having been touched by that painful feeling—the second one—he or she resists and resents it. It's not just that moment of aversion; we resist and resent it. And then, in one who resists and resents painful feeling, an underlying tendency or habit of resistance comes to underlie the citta. The habit of mind and heart tends toward resistance.

Under the impact of that painful feeling, the sutta continues, one then proceeds to look for and enjoy sense happiness. And why? An untaught worldling does not know of any other escape from painful feelings except the enjoyment of sense happiness.

I love this. It's so profound, but so obvious.

Then, in one who enjoys sense happiness—going to it for relief—an underlying tendency, the habit of craving, of lust as the translator says, for pleasant feelings comes to underlie the citta. A lust for pleasant feelings. And so one does not know, according to facts, according to the Dhamma, the laws of nature—one does not know the arising and ending of these feelings. Does not understand the gratification of pleasant feelings, the danger and the escape connected with them. In one who lacks that knowledge, the underlying tendency to ignorance gets going.

This is just so amazing to me, and it's something we can really start to explore. When one with these underlying habits—which have so quickly begun to develop—when one experiences a pleasant feeling, a painful feeling, or a neutral feeling, one feels it as if fettered by it, or bound by it. Another translation says we feel as if joined to it. I would say stuck to it by Velcro. Whether it's pleasant, painful, or neutral—it's like, "This is me," basically.

And such a one is fettered by suffering, the Buddha declares.

So that's our dilemma, as he describes it. I want to talk about it because this—as I'm saying—is giving you information. Many of you, if not all of you, have already experienced this, because it's happening all the time. But when we discuss it, this is the aspect of wisdom: heard wisdom.

I'm describing it, and the Buddha described it, for us not to take it on board as a piece of philosophy—because that doesn't help us—but to take it and look in our own experience. Don't look too hard for something, because that's wanting and it blocks. But when we're just landing in our experience with this open awareness, like I said about that time when I was walking with my foot—"What's happening now?"—I didn't try to analyze and go back. I just, with awareness, surrendered into "right now it's like this." What's going on? And just by seeing it, it can come up, because you have that information. And then the more we see, it moves into the third level of real insight wisdom, where we really do start to understand the gratification, the danger, and the escape in the form of these feelings.

I'll talk about that before I go to the difference with an awakened being, who experiences the same. Well, the difference, of course, is they don't lament and beat their breasts, and they don't shoot themselves with the second arrow, because they understand the nature. I'll get into that more, but I want to talk just a little about this first.

The way the Buddha is describing our moment-to-moment experience here—we've mentioned it before—he's really, in a way, pointing to the six sense experiences: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, and the whole realm of mental experience. Pleasant and unpleasant moods, emotions, thoughts, the conceptual realm, loving-kindness, anger—the entire realm of mental experience. Those things are just happening over and over. That's what we experience all day, right? Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking—over and over. Have you noticed it doesn't stop? Have you noticed how fast stuff occurs? That's just how it's going on.

So each time there's anything, it's experienced as pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. How often do we actually notice that? Even when we're mindful, everything's so fast. It's often not the predominant or observable thing, so don't make yourself crazy always trying to see it. It's often not observable. Because until we even have a sense that this is going on, the way we misunderstand our experience forms in the background our view of ourselves, our view of the world. When we talk about right view and wrong view, this is really how one aspect of wrong view gets formed—pretty much, I would say, with most of us.

So all these things happening, the six senses spinning through all day, every day—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—so often not being noticed. But the inculcated habit! Because we're all of an age where we have spent all of our life, how many times in a day, practicing liking the pleasant, not liking the unpleasant, not noticing the neutral. When you're bored, check out neutrality. Something else needs to happen, and quick! Many times people come in kind of chagrined in an interview and say, "I just noticed that I'm happier to have my mind create suffering than to be calm." It's a little more "me" going on here, even if it's a suffering one.

So we've practiced a lot—to the point that of course we like pleasant. If you had a choice, pleasant or unpleasant, of course you'd choose pleasant. And I don't think the Buddha was saying you can't tell the difference. We can tell the difference. We can keep on telling the difference. But because it seems so joined, the worldview that can get established in the background—and again, don't believe me, I'm just putting this out, but explore and see for yourself—good, right, "the way it's supposed to be," the direction we're all moving: doesn't it head in the pleasant direction? When your practice is working, isn't it pleasant? When something is unpleasant in practice, in life, we tend to think it's wrong or not supposed to happen.

Or when you start getting into—if anyone here ever gets into a little bout of self-judging, which I know very well you do—see if it arose from something pleasant. Yeah? Probably not. Same with doubt. But you may have experienced something like a pleasant physical sensation, and there was a quick thought: "This isn't what's supposed to be happening. I'm not doing it right because I should be experiencing something other." And that thought was unpleasant. And we didn't catch that. It's often the thoughts and the emotions that are really quick that we don't notice, because they're so much more subtle than physical.

So, often unrecognized, but the worldview—that happiness, peace, and ease is associated with pleasant—persists. Moving all the way into liberation, when we talk about freedom of heart and mind and peace, it's hard for me to even think about that without associating it with more pleasant feeling and less unpleasant feeling. No? And so when we experience in our life discontent or unpleasantness or suffering—again, we're not saying we go looking for suffering or that we should hurt ourselves. But we always have to explain even a little bit, because the question arises: "I hurt. Why should I sit with hurting even for a second if I can move and get rid of it?"

It's like asking, "You people are crazy. If I'm restless and I can get up and move, why the heck should I sit with restlessness? What's the point?"

Then we all offer the answer, "Well, when we die, we're going to have to be with it, so we learn now." That's true. It's a way to at least get the person back there practicing. But it's so much more immediate than that. Although, who knows how immediate that other reality is also.

It's so much more immediate because if we don't have the capacity or the interest to sit and be present and see what's really going on, then our responses—out of all the care in our heart to make ourselves happy or to bring happiness to others—are based on misperception or based on wrong view. This is really the sense of it: there's unpleasantness, we move towards pleasant, and that's the only outlet we know.

So it can be as little as feeling restless and going to get a cup of tea. And mind you, we're looking at the process here. I'm not judging or saying there's anything wrong with a cup of tea. The Buddha's not saying pleasant is bad. He's just saying we need to understand how pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral keep changing and cycling around.

But deep down, isn't there that sense that you could just get it a little bit better? A little bit better. And whatever it is, even if we get what we want—we do sometimes, right?—there's not unpleasant, it's pleasant, there's that ease. Do we really stay present and notice how long it lasts? How quickly the pleasant feeling changes?

The tendency is that when one pleasant experience is gone, we don't notice that what happened is a new experience came and that pleasant one went. We think, "Oh, it's gone. I need to get another." So there's that subtle leaning into the next thing. That's really samsara—the sense of just, it could be a little bit better. Even when it's all copacetic, it could be a little bit better. And when it's really unpleasant, we think the problem is in this situation. If I can get rid of this situation, then I'm on the path to happiness.

And conversely, when something isn't working out and you can't change it, there's often a tendency either to get angry or to blame and judge oneself, or to really feel ashamed, or to put the blame outward and spin in more anger. And neutral? We just ignore it.

When we talk about samsara, it's this living in a world of constant change where sometimes it's beautiful, sometimes it's not, where sometimes it's fair, sometimes it's not fair. Sometimes we have what we need. Sometimes everything seems to be going wrong. And we somehow think it should always keep moving in the hopeful, positive direction. And somehow we can control it. So when there's a lot of things going wrong, we tend to judge because we think, "I ought to be able to make this not happen."

This is samsara, and we're stuck to each experience like Velcro. It's pleasant: "Ah, finally, so happy." It's unpleasant: "Oh my God, I'm suffering." It's neutral: "When is life going to actually wake up? When is something good going to happen?"

The Tibetans have a saying I love—that the definition of samsara is the urge to correct.

And it's really like that. It's not always huge. It's just that little urge leaning forward, and not noticing that that's endless when we don't notice. So unexamined.

Some of the effects of this is that it actually feeds the sense of insufficiency, of discontent. There's always that kind of suddenly looking outward, or to the next thing, or away from this thing. Never just totally present, at ease with things as they are.

Things—as someone reminded me, I use this phrase a lot—yathā bhūta, which is a phrase from the Pali that means "things as they have come to be in this moment." You get the moving nature of it. Just in this moment, things as they have come to be couldn't be any different in this moment. And when there's the wisdom, the awareness, it's just like this—without thinking it needs to be corrected or anything. It's just like this. That's what allows the clear seeing, and an appropriate response can come up.

But when there's this sense of glomming to the pleasant, and I'm it, we never can just relax and see clearly. Same with the unpleasant. Always on that little, "what next, what next?" It keeps us always looking—I want to say outward, but it keeps us looking into the object, whether it's so-called inside our own heart and mind or outside. Looking to the experience, looking to the object for peace, for fulfillment, for meaning. And the objects, as we've been saying, are always changing. You put faith in any object for real peace and happiness, and it's gone. But we don't see that.

And so we kind of stay in the thrall. Even when we're sort of present, but we don't see this process—in the thrall when something wonderful happens: "Oh, it's great!" Or something horrible happens: "Oh my God!" And that's when, as I said the other day, life can be exhausting when it's like that. We're trying our best to respond appropriately, but because we don't really see what's going on, we can't. Someone's unhappy here—have some chocolate. I mean, there's nothing wrong with offering somebody chocolate, but it's not really going to take away the grief. So how to be with it in a way that's understanding.

Just to give an example that really works for me—it doesn't work for everybody, but I'll offer it anyway—of seeing how the ups and downs of life, pleasant and unpleasant, immediately follow each other. We take it so completely personal, which we do, and then we so inhabit it. And it can completely change the next minute. We so inhabit that and don't even see what's going on. We don't have the continuity of seeing. We're just in each experience. It's like this. We don't...

So this was a couple of years ago. Probably most of you know—I'm not a football fan—but when the New England Patriots were playing in the Super Bowl. Because I live in New England, I'm more aware. I wasn't watching the Super Bowl, but people said, "Go back and watch the last two minutes." My friends recorded it. So I went back to watch the last two minutes.

Tom Brady is the star quarterback. He's sort of to New England what Steph Curry is here—but not approaching the mania that I am experiencing here around this. It's really wild around the basketball world. So Tom Brady's the star quarterback. In the last two minutes, he and his team had done a really good job, had completed a lot of passes. But now the other team had the ball, and they were ahead, and within two minutes it was clear that they were going to win. There seemed like no way they could lose.

And then the camera cut over to Tom Brady sitting on the sidelines. Never saw a better picture of dejection. I mean, really, he was sitting there, his head was down, just sitting there, so dejected. And then I think the other team was actually on the goal line, and somehow they lost the ball. They turned it over, and the Patriots got the ball and managed to make a touchdown, and they won. This is all in two minutes—a completely wild and unexpected kind of thing. Then they cut to Tom Brady, and he's leaping around like a maniac, waving his arms and grinning.

Someone might say, well, of course he's happy. I'm not saying he shouldn't be happy, or that he shouldn't be sad. It's the totality of each that strikes me—and not seeing that this is the human condition. To me, that's samsara. Then you have to live with all that time in between, the back and the forth. I could just go to the last two minutes, but they had to live with however long that whole game lasted.

So we don't see it. We don't recognize it. We're always caught in looking to the object, the experience, for happiness, for peace.

The next part Joseph discusses is how these habits become underlying tendencies, because we go for the pleasant experience without understanding its coming and going. We don't understand the nature, the gratification, the danger, and the escape.

And this is again from the Buddha: "Before my enlightenment, oh monks, while I was still a bodhisattva"—while he was still practicing to awaken—"it occurred to me: What is the gratification in the world? What is the danger? What is the escape from the world? Then it occurred to me: whatever pleasure and joy there is in the world, this is the gratification."

The pleasure, the joy, the happiness, the pleasant sense feelings—that's the gratification. And I want to emphasize that he's not saying this doesn't exist or that it's bad. Yes, this is the gratification.

What's the danger? That the world is impermanent, that all experience is impermanent. It's all bound up with unreliability, with dissatisfaction, and subject to change. And as someone said the other night, the change is really so momentary. We all see the big changes, but the pleasant feeling is changing so quickly, coming and going, and we don't see that. This holding to the pleasant, the habit, comes because it's going the next and next and next, and we're not really seeing it as it is—how fast it's changing, how totally unreliable any feeling, any experience is.

It's pleasant and there's gratification in the moment, yes. But right away comes that clinging to the pleasant, thinking that's the source of happiness, not seeing the danger.

And the escape is the abandoning of this lust, this desire for the gratification, for the pleasant. This is the escape from the world.

I want to point out: escape from the world—he didn't say that. He said the abandoning of this habit of craving, of lust, is the escape from the suffering in the world. He didn't say the escape from the world is to go in a cave and never have anything to do with anybody. He didn't say that. He didn't say that there's no more gratification in the world. He said the abandoning of the lust. Agreed.

So that's really what Steve was talking about this morning. That is really where freedom comes. And it's not an act of personal will, because it doesn't work. We can try. I think I said the other day, you try all the time: "I'm not going to crave anymore. I really get it. I've heard it. I've read it. I've seen how fast pleasant things change. So I'm giving up believing that that's really the way to happiness." It's something to incline the mind towards.

If it works for you, wonderful—I'd really love to hear it. But the habits are so insidious, and as you see, it happens so quickly.

Abandoning lust for the world does not mean abandoning interest in the world. It doesn't mean abandoning care or compassion or engaged activity. It doesn't mean any of that. Actually, even in a moment—it doesn't have to be the heart-mind completely free forever of greed and aversion—but when there are moments of steady awareness and we can see clearly and wisdom comes, in those moments of wholesome heart-mind, there isn't greed, hatred, or delusion. The response to the moment is going to arise out of beautiful, wholesome states. That's what there's room for when they're not shoved out by wanting, by leaning into the next thing, by avoiding something because it's unpleasant.

So actually, the abandoning—even in a moment—of lust for the pleasant and resistance to the unpleasant is what allows for a more appropriate response. Whether it's compassion or wisdom or equanimity, or just a sense of doing what needs to be done in this moment without any big whoop about it, without resistance, without wanting, without putting it all back to what does it mean about me. Just what needs to happen.

But it's not an act of personal will. Wisdom does the work. Wisdom does the work. It's wisdom, which is a quality in the citta, that arises just like greed—comes and goes, just like greed. So what we can do, and what we are doing, is cultivate the conditions that allow for wisdom to arise more frequently, to grow stronger, so that we can actually begin to cultivate a different habit of mind.

There are many ways to do that. The main one, and the one we're talking about here—you know what I'm going to say, right? It's the long habit of continual awareness. And it really is an amazing thing.

Someone today asked something like, "What wisdom is coming from noticing my foot's asleep?" Fair question. In the moment, it's not like we get this great insight. But every moment of awareness that isn't distorted by these habits is a moment that's allowing for clear seeing. The continuity is necessary because we need to see the process—what I've been describing about pleasant or unpleasant, and to notice that, to notice the reaction, to notice how the reaction spins out of control and leads to more thoughts and feelings, and then how we go for the pleasant. We need a steadiness of awareness to really notice the process.

And the switch that happens, the way wisdom starts to work in our experience, is that we start to get more interested in the process than in our reactions to each individual experience or object. Because our habit is, with each object or experience, we assess it: like it or don't like it, what does it mean about me, what's the effect going to be, what can I do. There's a sense of separateness, of one-one-one. We don't see the big picture. We stay in this separate little reactivity. We stay in "what does it mean about me."

But when we start to see with a steady awareness that begins to build a little momentum, we start to see a process. This is where it's like, "Oh, I see it working. I really see it working"—like that silly example of me and my big toe hurting. I really saw it, and I wasn't expecting anything. Just with awareness, looking: "Oh, look at that." It wasn't about "I have to stop aversion" or "I should fix my big toe" or "How stupid am I that this happened." It was like, "Wow. This is like a natural law. This is how it's working when these habits have been developed—aversion and wanting, greed—without recognizing them." And seeing it function, it's like, "Wow, how cool."

Not expecting that with an act of will we can come in and say, "Okay, now I see it once, it's over." Think how many mind moments we've practiced these other habits in our life. Just think about it in one day.

So in a way, it's kind of encouraging. I'll say it's encouraging. I don't think we need as many moments of awareness and wisdom to cut through, for insight to arise, as we've had moments of delusion and greed and aversion. I really don't think we need that many. That's the power. Wisdom and the wholesome qualities are actually a lot stronger because they reflect the truth of how things are. This other way of functioning is based in confusion and not seeing. So when you see, "Oh wow, look at that, isn't that interesting?"—then I know. I know that that process was true.

You don't have to think about it anymore. That's what we mean when we talk about insight, the quality of insight. We might reflect on it later, but there's this sense of oh. The perception is shifting. You see it in a different way. And seeing—it doesn't have to be visual, I'm just using that word for all perceiving—there's this recognition: Oh, that's what's going on. You just know it.

It's like when a puzzle suddenly shifts—one of those trick-of-the-eye images where you can only see it one way, and then suddenly you see it the other way. Oh. You couldn't see it until you could. And once you can, you can't unsee it. You can fall back into seeing it the other way, but you know it's there. And if someone comes and tells you, "No, you didn't see that," you don't have to get into an argument. But you know. You know.

This is really what the quality of insight is. You can see why we can't create it from an act of will, because that would just be thinking about it. And we don't even know what we're looking for because we haven't recognized it yet. The way it actually reveals itself is so different from what we expect.

So we become more interested in the process rather than entranced by what's going on. This is the shift. This is where awareness, steady awareness, becomes what Ajahn Sumedho calls "an escape hatch"—the way out of samsara.

And now I have to say it again. When I said "the way out of samsara," did somewhere in the back of your mind, not quite articulated, a thought arise: We're not going to have to keep going through all this stuff? The samsara, the difficulty—but the stuff keeps happening.

So this is from Sumedho. He gives a kind of grin and says, "But it's not what we might think it is, the way out of samsara." It doesn't mean this stuff stops. He says that when we really determine in our hearts and minds—when we truly commit ourselves to cultivating awareness in our lives—then something changes. On a retreat like this, if this practice is new to you, it might give you enough of a taste that you want to make that determination. It doesn't mean we make it once and it's over, but there's a sense of reordering our priorities. He talks about this a lot.

When you really determine in yourself to cultivate awareness, then you start using everything that happens in your life—everything that happens, no matter what's occurring—as a way to cultivate awareness. On retreat and off retreat. That's why we structure the practice this way.

Someone today—I won't say who, because I didn't ask permission—said something I really loved, so beautiful. They spoke about having this determination and working with it in life, deciding to take some classes in a kind of craft they're not particularly good at. And just watching the whole process of trying to do, and doing or not being able to do, all the reactions that arise in the mind. The whole thing is held in the light of awareness—just watching what the mind is doing, being present with that entire process.

But the difference between being with a process and being with a process with awareness is that the Velcro isn't there. You might be jumping up and down with excitement or feeling really dejected, but there's this knowing: Oh yeah, I think this is going to make me happy. How long was Tom Brady happy from his Super Bowl win? Then there was this whole football deflating situation, and he's being sued—I mean, something always happens. That's how life is.

And Ajahn Sumedho is saying it's not that we create some ideal state through the continuity of awareness. He says that awakening out of delusion, we find ourselves in reality as it is—yathā bhūta, reality as it's come to be in this moment.

And again, the real isn't what you're expecting. Life is fair and unfair. There's pleasure and pain. There's success and failure. There are horrible things and beautiful things. That doesn't stop happening. It doesn't go away.

What changes? Back to the sutta. What changes is our understanding, and the understanding changes our response.

So the well-taught noble disciple does not beat his breast and weep when touched by a painful feeling. She experiences one kind of feeling—a bodily one—but not a mental feeling, as if pierced by a dart but not hit by a second dart. So having been touched by that painful feeling, she does not resist and resent it.

Can you imagine that? That's why we practice just being with little pains, being with restlessness, being with something that's unpleasant but not killing you. To see that it's really possible to be totally present without resisting and resenting it. Without needing to move away to go to something pleasant. And then when you're really clear about that, you can eat the shrimp. But it helps to be clear about that first. If you eat the shrimp before you're clear about it, we don't learn. That's where the awareness comes in.

So under the impact of that painful feeling, she does not proceed, does not need to go looking for sense happiness. Why not? Because a well-taught disciple knows of an escape from painful feelings other than by enjoying sense happiness.

To me, that's the most profound statement here. We know, even just for a moment, we know there's an escape from painful feelings other than just needing to enjoy sense happiness. This not knowing that there's any other way out of unpleasant than to go for sense happiness is so poignant to me. I mean, look at the world. I don't have to say much else. Look at the world and this sense that we have to get more to be happy. And those people who are born into a situation where they can't get more, where there's really a lot more of unpleasant than pleasant—we think, well, a lot of compassion if we can be present, but kind of like it's hopeless for them. But it's not hopeless for us when things really go wrong. To see that there's another way out of that suffering.

She knows. So there's no underlying tendency to lust for pleasant feelings. That doesn't get developed. Because she knows, she understands according to facts the arising and ending of those pleasant feelings. It comes and goes. You know that. And the gratification, the danger, and the escape connected with these pleasant feelings. And so when she experiences a pleasant feeling, a painful feeling, or a neutral feeling, she feels it as one who is not bound by it, as one who is not joined to it, as one who is not fettered by it. Such a one, oh monks, is called a well-taught noble disciple who is not fettered to suffering. This I declare.

That's really one way of looking at what we're practicing. So what does that mean—to experience it without being bound to it, but we still experience it and we're not fettered by suffering? It's really this long continuous awareness that allows that to happen. The situation may stay just the same. But the unfetteredness, the freedom, is in the completely different response that arises from wisdom, not because we think we should.

So I'll give you an example from a good friend of mine who's given me permission to use this. She's been practicing in the Dharma for many, many years. We're close friends. Both her parents are dead now, but her parents lived in Texas. She had always had a difficult relationship with the family, but she was close. She'd go home every year and visit her parents and her siblings. And it was always a bit fraught. Not horrible, but normal fraught. Difficult.

But she said every time she'd go home—just as Steve or someone was saying here, if you think you're enlightened, go home and see what responses, what reactions come up. She said every time she'd go there, on the plane on the way, she'd think: I'm going to act from mettā. I'm going to be really kind. I'm not going to be triggered.

Does it sound familiar? Have you ever done that?

As soon as she walked in the door—boom. She was the most reactive she'd ever been. And she'd wonder, why? She's making all these efforts, but it's not an act of will.

So we're talking over years. She started practicing really looking at the steady awareness and observing what's arising in the citta in any moment. Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—vedana—what's the response? We notice when there's anger, we notice when there's greed, we notice when there's love. It starts to become a habit. And this is the awareness getting momentum. It's not some great state. It's not based on a kind of structured concentration that goes away at the end of a retreat. That's why it doesn't feel so special right now. But it starts to creep in, and we know it is from talking to you all. You're still wanting some juicy steak you're not going to get, so you don't quite trust this yet.

So anyway, she'd done a retreat like this, and she's going home on the plane. She said, okay, I'll just keep practicing, just watching my mind. That's all—just the awareness watching my mind. Rather than make this commitment that she was going to be the perfect daughter when she walked in the door.

So she's on the plane watching her mind, just being mellow about it. She had a wait in the airport, so she went over in a corner and did a little walking meditation, just watching her mind. But then she noticed, on the plane watching her mind, that this kind of reactivity—not just resistance, but a little aggressiveness—was there in her own mind. Her mind was thinking, well, when I walk in, my sister is going to do this and this and that, and I'm not going to put up with that. And she goes, oh wow. So actually, I'm walking in the door with negativity, ready for a fight. And I had no clue because I was saying I'll be peaceful, I'll be loving, I'll be happy—but not with awareness, not seeing what was really there.

So she kept on being aware. She said, oh wow, look at that. Not "oh, you're so bad"—just "oh, look at that." And so she just kept watching. She walked in. She was aware of that. Her sister did whatever.

She said it was the best visit she ever had, because she was just interested in the process. And what happens with the clear seeing is the wisdom kicks in. She actually responded with much more openness, much more acceptance, because she wasn't blocking what was going on in her own resistance—she was aware of it. When her sister did do the things she always did, my friend was already aware of her own resistance, and wisdom said, yeah, you don't need to act from it. It doesn't have to drive the bus. And she was actually able to be—not even able, it just happened by itself.

That's what we mean when we say wisdom does the work. Our work is really getting interested in the process. And that's what Ajahn Sumedho means by stepping out of samsara. The same stuff's going on. The Velcro isn't there. The wisdom, just from seeing how things are, is all we need to do.

That's what I love about Right View. Once there's a real recognizing accurately, the way that craving is abandoned—it's not like, oh my God, I have to give it up. It stops making sense. When you see, oh, I really want this pleasant feeling to last, and you can watch it evaporate and you're aware, it doesn't make any sense because craving is uncomfortable. We don't like to be with it. It's like, oh yeah, craving doesn't make sense—poof, it goes away.

When she walks in and her sister's starting in her reactive mode, but she knows her sister really had a lot of suffering. And when she was aware of her own reactivity and not reacting to it, getting angry at her sister didn't make any sense. Because when you can see the suffering in someone, what naturally comes is compassion—when we're not caught. You don't have to think about it. I mean, we can cultivate it in other ways, but in this way, the wisdom does the work.

So when we think about, oh my God, I have to give up craving and attachment to all the beautiful things—that's what we hear, isn't it? Giving up attachment, giving up lust for the beautiful things in the world. We think that means giving the things up. But it's all still happening. Giving up the craving is like the hugest freedom, relief.

And we can't do it because an act of will is usually coming from me wanting something different. Duh. Wisdom's like, "Oh, it's like this. Craving doesn't make any sense." Boom. It's gone.

Play with it in little ways, not in big ways. Then it'll come in the big ways.

And then we see, as I said before, when the craving, the aversion, these habits are abandoned, it doesn't mean that one necessarily just becomes quiescent, just lives a quiet life. One is as active as one's personality ever wanted to be—with more being in sync with what's really going on, responding in a much more appropriate way.

The Buddha says this really beautifully. I want to end with this. Someone asks, "In what way is one a wise person of great wisdom?" And he says it's many different ways. This one just suits my talk.

"In what way is one a wise person of great wisdom?" He says, "Such a person does not intend"—so that's the citta in movement, the intention, the wanting—"does not intend for his own affliction or for the affliction of others or of both." So we don't have any arising of wanting to do something to harm ourselves or others. "Rather, when a wise person thinks, she thinks only of her own welfare"—and notice, your own welfare is included; we're all equal—"thinks only of her own welfare, of the welfare of others, the welfare of both, and the welfare of the whole world. It is in this way that one is a wise person of great wisdom."

So just by getting interested in the process, see what kind of... if it comes up, you're making a commitment to awareness, and just gently watching, this wisdom arises quite naturally. And from seeing such a little thing as pleasant feeling come and go. Like someone said—I think Alexis said—with one thread, the whole dharma is attached.

So play with it. Play with it over the days. Don't make a big deal about it, but it's really one of the keys in to recognizing reality and freedom.

Thank you for listening to the dharma.

CHAPTER 150

Wisdom Shines Through Our Actions: The Buddha

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines the second factor of the Noble Eightfold Path—sammā saṅkappa (right intention or wise motivation)—and how wisdom manifests through our actions. Drawing from the Buddha's teaching that "a wise person is characterized by his or her actions," she explores how the quality present in the heart-mind at the moment of action determines whether that action leads to suffering or liberation.
> Wilson references the Dvedhāvitakka Sutta (MN 19), where the Buddha describes his pre-awakening practice of observing how thoughts imbued with sense desire, ill-will, and harmfulness naturally subsided through steady awareness, while thoughts of renunciation, non-ill-will (mettā), and compassion arose without causing affliction. She emphasizes that this transformation happens naturally through wisdom rather than through acts of personal will—"superficial wisdom" cannot overcome "real and deep kilesa."
> The talk offers practical guidance for recognizing wholesome states with the same attentiveness we bring to unwholesome ones. Wilson reframes renunciation not as grim self-denial but as the spacious joy that arises when clinging falls away. She describes mettā as simply "the ability to witness the unpleasant without creating anything around it." Through personal stories and teachings from the Dalai Lama, Martin Luther King Jr., and contemporary teachers, she illustrates how shifts in internal motivation—even without external action—can transform our relationship to situations and others, connecting individual practice to broader questions of human rights and compassionate action in the world.

The first moment of launching out into the silence always feels really strange to me, and then it gets going.

What I want to talk about tonight—the general theme—is that we've been talking so much about the steadiness of awareness and the importance of continuing steady awareness with wisdom to recognize all the conditioning, all the habits of mind that cause suffering. Of course, I'll have to include that; don't think you're getting away without it. But what I want to emphasize more tonight is how that wisdom feeds and strengthens wholesome states. I want to mention a few ways this actually occurs—there are many ways—and really as a way of encouraging and emphasizing the recognition of wholesome states with awareness as well.

Theoretically, this shouldn't be necessary, since you're all committed from morning to night to steady awareness, noticing everything that arises and passes. So you equally notice the wholesome with the unwholesome, correct? No. Once a day there's a wholesome state, and the rest of the day—that's about how it is. I noticed.

So here's the focus. A couple of reasons I want to mention this. One is what I just said: because we talk so much and really start to explore the suffering habits that arise in the citta, in the heart, which is essential, sometimes it actually happens that even though we've been resisting them forever, our habit of mind in retreat gets a little too focused in one direction. We get into another habit of mind that just doesn't quite recognize the wholesome or bring full awareness into it and inhabit it with the same confidence with which we inhabit greed and hatred. We may not have the same trust or the same personal feeling that it's mine, but we need to recognize it.

Another thing is that sometimes on retreat, at different times, people feel that we're getting so involved in all the minutia, all the little stuff, that it seems to feed just this obsession with me, me, me—my stories, my this and my that. It just seems like I'm more self-involved than ever. And another kind of doubt that can come up at times is: this is great, I'm really learning a lot, but it seems so subtle and esoteric, so supported by the silence and separateness of retreat—what does it have to do with daily life? Noticing the little subtle movements of greed when I look at the person walking next to me, what does that have to do with daily life?

The answer, of course, is everything.

So those are perhaps some reasons I'm planting in the mind. What I talk about may or may not have anything to do with you, but I'm thinking it does.

What I really want to talk about is right view. Wise understanding is the first step in the Noble Eightfold Path. The Buddha's fourth of the Four Noble Truths describes the way of living, the way of practice to cultivate and deepen awareness, wisdom, right view. We've talked about that, right? You've noticed we talked about that.

The second step of the Eightfold Path is sammā saṅkappa, which is variously translated as right thought, right intention, right motivation. We've been talking about noticing the motivation, that impulse in the heart and mind before moving. That's really what I want to talk about tonight: sammā saṅkappa, right intention, right motivation.

This is from the Dalai Lama. A few people have also been expressing something along the lines of—nobody actually said this exactly, but this is my point—wondering whether this approach is really enough, or whether it's just something Sayadaw U Tejaniya made up. So just to say, it's not like this is completely separate or doesn't align with what other great Buddhist teachers say. The Dalai Lama puts it this way: Buddhism essentially consists of two things—the view, which means a definitive understanding of the interdependence of all things, and action, which can be loosely defined as non-violence. The view and action.

The second step of the Eightfold Path—wise thought, wise motivation—is the key, the impulse, the link to action: right speech, right action, right livelihood, which are the next steps in the path. So this intention is crucial. It's key.

The Buddha was very clear. I think I read a similar quotation in one of my other talks. The awakened mind, the awakened heart shows up and manifests in our actions. This is from the Buddha: "A fool is characterized by his or her actions. A wise person is characterized by his or her actions. It is through the activities of one's life that one's wisdom, one's discernment, shines." He says this over and over. Our actions are the inevitable effect, the result, the manifestation of whatever quality, whatever attitude is in the mind in the moment that impulse to speak or act arises. This is extremely clear.

And so it is a profound aspiration, I feel, to even begin to hold the aspiration to really purify, to transform the habits of our heart and mind, the habits of consciousness—those habits that, unrecognized and unthinking, keep leading us into wanting and aversion and more confusion and suffering. It's a profound and, to me, really beautiful aspiration.

But we can't do it as an act of personal will. We've said that many times, because what do we know? How do we know to act from? We don't quite tune into the awareness. We try to get rid of greed by aversion. We try to get rid of aversion by greed—"Let me feel loving kindness." We're thinking, we're trying to think our way in, and we may mean well. But we don't know what's going on. We don't have the tools. It's not something we can just personally wish into being.

This is where the key lies—this second step, this understanding of how to recognize motivation and what attitude in the mind colors our actions. That's what we've been training in. But what's really quite wonderful is that in the light of wisdom, in the light of steady awareness, as wisdom develops, the natural effect of that wisdom is that these unwholesome habits begin to naturally transform. I'll speak to the specifics that the Buddha addresses in Samma Sankappa, but it's remarkable. It really is.

You've all seen now how when we don't recognize what particular quality in the mind—the kilesas, the unwholesome habits, or as Steve was saying the other night, the dangerous habits—when we don't recognize their presence, they drive the bus. Sometimes even when we do recognize them, they still drive. But at least awareness is going along, and that's a significant difference, which I'll get to in a moment.

Even with good intentions, even when we have a really clear sense—"I want to be more kind," or "I'm not going to eat this harmful food"—we really mean it. We're totally sincere, and we absolutely can't do it. We don't know why.

I remember in one group with U Tejaniya some years ago, there was a perfect description. A woman, a long-term meditator, had a certain food she was really allergic to. It wasn't just that she didn't want it—she liked it. She was coming into the dining room at the meditation center in Barre, which has a big blackboard announcing what the meal will be. She came in, saw that food listed, and noticed the wanting arise. Her mind said, "No, I'm not going to eat this, out of compassion for myself." So that's wisdom, she thought. But then, she said, she went and sat down and took it and ate it.

So she asked U Tejaniya, "How come? There was this wisdom, but I didn't act on it."

And he said in his way, "Well, superficial wisdom, real and deep kilesa."

It's like that, right? That moment of wisdom—"I'm not going to do it because it's harmful to me"—that is a moment of wisdom. A moment. That's the key here. Mind moments are arising and passing really quickly. Without recognizing this, we think, "Oh, I'm not going to do it," and we stop looking. Hence the emphasis on steadiness of awareness. We don't notice all the moments of greed that are running the show. I guess you can relate. People don't laugh if they can't relate.

That's why it takes a real kind of seeing that is helpful—seeing all the different things in ourselves and in life. For me at least, if you don't go drown in self-judgment, which is of course just flipping to aversion, you can really say, "Oh wow, look how strong this habit is. Let me recommit to awareness." Of course, that requires some sense of verified faith, some sense of confidence that this work actually leads somewhere.

The key is in recognizing what's the motivation for action. As the Buddha said in the Dhammapada, that famous verse at the very beginning: "Mind is the forerunner of all things. Speak or act with an impure mind and suffering follows you like the wheel follows the hoof of the ox that draws the cart. Mind is the forerunner of all things. Speak or act with a pure mind and happiness follows like a shadow that never leaves you."

The key here is that mind is the forerunner of all things. And so when the Buddha speaks about this impulse of intention, cetanā, it's really like an impulse that leads to speech and action, and we can notice it arising. Often we just feel the impulse and notice the thought—like this friend thinking, "I want to not eat this"—without noticing, because it can be subtle, all the impulses and the wanting, the greed that was coming with those impulses.

As the Buddha describes what makes action wholesome or unwholesome, our tendency is to evaluate it by the result. Or by how it looks, or whether it got what it wanted. But this is absolutely not the case in terms of the way the Buddha understands the world and what's really supportive for us to see. Both the qualities of the pure heart and mind and how they manifest, and how the impure manifests—the intention is really the heart, the seed of action. It's the quality that's together with that impulse in the heart and mind in a particular moment that motivates the action.

The exact same action, looking from the outside, could be motivated by a whole slew of different things. Because when you look at it, we don't actually control the results of action, do we? We could do something that really, if you tune in, is felt from kindness. We're really trying to help someone, but we don't have the big picture. So maybe there's been delusion. We projected some whole story onto how unhappy that person is that wasn't true at all to begin with. That's big delusion. But maybe we even saw something accurately and tried to help, yet what they really needed was just to be left alone. That kind of thing is simple enough.

I use speaking as an example often, because say you have something a little difficult to communicate to someone, but you're not doing it in anger. When you're clear, you get in touch with this sense of caring, of kindness, because you know this little thing they do is really bringing a lot of negativity their way from other people, and you want to help them. Well, you can already surmise the various kinds of motivations and intentions that could give rise to the exact same words.

So if you're really clear with yourself, you could do it quite from loving-kindness. But you didn't check out what was going on with them, and they just staggered home from the end of a most stressful day. They're at the end of their rope, and you decide to give them this really loving feedback, and they're just not able to hear it. That's a kind of not getting the big picture. Or perhaps we've practiced being loving, but in the moment, that's not really what's happening. "Let me tell you this for your own good and for the good of all beings"—and various other things. The words are the same. But how it's received, even when you do it with loving-kindness and it seems like an appropriate time, is completely out of our control or even knowledge. We don't know how that person is going to hear it, how they're going to receive it.

So as the Buddha said, the key, the heart of action, of intention, of motivation, is the quality in the heart-mind that the action is springing from. And this is the place that is so cool, what I was talking about—because in the light of steady awareness that allows wisdom to recognize accurately what's going on, which is what we've been doing, the motivations begin to naturally transform. This is what the Buddha called sammā-saṅkappa.

In particular, he mentions that the motivation or thought of sense desire, of greed, transforms to the motivation of renunciation, and from that to generosity. That of ill-will transforms to mettā, to friendliness. And cruelty, another aspect of hatred, transforms to compassion.

You'll notice he doesn't say thoughts of delusion transform to wisdom, because as we've said before, that's not a matter of personal intention or thought. That's a matter of long, clear seeing that allows for wisdom to arise. But these are plenty to work with in terms of wholesomeness and really experiencing consciously the happiness of it.

So of course we start with the steady awareness that notices how, and how frequently, the unwholesome, the difficult habits of mind are kind of the fallback mode. And how, sometimes really obviously but sometimes quite subtly or suddenly, they can become the motivation for action.

Sometimes what really inspires me to keep having the willingness to open to this, to look at it with interest—not with "Oh my god, more aversion," but with genuine curiosity, really wanting to see it—I may have mentioned this in one group. I was on a retreat a while ago doing some walking meditation in a pretty calm, clear state. I wasn't feeling a lot of aversion. The mind was calm, there was quite some wisdom, some happiness, all of that.

And just then some thought came into my mind, thinking about some email I was going to answer and what I would say—a little funny answer—and it went on. But then I thought, wait a minute. And I saw in that little funny answer that had come up, which I could just dismiss as nothing, no suffering, gone on to the next thing, calm—but in that little funny answer there was just the teensiest bit of aversion. Because humor definitely can carry that, and I'm from New York so it's even more so. But it wasn't really harmful or anything. It was just a little tweak of aversion, and then gone.

I could see my mind go, "Well, that's okay. That's no big deal. It's not hurting anyone." And I thought, wait a minute. It's not a big deal, but the more we practice, the more the steadiness of awareness comes, the more the wisdom comes, the less it's okay. And this wasn't an aversive judgment. This was actually inspirational to me. Oh, okay—that's the aversion I really want to see. When aversion arises in the mind, when greed arises in the mind—because for me, it's my aspiration—it's not okay, really.

It's okay, it's a little bit aversive, and maybe they even missed it, they won't even know, they'll think it's funny too. But I can feel—you can feel. You know, we're learning how to feel how aversion feels: that separation, that contraction. Same with greed. Same with delusion. You start to feel it.

Really, the danger of it is that it blocks freedom. The danger isn't just that it doesn't feel good. The danger is that even subtle aversion—one can't see, as the Buddha said, with aversion one's own good or the good of another or the good of both. One doesn't recognize the pure nature of heart-mind with even the littlest bit.

But to look in that way needs to come with balanced awareness, not when you're already spinning in self-hatred, right? I think you get a sense of what I mean, and it was inspiring to me. It's like: right, keep going, kid, keep going. It's not just settling for good enough.

So that's one way I get inspired. Another way is just from noticing other little ways it comes up. If I'm walking in the city and I see a homeless person begging and I go in the other direction because I feel awkward, I let myself feel that. Let myself feel it. And then, just like here, you go or you don't go, you do whatever you do, but you bring awareness along with you. You bring it along with you.

Or paying attention to things in the world, to people in the world. I've used this in talks before, but on the radio three or four years ago, I came in the middle of some interview on public radio. I didn't even know who they were talking to. But it was somebody who was doing some kind of social research in prisons and had been talking to young men—young men in long-term incarceration for violent crimes. I didn't know any more details than that. But the person interviewed was describing one interview he'd had with a young man who was in for some very serious violent crime, very young, and in for life basically. And he said—the guy in prison said—"I just wish I had back that five to ten seconds where..." basically the greed or the—he didn't say it quite in our language—"I wish I had back that five to ten seconds where I did that violent act."

And that just struck me, because we all know how, even when we have quite some tuning in to what are the habits in our mind, given the conditions—and we haven't been paying attention, or something strong enough triggers us—boom, they just can come shooting up. And without enough self-knowledge, without enough care in the mind in terms of our behavior and action, without recognizing motivations, five or ten seconds is enough to ruin yours and somebody else's life. So stuff like that will really re-motivate me. And you can see it anywhere. You can see it anywhere.

This is where we start to see for ourselves: what do we really trust? Again, we've said this a lot—what is your refuge? For that young man, whatever was going on, anger, violence seemed like the only safe response, the only refuge, because of what had been practiced.

So here, starting to recognize—we've been talking about awareness as a refuge—but now I want to talk about the three wise intentions, motivations. Because as we learn to feel and recognize them, see how they arise, know how they feel, inhabit them just as fully as we inhabit the unwholesome qualities, this will also strengthen the wisdom, which will strengthen the confidence, the faith, which gives us the energy and the willingness to keep on being mindful and stabilize the mind—and it strengthens wisdom. Those are the five spiritual faculties that Steve's going to talk about, so I'm not going to say much more about them.

These three naturally transform in the light of steady wisdom and awareness. Let me read from the Buddha. Here he's talking about before his self-awakening, when he was still an unawakened bodhisattva. I love that there are not that many suttas where he's talking about what his mind was like before he was awakened. It's still pretty far along, okay? But anyway, this is a very famous sutta, the Two Sorts of Thinking. I'll just read a few lines of it.

He says: "As I was practicing, as I remained heedful, a way of mindfulness aware, ardent, energized, and resolute, thinking filled with sense desire arose in me. I discerned that this had arisen in me." Just mindfulness, right? You don't go, "Oh my God, thinking with sense desire, what am I going to do?" No—"I discerned that thinking with sense desire had arisen in me. I saw that it leads to my own affliction. As I noticed it leads to my own affliction, it subsided. As I noticed that it leads to the affliction of others, it subsided. As I noticed that it leads to the affliction of both, it subsided. As I noticed it obstructs discernment"—which is the word he's using here for wisdom—"it promotes vexation and it does not lead to liberation—it subsided. It subsided."

He's just doing what we're doing. Watching it. Seeing how it functions. It promotes vexation.

It leads to my own affliction and the affliction of others. He's seeing that in himself, and through the steady awareness, it subsides.

The same with thinking imbued with ill will arose in me—exactly the same thing. Thinking imbued with harmfulness arose in me—exactly the same thing.

And then he said, as he kept on, whatever a person keeps pursuing with their thinking and pondering, that becomes the inclination of their awareness. So we've seen that. That's the habit. Think about it all the time. It's like a rut—a rut in emptiness. I don't know where the rut is, but somehow it keeps feeding. That's what arises. It gets easy.

So if one keeps pursuing thinking—and by thinking here it's also motivation leading to action—imbued with sense desire, that's how it's going to go. With ill will, with harmfulness, that's going to be the easy response that leads to speech and action.

Then he goes, "As I remained thus heedful, ardent, and resolute, thinking imbued with renunciation arose in me. I discerned that this had arisen in me and that it leads neither to my own affliction, nor to the affliction of others, nor to the affliction of both. It fosters wisdom, discernment, clear seeing. It promotes lack of vexation and it leads to liberation. If I were to think and ponder in line with that renunciation, even for a night, even for a day, even for a day and a night, I do not envision any danger that would come from it, except that thinking and pondering a long time would tire the body." He's like, just totally, this is just what happens. "When the body is tired, the mind is disturbed. And a disturbed mind is far from collectedness, far from steadiness. So I steadied my mind right within, settled, unified, and concentrated it." Why is that? "So my mind would not be disturbed."

So he's really looking in the same way at thoughts of non-ill will, or metta, and thoughts of harmlessness, or compassion. Really just exploring them equally with steady awareness and seeing they don't lead to harm for me or another or both. They don't cause vexation. They don't block wisdom. Not a theory, but watching it in his own mind and heart.

And in the seeing of that—this is what's called the wisdom of seeing—oh, this is how the harmful ones act, leading to vexation. As I kept on noticing, as I kept on looking, they subsided. And you've all seen that sometimes. Then we assume it should always subside immediately. That's extra. But seeing how, through the steady awareness, the unwholesome is not being fed.

It may have a momentum and keep going. There are times when it's kind of half equal because the mind moves so fast, like when we act from the greed but bring awareness along. The motivation is kind of flipping back and forth between greed and awareness, greed and awareness, but because the mind moves so quickly. But as the awareness gets stronger and the wisdom stronger, the kilesa actually subsides in that moment.

And the reverse is also true. As awareness is really aware of non-clinging—let's say that for renunciation, or generosity, or metta, or friendliness, or non-ill will—the awareness of it, the wisdom that seeing that it causes no harm, actually feeds the wholesome. We don't have to think, "Oh, here this is, let me hold on to it, let me whip it up, let me get it stronger." We can really trust that through the steadiness of recognition of awareness.

It's like Guy Armstrong likes to say, the way he thinks of it, it's a beneficent universe. When I first heard him say it, I thought, "What, a beneficent universe? You look around?" But he said, no, because this is the laws of how it works. When you notice the wholesome with awareness, with wisdom, that naturally feeds it. When there's wisdom in the heart and mind, these unskillful motivations naturally begin to transform. It's not an act of will.

So this is really a wonderful thing. That's why I want to talk a bit about where that came from. One way it happens, as I just described from the Buddha, is just by steady awareness. We see this causes suffering, and the transformation is the wise mind goes, "Yeah," and just puts it down. This doesn't make sense.

When we really see that clinging is causing suffering in a particular situation, like holding a hot potato, you don't have to think about it. Should I put it down?

I mean, the trick is not to throw it with aversion. The trick is, "Oh yeah, let me just put that down." It's like that.

But another thing I want to explore—this is how I look at it too—is what allows for the clear seeing to come, for these kleshas to kind of drop away. It's that the wholesome, the beautiful qualities of renunciation, loving-kindness, compassion—these are qualities that can really arise from a broad, inclusive awareness. I'll talk about renunciation in a moment, because you may not think of that right away as a beautiful quality, as a happy quality. But that's because we don't understand what it really is.

When we're still caught in what Lama called the narrow bandwidth of "it's all about me," we may have the thought, "I want to do compassionate action," but we really can't see much beyond our nose. We want to do it and we think we want to do it, but that's when we can't. We can't really see what's clear. We can't really get a broad, more accurate perception. But just widening the perception to take in the whole show—it changes everything.

This again from the Dalai Lama, part of that same quotation. He's talking about universal interdependence, which is a way of saying not separate "me-self," just all arising experience: "Since we are all dependent on each other, and all other beings want to be happy and not suffer just as I do, my personal happiness and suffering are inextricably linked with those of others."

In other words, there's no way we can act out of greed and hatred without affecting others as well as ourselves—just as the Buddha said, the affliction of ourselves, the affliction of others. And seeing that, this narrow bandwidth opens up. Even if you're not acting, but the motivation shifts, it can shift the whole picture.

Let me tell you a little story—really a non-doing story, but just a shift of inner motivation. A long, long time ago, too long ago, I was traveling by myself on an overnight train in India. I had a sleeping berth, but not a private one—second or third class. So I had a berth, which is just like a shelf, with three other berths in that same little compartment. But I hadn't thought to get the ladies' car. So it was me and three guys on this berth.

I didn't feel totally comfortable. I mean, there were a million other people on the train—you're definitely not isolated. And in the daytime, there were people everywhere. But then they all leave, and it's just me and these three guys. They were just lying there. They weren't bothering me at all. But every culture has different ways that are appropriate. Lying there staring at me isn't really rude there, whereas here, if they're all lying staring at me—well, you know.

So I was extremely self-conscious and a bit aversive. I just turned to the wall, but I really felt impinged upon. Not scared—I knew nothing was going to happen—but I was aversive and felt impinged upon. "Me, and they should leave me alone, and my space, and blah, they're in my space."

I was like that for a bit of the night. And then at some point, somewhere, something in my mind shifted and I said, "Okay, this is our space. We're all just here." That was all. But it was a real shift—that thought was coming out of a shift in motivation rather than saying it and trying to rationalize and pretend that I really felt different. You can try that. Sometimes you can talk yourself into it, but usually not.

Anyway, I thought, "Okay, it's our space." That's all I did. I just kept on lying there. We got up in the morning, and of course their whole families came in, and suddenly there were twenty-five of us there in the car. But I hadn't said a word. I hadn't been like, "So it's our space, we're all one, let's shake hands." I hadn't spoken to anybody at all. But the whole motivation in my heart and mind had changed.

So they brought in their families, they got really friendly—where they hadn't spoken to me before either. And they were buying me little sweets when we stopped at the stations and giving me chai. The whole thing was a completely different experience. It was really such an interesting lesson.

So it's a natural occurrence. Not like I was doing something to be good friends with these people or making any effort. They just felt the difference. We're all connected, you know. You lie there emanating aversion—it's not a secret.

So really we start to see from this the interconnectedness. And this again strengthens these wise motivations, sammā saṅkappa.

I want to say a little bit about each, because each one could be a huge talk, but I want to touch on each briefly. Hopefully you can recognize when they're arising in your experience, because they are. They're not some incredibly esoteric thing. But do notice them just as much as you notice the others.

Renunciation might be the one that is most not recognized, or not quite recognized, as the really happy state of heart-mind it is as a motivation. Remember, the motivation is about what's occurring in the citta, not about the outward appearance.

We often tend to think of renunciation as a grim giving up of something we want. So we still have the greed and we're giving it up in order to better ourselves—which could be one way, but there's suffering in it because we're losing something we love. You kind of think of it as harsh and grim.

But the intention of renunciation, when it arises in a moment in the citta, is the abandoning in that moment of the clinging, which is actually an experience of spacious joy and ease and peace. And it's not about how much stuff we do or don't have.

Someone said to U Tejaniya once in a group, kind of idealizing, "When you left your lay life to become a monk, it must have been such a renunciation. Now there's so little craving. You have so few things." He won't put up with stuff like that for a minute. He said, "Yeah, all the craving for all the ten thousand things—the same amount of craving gets narrowed down into two objects: food and robes."

He's really saying it's not the amount of objects, it's the amount of craving in the heart-mind. So really look at that and see. But notice here, in the times when the craving is put down, notice the space that opens up. Notice the joy that leaves. And as one does live a simple life, if that's what one does—that's not what it has to be—but real renunciation is a kind of simplicity that comes from genuine joy and happiness and ease. If you're renouncing and wearing a hair shirt, filled with aversion and grimness, that's not sammā saṅkappa. That's aversion and grimness. So it's really looking to see.

Explore this. Quite a few people have mentioned the dining room as apparently a wonderful place for insight. I've had similar experiences, like the example I just gave. People in different ways have really enjoyed playing with noticing how craving comes up around any particular kind of food—whether they thought they shouldn't have it, like the woman in my example, or they thought they should only have one helping instead of five, or whatever it is. Watching how the craving came up and all the different responses.

First there's that joy. This isn't renunciation yet. This is the joy, a kind of wisdom in the steady awareness of just watching how it's working. And having the permission to go get the food or not go get the food takes the pressure off and lets you really explore.

But then there are times when you hold yourself back, you don't go get it, but there's that tightness. It's a working towards renunciation, but you can still see there's the wanting, the tightness. You're like, "What are you talking about? This is a real joyful thing? I don't think so."

And then there can be a moment when naturally the craving just falls away. You think, "Well, I just don't want that." Notice that. A lot of the time when the craving falls away, we move on to the next thing. But inhabit with awareness that moment of renunciation. Notice the ease, the spaciousness, the coolness that comes in the heart and mind when the kilesa dissipates. The kilesas are like hot. The mind is burning. It dissipates.

It's okay now. No. Stop and notice that. Stay really present with it. It's like this. Just like this in this moment. Nothing in excess. Nothing is lacking. That's a moment of renunciation, of ease.

From that can come a natural generosity that's also a joy of the heart. It's kind of the next step, not a should. But do you see how it can be easy to skip over it, wait for the next kalesha to come? Really notice it, because bringing that same steady awareness to the wholesome that we're bringing to the unwholesome feeds the wholesome. It strengthens it—not in a holding-on way, but really recognizing: oh yes, comfort, ease. Non-clinging feels like this.

And it becomes more familiar, more trustworthy. It's not something we hold on to, but every time we recognize it, we're strengthening that habit, if you want to look at it that way. So really take some time. When you start to feel an ease—some kalesha, it could be ill will or aversion, is easing out—don't just think, "Okay, thank God, that's over." Stop. Notice the heart-mind that's free of kalesha at that point. This is totally important. Over and over and over, because this is really what's changing the habit and bringing in the confidence. This same sense of simply not being so engrossed in "me"—which is how it feels when there's wholesomeness. It just opens up.

So in terms of renunciation, that's really where the opening happens—to not just seeing what I need and what I want, but what's the situation in the bigger picture. It could be in the dining room where you really want another biscuit, and you can see there's only three left and there's still five people to come. And not as a should—oh, there's five people, oh, okay—but the wanting just falls away. There's a natural ease of seeing this is really what's needed in this situation. That's wisdom. That isn't self-referential. You get a feeling for that.

And that can go all the way up to the whole environment, the shortage of everything that people need in the world, and noticing when we're overusing. Without having ideas about how one should behave, but really noticing in oneself when we're using too much—what we feel is more heat than I need, or more water than I need, or more whatever than I need—and not a should, but that sense of no clinging, it's not all about me in the mind. It's just naturally: oh, I don't need this much. There can be more. I don't need to use this much electricity. You might think, "Well, no one else is going to get it. I might as well use it." That's kind of the rational kalesha mind. But "oh, I don't need so much electricity, just turn it off"—that's the renunciation. Wise motivation of renunciation. And it's a sense of, again, as the Dalai Lama says, being in the wider picture, the sense of connectedness. You say, "Oh, I'm connected with all beings," but it's just not that inner reference so strongly.

So to say a little about non-ill will, which is how metta is described. Again, I'm just trying to give a flavor of each of these so you recognize them. Ill will we know. We're learning to recognize ill will. Metta—sometimes again, not mistaken, but a limited idea of metta may be making it a little too amazing. "I radiate"—when the Buddha talks about radiating metta in all directions, we could easily think it should be this amazing force of love moving out to all beings. And so I love the way Ajahn Sumedho likes to talk about metta.

He says, what I call metta is the ability to witness the unpleasant in a person or a thing or any situation or an aspect of oneself—to witness the unpleasant, to be really present, without creating anything around it.

You get a sense of that? In other words, it's like this. Just being purely present, non-ill will, is actually metta, friendliness. Much more available than you maybe would have thought, right? Non-ill will.

Or as James Baldwin said, an enemy is someone whose story we have not heard. When there's ill will, we're not hearing anything. And that could even be the story of some difficult emotion or physical experience we're feeling. Metta is just this quality of presence without pushing away, without adding a story, just fully with it. So meeting your own experience, hearing it, hearing the story—that's a kind of metta. That's a kind of non-ill will.

And so, hopefully you can see how that arises here on retreat, of course in daily life. But I mean here, many people say, I've seen it myself, how easy it is that somebody—and it's nothing personal to anyone—but usually somebody does something that bugs us, maybe just once, and the mind makes the thing, right? But the ill will is just that feeling of negativity that comes up, and then if you're exploring it with awareness as the Buddha taught, did you see the thoughts that come from it? Hopefully, here, mostly not actions. That's why silence is so wonderful. Really, it lets us explore this stuff without being afraid we're going to really say something that we'll regret just because the ill will was taking over at that moment.

But seeing how, if we just keep feeding the story, the ill will—and every time that we see that person, that's what we think—we can see how the seeing triggers the ill will. And then we think about it. And then say it's a sound that's being made. Then we hear a similar sound, and without even looking, we assume it's that person, even though it's a sound everybody makes, right? But that sound that comes from everybody is all about that. And you see how it builds up.

But then when we witness the unpleasant in a person or thing, you start by just witnessing the unpleasantness of the ill will in our own heart-mind when it's arising, instead of jumping away from it to blaming the other person, or jumping away from it to blaming ourselves for having ill will. Both of those are not just witnessing the ill will with awareness. Oh, it's like this. Ill will feels like this.

When you can be with that, then when the person heaves into view, you're able to just witness seeing. And when we're not creating anything around it, when awareness is just simple awareness we've been talking about, all of a sudden the perception spreads out, right? It happens to me all the time. And what I was perceiving as arrogant or whatever my mind was making up—because we don't know what's going on with anyone else, and we don't even know what's going on with ourselves, and we think we know what's going on with other people—when that spreads out, and we're just witnessing the unpleasant behavior without creating anything around it, there's a kind of connection. That's metta too. It's connection.

I'm not trying to talk myself out of the ill will. I mean, that's better than just being with the ill will, but I'm not trying to. The perception shifts, you know? You see something you didn't see, and what I was perceiving as arrogance—I said, oh. Wow, to behave like that, you just get this sense: that's a lot of suffering. That's a lot of suffering.

So that's actually compassion. Compassion comes up in response to suffering. Metta is connection with whatever's going on. They're both very close together. It just arises naturally, right? You don't have to make it. Notice that. We tend to go, okay, well, that's good, I had a moment of compassion. And then we sometimes think to really bring full awareness and inhabit that is a kind of an ego thing, you know?

I don't want to give it a lot of attention. I think I'm such a compassionate person, but I really need to notice how much ill will there was. And don't forget about that. But if the ill will is gone, really notice that it's gone. Notice the gone-ness. Don't keep holding onto it in memory.

And notice what this simple friendliness of metta or compassion—which is more like the connection with suffering, the quivering of the heart, but without aversion—let that be there in your awareness. Really notice, again, the coolness. Compassion is a beautiful emotion, even though it arises in the face of suffering. Notice the coolness of non-kilesa. Notice the spacious, all-inclusive quality, that it's not all about me and what you're doing and how it affects me. It's simply: oh, it's like this now. Me and you and the whole situation—it's like this now.

And then it can be that something somebody's doing seems to impact your activities and get in your way, and suddenly you realize, oh, that's a lot of suffering. And without even thinking about it, you just get out of the way. I don't need this. They can have it. But it's not an aversive thing. It's really letting go. And there's this sense of love and happiness in the whole situation—they need it more than I do. You don't turn that into a big ego thing. You could, but then it won't feel like happiness. It won't feel like coolness. Just notice that.

Do you see how these little moments arise so much on retreat? I see some nods, so thank goodness you're seeing some of it. And this isn't just a little nothing—this is really important. Really important to notice, because this is the path.

The steady awareness that we've been cultivating, this steady awareness free from kilesa, how that awareness is meeting each moment of experience—that is the path of non-harming, of metta, of renunciation. The reason those habits start to grow and transform is because in any moment, how the citta, the mind, the awareness is meeting the moment, is the path. There's only this moment.

So when we're meeting difficulty or greed with this clear awareness that isn't filled with difficulty or greed, in that moment you could say it might manifest as metta or compassion or renunciation, but it is actually the wholesome that's feeding that. In that moment, we're cultivating—or rather, the wholesome is being cultivated—in that quality of steady awareness.

So when we say that awareness has the qualities of metta, of compassion, of non-clinging, it does. Not that you can necessarily see them, but right there, just in how we meet the moment. One teacher said—not a Buddhist teacher, but he said—in every moment of activity, the heart-mind is committing to something. The question is: what? That's really what we look at in this moment. What's the attitude in the heart-mind? What is it committing to? And how we see internally is how we act externally.

Two reflections—from Martin Luther King and Eleanor Roosevelt. I was recently in Atlanta, where I have family, and we visited the new Museum of Civil and Human Rights, which is profoundly touching and illuminating.

From Martin Luther King: "Nonviolence means avoiding not only external physical violence, but also internal violence of the spirit. You not only refuse to shoot a person, you refuse to hate them."

So that's what we're doing, only in reverse. We see that you refuse to hate them, and that's what leads to refusing to shoot them.

And this was from Eleanor Roosevelt, in the human rights section of the museum, which documented both historical and present-day violations of human rights, both in this country and around the world. She says: "Where after all do universal human rights begin? In small places, close to home. So close and so small that they cannot be seen on any maps of the world." I'd say, you know, right here. "Yet they are the world of the individual person. Without concerted citizen action to uphold them close to home, we shall look in vain for progress in terms of human rights in the larger world."

That's what we're doing, you know. That's how it connects.

So notice again, when there's a shift of attitude—the little ones I've mentioned, but sometimes in the bigger picture too—when there's a shift of motivation, of attitude, how that can completely change the sense and effect of the action.

I'll give you a couple of examples, one from Mingyur Rinpoche and one from Bhikkhu Anālayo—two very different monks.

Bhikkhu Anālayo said—very classical Theravada study monk—he's talking about practice in a retreat setting and how it can seem very self-involved and separate and selfish. But he says, practice in a retreat setting turns into compassionate activity through the transforming power of one's aspiration to awaken for the benefit of others as well as one's own benefit.

Check it out. When you notice, when you tune into that aspiration, then going through the same outer actions can feel so different. And it can even motivate you to action that you wouldn't otherwise take.

Even in little ways. This seems like a silly little example, but from my own practice, it really stuck with me. I was sitting in Burma this past winter, and I was just doing some walking on a little path in a kind of wooded area. There weren't many people staying at this place; it wasn't crowded. And there was some rubble—I don't even remember what, something sharp—right in the middle of the path. I was just very calm and peaceful. I would come to it, see it, walk around it. I didn't have aversion, I wasn't thinking about it at all, quite equanimous, but just in my own world, doing my own thing.

And suddenly the thought just popped up: "Well, this isn't bothering you, but what if somebody else comes along later and really hurts themselves on this?" I hadn't had that thought. And immediately I picked it up and moved it. It was just a nothing doing—you're doing the obvious. Picked it up, moved it, and kept walking. I said, "Oh, that's so interesting." Because that time when it was just about me, it didn't bother me. It never occurred to me to move the thing. As soon as the connectedness, the friendliness, the mettā thought came up, there was immediate action—just doing the obvious.

So when we think it's aversion and clinging and self-interest that leads to action, just notice: mettā, compassion, wisdom actually are extremely strong motivators for action.

From Mingyur Rinpoche. He's Tibetan, and there's a great emphasis on bodhicitta, which means cultivating the awakened heart-mind—practicing in order to wake up so that you can help wake up all beings. That's bodhicitta.

So he says intention—what our intention is—can transform neutral activities into wholesome, positive ones. He says, "Sleeping, for example." Did you think that could be a really wholesome positive? When we go to bed at night with the mind of bodhicitta, with a mind that aspires, we aspire: "May our sleep be the cause of increased capacity to help all beings attain enlightenment."

Try it. It changes everything. Really.

When you go to eat, really tuning into gratitude when you're eating. And now I've just started saying to myself, "May all beings have food. May all beings have drink. May this food give my mind and body strength to be able to serve myself and all beings." And sometimes you really say it and it transforms everything. We can do that with anything, with everything as we go through the day.

So that's it—you say the thing and then you drop it. Don't be labored about it. But just notice: sometimes it does nothing, and sometimes it actually brings up that shift of motivation. Then just play with seeing how that feels.

We need to get as comfortable and trusting with these qualities as we are with greed and aversion, with fear and self-interest.

I think that's enough. Just to say that the noticing, as I was saying, really builds confidence in the understanding, which strengthens all the five faculties toward wisdom. The wisdom, again, strengthens the confidence, and it keeps on going. Because as we practice and get to more and more subtleties, we're also noticing more and more, becoming more sensitive to the suffering in our own heart and mind. So it takes a continuing deepening commitment to ourselves to keep being willing and interested to show up for the difficult. It's like a cycle.

As we understand more, the confidence and the willingness to keep showing up deepens, and they keep serving each other in this beautiful, self-reinforcing cycle.

May we all practice for the benefit of ourselves and all living beings.

Thank you so much. I deeply appreciate what you're doing with your lives here in these nine days. It's truly amazing, given everything happening on this planet.

Let's sit quietly for a moment, opening to awareness in whatever way or posture feels right.

CHAPTER 151

Mindfulness and Right View (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Carol Wilson · 53 min

> In this retreat talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the profound relationship between mindfulness and sammādiṭṭhi (right view), the first factor of the Noble Eightfold Path. She emphasizes that the Buddha's teaching is fundamentally pragmatic—not about adopting a philosophy, but about directly seeing how dukkha arises and ceases in our own experience moment by moment. The practice of ehipassiko (come and see for yourself) invites us to investigate reality directly rather than through belief.
> Wilson explores sakkāyadiṭṭhi (personality view or identity view) as the central misperception underlying our suffering—the deeply conditioned habit of taking any particular experience as 'me' or 'mine.' She illustrates how a simple sensation like warmth can remain neutral, flowing naturally, until the moment we 'privilege' it with ownership, triggering chains of reactivity rooted in greed, aversion, and delusion. Drawing from teachers including Ajahn Sumedho, Sayadaw U Tejaniya, and Mingyur Rinpoche, she describes vipassanā as experiencing mind and body directly with right understanding.
> The talk offers practical guidance for working with this recognition: rather than fighting reality or waiting for dramatic breakthroughs, we can trust the simple knowing of 'it's like this now.' Wilson describes mindfulness as 'the point that includes'—a non-judgmental, nonviolent awareness that doesn't require anything to be different. Through persistent, moment-to-moment awareness of ordinary experience, wisdom naturally arises, revealing things as they are and allowing unnecessary suffering to fall away.

I want to talk tonight about giving a bigger context for the purpose of cultivating this steady, non-judgmental awareness that we're exploring—that this whole retreat is set up to help develop, recognize, trust, and cultivate. It's not just for the heck of it. And it's not just to be a better mindful person. It really serves the deepest purpose, in my understanding, of the Buddha's teachings.

The thing that really drew me to the Buddha's practice in the first place, and really the way the Buddha taught when I started to be able to read and hear and understand it a little, is that it's never been about adopting a new philosophy. There's an endless amount of information and philosophical discourse and ways of understanding and describing the mind and heart and the world in the Buddhist teaching, don't get me wrong. One could take the Buddhist teaching and spend your life in philosophical debate and discourse about it. And many do. That's not my bent.

But the heart of the Buddha's teaching is really so pragmatic, so practical from what we can tell. He started teaching and everything he offered was from the point of view of helping us see for ourselves how suffering is created on a moment-to-moment basis in our own mind and heart—how the seeds of suffering can grow and create suffering in a moment when the conditions are ripe, and also how the seeds of peace and release from suffering arise in our own mind and heart when the conditions are supportive of that.

As someone said last night, maybe it was Fran, these teachings aren't about "if you believe this then this will happen for you," because belief just doesn't cut it. It's all about ehipassiko—you too come and see for yourself. Come and look.

So everything we say, everything the Buddha taught, this whole retreat—we're really trying to set it up to support everybody to get interested enough, or just stay interested enough, to keep bringing this interested, mindful attention to our life, to our mind and body process. Not just for the heck of it, but because when we really recognize accurately what's going on, that's the condition in a moment that gives rise to release from the confusion, the suffering, the angst that gets created in our response, our reaction to experience when we don't understand it accurately.

To me, that's the most amazing thing about the way the Buddha spoke about what frees our heart and mind. I think most of us, when things aren't right, when we're suffering, we try to fix everything externally. Nothing wrong with that when we can do it. But a heck of a lot of the time, we can't do it.

The Buddha is saying that the suffering comes not because the external conditions are as they are. Yes, a lot of the time, external conditions and internal conditions are really difficult, really messed up. We're not saying everything's hunky-dory. But when we don't recognize our experience accurately, then the response that arises in the way we think, in the way we feel, in the way we act in relationship to experience—that response is what creates and continues to keep us spinning in suffering and confusion.

And so what's so cool is that the freedom, the wise understanding, the right view the Buddha speaks about—sammā diṭṭhi, the first step of the Eightfold Noble Path—is wise understanding, right view, recognizing accurately. When we recognize accurately what's going on, then the response of heart and mind is in alignment with things as they are. It sounds simple and maybe not that exciting, but it changes everything. Everything. It's really so amazing.

From Mingyur Rinpoche: "If we want to be happy, we must figure out which causes and conditions lead to our well-being." Which makes sense. "Similarly, if we do not have a clear understanding of the conditions that create suffering, how could we possibly expect to free ourselves from it?"

This meditation, the whole Buddhist path, is about recognizing accurately the conditions that create suffering in our heart and mind. And once it's accurately recognized, it's actually a natural effect of the accurate recognition that we respond appropriately in a way that doesn't create more suffering for ourselves, just on a moment-to-moment basis. It's not a one-time thing and then it's over. You probably know that by now, right? It's never going to be a one-time and it's over. This is our life, this whole life.

But what's amazing is that the power of accurate recognition is what frees us, and the steady, non-judging mindfulness of the simple experiences—just the simple things we've been talking about today—that is the powerful tool. The steadiness of that sets up the condition for wisdom, for accurate recognition to arise.

One of the definitions, I think it's from Sayadaw U Tejaniya, of Vipassanā meditation: Vipassanā meditation is experiencing the mind and body directly from moment to moment with the right understanding. Sometimes he calls that the three jobs of a yogi. The moment-to-moment mindfulness—you're probably getting it that that's what we're really leaning on—experiencing the mind and body directly, just as it is, with the right understanding.

Often this right understanding, wise view, can be information that's handed to you, that we need to hear in order to inspire us to look more carefully. But what I personally really appreciate about the translation of sammā diṭṭhi in the Pali to "wise view" or "right view" is that in my mind, which is pretty literal, I translate that literally: that the view of experience is accurate. The shift of perception, the shift of recognition—"Oh, that's how it is." All the reactions of dislike or self-interest or greed or confusion fall away because they no longer apply.

But anyway, I have a nephew, a three-year-old nephew, and he's the first in my family—the first and probably the last, given the age of my brother—little one. So it's been fun watching how he learns.

This is just an example of how little kids learn. You know those toys where you put blocks in with different shapes—a triangle, a circle, a square—and you have to put the triangle block in the triangle hole? It's not rocket science for us, but for a little kid, you just see an adult do it, and then you can't do it yourself because you don't have the sense that the triangle doesn't fit in the circle. So the kid's trying to put it in the wrong one, and you can watch the frustration build and the confusion.

If it were an adult thinking more clear thoughts, you might think, "What's wrong with me? This is messed up. They made it wrong, or I'm stupid, or how come my mother can do it?" Because it was so easy for them and I can't do it. So given your propensity, you either blame inside or you blame outside or you throw the whole thing out the window. I have a good friend—she's a nun—and she'll be working on her computer and says, "I just want to throw this whole thing out the window." This is in the monastery over in Burma, but I can really relate. So it's not just little kids.

But then, suddenly, watching a little kid—and you can say it's developmental—suddenly it clicks in and he gets it. Maybe he doesn't know the word, but he can see: triangle, triangle, it matches, it goes in, the whole thing starts to work. And all that reactivity? It's just gone. Because it doesn't make any sense anymore. Because he's seeing things more accurately. This is the nature of things. And when there's accurate recognition, all the hullabaloo goes away.

That's simple, but that's really what I'm talking about. The nature of insight is this shift of perception—from not recognizing accurately and getting reactive, to just, "Oh, it's like this now. That's how it is." This is what our mindfulness is helping us practice.

So we stop fighting. It's not personal. It's like we stop fighting the law of gravity—probably we all stopped fighting that a long time ago. We stop fighting the fact that bodies get older. Well, no, actually, people don't stop fighting that. But you'd think we would, because it happens. It's the law of nature. And that whole extra suffering is just a sense of denying or not recognizing things as they are, or wishing they were different.

Have you spent any time at all today wishing things were different? Did you have any moments of experience arising where somehow you're thinking, "This isn't right. It's not supposed to be like this right now. I'm doing it wrong. It's too hot. The instructions are stupid. I shouldn't have come. I'm too sleepy." Whatever—something's wrong because it's supposed to be different. That's exactly the place of being in contention with reality.

And what this steady, moment-to-moment mindfulness is hopefully giving us the practice to see is: "Oh, it's like this now." Ajahn Sumedho says that all the time. "No, no, I'm sleepy." "Oh, it's like this now." And attention, a total sense of presence, just drops into feeling how it is—good, bad, indifferent. It's not that everything becomes lovely. You're still sleepy and your body's heavy and you're sweating. And—oh, it's like this now. But the contention is gone.

As the teacher Byron Katie says, when you fight with reality, you lose.

So we're here to embrace this quality of moment-to-moment awareness—to see what reality actually is.

And we can't think our way into it. We have to keep practicing. That's what this is about.

Let me give you another kind of example. In my mind, it's the same kind of example—a shift in how we think about something, or the way we use language, can actually affect how we experience. We don't recognize accurately.

I was reading a book about nonviolence as a powerful tool, both internal and external, for social change—how it really needs to come from within. The author was talking about Gandhi and Martin Luther King and the real power of nonviolence as both a strategy and a way of life. But he was also saying that it's often perceived from the outside as weak or passive—as if nonviolence is just the best you can do when you really should be fighting.

The point that intrigued me in this particular article was looking at how language reflects assumptions. We may be aware of some of them, but often we're unaware—yet they're affecting how we think about things, shaping how we even recognize what's happening.

He was saying the very term "nonviolence" actually makes violence the norm. "Non" positions it as the exception, and then we think that way. What about if the only word for war were "non-peace"? Doesn't it create just a little shift? Such a small thing. I'm not going to go into a whole linguistic exploration, but language, which reflects so much of how we think—and it's different from culture to culture—can shape the way we're thinking and looking at ourselves and life.

So why is it that we get so habituated to not recognizing accurately? Why should it be so difficult? I don't think I can answer that either, but that question leads into what I want to talk about next. This is really part of the exploration of moment-to-moment mindfulness.

We were saying that awareness can be with anything: the movements of mind, thoughts, sensations in the body, sound, sight. Sure, it takes some steadiness and practice to notice the more subtle movements of mind. Absolutely—that doesn't come right away. But we can actually notice how the mistaken assumptions and habits of mind and heart and reaction arise. It's not like we have to hear about them and say, "Okay, now I'm going to stop doing that," because we can't. We don't even know it's happening in our mind. But hearing it, we can start to get interested in exploring.

One essential wrong view, one misinterpretation of moment-to-moment experience that is, according to how the Buddha talked—and certainly in my experience—at the heart of our confusion: a central misunderstanding, misperception, wrong view, and one that is arising very, very frequently in our moment-to-moment experience. It's arising and passing because nothing is steady-state. It's not like there's this wrong idea sitting in the back of our mind that's always there. Nothing is always there. The mind isn't always there either. Everything's changing every moment. But this one arises frequently.

It's called in Pali sakkāya-diṭṭhi, or personality view, identity view. It really means the habit—incredibly deep—of taking any particular moment of experience as being me, or mine, or who I am.

I'm going to try to keep this from getting too abstract, but this is really at the core of our suffering and confusion. This is where all the distortions and reactions to experience arise—out of this habit of taking ownership. As I always say, we take everything personally, and it's not personal.

"What do you mean? Of course it's personal. I'm sleepy. Who's sleepy? I am. Who's suffering from it? Me."

Yes, it feels like that. We're not saying it doesn't feel like that. We're not saying try to think your way out of it, because who's trying to think their way out of it? The more you think about it, the stronger you feel the "I." So I'm not saying abandon that. Just start to watch what happens when a particular experience is somehow separated out as me or mine or I.

Very simply, going through the day-to-day, noticing when you were aware—I'm sure there's plenty of times you weren't aware, so only the times that awareness was remembered—noticing whatever's occurring. There's seeing happening, hearing happening, sounds come and go, sensations in the body coming and going, moods, emotions, thoughts coming and going. All of that. Maybe tastes when you're eating, smells. All of these things are happening over and over and over, sometimes very rapidly. You agree with that?

So when Steve was talking about moment-to-moment awareness and how we're practicing with really the very mundane experience much of the time, it's exactly so we can start to notice. You need the steadiness to start to notice this.

So notice how you might be walking or outside. There's sensations—it's warm, it's cold—there's hearing, there's a perception of bird, there's a thought that goes by, there's a sight that's happening. Not that you're naming each thing, but there's awareness that is going on.

But suddenly, a particular experience is somehow privileged. Being me or mine—and we don't say "neon lights me or mine." You're just walking along, and suddenly—Steve kept talking about being in the sun, right? So suddenly you're walking in the sun. There's been warm sensations, there's been hearing, and all of a sudden it's a hot sensation, and something happens: "Ah, I'm so hot."

That particular physical sensation of warmth—before it was just coming and going, it was warmth, it was relatively neutral, there was hearing, there was seeing—but suddenly it's like, "Ugh, I'm so hot." Do you get a sense of the difference? The feeling of heat or warmth has been kind of privileged, it's been pulled out of the whole flow which keeps on going and going, of me or mine. And this sense of heat or unpleasant has somehow come up and it's me. And the whole flow can kind of stop at that point.

Or it could be something really pleasant. "Oh, the cool breeze. It's so nice." And then the next thing you're thinking about how you're going to make it cool back in your room. And then you're thinking about the nice cool vacation you're going to take after this, and then on and on and on.

But before that, it's just a sensation arising, a sound arising, a thought arising. When the sense of me comes in, then it leads to reaction—and we want more, or we don't want it at all. We think about things. If it's something unpleasant that keeps on occurring, we start thinking this shouldn't be happening. How can I get rid of it? Why don't they fix it? Why is this going on? It can lead to a whole lot of resistance, anger, suffering, blame. And something that we like can lead to a whole story of how to get more, or what does it mean about me?

And what we don't notice is how what had just been a very steady flow of awareness—different things happening—has suddenly shrunk and gotten frozen in a way.

Lama Tsultrim Allione, the Tibetan lama, talks about how really thoughts and all our experience is just nature. We're nature. Yet we take everything that occurs personally, as if somehow we're in charge of it, as if we can control it. So if you're really sleepy, there's a sense it shouldn't be happening, or it's my fault, or if I do X, Y, and Z, sleepiness will go away. Other than going to bed, you probably can't control that.

Do you control what thoughts come? We wish, right? Can you control the sensations that arise in your body? No. Everything that occurs—there are conditions that are coming together, some internal, some external. We're really affected by the environment, by other people. But the tendency, when a particular experience has been privileged as I or mine, is that it becomes separate—me—and everything else is other.

So Lama Tsultrim was saying to recognize when that happens, instead of realizing that thoughts, sensations—it's all just part of nature. At the moment when a certain experience is held to as me, we kind of solidify. And he says we become locked then in the narrow bandwidth of personal human experience. We become a human experiencing this narrow bandwidth, and we lose the sense of—not even the connection, because that implies me connecting with something else—but we lose the sense of the inclusive nature of experience, of nature. What we're calling me is just conditions arising as part of nature, as a natural result of whatever the causes are in this moment. It becomes me and that's other. And how can I change the other so that the me is more comfortable or happy or whatever? It goes in that direction.

So when we get locked in this narrow bandwidth, it is what distorts our accurate recognition, and it leads to what the Buddha really spoke of as the deepest emotional habits of mind and heart—what are really the wellspring of confusion and suffering in our mind.

And those are—I'm just going to mention—the habits of greed, wanting what we want; aversion or hatred, really just trying to push away what we don't want. And this can go very subtle and get really far really fast. And then the basic delusion, just not recognizing accurately. Like my nephew, before he could tell the triangle and the circle apart, before he got frustrated and all, there wasn't greed or aversion. He just wasn't able to recognize accurately. That's a kind of delusion.

Our habit of solidifying around a particular experience as "me" and "mine" is so frequent and common. This is also nature. It's a habit that I'm going to guess we all have. I'm just going to hazard a guess—I haven't met a person who doesn't have that habit. But it's so familiar and it seems so right, it happens so much, that mostly we don't even look at it or notice it or question it. We just get involved in the reaction of liking, disliking, and confusion. This is what mindfulness helps us begin to see through in another way.

I'm back to the Dalai Lama and Desmond Tutu. So the Dalai Lama is saying that the paradox is that although we have a drive for self-focus, the drive behind self-focus is to seek greater happiness for yourself. And this is just what the Buddha said. The compassionate thing that motivated him to teach when he first woke up—because he was thinking, "I don't really need to teach, I could just kind of hang out in peace for the rest of my life." But he looked around and he really saw that everybody wants to be happy. That's really at the heart of all of us. But by not recognizing accurately what brings happiness and what brings suffering, we keep doing—in trying to be happy—just the things that keep us suffering more.

That's what the Dalai Lama is saying here: "The drive behind self-focus is to seek greater happiness for yourself, but it ends up doing exactly the opposite. When you focus too much on yourself, you become disconnected and alienated from others. And in the end, you also become alienated from yourself. With too much self-focus, your vision becomes narrow. And with this, even a small problem appears out of proportion and unbearable."

Have you had any moments like that today? Retreats are great for that. I mean, really, even in your mind you say, "This little thing that's going on that I really feel murderous rage about..." You can have a thought that your reaction doesn't seem quite in line with the mundanity of this situation. But you can really see—oh my goodness, little things cause so much suffering. And in our daily life, it's the same thing.

Now here's Desmond Tutu. He's talking his own language, but saying the same thing, so it's not just the Buddha. He's saying, "You know, in a real sense we have a very profound complementarity." In other words, we're all part of each other, the whole world. You don't have to be a believer in anything. He said, "I learned to be a human being from other human beings—learning to walk, learning to speak from other human beings. We belong in this delicate network. It is actually quite profound."

That's what Lama Dreamed was saying. We lose the sense, the recognition of this delicate network when it becomes "my sound, my hearing, my reaction."

Back to Desmond Tutu: "Unfortunately, in our world, we tend not to recognize our connection until times of great disaster." He's talking externally, how in times of great disaster, then we come forward and try to help. But I want to say also, internally, what we can explore on retreat here and in our life is when it's a time of personal disaster. And on retreat, the personal disaster may just be that you didn't get oatmeal for breakfast or something. It can feel like a personal disaster.

So what we can explore is—that's what we're practicing for. We don't have to wait for a huge disaster to knock us out of our habit of viewing everything as "me" and "mine." Because that's what happens with a big disaster, personally or worldwide. It shakes us up. It makes us look fresh somehow. We can see in a different way. It kind of knocks us upside the head or the heart.

We don't have to wait for that. This is why we want to practice this simple moment-to-moment mindfulness—because it sets up the conditions that reveal things as they are. It doesn't have to only be accessible when everything's falling apart. It's just this simple. The simplicity of mindfulness, which can include everything.

What I mean by that... Can you hear the bell? I'll say it again. Just the simplicity of hearing. Just what it is. Mindfulness. No big whoop.

Then, did you notice if there were any thoughts that came after that? Which is fine. Mindfulness can notice the thought. "Why is she ringing the bell?" "It's a nice sound." "It's not a nice sound." "I wish that was the bell for the end of the talk because I'm sleepy and I want to go to bed now." "How much longer is it going to be?" "Is it hot in here?" All of that is just natural. Mindfulness can notice all of that.

The simplicity of mindfulness, though, is it's just not adding anything extra. So the simplicity of hearing the sound—hearing. If we think "bell," that's a perception. Mindfulness can recognize that. There's nothing that occurs in our mind, in our body, in hearing and seeing and feeling and thinking that needs to be outside of the simple moment of mindful recognizing. It's like this now. Nothing excluded.

So that whole train of thought I just described—when we're not aware of it, we hear the bell and the next thing we know we're really kind of disgruntled and feeling restless and tired and wanting to go, and aversive. And everything I'm saying, you know, "Shut up, shut up already, I want to go." And you don't quite know how you got there. Then suddenly you wake up feeling really aversive right now. "I shouldn't be feeling aversive. I should be really in mindfulness and really loving—that's what the retreat's about."

But as soon as you notice—oh, aversion—that's mindfulness. That's the simplicity of mindfulness. It's like this now. There's nothing that's outside of this simple moment of awareness.

Ajahn Sumedho often uses the phrase, "Mindfulness is the point that includes." I love that. It's a point, meaning it's just this moment. It's not about what happened three seconds ago, because there's only this moment. But whatever's occurring in this moment, the simplicity and honesty of mindfulness can just relax into it. It's like this now. You don't even have to have words for it. Just—it's like this now.

I do that all the time, on and off retreat, when I'm really trying very dedicatedly to be mindful as we've been giving instructions. You try to hear the sound, notice the thought, feel the sensation, right? Have you been trying to practice like that today? Sometimes? Ever? Does it get tiring? Yeah. Does it feel kind of stressful sometimes? Because it's like we're trying too hard. Because it feels like something I have to do as an act of personal will.

No, that's only how we know how to do stuff. So in the beginning, the act of personal will is simply that remembering—what's happening now. That's it.

What's happening now. You don't even have to name it.

So when I'm starting to feel that trying to be mindful, trying to be present, and I start to notice the stress and the tightness and it's feeling so effortful—the point that includes is simply: oh, it's like this now. I'm saying words because I'm talking, but I may not need to articulate "ah, effortful feels like this." The whole thing—you don't have to name it all, this is a sight, this is a sound—just the whole thing. There's a sense of total relaxation, of total presence and wakefulness into this moment. The point that includes.

And for me, there's always a sense of ease. Ease because the sense of fighting with or trying to fix what's happening is released in that moment. Oh, it's like this now. And if I had to put words to it, it's like: I feel totally stressed and tired and hot and aversive. Feels like this now. And there's—it's so weird, I know, it doesn't make sense just to talk about it—but there's a sense for me of the relief of no longer being in contention with reality. And a wakefulness: oh, it's like this now.

This is the shift from our entrancement with the particular experience, the object. Say striving, say tension. Our idea of it being about me—my tension, I'm doing something wrong, or why is there tension? And the idea of relief would be: I relax into tension, I name it, and it gets better. Right? Those of you who've done a lot of mindfulness practice—don't we often get caught up in thinking that if you were being mindful properly, the unpleasant thing would change? I've been with it, I've been with it, I've been with it. We go, right, uh-huh, and? Yeah, well, and it's still here. Okay, that's right. No one said mindfulness makes everything you don't like go away. It's nothing to do with that.

But the peace that comes—oh yes, it's like this—this is the shift to taking refuge in that moment of awareness, that moment of mindfulness, rather than getting our confirmation, our sense of self, our sense of good and bad and liking from the particular object. Because the object is changing every moment. And awareness, mindfulness, is not stained or gotten dirty or ragged if it's a difficult experience. It doesn't get more beautiful and pristine if it's a lovely experience. In some ways, awareness doesn't care what it's aware of. It's not like our wanting mind of me—we only want to be with the good stuff. Good means pleasant, basically, or some idea that I'm doing good. Awareness doesn't care. Oh yeah, it's like this now, completely stressed out. And the ease is: the stressed out is here, but the sense of it's all about me in that moment is gone. Just for that moment. Because the awareness—trusting the awareness, recognizing—it's just so simple.

And that's why we want to do moment to moment to moment these very mundane experiences. Because we want to have more and more chances to just recognize. It's so simple. It's like nothing.

This awareness, you know, like we've talked about this morning and will keep talking about—you're just feeling your hands touching. You're just noticing, you're seeing. You think, hey, awareness of stress. You're like, huh? I came here so I could say, okay, I know I'm stressed. That's it? That's what you got to offer? I don't think so. We're looking for something a lot more spectacular often in awareness than just this simple knowing. Oh, yeah. Hearing and knowing of it. Sensation and knowing of it.

It's so ordinary. It's available in every single moment of consciousness. It's so available and so kind of neutral, you could say, that mostly our habit is to completely overlook it because we get entranced by whatever it is that's occurring, whatever the object is—especially when it says something about me.

But even that sense of me—this is about me—can also simply be noticed by awareness. That's the point that includes there's nothing outside of it.

So noticing the difference, for example, in how complicated and reactive our experience can get when that little privileged perception comes and owns something. Say you're walking outside. Of course it's not cold now, it's hot, but go out tonight and it's cool. My body doesn't like cold very much. So it could be walking outside and there's just a sense of coolness on the body, coldness on the body, and it can just be noticed like that, just like the hearing of the bell. That's normal. Then the perception can recognize it as cold. Hearing—that's just normal. Awareness notices that.

Then the habit of mind is that what we perceive, what we feel, we think about. So then there's the thought of cold, and this is where the sense of me can come in so strongly. "It's cold. How could it be so cold when it was so warm? And I was so warm, so now I don't have the proper clothes. And I know it's not good for me to be cold, and my proper clothes are all the way down at the bottom of the hill, and I have to walk all the way down there to get them, and now I'm going to get a cough, and now I'm going to get sick, and I have to teach the rest of this retreat, and I'm not going to feel well—I'll be up here coughing my guts out in front of all these people..." That's just how my mind might work. I'm sure yours are much more spacious and non-reactive than that.

And then it goes from the thoughts to what's called a view. The view would be: this is me, I'm cold, it's not good for me, something needs to be done. Like that. Me is really solid. Do you see how complicated it gets? What did it start with? Without the sense of owning it as me, we're out.

And there are plenty of times it's not like that. Walking, and there's coolness, and there's coolness. And nothing. It's amazing. We just recognize coolness and don't create anything around it. Life is so simple. It's so simple we can't stand it. So there's coolness, and then there's hearing, and then there's a thought: "Oh, my body doesn't like to be cold." But that thought can come and go and be recognized too.

So with the awareness practice, it's not that we're going to be able to stop all this complication. And there's no point in hating it—that's just more complication. But what we can do is get really interested in exploring it, include it in the mindfulness. See how, as the Buddha said, when we suffer, the extra suffering is that the heart and mind creates agitation through clinging. Clinging to wanting it to be warm. Clinging to wanting to have more oatmeal. Clinging to whatever. Instead of: okay, coolness is like this. Hunger feels like this. It's really just to explore the difference between the complexification and the simple moment-to-moment sati. Mindfulness.

Often we don't talk about this at the beginning of a retreat, but the way that this particular style of practice—and we really learned a lot from Sayadaw Tejaniya—remember, Vipassana meditation is experiencing mind and body directly, moment to moment, with the right understanding. This is what makes all the difference. We want to start by talking about the right understanding. Not that we have it all the time, but this is just an idea we can put in. When you notice you're really all caught up and everything's complicated, just stop a minute and ask: what's going on now? You can often feel the contraction, the tightness in the mind and body, and you might notice that sense of "it's all about me right now." You don't have to get rid of it. Just bring awareness: oh, it's all about me. It feels like this.

Ajahn Sumedho, who talks about this a lot, says we have a tendency to think that we must wait and practice a long time before beginning to understand this personality view, or the idea of personality. It's often that way. People say you shouldn't talk about it until late, late in a retreat.

We can't understand by thinking about it. But Ajahn Sumedho asked himself: why should I practice for twenty years from within the delusion of "I am practicing to achieve something for me"? Complete delusion. Why practice from wrong view when we can start by simply having it in our mind to bring in the mindfulness and begin to see? Is this true or not? Don't believe me—just look and see for yourself. Get interested. Explore.

When you're feeling suffering and confusion, just check what's going on in the mind that's paying attention. And when there are times of ease—not some blissful, amazing experience, but ordinary moments—notice those too. Maybe not today, maybe you were too tired today, but there will be moments. You're just walking, or sitting, or eating, or sitting outside looking at a bird, and nothing special is going on. But there's some moment-to-moment awareness, and really there's a sense of non-struggle, of ease, of peace. Isn't that simply being moment-to-moment present with things? Notice that.

The next moment, of course, the mind will go, "I'm doing so well. I'm at peace. La la la la la." That's okay. Just notice that. And if that recognition clamps everything down, great—awareness notices that too. "Oh, I'm making it so special. It's like this now."

I always think of this awareness—the point that includes, that can be with anything—as like a Tai Chi move. It's just, "Oh, it's like this now." You don't have to move away from anything. We simply move from involvement, from really being seduced and entranced by the object, to noticing what's occurring. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, mental activity.

So we don't have to wait. We don't have to practice for twenty years and then say, "Oh, I was doing it all from wanting to try and get something." When actually, it's like this now. Just moment to moment, simple awareness. And all these mundane moments of nothing special are just what we need. Because when nothing special is happening, we won't be so entranced by the object, and we have a better chance to notice the simple knowing, the simple awareness, and start to trust it.

The attitude that we bring to awareness, what makes it possible not to be in contention, brings us back to that nonviolence from Martin Luther King, where he's saying nonviolence means avoiding not only external physical violence but also internal violence of the spirit. You not only refuse to shoot a person, you refuse to hate them. It only comes from the attitude in the mind, heart, and the moment.

This quality of non-violence is the attitude that infuses wise mindfulness, wise awareness—the non-violence of refusing to hate or cling to whatever experience arises. The attitude we often bring is, "This is good, this is bad, I don't like this." But what's happening now? It's like this. This quality of non-violence, non-contention, really of interest—really seeing this is what's happening, this is life in this moment. Let's just see how it's working.

What allows us to see how these habits grow—the habits of suffering, the habits of freedom—is the steady moment-to-moment awareness, the perseverance, the persistence. When we're just aware for a moment, then we space out for an hour, then we're aware for a moment—sure, in the beginning that's out of our control. But what happens is we'll wake up again only when something is intense enough. Either we're really identified, really reacting, really liking something, and then we don't notice all those moments of simple awareness where there's a sense of ease, of peace, and just the knowing can be known. We don't notice that. Then we wake up again in the middle of some big reaction, and we think, "It's always me, I'm always reacting, this is how it is."

People come in for interviews and say—though no one here, since we haven't talked yet—"I've just been sleepy the whole day." Really? So when you had lunch, you were sleepy?

We do this same thing with our mental states. Someone comes in and says, "I've been sleepy the whole day." Really? So when you had lunch, were you sleepy? Well, no. At three o'clock, were you sleepy? No. So when exactly were you sleepy? "Well, there was about ten minutes in the 8:15 sitting where I was really sleepy. And then again at 4:30, I noticed I was really sleepy."

We do this. We take these moments and make them the whole thing, without the steadiness of moment-to-moment attention. This persistence is what creates the conditions for wisdom to arise—wisdom that recognizes accurately things as they are.

And this is what's so beautiful: it's nature. We don't have to create wisdom. We can't. But with steady moment-to-moment mindfulness, why we keep going through the whole day, that becomes the condition for wisdom, for clear recognition of things as they are, to arise naturally.

So this third aspect of the yogi—perseverance, continuity—as Steve said last night, every moment is a dhamma. Awareness doesn't care whether you're aware of your breath, a really subtle sensation, what the food tastes like when you're eating, or you're having a little hissy fit in the toilet. It doesn't matter. You bring awareness right then, at any moment.

As we go through the day, we really want to see this—not to privilege sitting over walking, over eating. That's part of why we take away the steady schedule, so you can find your own rhythm in sitting, in walking. What helps you keep coming back into awareness? What helps you refresh your attention, refresh your mind?

And then really to see that whether you're walking down to have tea, looking at the horses, sitting in here, or doing walking meditation, it's all equal. Nothing is more or less important in terms of awareness.

We're not trying to achieve something here in a short period of time. It's just nine days of many, many moments, each an equal opportunity to begin to recognize and trust simple mindfulness, simple awareness—to see how it begins to get its own momentum. And that momentum is the natural condition for wisdom to arise. We don't have to make it happen. It's not an act of personal will.

Sayadaw U Pandita said, "When mindfulness is persistently and repeatedly activated, wisdom arises. There will be insight into the true nature of body and mind, and then unnecessary suffering falls away."

And Mingyur Rinpoche says, "Once we start our path of Dharma, every practice is an awareness practice. Every moment is an awareness practice. Every activity is an awareness practice."

So that's really what we're doing here. In any moment, however long you forget, it doesn't matter. The next moment we're awake, we start right here. It may seem mundane and not much, but it has the power to completely change how we live our lives.

CHAPTER 152

Vedanā, Saññā, and the Power of Awareness (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this retreat talk, Carol Wilson illuminates two fundamental aspects of experience that the Buddha identified as arising in every moment of consciousness: vedanā (feeling tone) and saññā (perception). Drawing from the Sutta on the Two Arrows, she explains how unrecognized pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feeling tones trigger habitual patterns of craving and aversion. When we experience something unpleasant, we not only suffer from that experience but shoot ourselves with a second arrow of resistance—and then seek escape through pleasant experiences, not knowing any other way.
> Wilson explores how perception, equally subtle and quick, shapes our entire world through recognition based on memory and conditioning. She shares vivid examples of how perception becomes distorted by the kilesas (defilements), leading to elaborate stories, moods, and suffering—all from a simple misinterpretation. The practice of steady, relaxed awareness allows us to see these processes clearly, breaking the chain of reactivity before it proliferates into full-blown emotional storms.
> Quoting Ajahn Chah's teaching that the mind is intrinsically pure and peaceful, Wilson points toward the second aspect of practice: discovering the uncontrived awareness that has always been present. Rather than constantly chasing pleasant experiences or fleeing unpleasant ones, we can rest in simple knowing—fresh, clean, and unbound. She encourages practitioners to notice moments of natural peace and to trust awareness itself rather than remaining caught in the endless cycle of reactivity to objects of experience.

Deep in the middle of a retreat like this, it's always kind of amazing to me. I rediscover it each retreat, whether I'm taking the retreat or helping to support it—how much stuff goes on for everybody, how much comes up for people. You think you're just going to come and sit and walk, and it seems simple enough. Just be aware of whatever happens, or you could even just watch your breath.

And really, so many people have talked about the roller coaster. So much mental anguish and grief. People are describing deep suffering, habits of mind and heart that are coming up. At other times, real experiences of joy or peace or some kind of insight—and then two seconds later it's different again. It's amazing, really, just sitting there and walking, and all this is going on.

And so, does it ever come up? We say, whatever happens, okay, great. Are you aware of it? Good. That's basically all we say. Did you notice it? Great, that's the practice. You start to wonder: why, really? What's the point?

It reminded me—a teacher of mine said years ago, not a Buddhist teacher, but he said, kind of joking: in the light of steady awareness, all of the snakes come out of their holes. And you notice real snakes are coming out too. Apparently there have been rattlesnakes sighted all over the place here. I don't know if it's our steady awareness or if it was the sun's steady awareness, but anyway—beautiful snakes, weird looking snakes, snakes you'd really rather not see. Come on up, join the party, come into the light of awareness.

So what's the point? Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche said: the main purpose of these Dharma teachings is to find out what is the nature of the non-deluded mind-heart, as well as how the deluded mind-heart works. Meditation practices work to uncover our innate wisdom and purity by recognizing the obscurations—which we've been talking about—for the changing, insubstantial appearances they are, thus revealing what has always been present.

These two processes I want to give some ideas about, certainly not exhaustive. One is how the confused, the deluded mind works. A lot of what is going on in this retreat—and it's all meditation, not formal versus informal, even if our mind makes that distinction—a lot of what's happening, when we're noticing all the things I mentioned earlier with steady awareness, we're starting to see, or continuing to see, if you've been practicing for forty years, how the confused mind and heart works. And the other half is starting to get a taste, a glimpse of what the non-confused heart-mind is like. This innate wisdom that is always available, but unnoticed so much of the time.

Last year sometime, I did a month of self-retreat just in my apartment. I have one note I wrote down that I actually reread. Usually I write notes in a retreat and never reread them—just in case you're writing up tons of notes, see how much you really reread them. But what I wrote was that I noticed, and I realized, when I first started practice years ago, my motivation—which seems very reasonable—was to get away from, to somehow change, all the difficult, unwanted aspects of my life, my mind, my heart, my personality patterns, and to really change that, get rid of it, get away from it. As well as somehow—and how this was going to happen was never too clear—get away from all the unpleasant things in the rest of my life as well.

And we laugh, but really, bottom line, why else would we do this? Because that's what we know. That's what we know from the deluded mind: go from the unpleasant to the pleasant and everything's going to be great. So that's where I started. But I never would have been able to know—it wouldn't have made any sense, I couldn't have imagined from there—that the intimation of freedom, the touching of it, just not complete peace but moments where you recognize, you get a glimpse of what's available, arises in a completely different way. Nothing to do with getting away from the things we don't like. Nothing to do with somehow rearranging all the things so the world works better. Although we keep trying, and we can still act appropriately, but nothing to do with that.

I never would have known that the way to the release in the moment of the heart is actually this, what we've been talking about—just this complete being with whatever it is, even through the difficult, not in spite of but because of. This is what's happening. The way to peace and freedom is opening into it with just this fullness of presence without deluded interpretations.

And not just once, I'm sorry to tell you, but again and again and again. But it gets easier because the trust is there. We really know: the running away from this is actually the source of the suffering and confusion.

Opening into this moment with fullness of presence is what allows an intimation of what peace of mind and heart is truly like. But hearing that isn't going to make any difference to any of us. That's really what this steady awareness practice can, again and again, lead us into noticing, knowing, beginning to trust for ourselves.

This is from Ajahn Chah, a very well-known quotation. I kept thinking about it and couldn't find it, but it sums up what I want to talk about tonight. I'm sure many of you who've been in this scene have heard it a million times, but that doesn't make it less true:

About this mind, in truth there is nothing really wrong with it. It is intrinsically pure. Within itself, this mind, this heart—same word—it's already peaceful. That the heart is not peaceful these days is because it follows moods. The real heart-mind is simply an aspect of nature. It becomes peaceful or agitated because moods deceive it. The untrained mind-heart is stupid. Sense impressions come and trick it into happiness, suffering, gladness, and sorrow. But the mind, the heart's true nature is none of these things. That gladness or sadness is not the mind, but only a mood coming to deceive us. The untrained mind gets lost and follows these things. It forgets itself.

So I want to talk about two of the very core ways—there are many—but deep, deep habits, subtle habits of the mind, of how we get tricked and lost into moods and emotions and reactions. There are two mental qualities that the Buddha spoke about very clearly. He picked these out of all the different mental experiences to highlight as something to notice, as arising in every single mind moment—which is like every millisecond. A millisecond is a mind moment. The mind is just arising and passing. It's not a steady-state thing. Mind is an activity. Arising and passing, every millisecond, with different qualities arising in it. That's the only way change is possible.

These two qualities are vedanā, which is translated as feeling tone, and saññā, which is translated as perception. I want to give a little description of each and some examples of how these subtle but always arising, every-moment experiences, when not recognized, so easily take the mind and heart into getting confused and misinterpreting—into moods and everything, the whole nine yards.

Talking about vedanā, which I'm sure most of you are familiar with, though some perhaps not. The Buddha described that our whole experience is these six sense experiences, just arising and passing. We've talked about that. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, sensing with the body, and all the mental experience. Each arising sense experience, including the mental experience—take this sound, our trusty bell. In that moment, in each of our mind streams, that hearing is experienced in the mind. It's a mental experience of having a subtle pleasant quality, or unpleasant quality, or neutral quality. It's really quick and fast.

To me, this is one of the many reasons that when I've been studying what the Buddha taught, I think he was an incredible genius. Because this is so fast. He's saying it's happening, occurring in every mind moment, but it's so fast we mostly don't even notice it. I'm pretty sure I never in my whole life would have ever picked that up if I hadn't heard and read about it and been taught about it.

And that sound—say you heard that as pleasant—that's not inherent in that sound. It's a quality of how the mind is receiving it in that moment. It might have been pleasant in my mind and unpleasant in Francis's. Tomorrow, different conditions applying in my mind, I might hear what was not the same sound—you can't step in the same river twice—but hit the bell again tomorrow and the experience might be unpleasant in my mind. So it's not a steady-state thing. He's saying this is happening with every sense experience. So how many times is that a day? A trillion, right? How many sense experiences are happening all the time?

And this is the rub. This is where we get into trouble. Because it's so quick and we don't really notice it, the tendency is, when it's pleasant, just to kind of lean into it. We want more.

When something's unpleasant, we lean back from it. We want less. And when it's neutral? Any neutral today? No, we just space right out.

The Buddha talked about this in really interesting terms—I could discuss this all day, but I won't. He talked about how this tendency, when unrecognized, is what seeds the really deep habits of craving for the pleasant, aversion to the unpleasant, and delusion. These are the habits we've been talking about that so underlie and distort our perception and interpretation of things, because it just seems right.

In one sutta, he starts out by asking: what do you think is the difference between a completely awakened person and someone who's not? That gets the attention. And he said the difference is this: an awakened person experiences pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral vedana, feeling tones. An unawakened person also does. So just in case you thought when you get enlightened there's no more unpleasant vedana—forget about it. The same is experienced by all people.

So what's the difference? This is really interesting to me, because it describes how these habits come to be in our heart and mind.

When an untaught worldling—that's an unawakened person—is touched by a painful bodily feeling, let's start with physical because it's easier, the tendency is to worry, to grieve, to lament, to beat your breast, to weep and be distraught. Can you relate to that? He's not saying you get a little bit upset. He's really laying it on, because that's what we do.

He says it's as if you were hit with an arrow—one arrow, the physical arrow—and then we shoot ourselves with a second arrow. "Oh my God, what happened? How can this be? My knee's going to break!" And on and on and on. This is the first thing: we shoot ourselves with a second arrow when we experience an unpleasant experience.

Then we don't stop there. That person experiences two arrows. Then having been touched by that unpleasant or painful feeling, the mind resists and resents it. In one who resists and resents that painful feeling, the underlying tendency, the underlying habit of resistance against unpleasant feeling comes to underlie the heart, the mind.

He's describing the process. It doesn't happen once in a while—it comes to be an unconscious habit. A painful, unpleasant experience comes, there's this lamenting, beating the breast, the resistance. And so the resistance comes to be a habit we don't even notice. It just feels right, doesn't it? When something's unpleasant, you think, "Well, of course I move away from it. What, are we here to hurt ourselves?" It just seems absolutely true and right.

Then he goes on, and this is even more interesting to me. Under the impact of that unpleasant, painful feeling, a person then proceeds to search out sensual happiness. Why? Because an unawakened person does not know of any other escape from painful, unpleasant feeling except the enjoyment of sense happiness. So then in such a person, the underlying tendency, the underlying habit to crave, to lust for pleasant feelings comes to underlie the mind, the heart.

Do you get a sense of that? Can you relate in yourself how when there's something unpleasant, it seems like the natural thing to do is to go and have a pleasant experience? Just have that in mind as you go through the next days and see how that works.

He says the person does not know, according to facts, the arising and ending of these feelings, the pleasant and the unpleasant. We don't understand the arising and ending of the feelings. And we don't understand the gratification, the danger, and the escape connected with these feelings. And so delusion comes to be a habit underlying the mind.

I'll just finish with the sutta, then talk about it.

In the case of a well-taught noble disciple, an awakened person, when they're touched by a painful feeling, they simply don't do anything else. They don't worry. They don't grieve. They don't lament. They don't need to go looking for sense happiness to avoid feeling the unpleasant feeling. It is one kind of feeling they experience—a bodily one—but not a second one.

Those of us in this habit of resisting the unpleasant and craving for the pleasant, the Buddha said, experience these feelings as if chained to them, as if joined to them. We really suffer from them. Someone who is awakened feels the feeling, and it's just that. Nothing else is created in the mind or heart around it. Pleasant, unpleasant—it's just this. And so they experience that feeling as one who is not chained to it, who is not bound to it, who is not joined to it. It's just this.

And that's the gratification, the danger, the escape. The gratification is yes, pleasant is pleasant. We enjoy it. He's not saying pleasant is wrong. A lot of times people think the Buddhist teaching is that we shouldn't appreciate or enjoy the pleasant because then we start craving. That's not what he's saying. Yes, we may start craving, but we can bring in awareness and be aware of that. It's okay. We don't have to live in mortal fear of craving because, for one thing, it's going to come. For the second thing, fear isn't any better than craving. You trade craving for fear—you didn't really get anywhere with that one. But what we can do is bring in awareness.

So there is gratification in the pleasant. The danger, of course, is that these feelings last only that amount of time. It's so quick, the pleasant and the unpleasant. They may keep coming back, but they last that amount of time. There's no steady state to put our trust in for any kind of ongoing gratification. That's the danger. If you could have an unpleasant feeling, search for the pleasant, get a hold of it, and then be happy with everything okay from then on, there would be no problem. It doesn't work that way—but we tend not to notice until we're really looking.

The escape, he says, is realizing and abandoning the craving for the pleasant and the resistance to the unpleasant. And that's not an act of will. When awareness sees what's really going on in that moment, just for one moment, the craving dissipates because it doesn't make sense.

The habits that come from this go really far, really fast. There's a moment of pleasant, and—correct me if you don't relate to this—the sense of pleasant as good, as right, as the way things are supposed to go, and unpleasant as wrong, as bad, as a mistake, just seems so normal, so obvious.

When many of us, or at many times, are evaluating an experience or evaluating something in life, how much of the rightness of it is really around because it's pleasant? How much of the wrongness of it, how much of the stuff that even during this day you find your mind has been raging against in myriad ways—all the complex good stories that we can really buy into—how much, if you really look underneath, did it start from an unpleasant feeling, an unpleasant experience? And it's so obvious to us that that's wrong. Because this has been such a habit through our whole life, and it's certainly inculcated from all the different avenues in society. So it's just accepted.

When I say I came to practice with the sense that I wanted to get away from all this unpleasant stuff in my personality, and that clearly it was all a mistake, and that it ought to be possible to do that—I know I'm not the only one with that delusion. What I didn't know is that the freedom would be from seeing through that delusion. It's not that achieving constant pleasant is actually impossible—though it is impossible in this world, in these bodies, with this mind and heart to always have pleasant. It's just impossible. You won't believe me, and that's okay. Keep looking. This is the power of mindful awareness: to look and see what's going on.

But this is what keeps us caught—because the fact is, the feeling tone is so quick. It just moves like that.

Ajahn Buddhadasa was a wonderful Thai forest monk who died in the late 1990s. He had a forest monastery in southern Thailand called Wat Suan Mok, where practitioners would mostly just stay out in nature. He didn't do a lot of formal meditation teaching but let the silence and stillness of nature teach, which I think is pretty far out. I spent some time there when I was a nun. I know Fran spent some time there too.

Anyway, he was very learned as well, and he says to just explore in your steady awareness practice. You start to tune into vedana. Explore the fleetingness of it, how quickly it comes and goes—pleasant feeling, how quick. And then sometimes just reflect on your life a little bit. Think of some of the big choices you've made, the big things you've chosen in your life. How much of it came down to thinking this way is going to bring more pleasant feeling? I mean, we don't think it quite that clearly, but how much of it comes down to that? It's really interesting just to look. This is not to look at it with judgment, just to look and see what's going on.

But because the mind opens and changes so quickly, and our habit is not to bring simple, steady awareness to the process—our habit is so deep to move away from the unpleasant, just like that. It's so obvious that as soon as there's an unpleasant thing, the craving comes up for something pleasant. And if there's any way possible, as soon as that craving, that leaning in, that tanha, that thirst comes up, we act on it if we can. Whatever little thing it might be, we act on it. And that acting keeps us from recognizing the process.

The danger, of course, is that even if you get what you want—like people were talking about, this yearning for a cup of tea and noticing the wanting to go down and have the tea—you have the tea. Maybe it was as pleasant as you thought it was going to be. But no matter how pleasant that tea is, at some point it's over. Then you're left with your mind and heart again. The tea's gone.

And if you're really paying attention, how long does food stay pleasant when you're eating it? Really pay attention. How many chews does it stay pleasant? It just turns into mush, and you've got to swallow fast to get to the next pleasant moment. But that's the thing—there's always the possibility of leaning into the next pleasant moment, the next pleasant moment, the next pleasant moment. And so this hides what's really going on.

We don't really stop and look at it until we either do something like come on a meditation retreat where we're forced to sit and take away our usual escapes, or something big happens in life and we can't get to a pleasant moment that hides the unpleasant. But then we're thrown for a loop because we don't know how to be with the unpleasant without being bound by it. We don't know how to be with the pleasant without being bound by it—bound by craving, bound by aversion.

So here, part of what's going on when some of these snakes are coming out of the hole—and pick the littler ones—is that we're learning how to find in the heart and the mind the willingness to rest with this unpleasant for a minute. When we talk about just a simple moment of awareness that isn't distorted by aversion or greed, it's just for that moment touching the unpleasant. That's huge. That's a real shift, just for that moment—starting to be an intimation that there's another way.

There's another way of being in this world, in this mind and body, that doesn't entail having to get so reactive every time something's unpleasant. It doesn't entail being afraid of it. And when the mind isn't so distorted, if something is unpleasant, difficult, and harmful, and we can move to change it, well, that's quite obvious and we do so. So it's not stupid awareness where you have to stay and never move. We can move out of intelligence, not out of craving that just hides the whole process. Do you get a sense of what I mean?

So this is a whole different way of being. To me, when I first read that discourse—that line that the unawakened person doesn't know of any other escape from unpleasant feeling tone except to lust after pleasant—I find that so sad, so poignant, because it just describes so many of us in this world. If you look at the world, this is really what the whole concept of samsara points to: just the cycles of existence, of unhappiness and wanting and getting, and then it's gone away and wanting again and getting and it's gone away, and it just keeps going.

We're so used to that cycle that it's really common for people to say, when we're talking in retreats, in different kinds of ways, "Well, if there's no craving, if there's no aversion, then what?" I remember someone saying years ago in a three-month retreat, "Well, if there's no craving and aversion, what—I just sit in my room and never act for the rest of my life?"

That's what breaks my heart—as if craving and aversion are the only mental states, the only motivation for action. That's how ubiquitous they can be in our experience when we're not really looking.

We think... how much of this is part of the reason we keep emphasizing relaxed awareness? Have you noticed that we say that once in a while? I'm glad you noticed. We're going to keep on saying it too. We're not going to stop saying it.

Because mostly—I mean, we're not all the same—but many of us bring our same habits of mind to meditation as we do to anything. And how do we know how to do something with full intention? You buy in, you just strive, do, strive, push. We're really putting in a hundred percent effort, very sincerely, and not noticing the craving, the trying to make something happen. You wonder why you get headaches, why we feel like our body's snapping in two, why you think "I never want to meditate again" once the bell rings. "Let me out of here." But then luckily the mind changes and you find yourself coming back to the next sitting. Here today, you got a lot of time in between, but you're coming back to the next retreat, right? Now, about the fourth day—now is the time to think, "Oh, now why did I come again? Now I remember what the beginning of the retreat was like, why I never wanted to come to another retreat. I'm remembering that now." But then it'll change.

So thinking desire is the only way we can do something... What about compassion? What about simple wisdom? What about a neutral willingness to act? The body's hungry and we go to eat. It doesn't have to be a frenzy of craving every time we go to eat. Sometimes it's just time to go eat and we eat and we can enjoy it. It doesn't mean it's always craving when you appreciate the pleasant. But we can learn to recognize the difference, because when the craving is there, it really feels like this going forward, and it really narrows the vision. It's all about the craving, as Steve said the other night—it only sees the pleasant aspect. The aversion only sees the unpleasant aspect. And it doesn't just lead to craving; it leads into moods and emotions and reactions. It completely distorts our perception—which is where I'm going to go now, into saññā.

But the process of steady awareness, what we're really trying to give ourselves the time and space to explore here over and over... because you can see how quick and subtle this process of vedanā and the aversion and clinging can be, how much you just need to practice the awareness as an alternate way. But what starts to happen—it really does start to happen, and I've heard it in a lot of you already, even if you don't recognize it—is that where the attention goes, where the trust starts to move... it shifts from craving and aversion. Because really, in a lot of ways, you could say that's our refuge. That's where our trust is. When the chips are down, you crave, you avert, whatever. That's what we know how to do.

But it starts to switch to a trust in awareness. And for me, it's really like a love of awareness. I can be with the wanting and see the wanting for something, or the aversion, the fear of something. Okay, awareness of it. And there's a sense of appreciating the awareness more than I'm believing in the aversion and the craving. It really lets the awareness become stronger. It starts to get its own momentum, and we start to see more clearly, start to recognize these things happening. The steady awareness allows wisdom to see what's happening.

And in those moments where you really see it—for example, dying to go get a cup of tea—pick the simple things. It's good to start with the simple things. Don't start with the most complicated thing in your life. Just the little simple things here. Or someone gave a great example in the group today of just seeing anger come up about such a simple little thing. And really, the thing that the anger came up about was so simple they couldn't take it seriously. So you see how the process is working in the mind. And that's really where insight begins—where we see, "Oh, this is a habit."

This is the process. It's not really about this little thing that happened.

So like the cup of tea. How many times would I be walking and think, "I really have to go have a cup of tea." It's so strong. And just stop and be with the wanting. That doesn't occur to us in daily life that we could do that, but you can. Just be with the wanting and see how it is for you.

Sometimes people think wanting or experience wanting as being actually pleasant. So maybe it is for you. Look and see. For me, the actual wanting itself—not the idea of the thing wanted, the actual wanting—is extremely unpleasant. You're off balance and want to go get the thing. Why? So the wanting will stop. When the wanting stops, it's peaceful. It's nice. We think, "Well, that tea was so great. I'm so peaceful." It's because the wanting stopped.

So if you just keep walking and noticing wanting, wanting, wanting, sooner or later—I promise—the wanting will dissipate. Because everything dissipates. I'm not saying it won't come back in a tenth of a second. I'm not saying how long it'll be till it dissipates, but it will dissipate. Keep awareness going and notice the difference. And notice, wanting doesn't kill us. It's just an unpleasant experience. We're so in the habit of "unpleasant—jump away" that we don't stop and look at it. So, okay, wanting's like this. It's not so bad.

I play with it sometimes. Go into a supermarket when you're really hungry, but don't buy anything. Just go in and play with the wanting and then walk out. It's not going to kill you. Just play with it, little things like that.

Okay, so then moving to saññā, perception. And this is equally interesting to me. Perception—we've talked about that, right? Again, it's another mental quality arising in every moment of consciousness with every sense door experience. And the Buddhist understanding of perception is just that moment of recognition. It's based on memory and our past experiences. So I'd recognize this as a bell. You can see that perception is conditioned because someone could come in here from somewhere else and have no clue this was a bell. Our perception—we think our perception is accurate, but it's not necessarily accurate at all. It can be distorted by confusion, by delusion, by not having enough information.

So for instance, someone coming in here and not knowing what this is—what I notice is the mind likes to know, so it makes something up. It kind of fills in the gap. "That's a really big begging bowl. I don't know how the monk could walk around with that"—because it's kind of shaped like the begging bowls they carry around in Thailand. You just make it up.

I've seen my mind do that. Somebody's walking by over there. If I don't have my glasses on, I can tell it's a person—about. But that's it. But there'll be some little flick of some sign or something, and the mind goes, "Oh, that's so-and-so." Now, the chances it's so-and-so are slim, but you think it's so-and-so, and then the mind goes on from there—all the reactions and the thoughts and everything. That's a perception distorted by delusion.

Perception can also be distorted by wanting, by craving, by seeing only the pleasant, as Steve was saying the other night. I'm reminded of a friend who was talking about the second or third year of her marriage. I was a good friend with both of them, and I said, "Well, how's it going?"

She said, "Well, it's going, but you know, the work's starting now because the love glasses are off."

You know how that is. You think, "What? How come I didn't see all this other stuff that was going on before? It's so obvious now." You just hope that the hate glasses don't go on, right? That's when it's divorce time, and all of a sudden you only see the negative stuff. But this is perception that's distorted by the kilesas.

So the habit of wanting the pleasant, of craving—it can really distort perception. But perception doesn't just stop with that recognition. As the Buddha said, what we perceive, we think about. What we think about, we complicate with associations and memories and projections. And then these complications and these thoughts become out of control and assail a person, attack a person. Have you ever had that experience? You're just sitting here and your thoughts are attacking you. Go back to the beginning of perception. And it can go into moods and a whole world.

Perception describes and defines our world. It's a useful tool. We need it. It's good that I know I'm Carol and my job is to get up here and talk. It's good you don't all think you're Carol and we're all trying to get up here and talk. That doesn't work. We take turns. It's good you come in, you know the zafu, you know where you sit. That's all very useful, especially when our perceptions agree with each other. When they don't agree with each other and they harden into views, that's when there's big trouble.

So I'll tell you this little story—I often tell it because it's a great example of how perception goes right away into a description of the world, into mood and emotion and suffering. A friend told me this. She was sitting on a retreat, her first retreat, many years ago in Switzerland. There weren't any centers then, so they rented old summer camp houses up in the mountains. These were old wooden houses, not well built, with no insulation, because they weren't used in the winter.

It was a very structured sitting and walking retreat. The sitting room they were in was on the second floor, and right below it was the walking room. Because it was an old wooden house, it was really creaky. Every time anyone moved around, it made really loud creaking, popping sounds.

So she was sitting—everyone was sitting—and she was really finally, finally getting into her breath, having a good sitting. Then there started to be all these creaking, popping sounds. And she thought, "Oh, somebody's walking downstairs." Right away it was unpleasant. She wasn't tracking all of that, just thinking, "They're ruining my meditation. They're walking downstairs, and this is the sitting time. Everyone's supposed to be sitting. How dare they be walking downstairs during the sitting time." Crack, crack, pop, pop—really getting angry and upset and self-righteous, the whole nine yards.

This takes like a tenth of a second, right, from the perception of someone walking. But there was nothing to do, because she also wouldn't dare get up during the sitting and go down and yell at the person. Social pressure is sometimes a good thing. So she sat there. There was nothing else to do. She thought, "Okay." Somehow awareness came back in.

And just notice the whole thing. Okay, okay, just let it go. Just come back and be with the breath, just as it is. So awareness, this beginner's mind, awareness is just fresh and new, not carrying anything, but just meeting this breath completely new and fresh.

So she was doing that, just feeling the breath, really present with it. And as the breath came in and her chest expanded, she noticed she was leaning against the wall. And every time she breathed in, the wall started cracking and popping, and that was the noise she was hearing that she thought was someone walking.

So miraculously, the anger all went away. That's actually how insight works. With accurate perception, all the stories and the aversion and the mood—it all just vanishes because it doesn't make any sense.

This is what's going on in our minds and hearts an incredible amount of the time. And don't believe me, if you think I'm projecting—okay, just keep looking and seeing. When we're suffering from wanting, from aversion, from spinning, from what that person is doing, from what I'm doing and why can't I be different—we mostly don't, without awareness, even have the ability to see the whole chain.

Perception is really quick. Vedanā is really quick. Sometimes we're already way down the road. But even being able to—she was way down the road, all upset and angry—but awareness could come back. Don't try to retract, but just land with awareness right here, right now, just as it is. With that freshness, reality reveals itself.

As Dōgen Zenji said, if you can't find the truth right where you are, where do you expect to find it? This is the power of awareness, this simple awareness when it's not distorted by wanting, by aversion, by delusion. We can't always tell when it is distorted, but we can keep remembering, keep re-accessing.

And this is the second part of the practice, where the meditation is revealing these habits. I'm just touching on them, but really explore these. These are fun, especially perception and watching the whole story. That's really fun to explore if you don't take it personally. See how fast, how far the mind gets, and how upset you get. And then sometimes you can even play with it.

I've done this on retreat. I remember one retreat years ago, I was sitting in my room, and there was this sound of crickets. It was in the autumn. There's something about crickets that's a real autumnal sound to me, and something about that, plus I was long into a retreat, that led to a real nostalgia. That sense of autumn and the summer going—and mind you, this is New England, so winter's really coming in—and things are dying, and then I'm dying, and you know the whole deal. Crickets, crickets, hearing, hearing, and all the mood and the sadness and the whole nine yards.

So then I thought, let's just change that. The crickets. And then I had a thought: isn't that lovely? I'm out here in nature and there's the crickets and the peace. And then all these happy feelings came in about nature. We're just making it all up, you know? So you can really just play with this and see. It's kind of fun. See if it's really true. Perception—that's the beginning of how it goes.

But because it's so fast and so quick, and the habit of our mind is that we kind of like to know—like I said, I'll see somebody in my mind and I'll go, "It's so-and-so." Why can't the mind just go, "Don't know"? Why does someone come in and have to say, "This is a bell" or "This is a begging bowl"? Why can't we come in and go, "Don't know"?

We can, but there's this sense of liking to settle, of not being so comfortable hanging out in the not knowing. Maybe that's not true for you. But the Korean Zen teacher used to say, "Only don't know. Only don't know." But we like to know better.

What we perceive, we think about. And what we think about then hardens into views—this is how it is. This is a bell and nothing else. This is that person and nothing else. This is how my mind is. I'm an aversive type of person. I'm an impatient type of person. This is how it is. It just gets solidified, and we don't even recognize that.

And then that gets carried over. This is what's really interesting: when something hardens into a view that we don't recognize as a view, we believe it. Often, then, the awareness isn't quite open to recognize perceptions that run counter to the view. I call it selective perception.

So notice, for example, if you happen to be caught in the pattern of self-judging. A lot of people have mentioned that. Notice when that's the thought—that negativity, that aversion—that's distorting the perception. And the perception is that whatever's coming up in your mind and heart is proof of what's wrong with you, in whatever way your mind does that.

Notice at that time: do memories start to come up of all the wonderful things you've done? If you're walking down the path and someone smiles at you, do you say, "Oh, that's so nice"? Or do you think, "Oh boy, that deluded person is smiling at me. If they knew what was really going on in here, they'd never look at me again." Whatever perception doesn't fit, sometimes we don't even let it in.

Once I was teaching a retreat years ago, and as you see, I sit in a chair. I've done that for years. This was six days into the retreat or something. A woman was talking to us, the other teacher and me, and she was just dying of pain on the cushion—forty-five minute sit, forty-five minutes of dying of pain, sitting cross-legged. Not just a little pain and exploring it, but really beyond the beyond.

So I said to her, "Well, why don't you sit in a chair?"

She said, "Sit in a chair? You can't sit in a chair. You're supposed to sit on a cushion. Everyone's sitting on a cushion."

And the other teacher said, "Carol's sitting in a chair."

And it was like she had never noticed that. This was five days in, not two minutes into it. You could see her whole face shift—"Oh. Oh, she's sitting in a chair." This was before the days when half the room was sitting in a chair. But still, how can we so not see what's right in front of us? And we trust our perception so implicitly.

So let's plant that there. The hallucinations of perception that we don't see, that really keep us spinning—and each of these is a talk in itself—are these: we don't perceive the changing nature of things. We perceive permanence. We may intellectually say, "Yeah, yeah, yeah, I know everything changes." But on the perception level, we don't actually see it.

The three characteristics—we don't perceive impermanence. We don't perceive the unsatisfactory quality of conditioned things, the dukkha. That's why craving keeps leading us by the nose. We keep thinking it's going to satisfy us. We don't perceive the impersonal nature of things, the lack of control. We keep thinking somehow we're going to get this mind and body doing what we want. We just don't perceive that.

That's why thinking about it isn't enough.

That can get us looking, that can get us to trust the awareness, but it's not enough to change the perception. Because perception is below the level of thought. It can trigger thought, but it's actually below the level of thought.

These are two of the ways—subtle but really quite profound—that as we cultivate steady awareness, we're starting to see how the deluded mind works.

The second part then is starting to recognize, to uncover, the innate wisdom, the innate purity. This is the piece I want to end by pointing to: the steadiness of awareness, why this simple everyday awareness is actually so profound and transformative.

It's so kind of ordinary. You're starting to really notice it. You're getting a sense of how ordinary it is, how easy it is to overlook. But this is the shift that will start to really allow the intrinsic purity to come more and more into knowing, into perception, into our heart and mind—the real intrinsic purity that allows wisdom to arise.

So instead of being overly involved in all the objects of experience—the pleasant and unpleasant—and enamored of our reactions to them, which is also an experience, our perceptions, what I think about this, what I think about that, what I think about me, what I think about you, just so engaged with our reactions, over-involved with experience in a way... we're switching the real trust to the awareness. The awareness and the object coming together. It's not exactly a foreground-background shift, but it's kind of like a trust shift. We still know what the objects are, we know what's happening, but it's like: awareness of, awareness of, awareness of.

And this simple awareness—without looking, don't go looking for something, that's just wanting—but the more we're letting it in, there's awareness and object, awareness and object, not just object, object, object. The more it starts to spread out and make itself known: a moment of awareness. It's not a thing, it's really an activity. But we can feel into it. It has different kinds of senses, but it's a knowing—awake, alert. When it's not distorted by greed or craving, it's just this... someone described it as squeaky clean. The lenses of our heart and mind are squeaky clean. Whatever's arising arises, does its thing, and goes away. We're just really right there with it. It's not off at a distance. It knows what's happening. It's feeling it fully. It arises, does its thing, goes away. And we're not fettered by it. We're not chained to it in either direction.

So starting to get more interested in this, more trusting of this. One way I find helpful is to plant a seed in the back of your mind and heart to recognize in those moments—not just the big things I've been talking about, the difficulties, seeing the deluded habits—but I'm sure you must have had at least one moment, not that you had it, but there was a moment somewhere where nothing special was happening, and it was just feeling either peaceful or calm.

Nature's very helpful for that. You could put different words on it. Sometimes the word is just cool—the coolness of no kilesa acting out, the coolness of not reaching out to experience and getting all involved. Or peace. It could be joyful. It could be calm. It could be cooled out. Equanimous. Different words. The words are already too much. But noticing that.

Nature helps a lot because we tend not to... you can get involved in wanting and disliking, but it's a little easier just to feel that. I noticed on my first few retreats there would be lots of moments like that. But then I would go with the old habit of attributing that.

And it's kind of pleasant, but it's not exactly pleasant. It's really more like the peace of not getting caught up in things.

But I would attribute it. I'd go, "This is really pleasant," and I would attribute it to the beauty of nature, the fact that I'm silent, something to do with a particular experience. So I'd always attribute it back to the object, or back to the particular mood I was in, which is also an object—not really noticing, because awareness is just so available, so nothing special. Not noticing that what was actually going on was the peace of simple awareness not getting all involved in whatever was occurring, but knowing what was occurring.

I would have loved it if someone had mentioned that to me fifteen years ago, but it probably wouldn't have made any difference. You just notice it when you notice it.

So here—don't grab a hold of something, but also not just bringing in awareness when we're suffering, not just bringing in awareness when you're sitting and trying to do something or trying to see these patterns, which is interesting, that's far out. But the times when nothing special is going on—Steve's been saying over and over, just the mundane things. Fine. The things are mundane. Awareness is never mundane. Awareness is fresh and new in every moment.

It's something that Dipa Ma said. Dipa Ma—she was this amazing little Bengali lady, a grandma when we knew her, maybe four feet tall, literally. And very, very profound practice and understanding. She said her mind was filled with love and concentration and peace. That was it. But she's living a life—she's a widow with a daughter and grandson to support in a tiny little apartment in Calcutta. And she was a bundle of energy, I tell you.

Once we went to visit her in Bodh Gaya, just the year before she died, a bunch of us. We were with Joseph Goldstein, who was a long-term student of hers. And she says to him, "Joseph, you should sit for the weekend." And he's going, "Oh, well, you know, I'm busy. Maybe next weekend I'll sit." She goes, "No, sit down for the weekend and get up at the end of the weekend." Joseph just laughed. And she just looked at him and goes, "Don't be lazy." She was totally serious. To her, that was nothing.

So anyway, she said, "Nothing is mundane. Awareness is always fresh and clean. It includes everything without being distorted by anything." Like Ajahn Sumedho says, awareness is the point that includes. So far from being dull because we're not all involved—who cares, you don't know what's happening—it's just the opposite of that. Like she says: alive, fresh, clean. It's not like not caring. It's more like Byron Katie says—it's like loving what is. What is, is. What is not, is not. Don't add anything extra. I got that from Guy Armstrong's new book. I'll just put in a plug for that—it's a very nice book on emptiness.

So I just want to end with this from Nyoshul Khenpo Rinpoche:

Unfabricated ordinary awareness, unadulterated by effort and modification—naked, fresh, vivid, and totally natural. What could be simpler than this? To rest at home and at ease in total naturalness. What could be simpler? Apparently a lot of things, but this is one's birthright, one's true nature. It's not something missing to be sought for and obtained, but it's at the very heart of our being. It is actually inseparable from our uncontrived everyday awareness.

What could be simpler than this? To rest at home and at ease in total naturalness.

So let's just sit for a moment. Whatever posture you're in for the next half hour, just hang out in total, uncontrived naturalness. And if you're awake—

CHAPTER 153

Wise Intention Arises Naturally from Wisdom

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson addresses a common question among practitioners: how does the cultivation of steady, non-interfering awareness relate to action in the world? Drawing on the opening verses of the Dhammapada, she illuminates how all experience is preceded by mind, and how the quality of our intentions—whether rooted in the kilesas (greed, aversion, delusion) or in wisdom—shapes the karmic fruit of our actions.
> Wilson introduces the Pāli term cetanā, referring to the moment-to-moment intention that arises before every action and speech. She emphasizes that without steady mindfulness, we remain unconscious of these subtle motivations, operating from deeply conditioned habits. Through the powerful example of Mahā Ghosānanda, the Cambodian monk who taught mettā in refugee camps during the Khmer Rouge era, she illustrates how removing the 'landmines in our hearts' is the path to removing them in the world.
>
> The talk explores the three aspects of sammā saṅkappa (wise intention): nekkhamma (renunciation), mettā (loving-kindness), and karuṇā (compassion). Wilson explains how these wholesome qualities naturally strengthen when recognized by wisdom, while unwholesome states dissolve when clearly seen. She offers practical guidance for daily life—transforming neutral activities like washing hands or sleeping into opportunities for cultivating bodhicitta. The teaching reveals that our moment-to-moment awareness practice is not separate from compassionate action but is its very foundation.

Here we are.

It's great. It's been so much appreciating speaking with everybody and whatever you're going through—the depth of commitment that it takes just to still be here. Someone was saying, "I feel like all I'm doing is just going after pleasant. That's all I see, that's all I do." And I thought, you know, if all anyone was doing here was going after pleasant, no one would last a day here. Really, you'd be out of here. So just widen out the scope, give your mind and aspirations some credit.

I want to talk a little bit tonight about wise intention. Something that comes up frequently here, different people expressing what seems like a paradox: we keep stressing in the instructions and working with awareness that what we're cultivating is this steady momentum of awareness that's non-interfering, non-aggressive, not trying to fix.

Just watching what's occurring to see, to learn how the mind and heart works. That is what we're stressing. And then people often say, "But what about action in the world? How do we...?" You've heard those questions.

So I want to talk about it because it's not really a paradox. It's just an incomplete kind of understanding.

The first thing to say: when we talk about steady awareness, taking it with you, just notice—you've been acting. You've been acting with body, mind, and speech consistently through all your time here. And awareness has been coming along. Awareness can be aware of action. It's not either awareness or action. We're bringing awareness into our activities.

But what I really want to talk about is the steady awareness that's not interfering, that gets right into, surrenders into whatever's occurring in this moment, resting at ease, knowing it fully, feeling it completely. That turns out, in the way of the Buddha's teaching, as wisdom grows, to be the farthest thing from passivity. It's really just the opposite. It's movement into the ability of heart and mind to respond appropriately in situations rather than from these knee-jerk reactions we're not even quite aware of.

The Buddha was very clear that action is how we can tell our understanding. He said, "A fool is characterized by their actions. A wise person is characterized by their actions. It is through the activities of one's life that one's discernment, one's wisdom shines." He's so clearly saying that the clarity that comes from our understanding leads to wise action.

One of my favorite quotations is from Maha Ghosananda, a Cambodian Buddhist monk who has passed away. He was a peace activist, a teacher of wisdom and also mettā, loving-kindness, in the Cambodian refugee camps in Thailand during the time of the Khmer Rouge. He happened to be out of Cambodia when all the devastation and killing was happening, when the Khmer Rouge were killing so many millions of Cambodians and basically most of the monks and nuns. Most of his family was killed, so he was touched directly. It's not that because he was out of the country he didn't feel it.

He went to the refugee camps where all the displaced Cambodian people and families that were left were living. Because it was a largely Buddhist country, many of the people were Buddhist, and they really would respect him. He would go and make a little temple in the middle of the refugee camp. When he'd come and the people would gather, he would start just quoting the Buddha, the really profound teachings: "Hatred never ceases by hatred. Only by love alone does hatred cease." Just to have that depth—you'd have to really know that, not just say, "This is a good idea, I think I'll tell it to these people whose lives have been devastated." But to go in and really actualize that. Later he led peace marches throughout Cambodia. He was quite an activist.

He once said this at a demonstration against landmines: "All the landmines in the world have been planted by the landmines in our own hearts. So to understand and thus remove the landmines in our hearts is the way to remove them in the world."

This is, I think, very directly the link between the wisdom that arises through the steady, non-choosing awareness—not choosing to just pay attention to what we think is good and ignoring what we don't, but the steady awareness that reveals what's really going on—and where this wisdom and the ability, the natural response of heart and mind, really shifts. We can bring it along, but it shifts naturally from being caught in greed, in ill will, in hatred or cruelty, to renunciation, which is just renouncing the greed, to generosity, to mettā, loving-kindness, compassion.

Sure, there are many things we can do, ways in our life that we can actively cultivate these, and that's a whole other talk. That's certainly true. But first, to really start to see that with the wisdom that comes from accurately recognizing what's going on in these crazy minds of ours—as we start to watch, the natural effect of wisdom is that our motivations start to change.

That's what I want to talk about—this quality in our heart, in the mind, of intention or motivation.

I mentioned the first two verses of the Dhammapada in one of the groups today. The Dhammapada is one of the most well-known sections of verses from the Buddhist Tipitaka. These are the first two pairs, very well known:

All experience is preceded by mind, led by mind, made by mind. Speak or act with a corrupted mind, and suffering follows as the wagon wheel follows the hoof of the ox.

Corrupted mind. Guess what makes a corrupted mind? It's subtle. We haven't talked about it too much—our three friends, right? You know what our three friends are?

Speak or act with a corrupted mind, and suffering follows as the wagon wheel follows the hoof of the ox.

The second couplet: All experience is preceded by mind, led by mind—the word for mind being the same as the word for heart—so mental activity, made by mind. Speak or act with a peaceful mind, peaceful heart, and happiness follows like a never-departing shadow.

The point being that the seed of all action, according to the way the Buddha saw it—and we can explore this in our experience with our steady awareness—the seed of action isn't the act itself, but the intention, the quality in the heart-mind that gives rise to the action.

The way the Buddha talks about intention, it's a very specific mental factor or quality of mind. In English, intention can have a couple of different precise meanings. One is the really broad intention, aspiration—like what Steve and Alexis both spoke about: What is my intention in life? What's most important to me? Or even, my intention when I go back is to do X, Y, Z. It's still kind of broad, even if it's for a whole day or a whole year or a whole life. It's a wide-ranging thing. But we often use the same word, intention.

That's not the specific intention we're talking about here. It's a Pali word, cetanā, and it refers to something in any mind moment. The energy kind of coalesces—there's a little feeling of a little "uh," a little impulse that leads to speech, that leads to action. They say even thoughts, but let's stick with noticing it before action and speech. Before every movement, every speech, it's not personal. It's just, again, the whole series of cause and effect. But this energy kind of coalesces and gives a little—about to do—just, and then there's the movement, then there's the speech, then there's the voice. So it's a moment-to-moment thing, very precise and immediate.

And it arises, of course, due to whatever conditions are going on. When the Buddha spoke about wholesome or skillful, unwholesome or unskillful speech and actions—wholesome karma, unwholesome karma—he was very clear: it's the intention that marks something as wholesome or unwholesome. In other words, what brings suffering for ourselves or others.

So often we tend to think about how something looks. We could be trying to do a good thing for somebody, and it looks like the right thing, but we could be filled with fear or filled with aversion—let me do this thing so they can just stop suffering and get out of my face. You know what I mean? Even though you're doing something that's ostensibly kind, it still isn't a bad thing to do. But internally, what's being fed, what's being strengthened in one's own mind-heartstream at that moment would be the aversion, or would be the fear.

Do you get a sense of what I mean? The same action from the outside could be arising from very different qualities that are motivating in the heart and the mind. That's the whole source of skillful means. When we keep talking about being in pain during a sitting—when should you move?—we kind of want a list: go for this amount of time, and then when it's like this, move. And we always say no, it totally depends on the situation and the state of your mind, because it's really about what quality motivates that movement. It could be aversion. It could be compassion. It could just be clear seeing, a kind of neutral recognition: Oh yes, this is causing pain, the reaction is getting too strong, so I'll move. All of those look the same from the outside. Are you getting a sense?

So that's the seed of action. It's so subtle a thing, happening every mind moment, that we need this steady, steady awareness we've been cultivating to begin to really notice that this is even occurring much of the time. We might notice the grosser ones. We might notice, you know, I really feel a sense of love and I want to do something to help you.

But moment to moment, because the mind and heart is arising and passing in every moment, it can be changing so quickly. So without the awareness, for most of us a lot of the time—not always, but the reason the Buddha talks so much about really bringing in the awareness to see the difficult aspects... We also want to see and appreciate and really feel the wholesome, the beautiful qualities. But the reason we want to keep noticing when greed is arising, when aversion is arising, is because it's so familiar. We so often don't recognize it. It is, as we were saying, the default mode. So often things are happening underneath the level of consciousness. It's just habit, just habit driving the bus—the difficult habits of mind.

Tara Brach in one of her books gave a good example of just how habits, the default mode, can operate. Mental habits take less energy, and they can just operate underneath conscious awareness a lot of the time. I love the example she gives: if you're driving, listening to music or whatever, and changing lanes on a busy freeway—now, a lot is really going on, isn't it, in the mind? Seeing and hearing and thinking and checking the perceptions, the movement of the hands, the movement of the eyes, the movement of the leg. There's a whole lot going on. But if you've been driving for a long time, that's just almost second nature, isn't it? You can change lanes and be drinking coffee. And if you drive on the freeway in LA, you know, people are doing everything while they're driving. It scares me to death, but they're putting on their makeup, they're shaving, they're talking on the phone, they're drinking their coffee—because they're in the car for two hours on the way to work. But anyway, you get a sense. It's just operating below the level of consciousness a lot of the time.

And that's what's happening frequently with these habits of our mind. We don't quite see what's going on, and it's the steady mindfulness that lets us start to see it.

Someone mentioned something very common in a group: being aware, say, of a pain in a particular part of the body. You're watching it, watching the mind. Awareness is there. You see the aversion come. You see it go. You see the sensation—it's not moving.

Then all of a sudden, you move without having recognized or consciously said, "Now I'm going to move." Can anyone relate to that? You watch it ten times, and all of a sudden you moved. That's the moment.

In that moment, you've had all these intentions. For whatever reason you're not going to move—"I'm not going to move, I'm exploring it." But as soon as awareness goes away, it's just, "Oh yeah, right, move." It's unpleasant, we move, I'm out of here. It's just what we do from habit. It's not inevitable. But you see why awareness is so key, because that's a little thing. Big picture, so you move—so what? It's not the end of the world. And you're wondering, why do we make such a big thing out of not noticing you moved? It's not that you failed, but this is really a little example of what's going on.

So start exploring: have you ever noticed where you have some really good intentions in your life? Really sincere, but you can't quite follow through for some reason. Like, "I'm going to sit every day." Or, "When I go back home, I'm not going to get drawn into that difficult interaction with my family member. I'm just going to radiate love and compassion." Have you ever tried that one? But we mean it, right? How come we can't do it?

A good example from a retreat with Sayadaw U Tejaniya a few years ago at IMS—because it was shared in the group, I think I can say. Someone went into the dining room, and the menu was up on the blackboard. She saw something on that menu that wouldn't make her really ill, but something she really couldn't digest well, that wasn't good for her to eat. So she saw it, and wisdom came up, just with compassion: "Oh, I'm not going to eat that, because I care about my body." And then she found herself heaping it on her plate, eating it all, and going away feeling rotten.

So she said to Sayadaw, "How could that happen? I had the intention to care for my body and not eat that, but that's not what happened." He made one of his jokes, you know—he said, "Well, it was like weak wisdom and strong kilesa." Which is partly true. What I would say is that moment of wisdom, of really seeing with compassion—that was a true moment of intention, of wisdom and compassion. But then, a lot of the time, we have that, and there's not the steady momentum of awareness, because every moment is a new arising mind moment. So that moment was a moment of wisdom and compassion.

Then the awareness was kind of abandoned, or whatever. And then the old habits arose—well, that looks good, I think I'll eat it, it really tastes good. And just the greed habits come up, or the delusion habits. I don't know what was in her mind.

So you see, you can get a sense of where steady awareness matters—not to make yourself do the right thing, but to watch and even learn why you're doing the other thing. "I really don't want to eat it and I'm eating it, a big pile of that stuff." Well, let the awareness come along, and we start to see what's going on. Because until there's the awareness and the wisdom of seeing how these patterns work, I don't know about you, but I don't really believe it. We just kind of check out. But seeing how it's working—to me, that really brings in the saṃvega, the urgency, the willingness to keep on practicing, to keep on cultivating awareness.

I don't mean this in a discouraging manner, but the more I've been watching and practicing, the less you take it personally, the easier it is to just see: oh, this is how these patterns work. If greed's in the mind and we're not aware of it, it's easy for it to arise in the next moment. The more I've practiced, the more I've seen how really deeply conditioned these patterns are.

Quite a few of you have been saying, "Oh my God, I'm just seeing craving, craving, craving everywhere. What's the matter with me?" I'm going to say: nothing. There's a reason the Buddha picked it as the cause of suffering. It wasn't just like, "Let me pick something." What's the cause of all the suffering in our minds? Craving. It must come up once in a while! Of course we're going to see it a lot. That's a good thing if we can keep on with awareness.

But with lack of steady awareness, the sense of urgency comes to me because without the awareness, without really understanding these patterns and allowing the wisdom to appreciate and grow the wholesome motivations, the wholesome intentions—in moments of stress, in moments of crisis, when awareness falls away, what's the default mechanism that's going to come up?

I read this one little statement frequently because it so touched me. I heard on the radio a discussion with a young man who was in prison, I think for life. He was young. I didn't hear anything else about him or what he did. He was in prison for life, and they were having an interview with him. He was saying with so much sincerity that he wished he could take back the three to five seconds of his life where this violent act just came up. Three to five seconds. But can you relate? Because it's not an act of will—"I'm not going to act from aversion anymore." With all the wider intentions in our heart, if we don't know how our mind and heart works, if we're not trusting, if we're not continuing to cultivate awareness whenever we can, to just keep watching—and to be willing to bring in the awareness when the unwholesome motivations come, and meet that with kindness, with compassion, not with judgment.

That's the whole point of this non-judging awareness: to see how it's working. If we are bringing in the awareness with judgment or trying to fix it, there's no way to see what's really going on. As soon as there's ill will, as soon as there's some kind of not wanting to see it clearly, we can't recognize accurately what's the appropriate thing to do.

The Buddha said—one of my favorite quotations: "When one is dwelling with a heart or a mind that's obsessed or oppressed by ill will"—and he says the same thing for greed and the same thing for delusion—"and does not understand as it really is the escape from arisen ill will, on that occasion"—he's not saying this is who you are forever, he's saying on that occasion—"when the mind is obsessed with ill will, one cannot know or see as it really is one's own good, or the good of others, or the good of both."

So he's not saying bad or wrong. He's just saying when the mind's obsessed by ill will, when it's obsessed with greed, you can't see what's good for you, what's good for others, or what's good for both. Even when we want to do the right thing, if we're not in the habit of bringing in awareness and just watching what's going on in the mind, we can get so tricked. We just don't know.

I often feel this sense of actually respect for the power of the habits, the unwholesome habits of mind. But that same respect will start to come in for the wholesome habits, because they develop naturally in the light of awareness.

Some years ago, not that long ago, maybe three years ago, I was in a relatively new museum in Atlanta called the Museum of Civil Rights and Human Rights. It's all about the civil rights movement in the fifties and sixties—a very moving museum. But just the point I want to make now is on the top floor, it's talking about human rights and various historical moments. It's mostly writings and photographs, pointing to various times and histories of human rights crimes. One point just said: "While systematic human rights crimes often start with a small, powerful group, they can only be carried out if others are persuaded or coerced to join in or deliberately look the other way." Basically, for ordinary people—

What would I have done if I was in the Holocaust? I don't know. I haven't been in that situation. For ordinary people, the pressure to take part in abuse or to look away is real. They risk punishment, they risk death, they risk danger to their families—all kinds of things, huge fear. So this exhibit was just making a point of that, bringing it home, inviting you to look in your own heart and mind. It was a whole great process in that museum.

What it makes me think of, when I was visiting Dachau, or reflecting on any of the horrible things going on in this country—the violence and the racism and all kinds of suffering—is that if we're not really tuning in to our own heart and mind in a moment of stress, who knows what's going to come up? Who knows what we would do? Like that young man in prison, we might want to take back that three to five seconds.

We can't control all of that. And this isn't to make us feel scared. This is to hopefully inspire us to really have urgency, out of love and compassion for ourselves, for our families, for all beings. The place where this starts, the best way we can manifest that in the world, is by beginning with what we're doing here—understanding how this inner work and life in the world come together.

So all this "being with, being with, being with" isn't some esoteric mental game that has nothing to do with life in the world. It's exactly the reverse. Really coming to know how we would act in such a situation—we don't know until we're there. We know what we want to do. So here, every moment that there's the ability, the willingness to allow awareness to feel, to notice what's going on—that's a moment of strengthening this power of seeing. And that's what gives rise to natural wisdom.

What's so beautiful, really, is that in the light of wisdom, the habits driven by kilesa, acting from kilesa—it just doesn't make sense in that moment. I don't really like to talk about "letting go" of a particular action or intention, because to me that phrase can have a little tinge of aversion—"get rid of this, I'm letting go of this." But when we just are with it without adding the extra judgment, it stops making sense.

As the Buddha said of his own practice before he became fully awakened, he was watching his mind. He said, "I have two types of thoughts. I can put them on two sides." So he's not the Buddha yet, but he was pretty good, right? He was pretty far along. And still, he said, when he was walking or sitting, being very committed and paying attention, thoughts of greed would come up in his mind. Thoughts of ill will would come up. Thoughts of cruelty would come up in his heart.

So maybe we could cut ourselves some slack. If this guy, who was so close to being a Buddha, had these thoughts come up—it's just habit. And he said he would just notice: "Oh, a thought of cruelty has come up. If I really explore it, I see that it leads to my own suffering and the suffering of others. So I don't pursue that thought." But he's not saying, "Oh my God, I can't believe this came up, this is terrible, what am I going to do?" He's just looking at it: "Oh, a thought of cruelty has arisen in my mind." Really, it's awareness.

Then he saw the same for thoughts of ill will and greed. And on the other side, a thought of generosity would come up, a thought of renunciation, a thought of friendliness, of mettā, a thought of compassion. And he'd say, "Oh, I see this has arisen. And as I look at it, I see no harm to myself or another that can come from being with this thought, from contemplating this thought. Even if I stayed with this thought for a day and a night, I see no harm that could come from it." Except—he's so practical—"I could tire myself out. I could tire my body and my mind from just staying and thinking for so long." So then he stopped thinking about it. He's just so practical.

This is what he calls wise intention, the second step of the Eightfold Path. The first step is right view, wise understanding. We begin there, and it keeps cycling deeper the more we practice. Wise understanding—how we understand the world—gets deeper and more comprehensive. But even in the beginning, in a moment of wise understanding, in a moment of paññā, a moment of wisdom, the natural expression is going to be that the intention of greed, the intention of ill will or hatred, isn't what arises. Rather, it would be one of renunciation or generosity, of friendliness, of compassion.

So just noticing in your own mind, tomorrow or tonight—those moments when you're aware, when the heart and mind is perhaps calm, or whatever's going on—you can see that the heart and mind isn't kilesa-ridden at that time. You know what I mean?

It's not riddled with greed. It's not riddled with ill will. Maybe it's just neutral. But maybe it's also wholesome. Just notice that. In that moment, there's like a space.

You know, when there's self-involvement—remember, I read from Desmond Tutu the other night—when we're so self-involved, our whole world shrinks. We create a sense of self and other, and difficulty, and fear. When it's not kilesa-ridden, just notice this: there's a kind of space. And in that space, the kind of wisdom—you don't have to think this—but the whole situation is recognized just more accurately. And if there's something to do, to say or to do, the response can just come up much more naturally, appropriately, from connectedness, from recognizing the whole situation—either letting go of clinging, generosity, friendliness. It's just the natural response, doing what's obvious.

Sure, we can cultivate these qualities in our lives, but to notice that they're the natural effect, the natural response of wisdom—I just want us to keep exploring that, because that's what really, for me, feeds and strengthens faith. The confidence. Because it's not about "you're so great" or "I'm so great" or "I can do it." That's just a self-involved way of looking. The confidence is in the laws of nature, the laws of dhamma. It's like having confidence in gravity. You don't have to think about, "Do I have confidence in gravity?" I hope you're not going around thinking about that.

And so the more we start to see both that the unwholesome, unrecognized, just makes it easier to come up in the next moment—but to see that with clear seeing, with wisdom—then what more naturally arises is the renunciation, is the friendliness, is the non-cruelty or the compassion. Learning to trust that. It's not like you have to do it with an act of will. Just like hopefully we're learning at times to trust that awareness arises again by itself. Have you noticed that from time to time? We keep pointing it out. Sometimes it feels like a lot of effort, right? But other times you're lost in thought. You don't think, "In five seconds I'm going to arouse awareness." It just comes. All of a sudden it's here. That wasn't your act of personal will. Just like that. Noticing this, the faith can deepen.

So then I want to talk a little bit about these three wise intentions. Mostly just because we've talked so much about the kilesas, it's really important with steady awareness and wisdom to also recognize the wholesome. When we've talked about the five spiritual faculties, a lot of the reason is to recognize when wholesome qualities are present in the heart and mind. Because when wisdom recognizes the wholesome—this is the Buddhist language—it feeds the wholesome. This is another thing we can trust, have confidence in.

When wisdom is recognizing the kilesas, it's just, "Oh, look at that greed. Greed is like this." You know, when we're caught in it, we're caught. But when wisdom's watching it, as Sayadaw U Tejaniya says, we're seeing how greed does its job. And you see what it does, but it's not being strengthened by the awareness. But the wholesome, when it's recognized by awareness—actually, it grows. Awareness feeds it. I mean, wisdom feeds it. Awareness doesn't feed it; wisdom feeds it. And that's a really cool aspect of the way the universe works—that wholesomeness strengthens wholesomeness, that wisdom strengthens wholesomeness. It's not all, "I've got to sit here and get all these good qualities, get rid of all these bad qualities, and do it now." Good luck.

So each of these could be a talk in itself, but I just want to talk a little bit about them because they're all wonderful. Renunciation, which is actually a very happy quality of heart and mind. It's not the biggest one going in this culture, I would say.

I think it's often misunderstood. The Buddha too, you know—there's a sutta where he said when he first heard about renunciation, his heart did not leap up at the thought of it. So we're in good company.

But I really think, and this is from my experience, that we don't understand what renunciation actually means. Remember, we're talking about intention—a quality in the mind and the heart. It's not external so much as in the intention.

Renunciation wisdom is recognizing how greed works, which we've talked about a lot. And renunciation is what happens when greed is seen through in a moment—it's the quality of mind that simply renounces the greed itself. We think of renunciation as getting rid of objects, but this is the same misperception that we tend to have with greed as well. We miss feeling and noticing the greed because we're looking to the object. Greed is a real quality of mind, this thirst, this tanha. And we'll say, "Well, but it's okay if there's greed because this is a good thing I'm greedy for." Or we think, "Oh, I'm so greedy because that's a bad thing I'm greedy for." And we're skipping over the quality in the heart and mind.

But exploring—and here we're back to awareness, we're never going to get away from awareness, never—it's good because, as Alexis was saying, it becomes our friend. A friend that never leaves us, because we need it.

So renunciation is about recognizing the suffering aspect of greed. And in a moment when that's recognized, just for that moment, it dissolves. It doesn't mean there's no appreciation for beauty or for whatever the thing is. It doesn't mean we can never have the thing. But it means the greed is abandoned in that moment.

I think I referred to this example in another talk during the last retreat. A woman came in and said she was completely blown away by exploring this quality of greed. She was in a sitting and had this incredible desire—and desire in English covers many different mental states, so I'm deliberately not using that word. I really mean this quality of greed—to scratch an itch. You can imagine how strong it was in a sitting, how it felt. And she wasn't scratching, not because scratching was bad or good, but just to explore that quality of greed. Awareness was really exploring how the greed felt. And she said it was so strong, it was amazing.

Then suddenly it flashed in her mind—this is what I think I mentioned—when she was a teenager and had this unbearable crush on somebody in her high school, just filled with greed. And she said, "Oh my God. This is exactly the same quality, the same intensity of greed to scratch this itch as it was when I was in high school thinking I was going to die from greed for this person."

That was a huge insight. Do you get a sense of it? We think it's about the object. No, it's about that quality in the mind. And seeing that in that moment, there was a real moment of wisdom, of insight. It was like, "Whoa, this is crazy." And it just for that moment dropped away. Just for that moment. This is what we explore. It's the craving that creates the dis-ease, not getting the object.

So renunciation does actually breed a real quality of simplicity in the heart and mind, a kind of contentment. Because with less craving, you can still do whatever you do, but you just have less need to go out and fill it up. And it's not like you're left barren and empty. It's actually the sense of simplicity of just being able to be present with contentment and appreciate what's here.

On the other hand, one could live very simply out of a forced idea of renunciation that has nothing to do with what's actually going on in the heart-mind. Someone said to Sayadaw U Tejaniya once, kind of projecting, "Oh, you're a monk, you became a monk after you were grown—amazing renunciation—you must feel so pure." He won't put up with stuff like that for very long, and he said something like, "Don't make up a whole story. Just because someone's a monk, they can have the same amount of desire as you did in your life, only it's just channeled into two objects." Because there's not much you can have—you can have food, you can have robes.

That's what they get. And believe me, I've hung out more with nuns. They can get into very incredibly fine details about the robes. I've had friends that are nuns go on about the length and how this hem is and how this folds and this one and that one. The same amount of greed can come in.

So watching the renunciation is really this quality of just not needing to go with the greed, starting to feel the suffering of it. And it moves into generosity. Because when we're not holding, there's just this impulse to offer whatever is needed. And the thing about generosity—maybe Steve will talk more about it tomorrow—it's such a state of happiness. Generosity, just that act of offering and the act of receiving when you don't shut it down, the whole circle of that, it's a really happy state of mind and heart. It's really wholesome.

But I think we all know, we've had it implanted in us, that giving is good, helping is good, and it is. But to actually tune into the moment-to-moment intention, that motivation, that movement, that quality in the mind and heart—first there's the renunciation, the greed just isn't making sense, and then just the offering—it's a very happy state because it's actualizing the interconnectedness, the non-separation in a way. So I'm just dropping these seeds in. Explore that. Recognize it.

The Buddha even says to contemplate at times: if you're feeling lost in negativity, sit and contemplate past acts of generosity of your body, speech, and mind. Not to say "I'm so great," but because in contemplating, in remembering it, it can bring up a happiness, a wholesome happiness that can actually bring a brightness to the heart and mind. It's really like countering the kilesas. The same with our sīla, by the way, the same with our non-harming conduct.

So moving into the next one, I'll put them together: friendliness and compassion, non-harming, non-ill will. Obviously, what arises when the habit in a moment of reacting to unpleasant or suffering with resistance or fear or aversion—that's our habit. And often I can see in myself that I want to do something to help someone, and still it's better to do it than not, but at times the motivation really isn't compassion. Because compassion is a real connecting with suffering. It's this quality that we bring in with our awareness. Being fully present, without resistance, without clinging, without blame—really surrendering into it, feeling with. That's the quality of compassion, or the quality of friendliness if it's not as much suffering.

Every moment that awareness is meeting experience, just like it is, with that freshness, with that kindness, being fully present—that's actually, in my opinion and experience, a moment that's feeding and strengthening the habit of heart-mind, of compassion, of mettā. So all these seemingly nothing special moments of awareness, how our mind is meeting this moment, is the practice of wholesomeness, of mettā, of compassion, of non-greed. I think that's just really important not to think about but to recognize, to feel it. Because when we recognize the wholesome, again, it strengthens it and it strengthens our trust and faith.

So compassion, mettā, arises not from resistance to the difficult, but from connection, from simple being with, without the aversion that keeps us from seeing clearly. And then again, the point is, it's natural. It's a natural expression of a moment of paññā, a moment of wisdom, a moment of presence.

James Baldwin had a wonderful line: "An enemy is someone whose story we have not heard." I really feel that. Once we hear the story—and that could be the story of your knee pain, right? You really hear the story—that connection's there. That's compassion. It's natural when we're not lost in the aversion and the self-centeredness. Not making someone the other.

But it's not so supported. It's not really what I've learned in society, even though I verbally learned it. What kind of works in the culture, what's supported in the culture, is another thing.

The Dalai Lama, when asked about what looks like a lack of compassion in human society, said, "Well, perhaps we just pay less attention to compassion and caring. We reinforce it less. Whereas in some sense, we fully embrace hostility and anger as an emotional state, fueling or reinforcing it. If we were to give the same amount of energy, attention, and reinforcement to compassion and caring, they would definitely be stronger."

How I relate to that is just that I've grown up with a sense that really in the face of the difficult or scary or whatever, anger is not only the best defense but the only defense, the only protection. And you can't just change that intellectually. But the more we see the strength that can come when the heart-mind is open and not lost in ill will, when it can see and recognize more accurately, the strength of appropriate action that can come from compassion, that can come from mettā, is really amazing. And we have more sense of what can be appropriate to do.

It's the last opposite of being a doormat. It's not like, "Oh, metta, compassion—okay, just walk all over me." Metta and compassion include us, right? It's not metta for everyone else while this one here doesn't count. It encompasses the whole situation. But the power of coming from a different angle than what's usual in society—it's really powerful when it happens.

There's another story I heard on NPR, on a podcast called Invisibilia. I don't know if you've ever heard it—they look at different ways the mind works, things that affect society. This particular story is a great illustration of what they call "non-complementary behavior." I really think it's about not just going along with the flow we're taught in society.

Two families—I don't know where this was, it sounded suburban somewhere—were out in their backyard on a summer evening, having a picnic dinner together at a table, drinking some wine, surrounded by trees and bushes. All of a sudden, out of nowhere, a man appeared with a gun. He just slid the gun in between two people. They didn't see him coming or where he came from. He threatened them, said, "Give me your money."

Of course they were startled, scared to death. They said, "But we don't have any money." He was holding the gun right up against someone's head. First they tried saying things like, "What would your mother think if she saw you doing this?" He said, "I don't have a mother."

And then, all of a sudden, one of them said, "Would you like a glass of wine?"

He was completely taken aback. "Oh... okay." So he had a glass of wine, sat down at the picnic table with them. He's drinking wine, they all start talking and chatting, having this whole conversation. The people were still scared, but this is non-complementary behavior. They're having wine, they're talking, and after a while he says, "You know, I can see I came to the wrong place. I'm going to go."

He gets up, and then he says, "First, I want a hug from everyone." So they all hug him. They give him a glass of wine to take with him. He leaves.

They, of course, run into the house and lock the door because they don't know what's going to happen. Nothing. Afterwards, they went and opened the door, and he had drunk his wine and taken the glass and left it very neatly right in front of the door for them to take back. That's it.

Cool, isn't it?

It's not like it's always going to work that way, but notice the power of clarity it takes to just, in a moment, come from the beautiful, the wholesome. It doesn't always work, I know, but sometimes it does. And it's not an easy thing to do.

Metta and compassion don't necessarily mean loving something. I used to think that metta meant I have to love people who are acting horribly. And of course, the mind would immediately go into resistance about that idea. But I really appreciate the way Ajahn Sumedho describes metta in regard to difficult people or situations. He says it does not necessarily mean loving it in the way we usually think about love, but rather witnessing the unpleasantness in a situation, a thing, a person, or in oneself without creating anything around it. That's what he considers metta to be.

Does that sound like anything we've been talking about all week? Just witnessing the unpleasantness—or the pleasantness, or the neutrality—in a person, a situation, oneself. Really present with it, without creating anything around it. And out of that, wisdom arises and the wholesome qualities get stronger, really more naturally.

This is our path. And it arises only ever in this moment—how awareness is meeting this moment, what qualities are present in this moment. This is our path.

This is our practice. We can't do anything about the past. The future is just an idea now. All the moments we've had here, you know, non-aggressive mindfulness and the momentum it builds—it's, in some ways, I think it's the most powerful thing in the world for really bringing compassion and loving-kindness and some kind of greater humanity to ourselves and to the world.

Remember what I read that Martin Luther King said: nonviolence means you not only refuse to shoot a person, you refuse to hate a person. But this isn't coming from the "I refuse" up here. It's coming from that deep inner wholesomeness that only comes from this ongoing practice, from the practice of the heart and mind meeting the difficult without creating anything around it. Meeting the beautiful without creating the craving around it.

And so, as you go through these days, as you go back home, experiment with this steady awareness. This first part you've seen a lot, more and more clearly and deeply—some people were saying that today for yourselves—the actual suffering, the unsatisfactory quality of the unwholesome mind states.

Someone was describing that about really deep anger today. Being with it, being with it. Caught, caught, caught. But at some point, it was so clear how much suffering that was. If you just keep noticing that without judgment, the same with craving. Caught, caught, caught. Or wanting, wanting, wanting. Or not caught—like, "I love it, yeah, I'm going with it." But at some point: oh yeah, this is really suffering too. This isn't a judgment. And it doesn't mean that craving won't come up the next moment or anger won't come up the next moment. But the more that awareness is recognizing it, this is the wisdom. This is what will allow the spontaneous dissolving of the wanting, of the ill will in a moment.

What allowed whatever person it was at that dinner party to say, "Have a glass of wine"—you know, that's not something you could plan ahead. There had to be a moment of spontaneous dissolving of fear that one could do that. Just even for a moment.

And then the other thing is to recognize and appreciate and really feel the wholesome moments of quality in our mind. When there isn't clinging. When you walk outside or you go to eat and you're enjoying the food but you're not lost in rabid greed about it—I'm sure there are moments like that. Or when you're not in aversion, and that person who's just been bugging the hell out of you walks by and there's just nothing. You don't have to love them, but there's nothing. There's no aversion. Appreciate. Appreciate the wholesome moments because it really starts to go in and feel it, just like we're feeling the difficulty, the kilesas.

And then just a little thing to leave you with. Noticing there are many ways we can work. When we understand right attitude in our mind, we can really see when the mind and heart in a moment isn't colored by ill will or craving. Then we can use this steady awareness with any meditation technique. Because then we can do it without getting caught in the striving, without getting caught in the ill will of trying to fix. And there are many ways of cultivating these wholesome qualities, different kinds of meditation and inner life. All the different retreats could talk about different ways.

The only thing I want to say now, just to play with here, is: sometimes when you're not all lost in aversion but just going through the day, to consciously bring in a shift of attitude, to bring in a sense of compassion or a sense of sharing, just in your mind—not even doing anything. This is something that Mingyur Rinpoche talks about a lot. It can really change the whole tone of things.

Just simple things. Say you're washing your hands and just thinking, "May I wash and clean my hands to be of service to all beings." Something like that. Something that makes sense to you. That's all. You just start doing that. It feels so different from just washing your hands and running out. Or every time before I eat, I think, "May I eat this food to strengthen my body to be of service to all beings." Whatever makes sense for you when you remember it. And not just saying it—like when I was a kid and my parents always made us say grace before the meal. Each of my siblings, we had one, and we would say it so fast that you couldn't even understand the words.

Thank you. Okay, now we'd eat. Not like that—actually knowing what you're saying.

But play with that. So this is my favorite. I often use this. I'll share it with you. Even when you go to bed, when you're lying down to go to sleep—Mingyur Rinpoche offers this teaching about how intention can transform neutral activities into wholesome ones.

So sleeping. When you go to bed at night with the mind of bodhicitta, with the mind of cultivating awakening to be of benefit for all, we aspire that our sleep be the cause of increased capacity to help all beings.

That's nice, isn't it?

So you can even go to sleep with a good conscience. I'm going to sleep. May my sleep strengthen my capacity to help all beings. Doesn't that feel different?

And it's so easy. Just to incline the mind, the heart, toward the wholesome.

So that's the heart of what we're doing—with some small examples of how it moves into action in our lives.

Thank you all for your kind attention.

Let's sit for a moment.

Sitting or standing or walking or sleeping, for the benefit of all beings, in this next half hour.

CHAPTER 154

Sammā Sati - Mindfulness and Right View

Carol Wilson · 59 min

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the essential distinction between ordinary awareness and sammā sati—right mindfulness as a factor of the Noble Eightfold Path. She presents a working definition of vipassanā meditation as "experiencing the mind and body directly from moment to moment with right understanding," emphasizing that technique alone is insufficient without the proper quality of understanding informing our attention.

Wilson explores how cultural conditioning and identity view (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) distort our perception, using vivid examples from her time in Burma to illustrate how worldviews shape what we think we "know." She draws on the Buddha's teaching about the cowherd from the Dvedhāvitakka Sutta (MN 19), showing how mindfulness can be either precise and careful or broad and relaxed depending on conditions—both are valid expressions of sammā sati. The Tibetan master Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche's description of shepherding provides a parallel illustration.

The talk addresses the exhausting cycle of taking experience personally—creating concepts, exerting effort toward goals, and setting up targets in the mind. Wilson offers the liberating alternative: recognizing that nothing is personal, that awareness doesn't care what's occurring, and that every moment of clear recognition naturally allows wisdom to arise. She encourages practitioners to appreciate mindfulness itself rather than seeking confirmation through particular experiences, finding fulfillment in what she calls "the fresh instant of the present moment."

So tonight I mainly want to speak about mindfulness. Seems appropriate. And just mostly talking about recognizing it and pointing to how it can be such a powerful tool in service of clear seeing, in service of awakening.

One definition of Vipassana meditation that I often use and like very much is that meditation—Vipassana meditation, insight meditation—is experiencing the mind and body directly from moment to moment with the right understanding. Those are three aspects that I think go together. The mindfulness part is experiencing the mind and body directly. The right understanding speaks for itself. And "from moment to moment" is the continuity, the steadiness, the perseverance, which is also essential in terms of practice.

But I want to start by talking about experiencing the mind and body directly with the right understanding. That's really key. Our tendency often is to talk about or think about meditation as beginning from learning a technique and doing it right—and if we get it right, the understanding will come. It's true, of course, that the more we practice and the more steady our mindfulness gets, that's actually a condition that allows for wisdom to arise. Right understanding deepens kind of endlessly as we go through our practice and our life. But to think that we just do the technique and it doesn't matter what quality of understanding is in the mind that's paying attention—that is a piece of ignorance, a mistake.

What makes it sammā sati—sati being the word for mindfulness, and I'll be using mindfulness and awareness to mean the same thing in this talk—is the quality of understanding present. Sammā sati is right mindfulness, the path factor of the Eightfold Path. The Buddha also talks in a few suttas about micchā sati, or wrong mindfulness. So it's not that if you experience the mind and body directly any old way, it's mindfulness.

What does wrong mindfulness mean, very simply? It's when you could be experiencing the mind and body directly, but the motivation could be quite unwholesome. For example, a thief is extremely careful, aware of the body and the mind, to sneak into a house and do all those things to steal something. You could say that's sati in terms of experiencing the mind and body directly, but it's not sammā sati. It's not path mindfulness. It's not understanding. So that's a very simple way of describing it.

The right understanding, basically—and I'll talk quite a bit about this—is when the moment of experiencing the mind and body directly is not distorted or unrecognized by greed, by hatred or aversion, or by delusion. In the moment of sammā sati, right mindfulness, we're just experiencing sensation or sound or sight or thought, just as it is.

We all know that. We've all been practicing a long time. We know what mindfulness is. But I just want to point out a bit about practicing and really bringing in, from the beginning, a sense of the right understanding—just the beginning right understanding. You don't have to wait until the end of the path.

Right understanding is a translation often called right view, which is also a path factor—the first of the Eightfold Path. I like the translation "right view" because for me I find it to be quite literal. The way the mind is viewing experience is what gives rise to how we think about things, to how we respond, to how we understand.

When the Buddha was talking about what frees our hearts and minds, what the liberating wisdom is, it's not something that doesn't exist now. It's not that somehow we move to another plane of existence where everything's all love and light and wonderful. You know that, right? We're not going there, because it's not there. Rather, it's like suddenly the scales, the distortions drop—even if just for a moment—and the mind recognizes things accurately.

To me it's so far out. Liberation from clinging, from confusion, arises naturally from accurate recognition of things as they have come to be in this moment. Not from making things in this moment different. And this accurate recognition isn't something we can create with an act of will. But we can start to get interested in also seeing how the inaccurate recognition comes to be.

Mingyur Rinpoche, the Tibetan teacher, says: if we want to be happy, we must figure out which causes and conditions lead to well-being. Similarly, if we do not have a clear understanding of the conditions that create suffering, how could we possibly expect to free ourselves from it?

Our steady mindfulness practice means we're going to be spending all this time recognizing both. To really see, as the Buddha said—everything he taught us, as far as I can understand, is not about taking on board a new intellectual philosophy, even though there are twenty volumes of teachings. In all of those twenty volumes, it's not about memorizing them, although one can.

There are in Burma still, they call them Tipitaka Sayadaw. Sayadaw means teachers. There are a few still alive in Burma who have memorized the complete Tipitaka, all twenty volumes, which is as it was in the days of the Buddha. They're quite revered in Burma. So one could do that, and you would gain a lot of wisdom that way. But that's not why the Buddha was teaching.

It's so that we really recognize that suffering arises in a moment as conditions come together in our own mind and heart stream. Freedom from suffering arises in this moment when those conditions are seen through with right understanding, with wisdom. Mindfulness, samma sati, right mindfulness—not distorted by greed, hatred, confusion—is the tool that allows for clear seeing.

So just a few examples, two different examples that I like, to give a sense of how natural it is when we see clearly and the confusions drop away.

One very simple one. If you watch young children learning—I have a new nephew, he's about two and a half, so it's been fun visiting. He doesn't live around here, but each time I go, you see a new stage of learning.

Very simple: when he was around two, when they're playing with wooden blocks, you have a big wooden thing with different shapes—a triangle and a circle and a square—and the child has blocks in those shapes and tries to put the block in the matching hole. To us it's obvious, but to someone who doesn't know, you keep trying to put the triangle into the circle. It doesn't work. You put the square into the triangle. It doesn't work. You throw the blocks all over the place, you scream, you yell, you get upset, right? Because that's what happens when you don't understand. The not understanding leads to frustration, impatience. You blame the blocks, or if you're older, you blame yourself. Why am I so stupid? Why can't I do it? I see my mother do it. She just goes boom, boom, boom. It works for her. Why not for me? Of course, a two-year-old isn't thinking like that. They're just throwing blocks around. But that's an expression of the frustration.

Then they keep doing it, and it's just a natural function of the mind-body process getting older. Suddenly, you know, we say the penny drops in English, and he goes, "Oh right, triangle goes in triangle. That's how it works. Going in a circle doesn't work." He just suddenly sees how they go together. In that moment, that's like a moment of insight, recognizing the way it works. That's all. All the frustration, the self-blame, the other-blame, the throwing of blocks—it just drops away. Because it doesn't make sense anymore. You don't have to decide to abandon the frustration because, oh yeah, the triangle goes in the triangle, the circle goes in the circle. So simple.

It's like that. It's a law of nature.

So you get a sense. It's like how we stop fighting gravity. If you want to really suffer, go out and keep trying to fly. Fight gravity, get upset. But we don't do that. I hope. I hope you're not doing that. These are laws of nature. So you get a sense of what I mean.

In terms of right understanding—which we simply begin our practice with, not the endpoint of course—we can just begin to look and see: what is it that hides or blocks for us accurate recognition? Because it's accurate recognition that allows us to come into harmony with things as they are, the mind and body as it is, the world as it is, the way things work. And from that we can respond in an appropriate manner. We don't have to throw the block through the window. We can respond appropriately. But first we have to see clearly.

So what blocks for us? Obviously the habits of our mind. But even behind that, where do the habits come from? I'm going to give another example of how the views, the way that we view the world—based to a great extent for all of us on our culture, our upbringing, the environment we grew up in, the environment we live in, all kinds of things.

Because that's the cultural background of most people, the sense of the way the Buddha talked about the world—like for example, the Buddhist cosmology of different realms of existence—that's just taken as how it is.

So you might notice in the metta chant that we've been doing, there's a place where it says, "all devas," those are celestial beings, "all human beings, all those in lower realms." In Burma, that's just a fact of how the world is.

So I was there one year, and we were taking many photos of different things. At one point we were with a group of people offering food dana, food donation of rice and beans to some villagers after a strong hurricane—what they call a cyclone there—where the rice paddies and their food had really been destroyed. We were just offering and doing this beautiful thing. Offering in Burma is quite special, because there's a whole ritual around the offering and the receiving that's really dignified and beautiful on both sides.

Anyway, later, looking at a friend's camera—one of the friends who had taken many photos—in some of the photos, all over them, there were these perfectly round, bright light kind of things. As we were looking at it, two friends, one who is Burmese and one who is Western but had spent twenty years there as a Burmese nun, they said, "Oh, that means that's devas. Those bright lights in the photos, that's devas. Devas were there."

And then another friend, also a nun, who is a scientist with a PhD in biology, said, "It's just the way the light's working in the camera and the water and the refraction," and she gave all these explanations. I showed the photos to some friends here and they also offered all the scientific Western explanations.

And it's like—who knows, right?

If it was just the camera, I went back and looked in my camera. I'd taken a few photos, and those round things were also there. Who knows if it's devas? Who knows if it's just a quirk of the light in that particular camera? But to see how the Burmese people, the people really steeped in that culture—there was no question. They know that's devas. And the others had no question either. They know it's some refraction of light in that particular case. They know it.

At least we didn't come to blows about it. We were just like, okay, whatever.

Can we just be with not knowing? That's the mindfulness place. What do we actually know? Seeing. The perception is round, bright light. That's it. You don't have to create anything around it. That's the quality of mindfulness—really present. Maybe it's this, maybe it's that. Who knows?

Although I will say, my scientist friend later—this is a bit of a sidetrack, but later she went to Tiruvannamalai, Ramana Maharshi's ashram, where there's this really sacred mountain. And there is something there.

I spent a lot of time there. I was totally surprised. I'm not into sacred mountains or anything like that, but there's something there, I'll tell you.

Anyway, on the full moon – this is in India – many Indian pilgrims come to walk around the mountain. It's a thing you do, a pradakshana, walking around the mountain. It's quite some miles. And in India, when many people come, we're talking a million. I'm not exaggerating. We're talking a lot of people when many people come in India. So it's just solid people walking around this twelve-mile route at night.

My friend sent me this photo, but I don't have it on this computer so I can't show you. But it was just these round things all over the place, everywhere. She wrote me, "Okay, okay, maybe it's dust." Who knows?

But you get the sense that this is what affects how we perceive. And rather than getting into right or wrong, what mindfulness is doing – the steadiness of mindful awareness – is bringing us into stepping outside of having to know, being caught up in our worldview altogether. Not having to justify or say it's right or wrong. The worldview is going to come up, we recognize it, but the moment of mindfulness is just stepping outside of either "Oh yeah, it's like this" or "It's not like this." Just seeing. Who knows? It's like this now. It's like this now. It's like this now.

And when we're not adding the extra liking, disliking, aversion, whatever – it's just what it is – that steadiness, the perseverance, is what allows for wisdom, which is accurate recognition of the mind-body process of things as they have come to be in this moment. That's what allows it to arise.

I use that language on purpose. The steadiness of this clear mindfulness, with right understanding, without all the overlay of opinions of liking and disliking, allows wisdom to arise. It's not an act of personal will. It's not that if you do it right, you've got to figure out what you need to see and try hard enough and see it. In fact, that's just the opposite of what's going to help you see how things are.

I found that a huge relief. Oh, my job isn't to figure out everything and see it and create wisdom. My job is just: what's happening now? Learning to almost love the simplicity of mindfulness, rather than getting so involved in what I think about each experience – what does it mean, is it good enough or bad enough, what am I doing wrong, what am I doing right, is this on the right path or the wrong path?

Just what's happening now. Ball of light. Seeing. Finish. What's happening next? I wonder what it is. Wondering. Just this moment. Just this moment.

Coming to really... well, for me, it's almost like loving mindful awareness. I was feeling that on the way up here, thinking about this and that. And then just awareness of what's happening right now. It gets almost tangible in some kind of way, mentally tangible. It's just like this now. And that's so complete in the moment. It's a moment of being purely present, without needing to push away or include something that's not here, or push away what is here. Just whatever is here. Maybe it's precise, maybe it's broad – doesn't matter. But the quality of experiencing the mind and body directly, with right understanding, is just, in a way, the sense of total presence.

There was a quotation – I put it later, but I want to say it now – from Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche. He talks about "the fresh instant of the present moment." I like that. Just feeling the fresh instant of the present moment. That's all. The what of the present moment is whatever it is, changing every moment.

That's not as important as just recognizing, coming into trusting that fresh instant, that quality of direct experiencing with right understanding.

One of the habits, the views that keeps re-arising for pretty much all of us—and Winnie mentioned it last night—is one of the largest habits that obstructs accurate recognition: this sense of identity view, the sense of taking any experience in a moment as me or mine. Of course, that's not going to just go away, but we can begin to recognize how it's arising and functioning in a way that distorts our recognition of experience.

Just in a very light way, you can notice how it comes up throughout the day. There's just the six sense experiences arising and passing pretty much endlessly, right? Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, sensations in the body, physical sensations, and the whole mental realm—thoughts, emotions, moods, mental images. That's just what's happening over and over and over again, every waking moment. Have you noticed that? Are you waiting for it to stop? But this is what's occurring.

Now, mindfulness is just noticing what's occurring in this moment without adding extra. But in terms of this identity view, you might just—very lightly, don't make a big deal about it—you might notice how, say you're sitting, you're out walking, there are many sense experiences. A thought comes, it just comes and goes: "Oh, it's Tuesday today," or there's a sight, there's a sound, you're feeling the sensations of the feet. Many, many experiences are just coming and going. They may be neutral, pleasant, unpleasant, but no big deal. They just come and go.

But suddenly there's one that somehow the mind privileges as "this is me," or "this is happening to me," or "this is mine." And suddenly the whole experience takes on a different quality. Do you know what I mean? And to see then what effect that has. We react.

A couple of days ago when it was so hot and muggy, for example. Walking, there's a sense of heat, there's a sense of hearing, all the different things, and suddenly one becomes, "God, I'm so hot." Even that could just be a thought coming—"I'm so hot"—and it goes. But this thought, "I'm so hot," becomes privileged as my thought. And then the experience of the heat, of the mugginess: "Ah, that's so unpleasant. That shouldn't be. What can I do about it?"

So it moves from a sensation and a thought to my thought, my sensation. And then there's the reaction—it's unpleasant, the aversion comes, all kinds of thoughts come about what can I do about it, or what's the matter with me, if I was really a good yogi it wouldn't bother me, or whatever way your thought goes. It doesn't really matter which direction. But when there's that privileging, when it's all about me or mine, that just keeps going. And instead of just "oh, heat feels like this," it becomes my heat, or that heat, or "how can it be like this? How am I going to last for six weeks in this kind of heat? And the rooms aren't air conditioned..." And then there's flies, and there's mosquitoes. And pretty much you're like, "If I wanted it like this, I could have gone to India. I could have gone to Burma. You don't need to come to Massachusetts for this kind of weather."

It just gets out of control pretty quickly, right? And there's suffering, there's confusion, there's just agitation through clinging, which is what the Buddha called it. Agitation through clinging.

A friend of mine was telling me one of her Tibetan teachers described it in a way that I liked very much. He says, you know, everything's just arising and passing—our thoughts, all the different sense experiences coming. There's a sense of our body, but it's all nature. There's nothing personal. It's just all nature. But then suddenly something becomes personal, mere mind. And what had been wide open, all-inclusive, just nature occurring, suddenly gets all solidified into what he called "the narrow bandwidth of being a human being"—somehow separate from everything else.

I like to just get this sense of it: suddenly solidified, me against the humidity, or me against that other person who's walking slower and making me feel like I'm a lousy meditator, or whatever it is. Solid. Everything has gotten solidified, and it distorts our perception.

It distorts our perception, it leads to more thoughts, it leads to more wanting. We get really seduced and entranced by the mind's reactions to these things. And there's no way when that's going on unrecognized that we see accurately.

So when the mugginess is a problem, or "I'm too weak," or "I can't be with it," or "I have a medical condition, there's no way I can continue" with whatever it is—there's no way to recognize accurately: "Oh, heat feels like this, sweating feels like this, aversive feelings in the mind feel like this." It's not that the aversion has to go away, but the flip from the narrow bandwidth, the solidity—"this is really how it is, I'm like this, I'm separate, and this is causing me trouble"—to "oh, it's just like this now," without adding anything extra: that's when clear seeing, when insight can begin to arise.

This sense of taking it personally—anything—is one of the most pervasive patterns in our experience. For pretty much everybody, whatever our background, whatever culture, whether we believe in the devas or don't believe in the devas, this is what the Buddha was talking about. This sense of taking it personally is one of the biggest wrong understandings. When we don't recognize it's arising, it prevents accurate recognition. It keeps us spinning, spinning, trying to be happy but not understanding why we're not happy—because we keep looking in the wrong direction, which leads to clinging, leads to aversion.

Ajahn Sumedho says, "We create ourselves through our thoughts and we cannot create an ultimately peaceful self." So take that as a challenge, because you're probably not going to stop creating yourself with your thoughts. We're not here to stop it, but we're here to bring awareness to it, to bring mindfulness to it. It's not that the reaction stops. It's not that I still don't have the worldview of devas or not devas. But mindfulness can see: "Oh, this is muggy feeling, this is unpleasant heat, this is aversion—feels like this." That's the difference.

Mindfulness, as Ajahn Sumedho calls it, is the point that includes. It includes anything. That freshness of the present moment, whatever is here—it's like a totality of presence, just for a flash. Don't try to extend it in time. All we can do is be fully here for this moment. That makes it more possible in the next moment. But that moment is all-inclusive. This moment is all-inclusive. That's the power of simple sati.

We take a lot of things personally, don't we? I'm staying with simple examples, but I hope you understand that the simple example of the heat and the reactivity, the reaction of aversion, taking it personally—both the heat, the unpleasantness, and the aversion—we're taking it all personally when we're caught up in it. The only way to bring mindfulness, to explore the quality of heart and mind, to see what's creating the suffering, the only way to be able to do that in a balanced way is in a moment when we're not taking it personally. And that includes the aversion, that even includes the habit of sense of me. It's just a thought. Nothing is personal. Nothing. It's all just, as Ajahn Buddhadasa says, nature. We are nature. It's all aspects of nature.

The aversion arising from the unpleasant feeling of the heat that arose from a thought about it—that's just conditioned from habit. The more we react, the more that aversion reacts to unpleasant; it becomes an ingrained habit and shows up when we're not aware of it. That doesn't mean you are a bad, aversive person. It means that's just aversion doing its job, as Sayadaw Tejaniya says. We want to get interested and see: What is aversion's job? How does it work? What is fear's job? How does it work? How does wanting show up, and what's the effect when wanting is happening in the mind?

The quality of mindfulness with right understanding isn't to stop things from happening, but to get interested in whatever's happening, because none of it is personal. And that's what really allows for this quality of—I call it affectionate curiosity—that mindfulness can bring to whatever's arising. Without that, the effect of taking it personally is we really get caught in striving and reactivity, completely entranced by the habitual reactions of the mind and heart to whatever's occurring.

We start or continue in our habit of looking to experience, or whatever object of awareness is happening, for self-confirmation, for meaning, don't we? When you think about coming in to talk to a teacher, it's so habitual—you think, "What should I tell them?" And you want to say the good things, whatever the heck that means to you that day. But the "good things" really is either it feels good, usually, or somehow we think it means we're getting somewhere.

Where are we getting? Where are we going to go? There's nowhere but this moment. Yet we think we're getting somewhere. It's as if we're looking to a particular experience to give us meaning.

You come in and say, "I'm so sleepy, so tired, my thoughts are all over the place." And we take that experience to mean, "I'm a completely useless human being on the face of the earth. I shouldn't even be here." And why? Because I was sleepy in the ten o'clock sitting.

If you really question people—"I'm sleepy all day, the whole day"—and you ask, "Really, the whole day? How about lunch?" "No, I was sleepy then." "How about when you were walking?" "Oh no, I wasn't sleepy then." "So when were you sleepy?" "Well, the sitting after breakfast." Oh my goodness. Okay, you're sleepy, all right.

Sleepiness is like this. The difference between taking it personally and not is the difference between throwing your blocks through the window and simply putting the triangle in the triangle. Oh yes, sleepiness is like this. No big deal. It's a completely different experience. And that's strengthening the habit of mindfulness.

We think mindfulness is only strengthened when something incredibly good is happening, or when the mind is really steady. No. In fact, I can tell you from personal experience of forty years—actually it's more than that, which is really embarrassing—but it took me a long time to trust this. Sleepiness, that kind of low energy, is one of my hindrances of choice, let's say, one of my good friends, especially on retreat. And it took me ages to see that getting all resistant to it—"I'm not going to fall asleep, I'm not going to fall asleep"—and somehow thinking that's mindfulness? I'll tell you, that's not mindfulness. That's aversion. Aversion is aversion. Mindfulness of aversion is mindfulness, but aversion masquerading as mindfulness is aversion.

So if I'm sitting here and I don't fall asleep through sheer force of will, what have I really been feeding? What have I been cultivating in that sitting? Aversion and tension.

When I finally understood this—okay, sleepiness is like this—I realized something important. Sleepiness is dull. You think, "Well, I'm not mindful. It's not clear." Of course it's not clear, because the job of sleepiness is dullness. You're not going to have incredibly clear awareness when you're sleepy. It's going to be dull. But there's still awareness if you're there with it.

What I started to really come to trust—you can't see it happening in the moment—but when you go through a period where you're really sleepy, and you didn't just check out in your pajamas for the whole day, you did actually keep on trying to sit and walk to some extent, then suddenly you're awake again. It will happen. I promise you it will happen. You will be awake again—probably at three in the morning—but you will be awake again. And there's awareness. There's mindfulness.

Well, that didn't just drop from the sky with no causes and conditions. Everything is lawful. During that period of dullness, you were practicing: dullness is like this.

Sleepiness is like this. But that's mindfulness—albeit weak and dull, it's still being cultivated. It's very different from just giving in. You're feeding the wholesome rather than feeding the unwholesome by saying, "My God, I won't fall asleep." So really looking and seeing: what's feeding the wholesome, what's feeding the unwholesome? Feeding the wholesome is what supports our waking up.

Nyoshul Khenpo again—he was a wonderful Tibetan Dzogchen master. I'm taking his teaching in context to fit this discussion. When we're really practicing without a little bit of right understanding, when we're taking it all personally and we don't recognize that, we can practice extremely sincerely, putting in a huge effort. But with this wrong understanding, it's all about me trying to create something.

As Ajahn Sumedho said—I know I'm jumping around, I'll get back to Khenpo—people used to say, "Don't talk about identity view or this sense of creating self in the beginning because it's too complex." But he said, "Why not? Why spend twenty years practicing through the delusion of me trying to get somewhere? Why do that? Let's start seeing accurately in the beginning."

In this way, when we don't see, when we're coming from the sense of me, when taking it personally, as Nyoshul Khenpo says, we exhaust ourselves in three ways. Probably more, but I like these three. The first is we create fabrications, we create mental concepts. The second is then we exert a lot of effort. And then we create many targets in our minds.

Can you get a sense of this? When we're taking it personally, when it's about me, first we create many concepts, we construct all this stuff—like the example I gave about it being humid and hot. That's all that's happening. Yet from that, in thirty seconds or two seconds, we can be into a whole thing about our health and our past and our future and our retreat and what we're going to do. We're creating all these concepts from that sense of identification.

Then we create a lot of effort. The effort may be in the so-called environmental world. How can I get cool? You're running all around. You're going to L.L. Bean to order one of these fans with a battery that you see at tennis matches. And how can I hide it so nobody knows what I'm doing? I can't have it in the hall, so maybe I won't sit in the hall. You can spend days like that about whatever. This is a lot of useless effort based on a lot of concepts and a lot of goal orientation, creating many goals. Your goal is to get cool. Well, next week it'll be freezing, and then your goal will be to replace the fan with a little heater. You've got to get those gloves with a battery. This is our life if we're not seeing what's going on.

No wonder we're exhausted. No wonder we're not happy—because everything's always changing. If you just notice, "Oh yeah, muggy and hot, feels like this," it's so much easier. So much less exhausting.

And not just environmentally, but internally the same thing happens. Whether with mindfulness—"I think my mindfulness should be more precise. I think I should be feeling my breath more really precisely"—we set up a sense of how it should be, a concept. Then we put in a huge amount of effort, but it's effort based on wanting, on greed, personal effort. You're going to know it eventually because it brings conflict, it brings tension, it brings frustration.

In fact, if you feel frustrated, pretty much for sure there's some idea in the back of your mind that you think should be happening and it's not—or something is happening that you think shouldn't be. And you think the frustration is about this thing that isn't or is happening, but the frustration is actually just the wanting based on a concept in the back of the mind that sets up a goal, sets up a target, that we're putting in a huge amount of effort to try and make happen. Completely exhausting.

Yes, we do put in a lot of effort, huge energy here, but the effort is that of the steadiness of just remembering mindfulness in this moment, and now in this moment. As soon as we start aiming it to try and make something happen, we're moving into those three ways of exhausting ourselves that Khenpo is talking about. So let's not put in a huge sincerity of effort all towards trying to make something happen, when really the effort could be into just relaxing back into what's happening right now.

In terms of what I just mentioned, someone might have the idea that mindfulness should be very precise and really try for that. I think Joseph mentioned this morning that mindfulness isn't about a particular technique. Sometimes we can get ideas like that—mindfulness means it's very precise, or mindfulness means it's more broad and all-inclusive and settled back. This is right mindfulness, or that's right mindfulness. But as I think Joseph mentioned, both of those are fine. It's not about whether it's broad or narrow. Mindfulness is that quality in the citta, in the consciousness, in the mind-heart, of clear recognition in that moment—sammā-sati—free from distortion of greed, hatred, confusion. And that can be very precise, or it can be broader, more all-inclusive.

In fact, the Buddha even mentioned both ways in a couple of suttas. So I just want to read that so you know it's not just us saying it's whatever. Someone said to me once, "Whatever I come in and say to you, you're just going to say, 'Just notice it, it's all fine.'" There was some truth in that. But the noticing part is what's important.

In one sutta, the Buddha is talking about two types of thought—it's an important sutta, I'm not going to talk about the rest of it—but he's describing his exploration of his own mind before he was the Buddha, before he was awakened. He said he noticed two types of thought. One type is thoughts of harmfulness, thoughts of greed, thoughts of ill will—the unwholesome, the akusala kinds of thought. And when he really looked at it, he saw that the more he thought about them, the more they led to his own suffering and the suffering of others and tired him out. Then he saw on the other side what you could call wholesome thoughts—thoughts of non-greed, thoughts of non-ill will, mettā, thoughts of non-harming, compassion. And he saw that as much as he thought those thoughts, there was no harm that could come from them to him or another—unless, he's so practical, he thought too much all night and could tire himself out with thinking too much. Totally practical.

That's just the context. So he says, "Whatever a person keeps pursuing, whatever is the habit of your mind, that becomes your inclination." So if we keep thinking about aversion and not recognizing it—not recognizing it being the salient thing—it becomes a habit.

And then, talking about when he's noticing the habits of harmfulness, of ill will, of greed, he said, "It is just as in the last month of the rains retreat in India at that time, in the autumn season, when the crops are ripening, a cowherd would closely watch his cows. He would tap and poke, he would curb them, he would make sure that they don't go into the crops that are ripening. Why? Because he sees that there would be a fine or public censure or difficulties arising if he let his cows wander into the crops and cause them damage." Very simple. "In the same way, I saw for myself in the unwholesome states, unskillful qualities of mind—I saw drawbacks and defilements and suffering. And I saw that in the wholesome states of mind, there are the blessings of renunciation and the aspect of cleansing."

And then when he saw the wholesome states, he said, "It is just as in the last month of the hot season, when all the crops have been gathered into the village, a cowherd would look after his cows. While resting under the shade of a tree or out in the open, he simply keeps himself mindful. He simply needs only to be mindful that there are these cows." Very much as Joseph was saying from the sutta: "Oh, there is a body." Just has to know there are these cows. And then the Buddha says, "In the same way, I simply needed to be mindful that these wholesome states are here."

Both of those, he says, are ways of practice. So when it's wholesome, when the mindfulness is getting its own momentum, there's the sense of the more broad quality—settle back under a tree with the simple steadiness of mindfulness: these states are here, these states are arising, whatever they are. Yet at other times—and he linked the other times to when there are difficult states of mind—we're still aware of them, but the quality that we bring into the mindfulness, it's still relaxed, don't get me wrong.

They're both relaxed because we're not trying to change anything. But when there are unskillful qualities zooming in, we need to have a little more sense of care. A little more sense of not just settling back and going, "Okay, whatever," because aversion is zooming in in the background. Instead, it's recognizing: "Right, aversion is like this." It's still mindfulness. It's still relaxed. You're not going, "Oh my God, aversion! I've got to be really careful and keep it from coming." It's not that. But it's just being a bit more careful.

Both of these qualities are needed. When you're more open and settled back, you're aware there's a state—there's hearing, there's seeing, there's thinking, there's wanting, there's bliss—that things are coming and going. And people think, "Oh, that's really nice. It's all just coming and going. I've got it now. This is balanced mindfulness." And then all of a sudden a memory comes up, or someone starts making a heck of a racket, or you remember whatever. Something comes and all of a sudden—zoom—something has been identified with, something's coming up strong. The whole thing is rocky and you think, "But it's right that I need to be open and relaxed." And you try to maintain what you think is right mindfulness, and what happens? You just keep getting carried away, carried away, carried away.

So you go, "Okay, let me be a little more careful. Maybe I specifically come and feel sensations in the body." Not to block that stuff, but to reconnect with balanced mindfulness. Mindfulness that's not distorted by the kleshas. And then you can recognize the aversion. You need to just be careful enough to keep the mindfulness sharp and steady so that we see it when it comes. Because these habits are so familiar. We don't tend to notice them. "Of course I'm aversive to humid, muggy weather. Who wouldn't be? That's normal." And we're off. But with mindfulness: "Oh, aversion's like this. Aversion's like this." Sometimes precise, sometimes relaxed. Both are mindfulness.

I want to share another example from a contemplative master. I've known this teaching for a long time, but I was reading it when I was on a little self-retreat this fall, and I just have to share it because it's so perfect.

Nyoshul Khenpo was a truly great Tibetan Dzogchen master who died at the end of the last century. He's talking about what was really a hard life when he was a young monk at age ten in one of the monasteries in Tibet. He said, "At the age of ten, my job was to take care of the sheep that belonged to the monastery, sometimes shepherding the animals out in the wilds. When it was sunny and nice, I would stay outside, very relaxed, feeling happy, just watching the sheep munching the grass." Just like the cowherd—simply aware, like that.

"But sometimes it was raining and freezing cold with hail and wind, and I was without shelter, and I could not see the sheep who were lost in the mist in the ravines. So I had to chase them everywhere in order to collect them and bring them back at night. I knew exactly how many there were. I recognized each of their faces and called them each by name."

I love that, because in a sense, that's the quality of careful mindfulness. Sometimes with different techniques, we shouldn't confuse the technique with the idea that mindfulness only exists in a particular form. So for example, in the way the so-called Mahasi technique or Sayadaw U Pandita would teach, mindfulness is described as really coming face to face with experience, naming the object, seeing it clearly. It seems to be more object-related—very much in the way that Nyoshul Khenpo was really looking out for each sheep, recognizing them, able to give each one its name, seeing them face to face. Sometimes that approach is really helpful and skillful.

Then there are other times when it's just settling back under a tree, all the things coming and going, the sheep munching, and you're not focusing in on each one. That's also mindfulness.

So seeing for ourselves, it's not about how mindfulness shows up. Both of these approaches are very useful. What matters is that quality of just experiencing the mind and body directly, from moment to moment, with right understanding.

Whether it's precise or whether it's more broad, both of these can be right understanding—the fresh instant of the present moment. This is the meditation. This is the work of the mind that is knowing. This is really what we're practicing here.

And that's where we come to the continuity or perseverance. When we talk about right effort, this is where the effort comes in. Not for a goal, but to really completely open into this moment with right understanding. Because every moment is Dhamma—Dhamma in the sense of the truth of things, the way things are. As the great Zen master Dogen said, if you cannot discover the truth right where you are, where do you expect to find it? It's only accessible here because that's all there is.

So this retreat—we're not trying to achieve something in six weeks or three months or at any time. It's really practicing recognizing mindful awareness, recognizing right understanding, just meeting the mind and body experience as it is, noticing when we're suffering, how that's arising in the moment, getting really interested in that. Noticing when there's suddenly that aha moment of, "Oh, I'm holding on to wanting it to be different," and it all just falls away. How that arises in a moment.

Noticing that mindful awareness can be the thread through all of these, that there's nothing, no experience we have that needs to be outside of mindfulness, outside of awareness. When you notice you're putting something to the side and saying, "This has to change so I can practice," that's the place to really get interested. Because awareness doesn't care what's occurring. Everything that arises—as Joseph said—in our day, in our mind, in our body, is a key opportunity to come back into mindfulness if we've gotten out of it, to recognize awareness again. There's nothing that needs to be steadied, that needs to be kept away.

So Sayadaw U Tejaniya often says, as mindfulness is remembered, that's our perseverance, that's our effort—to just remember mindfulness every moment that we can remember it. And in the beginning, it is a personal effort. It's not just happening by itself. We're up here talking, we're having sittings, we're meeting with you, all to help you remember mindfulness. But it starts to develop its own momentum. I'm sure most of you, if not all of you, know that—where it starts to get easier, where you're not having to remember it every moment, it starts to come in by itself.

And we come to appreciate the mindfulness itself, the quality in the mind-heart that's present and aware. We come to appreciate that more. That becomes much more fulfilling than trying to have a particular experience or confirming or describing ourselves by experience. Like I was saying when I was coming up here tonight, I suddenly remembered, "Oh yeah, right. Just the freshness of the present moment, just that." In that moment, it doesn't occur to want something else. It doesn't occur to judge or evaluate. It's just this, but totally present and awake. It's like, "Oh, what's the problem?" And the mind goes, "I'll tell you what the problem is. There's plenty of problems." "Oh, problems feels like this." It's always available to come back again.

This steadiness of mindfulness, when it starts to get its momentum, is the condition for insight wisdom to arise. From Sayadaw U Pandita: "When mindfulness is persistently and repeatedly activated, wisdom arises. There will be insight into the true nature of mind and body." It's not like if you want it or if you're good enough. It's just a law of nature. It's how it is. The more moments of clear, accurate recognition—we recognize accurately—we're going to see how it is. We see how it is, wisdom arises. Try and stop it.

We do try. We try really hard. We really try to get in the way and not see how things are. But that's why we set up this structure. So by hook or by crook, you're going to get mindful and see how things are. "Oh yeah, what was the problem? There's no problem." I've had so many moments like that—"Oh, what's the problem? There's no problem."

Five minutes later, big problem, big problem. A minute ago, there was no problem. Why can't I get back to no problem? It's like, no, there's a problem now. Okay, problem feels like this. We kind of just land in where it is. Not an act of personal will.

But as Mingyur Rinpoche says, and I'll close with this: once we start our path of Dharma, every practice is an awareness practice. Every activity is an awareness practice, an opportunity to practice awareness. Every activity here—broad, narrow, whatever it looks like, wholesome, unwholesome—as soon as we're aware, that experience brings us back into clear seeing.

Nothing is excluded.

Thank you for your kind attention.

CHAPTER 155

The Dart: The Buddhist Explanation of the Difference Between Awakened and Unawakened People

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson offers an in-depth exploration of vedanā (feeling tone) as taught in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta and illuminated through the Salla Sutta (SN 36.6), known as "The Dart." She examines the Buddha's essential question: what distinguishes an awakened being from an ordinary person, given that both experience pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feelings?
> The teaching reveals how unrecognized feeling tones trigger automatic reactions—resistance to the unpleasant and craving for the pleasant—creating what the Buddha calls being "pierced by a second dart." Wilson draws on the wisdom of Mahā Ghosānanda's insight that "all the landmines in the world have been planted by the landmines in our own hearts," showing how these subtle mental movements shape our speech, actions, and ultimately our suffering.
> Through vivid examples ranging from meditation hall seating choices to watching tennis matches to the Dalai Lama's remarkable presence with suffering, Wilson demonstrates how steady mindful awareness offers an escape from the endless cycle of seeking pleasant experience to avoid the unpleasant. She emphasizes that freedom doesn't mean abandoning appreciation for beauty or becoming indifferent to life, but rather finding refuge in awareness itself—a peace not dependent on the presence or absence of any particular feeling tone.

So tonight I want to speak about the second foundation of mindfulness that the Buddha spoke of in the Satipatthana Sutta, this quality of mind-heart called vedana in the Pali—what we're calling feeling tone in English, which we mentioned a couple of days ago in the instructions. We use "feeling tone" rather than "feeling" because feeling is a more global expression in English. We use it to talk about moods, emotions, sensations in the body. So I'm going to use feeling tone for vedana to be quite specific about what I'm speaking about.

To start with, let's think about why the Buddha gave such emphasis to this fleeting, subtle, and quick mental experience. Why did he emphasize it so much that out of the whole realm of our human experience to be mindful of, when he divided our entire experience into four things, he picked one of those four things as vedana? He's really emphasizing the importance for us to notice it, to bring mindfulness to this experience, to this quality.

Remember that everything, as far as I can tell, that the Buddha chose to share came from the motivation that if you can explore this, if you can see and understand how this works in your own experience, this is a key to really releasing the suffering that arises moment to moment in mind and heart through ignorance, through not understanding. This is really at the heart of the phrase Ehi Passiko, where the Buddha says, "You too, come and see." It was never like, "This is what you need to know, memorize it, write it down." Well, they did memorize it, but that's because they couldn't write it down. But the point was never to memorize it, pass a test, have debates. It's "Look, you too—come and see, explore."

So I want to invite us tonight to explore vedana in our experience, using as my text one of the discourses, the suttas of the Buddha.

From what I can see, in choosing this subtle quality—this pleasant, unpleasant, neutral quality—the Buddha did so because it's right at the heart of the moment-to-moment arising of suffering and confusion in our minds when we're not aware of it. Sometimes it can seem, even to me, who is totally devoted to this practice, that there are times on retreat when we're really looking inward, getting so fascinated by these subtle movements of our heart and mind, talking about these subtle little things. Sometimes it's fascinating, and sometimes it's like, "What's this got to do with anything? The world's going up in flames and we're sitting here looking at these little movements of unpleasant and pleasant."

But the thing is, what we have to study is this body and mind. It's these subtle movements that lead to how we speak and act in the world. We're like the laboratory for everybody else. We're the laboratory of how human beings work.

I think of Mahagosannanda, who was a wonderful Cambodian monk and a very great peace advocate after the Khmer Rouge took over. He went to all the refugee camps with Cambodian refugees. His whole family was killed during the Khmer Rouge time. He would go and really bring Buddhism back to the camps, getting everyone together in chanting the metta chant, bringing metta in the midst of such suffering. Very powerful. And then once the Khmer Rouge were gone, he would lead peace marches back through Cambodia when it was still quite dangerous. He was a great peace activist and monk.

One thing he said in a speech once: "All the landmines in the world have been planted by the landmines in our own hearts."

To understand and thus remove the landmines in our hearts is the way to remove them in the world. And I would say the bottom line is that the landmines in our hearts—in my heart—arise from the unseen habit of greed, of hatred or aversion or fear, of delusion in the mind. When that's unseen and it leads to intention, it leads to action, as Winnie was talking about this morning. That's why intention is so key.

Learning to explore vedana, to recognize it, to just get interested in seeing how it arises and how it works, is a wonderful way—really a key way—to start to both understand how these so-called landmines arise out of habit in our heart, and how, with steady mindful awareness that gives rise to wisdom, they can be removed as the tendency for them to arise starts to be abandoned through wisdom. That's really how I see the importance of this.

So this sutta, this discourse of the Buddha, is called "The Dart." A dart is like an arrow. I'll read pieces of it and then give my impressions.

"An untaught worldling, O bhikkhus, experiences pleasant feeling, feeling tone, vedana. He or she experiences unpleasant vedana and experiences neutral vedana. A well-taught noble disciple likewise experiences pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feelings."

And then comes the question that is really the key to the sutta, what makes it interesting: "So what is the distinction, what's the difference that exists between a well-taught noble disciple and an untaught worldling?"

Essentially he's saying everyone experiences pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feelings. So what's the difference between an awakened being and a regular person going through the world like us?

I think that's a pretty compelling question. It gets me interested. I'm interested to see what he has to say is the difference.

First, just describing vedana, which I did a little bit, I'll remind us: vedana being, as he says, a sudden, subtle feeling tone in every moment of conscious sense door experience. As I think has been said, perhaps by several of us, all that is ever occurring that we can be aware of is any of the six sense experiences. All day long: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching physical sensations, and the mental realm—thinking, images, moods, emotions, mental states. That's all that's happening.

It's on and on and on—and happening really quickly. We're not always aware of each thing, of course, but it's happening. And what the Buddha is saying is that each moment, and a moment is really, really quick—seventeen trillion mind moments in the blink of an eye quick—no way we're going to see them all. Each sense contact like that, the mind receives it in some way with this taste, this flavor: pleasant, unpleasant, neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

This has been happening all day, all night, all our life. And as I think I said the other morning, it's amazing to me—how did he figure this out? How do you notice this? Because it happens so quickly. I would never have picked it up if it hadn't been pointed out. This is a place where right view can arise from the voice of another. If I hadn't read or heard this, I wouldn't have just been looking there, noticing my thought, and gone, "Oh, I see the pleasantness leads me to wanting. Ah, how interesting—that's the key to suffering and freedom from suffering." I don't think I would really have noticed that without it being pointed out like ten million times.

But this is going on all day long. And because we mostly don't notice it—it's so fast—the feeling tone itself is a very subtle mental experience. The tendency, and this is no surprise to you, I'm sure, is that we kind of lean into the pleasant, don't want to be with the unpleasant, and don't notice the neutral. This just feels so obvious and normal. It's not something we even notice or question, but it comes to be so culturally acclimated that of course we think, "Of course I like the pleasant. Of course I dislike the unpleasant. Neutral? It's okay, I guess." We never really pay much attention to that.

And it becomes so conditioned that really the sense of liking gets mixed in. As soon as you say pleasant, you think it's liking. Unpleasant—already in many of our minds, aversion is in there. But it comes to be, at least I've noticed it over and over in a subtle or sometimes not so subtle way, the way that our minds tend to value or evaluate our experience. Good, right, how things are supposed to be—usually in the pleasant realm. And when it's unpleasant or going into difficulty, it's gone there so quickly we don't notice the unpleasant. We think, "Well, this is wrong, this isn't how things should be." The whole view of the world, and what we're trying to do, and what makes things right or good, is based on pursuing pleasant and avoiding unpleasant. And as I said, ehi passiko—don't believe me. Keep exploring in your experience as we go through this time.

So that's just to begin with. That's all I want to say before going back to the sutta. But this pattern is so rooted in habit. Because remember, how often has the mind practiced this? How many sense door contacts have there been today? How old are you? How many days have you lived through with sense door contacts every mind moment? And how many times have we not noticed this? So it's really in there that the way it's supposed to go is towards the pleasant.

So back to the sutta: "When an untaught worldling is touched by an unpleasant bodily feeling"—but I would say it could be any of the senses—"unpleasant feeling, he or she worries and grieves. He laments, he beats his breast, he weeps, and is distraught. He thus experiences two kinds of unpleasant feeling: a bodily and a mental one. It is as if a person were pierced by an arrow, and following the first piercing, he is hit by a second arrow."

Utanija calls this double dukkha.

"So that person will experience feelings, unpleasant feelings caused by two arrows. It is similar with an untaught worldling. When touched by a painful, unpleasant feeling, he worries and grieves, laments, beats his breast, weeps, and is distraught. So he experiences two kinds of unpleasant feeling: bodily and mental."

Can you relate to that, or does it seem really abstract? You see, this is the place where it goes so quickly—unpleasant and unrecognized unpleasant. As the Buddha describes it, the feeling explodes into story. It explodes into reaction and reactivity.

Notice what the Buddha is describing here. He didn't say the person goes, "Oh, I kind of don't really like that unpleasant feeling." No—he's weeping, he's distraught, he's beating his breast. He's really having quite a reaction going on. That's what the Buddha is pointing to. Can you relate? I mean, that's what we do. And we don't even notice the subtlety of unpleasant moving into aversion. The unmindful mind can get so entranced by the reactions that this becomes the description of what's really going on without mindfulness.

Take an obvious, simple example you all know: an unpleasant, painful feeling in the body when you're sitting. Not even a really killer one, just a little one. But as we always say, as soon as you notice—oh no, unpleasant—it explodes into reactivity. "How am I going to stand the rest of this retreat? How am I going to stand the rest of this sitting? How many more days are there?" You want to start going through your calendar. "I wish I hadn't given up my phone because I could go back and really count exactly how many days are left, and how many more sittings, and how impossible it's going to be to get through this." And wherever it goes from there.

At some point, we might realize, "Okay, this might be papañca." Sally talked about that the other night. But then we often go, "Well, I shouldn't be doing this. This is bad." And it's more unpleasant feeling. We're not even asking: what actually happened here? What actually happened? Unpleasant—immediately moving away. Immediately. It's unbearable. Beating our breasts, tearing out our hair, weeping and distraught, hitting ourselves with a second arrow. And we think this is kind of normal. I mean, it is kind of normal, unfortunately. That's the problem. It's normal.

So it explodes into reactivity, and we get really sucked into the story, sucked into what's going on. And it reinforces a view we may not even realize we hold—that better and better means more and more pleasant. When you think about being an enlightened noble disciple, do you imagine still having that backache when you sit? Do you think about still having to deal with your grumpy family? Do you consider that your stomach might not digest food well, and people won't act appropriately, and you'll still get sick, and you'll still have unpleasant mental states? We don't really think it through. We think, "Oh yeah, it gets nicer and nicer, nicer and nicer, until we're all floating on a cloud." But we all have pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. This teaching really invites us to look and see.

Let me go back and then talk more about this. The Buddha continues: you have the unpleasant bodily and mental feeling. Having been touched by that unpleasant feeling—both of them—the person resists and resents the unpleasant feeling. Then, in one who so resists and resents the unpleasant feeling, the underlying tendency—in other words, the habit of resistance against unpleasant feeling—comes to underlie the mind.

This is where these habits, these kilesas, are being created moment by moment by moment. That habit of resistance: as soon as there's unpleasant, we resist it. And the resistance is just that—"No, this shouldn't be happening." It doesn't have to be all the way to beating our breasts. Just: "This shouldn't be happening." And that comes to be the habit.

I'll read a bit more and then go back and talk about it. Under the impact of that habit of resisting the painful feeling, he then proceeds to enjoy sense happiness. And why does he do this? "An untaught worldling, O Bhikkhus, does not know of any other escape from unpleasant painful feelings except the enjoyment of sensual happiness."

I really think that's one of the keys to this whole teaching.

Then, in one who enjoys sensual happiness in this way, an underlying tendency to lust, to craving for pleasant feelings, comes to underlie the mind.

In other words, that becomes a habit. He does not know, according to facts, the arising and ending of these feelings, nor the gratification, the danger, and the escape connected with these feelings.

I think this is really the key part of the sutta, something to get interested in exploring. Because the Buddha is laying out so clearly how these habits of aversion or hatred and greed for sense pleasure come to underlie our mind, come to be habitual. And we can really, with mindfulness, explore that happening—not just hate it, but explore it happening and really see.

This pattern reinforces a worldview of not recognizing the first noble truth. So just check and notice how you evaluate yourself, how we subtly evaluate others, how you're evaluating your practice—which we try not to do, but do on an endless basis. How much of that evaluation is by pleasantness or unpleasantness? It's so ingrained. I keep finding it sneaking up through the back door. I think I'm just really present with things as they are. It's all fine. I can feel the ease of that. And then suddenly it's like, "Oh no, it should go a little bit in that direction because that's the way it's supposed to go." And ninety-nine million times out of a hundred million, that way it's supposed to go is going to be pleasant. Because that's just what we're geared to look at.

This underlying habit of resistance to the unpleasant, leading to leaning into, lusting for, craving any kind of pleasant experience—because that's the only way out we know. That's so sad to me. But see, that's really what I would describe as the workings of samsara: the sense of this endless leaning forward into the next thing, the endless search for gratification.

We can see it in the big picture; it's not hard to notice. When we're out in the world and things are a little unpleasant, we go to the refrigerator, call up a friend, get in the car, buy a new something, or do whatever to feel something pleasant, just to move away from the unpleasant. I'm not saying that any of these things are bad. It's not about that. It's really about noticing the process.

But this habit keeps us always leaning a little bit toward gratification, a little bit out of a sense of insufficiency. Whatever is here right now just isn't quite enough—this next one will do it. This next one will do it. And it's not quite so clear in our minds; we just get into the habit of moving toward the next pleasant thing, the next pleasant thing. We don't see the danger, which I'll talk about in a minute.

One thing this pattern does is keep us focused on each object, each experience as good or bad, the thing to get away from or the thing that's going to do it. When that experience inevitably dissolves or changes—when the gratification, even if it did gratify us, just doesn't last more than a fraction—when it inevitably changes, then the focus is on the next object, the next object, never seeing the process. This is the endlessness of dissatisfaction, the leaning forward of samsara. Sally gave that Tibetan definition of samsara: the urge to correct. It could always be just a little bit better. Never quite good enough.

In focusing on the object, the experience—this one or the next one—there's always a sense of me and object, and the world is narrowed down to that. We don't notice the vastness, the sense of nature, the non-separateness of it all. It's me needing to get that. Each experience—and this is to me why life can seem so exhausting—each experience is like, "So this is the one that's going to do it," or "This is the one that's making me miserable." We're just completely taken by each experience, up and down and all around, and it's just—oh my God, how do we get through the day?

The example I use that's been in my mind the last two or three years is an image that really works for me, plus it makes me laugh. Clearly it's not about me, because it's easy to laugh when it's not too close. It's about how we're up and down so quickly, and each moment seems so real. We don't notice what's happening because we're in that constant leaning forward of resistance and going after pleasure.

It's a sports example from a few years ago, from the Super Bowl—American football, for those of you who aren't American. It was when the Patriots, the New England team, played the Seahawks from Seattle. I didn't watch it; I'm not actually interested in football. But my friends told me the last two minutes were really amazing, and they recorded it so I should watch it.

I'm not going to get all the details right, so football fans, don't hold me to being accurate with how these things work. I'm just making a point about samsara, okay? I'm not trying to get football right.

Anyway, it was the last two minutes, and the New England quarterback, the big star Tom Brady, had done his job. They were ahead, two minutes left. He was sitting on the sidelines with the defense team on the field. And then whatever happened, the Patriots were about to lose. Two minutes left, the other team had the ball almost right on the goal line. There was no way they wouldn't score, and the Patriots would lose.

Brady was sitting over there on the sideline, nothing he could do, and the camera panned to him. He was a picture of total dejection—his head in his hands, total despair. Then it went back to the field, and a totally bizarre thing happened. The pass was intercepted, and somehow they ended up winning.

A totally weird fluke. Then the camera pans to Brady again. He's leaping all over the place, so happy. They won.

Someone said to me, "Why shouldn't he be upset? Why shouldn't he be happy? Sure, he's upset, he's happy—that's life."

But it's the thing—it's like it's so everything. That upset was total, that was going to make him miserable forever. Then he was so happy, he won the Super Bowl, he's going to be happy forever. But how long was he happy? There was some whole big thing about deflating the balls. Actually, now he's not even allowed to play for four games. You know, it doesn't last. Nothing lasts.

This is life. Up and down, up and down. It keeps changing all the time. And when we're looking to the object, to the experience, we wonder why. Why is it so exhausting? Why are we never really fulfilled for more than a second? Because nothing can do it. That's the danger.

But it's nice to watch. We can watch it on retreat in little ways. I came up here and all these people are out looking at the sunset. It's really pretty. You're probably not looking for your life's fulfillment in the sunset. Probably. I hope not. I don't know—yogi mind can get out there. But you're just looking at it. "Isn't this nice?" It's nice. That's it.

Are you noticing the pleasant? Or do you notice where it goes into, "Wow, the sunset! But last night's was even better." Someone just said that to me—we were saying, "Yeah, last night was really better." Then we hope maybe tomorrow night will be even better. That's it, right there. That's the movement into samsara. Being on retreat is great. We can watch it in the little things. It's the same way it works in the big things.

So why would we want to look this closely? When we really bring our attention to look, what we find... you know, we kind of like the juice. We like the juice of being all excited and leaping around because we won the Super Bowl. We don't really like the juice of being totally demoralized and depressed. But there's a way we get hooked in, and the steady awareness that lets us see what's really going on is sometimes, to the unenlightened worldling's mind, not so attractive.

Ajahn Sumedho—it's funny, it was a talk I was listening to from a while ago, and sometimes he just says, "This is how it is." He's talking about opening to the real in any moment. He says, "The real is not what you're expecting, I tell you. It's not all happy, safe, and secure. Life is fair and unfair. There's pleasure and pain." He says, "The conditions arise and cease, arising and ceasing like the breath going in and out."

There's pleasant, there's unpleasant. This doesn't go away. There's nothing that has any intrinsic substance to it.

And so when we really look, we can practice without realizing this and turn our whole practice into still subtly searching for the pleasant thing that's going to do it for us. It turns into an idea of some meditative state or an idea of what nirvana would be—I mean an idea, not the reality—that always will have a tinge of "it's going to do it for me now."

Instead of seeing pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, just really bring in the steady mindfulness and see how this is. When we really see steadily, some of the entrancement with the object, with this experience, with the leaning and thinking it's going to do it, goes away—which I experience as really ease and peace. The idea of it to the mind that hasn't experienced that is like, "Oh God, who wants that?"

Again, I'll take another sports example. Sports are good because so many people get involved. Anyway, I happen to like to watch tennis, professional tennis. God knows why. I'm the most unathletic person you could imagine, but I love to watch it.

The thing with watching sports—I see it with other people watching other sports too—there's this idea that you're doing it from choice to enjoy yourself, right? That's the idea. So if I'm watching tennis and I care at all who wins, if I pay attention to what's going on in my experience, it's not that enjoyable that often. Every point that doesn't go the way of the person I want to win—oh, you know, it's unpleasant. And then it's like fear, and then it's worry, and then, oh my God. I'm all tense and suspense and everything. And then even if they do win, it's really just more relief that the damn thing is over. And then I feel pleasure. But then, as with any sport, as soon as it's over, there's a day and then the next tournament starts or whatever. There's no resting.

But then, if I really watch, I started saying, "Okay, I'm doing this to enjoy myself. Really, Carol?" There's something a little off. So I started just really paying attention to what's going on internally, externally, seeing. And as I said, I was telling this in Switzerland—it's actually when I said it that I realized exactly that's what was happening. I hadn't realized it before.

Watching tennis, it's moments of pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. There's pleasant—there's one really skillful shot. It's like pleasant, it's so great. But then it keeps going. There's another shot. It's going back and forth, back and forth. Neutral, neutral, neutral, neutral. Then there's another bad shot. Ah, unpleasant. And then it's just neutral, neutral, neutral. And then, ah, unpleasant. Then pleasant. Then neutral, neutral, neutral. And that goes on for hours. I was just fast-forwarding through a match. It was a five-hour match. These guys are fighting. And that's going on all that time. If you're really paying attention, it's like, "What am I doing this for?"

But that's just like a little microcosm of life, extraordinarily. It's really, really kind of interesting.

So, okay, back to the sutta. I'm talking about—this is all talking about the sutta.

Remember he said, in one who enjoys sensual happiness, the tendency to lust for pleasant, the tendency to resist unpleasant, doesn't know according to facts the arising and ending of these feelings, or the gratification, danger, and the escape connected with these feelings. In one who lacks that knowledge, then the underlying tendency to ignorance as to neutral feelings also comes to be a habit.

And so when such a person experiences a pleasant feeling, an unpleasant feeling, or a neutral feeling, he feels it as one fettered by it, as one chained by it. Another translation says "as one who is joined to that feeling" — unable to escape from it. It's like a chain, a trap.

"Such a one, O monks, is called an untaught worldling, who is fettered by birth, by old age, by death, by sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief, and despair. She is fettered, she is chained to suffering by this, I declare."

It's a strong statement. I'm giving examples that make us laugh, but the Buddha is saying: really look at this. This habit chains us to suffering.

As I said when I read that statement — that an untaught worldling doesn't know of any other escape from unpleasant feeling except to crave for pleasantness — I feel that's so poignant. It makes me feel so sad, really, for all of us to be in that position. But then I feel enormous gratitude, a sense of being blessed that I, that all of us here, have had access, been exposed to a path that actually does offer another way. There is an escape other than just looking for endless pleasant feeling. And the escape, as Semedo says, is just not what you might think it is. But there is really an escape.

So I want to talk about that — gratification, danger, and escape. This is another sutta from the Buddha:

"Before my enlightenment, O bhikkhus, while I was still a bodhisatta" — someone who's committed to complete awakening of a Buddha but not there yet — "it occurred to me: What is the gratification in the world? What is the danger in the world? What is the escape from the world? Then it occurred to me: Whatever pleasure and joy there is in the world, this is the gratification. That the world is impermanent, bound up with dissatisfactoriness, and subject to change, unreliable — this is the danger in the world. The removal, the abandoning of desire and lust for the world — this is the escape from the world."

First, I think it's important to point out that the Buddha says there is gratification. Often when people hear about the danger of everything being unreliable, and the escape being the abandoning of desire for the world, it's heard in a way that suggests pleasant experience is to be shunned, or pleasant experience is a problem — basically saying abandon the world altogether. People hear the Buddha say sense desire is bad, and we hear that as pleasant experience being bad. He's not saying that. He's so practical, really looking around and saying: there is gratification. There is beauty in the world. And we enjoy it, we appreciate it. That is the gratification in the world. If there were no gratification, we wouldn't have desire for it. So not to deny that, but more to explore what that really is.

The danger being, as he said, that whatever we put our reliance on vanishes in a moment. He's talking here in terms of vedanā, the feeling tone, saying that people don't understand the gratification, danger, and escape in the feeling tone itself. The gratification is just that little blip of pleasantness — like that. And what we don't see, the danger, is how fleeting and insubstantial feeling tone is — pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. It's just a blink of an eye. We think, "I'm building all the decisions of my life around having this pleasant feeling," which just vanishes in a moment. Look at it and see.

Ajahn Buddhadasa, who was a renowned Thai forest monk, meditation master, and scholar who died at the end of the last century — actually, several of us have spent time at his monastery in the forest in Thailand — he said once: really explore the fleeting nature of pleasant feeling. And then look at all the decisions you've made in your life and really see how many of them were guided by wanting to have more pleasant feeling. How many decisions did you make for pleasant feeling? His guess was you'd find about ninety-five percent of the decisions we make, just kind of off the cuff. We don't really see the fleeting quality of these. We go right into the reactivity to the reaction, and then we build our whole life around it.

So the escape — the escape is the steady mindful awareness that just starts to explore...

The abandoning of desire and lust for pleasantness, for the things of the world, is not something that we do with aversion or fear. It's not, "Okay, I'm not going to go to anything pleasant anymore because I'll just get into wanting. I'm just going to go in a room and shut the door and live the rest of my life there." Which doesn't work anyway, as you see. The mind then will just make up pleasant, unpleasant, pleasant. You can't get away from it—you can't, in a body and mind.

But when we start to see how it really works, the wisdom sees that the craving stops making sense, because you see it's only bringing more suffering, not less.

But first I just want to say that the Buddha himself says it's not that we no longer appreciate the beautiful or the lovely. There's one place where he says, "What is beautiful in the world remains so, but the wise one no longer strives after it." Very different things. It's not like then everything's just all kind of gray, the same, ugly. "I don't care, I'm going to put a vase of flowers, I don't care—pick ragweed, pick dandelions, pick up an old piece of grass or this beautiful rose, I can't tell the difference." We can tell the difference. We can still know, "I like the yellow rose better than I like that other thing." But in the end, it doesn't matter. I'm not predicating my happiness on pleasant or unpleasant. There'll still be that sense of looking at this and pleasant might arise in the mind, and looking at that and unpleasant might come up. But I don't have to build my life around it.

From Thich Nhat Hanh: "When we are obsessed by desire for sense pleasures, we lose our freedom." This was taught by the Buddha. But it's very important to distinguish between indulging in sense pleasures and the joy and happiness that we experience when we are mindful and at peace. Attachment to sense pleasures, that kind of looking for happiness, brings about suffering and entanglement, both in the present moment and the future, for ourselves and others. The joy and happiness of a peaceful mind brings neither suffering nor attachment in the present or in the future, for ourselves or for others.

That's actually a very good guideline. If you can't tell—am I just appreciating, or is there a little bit of clinging going on?—and then we try to rationalize to ourselves... Rationalizing, you can't ever trust that. But we can tell when we're just with mindfulness watching the experience: if it starts to feel entangled, if it starts to get complicated, as Marie Joy was saying—complexification starts happening, we're concocting all kinds of stuff—good chance, really good chance, there's some craving for pleasant or avoiding of the unpleasant going on.

So this is something we can really explore on retreat here. Something I love about retreat is the simplification of life. And you've all been here now, what, like nine or ten days? You probably know to the minute. The things of your daily life are a little bit farther away, and the stuff that goes on here starts to seem bigger and bigger, doesn't it? Some small thing that in your daily life you'd go, "That's no big deal," and here the mind is like, "Oh, I don't like that, I do like that"—it's really huge. You can really notice it more. The magnification of concentration. And as Sayadaw U Tejaniya says, the exaggeration of the kilesas. You put those two things together and what have you got? Yogi mind. "It can't be like this. I've got to have a different toothpaste or I'll die." Yogi mind.

So anyway, we can really explore here, really get interested in looking: Is it true? The little decisions that the mind makes as you go through the day here—don't take it personally. Remember, this is just nature. This is the Buddha describing how these habits get set up, how when we're not aware, there's the resistance and the wanting. Don't take it personally. This is going on in all of us here in this human race. You're in the laboratory to explore it.

And this is what's so beautiful to me about it—it's just nature. With a steady seeing of mindfulness, you don't have to figure it out. Just be willing to bring the simplicity, the honesty of mindfulness to the whole process. And you have ten million chances a day to do that. Then the wisdom comes by itself. It starts to see by itself: "Oh, wanting this just complicates. Wanting doesn't make sense." It drops away. It's a huge relief.

So explore that here. How fast that movement comes. There's something unpleasant in experience—that flash of movement towards the pleasant.

So this little example—I think Winnie or someone was talking about this morning—in terms of intention, it's the intention that comes up: where to go sit when you're in the dining room. Just notice. Notice you walk in, and there's a little sense of unpleasantness, so you want to move. Somebody's too close. The light's too bright. It's too noisy. You don't like this. Just—why do you go sit where you sit? Why do you choose which cup? Although now they're all the same, but still, you choose one. Why do you choose how much food to take? How do you choose where to sit in the hall? Whether to walk? What kind of tea to have? Little decisions.

I don't mean analyze it and get into some crazy kind of doubt—"Oh no, should I have peppermint, should I have chamomile, oh no." I don't mean that, okay? Just be natural, be normal, but watch what comes up and how often the movement toward wanting something comes when there's just a little bit unpleasant. Just a little bit.

When you're walking and suddenly there's that sense, "Oh, it's time to stop walking now." Check it out. What's going on? A lot of the time, just unpleasant or boring. And a thought came up: "I could go do something a little more juicy, a little more interesting."

And just the sense of craving itself—it's a habit, right? But sometimes just the craving itself is experienced as pleasant, as more active. Someone said today, and I really loved it because it showed how we don't understand the neutral, how ignorance to the neutral starts to underlie the mind—this movement, this resistance to unpleasant and going to pleasant.

Sometimes as the mind's getting quieter here, people experience where it's been really intense—pleasant, unpleasant, or nice—but then it kind of calms down a little. Maybe it's a little dull, maybe not, but things just aren't so vivid. Things are present, you're there, but it's heading into neutral zone, which we've talked about before as being maybe calm and we don't notice.

So this friend said today, noticing that, and noticing how suddenly the mind wanted to want—just to look, just wanted to look at something. And the wanting itself brought a sense of vividness, of a little bit more intensity that was experienced kind of as better. You could see the wanting itself was enough to give this sense of vivid. Basically it's a sense of vivid me. That's often what's missing in the neutral. It's just this—"Oh, I want to look." And it's experienced as being almost more alive, more pleasant or something.

This is when, really, we can see how we get caught in saṃsāra. So notice that. The sense of how the wanting and the aversion is so normal and natural that that's what feels at ease.

So here, again, when you notice the wanting, the clinging—even just little things like "I want to go sit in that seat there, but somebody's in it," or "I want to go sit in that seat, it's empty"—just stand a minute and feel the wanting. This is so not our comfort zone. We're so habituated. Wanting comes up, you act on it. You get the thing you want and everything's copacetic. What's the problem? Why should I sit there and feel wanting when I can hurry and go sit there and get the seat I want and be happy? Right? That's how we live our lives.

So stand there. Just feel the wanting. Just feel it. Notice how it's just sensation, coming and going, thoughts in the mind. And eventually it will go away. I promise. Because everything goes away. Keep paying attention after it goes away, and just notice.

So then, having been touched by that painful feeling, he does not resist and resent it, and no underlying habit of resistance to the unpleasant comes to be. Because there's no habit of resistance to the unpleasant, there's not the need, the urge to go looking for sense pleasure to avoid it. There's no need to do that, so it doesn't come into the mind. And so there's no habit of craving and lusting after sense pleasure in the mind. It's just this now.

He knows, according to facts, the arising and ending of those feelings—just that fleetingness, the coming and going. He knows the gratification, the danger, and the escape connected with those feelings. So in one who knows thus, no underlying tendency to ignorance as to neutral feeling comes to lie in the mind either. He feels as one who is not fettered by feelings.

Still feeling all the feeling tones—that doesn't change. Such a one, O bhikkhus, is called a well-taught noble disciple who is not fettered by birth, by old age, by death, by sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief, and despair. She is not fettered to this suffering. This I declare.

This doesn't mean she or he is not living a life. As Ajahn Sumedho says, life still goes on. But as Mingyur Rinpoche puts it, we start to recognize a sense of peace that arises from the stability of an awareness which is not dependent on the presence or absence of pleasant or unpleasant feeling.

The stability of awareness doesn't care—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. And we bring this sense of steady awareness to our normal everyday experience. But this difference of steady awareness, rather than getting lost in reaction to each experience, changes the whole thing.

I'll give just one example from a good friend of mine. She's given me permission to use this story—her family, hi, if you're listening. She always listens to the podcast. Her family lived quite some distance away. I've known her for many years, and she'd fly to visit them a couple of times a year. As is often the case, going back home to visit family was often difficult—difficult relations with the parents and with a sister. And every time she'd go, she'd make a vow: "I'm really going to meet them with loving-kindness this time. I'm really not going to get reactive this time." Have you ever tried that? "I'm going to go home and just be the bodhisattva of compassion." And you step in the door and it's all over.

So she said she'd always do that and then get home and get involved with the sister, with the mother, whatever. But this was just a couple of years ago, after a retreat where we'd been particularly looking at the attitude in the mind and really strengthening the steadiness of awareness of whatever was coming without trying to change—just really seeing. Taking refuge in the mindfulness, in the awareness, rather than reacting to what's happening.

She was doing the same at the airport, getting ready to get on the plane, starting to say, "Okay, I'm just going to cultivate mindfulness." And then she thought, wait a minute, let me just bring awareness to what's actually happening. So she's bringing awareness, doing some walking meditation in the airport, sitting on the plane, and she noticed—I don't remember the exact specifics—that as she was going home, she was actually feeling rather resentful, getting a little ready to engage in battle. She was trying to pretend she had loving-kindness, but there was this subterranean difficulty going on. So she just brought awareness to all of that, instead of trying to make it be different, trying to move to the pleasant.

She said it turned out to be the best visit she'd had. Because through that steady awareness brought to all those experiences, there wasn't the sense of her being that, or being stuck to it. The way I say it: the Velcro is off. She was watching the sense of resistance or fear or judgment coming up, but seeing it coming and going without landing in it. She didn't act from it or speak from it, and the visit was completely different from how other ones had been.

Same world, same life, same pleasant, unpleasant, neutral feelings—but taking refuge in the steady awareness, the wisdom comes that we don't need to react from them, because that's not the path of happiness. But it doesn't mean we shut the world out.

I want to end with a little story about the Dalai Lama. Because this isn't about not caring or somehow not feeling or not being open to the suffering and the joy in the world. It actually allows for much more sensitivity and open-heartedness and connectedness when we're not taking it personally, when we're not needing to go to the pleasant to make everything okay.

Someone was asking the Dalai Lama—you know, everybody who comes, all the Tibetans who come out of Tibet always go to meet him. How many stories, how many people has he been face to face with, telling him horrific stories of loss and death and imprisonment and torture and destruction? I mean, really face to face. Even reading about it, I can hardly bear it. But can you imagine being face to face with hundreds of thousands of people? And this person asked, how does he do it? Because if you look at him, how is he not continually overwhelmed?

He said that when the Dalai Lama is with someone and they're talking, he's totally with them. And if you've ever seen him, you can see that. He's completely present with somebody, like you're the most important person in the world in that moment. Very responsive. And if you've ever seen him anywhere, you also know he has a sense of lightness, a sense of joy, a sense of real love of the Dharma, compassion. Well, he's Mr. Compassion, the sixteenth incarnation—he's had practice.

So he's totally present. When somebody's telling him a story of great suffering, he can be crying, really feeling with it. Then they leave and he's done. He turns to the next person, and maybe they're laughing, and the next minute he's laughing like a small child. People ask, how can you do it? Because he's so present. But there's no kind of him resisting the unpleasant or needing something pleasant. Nothing created around it. It just moves through. He turns to the next one, totally there. And if that's joy and happiness and childlike wonder, he's totally there. Not holding to that either—it moves through. Turn to the next. If that's suffering, totally there.

This is life. When we're not under the thrall of these habits, when we see just this—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—this little thing, it seems like so nothing. But if we explore it, it has immense potential to free us from these habits that keep us confused and struggling when we don't recognize them. The power of accurate recognition is immense to free us from suffering.

Thank you for your kind attention.

Let's just sit quietly a moment.

CHAPTER 156

Cultivating the Perception of Impermanence

Carol Wilson · 55 min

In this deeply personal dharma talk, Carol Wilson examines why intellectual understanding of impermanence (anicca) differs from the liberating perception the Buddha described. She explores the three levels of wisdom (paññā): heard understanding (suta-mayā paññā), reflective understanding (cintā-mayā paññā), and direct insight (bhāvanā-mayā paññā)—explaining how only the third level truly frees us from clinging.

Drawing from her own month-long self-retreat and the death of her younger sister, Wilson identifies three ways delusion (moha) blocks accurate perception of impermanence: denial and avoidance of change, misperceiving momentary change as stable existence, and simple inattention or lack of continuity in mindfulness. She shares the touching story of Ānanda weeping at the Buddha's impending death from the Parinibbāna Sutta, illustrating how grief is a natural human response we need not resist.

Wilson offers practical guidance for retreat practice: noticing how moods arise and pass, observing the changing nature of seeing and sensing, and using Ajahn Chah's simple reflection "this is uncertain" throughout daily activities. She emphasizes that steady mindfulness reveals how we create permanence through selective perception and imagination, while direct presence opens us to the tender beauty of each fleeting moment. The talk concludes with Hafiz's poem "Deepening the Wonder," celebrating how awareness of impermanence can deepen rather than diminish our appreciation of life.

The subject I want to speak about tonight is cultivating the perception of impermanence. Anicca.

As you know, the Buddha spoke frequently about the centrality of really understanding the fact of impermanence—one of the three Dhamma doors. Guy spoke the other night about the five aggregates in terms of seeing anattā, the insubstantiality of sense of self. That's one Dhamma door. Really getting an understanding of the truth of dukkha, like the first noble truth, is another Dhamma door. And then sometimes the perception keys into the truth of impermanence, anicca—the three characteristics. Of course, as we proceed with our spiritual journey, we're going to see and understand all three of these because they're just three different aspects of how things are. It's not like it's some insight that changes anything except how we relate to life. But it's said that sometimes a person might just more naturally tend to recognize, to have an accurate perception of, one or the other of these three.

So tonight we'll talk about anicca, the power of the perception of it.

This fall I did about a month of self-retreat. I did a few self-retreats last year—I took a sabbatical from teaching. So I did about a month of self-retreat in a really beautiful spot, and for some reason this sense of impermanence arose strongly. Sometimes it's kind of terrifying in the implacability of it. This is how it is, and nothing can change that. But also, when the mind isn't caught in clinging and resistance, when it's really just recognizing this is how it is, it opens us into this tenderness of the immediacy of this moment of life, because it's all there is. It's so poignant and so beautiful at the same time, in my experience.

One very famous haiku kept running through my mind and heart that whole month. I'm sure many of you are familiar with it. Issa, a Japanese priest from the 18th century, wrote: "This dewdrop world is a dewdrop world. And yet, and yet..."

I just love that. It is a dewdrop world. It vanishes as soon as the sun comes out, and yet it's so beautiful. It's so poignant. It's so tender. It's said that he wrote that after the death of his young daughter.

So this opening to the perception of impermanence is really what frees our hearts and minds from the stasis of clinging. And it's not a dread, horrible thing—it opens us to the wonder and the mystery at the same time.

But here's what's interesting. Of the three characteristics, intellectually, when we speak about them, impermanence seems to me the most intellectually obvious, easy to understand. Probably no one here is going to argue about it, right? But there's some way that knowing it intellectually isn't freeing us from clinging. Or am I wrong about that?

So what is it that changes? And this is where the Buddha talks about the perception. He said: "Bhikkhus, when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated, this perception eliminates all sensual desire. It eliminates all lust for existence, for becoming, for turning into some new form in mind or body. It eliminates all ignorance. It uproots all conceit, 'I am.'"

Those four things mean complete awakening.

The perception of impermanence, when it's developed and cultivated—I'm taking that as the key for what I want to talk about tonight: how we can begin to develop, or continue to develop, this perception.

Because it's not that things are permanent and then, if we have some kind of insight, things start to change. This is how it already is. So how come we don't see it? Why is it so hard to perceive this?

On some level, this is the nature of all insight. It's not creating a new reality, but shifting our inaccurate, confused, basically wrong perception of what's occurring, of what we're experiencing. Because how we perceive is how we think about things, and how we think about things becomes the views, the construction our mind puts onto life through thought, and that then determines how we're going to respond to experience.

So even if intellectually we know everything's changing, when we have a really hard, difficult mood—everything's changing, but not this. This is going to be here forever, right? That's just kind of how it feels. And then we start reacting as if it's going to be here forever, because that's the perception in that moment. The nature of insight is not that actuality changes, but that perception shifts.

The Buddha spoke about three different levels of wisdom, of paññā. They're all wisdom, and we're taking in and working on all three levels at various times. It's not simply linear.

The first level is suta maya paññā—in English it would be "heard understanding." Understanding that someone says, or that we read, or that we intellectually take in. So when you read "yes, everything's impermanent," that's heard understanding. Or I say that tonight. And that's not nothing—it's useful. We can sometimes use those thoughts just to help us remember. When you're in the middle of that really difficult, horrible mood and your mind goes, "Oh yeah, right, I think I heard somewhere that everything's impermanent"—it doesn't really shift our understanding, but it might just give us the strength or the courage to hang with it a little bit more. So that's the first level of wisdom, and it's important. Without that, there's no right view, no wise understanding.

The second level is cintā maya paññā, which is really using our thinking, wise reflection, our intellectual understanding. We kind of think about it: everything really is impermanent. And we might intellectually go through the day—it's not really the gut-level perception, but we're kind of saying to ourselves, "Oh yes, the leaves on the trees are turning yellow, everything's impermanent, things change." Now that's true, and that's a reflection that can help us come back into our own experience. But even that, unless it's on the third level... Oh yes, the autumn, the leaves are falling, the leaves die—we can say the whole thing, and it's like, okay, maybe it mellows us out a little bit. But it isn't really the depth of insight into anicca, into impermanence, that really shifts our understanding in a moment. You know what I mean? It's important, and we really use this. It kind of softens us up to start perceiving things in a more accurate way.

And the third level—this is really the level of insight, not thinking but just an aha moment—is when the conditions are ripe such that the perception actually shifts. We have little or big insights frequently about all kinds of things. In terms of impermanence, it can be anything going on. It's not that you have to be in some kind of deep state of practice. It can be with anything. But suddenly, you're washing your hands, and as you're washing your hands you just see the soap disappearing, and it's like—oh my gosh, everything just disappears. Everything just... And it could sound really silly when you're saying it, but when it goes in, it's on a cellular, visceral level. Do you know what I mean? You've had insights like that. Oh. Wow. And then the mind will think about it and we'll talk.

And that's fine, knowing the mind's thinking. Usually two thoughts is enough. You know, we got it. Okay, you don't have to write a novel about it. But the energy of the insight usually goes into thinking. Yet you can feel, wow, yeah, everything's changing. And if someone came to you and said, "That's not true," you don't have to get in an argument. You see, the perception has aligned in that moment. That's really how it is.

Of course, as with everything, perception lasts a fraction of a second. So again, we may have that insight, it goes in, it makes a difference. It has an effect on our understanding going forward, on our mind stream. But it doesn't mean that once we have an insight on impermanence or anything, then from that moment on, every single moment is going to be accurate perception. Right? Because what blocks it? We know—our old friends, especially delusion. Delusion leading to greed leading to aversion, resistance.

So this is what I want to talk about: just how we can explore this in this situation we have here, which is a great situation for exploring this. The perception of anicca is so liberating, as the Buddha said, because in that moment, just in that moment of that accurate perception, the heart, the mind is liberated. In that moment, it's freed from clinging. Because clinging doesn't make any sense. It just doesn't arise in a moment of really recognizing that there's no solidity, no stability anywhere. It just doesn't make sense. And then with that wisdom, the heart, the mind, you really get that sense of freedom, of liberation from the constriction, the limitation that comes with the trying to hold on, with the trying to push away, with the trying to keep everything in its nice little box so we can feel safe and secure.

So I wanted to talk about three different ways that came into my mind that moha, delusion, manifests—ways that we can explore here. This is to be interested in how delusion manifests as a kind of block, not allowing the accurate perception of impermanence. And sometimes we can see these manifestations coming up too.

And again, as I talk about forms of delusion or clinging, remembering, just to plop it in there, that we're exploring these with interest, with wise attitude. These are not three more ways of delusion that show what a really hopeless, stupid person you are and you might as well give it up. This is like, "Wow, let's see how this works. It's really fascinating." And if you think you're going to see anicca once and then the delusion is going to stop—hello, wake up. What are we all doing here? Why are we spending our life? This is a lifetime process.

And if we're interested in it—I've talked to a lot of people in the meetings, not everyone and no one all the time, but quite a few people are just starting to get this sense of interest in seeing what's going on. Like someone said, "Aversion comes up in my mind and it's like, okay, it's aversion. It's the next thing arising." You can kind of watch it. So just to put that in there.

The three ways I want to talk about are: a kind of denial, avoidance of change or what comes with change; the misperception, recognizing wrongly even when we're present; and the third—you see they all link together—is simple inattention, lack of continuity. The inattention means we just don't notice what on some level we're not keyed up to notice. And that actually hides the perception of impermanence.

So, just to start by talking about denial. This is a bit coming off what I was talking about last week. It's not a quiz, I don't really expect you to remember, but I was talking about the two darts, the two arrows. The Buddha is saying that the habit of our mind when unpleasant experience arises is resistance. That comes to be the underlying habit of the mind, resistance. So that's denial—a refusal to look at change. And then under the influence of the habit of resistance, the other habit that comes up is clinging, looking for pleasure. So that's the second way, the misperception, looking for something to make us happy where it can't happen.

So this is one of the ways, on a very subtle and profound level, that this habit of resistance to unpleasant and clinging to the pleasant actually operates. It's not only just about it feeling uncomfortable in the moment.

This is one of the habits that actually obscures the recognition of reality. In that obscuration of things as they are lies what keeps us wandering in confusion and suffering. So on this level, the habit of resistance and clinging—it's not that it's bad, and it's not just about big things. On these subtle levels, it's really deep. This is such a great opportunity to explore it while we're here in the silence together.

I want to say a little bit from my own experience about the sense of resistance. One of the resistances that comes up—and this can be on the macro level of change as well as the smaller one—is simply seeing things that we are attached to, things that we love, particularly people that we love, or situations that are important to us. When we see them vanish, go away, it opens us into a great deal of sadness for most of us—a sense of loss, grief. And then what can come in so quickly, in the sense of denial, is not really deeply understanding the First Noble Truth.

So the loss comes, the grief comes, and there's that sense in the back: "Well, something's wrong. It's not supposed to be this way. I shouldn't be feeling this." Or basically, "I don't want to feel it"—that's what it really is. I'm feeling grief, and I don't want to feel the grief. Therefore, there's something wrong with the way the universe is working. They shouldn't have gotten sick. I shouldn't have lost my job. This person shouldn't have died.

The denial, I think, is really a turning away from simply opening with tenderness to the pain, to the sadness, to the sense of grief or loss or change or confusion or instability—and really seeing that this is part of our human life. When we talk about opening to the truth of impermanence and really freeing our hearts and minds from this confusion, from always reacting and responding in a way that's inaccurate... Sure, I have no idea what an arahant experiences. Maybe they don't really experience grief, but they do notice absence.

There's some sutta—I'm paraphrasing because I couldn't find it—after the Buddha was really old, and his two closest disciples who'd been with him all the time, Sariputta and Moggallana, had both passed away. He's looking out at the assembly and saying, "This assembly is empty. It is empty of Sariputta and Moggallana." He noticed the difference. He wasn't weeping and wailing, but he noticed the difference.

But another sutta that I actually love, because it really touches me, is from Ananda, who was the Buddha's attendant and cousin for his last twenty-five years. He is a really lovable figure throughout all the suttas, all the discourses. He's in very many of them because every discourse that starts "Thus have I heard" is meant to have been recited by Ananda, who was with the Buddha for twenty-five years, had an incredible memory, and remembered every discourse that he heard. So he pops up a lot.

But he's very human. He's kind of like the human touchstone. Sometimes he would make mistakes, and the Buddha would chide him: "Haven't I told you, Ananda?" He was very kind, very inclusive. In terms of being the Buddha's attendant, it wasn't like you see with some masters, where the attendants are trying to keep the crowd away. Ananda was there because he loved the Dhamma. His job was to help everyone who wanted to hear the Dhamma come and hear the Buddha. He was a great supporter of the nuns. He spent a lot of time teaching the nuns, sharing with the nuns—anyway, I'm getting off on a whole other talk. But he's a kind of way in for us.

There's one lovely sutta, the Parinibbana Sutta, which is very long. At this point, the Buddha has told his disciples that he's going to die in a certain amount of time, and then they're talking about other things. And then it says, all of a sudden, Ananda left. "The venerable Ananda went into his lodging and stood lamenting, leaning on the doorpost: 'Alas, I am still a learner with much to do, and the teacher is passing away, who was so compassionate to me.'"

Andy Olendzki, who's a Pali scholar and was the director of the Study Center for many years, told me something I didn't know—that this is a very well-known image in Buddhist art and iconography: the sense of Ananda leaning against the doorframe and weeping at the coming loss. And the Buddha was still around at this point, mind you—at the coming loss. I love that this is in the suttas, because it shows that this is part of being human. If we shy away from feeling that, we'll never see things as they are.

The story goes on. The Buddha inquired where Ananda was, and they told him, so he told a monk to bring Ananda to him. When Ananda came, he said, "Enough, Ananda, do not weep and wail. Have I not already told you that all things that are pleasant and delightful are changeable, subject to separation and becoming other? So how could it be, Ananda—since whatever is born, become, compounded, is subject to decay—how could it be that it should not pass away?"

But he's not saying this harshly. He's saying this out of love and wisdom and compassion. This is how it is. This is how it is. Let it in. Let it in.

And then he went on to really praise Ananda and bring up his confidence in Ananda's understanding and practice, saying, "Continue to practice, and you will come to full understanding." He's really saying: This is how it is. You have the confidence, you have the understanding, you have the ability. Keep practicing.

And so I just love that, because I feel like that's saying: yes, this is how it is for us. Don't run away from it. Don't hide from it. This is part of life.

Personally, I found that even opening to the grief of a loved one's death without resistance kind of deepened the sense of love and connectedness. About five or six years ago, my younger sister died quite suddenly and relatively unexpectedly. I was her closest person, so it hit me harder than I expected—my parents had died in the years before that, but this was just different.

It was so interesting to me. I couldn't have talked about it like this in the couple of years after, but now it's become part of my psyche. It was like: this had happened. There's no way to argue with that. You can't say, "Oh, no," or "Maybe," or "We could change it." There's nothing to do. This is how it is. And so somehow my heart was just able to say yes, this is how it is, and was just able to be—for quite some months—totally present.

At times this really strong sense of grief or sorrow would just well up in the middle of whatever I was doing—you know how it is—and the heart and mind would simply respond: "Yes, this is how it is now." I would just really let it be there. It would move through, last a little while, be gone, then come again a few times a day. But the sense of clarity remained: No, this is just how it is. And also that it's fine to feel the grief. Actually, I felt that it came connected with the deep love I felt for her. Trying to shut it out was like trying to shut out the whole world, in a way.

I feel like I learned a lot about the human nature of change, of death, of coming together and going apart. How could it be otherwise? The only way it could be otherwise is if I went first. There's no other way it's going to happen. And yet this sense of subtle denial and fear of just feeling is something that can keep us locked.

The Buddha often used an opening to the reality of death as a powerful teaching tool. There are many stories like that. Just one brief one—I'm sure you know it, it's the most famous one—of the woman who came to him after her young child had died. She was completely distraught and begging the Buddha to somehow bring the child back to life. He said, "Okay, if you go and collect a cup of sesame seeds from houses that have not experienced death." Of course, she went, and every single house had experienced death. After however long, the mind gets it. She comes back and says, "Okay, I get it." And then the heart-mind is open to really hearing the truth, and the Buddha could teach, the Buddha could share.

So I'll tell one more story about this, because it's just life. Some years ago—I don't know, maybe ten years ago—I was teaching a retreat in the Sagaing Hills in Burma with friends, including Sayadaw U Lakkhana. It was all Western yogis, about thirty of them, but with a Burmese teacher and us, another teacher and me, along with Western translators. We were friends with people there. There are three nunneries in a row next door, and we're friends with those nuns. The retreat center is right on the Irrawaddy River, kind of up high, but you walk down to the road and you're walking along the river.

So one day, we were just out walking along the river—me and the other teachers and the translator friends—and about two nunneries down, there was a huge gathering: the whole group of the nunnery, some monks, and many of the people who live there, all standing by the river. I said, "What's going on?" They told us that three young novices—little boy monks, ten, eleven, twelve years old—had gone out in the river to play. Somehow one of them had drowned. The other two had lived there for a long time, but this one who had drowned had just come last week from far away. He wasn't used to being in the river, and I guess he didn't know how to swim. Everyone was standing there, and they had just recovered his body.

And then—the learning is what happened next.

They had to send for his family, who lived far away. There weren't cell phones there yet, so it was a long journey to reach them, and then they had to take buses to come. It was going to take twenty-four to forty-eight hours for his family to arrive. So the nuns and the monks from his monastery came down, just up the hill, and they took his little body up to a big sala right on the side of the road. A sala is like a big open room without walls—a large roof, big teak pillars, open space. They set up a really lovely little bed and put him in clean robes and brought down nice blankets. Then all the nuns and monks gathered. And many of the nuns are really young—there's this one little nun...

At that point, she was probably around six or seven. We know her now—she's sixteen, seventeen. It's wonderful to see. She came running up to us, holding our hand, and Jake was with us. He could talk to her; he speaks Burmese. So she was part of it too. They didn't say, "Oh, you're too little. Go hide in the back."

They put him on the bed, and then everyone from the community—the laypeople, the monks, the nuns—all set up what we would call a wake. They were staying with him for the twenty-four to forty-eight hours, chanting suttas and metta, taking turns. The whole community just staying there with him, including the little nunlets and the little novices. And the two little boys who had been with him—they took care of them too. The monks came down and made sure they were okay, not too lost or caught in blame. It was just this sense of the whole community coming around and saying, "Yes, this is what happens. And here we are, dealing with it."

One of my Western friends said, "I'm forty-seven years old. I've never seen a dead body before." And I thought, yes, that's kind of how it is here in this culture.

I thought it was beautiful—I mean, sad. It was really sad. Even when I saw Yeti just last year, we were walking right by the river and we both kind of pointed, reminding each other of that time. It has a resonance. But there was this sense of: this is how life is. Let's see it. Let's not hide from it. Feel the sadness—that's part of how life is. We don't stop caring, but we can respond in a much more appropriate way.

So that's the denial piece. And then, as I was talking last week, out of the denial—or out of "I shouldn't feel sad" or "this is too much"—we tend to cling, as we know.

One time I asked myself: Why? Why do we cling? What are we clinging to? This sense of instability—something about it, I don't know about your mind, but my mind, which of course doesn't exist, but the mind seems to hate it. It hates instability. Unless you don't like what's happening, then it wants instability. And it doesn't seem to notice the contradiction between those two different ways.

Just this sense of shaky ground, the sense of not knowing what's happening. Have you noticed that in your practice? We want to get it all figured out. "Tell me how to do it right so it'll always be nice, balanced, open, choiceless awareness and no striving. How do I get it so it stays like that?" Right? Isn't that what we think we're trying to do?

But it's so poignant. Our strategy for happiness: cling to an experience, cling to ideas, cling to views—views of ourselves, clinging to views of our personality. Even when we think we have a disgusting personality, still it's my personality and we hold on to it. Views about anything.

This sense of clinging—like how to find stability in an unstable world—and not quite noticing that it's the clinging that's creating the dissonance, the ill-at-easiness, the suffering.

I heard this on public radio a few years ago. It was a financial program, or maybe the news, and they were talking about the European debt crisis. Very seriously talking about it, discussing the stock market and what effect the European debt crisis would have on politics and governments. And they said, "Politics is being driven by the stock market, and the markets hate uncertainty." So they pressure this or that government, this or that political figure to stay or resign or do this or that—so there won't be uncertainty in the stock market.

This was said with all utmost seriousness.

Stock market uncertainty. That goes together, right? Uncertainty and the stock market go together. "Stock market uncertainty" is like an oxymoron. It doesn't happen. They said this with all seriousness. If this figure resigns, if this government does that, then the market will be happy because there will be no uncertainty. And I thought, this is how we live in this world. We don't even notice when we're doing that for ourselves—this response to the unreliability of life.

Hold on, let me share this. It's a fragment of a long poem by Galway Kinnell, an American poet, called "Little Sleep's Head Sprouting Hair in the Moonlight":

You scream, waking from a nightmare.
When I sleepwalk into your room and pick you up and hold you up in the moonlight, you cling to me hard as if clinging could save us.
I think you think I will never die.
I think I exude to you the permanence of smoke or stars even as my broken arms heal themselves around you.
I have heard you tell the sun, "Don't go down."
I have stood by as you told the flower, "Don't grow old, don't die."
Little Maude, perhaps this is the reason you cry.
This the nightmare you wake screaming from:
being forever in the pre-trembling of a house that falls.

And so, that's how it is. And sadness is okay. Actually, when we're not trying to stop from falling, when we're not resisting the trembling, there's so much beauty and love and tenderness for the moment. When our minds and hearts become more flexible, more flowing—not caught in that "oh no, it's going to go, it's going to go"—we can recognize: it hasn't gone right now. It's just this. There's so much tenderness and freedom in that.

From the Buddha: "The search for a resting place is burning. Not to need one is cool and peaceful. One abides in peace who does not abide anywhere."

This comes back to realizing there's not one to abide. It's the clinging that makes us look for somewhere to abide.

One way we can open to this—just to remind ourselves, it's a practice Ajahn Chah mentions often—is simply going through the day, and when something comes up, you remind yourself: this is uncertain. Not some heavy "oh my god, this is uncertain." But just when you notice your mind saying, "I'm going to do this, I'm going to do that," then simply: oh yeah, this is uncertain. That's all. And then we go on. I think what's more amazing is how much things seem to keep going the way we think they're going to. This is uncertain—just not putting that clinging in. As we saw, anything can occur in the next moment.

The other moha I want to talk about is the misperceiving of impermanence. We think of it like this: something's here, here, here, then suddenly something can happen in the next moment. Someone's here, here, here—suddenly they die. But that's the misperception. We're not perceiving the momentariness of change. As the Dalai Lama said, the sense of impermanence is not that something arises, exists, exists, exists, and then goes away. That is not perceiving accurately. That's misperception. That's perceiving a sense of permanence—that it's hanging out for a while and then goes away. Not really seeing the constant nature, the momentariness of change.

Someone mentioned today, in terms of our practice, in terms of seeing, for example—when we're not quite mindful of seeing, it's one of the things that gives us a sense of permanence. The room and the people seem the same as last time, and seeing is always occurring. But there can be a moment when you tune in and every second the actual seeing is different. As you're walking, it's different images, different images, different images, changing every second. But mostly we don't perceive that. It's not that we're going to go through life perceiving little layers—you can't function that way. But there are moments when the perception shifts and we see: oh yeah, it is like that.

It isn't like it's just all the same, the same, and all of a sudden it crumbles. It's not like that.

A friend was telling me about watching a time-lapse video—you know time-lapse, right? It was a time-lapse video of a flower bulb that was planted and then growing. You've probably seen things like that. When you see that, starting from the bulb and then the little shoot comes up through the earth and it grows into the leaves and the flower and then the flower decays and falls, you just see it's moving the whole time when the time is speeded up.

Where can you stop it and say, "Now that's just a flower existing"? Now that's just a bulb existing, separate from anything else, self-existent. It's not. Every single instant it's changing. The conditions are changing and the so-called self-existent thing is changing, and there's no way to just stop and say it's static. There's nowhere to land and say, "Now it's going to be like this," even for a second.

And then, as we start to turn around—someone years ago said on a retreat, "Oh, I finally got it. I've been seeing for years that everything around me is changing, but suddenly I see, oh, that includes me." So it's not only like some static me is watching the bulb growing and everything changing, but the so-called me, as Guy was talking about, is also constantly changing. The five aggregates are rising and shifting and changing and coming together in different ways. That's all that's going on.

So part of our misperception is that we don't recognize that aspect. And it's true—on some level we need some sense of steadiness to get through the day, absolutely. But one of the great things about being on a retreat like this, at times when you don't have very many responsibilities, is that you can even just sit in your room if it gets all kind of too weird for a little while. You can just sit in your room for a while and watch molecules dance. It won't stay that way very long, believe me. You don't have to worry. You don't have to hold it all together so much.

So one way we don't perceive accurately then is inattention. Nisargadatta Maharaj said, "We miss the real by lack of attention and create the unreal by excess of imagination." I love that. It's going on all the time. We miss the real by lack of attention and create the unreal by excess of imagination.

This is why we put so much emphasis on gently cultivating a sense of continuity, just whenever you remember, bringing the mindful awareness to whatever's going on. Because lack of continuity is something that really masks anicca, that really hides impermanence. We don't really see the constant shifting and change. We might notice something's here, and then later we might notice it's gone, or we might just be more caught up in another thing. But we don't quite see the whole process—we absolutely don't see the whole process without some continuity of mindfulness, even in chunks.

A great place to explore that here on retreat is with your mood, with your sense of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, with your sense of your personality. The moods that come through the day. How many moods, how many emotions have you had today? You probably didn't count them. More than one?

If Joseph was here, we'd have a joke, but he's not here, so I'll tell you. One time we were teaching a retreat together, and after we left the sitting, he said, "Carol, how many emotions did you have in that sitting?" I thought, I don't know. I must say mental states, not just strong emotions, but mental states. I don't know, fifteen, twenty, something like that. I said, "How about you?" He goes, "I don't think I had any. Maybe one." This is like a real joke between us now all the time. I go, "How many mental states did you have?" So we're all different. There's not a right way.

But notice how the lack of continuity masks impermanence. We've all known being in a really strong emotion and thinking, "Now it's going to be like this forever." You know that. We think that. Then somehow it goes away. Or I think I mentioned in another talk, someone comes in and says, "Oh my God, I was so upset." Really, the whole day?

No, well, not this time, not that time, not when I was sleeping, not when I was bathing—but it comes down to like one sitting or a sitting and a walking. But then the mind is thinking, and this is three days later, "I was so upset." And it assumes a permanence. We assume permanence so much of the time.

A story from a friend of mine. I was teaching a retreat at Spirit Rock and she was cooking there. It was a long time ago. And she was telling me—she's a longtime meditator—that she saw herself, and other people saw her, as an aversive type personality. So she'd been having this conversation with the other cooks and they were saying, "Yeah, you're really aversive." And she thought, "Yeah, I am really aversive."

But then she had a day to just be silent on retreat. So she was sitting and walking, and she said, "I'm just going to be really steady and mindful and watch the mental state, watch the mind, just be really continuous." And she said it was amazing, because the idea she had been clinging to was "I'm aversive." And when we're not steady with our mindfulness—which is just noticing what's happening—when we're not being steady, we tend to fall into what I call selective perception. We have a view, "I'm aversive," and then the selective perception tends to notice everything that substantiates that view. Have you noticed that? When you're in a bad mood, everything seems to prove, "Yes, I am in a bad mood, and this is why I ought to be." We don't notice the other stuff.

So she was just being steady, and she noticed—oh, when I look carefully—there were many moments where her mind was kind, generous. She really had a lot of faith, loving the Dharma. She was having joy, a heart of generosity in cooking for all the yogis. There were many neutral moments. There were some loving moments. There were all kinds of things. She said about ten percent of the thoughts and moods were aversion. Ten percent. But without the steady, mindful awareness, we don't notice that. We fall into these assumptions that it always is like this.

So notice, as you're going through the days, not only with moods—though moods and thoughts are a good way to do it. People often say, "I have this particular habit. This is my personality. I always tend to have this loneliness." And I ask, "So you're feeling that?" "No, no. I had this joy. I looked out and there was this joy. But then the loneliness, I know, was just gone in the background because I wasn't paying attention to it. But when the joy went away and I thought about it, then of course I could feel the loneliness again."

And no one has said that specific thing to me. But do you hear that sense of "this unpleasant thing, whatever I'm identifying with, is always here—it's underground"? When you don't notice it, you're still assuming permanence, that it's always here. And we do that.

So what we're saying with steady mindfulness is: just letting go of the clinging to ideas and surrendering into what's occurring now, just like this. When the loneliness is here, it's like this. Not the stories, but how does it feel? And stay with it, stay with it, stay with it—and then it changes. It goes away. Something else arises. Stay steady and notice that.

So often we don't quite notice the actual gone-ness of something. We lean into the next thing. "Okay, the loneliness is gone. That's over. I don't have to worry about that anymore. Now what's next?" And then we're all caught up in the next thing. Really notice when it's gone.

Really notice when you're having an experience of bliss and it goes away. Really notice that it's gone. I don't mean just notice calmly that it's gone—notice what comes next, how something else begins. When we really stay steady, we can't hide from the ephemeral, changing nature of things.

Notice how conditions change and affect the experience we're having. Notice how you feel emotionally might affect how the breath comes and goes. Notice, as many people point out, how the weather might have an effect on your mood. But we don't tend to just see it as changing conditions, like the bulb growing with the sun and the water. We think, "What's the matter with me? I was in such a good mood yesterday and it rained a little bit and now I feel like crap. What's the matter with me? Why can't I stay steady? Why can't I stay in this open, loving space? Isn't that what I'm here for—to always be open and loving?"

Good luck. It would be nice. But the weather changed and the barometer dropped and you got a headache and now you're in an aversive mood. That's how it is now. Notice it coming together. Notice the conditions coming together. Notice how they change, and notice when the aversion is gone. It's gone. Don't assume it's hiding underground. It's gone. Really notice what's here now and stay really steady with it. We can't hide from it.

This is silly, but this is where I really saw this: one time I was eating on a retreat. Eating is really interesting. I think if you're really mindful of all that goes on in eating—for one thing, how many chews is it while the food still tastes good? Not many. One chew, two chews, and then blah. That's why we're going for the next forkload before we even finish, because it stopped tasting good. But that's another thing—a whole other talk.

So I was being really quite aware, feeling the sensations and watching it go down the throat, and then feeling the sensations, when it suddenly hit me: the food in the mouth was "the food," but these sensations were just sensations. It was a thought in my mind calling these sensations "the food" that was giving the sense of permanence, of something unchanging. It was a completely different experience. Sensations in this area was very different from chewing and feeling "the thing." But the mind says, "Oh no, this is the food, and now it's that," and then I visualize the esophagus or whatever. We create the unreal by excess of imagination. What's really happening? Sensations. That food was so gone. You go back to your mouth and see there's no food there. It's gone.

It seems silly, but we're so into the next thing that we don't give ourselves time to notice. So maybe there are ways you can play with this on retreat—just give yourself time to notice. In activities, see if as soon as you eat one bite, you're shoveling in the next. Give it a little bit of space. Or as soon as you finish eating, you jump up to go do the next thing. Give it a little bit of space. Just let something end. Or notice how the mind jumps into the next thing, but notice that's what's happening. Notice when you're assuming permanence—whenever we think, "This is what's going to happen," or we assume we know what's going to happen next. The bell rings and we all come in here. It's amazing that most of the time that works.

It is amazing.

So just bring in that Ajahn Chah teaching: "Okay, this is uncertain. This is uncertain."

For me it feels like really great renunciation when I'm on retreat—off-retreat too, but on retreat you can notice it more clearly—the difference between when I'm simply really present with whatever's happening in this moment, or when I'm walking around or sitting, really living in the constructed world of thought, of whatever's going on. Not that thought should stop, but when we're really living in that world.

And the great renunciation is to just simply let those thoughts hang there in space. Just come out of living in that constructed world and drop with total surrender and presence into the reality of this moment. It's like this now. Just feeling the sensations of the lifting, or the coolness of the rice when you're chewing, whatever it is. That complete coming into the present moment. The renunciation of all the stories and the thoughts just for that moment. Ah, peace.

Not needing somewhere to rest, but the resting at ease in whatever's arising. There is resting at ease—it's just in this moment. We can't hold it, we can't keep it, we can't keep it going. But when we're not trying to make something to rest in, whatever is occurring right now, this is the place where total ease, the totality of presence, is possible.

So just play with this as you go through the days, noticing when you're assuming permanence. Notice when you're not. Notice when something's gone and you think, "Oh, but it's gonna—" Wait. How is it right now? Just drop into that.

And yes, some of the time we do open to that fragility—that being in the pre-trembling of a house that falls. And because we're not completely awakened, sometimes we're going to fall into some fear or some resistance or whatever. That's fine. That's just the habits of the mind and heart. We can be with that too.

When we really start to have some—or continue to deepen—our confidence in our perception of change, of impermanence, we get much less afraid of life, of change, because we know this is how it is. This is all there is. It doesn't take us into a kind of "well, who cares" disconnect—"it's all changing, to hell with it all." At least in my experience, it doesn't do that. It actually opens into the potential to really appreciate the wonder and the mystery. It's just this. It's so amazing. And then now it's this. We don't need to make it anything in particular. Somehow this moment is everything.

I just want to end with a poem I really like from Hafiz, the Persian Sufi poet.

Deepening the Wonder

Death is a favor to us, but our scales have lost their balance. The impermanence of the body should give us great clarity, deepening the wonder in our senses and eyes of this mysterious existence we share and are surely just traveling through.

If I were in the tavern tonight, Hafiz would call for drinks, and as the master poured, I would be reminded that all I know of life and myself is that we are just a mid-air flight of golden wine between his pitcher and his cup.

If I were in the tavern tonight, I would buy freely for everyone in this world, because our marriage with the cruel beauty of time and space cannot endure very long.

Death is a favor to us, but our minds have lost their balance. The miraculous existence and impermanence of form always makes the illumined ones laugh and sing.

So, thank you. Let's just sit quietly a moment.

CHAPTER 157

Aspiration and Courage

Carol Wilson · 57 min

> In this heartfelt talk from a three-month retreat, Carol Wilson addresses the inevitable challenges practitioners face when cycling through difficult mind states. She emphasizes that the path of awakening is vast and all-encompassing, held within the framework of the Four Noble Truths—dukkha, its cause in taṇhā (craving), the possibility of cessation, and the Eightfold Path of practice.
> Wilson draws on Ajahn Buddhadāsa's teaching that Nibbāna is accessible to everyone, describing it as the coolness of heart-mind freed from the torments of greed, hatred, and delusion. She distinguishes wholesome aspiration from goal-oriented wanting: aspiration uplifts and energizes, while craving contracts and frustrates. She shares inspiring examples, including Master Sheng Yen's unwavering determination to return to monastic life despite years of hardship, and Burmese nuns whose devotion and generosity transformed their communities.
>
> The talk offers practical guidance for working with common obstacles—returning patterns, overwhelming emotions, and what Sayadaw U Paṇḍita called "stopping within." Wilson references a discourse where the Buddha reassures the dying monk Asaji that concentration is not the essence of the teaching, but rather insight and awakening. She encourages practitioners to use wise reflection on inspiring beings, to hold personal suffering as an expression of the universal human condition, and to meet difficult moments with non-aggression—the very expression of compassion that transforms experience into the path itself.

I want to offer some reflections on aspiration and courage.

At this point in the retreat, I'm really struck by how much everybody goes through. How difficult it is sometimes. And despite all the instructions and all the lists and everything we talk about and the upliftingness—there are times for everyone where there's lots of insight and it's really going well—then it seems to cycle around again. You're just kind of spinning in your neuroses, it feels like. You think, "Here we are again, and it's into the fourth week. What did I do wrong?"

And that's just the lighter side. But seriously, what everyone goes through at different times in your own way, it's quite challenging sometimes, isn't it? Difficult, tiring. And it takes, I think, enormous courage to keep showing up again and again—not just today, not just in this retreat, but for our whole path of awakening, for our whole life.

What I want to talk about tonight, in terms of something that can support our keep showing up, having this moment-to-moment courage, is something that helps me a lot: to keep refreshing, renewing my deepest sense of aspiration for why I'm doing what I'm doing, in terms of this whole path of awakening.

When we are in the difficult time, even if yesterday it was all flowing and it was so clear that there's no self, or everything's coming and going, or there's no point in putting in effort—it's just all happening by itself—when it feels like that, it feels like, "Well, now I know. This is how it is, and it's going to be like this for the rest of the retreat and probably the rest of my life." And it probably isn't the first time you've had that experience and that thought. And if you're lucky, it's the next day before that falls apart. Could be five minutes later. And it's like, "Oh my God, again, this."

Sometimes we can see in whatever particular personal experience of suffering is coming up, we can see the three characteristics. But then it starts to spin and we start to get sucked down into the vortex. And this is for everyone at different times—it's as if we're back in the story and the "me" and the suffering and "what did I do wrong." Can you relate at all?

So, some things about aspiration. The first thing, to remind us when we're really in this struggle and it seems to come down to me doing it wrong and what can I do to fix it: remember that this path, this whole path, is vast. Hold it in the framework of the Four Noble Truths.

When I'm spinning and thinking, "Oh my God, I'm back in self-hatred again, and if I really knew better..."—just to open up a minute, even if it's an intellectual reminder, to remember that whatever arises is held within the Four Noble Truths. There's not some experience you have that's somehow outside the Four Noble Truths, and if you get rid of that, then maybe you can begin to discover what the Buddha was talking about. Everything can be held within that framework.

Just widen out and see: it isn't just about me fixing this pattern of my mind and being less neurotic. We're really here to understand the Four Noble Truths—that this is dukkha, the cause of dukkha is tanha, craving, that there is an ending of craving, the sure heart's release, the ending of suffering. Whether it's a momentary release from craving, which even Sayadaw U Pandita talks about as a moment of mindfulness, as a moment of freedom, or it's the complete ending of greed, hatred, and confusion, which is the arahat—both of those are on the path. And then the Eightfold Path of our practice, of how we live our life.

Just to remind ourselves: even if it seems we're struggling in a bubble of me and mine and what's wrong with me, that's just the particular expression of some aspect of the Four Noble Truths. Remember the vastness of what we're doing.

The path is vast, all-encompassing, and as the Buddha said, we are all invited. Ehipassiko—you too, come and see for yourself. It's not only for monastics. It's not only for people who have some kind of really special circumstances in their life.

The truth is true for everyone. Everyone here has some kind of incredible deep aspiration, or you wouldn't still be here. Whatever got you here, you wouldn't still be here into the fourth week. It's for everyone.

So to remind ourselves that the potential for awakening is available to each of us in any particular moment of our experience. And that's not just some kind of a nice idea. That's really the essential heart of, I hope, why we practice. Don't shy away from that. Or let yourself fall into some sakkaya ditthi, personality view, of "okay, yeah, for somebody else—for me, if I could just get through the six weeks without committing some horrible thing, that'll be good." Really let it in. This is what this path, this practice is about. And as the Buddha said, if it were not possible, I would not ask you to do so. He didn't just say it's possible for this person over there. Ehi pasiko—you too come and see.

Ajahn Buddhadasa, who we've spoken about, gave one talk that was translated into English. I just want to mention it very briefly because I love the title: "Nibbana for Everyone." This was a talk he gave to Thai laypeople quite some years ago, where he was saying that in Thailand at that time, Nibbana had come to be thought of as something only accessible in previous generations, or only to monastics. But he was saying Nibbana means cool, basically. So he said that in any moment the mind stream, the heart stream, is freed from the torments of greed, hatred, and confusion, it's cooled. That's the coolness, he says. He talks about momentary Nibbana the same way that Sayadaw U Pandita talked about a moment of mindfulness being a moment of freedom.

His whole talk, which I'm not going to go into more now, is really saying Nibbana is for everyone. We all experience many moments every day of this coolness—the heart and mind that's cooled, not burning with the fires of the torments. We need to notice this. He said if you didn't have moments like that, you couldn't bear it. We couldn't survive. This is what keeps beings alive, he says.

So this is, to me, both very inspiring—it can feed aspiration—but it's also, in a way, daunting. Or it's a... I don't know, challenge isn't the right word. But if I really let it in that this is true and accessible and open to everyone, it can inspire in me a really deep aspiration. And it doesn't allow me to fall back into personality views that are almost afraid, or somehow thinking I'm not worthy to really honor, to really have such a deep or profound aspiration. If we don't really think we want it, then it's okay if we don't get it, kind of thing. I'm not good enough, so why should I try? So let's not really look—if you know what I mean.

So I want to talk about really taking the time... Bonnie and Sally have both mentioned aspiration. I just want to talk about it a bit more to bring it home, because I've been finding in some of these last years in my practice that consciously tuning into this quality of aspiration—in my own particular mind, heart, stream—consciously tuning into it, feeling it not just on an intellectual level but really tuning into it, allowing it to inform our moment-to-moment decisions, allowing it to give us the courage, the energy to keep going, to keep showing up on the path... I've found this to be enormously supportive, and something I didn't think about or do so much in the early years of my practice.

This sense of aspiration, as Sally talked about a while ago, is kind of like the overview, the large-scale intention—not just moment-to-moment cetana, but a wider sense of what's really, truly, deeply most important to you in your life. Really take the time. You may know, you may not know, but tune into that for yourself. And it's not just a thought. The thought might... you may know when there's a thought, or maybe a thought of what you think ought to be your intention. But when you really tune into the aspiration, for me it's a kind of felt sense, kind of like a gut level—oh yeah, that's really what's most important to me in this life. It doesn't mean other things aren't also important, but this is kind of the bottom level, you could say.

And this sense of overarching aspiration really helps set us on a path. It's what we return to again and again, what keeps us on a path. But it's not something that's just a one-time thing—okay, that's my aspiration, I'm here to awaken, that's it—and then we forget about it. We have to keep connecting with it, moment by moment. It becomes, hopefully, a support, a sense of strength, something to remind us in our moment-to-moment choices and decisions. Because every moment is changing.

So first let's say, now, tonight, tomorrow, through this time, let yourself—when it comes up in your mind, in your heart, or you just have some sense, yes, whatever it is—I'm not here to say what it should be for anybody. But say an intention is: I really want to awaken for the benefit of all beings. Okay, that's the bodhicitta, the bodhisattva motivation.

But say that intention comes up in your heart, in your mind. For many people—not everybody, but so many of us—there is this tendency of self-doubt, of putting oneself down, thinking "I'm not worthy" or "I'm not able" or "someone else, but not me." You know what I mean? An intention that profound could arise, and the mind goes, "You're right—who do you think you are to be having such an aspiration? First, you can't do it," or "You're just being..." whatever way your mind goes to dismiss yourself.

Don't listen to that. That's just aversive habit of mind. That's just falling into some view of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, of personality view. Don't listen to that. Really honor what comes up in your deep sense of what's most important to you in your life. And that can change, of course, as our life goes on, as our understanding and wisdom deepens, as our compassion grows—whatever. That can change, change form. But just for here on retreat, when you let yourself touch it, whatever stuff the mind has around it, don't pay attention to that. Really honor that intention.

And that's all. You don't have to make a big deal of it. It's not an ego thing. It's different from "I'm so great, I have this intention." It's just an aspiration that comes.

One way—the way I, for myself, can tell the difference between when aspiration turns to wanting: aspiration could be a sense of what is possible. So say the aspiration is really to free the heart and mind from the torments of greed, hatred, and confusion. That's a vast aspiration. It's also a sense that that's not how it is right now. It can be a sense of what's potential, right? So that could certainly turn into a goal. And then I'm sure you remember us saying again and again that the practice is about totally being here now, not goal-oriented. How does that work together?

When it's an aspiration, it's not like one eye on the goal—"I'm here, and how can I get there?" It's a sense of, "Wow, it's a possibility." And it's a wholesome, beautiful quality. You can feel it. It brings a kind of brightness in the mind, an uplift, a sense of energy, a willingness to do. You could say saddhā, faith, bringing viriya, the willingness to do. And what do we do? We don't have one eye on the goal, saying, "What can I do to get there?" What we do is completely open and surrender into this moment. Just this moment now is the path.

So aspiration—you can feel it's supportive, it's energizing, it brightens and uplifts. When the habit of mind switches to wanting or greed, which it will because that's just its habit, it kind of switches. Then it's like one eye on the prize, so to speak. "How am I doing? How am I doing?" And instead of feeling this uplift, you can feel—as with greed, as with wanting—the tendency of the mind-heart starts to get more narrow, more contracted. That can come as some sense of frustration, or a sense of expectation, or a sense of disappointment—all that stuff.

So that's useful to notice. Not something wrong, but it can be really helpful. "Wow, I'm really feeling frustrated. It's just not happening. Here's greed, and I'm really here to get rid of greed. What's going on?" Oh yeah—greed. That's what's going on.

And then the aspiration can come back to give us the courage. "Oh, okay. Greed is like this." Honestly. And in that moment, the frustration shifts. It's like a sense of, "Yes, I'm willing to show up for this."

So aspiration is a powerful force to keep coming back to, to keep finding ways to refresh, revitalize, and remind yourself. Because when we can really use this aspiration—this sense of what's most important to us, maybe our deepest, strongest purpose in life—that's a reminder. It can serve to allow us to collect and focus our energy through the vicissitudes of our life, through the different choices we have to make.

We're able to do or be with things that we never would have thought possible just from our little sense of self and personality. The sense of aspiration gives a great courage and quality of resolution, determination. Adhiṭṭhāna, which I think Sally also spoke about, is a real strength of intention where the energy of the mind-heart comes together. Just do it. Determination is really like the Nike thing—just do it. In fact, U Tejaniya used to hold up the Nike swoosh when somebody was having trouble. He'd just hold it up and say, "Just do it. Just get up. Just feel what's happening. Just get simple. Just do it."

To give an example, one thing that helps me keep refreshing or encouraging my aspiration is sometimes wise reflection—tuning into beings that I know or that I've read about or that I see who are somehow inspiring. The way they are living their life or manifesting certain beautiful qualities can touch that same wholesome, beautiful quality in my own mind and heart, rekindling my being in touch with aspiration, with what's important.

So I wanted to give an example of determination, of how the clarity of aspiration can lead to a real sense of determination that can take one through very difficult aspects of life. This is from an autobiography I read of a great Chinese Chan master who died just a few years ago. I know some of you knew him very well—Master Sheng Yen. I had the good fortune to sit with him for only two short retreats, but I was enormously inspired by his being, by his wisdom, and also by his kindness, his relational quality, his simplicity of being. He was a great Chan master in Taiwan with tens of thousands of followers, which you didn't realize because I met him in the West and he just seemed so simple and accessible. And then you find out he's huge, just huge in Taiwan. He wrote an autobiography called Footprints in the Snow.

He became a monk early in life. He had a very difficult life of great privation and poverty, and he became a monk in mainland China during the twenties or thirties. It was a very difficult life, but he was quite dedicated to being a monk through the World War and then through the Civil War. Then in 1949, when it was clear that Mao was winning the Civil War and that all the monasteries were going to be destroyed, the only way he could get out of mainland China—he had no money, he had nothing, and he was still a monk—was to join Chiang Kai-shek's army, and then they would take him to Taiwan. So he did that. He did that to get out of mainland China.

But once he got to Taiwan, you couldn't just say, "Okay, thanks. I think I'll withdraw from the army now. It's been nice." He said he was really basically stuck there in the army. He was disrobed. He said, "But in my heart, in my mind, I'm always a monk." He had to spend really years and years, over ten years, in a very difficult situation in the army there. He said he managed not to have to do any killing, but he had a very deep commitment to vegetarianism, for instance. But the food wasn't vegetarian.

This is his sense of determination, but also how to be flexible. In his heart, he was always a monk. One of the monk's rules for him was to be vegetarian. So mostly he'd eat vegetarian to the point of almost starving, because that wasn't the food. But when it would come to the point where he was really going to starve, he ate meat. He really had this flexibility of discerning wisdom, asking what's the appropriate action here, but still relating to that truth: in my heart, I'm always a monk. And when he felt that he had done actions that he felt remorse for, actions that weren't the sīla he really wanted to support, he would, in his own way, make amends. He did lots of prostration practice as a way of purifying his karma.

He said finally, after a long time, he did manage to find a way out. And he said, "Looking back, I realized that if I did not have a very strong determination to actually return to monastic life, I probably would not have succeeded. Getting out of my particular branch of the military was nearly impossible."

This is the kind of thing that you can't see from the beginning—his aspiration to be a monk and to live that way. But we don't know what events are going to happen in our life or what's going to turn out, really. We don't know what will happen tomorrow. So aspiration isn't about planning out how everything's going to look. We don't know.

But it's really the beacon, the deep-seated root of what will be our guide. And then we have to find the flexibility and the discerning wisdom to move within the circumstances of our life, but always returning as best we can to our aspiration.

He said that after he got out of the military, one of the first things he did was seven years of solitary retreat. I thought, wow, finally.

He was elderly when I met him and really one of the more inspiring people I've encountered. When I think about him, it brings a sense of brightness to my mind, to my heart. We don't always have to generate all the brightness, all the wisdom ourselves. Sometimes we're spinning in our stuff and we can't find it within. But it's okay to bring to heart, to mind, somebody or something that can reignite us, that can get us back in touch with some quality of wholesomeness, some quality of uplift that really feeds our aspiration.

When I think of Master Sheng Yen, my mind doesn't list all these qualities—it just feels this brightness, this inspiration, and a kind of real metta that I felt from him, a real commitment to what is possible in a life. Just leave it there. You don't have to go on to the next thought: what is possible for him but not for me because of this or that. No—just leave it there with the inspiration.

It's so helpful to keep doing this, because as I said, we need to keep finding ways to support what I'm calling the courage, the willingness to say, okay, this too, again, for the ten-thousandth time. Just now? How can I have the courage, the willingness to show up for this and recognize that whatever's coming up now is part of the path? Just because it doesn't look like I think the path ought to look. Just because I feel like I'm spinning in my story and I'm not getting neon lights—that's okay, honey. You're understanding anicca while you're going through this. It doesn't usually telegraph itself like that. You just feel like, aye, aye, aye, again.

And then you come in to one of us teachers and we say, yes, but you weren't feeling that yesterday. And you think, oh, shut up. I'm feeling it now. I'm going to feel it forever. Don't give me this "you didn't feel it yesterday." It's really happening now. And you go out of the room.

So this is where we really need to find our inspiration to keep going. At this point in a retreat, where you're really working so sincerely—everybody—there's, I think for all of us at different times, periods where I call it hitting the wall. We hit the wall in different ways. I'm not going to even try to list them all. I'll just give a few examples. But for whatever reason, we think this is it. It's kind of like, give me my walking papers. I'm gone, for whatever particular thing is going on.

Sometimes—and this is a big one—as I said, we've been seeing clearly, and then our so-called painful, neurotic, bad habits come up again. The self-hatred, or the spinning in fear, or that memory again of what that person did in the third grade. I thought we went through this already fifty-five times. And again, I have to feel it. I felt it. I know it. It's over—but it isn't over. Here it is.

So then the only conclusion our little minds can come to is: I'm no good. I can't do it. It's not working. And it's all about me, because we're caught in the cage of self-judgment at that point. We're taking it all personally. It's all about me working my way through it.

Sometimes we know what it's like not to have that particular pattern happening. We've felt the freedom, those moments of the coolness of no kilesa. So when it comes back—I don't know if it's like this for you, but for me it can be like a double whammy. Not only do I have to feel it all again, there's also the thought: I'm more aware of how deluded I am feeling all of this. I'm actually feeling quite clearly how caught I am, and how unable I am to get out of this.

And so on top of all of that, we add the hopelessness of: oh my God, the more I practice, the more neurotic I get. And if it's like this now, just wait till I go home—because I'm not even getting triggered much here.

Wait till I have to go see my family. You know, that can just spiral and spiral.

Okay, that's one way of hitting the wall.

Sometimes, for all of us, something opens up—an emotional pain, a trauma memory, physical pain—that we haven't really quite felt before to that extent, or opened to before. It can be both scary and frightening, or just painful. Just that sense that this is unbearable, there's no way I can be with this, the mind says. I can't bear this. Sometimes it's just afraid of how bad it's going to be. Sometimes it's like shock: "No, if freedom means opening to this, never mind. Let me just shut it down." But that's just a thought coming through. It comes through a lot, but it's just a thought coming through.

This sense of "I can't bear it another moment"—I think of something I heard Ajahn Sumedho say one time, which comes into my mind a lot. It really helps me. He was talking about practicing in Thailand during the hot season—and it's hot in the hot season. There's the kuti with a tin roof, which I've experienced. You bake. Go in a little hut with a tin roof when it's 120 degrees outside and see how you feel. Hot, that's how you feel. And in all his robes.

He said, "I'm sitting here sweating through my robes in the hot season of Thailand with the mosquitoes, and my mind is doing whatever it's doing. And I think, I cannot bear this one more second." Have you ever hit that place? "And then I'd find that I could."

I love that.

So I'll be sitting, thinking, "This is unbearable. I cannot be with this one more instant." Oh, yes I can. It's just an instant. Then I'll say to myself, "What's actually so unbearable about this moment right now?" And this is a serious question; it's not putting myself down. When I ask that question, it piques the interest again. The mindfulness returns: What is actually happening right now? It's not saying I should be able to bear it or not. It's just a shift of attitude in that moment.

But what makes this shift possible? Remembering. Just remembering our bigger aspiration from time to time.

Another way we get really caught in what I call the cage of sakkāya-diṭṭhi is when our view of who we are or what should be happening on retreat becomes rigid. Winnie talked a lot about the kind of background agendas we come into retreat with, and we're going to keep hitting them over and over. You know you're hitting one because you're frustrated that something isn't happening. That's always a great sign. "Oh, I'm hitting up against some agenda, some expectation. Great, let's see what it is." Bring it up into the light of day so it's not working in the background.

But when change is occurring and we're taking it personally—and we all do this—there's a great sutta I like from the Buddha about a monk named Asaji, who had been a very good monk. He was practicing a lot and he came to the Buddha, very sick, afflicted, gravely ill. I think actually he was dying. He was telling the Buddha that he was filled with remorse, and the Buddha said to him, "But if you have nothing for which to reproach yourself in regard to virtue, Asaji, why are you troubled by remorse and regret?"

And Asaji says, "Formerly, venerable sir, when I was ill, I was able to tranquilize the bodily formations." In other words, he could really cultivate concentration and get calm. "But now I do not obtain concentration. And so it occurs to me, let me not fall away." He's not being able to concentrate his mind and he's freaking out. "Let me not fall away"—he's basically saying, "Don't let me fall away from the path. I can't get concentrated."

Sound familiar?

And the Buddha said—it's a whole long discourse, and I'm going to spare you the full version. First he talked about impermanence, about the impermanence of the body. Bodily formations change, and so the conditions change, the results change.

He talks about impermanence of vedana—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—when the conditions for the pleasant change, it changes.

And then he said also, "Remember in fact that in my teaching, concentration is not the essence. People who think concentration is the essence of the teaching, when the concentration can't arise, they think they've fallen away from the path. But concentration is not the essence of my teaching. The essence is insight, the path, awakening."

And so he's saying to Asaji, "Yeah, the conditions are changing. You're really sick. You can't cultivate concentration now. That's how it is. But that's not a falling away from the path."

So this is the sutta. Everything's the path. Seeing concentration can arise. Seeing the causes and conditions have changed. Seeing the impermanence, seeing the impersonality of that. That's the Four Noble Truths right there. And the freedom in the moment—oh, it's like this. Of course I can't concentrate. I'm dying, for God's sake. I can't concentrate.

That's a moment of freedom, that the bubble burst, the clinging, the sense of self trying to do something burst. And of course, Asaji became one of the arhats.

So just to know, it's not just us spinning around in this. The same at the time of the Buddha, the same with nuns and monks who'd been his disciples and followers for many years. We can get caught in this little bubble of "it's all about me and me doing and falling away" instead of seeing the big picture. Whatever's occurring, we see it through the lens of the Four Noble Truths. There's the potential in that moment for a moment of awakening, a moment of freedom, a moment of coolness, whatever it is that's happening. And it doesn't mean in the next moment the conditions change and we're back spinning again. Not to take it personally.

Two other quick ways we sometimes get caught. One is something Sayadaw U Pandita used to call "stopping within," which is basically this: it's going really nice, things are flowing. Either you're really focused, it's smooth, everything's happening, it's effortless, it's just going. We don't have to put in effort and you don't need to put in effort. And something in the back of the mind goes, "That's good enough. I could live with this." I'm exaggerating a little. It's kind of subtle, but there's some way we go, "Yeah, okay, that's good. It's better than I ever thought it could be. I'll take it." Something puts down, "Okay, that's enough now."

He calls that stopping within. The energy over time can start to decay, or the interest isn't quite so strong. Of course it'll change—we know that. But just to be aware, we've said, "Great, good enough. I'm on cruise control for a while."

Another way that I see a lot is this: actually, a lot of insight could be happening, really getting a deeper sense of anattā, of the out-of-control nature of things. Quite a lot of people are experiencing things where you're really feeling the out-of-control nature of things. But often that's accompanied not with "Great! Not-self is occurring, out of control. I'm so free! I'm so happy!" Instead, all the defense systems, the self-personality stuff kicks in, trying desperately to control. There's this real sense of struggle. Or some idea of impermanence comes in and the mind goes, "If that's what freedom's about, I don't want anything to do with it."

The mind thinks, "What about if there's no self—what about loving my family? If there's no clinging, how do I care for my children?" All the stuff that the mind makes up about the future. It's not actual experience, but a fear of what it might be.

And it's almost like we want to go back to the pleasure garden. When we were talking about the Buddha's life, you know, maybe there were times when he was out there in those six years eating one grain of rice every two weeks, where maybe he thought, "It could be nice back there with those lotus ponds. What am I doing here? This is what it's about? Let me go back. I'm not ready to give this up yet."

Chögyam Trungpa called that "nostalgia for samsara." I love that phrase. We know we're suffering, and yet we just want it back. It doesn't quite make sense, but over my years of practice, several times in long retreats—I can't even say exactly what it was—but it felt like a series of small deaths. Not aspects of my personality I wished away, but more like views that I was believing about who I was, about my personality. And they would just start to melt away or be seen through.

Even though it was liberating, there could be this sense of nostalgia for something going away that was familiar. That's comfortable, you know, like in that Peanuts comic from when I was a kid, with Linus and his old blanket. Your old cozy, smelly, holey blanket, but it makes you feel good, so you slip into it. A kind of nostalgia for whatever it is—a certain sense of self—even though in the going away, in the seeing through it really, seeing it was never real to begin with, there's quite a freedom. I find that interesting, that nostalgia for samsara.

These are just some examples, but I'm offering them not because there's something wrong when any of these are happening. Rather, I want to remind us that the path is lifelong and all-inclusive. And a lot of the time, we don't realize the understandings that are coming. It's not all in thought.

On retreat, there are times when emotions are coming and going and changing rapidly, and they're all really intense, and you kind of believe them all, and it's exhausting. And we'll say, "Oh, so things are changing." But it doesn't feel like you're getting that insight. It just feels like you're getting thrown all over the place. But on another level, on a deeper level, perception is shifting. Perception is starting to get clearer, to see things more the way they are. It doesn't always make it up into the thought world the way we want it to. So these are extremely valuable and important aspects of our path—in retreat, out of retreat.

Remember, nibbāna is for everyone. And as far as I can tell, except for incredibly rare exceptions, it's very challenging. It's demanding for everyone. In some ways, I would say, freedom from clinging—the heart-mind that's free from clinging—is absolutely uncompromising. It's not free from clinging except for certain things. Freedom from clinging is just really freedom from all clinging.

And with our most sincere intention, and everything we read, and us yakking up here all the time, and ten million instructions, the mind of thinking—of what we know—can't imagine what that uncompromising, radical freedom of heart-mind is like. Whatever we can imagine is limited by what we know, and by what the imagining is. It's impossible. But we want to know ahead of time. We want to aim in the direction of what we think it should feel like. And then when this other stuff comes up that sure isn't what we think it should feel like, we get caught again in our expectations. Or we get caught trying very sincerely to take all of the instructions and figure out which is the best one to apply right now to get to freedom from clinging, or to feeling better, or whatever it is.

But we're all caught up in really what's required of us. The full commitment, the courage, isn't to fix it or figure it out. In those moments when we see we can't possibly know, it's the commitment, the courage to just—in this moment—open. Surrender. It's like this now. Totally open into this moment as it is. Not for anything. But because this is all there is. This moment.

As Dōgen said, "If you can't find the truth right where you are, where do you expect to find it?" Right here. This moment.

And so, to do this again and again—that's what we're all doing here, again and again. We get lost in our stories, in trying and figuring out and applying things. And then, for me, I need to call on my aspiration at this point. When I can see I'm confused, when I'm trying to figure things out, I really connect with opening to truth. For the benefit of all beings, just drop into the moment. And the next moment arises as it does.

It's a really radical trust in the path of awakening. It takes its own path and wends its own way for each of us. Each of us has a different path. It shows up differently. That's why comparing makes absolutely no sense. Of course, that's not going to stop us, as you know. Bonnie was talking about māna—we'll keep it up until the last possible moment. By God, I'm going to compare until I die! But it makes no sense because everybody's path, everybody's conditioning is slightly different. And we all have to go through what we have to go through.

So it's about finding the courage to open into this vulnerability, into this kind of love and trust of the mystery of now. For me, more and more over the years, it's become a sense of reconnecting with my aspiration—that brightness of heart, mind, energy that just gives me the courage to show up again. And so I want to encourage you to find ways for yourself. We're all different. What helps you reconnect with that for yourself?

For me, one way is remembering—as I said, just remembering inspiring beings. Another way is when I see that I'm in my story, to widen it out and see that this particular moment of suffering is not just my moment; it's an expression of the human condition. Whatever particular suffering any of us are experiencing, we're brothers and sisters in that with so many people in this particular moment of life. Opening it beyond the personal—the personal as an expression of all of us, humanity, not separate. That gives me strength to be with it more.

Also, I find when I'm just being with myself on retreat, sitting, walking, going through something, and I'm not really thinking of my aspiration or that real sense of practicing to awaken but also to be of benefit to beings—I'm just doing my thing, practicing, something's hard, and I'm with it for a while, and I think, "Okay, that's enough. I can get up now and go do whatever." And then it comes to mind: "You know what? Just be with this. It's not just for you, but maybe if you're really with it, it might be able to benefit somebody." There's a whole other kind of strength, a courage—like, "Okay, right, let me sit down and be with this again." And it's not like a should at all. It's this really uplifting energy of "Right, let's really understand it." It's a kind of compassion, a kind of love, a mettā.

And again, seeing that the attitude with which our mind-heart meets any particular experience is also really helpful. Sogyal Rinpoche says, "If you cultivate the correct motivation within your own experience, it turns into bodhicitta all by itself." So the way I think of that is: How does the mind-heart meet this present moment of your experience? Non-aggression in the mind-heart's relationship to a moment of our own personal suffering is the expression of the intention of compassion.

So just playing with that—as difficult as this moment is, just surrender into it for an instant with non-aggression. You don't have to love it. We don't love the things that are difficult. You don't have to like it. But as Ajahn Sumedho says—he calls mettā just being with what's difficult without creating anything around it. That seems more possible to me. I'm not going to love my knee pain. But I can just be with it without creating anything around it. Non-aggression, just meeting this painful experience, this sense of self-hatred, this self-blame, this fear—just like this now. It's just like this now. That's manifesting the intention of compassion, and it strengthens the more we do it.

So as I said earlier, one of the things I do to help me reconnect with aspiration when I'm not finding it in myself is to use wise reflection. This is a way we can use in different ways. One is to consciously think of beings I've known who inspire me, like Master Sheng Yen.

It doesn't have to be some amazing master either. It can be just someone you know who manifests great generosity at times, or courage, or compassion. Thinking of that person really lights up that energy in my own heart and mind.

Or if you're a devotional type, as Bonnie was describing the other night, then sometimes thinking of a sense of the lineage—whoever your teachers have been, their practices, going all the way back—just holding that in mind can sometimes really brighten the heart-mind.

I've spent a lot of time in Burma, a lot of time with different nuns at various nunneries, many of them quite poor. These are mostly village women, you could say living a simple life, a poor life, and they're dedicated to living a virtuous life while also being very generous. Many of the nuns take care of young children. They all have a very—well, not all. I mean, there are good nuns and bad nuns, good monks and bad monks, just like everything. But the sincere nuns, and there are many of them, have a very devotional nature. For many of them, Buddhanussati, reflecting on the qualities of the Buddha, is a very profound practice.

Now for me, I'm not that type. That particular practice doesn't inspire me. A guy talked about it the first night—it really inspires him. We're all different. But I can be with those nuns and see how inspired they get from that reflection. And that inspiration, that love and devotion, lights up something in my own heart. I can appreciate that energy, and it touches a kind of devotion to the truth, which is the way it manifests for me. So it doesn't have to be exactly your way, but letting in the different beautiful, uplifting qualities that we see in people is a profound way, I find, to touch into aspiration, to remind yourself.

I'll tell a little story of another nun who inspired me—Sumanachari. We knew her for several years. There's a group of us that goes every year, and friends donate some money that we offer to these nuns. She was the head nun in a smallish nunnery of about twenty-five nuns—again, poor. When we first met her, like so many of the nunneries, they had no electricity, no decent clean water, just a tiny little building. The building had gotten bigger over the years, and she'd been there quite a while. She came by one day because she knew that we sometimes—I mean, we would offer money anyway, every year—but she came at the end of our time, very earnest and sincere.

We'd always thought of her as a little depressive, a little pulled in, just going along. But our friend Aria speaks fluent Burmese, so we could communicate well. She was saying that she hadn't been able to be at ease in her heart and mind all year because she saw that many of the poor children in that area—and there are many, both young nuns and little kids—had to walk far away to another school started by another nun, about a forty-five minute walk. But in the rainy season, that was too hard for the really little children. So she had this deep wish to start a school for these very small kids. She had nothing, but she asked if we could donate some money just to start it.

We didn't really think she could do it, but we thought, well, we could give three thousand dollars. So we did. We came back the next year, and it was amazing. I've seen this so many times now. It's amazing. With that money, all of the nuns had moved into one little house. They'd given up all their space. She'd used that money to build lean-tos—just roofs, open air—and lots of desks. She had one hundred and fifty little students by then. That means she has to hire teachers, regular teachers at regular salary, all from donated money. These are nuns who live on total donation. She's not the only one who's done that—there are lots of nun schools that do the same. But she had pulled this together in a year.

She came back and she was bright. Her face was radiant. She was exhausted—and she's been more exhausted every year since. But she said, "I'm so happy. My citta, my heart and mind, is at peace. I'm able to just give all that I can to take care of these young kids. It just makes me so happy."

When I think of her, Sumanachari, she's really an ordinary person who manifested this great love and devotion and generosity, year by year by year. I know many like her. So just thinking of people you know who embody these qualities—see how it lights up your heart and mind. And then you can say, okay, let me come back.

Let me be with this moment of back pain for the benefit of all beings. And mean it. Let me just surrender right now.

So just coming back to your aspiration—sometimes you'll feel it deeply, sometimes it seems superficial, but keep it up. It sinks in. It gets deeper. It starts to spread out. And you'll see how it gives us the courage and the determination and the resolution to keep showing up, even when we don't understand, even when we don't see the path before us. We really have to trust that what's occurring now is what it is.

I want to end with two things from the Buddha. Two things he said he never lost sight of: not to shrink from the struggle, and not to rest contented merely with wholesome states of mind. He says it is this unshakable deliverance of heart, of mind, that is the goal of this holy life—its essence, its heartwood, and its end.

Don't settle. Don't settle for anything less.

Thank you for your kind attention. May our sincere practice together today—and these six weeks or three months—be a cause, a condition for our own awakening from confusion. And may the merit be shared with all beings everywhere, that all beings may be freed from suffering.

CHAPTER 158

Wisdom and Compassion

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> Carol Wilson offers profound reflections on the essential unity of wisdom and compassion, building on the teaching that the manifestation of emptiness is compassion. She explores how these two qualities, while sometimes developing at different rates, ultimately need each other for complete understanding and skillful action in the world.
>
> Drawing from teachers including Nāgārjuna, the Dalai Lama, Padmasambhava, and Thich Nhat Hanh, Wilson examines how insight into anattā (not-self) and suññatā (emptiness) can feel cold or alienating without compassion, while compassion without wisdom can lead to despair and overwhelm. She explains how simple moment-to-moment mindfulness practice naturally cultivates both qualities—wisdom arising through clear seeing of the Four Noble Truths, and compassion emerging spontaneously when the contracted sense of self releases.
> Wilson shares personal examples of how resistance to difficult experience creates disconnection, and how cultivating compassionate intention can open the door to wisdom. She discusses the crucial role of upekkhā (equanimity) in sustaining compassionate action when we cannot control outcomes, offering inspiring examples from Martin Luther King Jr. and the Russian poet Anna Akhmatova. The talk illuminates how bearing witness with presence, even when we cannot fix suffering, has profound power—and how the Eightfold Path itself bridges wisdom and compassionate action through right view and right intention.

If you may remember, Guy ended his talk the other night on emptiness by saying that the manifestation of emptiness is compassion. I want to offer some reflections on wisdom and compassion—the unity of the wisdom of emptiness and the manifestation of compassion.

I really enjoyed when Guy was talking about how the common way we think of the world here in the West is materialism. That's obvious, but I just hadn't thought of it that way. And it's been a conundrum, I would say, in my whole life of practice, phrased in different ways: how to find really the balance of wisdom and compassion.

When you're having some sense, some understanding of the fact that everything is really a dream, that everything's really empty of substance—how do we live in the material world when there's that understanding that it's all just a dream, just a phantasmagoria? How do we continue to function and care?

And then on the other side, when that isn't so apparent, how do we continue to open our heart and mind to the infinite beauty and the infinite suffering without either drowning in despair or grief or getting so identified?

I've often found that my practice, which is my life, kind of flips between trying to understand from those two points of view, both of which are limited. The sense of how do those come together?

Sometimes, for me and for people I've talked with, when the understanding of the emptiness of phenomena and the emptiness of self becomes clear—as Guy was saying, knowing it's not just like a dream, it is a dream—sometimes that quality is really how perception is shot through. It can happen deep in retreat from time to time, it can happen in life. And for me, when there's that sense, it's not complete, not finished. It's like living in this surreal space—someone used that wonderful word in one of our group meetings. It's so clear in one way that it's just this phantasm. And at the same time, we've got to walk and talk and function and eat, and we do, quite easily with no problem. So the material world is really here.

It can seem like one way of perceiving and being negates the other. How do we hold and understand both? That's a question that can let the thinking mind go wild. How can I reconcile? Have you spent a few moments of the thinking mind trying to reconcile how everything's just a dream, a lump of foam, but somehow my knee hurts and I hate it? It's a lump of foam, but I'm hungry. I really want something to eat. This lump of foam needs some food.

How do we hold both of those? It really does seem surreal sometimes. But the problem of the surrealness and the trying to reconcile is actually the thinking about it.

As Thich Nhat Hanh says, "Understanding does not arise as the result of thinking. It is the result of the long process of conscious awareness." I've loved that quotation for years because in my experience it's so true. Thoughts are the reflection of the material world and describe it really well. The fact that everything's a dream—thoughts can talk about that, but they can't touch the experience. Trying to reconcile with thoughts is never going to work. If we could just give that up, in that moment there's no problem.

But looking at it another way: the wisdom of not-self, of emptiness, is that sense of wisdom that really sets the mind free from clinging, the heart free from craving. And then living in the material world is the world of action and response. So what's the link between those two?

This is the Buddha's genius, right? Wisdom, action, right thought, intention. Sound familiar?

The Eightfold Path. Right there—right view, the wisdom of emptiness; the second step, wise intention, which compassion really is. You could think of that as wise intention, right thought, which is what leads to action and speech in the world. Somehow you can find everything in the Buddha Dharma.

So to talk about wisdom and compassion really in terms of our deepening understanding of the whole path and our life—they really have to come together. They have to support each other. Of course, this happens naturally. It's just the way things are.

So now we're in the material world, talking, using thoughts. That's what I'll be doing the rest of the talk—some exploration of wisdom and compassion, how they support each other, how we could get lost in one without the support of the other.

The empty nature, the sense of emptiness of things—that can be a really profound insight. But just by itself, it's incomplete. We have it many times, the insight, but incomplete. Often people talk about having seen anattā at a gut level, not just thinking about it but feeling it, or the dreamlike nature as I was describing, and really an intimation of the truth that, oh yeah, it really is like that. That's not just a metaphor. It can hit you in many different ways. It can be shocking. It can be freeing. It can give you a lot of energy. It can be scary as heck.

Some of the different things yogis have said to me over the years in describing their reactions to insights into not-self, emptiness—sometimes it's very fearful. I think some people even mentioned that to Guy after his talk, that it kind of brings up fear, this sense of the emptiness of things. Or—I've written these down, these are words people have said to me over time—"If there's not any self, if it's all empty," it has this sense of being uncaring, cold. Alien, someone said. Inhuman. Indifference, not caring, annihilation. You get the drift.

And that can really be what I think in Tibetan they call falling into emptiness—the sense of emptiness, of not-self, that isn't supported by the compassionate manifestation, which naturally comes. But it doesn't always... Just as with the seven factors of awakening, they don't all grow up exactly together. We're kind of flipping. Sometimes you might be understanding emptiness, not-self more. Sometimes you might be seeing more compassion. Sometimes you might think you've never seen either one of them, and you'd give a lot for either one. But anyway, they're not always growing up together. It can tilt one way or the other.

In this sense of not quite seeing the compassionate aspect but just tuning into the emptiness, it can become embraced as a view. We get a hit of it, really a hit of not-self, but then it becomes a view—this is how it is.

There are various quotations I really like. One from Nāgārjuna, who as Guy mentioned is one of the best writers and teachers on emptiness. He said, "It is sad to see those who mistakenly believe in material, concrete reality, but far more pitiful are those who believe in emptiness. Buddhists say emptiness is relinquishing opinions. Believers in emptiness are incurable."

We can get caught in that. And so this is where compassion brings in the warmth, the connectedness to life, to beings, a sense that it matters what we do even when everything is empty.

But compassion also needs the support of wisdom. This is from the Dalai Lama. Because without the understanding of emptiness, compassion veers off into despair and overwhelm. From the Dalai Lama: "Compassion must be derived from our insight into emptiness of inherent self."

This is where the vast meets the profound. Without that unity, we can fall into despair. Because knowing from emptiness that people's suffering is avoidable can lead us to a more powerful compassion. But without the wisdom of emptiness also for ourselves, our compassion may be strong, but it is likely to have a quality of hopelessness, even despair.

You get a sense of that for yourself sometimes as we open up to become much more sensitive to our own suffering, the suffering of the world. There are times when the compassion is quite beautiful, but it's so easy for it to tip over—at least in my experience—into overwhelm, into a kind of despair, into a feeling of how can I possibly hold all this or be with all this? And that is when it needs to be balanced with the deeper understanding of not-self, of emptiness. These two always balancing, always coming together.

From Padmasambhava, the great founder of the lineage of Tibetan Buddhism: "The view"—which is really the understanding of emptiness, of not-self—"the view is the most important thing. However, do not let your action slip in the direction of the view. If it does, you will fall into the evil views of demons, prattling on about how goodness is empty, evil is empty." Doesn't matter what you do, it's all empty. "But do not let your view slip in the direction of action either, or you will be caught in materialism and ideology. That is why my view is higher than the sky, but my attention to my actions and their effects is finer than grains of flour." That sense of how both aspects are true at the same time.

Another Tibetan teacher, Padampa Sangye, was once asked, "Once we have realized emptiness, does it still harm us to commit negative acts?" Again, that's like the action slipping in the direction of the view. And he said, "Once you realize emptiness, it would be absurd to do anything negative. When you realize emptiness, compassion arises with it simultaneously."

To me, ongoing in my practice, in my life, and in talking with so many people, we see for ourselves in our little ways—okay, we're not up there with Padmasambhava or even close—but in little ways, how as wisdom comes, more compassion comes with it simultaneously.

I want to talk a bit about our practice. Vipassana here is a wisdom practice, but compassion is being cultivated at the same time. When we realize emptiness, even for a moment, compassion comes with it naturally. And how can it be otherwise? In a moment of insight into not-self—let's keep this simple, insight into not-self—in that moment the heart-mind is free from clinging. That's really what a moment of not-self is. There's no clinging at that moment. Clinging is almost synonymous with an arising of sense of self. So much energy is released when it's not bound up—the energy for life, the tenderness for life, the ability to see clearly when the energy is not caught in this obsessive self-referencing.

The Buddha talked about the kleshas, greed and hatred, but really a sense of self, which arises from that, is a maker of measurement. As soon as there's clinging, a sense of self, there's a measurement: me and other. And with the obsessive self-referencing, even when we mean well, there's no way to recognize the vastness of the situation. There's no way to really see clearly the good of oneself or the good of others or the good of both. I'm quoting from the Buddha: when there is greed, when the mind is obsessed with greed, with hatred, with confusion, we cannot see clearly.

In a moment when that vanishes—just a simple moment, and you have many moments like that when the sense of self isn't arising—then all that contracted energy of mind and consciousness and heart is available for just pure presence in this moment in life, for just the tenderness, the vividness, the totality of "it's like this now." And we can see clearly. It's just a natural occurrence.

Without that, even when we intend to do well and we have a compassionate intention, we still can act. It's not like we have to wait until we're completely liberated before we ever do anything, because our compassion would be tinged otherwise. But we really can't see as clearly.

I've used this example often because I love it. I heard it on the radio some years ago. There's a bridge that was built in London over the Thames, the Millennium Bridge. This is a bridge that people could walk over. When it was first opened—I think when it was being inaugurated—hundreds of people were walking over the bridge. There were so many people that the bridge started to shake. It was leaning a little to one side.

So each person thought—or rather, didn't think, but simply responded—what can I do to help? And everyone moved to the other side. And that, of course, just made the whole thing worse. You get a sense of each person trying to do their right thing, but completely in their own little bubble, because you can't really see the vastness when we're caught in the self-referencing. So the wisdom of emptiness allows for a more appropriate, a more wise response.

And also, this question of how can I hold it all—all the suffering, even just one day of listening to the news. Sometimes I can't bear it. Yeah, I can't. That's exactly the point. I can't. And as long as it's I resisting or drowning or wanting to do, but somehow hitting a sense of me, that subtle resistance—we can't. And that's realistic. We can't.

But in the moment when there's not that sense of I, and it's just passing through, like that story I told about the Dalai Lama a few weeks ago, where he can just be with people in their most immense suffering and really be crying and there with them. Then they leave and he turns to the next person and they're laughing and he's jovial and kidding around. And he's totally present, but there's not an I that's landing on and holding on to it. It moves through.

Not that we should hold that out as "this is how I have to be all the time." But play with noticing it once in a while when it happens here. With little things that happen here. That's what's so great about being on retreat—it's the little things. That's what we can do.

So our practice here, our simple moment-to-moment mindfulness practice here, is actually what is also developing the capacity for greater and greater compassion. As the Dalai Lama says—and since he's Mr. Compassion, we always use him when we're talking about compassion—how compassion is developed is through deep insight into what the nature of suffering is. And how do we get that deep insight? By focusing on, by being present with our own experience of suffering. How else? Where else?

And so then he says, as we're more present, without resistance, without judgment, with our own suffering, that insight into compassion begins to strengthen. It turns into not only compassion or being able to be with our own suffering, but it broadens into a sense of empathy with more and more beings until it really turns into the vastness of bodhicitta.

And this is really going on in the simplicity of our mindfulness practice. So we start where we are, wherever we are. And that's why the difficult—the really difficult moments and hours and days of our retreat—are so important. It's not just that we're developing wisdom, but also they're the ground, the seed for really developing compassion. Sometimes the wisdom shows up more, sometimes the compassion.

Whatever is arising in this present moment—mind, body, whatever is occurring, inner, outer—yathā bhūta, things as they have come to be in this moment. This moment is the result of all the previous conditions and can't be changed. But how the heart-mind, how the attention is meeting this moment, the quality in the mind and the awareness that's meeting this moment—this is the place that we are cultivating and developing. This is the place where wisdom and compassion can grow, where the old habits are being changed.

How we meet what's currently arising doesn't mean it should go away. But any moment that you're simply present with fullness of attention, without greed and aversion—that's a moment that actually has the seed of wisdom and compassion in that moment of awareness. We kind of, in the material world, get lost in looking for results. It's not that way.

Pema Chödrön writes: "If we begin to get in touch with whatever we feel with some kind of kindness, some kind of tender attention, our protective shells will begin to melt. And we will find that more areas of our life are workable. As we learn to have compassion for ourselves, the circle of compassion for others—what and whom we can work with, and how—becomes wider."

Just what the Dalai Lama says. Can we begin to just have the idea, when we're in these difficult, really difficult times, and you can't—when you can't really be mindful of it, and it's not going away, it's not getting better—can we just have the idea to meet it with simple kindness, just to touch it as it is? This is so not our habit.

The Dalai Lama, when he was asked about what looks like a lack of compassion in human society, offers us something important to consider. For the moment here on retreat, each of us is a representation of human society. So if at times you feel a lack of compassion in yourself, even towards yourself, you could listen to this.

He says, perhaps we just pay less attention to compassion and caring. We reinforce it less. Whereas in some sense, we fully embrace hostility and anger as an emotional state, fueling or reinforcing it. If we were to give the same amount of energy, attention, and reinforcement to compassion and caring, they would definitely be stronger.

Just think about it—and maybe this isn't true for you—but how often in our own internal experience on retreat, when something really difficult is going on, does it seem just natural that we have some form of self-aversive reaction? Some kind of self-blame: if I was doing it right, this wouldn't happen. Or: this is so bad, or I hate it. Or it's somebody else's fault—also a kind of aversive reaction. But just really beating ourselves up, going negative: all the instructions they give, and I can't do one of them, and it's because I'm useless and I'm hopeless. Does any of this sound familiar? Does it ever? And really, not just saying it, but totally buying into it.

And even more, have you ever noticed how the really self-judgmental negative comments about yourself and your practice masquerade as wisdom? "Yeah, you are really an egotistical, hopeless yogi. Look at how much the sense of self is arising. You are the most egotistical person here." Oh, that's egotistical. "I can't even criticize myself without being egotistical." It keeps on going and going. And that's masquerading as wisdom. Then a different voice, a different thought comes in and goes, "Well, that's really interesting. You're really seeing clearly." Oh look at that—that's really egotistical again. So the wholesome, compassionate voice? No, that's just weakness. The negative, self-blaming voice? That's wisdom. That's what the Dalai Lama is talking about. We don't really embrace compassion, we don't really see it.

So could we have the possibility? You can't force compassion. "Okay, goddammit, I'm gonna be compassionate now with this back pain. Compassion, compassion. Oh, I really love you." That doesn't work.

Just bringing mindfulness, coming face to face with the experience—this is one way Sayadaw U Pandita would describe mindfulness. Coming face to face, just as it is. Beginning there and just seeing it as it is can also bring along a compassionate attitude. And it may be that you need to begin by coming face to face with the dosa, with the anger, with the judgment. That's the thing that's happening. Coming face to face, we see it for what it is.

This is from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche:

Thoughts and feelings have no intrinsic solidity, form, shape, or color. When a thought of anger arises in the mind with such force that you feel aggressive and destructive, is the anger in your mind actually holding a weapon? Can it actually burn things like fire or crush them or carry them away like a violent river, that thought? No, anger, like any other thought or feeling, has no true self-existence, not even a definite location. It is just like wind roaring in empty space.

I love that. So let that thought of anger roar, and it just roars and roars itself out. Instead of allowing wild thoughts to enslave you, with mindfulness you realize their essential emptiness. Examine the nature of anger, the nature of hatred. You will find that it is no more than a thought. And when you see it as it is, it will dissolve like a cloud in the sky.

The essential emptiness, even of anger, roaring in empty space. In that moment, that's the moment of emptiness bringing in—as soon as you see it roaring in empty space, any sense of judgment or anger goes away. It's just, "Oh, that's just what it is." That simple touching can allow for compassion to arise. Coming face to face then with the actual thing that the aversion was about, seeing it as it is, can completely change the experience and allow compassion to come.

An example, a daily life example. The public radio station over the last two or three weeks has been having a series of reports on various aspects of the refugee crisis in Europe.

And so this particular one I thought was very interesting. They were talking about in Calais, in France, where there's a really huge refugee camp called the Jungle. It has thousands of people, and it's been the center of a lot of agitation and anger. The refugees are really trying to get out of it and get over to England, but it's getting a lot of press.

A reporter went there, and some of the French residents of Calais were having big demonstrations, wanting the jungle to be gotten rid of, demonstrating against the refugees. The reporter was talking to some of the French people who were demonstrating, saying they hated them, they should go away—the usual.

He talked to a sixty-eight-year-old woman who was protesting, really angry, saying they should go, that she hated them. He said, "Well, have you ever been there?" And she said, "No, I never did go there." So she agreed to go with him to visit the jungle, just to see what it was like. Obviously she already had some openness that she would even do that, but she was afraid to go by herself.

So they went. And he was just describing—because there were so many people—she was first amazed by how many people were there, how many children, how tough the conditions were, and the incredible ingenuity she saw of how people were surviving and taking care of themselves and their families, washing themselves, how many children there were without their parents.

Then she talked to a young man who had been a law student in Afghanistan. His whole village had been destroyed, completely destroyed, and he had managed to get out and made it to Calais, to the jungle. They're all kind of stuck there. He was describing how, because some of the refugees were trying to get out and jump on trucks to get over to England, he felt—just going out for a walk—like they were targets of the truckers, and sometimes targets of the police, really feeling completely vulnerable and unsafe.

She was completely appalled. She left and said, "This is a free country—or I thought it was. I didn't know that people were being treated like this." And she went to the offices and said, "What can I do to volunteer and help?" That was the outcome of her one-day visit there.

I love that story, because it shows how the fear, the anger, the hatred comes simply from not coming face to face with seeing the situation as it is. That simple coming face to face, breaking through the preconception—oh, it's like this now. She didn't go hoping to be compassionate. It just naturally arose, a sense of, "Wow, this is really suffering. What can I do?"

That's really, I think, how our practice works, how simple mindfulness works.

The great author James Baldwin had a line that I really love. He said, "An enemy is someone whose story we have not heard."

Take that back to yourself. When our experience is feeling like it's an enemy to us, what's the story we haven't heard? We're like that French lady going into the jungle. Can I just put down my preconceptions and turn my gentle attention back onto this experience here, this experience I'm finding so unbearable or off or bad or whatever it is?

This is where we can also see that wisdom gives rise to compassion. I also want to mention Thich Nhat Hanh, who in one of his recent books, Compassion and Emptiness in Early Buddhist Meditation, analyzes some of the different suttas of the Buddha. He points out that in one sutta the Buddha mentions that penetrative wisdom, really penetrating wisdom, comes from insight into the Four Noble Truths. And vast wisdom finds its expression through compassion, through intending to benefit oneself and others.

I would like to point out that everywhere I've read, when the Buddha talks about compassion, he doesn't just say for others. It's always oneself and others. Sometimes I think when we're considering what compassion should be, it's like it's out there, and we forget we're also a human being in need of compassion. That's another way you get into compassion burnout—forgetting that this nama-rupa needs the same care as that nama-rupa, if you want to look at it that way.

So Thich Nhat Hanh is pointing out that when we meet an experience that seems like such suffering, when we're so caught up, and with steady mindfulness we suddenly see it through the lens of the Four Noble Truths, compassion might automatically arise.

Let me give a simple composite example. This is no particular person, but a composite of a lot of people saying a lot of things here. Simple things, when something is really causing you distress—like the sight of a person that for whatever reason triggers your judgment. You're comparing, you're unhappy, and you keep seeing them and it keeps triggering, and you're all balled up in that suffering. Or there's a sound that keeps happening and it's really triggering anger, despair, blame of oneself, blame of another, and we're really caught in it.

Can you relate to how that can happen? We can be caught in it and think we shouldn't be caught and try to talk ourselves out of it, but it's just still a big ball.

Then we bring our attention right in.

Say, well, what's actually happening here? So say it's a sound. Bringing the attention just really with the hearing. Noticing the unpleasant. Seeing the arising of all the aversion and the self-blame and the other-blame and the story and "it shouldn't be" and this and that. And then keeping us, oh, that's really the first noble truth: suffering. You may not say it, but that's what's happening. Seeing the second noble truth: the cause of suffering is the reactivity and the delusion in the mind. It's not the sound, it's not the sight, but it's all that reactivity and identification. And the continuing mindfulness, seeing this whole process start to break apart—and really it's the Eightfold Path saying, oh, just being present with what is. Hearing is like this. Aversion is like this. Sound is like this. Oh, and the whole thing drops away. And in that moment there's a sense of really cessation of that suffering. You get a sense, just like that—there's the whole Eightfold Path. That's the Four Noble Truths, right there. You don't think of it.

So many people have mentioned to me and to other teachers, through some experience like that—really quite simple, although it could have been a huge storm of suffering—when it comes to that wisdom piece through the Four Noble Truths, seeing it clearly, spontaneous and sometimes really profound compassion and metta has arisen.

Sometimes it's manifested as metta and compassion for one's own self for having been caught in that. Sometimes, and many people say this, the sight, the person who triggered the response, or the sound, or whatever—there's just spontaneous waves of compassion and caring and non-separation that comes. Not self-generated.

It's different from when we're really angry at someone and we're trying to crank up the metta: "May you be happy, may you be peaceful"—you know, really trying to get over it. Maybe we get a little squeegee bit of metta going. But this is—well, thank God at least—but this is just spontaneous, because that sense of obsession with "me" is gone. And there's just the compassion that comes about from seeing the suffering in the world that arises from confusion. People are quite surprised by that sometimes, but this is the natural result of wisdom: the manifestation of compassion.

So just notice when that happens. And see how the simple mindfulness, the steadiness of mindfulness that leads to clear seeing, is the cause for compassion to arise. And when it's there, just explore it, feel it. You don't have to own it, but just see how that goes. And when it goes away, because it will, then we just meet the next experience face to face. No need to hang on.

And then another way: sometimes in our practice and in our life, the way into wisdom—this is how compassion came through wisdom—but sometimes the way into wisdom is through cultivating compassionate intention when we can't really come face to face with something.

I feel in my own life, I notice this all the time: when I'm feeling, I start to notice over some period—sitting, walking, on retreat, it doesn't matter—but I start to realize I'm feeling quite disconnected somehow. You think you're really present, you're trying to be present, mindfulness seems like it's there, but you have that feeling of disconnect. You don't quite know what's happening, but whatever's happening doesn't feel good. There's something going on; you don't know what it is.

And I find, almost always, it turns out that there's some difficult or unpleasant experience—it could be a little tiny thing, or it could be a strong emotional state, whatever it is—that there's a resistance, a denial, and trying to avoid, to not have to touch into. Maybe unconsciously. You know: "Oh yeah, I'm looking at that. Oh yeah, that's over there. Yeah, I see it." And you can't quite get there. That's always, I find, leading to this sense of disconnection, being out of touch. It keeps us locked in our little bubble of me and other and distance and separation. When we have that dosa lens on, back to the Buddha, we can't see our own good, or the good of another, or the good of both. And we can't make clear decisions; there isn't wisdom.

So just a personal example then of an experience where the resistance to the unpleasant was there, not quite recognized, but the mindfulness wasn't really connecting, and wisdom wasn't coming—but the actual cultivation of compassion allowed for the attention to settle into what was happening, and wisdom came.

This was quite a long time ago, years and years ago, and I've talked about this on other retreats. I started to develop an autoimmune disorder, a physical disorder. At that time it ended up being mild, but it had rather strong symptoms that were affecting me. I couldn't walk very well, and there was some kind of pain, and they didn't really know what it was—one of those situations where they don't know what, and even when they give it a name, they still don't know what, and they can't do anything anyway. But here's a name for it.

At that time, which went on for some months before I really knew what it was, it was worsening steadily. It had the potential—I've been really fortunate—but it had the potential to go in a direction that would have killed me. That was unknown at the time, but even just living with this, I was—I think I was here during part of that time, teaching a three-month retreat—just dealing with the physical body and the idea in the mind of what it could be.

So I was pretty aware. I wasn't in a big state of fear or a huge state of aversion or anything. It really felt like I was pretty present, just dealing, being mindful. But I really can tell you now, because I didn't see it at the time: there was this subtle background sense of, "You know, if you were really spiritual, you wouldn't have this." Have you ever had that thought?

If you really could think the right thing, then this particular thing would go away. Or this disease is caused by my lack of, you know, my holding on, my aversion, whatever. I just want to say—I'm here to say—these thoughts are really not helpful. True or not, I have not found them to be very helpful.

So that was kind of in the background. Well, if I was really spiritual, I wouldn't be having this, with all my practice, you know. Sayadaw U Pandita was here and talking about how when you're really giving, he gives all these examples of yogis developing the seven factors of enlightenment to this great degree of balance and curing themselves of all these amazing diseases. And we would sit around and go, how come we never get cured of anything? It kind of leads to doubt. Not helpful.

But anyway, that was going on. And at some point later, it dawned on me: you know what? Even the greatest masters, even the Buddha—he died. He died. Ramana Maharshi got cancer, you know? You think he could have thought his way out of that? Like, duh. But that wasn't the wisdom piece. That came later.

So there's this subtle thing, but I was trying to be mindful, trying to see this and that. And everybody I knew had advice. You should go live in Arizona because the cold really affects it. You should only eat non-wheat, non-dairy, non-caffeine. I did that for a while. That really cheered me up. All kinds of stuff. The doctors didn't know what to do, so you have to make a decision. But when you can't see clearly, the decision comes either out of fear or out of denial.

So anyway, at some point during that fall, a Tibetan lama, a really beautiful old man, just happened to come by here for the afternoon. That just happens here sometimes. And he gave me a little blessing on the head and said, okay, say this mantra—which I didn't even understand, it was Tibetan. I had no idea what it meant. I looked it up later and it was a compassion mantra. So I said, sure, what the heck, it can't hurt.

So I'd sit up here and once a day I'd just be doing that mantra. I wasn't trying to cultivate compassion or anything. I was just doing that mantra. Really, it changes the habit of the mind. And so, just without consciously making it happen, the whole inner weather system switched to this sense of compassion for the body. And I really felt the body not as caroling me, but just as—wow. I didn't realize I was holding this negativity, this kind of blame, this resistance toward a body going through suffering, you know. There's a body over there. Would you hate it? Would you blame it? You'd just do what you could.

It changed everything. There was just this sense of tenderness, and the resistance and the self-blame and all that just vanished. That was just aversion. With the compassion, the aversion was gone. And with the compassion, the awareness, the attention, the presence could just touch what was going on moment to moment in the body, in the mind.

And it was really—I had to make decisions about what to do. I could make much clearer decisions, not based on fear and not based on denial. Should I give up teaching and do everything differently and go live in a corner in Arizona in case it got worse? Or should I just pretend nothing was happening and carry on?

Anyway, just after that, some good friends—Joseph was one of them—were going to India for a short visit to Dipa Ma, which I'm so glad I went because that's the last time I saw her before she died. So I thought, they said, come on with us, it's only for a couple of weeks and you'll be with us. We can take care of you—which was important because I just had trouble walking, getting into rickshaws and stuff like that. So I thought, yeah, great. So I went to India, which other people thought was nuts.

You can't go to India. What if this gets worse? But it wasn't getting worse. I could see how it was. It was fine. And in India, I could drink chai and eat chapatis. I got so happy. It was really nice. And it was fine.

And then you just do what you have to do. You can see clearly. You can make choices. You can see your own good or the good of another. And that compassion intention then leads us into coming face to face with the development of wisdom. So both these aspects are going on in our practice here, in different ways, taking turns.

There are of course other ways we can cultivate compassion, like doing the compassion brahmavihara, just as with metta. I'm not going to talk about that tonight, but I want to point out that there's the wisdom of moment-to-moment mindfulness, and the compassion intention can sometimes bring us into that wisdom.

Another way, though, that compassion needs wisdom is wisdom in the form of equanimity. Because even when we have relatively clear seeing—I mean we're not arahants, but relatively clear seeing—and touch compassionate action with as much wisdom as we can, say when I was making my decision to go to India or whatever, you have to make choices, take action for yourself or for the good of another.

The wisdom of equanimity is knowing that no matter how caring we are, how wise we may be, without any action we can't ensure or control the results. We can act as best we can from compassion. The compassionate action may not be received at all. It may be thrown back in our face, and that's the least of it. But that's possible. Can we then cultivate equanimity—not either keep forcing it where it's not helpful, or take it personally and fall back into negativity?

This needing to balance equanimity and compassion is again present in some suttas from the Buddha's time that Anālayo pulls out and mentions in his book. Just a couple of quick examples.

One where the Buddha was called because the bhikkhus in a place called Kosambi were having a huge quarrel about some minor point of etiquette, but it had completely split the Sangha. They were brawling with verbal daggers, as it's described in the sutta. And the lay people were losing their faith—who are these guys, you know, just fighting over this stupid thing?

So the Buddha was called and asked out of compassion to come and talk to these bhikkhus and straighten them out, basically. So he came and he's essentially saying, "What are you doing, fighting? Come on, let's get together." And basically—you can tell I'm paraphrasing—they said to the Buddha, "Don't bother yourself with this. We'll deal with it. You just go off and abide in peaceful abiding."

And so the usual requisite three times he says, "Come on, get it together. What are you doing, you foolish men?" And they respond, "Don't bother yourself. We're dealing with it. We'll take care of this. You go off." And so after the third time, he did. He took his robe and his bowl and he wandered off.

So basically, with equanimity, you really see clearly: I can't do anything. These monks are hopeless. He basically went off—"You foolish men"—and found three bhikkhus who were living together in perfect harmony and metta, combining like milk and water, which is another whole beautiful sutta. But he really just accepted the situation.

Then there's another sutta, though, where the Buddha is pointing out that there are times when equanimity isn't appropriate and we need to have the wisdom to see when action is called for. This is also really hard to discern and we're not always going to be able to.

So again, very briefly, there was a point where Sariputta—I think it was Sariputta, one of the Buddha's main disciples—was giving a talk on a very profound and abstruse point of understanding. I read it and I thought, yeah, well, I really don't understand that. So I'm not even going to try and replicate it for you all. But anyway, he was giving this talk. And some of the other really senior bhikkhus were saying, "No, that's not true. You're wrong." They kept basically abusing him in that way. Then they went to the Buddha, and Sariputta explained what he had said again.

And the bhikkhus again said, "No, you're wrong." During this time, Ananda had been there—Ananda, who was very close to Sariputta—and had heard all this and had just kept silent.

So then the Buddha says—first he says, "Sorry, Buddha's right." Then he turns to Ananda and says, "Ananda, what are you doing when your senior bhikkhu, your well-loved bhikkhu, is being abused by his fellow bhikkhus, and you just stay here silent?" Basically, he was saying this is not the time for equanimity. You should stand up and support your fellow bhikkhu out of compassion.

This is very interesting. And so I find in my life, and in all of our lives—it's really complex, isn't it? The situations we find ourselves in are complex. Life is ambiguous. There are so many times when we're not always going to have enough wisdom or enough compassion. We have to do the best we can. But equanimity is so essential, in both ways.

Little things. One time, years ago, I went outside at a friend's house and their cat was just in the process of pouncing on a little baby bird. So without even thinking about it, I grabbed the cat and grabbed the bird. It seems like that was the spontaneous act of compassion that it was. But what was the result? The bird was going to die anyway, and I managed to prolong its death by about thirty-six hours. Not good or bad, but I really needed equanimity to see that. We don't know what the effects are going to be.

And if you've ever had both the privilege and the responsibility of being a medical proxy for someone who's really sick—maybe even on the edge of life support—even when you know what they say they want, the situation is pretty much always going to be other than whatever you thought about. I know this from personal experience. You have to make decisions based on as much wisdom as you can about what they would want. But what they want depends on what the effect of that decision would be. And whatever the doctors say, they don't really know. You don't really know. You have to make the best decision you can out of compassion and wisdom. And then have the equanimity—for yourself, for your loved one, for the doctors—to stay present with that decision and with the effects, however it went.

So wisdom, compassion. Compassion needs the wisdom of equanimity to stay present in this world, to stay present.

And what about really the vastness of suffering—throughout history, but now—of war, of violence, of prejudice, of inequality, of poverty, of injustice, you name it. How do we respond? Sometimes we can do something, but whatever we do doesn't solve the whole problem. The Buddha couldn't fix the world. How can we do what we can and still stay present when we can't? How do we tell the difference? This vastness of compassion and the wisdom of equanimity—but still staying present. This bearing witness has such power.

So I want to read from two people who really inspired me, in very different ways, with the ability to stay present and bear witness, and maybe act, maybe not.

One, of course, is Martin Luther King. Just one thing he wrote in 1963, at the time of some of the most violent bombings—those church bombings where little girls were killed—and the violent, violent response of the police against the demonstrators, and the jailings. He said at one point: "I have come to see even more that as we move on towards the goal of justice, hatred must never be our motive. I refuse to become bitter."

How can we do that? To stay present. Really seeing with wisdom the suffering—enough wisdom and compassion to keep moving forward, and that vastness that allows us not to become bitter. It's mind-boggling to think of. But moments, moments.

And then this is very different, but there's also this sense of bearing witness when there's nothing one could really do—but just the bearing witness, and the being able to communicate it, had a huge effect on a whole people.

This is the very well-known Russian poet Anna Akhmatova, who lived through the whole period from before World War I through the entire era of Stalin's terror and the gulags. She was very, very well known for her poetry in Russia. People wouldn't know her to look at her, but her poetry—she would write about this, and it had a huge sense of support for the people living through that terror.

So I want to read a few short lines from a really long poem of hers, which she wrote from 1935 to 1940. Requiem is the name of it. This was at the height of the Stalinist terror, when people were just being arrested and thrown into the gulags or killed—anybody, anywhere, for no rhyme or reason.

She could have emigrated. She could have emigrated to France. And she chose not to. She chose to remain in the country to be a witness to the horrors and to record it in her poetry.

During that time, her first husband was killed by Stalin's police. Her second husband and her son were arrested and thrown into the gulag for years, where her second husband died. So she was not observing this at a distance. This was her life.

There are just two little lines I want to share:

No foreign sky protected me. No stranger's wing shielded my face. I stand as witness to the common lot, survivor of that time, that place.

And then at the beginning of the whole poem: "In the terrible years of the Yezhov terror"—Yezhov was the head of the secret police, so this was the worst period of time, of arrests and death—"In the terrible years of the Yezhov terror, I spent seventeen months waiting in line outside the prison in Leningrad."

That was when her son was in prison. Everyone who could even find out they had a relative in prison would go wait in line all day, every day, hoping to get a food parcel in. So she spent seventeen months waiting in line.

"One day, somebody in the crowd recognized me"—because they wouldn't have known her face—"Standing behind me was a woman with lips blue from the cold who had, of course, never heard me called by name before. Now she started out of the torpor common to us all and asked me in a whisper"—everyone whispered there—"'Can you describe this?' And I said, 'I can.' Then something like a smile passed fleetingly over what had once been her face."

Nisargadatta said, "Listening is an act of love."

So however our compassion, our wisdom—however it shows up—the two need each other. They cannot exist without each other.

I'll just end with Pema Chödrön: At the relative level, our noble heart is felt as kinship with all beings. At the absolute level, we experience it as groundlessness, or open space.

Thank you for listening to the Dharma.

CHAPTER 159

Purifying Habits of Heart/Mind

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this dharma talk, Carol Wilson illuminates a profound realization that has deepened her practice: all of the Buddha's teachings converge toward a single purpose—purifying the heart-mind from the habitual patterns of greed (lobha), hatred (dosa), and delusion (moha). Rather than viewing nibbāna as a distant state to achieve, she invites practitioners to recognize the moments of coolness and freedom from kilesa (torments) that are available right here, right now.
> Wilson presents the traditional framework of the three rounds of kilesa: transgression (purified through sīla), obsessive torments (protected by samādhi), and latent defilements (uprooted by paññā). She emphasizes that these levels work together, each strengthening the others. Drawing from her visit to Dachau concentration camp, she reflects on the profound importance of truly knowing our own minds—recognizing that without this intimate understanding, we cannot predict how we might act in extreme circumstances.
> The talk offers practical guidance for working with difficult patterns, encouraging practitioners to notice not just when kilesa arises, but also moments of its absence. Wilson suggests various tools including sense restraint, the brahmavihāras, dāna practice, and consciously shifting intention during daily activities. She reminds us that purification isn't about hating the torments but about curious, compassionate exploration—understanding how craving and aversion do their job, and recognizing the gradual weakening of these habits through sustained practice.

Tonight what I want to reflect a bit about is something that's been becoming more alive for me in the last few years, more like a realization about the way that everything the Buddha taught—as far as I can tell, all the different aspects that make up all the different teachings—all come from the same place, heading toward the same place of purifying the heart and mind from the habits of greed, of confusion, of delusion.

I want to talk about some different ways of that tonight, ways that you all know, that we all know. But sometimes, I know for me and in talking to people here on retreat, one can get so pulled into whatever technique you're trying to do, or whatever idea we have about nibbana or bust and how to get there. And if you can't do what you think is supposed to be happening, you go to some lesser practice, but it doesn't count because you're just marking time, not really heading for the big end.

What has really inspired me these last few years is that I feel once we start to understand the depth of how subtle and strong these habits of the torments are, but how in any particular moment they can be gone, and all the different ways of purifying—it stops being about retreat and it becomes so clear that everything we do in our life is part of this practice. Not that I pretend to be able in one talk to address everything we do in our life, but just to point in that direction.

So, what is this noble truth of the ending of suffering? It is the complete fading away and extinction of this craving. It's abandonment, liberation and detachment from it. The extinction of greed, the extinction of hate, the extinction of delusion. This indeed is called nibbana.

I bring that up because I want to use it as a kind of reference, a pointer tonight. There are different ways one can think about nibbana, all of which are essentially wrong and useless. But we have to talk—well, I have to talk, you have to listen. This way of looking at it I've found really helpful, rather than some state we're trying to construct the conditions to get to and then it's all okay for the rest of our life. It's the sense of a moment, or increasing moments, where greed, hatred, confusion is not present in that moment of consciousness, in that moment of citta. So it's not a state at all that we're trying to get to, but immediately, here and now—that's all there ever is. What's the quality in this moment of the mind, the heart?

As Buddhadasa says, nibbana is a natural condition. It's the cool state of mind without kilesa, without torments, defilements, whatever word you want to use. The fewer the defilements, the more coolness there is. So one way of talking about nibbana is like the complete extinction. But another way, which is accessible to us here and now, moment to moment, is to trust more, to recognize more the moments when the heart and mind is cool, when in that moment it is free from kilesa. Start to get a taste of that. Start to recognize it.

As Andy Olendzki puts it very succinctly, the mind is not a steady state; it's not a subject that has objects as contents. The mind is activity, the process of cognizing, a flow of events. The events are changing from moment to moment, the action of cognizing everything is changing from moment to moment. That's what makes freedom possible—the mind is changing from moment to moment.

So we can really recognize and explore both the moments when there is this coolness, when the heart-mind is free from the torments, and also the moments when it's not. Our whole life, our whole practice can become really not about hating the torments and trying to get somewhere else, but really getting interested in exploring: How do the torments arise? What is it like when they're not there? What feeds them? How do they starve? How do they work?

As Sayadaw U Tejaniya says, how do they do their job? We just want to explore. How does craving do its job? How does aversion do its job? How does metta do its job? None of it's personal.

So in any particular moment, cessation of clinging is available.

The next moment it may not be available anymore.

The Dalai Lama offers this profound insight: "When the mind is free of negative emotions and tendencies"—in other words, the three roots of confusion—"it understands and knows all phenomena. It is only because there are obscuring veils between the mind and its object that we are unable to know all things. Once these veils have been removed, no new power is needed. Seeing and being aware is the nature of the mind itself. As long as the mind exists, it has the ability to know, but this ability does not reveal itself until obscurations have been removed. This is what it means to attain enlightenment."

As far as I can tell, all the different things the Buddha talked about, all the ways of meditation practice—dana, sila, bhavana, all the aspects—are different methods, different conditions for recognizing when the heart-mind is obscured and cultivating a shift in those habits. Because they're just habits, right? Since the mind is changing every moment, the habits of greed, aversion, and delusion are really deeply rooted.

If you remember a few weeks ago when we talked about the sutta of the two darts, the habit of resistance to the unpleasant is so strong. Many of you have seen this—how immediately the mind craves the pleasant and ignores the neutral. Many of you have been noticing and talking about that. Often, then, there comes a sense of dismay: "Oh my gosh, there's so much aversion." It's usually framed as "I have so much aversion. I am so deluded. There's so much craving in my mind."

And we remind you: if the Buddha chose craving as the second noble truth, the cause of suffering, you're probably not the only one experiencing frequent moments of craving arising in the mind, right?

But what we're here to do is actually get really interested in exploring. There is a moment of craving—it doesn't mean it's a steady state. Mindfulness is, of course, always the first line of support for purifying. Just the interest to notice craving, for example, is already a shift from identifying, from being lost in it. We've talked about that a lot.

All of these teachings, all the ways we live our life, give us different tools to help us recognize what habits are arising right now. And if they're torments leading to unwholesome thoughts, speech, and action, then there are all these different tools to help us strengthen the wholesome and starve these unwholesome habits. But the only way that can happen is not from aversion or clinging, but from this wise attitude, from interest, from really wanting to understand.

What I really want to encourage—really, this whole retreat I wanted to encourage—is to have that sense of not taking it personally when you notice how these torments are arising and how they might lead to thought, speech, and action. Because as soon as you take it personally, we're stuck, we're caught, we're feeding it. But when you start to just look at it and see—that's that step, that Tai Chi move, the way Ajahn Sumedho talks about—"Oh, it's like this." That can be the difference between night and day in beginning to explore, understand, and shift the way the habits of mind work.

For me, what it has taken is more and more understanding of this—less thinking I have to have a really good meditation and get to some special place, otherwise it's impossible, but starting to appreciate that from whatever space I'm in, whatever the quality of mind, if there are kleshas present, whether really concentrated or scattered all over the place, quiet and subtle as in retreat or in a really busy experience in life, there are tools available to really continue working to purify, to shift these habits.

It takes trust and interest, a sense of really understanding that this is about our whole life. There's not some piece of our life it's not about. And there's not some piece of our life where it's impossible to notice what's going on in our mind. Maybe not in the incredibly subtle way some of you are experiencing when you get quiet and can notice, for example, the seven factors of awakening and feel how they are, when they're balancing. Sometimes. And then that changes. Why does it change? Because every moment of mind is changing. It's always going to be that way. But that's a subtle kind of awareness.

Just walking through life, walking down a busy city street with all kinds of things happening and you're thinking about going to work and you're late—that doesn't matter. Just noticing the quality of mind right then, it doesn't take huge concentration, it doesn't take effort. It just takes remembering. Walking down the street, noticing rushing. Okay. How hard is that? Noticing rushing—you don't have to then get out your list and go, "Is that one of the kleshas? What do I do about it?" Right there, you're present with it. You can feel the imbalance of the rush. You just notice it.

That kind of noticing can follow us through our life more and more, and then we can begin to more consciously bring in any of the tools that arise for us. So first it's just getting really present, having some trust, having some interest, not taking it so personally.

For me, the more I practice, the more I respect the subtlety and the power of the habits of the torments. But as Joseph always says, I'd rather see one arising in my mind-heart than not see it. Because not seeing it is when you really don't know how your mind works. Some of you have mentioned this—there was a question the other day about being really mindful and really careful, and all of a sudden you do something that's not careful. Or all of a sudden you've been really mindful. Someone told me—not this retreat—they were really mindful, not craving, really watching their eating, walking, they were in eight precepts, and walking past the table, really, really mindful, and all of a sudden their hands shot out and grabbed some orange and kept on going. Who did that? That wasn't me, you know. We don't know what's sitting down in there sometimes.

I've told this before, but this experience had a really deep effect on me in my life, in terms of once again deepening my respect for the power of the torments when we don't see them. But also, somehow, this really strengthened my faith, my confidence, my willingness to keep exploring no matter what. I don't know why that's how it worked, but I was in Munich one summer and went to visit Dachau, one of the concentration camps—I guess one of the smaller ones—just outside of Munich. I went by myself one afternoon.

It was set up in a really interesting way, like a museum. This is what I remember. It's been a while now, so I don't totally trust memory. If you go and find that's not how I said it was, that's just because memory is unreliable. But this is what I remember and the effect it had.

You go in the different rooms or the different barracks, and there were lots of big posters, notice boards describing different aspects of the people who were incarcerated there, of things that went on, of people outside—maybe the guards or the people in the village who brought in the bread, some of the doctors who worked in the place and did experiments, some of the people in the place who did wonderful things, some of the people who were incarcerated who did terrible things. And they would talk about it and then give examples, a photo of a real person, their little story. So it made it real.

And of course the vastness of it, knowing that's just one place, and the sense of—normal people. That's the thing. The people who were in the concentration camp, the people who were running it, all the villagers around, everyone who's involved in one way or another. It took away any kind of sense I could have of—we like to make up stories that it's all these bad, evil people who do the bad, evil stuff and everyone else, we're just good people. I would never act like that.

Walking through it, I thought, so many people. And that's just one country at one time. We don't have to go through the history of even the twentieth century—the amount of horrific things that human beings do to each other. Genocides and racism and wars and cultural cleansing, on and on. So many people, each individual person involved. All the people doing that can't be some kind of evil monsters. It's impossible. It's people.

Walking through it, what I really got for myself was this sense—and this is why it's strange that this was inspiring to me, but it was—this sense that I don't know, if I were in a position where my family were threatened, or if I were threatened with torture, what I would do. I've never been in that situation. And so it helped me see that if I don't really know the quality in my own mind and heart, what's coming up in this moment—not how I think I'm going to be, or how I think I should be, or what my idea is of what's right—but if I don't know how to really be present with the suffering that comes in my mind, to really see, even in the little times, when the torments come up, when they don't, how to work with them, how to not feed them, how to move in another direction... If I don't really take that in as the work of my whole life, of every moment, who knows what I would do in a situation I could never imagine being in. Just those sudden moments.

So that somehow inspired me a lot. It keeps reminding me when I think, this is good enough. There's not so much craving right now, this feels good enough. Keep looking, Carol. Keep looking. It's maybe good enough in this moment, but good enough isn't completely liberated. But that's not trying to go somewhere else.

That's just looking right here. You never know.

I was listening to the public radio a couple of years ago. I came in in the middle of an interview, so I actually don't know who was speaking. But there were two men and they were discussing work that they were doing with young men in prisons in the States. Their work was called Interrupting Violence. All I heard was them quoting one of the young men in prison for life that they were working with. And he said, this young man, "I wish that I could take back that three to five seconds of my life when I reacted in this violent way" — a situation that completely ruined someone else's life and ruined his life.

To me, I still get chills at that: three to five seconds when we just lose it. And so if we don't really know our mind, if we don't know how to be with our mind, if we don't really take this seriously — and this is out of love for ourselves and the world, not out of fear, not out of aversion, but really out of recognizing that this is how we can bring freedom and compassion to our own heart and mind and to everyone we come in contact with in the world — we start right here, right now.

This is why there's so much emphasis on recognizing the presence of the torments. I don't really like the word "defilement." But I might keep using kaleshas — I like that. Greed, hatred, delusion. Recognizing their presence, recognizing how they act, recognizing their absence. Like I said at the beginning, it's equally, if even more important, to recognize just the simple moments when the heart and mind, as Buddhadasa said, is cool. Cool from the absence of kalesha.

Again, I'm paraphrasing Buddhadasa when he says that like everything, kaleshas are conditioned. They come together due to conditions, and anything that comes together goes apart when the conditions change. So a lot of what we're learning is what conditions give rise to the kaleshas in our experience, what conditions starve them. Certainly that's what we're doing in the meditation. And that's a major piece, but it's not the only piece.

So seeing how they do their job — this is really a profound aspiration. I just want to remind us, we need wise attitude to watch these. When we start falling into this sense of despair that there's so much, that these habits are so deep, that despair is simply another way that aversion is doing its job, making you feel like crap. That's its job. So then we just have to notice again. Notice again. You kind of pull up your socks and notice again. Don't let yourself fall into it. It's just the kaleshas obscuring, obscuring the radiant mind, the radiant heart. But that radiance is not gone, it's just obscured.

The more you notice even just little moments of coolness — moments when, whatever, you're sitting here and you're struggling with something or you're just bored or you're feeling your breath but nothing special, and suddenly there's no big deal. There's suddenly no big deal. I'm not talking about suddenly the lights go on and everything explodes and you're floating in nibbāna. I'm talking about there's just a moment of coolness, free from kalesha. No neon lights. You probably didn't have time to think "it's neutral and I'm bored." That's the next moment when it's gone. But the moment — oh yeah, it's just like this. Notice that. Not cling to it, that'll come next and then it's gone too. But notice, just notice it.

Because this is where the real saddhā, the confidence, the faith comes — that oh yes, this isn't some fairy story. The purity of heart and mind, that ease, that peace, that's actually, as Buddhadasa says, accessible in the moment. Just a moment of non-clinging, that's all it is. So noticing those, and that gives the faith to again notice when the clinging comes in.

I want to talk about three ways, called the three rounds of kalesha. Three aspects of our practice — by practice now I'm meaning our whole life — that we can work with. This is in the commentaries. These are three different levels of strength, of intensity, that these kaleshas show up in our mind, in our heart.

The first round is called the kaleshas of transgression. You can guess what that means. That greed or hatred or confusion is so strong that we speak and act from it. Actions of speech and body motivated by greed, hatred, confusion. And the protection from that, what helps to purify that, is sīla.

is our commitment to non-harming conduct, to restraint.

And I think, you know, we talk about the power of sila, the power of virtue, of non-harming conduct, and I think sometimes I hadn't always appreciated the purifying power of wholesome restraint. So when a kilesa comes up in your mind as thought and you don't speak from it, and you don't act from it, notice the wholesomeness of that rather than berating yourself for having had the kilesa arise. You say, "Oh no, I'm being so angry." But you didn't go yell at the person, did you? You kept your mouth shut. That's wholesome restraint. We hope you did. That's wholesome restraint. You didn't act on it. That's wholesome restraint.

This is really a huge protection. Not only protecting us, but the rest of the world, of course. But it's also—and this is the part I wanted to point out—it's also weakening at that time the power, the strength, the intensity of the kilesa. The more we practice wholesome restraint of speech and action, the easier it gets, doesn't it? Have you noticed that? Because the power of that habit, that kilesa habit, is weakening. It's not as strong.

And sometimes, especially on retreat, we just notice that it keeps coming. We think it should—you know, I restrained already, it shouldn't come back anymore. And we don't really notice that it's weakening. So here is something kind of subtle, but it's great to explore.

And this isn't news, but just to say: of course when we act from unwholesome speech or action, we feel bad, the other person feels bad, and it feeds, it strengthens the habit of that kilesa in the mind to keep on going.

I was looking at some notes from a talk I gave a long time ago about something like this. And it was an example that I guess had just happened that week. It must have been a long time ago because it was about calling my parents, and they've been dead for quite a while. But anyway, I noticed I had felt aversion—some kind of anxiety, not like aversion to them, but worry, anxiety, negativity. And not with awareness. You know, when there's awareness of the kilesa, that's already our first protection. But this was without awareness.

So I called them up. The aversion, the anxiety was in my voice, was in the way I talked to them. So then they got all reactive and anxious and worried about their condition—it was a time when they weren't so healthy. So then in our dialogue, in our communication, since I was anxious and negative and then they got more anxious and negative, then I got more anxious and negative about them. Then we hung up. We were all more anxious and negative. And then I talked to my sister and I brought that into it. And the whole thing just kept spiraling, spiraling.

So this isn't like aggressive, horrible. This is still dosa. This is still aversion. And when we're not aware, it's just what happens when we act it out. It's contagious.

But you know what? Wholesome qualities of heart and mind, as we see, are also contagious, aren't they?

So just that sense of sometimes—you know, when teachers are all together, you probably hear what a racket it is in there in the staff dining room sometimes. I mean, there's so much noise and everyone's talking all at once and with a lot of energy. And I can get quite inspired when one of us starts to say something and then just stops. And you can see that was a wise speech moment. Oh, wise speech moment! And there's the tendency, "Oh, come on, say what you were going to say," you know. But it wasn't anything wholesome. And the sense of just stopping is inspiring. Seeing the restraint, just such a simple thing like that, is inspiring—never mind when we manifest non-harming, when we manifest even generosity or compassion.

So here, when you don't act out, that's really purifying the intensity.

Another way that I think I consider part of sila is non-acting, is restraint at the sense doors. So, for example, many people talk about this.

When you're walking around and you see that you're comparing, right, the mana, and there's the seeing, and unpleasant feeling, and then the whole judgment comes up, and the negativity, and then you're negative back at yourself, and you've really been getting caught in it. But then you decide to bring restraint to the sense door. By restraint, I don't mean walking around blindfolded. Somebody did that here once, a friend years ago. He spent three days walking around here blindfolded when he was on retreat. That doesn't really solve anything, though it could have been interesting.

Restraint can be first that we just choose not to look around. Very simply, not out of fear, not out of negativity, but similar to wise speech, we just don't feed the seeing because the mindfulness isn't strong enough right now to just see it and not react. Or right at the seeing you bring sati-pañña, mindfulness and wisdom, right to the point of seeing. Seeing, just seeing is like this. But you have to have some mindfulness to do that. Sometimes if there's not enough, and the defilements of transgression are strong, you just have a feeling that if you see that person again you're going to go trip them. Then you just restrain at the sense doors. You don't look. That actually can be wholesome.

Not everything needs to be: "I'm so hopeless. I should be in Nibbana and instead I'm just trying not to push somebody." But you're making the choice. You're making the choice not to do that. Notice that. This is serious stuff.

Again, noticing the wholesomeness that comes from non-harming behavior, from restraining action. This is from the Buddha: "For a person endowed with virtue, with non-harming behavior, with sila, there is no need for an act of will: 'May freedom from remorse arise in me.' It is in the nature of things that freedom from remorse arises in a person endowed with virtue."

In other words, when we don't act on the kilesas, when there's a sense of restraint, you can actually feel and appreciate the wholesomeness of freedom from remorse. And it's important, just like with noticing the mind of non-clinging, to notice those moments of wholesomeness. It brings a real kind of freedom from remorse, a real kind of happiness, and a deeper confidence and trust in your own ability to continue to explore, to not have to be afraid when you notice the kilesas coming, but that you can really start to meet them with more strength, with more wisdom.

A friend and I once—I've used this story before too, but it was a funny thing—we were visiting Spirit Rock, or maybe I was teaching there, I don't know. But we went down to the bookstore, which if you've ever been there, has like seven million things in it: books and statues and jewelry and God knows what. You'd spend hours going through it. But I knew I wanted one particular little statue I had seen, and the friend I was with had sometimes done volunteer work in the bookstore. So she knew, because it wasn't on display—it's a help-yourself place, there's not someone serving you there—she knew where in the back room, in the big closets, which closet had statues and where I could find it.

So the two of us were opening the closet. And it's like, you know, floor to ceiling, row after row, hundreds of little statues. So we were piling through the thing, taking the ones out, because the one I wanted was in the back, small like this. As we were doing it, we each picked up a different statue, and they're made of some kind—I don't know what they're made out of—but I picked one up and it had a little sword and I barely touched it and the sword broke. I thought, uh-oh. And then my friend, like a second later, the same thing happened to her. She picked up another one, the sword broke, and we both looked at each other.

We went over this later. We just looked at each other. But we both had the thought go through each of our minds: we could put it back and no one would know. But it just went through, and neither of us had the slightest impulse to actually act on that thought at all. So, you know, we have to go take it to Marianne, we're going to have to pay for it. So we did, and we went to Marianne—she's our friend, but she runs the bookstore—and we were like two little bad schoolgirls: we broke the statues. And she just said, oh yeah, that happens all the time. We just glue it back together, sell it at half price, no problem.

We talked about it later, and we both felt so happy at that sense of confidence—the confidence that there was no way either of us would have the slightest inclination to actually act on that idea, that aversive or greedy thought or whatever it was.

So there's that sense of freedom from remorse, but also an appreciation of the confidence that comes from recognizing that the quality of greed—or whatever kilesa it might be—is getting less strong, a little more transparent, not so much running the show. It gives you confidence to keep on exploring in other aspects of your life. It's not personal, but it's really quite happiness-producing. So notice that. Notice not only the kilesas themselves, but their absence and the effect that has.

The second level is called obsessive torments. You can figure out what that one is, right? You've all been having a lot of fun with obsessive torments here. You're not acting out on greed or hatred or confusion, but the mind—you know what the mind is doing. "I am so useless. This is so horrible. That person is driving me crazy." I don't mean just thoughts that come and go, but you know when you're really spinning in a deep habit. And the suffering is obvious. I don't have to tell you. Whether it's self-judging or what I call vipassana vendetta—when you're just lost in thoughts of revenge and aversion, wondering what you can do, caught in self-hatred or greed. Greed can be incredibly painful. Have you noticed that? It can be so strong. These are called the obsessive torments, this spinning.

We're protected from that when there's unification, a collectedness in the mind—the samādhi. When the mind is sufficiently collected, the hindrances don't really get in. It truly feels like a protected space. Sally gave a whole talk about samādhi and shamatha, where you're really cultivating collectedness of mind. That's part of what is so beautiful and uplifting when the mind is really focused on one object—because it's so collected that greed, hatred, and confusion aren't really arising at that point. That's one of the ways we get drawn in and want to really have that. We think it's a great state, but notice the coolness, or just appreciate a moment of what the pure mind feels like.

But it doesn't only have to be with samatha, with one-pointed concentration. There's the whole khanika samādhi that we talk about, the moment-to-moment-to-moment practice. I don't want to repeat everything we've discussed, but the mindfulness is steady, and the collectedness, the steadiness of the mind, can become very stable. That's what Sayadaw U Pandita was referring to when he used to talk about vipassana jhānas. He was really talking about a level of stability in the observing mind that had the same quality of protection from the kilesas arising. You can be really, really steady with whatever's occurring—steady whether you're using noting or just moment-to-moment mindfulness. Whatever's occurring—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—it doesn't matter. Even if what you're noticing is an unpleasant thought and aversion starts to arise, the mind is so steady that it notices it and then the aversion just goes. There's no space for the kilesas to really get in at that time. It feels like real protection—temporary, conditioned—but genuine.

Again, though, we mustn't hold onto it. If our mind makes this a space we're supposed to get to because this is the place of safety, then we're missing the point. That's just a constructed space. It's useful, first to steady the mind, because when the mind is free from kilesas we can appreciate that coolness, come to understand how it feels, and trust it more. But we shouldn't hold on to a constructed state that is somehow going to protect us if we just stay there. That's not really how wisdom arises—that's how craving arises.

But the protectedness of samādhi, whichever way it manifests—in one-pointed concentration or in khanika samādhi—again, let yourself feel it. When there's steady noting and things are flowing steadily, we tend to get so focused on the object. But notice the quality in the mind that's observing. If you're noticing the seven factors of awakening, or any one of them, also notice that there's an absence of kilesas at that time. Familiarize yourself with this. Really trust it—that sense of purity or ease or however it feels. There are many different ways to experience it. It strengthens confidence. It helps us truly appreciate what's happening.

And then when craving comes in and we start to make this the thing we've got to aim for, the craving becomes all the more obvious.

And so then, if we're really having this commitment—great, I want to explore the absence of craving, the coolness—and now here's the craving, great, this is the thing to explore now. Honestly, I really mean that. I'm not just saying it. Okay, craving is like this. See how it behaves. See how it destroys the ability to recognize the radiant nature of mind.

Then the third aspect is called the latent. The latent torments, the kind of underlying tendency, is described as a seed that, if it's given the proper conditions to sprout, it will sprout. Like the example I gave of that person walking by being so mindful and then suddenly the hand reached out and grabbed. There was just that moment. Mindfulness went away, craving came up, boom, acted on it.

Quite a few people have described similar experiences. You're walking, you're really mindful, you're walking out of the hall, you're really present, you're really steady, you're noticing what's going on, you're starting towards your walking place, and then all of a sudden you find yourself rushing and almost pushing somebody aside to get to your walking place. You go, wow. How did that happen? I was so mindful. Apparently not in that moment.

What are the conditions? You get interested rather than berating yourself. Mindfulness went away. There was a sight—somebody getting close to my walking place. Sudden craving came up and, unnoticed, in one second you're shoving somebody away and running down. Then you get there. Probably nobody noticed that for a moment, right? But this is what's called the latent. And that's there for all of us. But they only arise when the conditions come together to allow for the arising.

I just want to say, it doesn't mean that sitting down there in the middle of your chest there's all this gunk that's just sitting there and it's always there but you just don't see it, but it's really you down there. Not. Okay? Just given certain conditions, lack of mindfulness, pleasant—craving will come. Lack of mindfulness, unpleasant—aversion will come. But the more we're practicing with this, the less strong these habits get. Every moment of mindfulness is weakening the habit.

Latent greed, hatred, and delusion, the Buddha said, are abandoned not by acts, but by wisely seeing. Wisdom, paññā, is what really uproots the latent defilements. That is really the subtle level that we have the opportunity to explore here in a long retreat, one that is more accessible to us than perhaps in daily life—although it is accessible in daily life when we get familiar with it.

An example of how paññā uproots in the moment is really the same thing with, say, the seeing and the comparing and the unpleasant sight and the self-judgment, the aversion. When there's steady mindfulness, say, of concentration—you can be walking and you're really steadily noting, so there's the protection of the concentration. There could be walking, you're aware of seeing, you recognize unpleasant thought, you recognize comparing come, and the mindfulness keeps going on while the obsessive thoughts about it just don't start. Because there's so much steady mindfulness and concentration, it doesn't have room. But you have the sense that if you let up on the concentration and mindfulness, those thoughts would blossom real easy. You're not holding it out of fear. This is steady, but it's not uprooted.

Then there can be another moment—and this is paññā, the uprooting of the latent tendencies—and people have described this. The same scenario: you're walking, there's the seeing, the comparing starts, but there's enough... suddenly there's just wisdom in the mind. It doesn't go to aversion. And people have described this. Comparing. Everything's changing. What on earth? Who's comparing what to whom? It doesn't make any sense. And it's not an intellectual thing. It's a sudden seeing. It's like, wow, that doesn't make any sense. So the aversion makes no sense, the comparing makes no sense, and the whole thing just dissolves. Have you ever had that experience?

Yes, yes, you have. I know some of you have. But you may not recognize it. You're saying, "Oh, thank God," and then you think, "Well, that's okay. Done with that one." Now we're over māna, we're over conceit. No more comparing is going to happen.

That was a moment. But it's important in that moment to recognize it, because it really is gone in that moment.

Or when you're craving for something, going down to the walking place and you start to put... and suddenly it just doesn't matter where you walk. The craving doesn't make any sense at all. It's just creating suffering, and it simply vanishes in a moment.

That's how paññā, in the clear seeing—that's how wisdom sees how things really are in a moment when there's no kilesa in the mind. And then craving, aversion, comparing—it just doesn't make any sense. That's the abandonment that comes from wisdom. It's not some kind of rigid "I can't, I've got to shut everything out." The wisdom does the work. It's not an act of will, it's nothing personal.

But recognize and appreciate when there are moments like that. Because this is what will strengthen the confidence, the faith, that gives us the energy to come back and be mindful, be present in the next moment, even if it's a difficult moment. To show up again rather than thinking, "Oh no, I thought I had it and now it's over," and then wanting to give up.

Instead: "Right, I really saw how that moment of pure heart-mind worked. In that moment, kilesa doesn't make sense. Okay, let me see now. I'm wanting it back. Let's see how wanting is working in this moment." This really strengthens the wisdom factor.

These three work together. Sometimes the level of sīla is the place where we need to work—restrain at the sense doors because the kilesas are so strong. Great. And then that can lead to steady mindfulness, which can lead to wisdom, and then wisdom can strengthen the faith. And again, we might be back at the place where we're needing the sīla, but they circle around and support and strengthen each other.

I was talking with a friend about this the other day. When you start to feel, here four or five weeks into the retreat, and one particularly painful personal pattern is coming up that you've seen ten million times—you really know it—and you've gone through all these different phases I was describing, even including moments when you saw it clearly with wisdom and it went away, and now it's arising again, it can be easy to think, "All of this work and it's still here. How am I ever going to get rid of it?"

We notice this presence rather than noticing how the habit has been getting weaker, more purified through all these different aspects. Notice when you're now using sensory restraint instead of just feeding the seeing and getting lost in the reactivity—that you do that so much of the time that the whole pattern arises much less than it ever used to. Or when the anguish, the pain of it comes, instead of just getting lost in it, there's enough steadiness of mindfulness and concentration that your attention can really rest compassionately with the pain and be with that. And the practice keeps going on really steadily. And then there are times when it just starts in the mind—"Oh yeah, there's that obsessive thought"—and it just drops away.

It's important to notice that all of these are happening, that the pattern is, as one Tibetan teacher once said, like having a piece of cloth that you keep washing and washing, and slowly it gets more transparent. First you can't see through it at all—it's just so solid, the pattern. But then you can start to see a little bit of shadow and light through it. You wash it, you wash it, you wash it. And then it's even more threadbare and you can start to see some forms. You wash it, you wash it, you wash it. And it starts to get some little holes and it gets more and more clear. And eventually—not soon, okay, not soon—but at some point it's just kind of holding together with little threads, and it's more and more clear.

So our job is to notice that purification process—not just keep focusing on "look at that thread, it's still there, it's still there, this is hopeless," without noticing how much it's actually been weakening.

When wisdom is not available—and there are times wisdom isn't available—all the other ways the Buddha taught are also ways to help us continue to shift the habits. This is from Ajahn Pasanno: "It is helpful to recognize the tendency that good qualities foster further good qualities, so that we can nurture the appropriate causes for the results we are seeking. Otherwise, we may want to experience the fruits of the practice before the ripening has fully taken place." Does that ring a bell? We don't know when the ripening has taken place, but we can look and see what's going on here and now in this mind, and then use the appropriate support for shifting the habit.

When we realize we're really blinded by ill will, when the aversion is too strong and we're drowning in it, that's when all these tools we've been talking about become supportive—not to run away, but to change the habit. Sayadaw U Tejaniya talks about when we're blinded by ill will or greed or confusion, before you start trying to fix the environment, recognize the quality of really strong kilesa in the mind, and then refresh the awareness. Change the channel. Bring your awareness to something neutral. It isn't helpful to drown in the difficult state—we've said this again and again.

You might bring attention to a neutral object. When you have pain in your knee and we say "go to hearing," it's because you're just getting lost in aversion. Refreshing the awareness isn't running away. But this applies in life too, not just on retreat. When you're too caught in aversion and notice the mind keeps going to the negative, use some of the tools—for example, what Jaya talked about the other night, where we consciously tune into the lovely. Not as running away, but refreshing the awareness so that we can shift the habit, purify in that moment the habit of aversion. When the mind becomes balanced, you can let go of looking to the lovely. You don't want to look at the lovely so much that it turns into total greed, running around only seeking pleasant. But it can be really useful.

This is one of the ways we practice the brahmavihāras—not as running away, thinking "there's aversion toward that person, let me send mettā." But when aversion or greed is just taking over, and you recognize that's happening, and you see that mindfulness isn't strong enough right now—it's not about sīla, you're not acting on it, but it's becoming obsessive—then you can change the channel to bring in one of the brahmavihāras, if that's possible.

Or in daily life, when we feel like we can hardly even touch meditation, what about practicing dāna, which Ajahn Jaya talked about last night? This is a beautiful practice of purifying the heart, because it's about intention—not what you give, but the intention of joyfully opening the heart and mind from clinging, whether it's clinging to time, or an idea, or money. This intention of open-hearted sharing is an internal act of shifting, purifying the habit of greed into the openness of renunciation and generosity. It's a beautiful practice. I see it a lot in Burma—it's really embedded in much of the Buddhist culture there. And it brings a kind of happiness that's important to feel, to let yourself feel what that purification, that happy quality of mind, is like.

Working with patience, working with all of the pāramīs. There are times when you might call upon viriya, the pārami of energy. When you notice you're just slumping around with no energy and you couldn't care less, you think, "You know what, I could find a way to just bring up a little bit of energy." Not in a negative, pushing way, but in a way that shifts the habits toward the wholesome. We can really use all these tools in our life. Dāna—big. Sīla—big. Bhāvanā, especially using the brahmavihāras in our life when the concentration, the steadiness, and the wisdom aren't available.

One last thing I use a lot from the Tibetan tradition: sometimes just consciously shifting the attitude with which we're doing activities can really change the sense of the action. The way Mingyur Rinpoche talks about it, a conscious intention of wholesomeness can transform a neutral activity—or even an activity where we're feeling a little negative or like we have to do it—into wholesomeness, into generosity, into compassion.

When you're doing anything, washing yourself here, or doing your work meditation, if you catch yourself thinking "I've got to do this"—not even in a hurry, but just kind of blah, "I'm sick of doing this"—or you're at home brushing your teeth, thinking "brush my teeth again, sankhāra-dukkha, every day brush your teeth, wash your hands," and you can feel that subtle kilesa, shift the awareness, shift the intention. Mingyur would say, when you're washing your hands, think: "May this help to cleanse the hands and minds of all beings." When you're making food: "May this food serve to strengthen my body so that I may act for the benefit of all beings." Not as a should, but really changing from neutral or slightly negative or slightly greedy to wholesome. If you keep thinking of it and doing it, it really has quite a profound effect on shifting the habits, on purifying the habits.

The one example Mingyur gave that I like most is for sleeping.

So this is wonderful. You go to bed at night with the mind of bodhicitta, thinking: "May I aspire that my sleep may be the cause of increased capacity to help all beings attain enlightenment." Isn't that beautiful? You go to sleep and while you're sleeping—or just before you go to sleep—you're purifying your habits of mind simply by shifting the intention. It's a wonderful way to go through life. Not that I go through life like that all the time, but whenever I remember it, it makes one feel so happy. And that happiness is a sign of the wholesome. It really is how we affect all beings.

This working on purifying our habits in all aspects—whatever we're doing in our life, from the most subtle wisdom practice to something quite broad, like simply holding an intention while you do the dishes: "May this be for the benefit of all beings"—it does somehow affect everyone we come in contact with. All the beauty and the suffering in the world, it starts in our own hearts, doesn't it?

I want to end with a quotation from Eleanor Roosevelt that I encountered in Atlanta. There's a relatively new museum, the Museum of Civil and Human Rights, which I was visiting last year with my family. It's quite a moving museum, because Atlanta was the heart of where Martin Luther King lived. The first two floors present a complete history of the civil rights movement in the fifties and sixties, that entire period. It's really well done, very moving. And then on the top floor was the human rights section—a smaller part, but focused on different genocides and human rights abuses that have taken place and that are even taking place now.

I found this quotation from Eleanor Roosevelt there, and to me it applies so directly to this practice. It inspires me to continue to have that willingness to see what's going on in my mind and heart, to meet it with compassion when I can, with interest always, and with the confidence and trust that whatever tool is available to help purify, that's where we need to be. There's not some that's lesser and some that's better.

So from Eleanor Roosevelt: "Where, after all, do universal human rights begin? In small places, close to home—so close and so small that they cannot be seen on any maps of the world. Yet they are the world of the individual person. And without concerted citizen action to uphold them close to home, we shall look in vain for progress in the larger world."

The world of the individual person. That's us, where it all starts.

Thank you for your patient attention.

CHAPTER 160

Right View: From the Beginning and All Through the Path

Carol Wilson · 55 min

In this dharma talk from a month-long retreat, Carol Wilson offers a comprehensive exploration of sammādiṭṭhi (right view), the first factor of the Noble Eightfold Path. She emphasizes that right view is not about adopting new beliefs but about perceiving reality accurately—what the Pāli phrase yathā bhūta ñāṇa dassana describes as "knowledge and vision of things as they have come to be." This understanding recognizes the impermanent, conditioned, and impersonal nature of all experience.

Wilson examines how sakkāya-diṭṭhi (personality view or identity view) creates the fundamental misperception that underlies our suffering. She illustrates how the sense of "me" becomes the measuring point for all experience, leading to the complexity of reactive patterns rooted in greed, hatred, and delusion. Through practical examples—from reactions to cold weather to the subtle ways fear can permeate even simple actions—she demonstrates how mindfulness (sati) differs from sammā-sati (right mindfulness), which recognizes not just objects but the qualities present in awareness itself.

The talk offers profound guidance on transforming practice from striving and self-improvement to simple recognition of what is occurring. Drawing on teachings from Ajahn Sumedho, Ajahn Chah, and Mingyur Rinpoche, Wilson points to the radical simplicity of awareness practice: any object—whether pleasant or unpleasant, sublime or difficult—can serve as a doorway to recognizing the naturally radiant quality of mind that remains accessible even when temporarily obscured by passing defilements.

I would like to share some thoughts about Right View, which is really the beginning and the ending of the path of awakening.

I'm sure you're quite aware that in the Four Noble Truths, the Eightfold Path begins with Right View. And of course, it's not a linear path. It's not that at the beginning of the path we should be completely awakened—that doesn't make sense. You'd think it should come at the end. But there's a certain degree of Right View that begins the path and then permeates all aspects of our practice. It keeps cycling through. It's certainly not a linear path; it's circular, spiraling deeper and deeper.

So even to begin our practice, we need and we have some essential aspect of Right View. This is something we can think about intellectually, but we keep coming back to this attitude of how we relate to our moment-to-moment practice—whether it's from Right View, right understanding, or from confusion. It really affects how we practice. The attitude in our mind and our awareness in a moment of paying attention matters deeply. It's a bit like what James was talking about last night when he spoke of bringing to mindfulness the qualities of interest, relaxation, and being kind. That's the quality in a moment of awareness, and that's really what Right View points to. It's the heart of the Buddhist teachings.

We've been giving lots of instructions, and you all know many more techniques. I'm sure you know this, but just a reminder: the practice isn't about getting the technique right. All the meditation techniques, all the methods, all the instructions—they're not about perfecting those so that you become a good meditator. The Buddha wasn't there to teach, "This is how to be the perfect follower of the breath, and if you can do it perfectly, you're enlightened." No, the techniques are in service of cultivating steady mindfulness, cultivating at least a moment of mindfulness that grows more and more steady. All of the Vipassana techniques are in service of that. That's the beginning of Right View. Right View then imbues everything.

But even steady mindfulness—why do we want to cultivate that? That's not an end in itself either. The Buddha's whole teaching has many wonderful, fantastic side effects and results. But the heart of the teaching is to really awaken our hearts and minds from delusion, from the confusion that creates suffering arising in our hearts and minds on a moment-to-moment basis—suffering that comes from the way the heart and mind respond to situations inaccurately, incorrectly, because we don't recognize what's really going on.

So his whole teaching is to really have the motivation, the understanding, the trust—the faith, the saddhā—in this potential: that freeing the heart and mind from confusion and suffering is really possible. As he said at times in different suttas, don't settle for anything less. Even for wholesome states of mind—that's wonderful, but don't settle for that. This is really the deepest aspect of Right View, which we cycle into and out of over and over. We keep coming to understand it a little bit more, then we lose it completely. That's on the deepest level.

But even to begin our practice, we need to know that the Right View which can lead us to even start is the sense that somehow we're not really getting it right. I mean, if we really had it all together and things made sense, who would spend a month sitting here like this? It's not really a vacation. We come here knowing, having practiced before, that it's not going to be a joyride. There will be moments that could be a joyride, and there will be plenty of moments that it's not. Because that's life. You think life gets different because you're sitting on a cushion? No. You just see it more clearly.

So sati, mindfulness—it's not an end in itself, but it's the amazing tool. The steadiness of mindfulness is the amazing tool. What does it do? How does it open this really deep potential of awakening?

It's not that mindfulness is creating a new reality. It allows us to recognize this reality, this moment of mind-body experience, accurately. We may think we're recognizing accurately, but if we were, we wouldn't be so embroiled in confusion.

One of the ways Sayadaw U Tejaniya defines Vipassana meditation is as experiencing the mind and body directly, from moment to moment, with the right understanding. So that's what I want to talk about tonight—the beginning right understanding that we can remind ourselves of, that we have to remind ourselves of, because it's not completely in ourselves all the time.

Right view, which is often the translation of samma ditthi, the first step of the Eightfold Path—it's not about learning another set of beliefs, or believing anything, or taking another set of concepts and saying this is true, everything else is false. Not even the Buddha's teaching. Right view isn't about believing anything.

Sometimes it's translated as right or wise understanding, which is also good. But personally, in the way I'm talking tonight, I really like the translation of right view because I think it's very literal.

Right view is far more simple, and I would say elegant, than believing another set of concepts or views or explanations. It's simple, elegant, and totally radical in terms of our experience.

Right view is literal, and it means the view, the way we recognize ourselves, the world, in a moment of experience. There's only this moment of experience. It's right in terms of being accurate—in a moment, recognizing what's actually happening. Not through some veil, some mist of assumption, distortion, self-identification, liking, disliking, whatever. In the beginning of practice, we don't even know that's there.

You think, "What are you talking about? I'm just seeing how it is. It's cold and I don't feel good, and that's how it is. Let's fix it." That's our idea of what's going on. We come in here, it's cold in the morning, and we think, "They should get this heat together." That's just the reality. This is wrong. But there's a little extra in that, you see? There's a little extra.

So right view. Just this moment. How is it?

There's a phrase listed in Pali, one of the higher knowledges, realizations. The phrase, which I love, is yatha bhuta ñana dassana, which means knowledge and vision of things as they have come to be. I'm indebted to Gil Fronsdal for giving it that precision of translation, because it's often rendered as "things as they are," but that gives a solidness. "Things as they are" makes us feel it's like this now—solid, non-changing.

But "things as they have come to be" gives me the sense of fluidity. They've come to be in this moment as a result of so many causes and conditions that there's no way we can even name them all. And this moment could not possibly be different. It's impossible, because this is how it's come to be right now. The next moment will come to be in a different way.

So "things as they have come to be" recognizes the impermanence, the changing nature, the conditionality, the impersonality. And when this is recognized accurately, appropriate response is much more possible.

This is the sense of right view—things as they have come to be.

When you look at the Buddha, or read about the Buddha after his awakening... for years I never thought of right view and right understanding as "we recognize experience differently and thus respond more appropriately." In the back of my mind, there was always this feeling that somehow it all should get better, shouldn't it? Things should shape up somehow. We should shape up the world, for God's sake. People should get better. Something should change.

But when you look at the Buddha's life, he woke up—the Peaceful One, the Fully Awakened One—into the same world that he was asleep in. He woke up in the same world. Things didn't change. There were still wars and poverty and prejudice and bias.

He lived with physical ailments. People still acted in totally irrational, stupid ways, both toward him and otherwise. His awakening didn't end violence in the world. It didn't end hatred. It didn't end prejudice. But how he lived in and understood and related to the world was completely different. He lived in a world of relationships and action.

So when I look at that, I think, "Oh, right, so what is awakening about? What is right view?" It doesn't mean people start acting nice, necessarily. It doesn't mean they walk up and say, "Oh, you look so bright and clear." Don't you kind of secretly think when you leave retreat that everybody's going to say, "Wow, you're really amazing. You're just filled with metta and compassion"? Yeah. Once in a while that happens. But it doesn't last, because nothing does. And that's not really what it's about.

So what changed? What changes? How we recognize and how we respond. We move from misperceiving—we perceive wrongly, we interpret wrongly—so we respond in ways that increase our own confusion and suffering. And much of the time we don't even know that's what we're doing. That's what the Buddha's talking about with wrong view. For me, it's fascinating when I can start to tune into it. It's also painful at times when we begin to see all the ways we're misinterpreting and complicating things for ourselves.

I'm trying to talk on a very basic level of right view here. But why? Why do we so misperceive? Why do we misrespond, embroiling ourselves in so much suffering? I'm not going back to origins—forget that. The Buddha said one of the things that will drive you crazy is trying to think about the beginnings of the universe. So he didn't know about the Big Bang, I guess.

How we perceive, how we think about things—this is the heart of what the Buddha's teaching is. He talked about how his teaching is against the stream: against the stream of common society, of common culture, of all the different common cultures. That's not so different now than it was then. But it's not only the external culture he's talking about. It's also the internal ways that we perceive and understand the world—ways we may not even recognize. We take them for granted.

As it's often said, when we're growing up in a particular family, in a particular culture, and if we're only surrounded by that particular culture, we don't even realize that there are other possibilities, that there are so many other cultures and ways people live—until we travel a little bit or step outside, if we happen to be able to live in a bubble like that. But then we start to see: this is true for all of us. How we're brought up, the cultures we live in, the things we meet in our lives—these have an effect on how we interpret, how we look at things. Some things we recognize, but much we don't.

And so Buddhist teaching—awareness practice, moment-to-moment awareness practice—is actually a stepping outside of the unrecognized, unspoken, unquestioned worldview and self-view that we may have been operating from in the background, whatever it is. This can be very uncomfortable at times, even if the self-worldview isn't a particularly happy or pleasant one. But it's familiar, like an old cozy bathrobe. You just get all cozy in it, even though you put it on in the morning and get really depressed and never want to go outside and just slump around the house. But you don't want to take it off because it's so cozy. Sort of like that.

Here's an example—not a personal one—of the ways ideas we don't even recognize shape how we interpret and perceive things. I hope this works. It worked for me. I was reading a book some years ago. I didn't take very good notes—I think the book was called Nonviolence. Anyway, I was reading the foreword by His Holiness the Dalai Lama.

And he's talking about nonviolence as the word, noting how in Gandhi's philosophy and teaching—in the Hindi, it's ahimsa—both of those are negations. Violence, or ahimsa is the negation of violence, just like nonviolence is the negation of violence. And so without recognizing it, he says, it's as if saying violence is the norm.

And nonviolence, rather than being a really active, proactive response to life, rather than being a whole view of life, it's simply, in that way—ahimsa, nonviolence—it's like it's the negation of violence. Violence being the thing that's expected. He said, what if you turn it around? What if the only word for war were non-peace?

You get his sense? Just a little thing like that. You don't say, wow, I don't even recognize the subtle effect words can have like that.

So it is sort of to turn in and kind of see—you have to stretch the mind a little bit. What would that mean?

Just along this same theme, I heard an interview soon after I was reading this, part of an interview with James Lawson. Do you know who he is? He's one of the foremost—he's pretty elderly now, I think he's still alive, two years ago he was—pretty elderly now, but he's one of the foremost theorists in this country on the philosophy and the actions of nonviolence. He studied Gandhian principles in India. He was a conscientious objector during the Korean War. But during the Civil Rights Movement, starting in the late fifties and early sixties, he was really one of the main people who was training all the civil rights workers, especially those young people in Nashville who started the Freedom Rides and the sit-ins. He was really the major trainer of how to do really important action from nonviolent principles.

And so in this interview—this is just one line from the thing—but the interviewer was asking him, "Well, how do you then deal with violence if you're talking about nonviolence?" And he said, "You're asking the question from the wrong angle." Nonviolence creates, it stems from a completely different configuration of power than the one you're imagining, or the one that would ask, "Well, how do you deal with violence?" He didn't really go into it or outline it in that interview, but it's that same sense of: if non-peace is the only word for war, everything changes. And he's saying it's a completely different configuration of power. You're asking basically from the other way of perceiving, which is really what we're doing all the time in our daily life.

One last thing that gives a hint of it too, from Martin Luther King: "Nonviolence means avoiding not only external physical violence, but also internal violence of the spirit. You not only refuse to shoot a person, you refuse to hate them."

So just to me, that gives a little sense of looking from a whole different angle, from a whole different place, a configuration of power that has nothing to do with the external kind of power we think of. He's always talking about soul force, power of the heart. You can't even think all the depth of that.

Well, that's just the example I was giving—to take up that our essential wrong view, the essential misinterpretation that the Buddha's teachings speak to, that we carry around with us because it just seems so normal. You know what I'm going to say, I'm sure: it's sakkāya-diṭṭhi. Diṭṭhi means view. Sakkāya means personality or identity view.

So what that means really, in the nitty-gritty moment-to-moment experience, is there's the whole field of sense experiences happening. I think Sally mentioned the sense experience. So there's seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, physical sensations, thoughts, moods, images—all arising from moment to moment, right? We agree on that? And it's just like this, seems like a flow, a stream, one after the other after the other. This is one of the ways the Buddha described our life.

So this is just going on. Whenever one of those is—particularly when the energy of grasping comes—it's identified, it's felt as, taken as being me or mine, any particular one of the sense experiences, that's a moment of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, a moment of personality view.

Now mostly when we're meditating, we might notice—when we're being quiet, one of the advantages of a retreat environment—we're actually first even noticing there's this constant flow of sense experiences. And we might notice that some are just coming and going, and then suddenly there's this energy of, kind of like a mental energy to grasp it and go, "Yes, this is happening to me." And it feels different from all the other ones.

In our daily life it's still like this, but it's happening so fast. Generally, I think a lot of us, we don't notice a particular thing like that—it just feels as though it's me.

This stuff is either happening in me or to me. This is me in my life, right? Or am I the only one? Creating a sense of self and other.

The way Sogyal Rinpoche describes it, he called it this fascination with me, with the sense of me. And that's a real feeling, the sense of me, isn't it? Sometimes when we talk about sakaya-ditti being a view, not being an accurate interpretation of reality, we think, well, there should be no sense of me. But there is a sense of me. Do you have a sense of being me or I sometimes in the day? Do you notice it? It can be noticed because it's not always there.

I actually love exploring that in practice, but it's so frequent and it's so taken for granted. It's like what I was saying before about nonviolence—you don't even think about it. The sense of me isn't thought about. So Sogyal says this is like a fascination with me. This sense of me, which is a real kind of sense—it feels like me. It doesn't mean it is; it feels like me. And so that becomes the measuring point for all experience. Everything relates back to the sense of me.

Joseph gives a great example. He was standing once on retreat in the food line for lunch, second in line. There were big pots, and the person in front of him lifted the top off a pot and dropped it, making a heck of a racket. You can imagine, in the silence, deep in retreat—a heck of a racket, everybody looks. And he said his first thought was, "It wasn't me."

We do that. It's all about me, right? The measuring point for everything. It's cold out—is that good for me? Bad for me? Something happens, and we think, what's this going to mean to me? Incredible things happening in the world, good or bad—well, what's this going to mean for me? That's the first thing, and then we can widen out.

Now, this isn't to be looked at with judgment or self-judgment. What's that? That's all about me too, right? "I'm just the most self-oriented person in the world. I'm the most self-judging person here." Just watch it all. Watch it all. But don't take it personally.

So Sogyal says everything is measured from the sense of me. It's natural, but that doesn't make it true. It's really fascinating. And that's where we get seduced into it. That's where we really don't quite notice.

This is where our wrong view feeds the confusion that keeps us from recognizing in any moment accurately what's occurring. An incredible complexity comes into our reactions to a moment of experience as soon as it's being recognized through the veil of distortion of sakaya-ditti, of me.

Even this, though, can be recognized with mindfulness. There's nothing that awareness can't recognize. So it's not hopeless—otherwise, there would be no point in bringing it up. We can explore it. But the complexity of our life, of our response to all these different sense impressions, is triggered by, distorted by, the not recognizing sakaya-ditti when it's operative in a particular moment of mindfulness, a particular moment of awareness.

Let me give you a simple example. The other morning when it was really cold—

Start with just perception, just the recognition of experience. Say you're walking outside. My body is very sensitive to cold, so I'm using that as an example. Walking outside, the cold is coming, and the cold sensation is occurring. Maybe there's a sound of wind, and there's an experience of that as being unpleasant. That would just be perception—coldness feels like this, wind, unpleasant.

But the sense of sakaya-ditti would be, "I'm so cold. I'm so cold." Do you get a sense of the difference? Cold is like this, versus I'm so cold. It starts right there, and it's unpleasant.

So then from what we perceive, as the Buddha says, we think about. Like the example I was giving before: I'm so cold, and I come in here to sit and it's fifty-eight degrees. Can't these people get themselves together? Don't they know? Okay, maybe we want to save propane—turns out there wasn't any propane—but maybe we want to save it. Don't they know it's flu season? The last thing we want is for everyone to get sick here, right?

So it depends how far that goes. One thought might be all, or maybe it went on for twenty-five minutes. Who was suffering? Only one person was suffering from that particular train of thought. The other person was suffering from their particular train of thought. But that's the incredible complexity coming from the sense of me.

Those thoughts—and it could be on the pleasant side; I'm just using the unpleasant because it's more obviously suffering—all of that is going on. And then it comes down into a view: Yes, this is true. It's too cold. They're not on top of it. I'm going to get sick. This is not okay. This isn't good for my body. And it's all so solid. Do you get a sense of that?

In the sense of yata-bhuta, things as they are—so that's sati. You might be noticing all of that, but if you don't recognize the view of self and the aversion that's distorting perception, it's sati, but it's not what Sally mentioned the other night: samasati, the path factor, right mindfulness. Because right mindfulness recognizes the qualities in the citta. Mindfulness can be aware of sakaya-ditti, can be aware of aversion. That's fine—you know it's there. It still feels like aversion, it's still unpleasant, but mindfulness is recognizing it. That's samasati. That's path factor mindfulness.

Unrecognized, we just spin and spin and spin. As the Buddha said, agitation through clinging—clinging to the sense of self, clinging to the belief, clinging to the dislike, clinging to the unpleasant. And then if you think, "Oh, I'm clinging again," it's just another thought of me that's clinging.

But what's wonderful, what's amazing, what's so freeing about awareness, about mindfulness, is that at any moment it can flip—from being completely lost in the sakaya-ditti to, oh—

Sense of self is like this.

Or, "I'm so cold. This is impossible. I can't bear it." Oh, coldness feels like this. It still feels cold—it doesn't become all mellow and wonderful. It still feels cold, but it's just the sensations, and nothing created around it. That's the simplicity of clear seeing versus the complexity of the attachment of sense of self and all the reactions that come from that.

Ajahn Sumedho—the American who's been a monk in the Thai forest tradition for forty-some-odd years—he says we create ourselves through our thoughts. And we cannot create an ultimately peaceful self. Check it out. You've got a lot of time to see that.

But if you just look at the difference between this complication and the simple being—"Oh, sensation cold is like this. It's really unpleasant. Unpleasant feels like this." And a thought comes up: "I wonder why it's so cold. What's the matter?" And you go, "Okay, wondering feels like this." It's not that you have to push anything away. It's just shifting from the unconscious, unrecognizing that we're believing this interpretation, to what's the actual sense experience now?

Physical coldness. Mental unpleasant. Mental thought. Physical contraction around the coldness. Mental unpleasant. More mental unpleasant thought because the contraction is more unpleasant than the coldness, which is actually just cold. And spiral, spiral, spiral. And then you say, "Oh yeah, sakayaditthi is like this." I'm not just saying—I do that all the time. It lands you in the middle of the experience. It's not a suppression or a pushing away at all. It's like, "Oh, it's like this now."

Which is a phrase Ajahn Sumedho uses. It really helps me, because sometimes my mind is trying to analyze, trying to name it like I just did—cold sensation, unpleasant sensation—and really get into that. But behind it all, that can come from a trying to control and get it all copacetic, right? If I can name it all and be mindful. Instead, just "Oh, it's like this now." Not even naming it, just "like this now." The resistance goes, and you're just being fully present in that moment.

And then the next thing arises. And if you're really cold and a thought comes, "Well, why don't I just put a blanket around me?"—there's nothing wrong with that. Just put on a blanket, for the love of God, and stop whining, Carol. It's so much more simple. It doesn't mean we can't respond in an intelligent way, but we're able to see what's actually going on rather than running all over the place.

As I did once at IMS many years ago. Yogi mind, when everything's exaggerated and you're really not seeing clearly. The heating pipe started playing the Rolling Stones. Not really, okay. But it was so loud. How can it be so loud? These heating pipes—something's got to be wrong. I was on staff at the time, so I knew the building, and I ended up running around down in the boiler room, way down in the basement, to see if the furnaces were working right. As if I would know, right? As a cook, what do I know from furnaces? Nothing. "It's got to be something wrong. It can't be making so much noise." Instead of just, "Oh, sounds like this now." It's probably not the Rolling Stones—but that could be, you know, a perception. But okay, it's loud. Just like this now. So much more simple, so much more simple and appropriate.

So just that simplicity of recognizing what's happening—sensation—that's samasati. In that particular moment, it's not like it's an incredibly powerful insight. But what we're cultivating through all the techniques is the moment-to-moment-to-moment recognition, recognition of this simple awareness. And that's what starts to give awareness its own momentum. You start to be able then to see more accurately, more clearly.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya likes to describe, instead of thinking of whatever's occurring as ourself, is to just think of its nature. Like, we tend to get upset about the weather, but probably—at least in this culture—we don't think we can control it. And so I may be upset about it, but I'm not really going to go out there and start blaming myself because it's raining or snowing, right? So that little bit of assuming we have control is taken away.

So when we're exploring in our practice moment-to-moment experience, especially when we start to see the painful, the distorting mental states that come when we're looking through wrong view, we recognize that these also are simply arising. Yathabhuta—they've come to be as they are in this moment due to just previous habits of mind. It isn't personal.

The deeply conditioned habits. As I'm sure you know, the Buddha spoke of the roots of our confusion, our deep suffering, as arising in this mind-body system through certain mental states or mental factors—the mental qualities of confusion, delusion, not recognizing clearly what I've been talking about. These lead to responses of either great greed, fixation, holding on, wanting, leaning forward, craving—or hatred, aversion, fear, pushing away. These three are the root mental qualities that lead to all the other suffering states we experience. And they really arise out of the misperception of relating to any experience as me or mine.

When they're present and not recognized, they're going to be present a lot. As we cultivate mindful awareness, we start to recognize them more and more and more. This is a very important part of practice. This is where I was going with seeing it as nature. If we start to recognize, for instance, how often wanting something to be different arises—even some little thing—and if in that moment it's taken as me, taken as mine: "I'm such a greedy person. I can't believe wanting is coming up again. I'm hopeless." Then right away we're back in the extra suffering, and we don't want to see it because we're taking it personally. And it's really, really hard.

But if instead we say, "Wow, wanting coming up again," or "Fear coming up"—I remember one period in practice where I thought I didn't have that much fear. I was waiting for some big, total panic that was going to send me fleeing. But then I started to notice little blips of fear coming up about everything. This was one phase of practice. I wasn't even on retreat. I was home, and I was taking the tea kettle off the stove, and I had this fear that I was doing it wrong. How can you take the tea kettle off the stove wrong? And the fear—I thought, oh my god, this is amazing.

Now if I took that personally, that would go down the path of "You're completely hopeless. All these years of practice and you're afraid of how you're taking off the tea kettle. Why don't you just hang it up? It's hopeless." Or I could get really overwhelmed. But when you're seeing, "Wow, this is a habit of mind, that's fascinating"—it's not something about Carol, because there's not a solid Carol here anyway. It's just seeing how this has been conditioned in this mind-body system. And the awareness noticing it is, as James said, really interested.

It won't be every moment, but just to hold that sense that whatever's coming up in this moment is arising due to its simply having been practiced a lot. As there is conditioning, here we're shifting—the yatā bhūta, recognizing things as they have come to be in this moment, allows the clear seeing that we can respond differently in this next moment. Like I said, instead of getting all upset about the cold, you just see how cold feels like this, you put on a blanket, no big deal.

So it makes clear seeing possible, which allows us to respond appropriately. It's not that these things aren't going to arise—greed, hatred, confusion. They will. They are. And the more we practice mindfulness and trust it, we'll see them more. Sometimes people come in and they'll say, "Oh my god, I'm a million times worse than when I started practice. I'm a hopeless neurotic mess." But we're just seeing what we didn't see before because the faith is getting stronger, the mindfulness is getting more continuous, gaining its momentum. There's more sammā sati than there was, and so it gives us the heart and the strength to really look at it, to not take it so personally. And it's important to see because without that clear seeing, these difficult states are what lead to the distortions where we recognize inaccurately.

There's a sutta, a very brief one, where the Buddha talked about the four ways of going off course, the four ways of wrong action. And they're basically this: prejudice based on what we like, what we desire; prejudice based on what we dislike, based on anger; prejudice based on delusion, not recognizing accurately; and prejudice based on fear. We can see this in the world clearly. I imagine for you, certainly for me, we can see how that in other people impacts us, how it impacts other people. We can get really filled with despair and pain around that.

What we're doing here though, and what is really amazing about this month-long period or two-week period of silent intensive practice—where we're not so much relating to each other or to the outside world—as I said with the Buddha, it's not that our awakening fixes the outside world. But what we are looking at is seeing: okay, it's not only everyone else who has prejudices based on likes and dislikes, on anger, on fear, on delusion. It's also arising from time to time in this mind and heart, completely clouding accurate recognition, completely clouding appropriate response. And as the Buddha said, leading to more agitation through clinging, affecting how we can relate to others in the world.

So this is some of the reason why we need faith, as James was talking about. These five wholesome spiritual faculties arise through our willingness to keep cultivating steady mindfulness, and they're essential. There are times we really need to call on confidence, on our faith or trust, because the stuff that comes up—we're stepping outside the comfort zone to recognize these things.

Or sometimes we can bring in the intellectual understanding of right view, really why I'm talking about it tonight. Sometimes when I'm totally caught, I'll really say, "Right, this is nature. This is cause and effect. It's like this now." And it gives me the faith just to relax into it. It's like this now. This feels horrible. It's like this now. For this instant it feels horrible, okay. But it doesn't have to have all the stories about me and past and future and everything. It's just like this now.

And then there's a possibility for the next moment to arise with a response of more clarity, more wholesomeness, more compassion, more wisdom.

When we don't recognize the effect of sakkāya-diṭṭhi that is present, we bring the same sense of misperception into how we approach our practice—just our simple mindfulness practice. This is what so frequently leads to striving, trying to make your experience be a certain way. Probably none of you have ever fallen into that.

Even trying to make the breath be a certain way, as if it matters. The breath is going to come and go, and if it stops coming and going, you won't be there to care about it. But it's going to come and go, and it's the object that helps us re-recognize awareness. It's not about getting a better breath. We think, "Well, I shouldn't be thinking about things." Thinking is occurring. That's what's happening. That's then the object to bring us back into awareness. Any object can bring awareness. But when we don't recognize that the sense of "me doing" is behind the technique, then we can practice endlessly without understanding.

Ajahn Sumedho says our tendency is to think you can't understand or even think about sakkāya-diṭṭhi in the beginning of practice—it's too obscure, too complex. You have to practice a long time. But he says, no, he's come to really believe—and I agree with him—that's crazy. Why practice for twenty years from the delusion that I'm practicing to get somewhere and make something happen? Why spend twenty years doing that? You can start to just begin to explore, to bring in and recognize when the sense of self, sakkāya-diṭṭhi, is occurring. It's not going to stop occurring, but we can just recognize it, as I've been talking about, and see the difference between the complexity and the simplicity—when it's there and when it's not—without even taking that personally. Sakkāya-diṭṭhi also isn't personal. It's just a habit of misinterpretation of our minds.

When we don't recognize it—and I mean, probably many of us have practiced with great diligence, great sincerity, great effort—behind that, without recognizing, so much of it is coming from that forceful striving. Trying to get, trying to do, trying to be better, or trying to get rid of, trying to change your personality. Does this resonate with anybody? No, I'm serious.

And then we say, "Okay, well, I've got to stop doing that, right? I'm just going to recognize sakkāya-diṭṭhi and stop doing that. No more striving." No. This is the radical nature of moment-to-moment mindfulness practice. Sati, mindfulness of just what is occurring, no matter what is occurring. So striving—striving feels like this. It's just another movement of mind, another mental state. Trying to get rid of striving feels like this.

You just keep noticing. A good place you can see it in minuscule is the sense of trying to control your breath. You ever get into that? You just try to notice the breath and then as soon as you notice, you're trying to control it. And you think, "God, I'm not supposed to control the breath. I'm going to not control the breath." Then you try to just look at it from the side because you're not trying to control it. "I'm not really controlling—oh, controlling, controlling. Never mind, I'm going here. Am I controlling it?" And you're all wrapped up in a knot.

What about: "Oh, controlling feels like this." Okay. That's just what's occurring. Controlling feels like this. I don't like it. Okay. Not liking feels like this. Really. Really. I'm not kidding. This is really the quality of sammā sati—recognizing what's occurring. Steady, steady awareness starts to get its own momentum.

Mingyur Rinpoche, describing this, says we give attention to the object of meditation to support the recognition of awareness, of mindfulness. We use the object as a tool to access the mind of mindfulness. Now this is me, not him: for that purpose, any object is equally useful.

So it can be breath, or it can be controlling. It can be a pristine sense of coolness and little subtle vibrations, or it could be a massive whole body-mind feeling of hatred. It's like this. It's the awareness that we're recognizing, developing the steadiness of—not trying to make better objects.

And you'll know when you're trying to make better objects, because right away the sakkāya-diṭṭhi leads us into either greed, wanting to achieve something, or aversion, trying to get rid of something, trying to stop something, or delusion—you don't know what the heck's going on—or more, it's all about me. It's all about me. But then mindfulness can just notice that.

I'm not saying it's easy, but the more we start to do it and trust it, the more natural it gets. It starts to be that this old suit of clothes, the old fuzzy bathrobe of "me, me, me," isn't the only way of recognizing a moment of reality. So here we have all these moments to practice—simply recognizing mindful awareness. Mindful awareness.

A lot of times it feels like nothing much is going on. We want some flashy things going on. And if you can't have wonderful flashy things, we'll take some big trauma. Better that than boring, right? Nothing's happening. But awareness doesn't ever get bored.

We start to notice—this is back to Mingyur Rinpoche again—as we're using every object to recognize awareness, then we start to recognize the quality of the mind, the quality of the mind that's aware in any moment of awareness. Not just the object, not just the phenomenon perceived by the mind.

This is what James was pointing to last night when he talked about those qualities of interest in the mind, and relaxation, and kindness. Those are the wholesome qualities that we start to recognize. Interest is really a quality of bright mind, of wisdom, of non-delusion. Relaxation, I'm thinking, is really like a quality of non-greed. The fixation of clinging, of holding onto something, is relaxed. It's just as it is right now—non-greed. And kindness, of course, obviously non-hatred. Not the kindness of "oh, it's so nice"—it's just like this, without creating any negativity, any aversion, any "me" around it. It's just like this. Kind attention can just be with what is. And that's all.

In fact, one of Ajahn Sumedho's definitions of mettā, which I really love—mettā in terms of being with something or someone that's difficult—is just to experience the difficult or unpleasant in a person or a situation, just as it is, without creating anything around it. I love that. It's like this. And space. Nothing else you need to do.

So this is really sammā-sati. As Ajahn Chah says, we become the knower of objects, not the owner of objects. And so slowly, slowly, as the awareness gains momentum, the right view, the understanding—it starts to be more our default mode. Not completely, but it does start to be at times. Sometimes we actively remember it, but then there are times when, like I gave the example, all of a sudden: "Oh, it's just like this now." That arises spontaneously, and it's so obvious. And we really start to shift to the more accurate way of seeing.

I'll just end with this very well-known sutta from the Buddha. I know you know this—two alternate ways of perceiving. And we go back and forth between them.

This mind-heart is radiant, but it doesn't show its radiance because passing torments, kilesas, defilements, come and obscure it, hide it. The unwise, ordinary person does not understand this as it really is. So for them there is no development, no cultivation of mind. You just think, "Oh, this is just how it is. Greed is here and I'm the victim of it and there's nothing to do." This is the truth.

This mind is radiant, and it shows its radiance when it is unobscured by passing kilesas, torments. The wise, noble disciple understands this as it is, and so for them there is cultivation, development of mind.

So that's what we're doing. We recognize that when the kilesas are covering the radiance, we don't think that's all there is. We can recognize the torments, but we know it's a passing show. And when the radiance is there—just the simplicity of the heart-mind at ease, at peace—just starting with that.

Don't go looking for Nibbana—just start with moments of purity. When there's not greed, not hatred, not delusion, recognize those moments as well. Just the simple radiance, really view that.

And when a new cloud comes, we don't despair. We know it's a cloud. Conditions brought it together. Awareness that radiance is still accessible.

So that's what I wanted to share about right view.

CHAPTER 161

The Two Darts: Mindfulness of Vedanā can Purify the Heart

Carol Wilson · 59 min

In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson illuminates one of the Buddha's most penetrating insights: the role of vedanā (feeling tone) in the arising of suffering and the path to liberation. Drawing primarily from the Sallatha Sutta (SN 36.6), known as "The Dart Sutta," she explores how an ordinary person experiences two kinds of suffering when touched by unpleasant feeling—the initial bodily pain plus the mental anguish of resistance—while an awakened being experiences only the first dart.

Carol explains how vedanā—the quality of pleasantness, unpleasantness, or neutrality that arises with every moment of sense contact—is so subtle and fleeting that we rarely notice it directly. Yet this unrecognized feeling tone drives our habitual reactions: grasping toward the pleasant, pushing away the unpleasant, and ignoring the neutral. She weaves in teachings from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), the Dhammapada, and insights from teachers including Ajahn Buddhadāsa, Mahā Ghosānanda, and Mingyur Rinpoche to show how these unconscious patterns perpetuate saṃsāra—the endless cycle of craving and becoming.

Through vivid examples—from watching basketball fans ride waves of elation and despair, to her own midnight cookie episode on retreat—Carol demonstrates how simple, sustained mindfulness of feeling tone can reveal the mechanism of suffering and naturally release our bondage to it. The Buddha's promise is clear: by contemplating the impermanence of vedanā without clinging, "one personally realizes nibbāna."

To explore together, expanding and discussing a bit more on this aspect of our experience of vedanā that Bonnie introduced in the instructions the other morning. Because one, it's fascinating, and two, it's really one of the key experiences that just happens to arise every single mind moment that we're alive. Understanding and meeting it with mindfulness rather than overlooking it is really one of the keys to clear seeing and liberation. It's an amazing thing. To me, one of the signs of the genius of the Buddha is that he even noticed it and figured it out. This can be really interesting to explore, and I'm just offering these reflections in that spirit.

Mingyur Rinpoche writes, talking about recognizing cause and effect conditions: "We can recognize that the same interplay between cause and effect conditions our own mind and shapes our experience." Hopefully we're all seeing that as we explore here. If we want to be happy, we must figure out what causes and conditions lead to well-being. Similarly, if we do not have a clear understanding of the conditions that create suffering, how could we possibly expect to free ourselves from it?

To me, those are kind of the two aspects of our ongoing spiritual practice—the two sides of a retreat, and the two sides of the things we talk about. Sometimes we're talking about the causes and conditions that lead to happiness, that lead to well-being, and sometimes we're talking about the causes and conditions that create a moment of suffering in our hearts and minds. Sometimes you're experiencing a rare moment of the causes and conditions that lead to well-being, and other times you're experiencing many moments of the causes and conditions that lead to suffering.

This is really what we're exploring in our practice, what we're seeing. I remember Sayadaw U Tejaniya once said something that was so obvious I thought it was brilliant precisely because it's so obvious. He was talking about someone really wanting to get concentrated and wanting to be free. He said, "You know, concentration doesn't happen just because you want it to. That's not really the cause and condition that gives rise to concentration." Just take that in. "I want to be free. I want to not have this experience anymore." And we get so frustrated when it doesn't happen. So here it's like, stop. We just look, moment to moment to moment, with steady mindfulness without assuming we know. And then the causes and conditions for both happiness and suffering reveal themselves. That's really why we have to go through both sides in our practice.

Vedanā, this quality, this moment-to-moment experience of feeling tone, is so important that the Buddha picked it out in his sutta on the four foundations of mindfulness. When he decided to divide up experience into four areas, he picked vedanā for a whole section, the second one. Until I really heard and read about it from the Buddhist teachings and started to explore it in my experience, I never would have even noticed it. I didn't even have a clue that it existed. How did he figure that out?

Really understanding and exploring how we suffer, really looking at these qualities in the mind—remember, meditation is the work of the mind. It's not just about some kind of subtle, esoteric looking at these things separate from life. What goes on in the heart-mind is what conditions how we speak and how we act in the world. It's not separate.

I think very frequently about a quotation I love from Maha Ghosananda, who was a Cambodian monk and peace activist during and after the time of the Khmer Rouge. The Khmer Rouge killed millions of people in Cambodia, and basically all the monks and nuns had to flee if they were going to survive, as did many other people. Maha Ghosananda, who has since passed away, was giving part of a speech in Washington, D.C. some years ago. He said, "All the landmines in the world have been planted by the landmines in our own hearts." So to understand and thus remove the landmines in our hearts is the way to remove them in the world. To me, that just really points to the inseparability of understanding the landmines in our own mind and hearts from how we speak and act in the world.

So what are the landmines in our hearts? In the big picture, the Buddha said: the qualities of greed, the qualities of aversion or hatred, the qualities of delusion. When they're present in the heart-mind in a moment and unrecognized, that's what leads to unwholesome speech and action. And it's not just something that makes you feel a little bad—it's actually running the show.

This brings to mind the first two verses of the Dhammapada, which are also very famous: "All things are preceded by the mind, the heart, are ruled by mind, are made of mind. If you speak or act with an impure mind"—basically greed, hatred, confusion in the heart-mind—"then suffering follows you as the wheel of the cart follows the ox that pulls it. All things are preceded by the mind, the heart, ruled by mind, made of mind."

And if you speak or act with a pure mind, a calm, bright heart, then happiness follows you like a shadow that never leaves. This very famous couplet from the Dhammapada says to me exactly what Maha Gosananda says and exactly what Mingyur Rinpoche says: understanding what leads to suffering in our experience, and thus in the world, and understanding what leads to happiness.

Each of us, as human beings, is just one representative of humanity. We have our own particular stories and our particular patterns, but underneath that, we're all the same. It's the same things that lead to suffering, the same things that lead to happiness. So as we come to understand how confusion and complexity gets created moment to moment, how we can see through it, and how recognizing accurately releases the confusion—even if just for a moment—we're not just doing it for ourselves. We're understanding how this works in everybody.

This doesn't mean it fixes everybody. The Buddha couldn't fix everybody. But we can certainly move into our relationships with ourselves and others in the world from a very different place of understanding—when the corruptions aren't present. I'm going to use klesha, the word for greed, hatred, and delusion, because I really don't much like the translation "defilement." "Torments" is another option, but I'll just use klesha—that's what I mean by it. The torments of heart-mind: greed, hatred, confusion, the habits.

When the Buddha came to talk about this, when he picked out vedana, this quality of feeling tone to explore, it was really because—while there are different angles to enter—this is one that's very accessible to us when we start to notice, to really come to understand.

I want to start talking about it from a sutta the Buddha gave, called "The Darts." I'll go through the sutta bit by bit and then offer my ideas, my comments about it.

He starts out by saying, "Now what is the distinction, what is the difference that exists between a well-taught noble disciple"—basically an awakened person—"and an untaught worldling, an ordinary person?" That's an interesting question, right? What's the difference? That gets my attention.

And he says: "An untaught worldling, monks, experiences pleasant feelings. She experiences unpleasant or painful feelings and experiences neutral feelings. A well-taught noble disciple likewise experiences pleasant, painful, and neutral feelings."

So what's the difference?

I would suggest—if you're anything like me, maybe you're not—just take a moment to look at what might be the background, perhaps not quite conscious assumption when you think about what it would be to be enlightened. And don't pretend you've never thought about it either. When it slips in, do you think, "Yes, I'll experience the same unpleasant feeling tones that I'm feeling now"? No, you don't. Don't you think it's just going to get better and better, nicer and nicer—in other words, more and more pleasant vedana? Doesn't that somehow slip in the back door?

He's saying no, it's not like that. An awakened person, like an unawakened person, experiences pleasant vedana, unpleasant vedana, and neutral vedana.

So first of all, if we can even let that one go, that's huge. Okay, it doesn't go that easily. May it be so for you, and I won't have to give this talk. But I'm giving it to myself, not just to you.

So what is the difference? That's the rest of the sutta.

"When an untaught person, an ordinary person, is touched by a painful, unpleasant bodily vedana, feeling tone, they worry and grieve and lament. They beat their breast. They weep and are distraught."

Can you relate to that? It's not just, "Ah yeah, that knee, it's a little bit unpleasant." No—you beat your breast, you're distraught, you weep, you pull out your hair. It's like, "Oh my God, it's the end of the world!"

"They thus experience two kinds of unpleasant feelings: a bodily and a mental one. It is as if a person were pierced by a dart, an arrow, and following the first piercing is hit by a second arrow. So that person will experience feelings caused by two darts. It is similar with an untaught, ordinary person: when touched by an unpleasant bodily feeling tone, they worry and grieve, lament, beat their breast, weep, and are distraught. So they experience two kinds of feelings."

That's the first part he presents. He's saying this is what an ordinary person does. Can you relate to that at all?

Let me describe vedana for a moment, and then say what happens with this. Vedana, feeling tone itself, as Bonnie described the other morning, is a very subtle and fleeting, quick experience.

arising in every moment of consciousness.

So how does the Buddha describe our experience, really? Seeing, hearing, smelling, touching, tasting, mental experience and thinking or emotion—he calls these the six sense experiences. And they're just happening, over and over and over, all day long. Have you noticed that? Just happening.

So what is a sense experience in that moment? All these things are happening very quickly. Say seeing, for example. There's the physical eye door that works, if it works. There's a form, a visual object to be seen. And there's the consciousness in that moment. When they come together, there's seeing. But what we experience, what we really recognize, is just that seeing is happening. Recognizing the seeing—that's mindfulness.

So the seeing occurs, and right away with it is perception. That saññā, that recognition: it's a bell, or it's a light, or this is a room. You may not even say the word, but that just comes up. It's just normal nature. Nothing wrong with that. The perception can be accurate or inaccurate—that's a whole other talk—but that perception arises is just natural.

And it's perceived, it's recognized in the mind with this feeling tone that is also felt in the mind: this kind of pleasant feeling tone, unpleasant feeling tone, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant. This is just arising as nature, cause and effect, just as with perception, just at that moment of contact. It's just nature. It's not good. It's not bad. It's not personal. And it's so subtle, arising in every moment.

It's easy to think that the feeling tone, the quality of pleasantness or unpleasantness or neutrality, is somehow embedded in the object—like this bell is pleasant to look at. But it's not. It's how it's felt in the mental sphere in each of us. The same sight—well, it's never the same, right? How I see this bell in this moment, someone else may see it differently. It may come in as neutral to me. It may come in as unpleasant or pleasant to you. And five minutes later, to the same person, it could come in with a different feeling tone. It's not a steady state thing. It's just what arises due to conditioning.

But it's so quick. It's so quick that, as I said, until I read about it, I didn't really notice. I don't look at the bell and think, "Hmm, neutral feeling tone. Nice gold color. Pleasant feeling tone. Ah, it's pleasant." We don't really notice. It's so fleeting, so quick.

And in the not noticing, of course, is where the habits come in. You know this. We talk about this all the time. But it's so deeply habituated in the mind stream: when there's pleasant feeling tone, there's that little leaning forward. When there's unpleasant, that little pushing back. When it's neutral, look for something else.

In the not noticing, that's where it moves from unpleasant bodily feeling tone to lamenting, beating your breast, pulling your hair, and thinking it's all over. It's like that. It's so fast. Because we don't really notice the feeling tone so often, the whole experience—all the reaction—we're immediately into complexity and story. What does it mean? What to do? Without mindfulness, it's really easy for us to think that the reactions and the story is really what's happening, the accurate description of reality. Do you get a sense of what I mean?

Take unpleasant sensation, just a little unpleasant sensation in the knee or the elbow or the hand. We may actually be mindful of the sensation but not recognizing the unpleasant, and then immediately the thought arises: "This really isn't good. I don't think I can continue to sit with this like this. In fact, I remember someone I knew who kept sitting when it was like this in their back, and they really hurt themselves."

And that's really not wise attention. That's really not mindfulness. That's really not compassion. It's just "I've got to do something and I've got to do it now. This is bad. This is wrong." And all of that could happen in like a tenth of a second. Or am I the only one?

We may recognize, as it's getting really ramped up, that this seems a little exaggerated. "Fear is like this, fear is like this." But really, in there, not noticing the unpleasant, the reaction, the response is just—of course. Of course it's wrong. Of course it's bad. Of course I shouldn't hurt. You know? Hello?

And someone said, you know, we have a body, and cause and condition. We have a body and we're sitting still for half an hour. At some point we're going to hurt. So then your mind goes, "Okay, so why sit still for half an hour?" Right? Because we should be able to organize it so we don't hurt, because hurting is bad.

Same with pleasant. There's a pleasant feeling just at lunch. Something tastes good. We know it tastes good, but we miss the pleasant feeling. And it's just, "Oh, this is really great. I've got to get the recipe. I've got to have some more, but I don't want to be greedy. How much are other people eating? It's okay, they had four—I can have another one. It doesn't really... this is really good for me and it soothes me. It's compassionate. It's really the way we're supposed to be, and there's still enough. And the cooks will appreciate it—I'm really doing it so the cooks will feel good, so they'll know that I like the food." Right?

There's nothing wrong with pleasant food. And there's nothing wrong with moving so you're not harming your body. But when we don't recognize the vedanā, the complexity—we're entranced by the reactions. We're really lost in that. And we think that's really... we're taking that as a description of reality. And we respond in that way, and through that to the next thing that happens. That's how we get so confused. Confused and lost.

So basically, without mindfulness—because the six sense experiences, that's all that's happening all day. And notice how fast they're changing sometimes when you see it. Nothing stays really for more than a moment. So all those vedanās arising through the day in our daily life too, and the not recognizing the tendency to move toward the pleasant, away from the unpleasant, ignore the neutral—we use that really as the overlay of what's meaningful, what's valuable, what's worthwhile in our life.

Think how many mind moments we've practiced that. No wonder it's such a deep habit. No wonder it feels right, really, and normal in a way. Do you know what I mean? It's like, of course pleasant is better. Of course, if it's been a pleasant sitting, if it's been really clear and then suddenly it's all muddy and the body's really hurting—even though you're aware of it, but it's really turned unpleasant—it of course feels like something's wrong. It's just such a deep habit.

But it's a habit. Because it's a habit doesn't mean it's the truth. But it's, as you know, very difficult to change habits. So a lot of our practice is this exploring to see how this process is working, really being interested, not taking it personally, because we're all kind of running in these habits.

So really starting to explore, back to reading the sutta, which I put down somewhere. Here it is. The Buddha goes on to describe how we ordinary people react.

You're beating your breast, you're resisting. "Having been touched by that painful feeling, one resists it, one resents it. Then in one who so resists and resents that painful feeling, an underlying tendency of resistance, a habit of resistance against painful feeling comes to underlie the mind."

Do you get a sense of that? It just becomes the habit to resist and resent unpleasant feeling. And because it's a habit, it feels normal. It feels appropriate.

Then he goes on: "Under the impact of that painful feeling, one then proceeds to enjoy sensual happiness. And why does one do so? An ordinary person, O Bhikkhus, does not know of any other escape from painful feelings except the enjoyment of sensual happiness."

This kind of breaks my heart, actually.

"So in one who enjoys sensual happiness, the underlying tendency to lust for pleasant feelings comes to underlie the mind. He does not know, according to facts, the arising and ending of these feelings, nor the gratification, the danger, and the escape connected with these feelings. And in one who lacks this knowledge, an underlying tendency to ignorance as to neutral feelings comes to underlie his mind."

Let me talk about this a little. To me, this is the classic description of samsara—what keeps us spinning in this wheel of wanting and becoming. This deep tendency of immediately resisting the unpleasant, and the only way out, we think it's the way out, the only one we know, is to go look for something pleasant.

That's just the sense of samsara: always leaning a little bit forward, if not a lot, but a little bit forward to something a little bit better. The next good thing, the next good thing. Even so simple as: this thing I'm eating is good, so let me have the next one.

Just as Guy was saying, the Tibetan saying that samsara is the urge to correct—just get it a little bit better, a little bit better. That sense of always leaning into the next thing and confusing it, not really seeing the effect of that, which keeps us really quite narrow, looking forward, with a sense of incompleteness, a sense of insufficiency, a sense of needing something to make it okay. And the second it's here and okay, it doesn't last—we're needing the next thing, needing the next thing.

So we're always kind of leaning into that object, not seeing the whole process, not recognizing the sense of connectedness and vastness, but really under the influence of unrecognized greed and aversion and me, me, me. The mind becomes really narrow and focused, like tunnel vision. And we experience it in different ways—as alienation or neediness or a sense of what's wrong, always needing something more. And we often confuse this with happiness, with pleasure.

Have you ever noticed that sometimes just the wanting of something, we almost think it's pleasant? We confuse it. Oh, just the pleasant fantasy. Well, that thought's pleasant in the moment—just imagining how great it's going to be when you get whatever the heck it is. The orange at breakfast or the amazing new relationship or whatever it is.

Is it ever as good as you imagined? If it is, how long for? Really, pretty quick. So then the next thing, the next thing, the next thing.

And we start to see how in each moment—it can be emotions, it can be physical objects, it can be pleasant meditative experiences—there's always that sense when we get it of thinking, this is supposed to do it. Not understanding, of course, the impermanence or the fleetingness of vedana itself. We're looking at the object, thinking it's going to make me happy, when really the craving just goes away and there's a sense of ease, a sense of peace. And really what we're craving is pleasant vedana, pleasant feeling tone.

How quick is it? When we start to explore, just noticing pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, feeling tone is so fleeting and insubstantial—and we're running our life by it.

Ajahn Buddhadasa, who was a really wonderful Thai forest monk, teacher, and scholar, quite interesting—he said once, just explore pleasant feeling tone. Start to notice how it feels, and I'll talk a bit later about unpleasant too. Just notice how quick it is.

So try it in eating. Say you're eating an orange or something that you like, something that's pleasant. When you take a bite, we tend to notice the juiciness and all of that, but just notice, if you can, just the burst of pleasantness. How long does it last? You have to take another bite to get another burst, or eat another orange, or think a happy thought, or remember how the previous bite tasted so that thought is pleasant.

See how quick it is.

So Ajahn Buddhadasa says, as you start to notice how fleeting pleasant feeling tone is, you start to see—and he says this: think about all the decisions and choices you've made in your life. He says, I bet you'll see ninety-five percent of them were based on wanting more pleasant feeling tone.

So maybe that's exaggerated for us, you know, more awake beings. But look and see, not with judgment, with interest. With interest, see how this works.

We don't see the vastness, the non-separation. It keeps us looking, looking, looking. And another thing it does is we keep landing in each experience, whether it's emotional or something to eat, pleasant, unpleasant. And it's so—this is it. We take each one as so—I mean, it's real in that moment, but it's like we really die into it. This is going to make me happy. We're really there with it. And then when it goes away, we're distraught. We're so—oh no, this is really gone. And that's so complete. And then the next good thing—oh, finally, now it's good again, and now I can relax. And then another difficult one comes.

Some of you have mentioned in interviews how you're starting to see emotions just coming really quick and fast—beautiful ones, difficult ones, confusing ones, complicated ones—coming through, coming through. And you see, wow, when you really identify with each of them, how exhausting it is. And we're doing that in our life a lot of the time.

A place I like to watch—it amuses me—I kind of think of it as a metaphor for watching how samsara works, is if you watch friends who are really involved in watching a particular sport, a particular team. It's good to watch friends if you're not particularly involved, right? Easier to watch them.

So, for example, last year when the basketball team here, the Golden State team—those of you who are here know—it was like a big deal when I came out here in the spring during the playoffs. I've never in my life been anywhere out here where everyone, everyone I spoke with without exception, was completely caught up in the Golden State Warriors and where they get through and have the most wins or whatever, and then in the playoffs. And I mean, even people, friends of mine on staff here who to my knowledge had never looked at any kind of a sports game at all. They're like, "Gotta go, Carol, I gotta go watch the Warriors play." I almost fell off my chair. Really? You're gonna go watch the Warriors?

So one night I was out to dinner with a friend from Germany. We were driving home into San Rafael around 7:30 on a weekend evening. I was driving, and I said, "Jeez, it's like there's no cars on the road. It's weird. It's spooky. What's going on?" And Franz goes, "I bet there's a Golden State game on." And sure enough, when I went home and walked past the window of my friend, I could see in the TV—Golden State, two heads.

And if you watch people—something like basketball is fun because it's fast moving. So you're watching and you want a particular team, so that team scores a basket. Yay, yay, pleasant feeling, pleasant feeling, so excited! And then they're running around, and then the other team scores—oh no, unpleasant feeling, unpleasant feeling, oh, it's so bad. And it's changing every second, every two seconds. It's exhausting, but each one's really real. It's so true, you know? And it's like, halftime, "Oh my god, they're twenty points behind!" I said, "But it changes so fast. How can you worry now? There's another—you don't know what's going to happen in forty-five minutes. It's so fast."

It's fun to watch when you're not the one who cares. It's different when you're the one who cares. But to me, it's a great little metaphor for samsara.

And then, you know, finally, thank God, the game ends. And it's good if they won, but even if they lost, thank God it's over because it's exhausting. But how long do you get? If they won, great, you can be happy. For how long?

If you lost, you're sad. For how long? Because the next day, there's another game. You've got to get all revved up again. You've got to go watch it again. You've got to see where they are. So to me, this is like a little metaphor. It's exhausting, but we think we're having a really good time. We're choosing to do this.

But in our life, here we are. We can notice what we're choosing and what's really bringing us happiness. I'm not saying there's anything wrong with watching a basketball game—don't get me wrong. I'm just saying, watching what we really think is bringing happiness and ease, and seeing how it works. It's fun to see how it works in something that's not the most important thing in your life, because then we can really explore.

That's kind of what's great about this time we have on retreat. Now we're really in the heart of the retreat, well into the second week. And sure, stuff from your daily life is still coming up—it doesn't go away. But all of you, no matter what you think, you're quieter than you were when you came. You might notice, actually, as awareness strengthens and gets its momentum, that one might actually notice more thinking. You might notice more wanting arising, more aversion arising. You think, "I'm more of a mess than when I came." But it's really that awareness is noticing more and more subtle things.

People come in and say, "Oh my God, everywhere I look there's craving." And we go, "Great." And you probably think we're really twisted, but it's like, wonderful! You're really seeing what's going on—and not only you. That's a wonderful thing to explore in retreat. Here in the smaller things, start to see how it works. When there's pleasant or unpleasant, or when you notice you're all caught up in wanting or aversion.

And the question might come up: so what's wrong with wanting and aversion? Okay, we can see, if you really don't see it, you can do bad stuff. But if you're just sitting here minding your own business and feeling some wanting and aversion, and so what, you go have a cup of tea instead of doing your walking meditation—big whoop. We're not saying there's something wrong with what you did. That's again looking at the object. But we want to explore: what happens with vedanā? And when we don't see it going into wanting, aversion, delusion, why does the Buddha pick those out as being so not just problematic, but the roots of suffering, the roots of confusion?

This is just a quick aside: when they're not recognized in the mind, coloring and distorting perception, it's exactly this that gets in the way of recognizing accurately. And as I've said before, waking up, freedom from suffering, isn't about coming into another reality. It's about recognizing accurately—just what Mingyur Rinpoche was saying—what brings happiness and what brings suffering. Not our habitual ideas that more pleasant equals happiness. That's not real reliable happiness. But what really does.

And so when there's desire present in the mind—maybe you didn't notice the pleasant, but you're noticing desire—get interested in watching the effects of it. Notice what it does in the mind. It has a kind of narrowing, a tunnel vision. You can see how it really, from being kind of just present, calm with whatever's arising, suddenly the awareness snaps shut on the thing that's wanted.

My brother used to have a hound dog, the kind they breed for hunting, although this one was just living with him in his house in Atlanta. But because it's bred for hunting, it's a really sweet dog, yet the nose is so highly sensitized that he'd come into the house or go out in the backyard and all he could do was follow scents. His nose would just take him to any human, any animal scent. He had no control over it. He'd come in the house and go into my suitcase and pull out any dirty clothes because they had a human smell on them. He'd leave the clean clothes alone. You had to hide all the garbage. He'd just be pulled by the nose, by scent.

And I think of craving as like that. It just kind of pulls us by the nose. It's like, "I just want..." and we're off after it.

The story I often tell, but I think it's a good one, is when I was years ago at Yucca Valley in the high desert there in Southern California. I like it there very much, that high desert. We'd go walking out in it every morning. And I find there's just something very clear and bright in that dry desert air—the different Joshua trees and the birds and the little bunnies and the chipmunks—just being present with all of that and just walking, just being there.

So again, one morning doing that, and there are a few really large land tortoises there, but you don't see them very frequently. Normally I was walking in the desert and just present with that, just that exquisite awareness we have sometimes but we don't recognize. It's because there's no wanting going on, there's no aversion going on, there's just—you're just awake. But the thought comes up: "Maybe I'll see a tortoise." And that thought was grasped at: "Oh yeah, maybe a tortoise! I know where the beds are..." And immediately, what had been awake walking, inclusive, became: head for the tortoise, head for the tortoise. And everything else that came—not tortoise, not tortoise, not tortoise—just head for the tortoise, head for the tortoise, whether you see one or not. The experience, totally different.

And we think, "Oh, that's going to make me happy, seeing the tortoise." I was happy before I got into wanting to see it. And now I don't even remember if I saw it or not, because at some point I noticed what was happening to me. "Oh, look at that." And then the peace that comes back is when the wanting is just put down. It goes away. Ah.

So whether I saw the tortoise or not, I don't remember. But if you see it, it's like, "Ah, great. Saw the tortoise." The wanting's gone. There can be a wide sense of just presence with all that is in that moment, whatever arises.

That's why it's often said—I think Guy said this, a Buddhist said—wanting and aversion are makers of measurement. It kind of measures me and the thing that's wanted. "Me" immediately springs up when there's wanting or aversion.

Aversion works the same way. The mind shrinks back, really like a sudden reaction to the unpleasant. And in that shrinking back, almost we get just as caught up in the thing. Have you noticed?

Thich Nhat Hanh always gives the example of what it's like if you have one rough tooth. One tooth that just has a little chip in it. All your other teeth are fine. How much time does your tongue spend going to that little chip in the tooth? It's not like feeling all your other teeth and going, "Oh, these are fine, these are neutral." It's: rough tooth, unpleasant, rough tooth, unpleasant, rough tooth, unpleasant. Right?

Or if there's some sound going on that you find annoying, that you find unpleasant. We're not just noticing unpleasantness, that sound. And it's intermittent and not regular, right? So it happens. And then it's quiet. Then it happens again. And it happens, but it's not regular. Do you notice the time in between when the sound is not happening? The mind can be completely caught up with unpleasant expectation, waiting for that sound. We're like married to the unpleasant experience with aversion, the same as with pleasant.

And then delusion—well, for unpleasant, Ajahn Chah has a great line. He says it's as if we spend our life walking around tensed up like we're in the dentist's chair. Just trying to hold away anything unpleasant.

And delusion—first it's just not noticing what's going on, that's one aspect. But really the deeper delusion is that this all becomes about me. When there's craving, there's definitely me, it's about me. When there's aversion, it's about me. It all becomes the center focus of everything.

As someone was saying today, they noticed the sense of "me" came up in something, and they said, "Wow, I was just paying attention to it and I noticed—this is really unpleasant." Just kind of contraction and limiting and really, really unpleasant. That's interesting.

It wasn't aversion—just noticing.

So this is the most simple way to start exploring. Not to say, "Oh, wanting is bad, I'm going to stop wanting." Forget that. But get interested in exploring it. Get truly curious about it. Because as the Buddha said, until we start exploring it, we know of no other escape from unpleasant feeling except to lust after the pleasant.

Until we get interested enough to see what's really going on—with the pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral, with the lusting after the pleasant—until we see what's actually happening, we don't get it that this isn't making us happy. We just keep thinking, "The next one, the next one, the next one, the next basket, the next basket."

So our practice here is simply to bring attention to see, to explore craving and aversion, pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. Remember, the Buddha said that the ordinary person doesn't understand as it really is the arising and ending of these feelings. As I was saying, they're so quick when we start to see them, these feeling tones. And the ordinary person doesn't understand the gratification, the danger, and the escape.

The Buddha talks about this frequently, and I think this is another piece of brilliance—the gratification, danger, and escape in feeling tone, in the world in general.

He says that before he was awakened, he was exploring: What's the gratification in the world? What's the danger? What's the escape? He said there is gratification. Whatever pleasure and joy there is in the world—pleasant feeling tone, in a way—is gratification. We enjoy it. We get pleasure from it. And that's how it is. He's not saying bad or good. He's just saying, yes, this is a fact.

So when people say the Buddha's teaching is that everything is suffering, everything is unpleasant—he's not saying that. He's saying, for sure, there's gratification, there's pleasure and joy in the world. This is pleasant feeling tone.

What's the danger? The danger is that the world is impermanent. In terms of feeling tone, they're so quick, so fleeting. There's no way they give any kind of lasting gratification at all. Bound up with dissatisfaction and subject to change—this is the danger. If we're not seeing the feeling tone, if we're letting it drive our decisions, how we respond to life, it doesn't work. Because we're looking for something it can't give.

The escape is the abandoning of desire and lust for the world. This is the escape.

I want to say a few things about that. I've talked about the fleeting quality of vedanā, the confusion of thinking that going for the pleasant is making us happy. But when we really look at it, we can see that's not necessarily so. However, this "abandoning the lust for the world" is often confused—when we hear it but we don't experience it in a moment—it's often confused with thinking we should abandon the world. And that's not what the Buddha's saying.

When we abandon, just in a moment—like when I was describing the simple craving for a tortilla—when that drops away, there's peace. Not the peace of incredible gratification from getting what you want and the big jazz of that, but the peace of contentment. Just contentment. It's like this now. This is really a much deeper peace.

It's the escape from the lust in the world, but it's not escaping from the world. It doesn't mean there's no appreciation of beauty, of joy. These things are still happening. It's not like we want to abandon pleasant feeling tone. But what drops away in a moment is this lusting for it and this fear of the unpleasant—which has been driving the bus, running the show.

One of my favorite quotations from the Buddha is: "What is beautiful in the world remains so, but the wise one no longer craves after it."

Explore for yourself, just in little things here, a sense of that difference. A sense of the difference between appreciating and craving, this contentment.

It's not from an act of personal will. That's just more wanting. "Now I'm going to stop craving and really feel contentment with just this breath, no matter how it comes."

Contentment. Ease. These are out of our control—how we're going to feel. We don't know what feeling tone is going to come up. It's not an act of will. But notice in those moments, it's wisdom that recognizes, "Oh, this wanting, this seventeenth orange—maybe it's not going to do it." And you put it down.

So I'll tell a story like that. And let's just see it: simple moment-to-moment mindfulness.

From the Buddha in the Satipatthana Sutta, where he's talking about vedana, how to be mindful: "When feeling a pleasant feeling tone, one knows, 'I feel a pleasant feeling tone.'" That's it. You don't need anything more. "When feeling an unpleasant feeling tone, one knows, 'I feel an unpleasant feeling tone.'" Not "Oh my God, what can I do about it?" Simply: "I feel an unpleasant feeling tone. It's like this." "When feeling a neutral feeling tone, one knows, 'I feel a neutral feeling tone.'"

I know—we're like, "Okay, yeah, right, then what?" Try doing it. Just try doing it. And with steady attention, see what happens. The whole world opens up. And we can start to see how these patterns work.

I'll give this example. I think it was the first time I sat a three-month retreat at IMS, a long time ago. And this is a story of bad behavior on retreat that I am not recommending, okay? But I happened to have a car, and it was deep in November in Massachusetts, and I got this intense craving for cookies. I got in my car, went into the little town there, and bought a bag of chocolate chip cookies. It's not my usual thing. I took them back—I had a room by myself, which is sometimes unfortunate.

The going and the getting and coming back—I knew what I was doing, but that wasn't mindfulness. I was just being pulled by the nose of craving, with no understanding of what was happening. I went back to my room and sat down. But then I started eating the cookies. And I was being very mindful of eating them—picking one up, chewing, swallowing. Very mindful. Feeling how it goes down. Very mindful.

And I kept eating them. I don't usually tend to binge, but I ate a lot of those cookies. A lot. And I kept on being mindful. At some point I thought, "This is a lot of cookies, Carol." And I kept on being mindful.

Because I was mindful—and mindfulness doesn't have a hierarchy—I started to notice something. It was as if, following the cookie down, it would drop into my stomach, which was starting to feel less and less pleasant, I have to say. But I noticed in my heart area there was this real painful feeling that the cookies were dropping past. They weren't fixing that painful feeling, which I hadn't noticed before.

And then I realized: this is a really deeply unpleasant feeling of loneliness and sadness. Oh. And feeling it was like, "Oh, that's what's happening." This unpleasant feeling so often gives rise to not wanting to feel it, not even noticing it, gives rise to seeking pleasant feeling tone. And I hadn't even recognized that.

As soon as I saw it—"Oh, loneliness feels like this"—I didn't eat another cookie. I didn't eat another cookie.

I just put it down. Oh, loneliness feels like this. That was fine. That was completely fine.

So we can explore these processes and we can really trust the steadiness of awareness. You don't have to figure it all out by yourself. Simply have the willingness—if you notice wanting, let your attention feel how wanting feels. Generally, I find wanting unpleasant. We're used to doing something to get away from it because it's unpleasant, hence we get what we want. It doesn't feel natural to just hang out with wanting without acting on it. But explore that in little things. I promise you won't die from wanting. And I promise at some point it will go away. I don't know how long, I don't know how soon it might come back, but at some point it will go away.

So sometimes work with this in little things. You're walking and it comes up: "I've got to go have a cup of tea right now." Just explore the wanting. But if it gets stronger than the mindfulness and you go have the cup of tea, then still bring the mindfulness along and watch. Watch the whole process. It gets really interesting.

Another approach—if you've missed the feeling tone but you're already in action, which can be interesting, like me with those cookies—is to have an eye of mindfulness watching the little decisions you make throughout the day. It's fascinating to see what's motivating them. Often, not always, but often, a little decision like walking into the dining room and choosing where to sit can involve a quick sense of "oh no, unpleasant, I don't want to sit next to that person," so you go sit somewhere else. It happens so fast we don't even notice it.

Or you decide, "I want to have a cup of tea." You're in walking meditation and you notice the wanting. Stop a minute and feel what's going on. Maybe it's just wanting pleasure. But maybe there was a moment of boredom, neutral or unpleasant. Or maybe your foot hurts. Or maybe it was just "enough of this." Or maybe the rain—my God, I can't stand it—was just an unpleasant thought. Let me go inside and have some cozy tea.

Whether you drink the tea or not, that's not the point. Watching how this process works is fascinating. To see how frequently this habit pattern operates—immediately jumping back from some subtle unpleasant feeling, not even a big deal, and going toward pleasant—reveals how deeply ingrained this is. It's just habits of mind. And you don't have to try to forcibly stop it. Just bring the mindfulness along, bring the mindfulness along.

At some point, when wisdom sees clearly—like when wisdom saw, "Oh, that's loneliness"—I didn't have to tell myself to stop eating cookies. The whole thing just fell away. It wasn't necessary anymore. The craving stops making sense in the light of wisdom in that moment. It's not something you give up as an act of will. The aversion to unpleasant feeling stops making sense too. All that aversion does is bring us into more suffering. We start to see: pleasant feeling is like this, unpleasant feeling is like that, and we can really be with it.

This is how the Buddha describes the awakened one: "When a well-taught noble disciple is touched by a painful feeling, he does not worry or grieve or lament, beat his breast or weep, nor will they be distraught. They experience one kind of feeling, a bodily one, but not a second mental one." You're pierced by a dart, but you don't shoot yourself with the second one. "Having been touched by that unpleasant, painful feeling, they do not resist and resent it." So the underlying tendency of resistance against the unpleasant does not come to underlie the mind of someone who understands this.

"Under the impact of that painful feeling, she does not proceed to enjoy sensual happiness. And why not? Because a well-taught disciple knows of an escape, discerns an escape from painful feeling tone other than by enjoying sensual happiness." So the underlying tendency to lust for the pleasant does not arise. "She knows, according to facts, the arising and ending of these feelings." We just know it. Unpleasant feeling comes, it comes, it goes.

You don't need to do anything about it. Pleasant feeling comes, it goes. We don't need to do anything about it. Neutral feeling comes. We actually notice it's happening. We don't need to do anything about it. It comes and goes.

So when an experience carries a pleasant feeling tone, a painful feeling tone, or a neutral one, they feel it as someone who is not bound to it, who is not joined to it. "Such a one, O bhikkhus, is called a well-taught noble disciple who is not chained by birth, by old age, by death, sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief, and despair. Such a one is not chained to suffering. This I declare."

So the same things are happening, but we experience them as not chained to them.

I want to end with the conclusion of the Buddha's instructions on being mindful of feeling tone. First, simply recognizing pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral feeling tone. You might pick particular moments to explore this—don't go crazy looking for it every moment. Sometimes it's not the obvious thing; notice what's obvious. But sometimes when your mind is fairly calm and you explore, you can choose experiences where feeling tone is very apparent.

For example, if it's cold out and wet, and that carries an unpleasant feeling tone for you, you might simply experience it. You don't have to go stand in a downpour—I don't mean that. But just for a little while, feel the cold. And instead of lamenting and beating your breast, simply feel... unpleasant, unpleasant, unpleasant—just exploring the feeling tone. Then go inside where it's warm and dry and simply feel pleasant, pleasant—just exploring that. When nothing else big is going on.

So this is the Buddha: "Whatever feeling tone one feels, whether pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant, one abides contemplating impermanence in those vedanā. Contemplating, recognizing the fading away. Contemplating, recognizing the relinquishment, the not holding on, the simply letting it go." You don't put it away—it just goes. "Contemplating this, one does not cling to anything in this world. When one does not cling, one is not agitated. When one is not agitated, one personally realizes nibbāna."

Just from noticing such a simple thing, over and over.

CHAPTER 162

Courage of our Aspirations (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Carol Wilson · 58 min

> In this retreat talk, Carol Wilson addresses a challenge familiar to all serious practitioners: how to sustain energy and commitment when practice becomes difficult. Drawing from the Saṃyutta Nikāya's description of the Third Noble Truth—"that unshakable deliverance of the heart"—she explores how aspiration (Pāli: chanda) differs fundamentally from craving. While craving focuses on results and creates suffering, true aspiration opens us to possibility without attachment to outcome, providing energy for each moment's practice.
> Wilson shares the inspiring story of Jangchup Palmo, a Tibetan refugee who at age fifteen witnessed her family's death and spent years in caves around Mount Kailash practicing to develop genuine love and compassion—even toward the Chinese soldiers who had caused her such suffering. This real-life example illustrates that profound transformation is possible, though it requires sustained commitment over time. Wilson also references Ajahn Buddhadāsa's teaching that Nibbāna—the coolness of heart free from kilesa (defilements)—is available to everyone, not just monastics or ancient practitioners.
> The talk addresses common experiences of "hitting the wall" in intensive practice: when concentration fluctuates, when we see our patterns with painful clarity, or when glimpses of non-clinging reveal how radical true liberation actually is. Wilson encourages practitioners to find personal sources of inspiration—teachers, practitioners, or anyone whose qualities of goodness brighten our own hearts—as resources for renewing commitment when practice feels impossible.

What I wanted to talk about tonight is having the courage of our aspiration and how aspiration can really support us when things get difficult, should that happen.

Just noticing this point in the retreat—well into the middle—is a really interesting time. It's all interesting, but it's really like you're all cooking in different ways now. And we on the teaching side are really privileged. Some days it feels like a privilege to hear everything that's going on and see the wide variations.

The sense I get, always around this time of the retreat, is how much it varies for each person. There's a time when you might be feeling there's a lot of insight. You're really starting to see and understand things. Maybe there's a period where the sense of self isn't so strong, or the craving is really letting go, or you're getting a sense of what simple, quiet awareness is, or whatever it is. You think you're getting some understanding. It's going.

And then the next sitting or the next day, you're back in despair. The patterns of heart and mind seem to have come back. Not only did they come back, but stronger than ever and more gripping than ever. And you're more upset about it because secretly we thought it was over. Even if we didn't think it was over, at least we thought we were getting the retreat together. And now it's gone down the toilet again. And we say, okay, just be mindful. Keep going, keep going. And you walk out thinking, yeah, thanks a lot. Don't you guys have anything helpful to offer? You just keep going and the next time it's like, wow, so amazing, so beautiful. It can change from one step to the next, right?

So how do we keep ourselves renewing, refreshing, re-energizing, recommitting over and over again in the times where it feels like it's all gone awry or it's just like, oh no, one more time. I cannot open to this self-hatred one more time.

That's what I want to talk about—really the power, the courage of aspiration. In the last couple of years in my life, there have been many ways to support our keeping going, but tuning into and consciously contemplating my own particular aspiration has been something that has been really helpful and supportive to me, so I'm sharing that aspect.

Starting with a sense of what the Buddha was teaching and offering, really tuning into the vastness of the path and the fact that he's saying it's freely offered to everyone. You know the famous phrase, Ehi Passiko—you too come and see. That's something he said to everyone. Not "this is how it is, you have to believe it," but "this is what I've learned. Ehi Passiko, you too, come and see." All are invited. Not just monastics, even though the particular way we've been offering the teachings has come from—has been kept going 2,500 years through—the monastic tradition of nuns and monks in the Southeast Asian Buddhist countries. It's not just for monastics; it's for everyone.

And what he's saying really—I just want to read this because it inspires me—is that we not sell ourselves short with what's possible. This is the Buddha talking in the Saṃyutta Nikāya about the Third Noble Truth. I'm not reading the whole thing, but just part of this particular way of describing the Third Noble Truth:

And one who has considered all the contrasts of this earth and is no more disturbed by anything whatever in the world, the peaceful one, freed from rage, from sorrow and from longing, has passed beyond birth and decay. This I call neither arising, nor passing away, nor standing still, nor being born, nor dying. There is neither foothold, nor development, nor any basis. This is the end of suffering. Hence, the purpose of the holy life does not consist in acquiring alms or honor or fame, nor in gaining morality, concentration, or the eye of knowledge. That unshakable deliverance of the heart—that indeed is the object of the holy life. That is its essence. That is its goal.

I just love that. As aspiration, not as "this is where I am now," but aspiration as really—and that's just one way of expressing it, that's what the Buddha offers. I'm not saying that's what one's aspiration should be. It's unique to each of us. But the sense of his holding that out as possibility—to me, when I feel like I'm just spinning in my stuff, or I'm on retreat too, and there are times on retreat where you're putting one foot in front of the other and going, why? What has this got to do with anything?

And just reminding myself of that potential, of aspiration.

As Ajahn Buddhadasa said—we've mentioned him before—there's a talk well-known in English-speaking countries, a translation called "Nibbana for Everyone." This was in the 1980s or early 1990s, before he died. He was speaking to Thai laypeople and saying, you know, it's come to be believed that Nibbana, freedom, is either just for very rare monks and nuns, or something that only happened back in the old days. That it has nothing to do with people now—it was a nice idea but, you know, forget about it for us. And he's saying no, Nibbana is for everyone.

The short synopsis: Nibbana means "cool." He's saying it's that state of heart, of mind that's cool from the freedom, from the coolness of no kilesa at that moment. Just a moment—and sometimes even Sayadaw U Pandita would talk about momentary freedom. A moment where we just touch the sense of what's possible when there's that real, steady mindfulness and awareness without any clinging or aversion or me-me-me-ing. And we have moments of that, just moments where we get a glimpse. Buddhadasa called it a momentary sense of the coolness of heart and mind, free from kilesa, but with mindfulness and wisdom. He says we all have many moments of that because we couldn't survive without it.

The fire of the kilesas, the burning of clinging and wanting and aversion and the endless—seemingly endless, but it's not—me-me-me-ing. Have you noticed how exhausting that is? How sometimes it really does feel like a fire? And just the sense of ease, of peace, of coolness, really, when that's gone. The word comes from really hot countries where coolness is more a sense of peace. I know in Barre right now, in Massachusetts, you talk about coolness, it might not be the best simile. But the sense of ease—just noticing that, touching it, and thinking this is the potential for everyone.

So just to bring it into the realm of reminding us why the Buddha taught, why we all are continually inspired and motivated to spend our lives both practicing and sharing this—because it's such an incredible possibility for each one of our minds and hearts, and for the world.

This sense of aspiration—talking to someone today in German, Absicht, that's aspiration—not a one-time decision but a really incredibly supportive, onward-leading aspect of our path, of our whole spiritual practice, which is really the path of our whole life, not just about a meditation retreat.

So I'll say a bit about aspiration and the difference between aspiration and craving, desire. We can often get confused between those two, of course. Aspiration as a wholesome sense of our deepest motivation, our deepest, really deepest purpose—I'm talking now in terms of our life, in terms of our awakening heart and mind. From this aspect, it could be many things. But it's a wholesome factor. And one can feel when it's wholesome aspiration: it has a quality of uplifting our energy, supporting our energy. It brightens our heart, our mind. It gives a sense of ah.

So for me, when I read what I just read from the Buddha, if it tunes into aspiration, it's a sense of ah—inspiration. An in-breath, filling the body, filling the mind, the heart with life, with possibility. You can feel the wholesomeness. And it gives the faith, the confidence, the energy to do. Really, the energy to drop into the next moment with total commitment.

But how it can shift, of course, to greed, to wanting—and at times it will—it feels really completely different. Because the attention starts to get focused on the result. So maybe the aspiration is for complete awakening, and that can be really inspiring, uplifting, energizing, brightening. And then another time I could read this, but the mind, the heart is a little bit—or a lot—colored by greed or self-hatred, and not quite seeing it. It's like, well, that's just hopeless. That's impossible. How far am I from that? Really far. And then the comparing comes in, and the sense of looking—one eye on the goal, or both eyes away from here. And it feels different, way different. It can be frustrating. It can be demoralizing. Or you start making the checklist: How much more do I have to do? How far have I gotten? But it's not an inspiring, onward-leading state. It's a suffering, confused state.

You can flip back and forth. Gil Fronsdal has written a little about this, and I like the way he described it.

One way aspiration becomes craving is through expectation. "I've been meditating—how far along am I? Have I gotten there yet? Am I first stage yet?" We measure ourselves through expectation. But at its best, aspiration has an openness to possibility without a need for anything to happen. To me, this is the most succinct, beautiful explanation: an openness to possibility, to the vastness of possibility, without a need for anything to happen. This is the practice in a nutshell.

This does not mean that we do not act on our aspirations, but that we do not cling to the success, to the results. There is something wonderful in a healthy aspiration that is not dependent on outcome. This isn't something we can just own, but I'm saying it to drop into our hearts and minds. You get the sense of the difference—when the aspiration is alive and yet not dependent on outcome, it gives the energy, the determination to simply take the next step.

A sense of what's really true for each of us, our deepest aspiration, our motivation—I've found for myself, and talking and reading with many other people too, it's not so much something that comes through thinking about what it should be. As soon as there's a "should" in there, it's not really quite the thing. Whatever is a deep aspiration for you tends to arise in an intuitive kind of way. I feel it could come up in the heart, in the mind, often in the silence, in the stillness of heart, in a contented mind. That can happen on retreat, though it doesn't have to be on retreat. But not when we're in the midst of trying and wanting and comparing and doing—just when there's a stillness to get more in touch with ourselves. I'm sure many, if not all of you, are familiar with that.

And what it is for you could be whatever it is—to cultivate compassion, to completely awaken, to be a better person. There's no right or wrong about this. But taking the time from time to time, or just having it in the back of your mind, notice if and when something like that arises. And don't let your little personality trap you into thinking, "Oh no, that's not possible for me. Who do you think you are? This is an ego trip." When the vast, powerful depth of a deep aspiration arises, don't dismiss it.

Say, take what the Buddha says—this unshakable heart, this unshakable mind. Say that arises as an aspiration. I know in my mind the next thought could quite possibly be, "Yeah, right, fat chance." Or, "You think so? Who do you think you are? Maybe the Buddha." That's just the old habits talking. Blah, blah, blah—thank you very much. It's just thoughts arising. But the sense of the power, the depth, the beauty of whatever aspiration comes for you—I feel it's so uplifting, so onward-leading, and so important to honor that, really. To let it in. It's really beyond the personal, you know. It's the personal that thinks, "Oh no, it couldn't be possible." But that quality, whatever it is that comes up for you—just let it in. Let it sit there. And as best you can, simply honor it without putting it down, without going into personal stories.

Sometimes the aspiration can be inspired. For me, it sometimes came from reading the Buddha. But sometimes it comes from talking to someone else who's experiencing inspiration, or hearing about someone else. So I want to share a story of a woman, because this is actually what made me want to talk about this tonight.

Some days ago I was talking to a friend, a long-term meditator and practitioner. She has been involved for many years in what's called the Tibet Oral History Project, which interviews elderly Tibetan refugees, gathering whole stories of their lives. Some of them are available on the web. She had told me about this some years previously and had shared a particular story—she'd actually sent me the whole interview.

When we were talking the other day, she just kind of burst out again, remembering this woman she had interviewed: Jang Chup Palmo. The depth of her wisdom, the simplicity of her kindness and love and caring for everyone around her, the incredible suffering she'd been through and the practice in her life—it was so inspiring to my friend. And remember, my friend had met this person in person just a few years ago. This is a real, living person, which sometimes is so much more immediate. You might think, "Well, the Buddha, okay, but that was 2,600 years ago—maybe things have changed." But the profoundness, the depth of her wisdom, what she'd gone through, and here she is sitting there, this really loving, simple person caring for everyone.

She said, "That really inspired me. Why settle for less? Why settle for less?" You know, it's really possible.

So I'm going to share this story, because my friend inspired me—she who was inspired by this woman. It's a long story, so I'll just give you a brief synopsis.

Jangchup Palmo was born in Tibet in 1943 to a nomadic family, fairly well-to-do at that time. When she was about fifteen, after the Chinese had been in the country for a few years but when they started to really destroy the monasteries, she and her family and village were all trying to flee to India, as so many did. They got involved in a firefight with some of the Chinese army. Most of the relatives she was with—her parents and siblings—were killed. And she was shot; she had several bullet wounds in her legs and arms. She was fifteen at this time.

She was captured and taken—not really to a jail camp, but to a sort of house arrest. They took care of her and treated her wounds. But she was so determined; she wanted to escape so that she could practice the Dharma. Her family had been quite religious, quite involved with Buddhist practice, knowing many lamas, and she herself had been quite spiritual from a young age. She very much couldn't practice where she was, and she wanted to say prayers for her dead relatives and simply practice the Dharma.

After a couple of different attempts, finally when she was sixteen and had more or less healed from her leg wounds, she managed to escape with one other person. This is in Tibet, in the winter. They managed to escape and flee. It's a whole long story—I'm cutting this short. Through the winter, falling in icy ponds, not having any food, going over passes, encountering others who would support them. One woman took them to her house and completely gave them food for the journey and ways to carry it. Finally she and this other woman managed to escape. They traveled for one year—one year walking around Tibet with nothing, escaping from the Chinese.

They got to Mount Kailash. And when they arrived, she began really wanting to do practice. After a while, her friend said, "It's too much. I'm too cold, there's not enough food, I really can't stay." She said, "Of course, fine, go on your way." But she really wanted to stay at Mount Kailash and practice. Now she's sixteen, seventeen at this point.

So she starts doing full-length prostrations around Mount Kailash, going on and on, taking weeks and months—just storing a little tsampa and then doing prostrations, going back and getting the food. She's doing this, living in caves for some time, really trying to purify her heart and mind so she can say prayers for her dead relatives.

At this point, she met a couple of lamas who came—realized beings. They were talking to her, asking, "What are you doing?" She described her practice, how she was trying to practice to be enlightened and also to say prayers for her parents. She said, "I felt agonized by the thought that the Chinese had caused us suffering and killed without reason, yet I continued to practice."

The lama asked her, "How do you perceive the Chinese?"

She said, "Well, to be honest, I perceive the Chinese as enemies. They caused me so much harm, and I believe that they're enemies."

He said, "You are doing a great deal of practice, but you know it's necessary to have love and compassion. If you continue to perceive the Chinese as enemies, this does not conform with the Buddha Dharma. You really will never achieve complete enlightenment as long as that's how you are perceiving the Chinese." The lama told her, "If you practice this—love and compassion—the enemy will not be the enemy but like your relatives. If you can love the enemy without any degree of difference, if you can learn to feel no difference, this is what you need for practice."

She, of course, had great faith—she'd been brought up in great faith. So she really took it in and vowed to this Rinpoche, "Yes, I really will practice. I want to do this."

So she's staying now around Mount Kailash for years and years, practicing, just living in caves. There's nowhere else to live.

And she said, I put in tremendous effort to learn. I practiced again and again, really hard. I exercised the practice again and again, even while eating, and finally with the Lama's blessing, and doing pilgrimage and prostrations around the mountain, meditating, and putting in every effort I could, really focusing single-mindedly on this—this coming to love and compassion. I couldn't do it for almost two years.

So I'm thinking, only two years? She couldn't do it? It improved a bit. Then a little bit more. But the thought kept returning—the thought of the Chinese as enemies. So she kept practicing while at Mount Kailash.

And we think, you know—I think, I don't know what you think—but I think, okay, I've been doing metta for a couple of weeks, and I still don't quite love myself. She spent at least seven years there, practicing, practicing, practicing, with this sincere devotion, but also the honesty of seeing. So how do you find the energy? How do you find the determination? How do you find the inspiration to keep going? This is what inspires me.

She said, I lived at Mount Kailash for many years, practicing Dharma. There was no place to sleep except in caves. And so the interviewer is asking her—she'd been living in the States for many years at the point of this interview—and the interviewer says, after spending seven years, can you help us understand what did you come to understand from that? And she says, if one practices diligently, it certainly is possible to realize enlightenment and help sentient beings. And those two are like conjoined.

But this is what she's saying now, how she is now. The essence of practice: I treat everyone with love. When people appreciate it, there is joy all around. That's the result of practicing the Dharma. However, you may not be able to practice love and compassion as the Dharma teaches all at once. Just know a moment of peace, the possibility.

She says, I do my Dharma practice. I continue to do my Dharma practice that has brought me so much positive results. However, since I live in constant touch with human beings, these days I strive to bring happiness and peace to the people, try to alleviate their suffering and multiply their joy and do whatever I can to help people. That is my work.

That's what I teach people in ordinary words—to love your parents and your family and then spread out to your community and spread out to the country. And then she's really working on developing love and peace between countries. To speak in terms of the Dharma teachings, you must really practice for years and years, which is difficult.

This is a real person. I think she's passed away now, but I got the transmission from talking to my friend, and this kind of thing is like, oh, okay. This is possible. It's possible, and if the mind isn't covered with klesha at the moment, that sense of possibility, of potential—if that's what speaks to you—can really bring an energy of willingness. Not the grasping to be like her, but as she says, okay, years of practice. Can I just open into this moment as it is?

That's really how the aspiration can support us. Not in looking forward, but in really moment to moment mindful awareness—what's happening now—to meet it with fullness of attention, the kindness that comes with a compassionate awareness, and no expectation. Each moment is like an opening into the unknown. We have no idea what way each of our paths is going to take.

And even though I doubt most of us have the degree of physical suffering that she went through, we all have our own particular difficulties and sufferings and joys in our life. It's another kind of personality thing to say, well, my suffering isn't that much, so it's nothing, and push it away. Whatever suffering is occurring, that's the place where compassion and wisdom can land and grow.

So it's like opening into the unknown. I need the aspiration to give me the faith and the courage to keep doing that, moment after moment after moment. And as I said in the beginning of the talk, certainly for me, I think for most people on retreat—and I'm mostly talking about being on retreat here just because that's where we are—we keep on coming to places where it's difficult, no?

I call it, sometimes it feels like hitting the wall. You're going and going and going, and suddenly it's like, oh no. We hit the wall in so many different kinds of ways, and some walls are harder than others. Sometimes the wall is just a little bit of foam, and you just kind of bounce and can keep on going. Sometimes the wall is really solid brick, and you run into it at full speed, and it's like, whack. "I can't keep going, I'm out of here."

And it almost doesn't matter what the particular content is, although there are different contents. It's just that sense of being thrown back. How do I find the trust and the energy to just open again, land again in this moment?

Ajahn Sumedho gives this teaching—I think people have mentioned it—where he's talking about being in Thailand when he was practicing as a monk in the hot season, and it's really hot, and these little kutis, these little huts with a tin roof. Have you ever been under a tin roof when it's like a hundred and ten degrees out? Man, you cook. This is from personal experience. You cook. And he says he's sitting in there just sweating through his robes, just sweating through his robes. "I cannot bear this one more moment." Have you ever had that feeling—about whatever? He said, "And then I would find that I could."

I love that. I use that so often. "This is just unbearable." And then my mind would go, "Yeah, what's actually unbearable?" And that's not like a snide comment—it's a real inquiry: what's actually unbearable about this? And usually I find it's just that there was a moment of aversion, just saying I don't feel like being here anymore, basically. Then I found that I could.

So there are different ways we hit the wall. I just want to mention a couple of them. There are many more. Just maybe so you know you're not alone, although maybe nobody here will have experienced any of these, in which case I'm just revealing myself. But I tend to doubt that.

One way is simply how impermanence manifests in relation to either the technique of our practice or what's arising in the sitting and the walking—how impermanence manifests, and we don't see it as impermanence, as causes and conditioning changing. We take it personally. If you've ever noticed, when things are smooth, you're with the breath and it's quiet and subtle, it's pretty effortless, there's not much clinging, you think, "Yeah, this is now how it is. This is really how it is." And you go out to walk or you come to another sitting and the mind is just all over the place and there's nothing but thinking. And we think, "What did I do wrong?" Right? Isn't that what we think? "What did I do wrong?"

There's a sutta from the time of the Buddha I like a lot in this regard, with a monk called Asaji who had been really ill and probably on the verge of dying. But he had been practicing a long time and had strong practice, and so the Buddha came and was talking to him. Asaji was sick, afflicted, gravely ill. But he was very troubled. He's saying to the Buddha, "I'm very troubled by regret, by remorse." And the Buddha says, "Why? Have you done unskillful things? Have you done unwholesome things? Have you had bad virtue?" And he said, "No, not at all." So the Buddha said, "So what's bothering you, basically?"

And Asaji says, "Well, formerly, Venerable, when I was ill, I could keep on tranquilizing the bodily formations. I could calm the body with concentration, with samādhi. But now I cannot achieve concentration. I cannot calm the bodily formations with concentration. Now I think, oh no, let me not fall away." Oh no, I can't get concentrated anymore, I'm losing it. Does that sound familiar to anybody?

And the Buddha basically said, "Asaji, haven't I said over and over that the conditions coming together give rise to the results, and when the conditions change, the result will change?" Formally, you could attain concentration. He's basically saying—okay, this is my synopsis—"Asaji, you're gravely ill. You're dying. The conditions for concentration arising do not exist."

But in my teaching, concentration is not the essence. The essence is insight, the path and the fruit. He's actually saying, don't glom onto that and get all upset because the conditions have changed.

But I like this story because that's just what we do, you know? "Oh no, it's gone. It was all about this."

So that's one way. Just noticing that when things change, instead of taking it personally, notice how the conditions have changed. Oh, it's like this now. We need some inspiration, some trust, some faith sometimes to do that—not to get sucked into our personal story of "I blew it, I'm not good enough, what am I doing wrong?"

Another way this shows up is not just when things change, but when we're really seeing things clearly and it seems like so much that we feel, "I can't see this anymore." Often around this point in retreat, people start saying, "I'm seeing so much clinging—it feels like every single moment, what I see is clinging." Or another person will say that about aversion. Or someone will say it about conceit, or just the sense of self: "It's here all the time, every single moment."

And we'll say, "Oh yeah, great, that's great, you're seeing it." But it feels unbearable, right? "I can't bear to keep seeing this anymore." It doesn't even feel like insight anymore. It just wears us down.

Even though I always say it's true, it's not complete. We haven't quite seen it so clearly before, so when we start to see it clearly, it stands out—that's all we see. Sense of self arising about every single little thing. "Oh my God, I never saw it before." So it really stands out. It's true, but it isn't complete. It's a little bit magnified—or a lot magnified—because of what Sayadaw U Tejaniya said that I love: concentration magnifies experience. And the kilesas exaggerate.

Put those two together, and that's when we go wild with yogi mind, right? When something that's just a small thing becomes huge.

So something that's really an insight—seeing sense of self arising, or how much clinging there is, or how every little thing can seem like clinging—that's really useful insight, seeing how subtle and how frequently it arises. It's magnified through the stillness of some concentration. Even those of you who think you have no concentration—that's because you have some idea what it should look like. But there's some stillness, some steadiness in the mind. Otherwise you couldn't even sit here for forty-five minutes without going nuts.

So we're seeing it with concentration. But if there's a little bit of aversion or a little bit of selfing, that's the kilesa that magnifies it further. And that's when it's like, "Oh my God, I've hit the wall. I can't look at this one more time."

For me, that's when I can call up the aspiration. Okay, I don't know where it's going, but there's the trust to just drop in. Okay, I can't bear it. And then I found that I could. Just this moment—not the whole future, not the whole past—just this moment.

Or when we see our bad habits, our unpleasant habits of mind, and the patterns that have been difficult, and we're seeing them really clearly but with insight. We say, "Oh, I always get reactive in this situation, and I see how that's driven," and we really understand it. And we have this sense: maybe it's not going to happen so much anymore. Do we really have that hope? First it's a belief, then it's a hope. And then we see it not only happening—with awareness it's happening, so it's more painful. And then we act on it again, still, with awareness.

And we're thinking... do you know what I mean? You can watch yourself doing the unskillful thing, which is actually better than doing it without awareness. Even the Buddha said that. But it's more painful. That's why it's better.

Because... no. I know. That sounds sadistic. It's not. Really.

It's wisdom that abandons the unskillful patterns. It's not an act of personal will. But when we're acting in unskillful ways and the awareness is coming along, we go, "Oh wow. Eating that seventeenth orange, like I mentioned the other time—that actually isn't really bringing happiness. Maybe I don't need to do that." And that puts it down. Wisdom puts it down. But the wisdom has to kind of come along to see how the suffering is being created through the wanting and the aversion.

When we don't see that, that's again like hitting a wall. Not only are my patterns still here, they're worse. I'm more neurotic than when I started. And it's like, what's the point? That's another place where we hit the wall.

Just one other thing I want to mention. Sometimes when we're really opening into new insights, perceptions maybe we haven't had before, or not in the same depth—maybe really an intimation of what non-clinging, what the heart-mind of non-clinging could really be like in a moment. Or an intimation of really the sense of self, the sense of thing, just kind of not arising. You know how sometimes fear will come when there's that little sense of "oh, it could be possible." And that's okay. Fear just comes. That's nothing personal. It's just a habit. That's not what I'm calling hitting the wall.

But sometimes, at different times, you can get a sense of intimation. "Oh, non-clinging is really... the liberation of heart and mind through non-clinging is really radical." It's uncompromising. It's not, "I let go of clinging to anything except this one particular thing I still get to hang onto." It's not like we can abandon all the unpleasant experiences but still feel personally gratified by the pleasant ones.

I remember one retreat, I was suddenly realizing awareness really wasn't picking up the unpleasant—aversion wasn't coming—but the pleasant ones would come in and it was kind of like, "Oh, let's land in that one." That's still... you don't get to have it both ways, you know?

So sometimes there can be, at least for me, I've noticed an intimation: "Oh, so liberation means even that. I don't even get to hold on personally even to that, whatever it might be." And there can just be this little sense of "I don't know if I want to go there." And that's because it's some idea we have. We don't really know, but it's like, "Oh."

So I've noticed for myself, it's like a sense of wanting to go back to the pleasure garden. You know, the Buddha was brought up in all these pleasure gardens and everything, and he left and went on his quest. But sometimes we're out there and we think, "Oh, I just would like to go back, just for a little bit, to the pleasure garden." It's not like we're abandoning all pleasant experience, but the pleasure garden is that sense of feeling fulfilled by it.

Talking to someone today—and I feel that myself—sometimes I wish I could just go back to thinking, "Oh, if I could just go see that movie, it's really going to do it for me." And I'm going to still go see the movie, but we know it doesn't really do it for us.

So this kind of... Chögyam Trungpa called it "a nostalgia for samsara." Yeah, that's a great line, isn't it?

I've felt this sometimes in my practice, at different times, where there's a particular personality pattern or some way I've perceived myself that I wasn't even aware of. And it just becomes clear. It just comes up and it's so obvious, and something about it is just dissipating, going away. And there's a sense of a small death of some idea of myself that isn't even particularly pleasant, but it's comfortable. There's almost a sense of grief or mourning for the passing of some sense of myself—which is just an idea, because that sense of yourself doesn't really go very far. But you start to see through it. And so sometimes that's like, "Ah."

No more. But, you know, we never just stay in one place. You can notice when that's a funny kind of hitting the wall—okay, I think I'll stop for a while. I don't want to give that up. But that's just a momentary thought, an idea. As Buddhadasa says, Nibbana is for everyone. And it's demanding for all of us. It's challenging for all of us. We're all going to face, to meet many, many really difficult, confusing moments on our path of awakening.

And these are, in some ways, really important and valuable moments on our path. Because this is where we're really up against the belief systems we maybe don't know we have, or the areas we've gotten comfortable in but that are really keeping us in our little cage of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, our little cage of what we believe is possible for this personality, maybe without even realizing it. And it's not like we have to break the cage—we just have to see, oh, that's an idea. Bring in whatever inspires you. That's an idea of what's actually just happening now. The idea can hang around there, but just drop into what's happening now.

It's impossible not to come up against this. And our path is lifelong and all-inclusive. It includes not just being on retreat—everything in our life, all aspects of our life. Freedom from clinging is uncompromising. Really, there's no part left out.

And I believe that with our most sincere intentions and aspirations, and everything we read and talk about and hear from other people, our minds, our thinking minds, can't really imagine what that would be like. We can only imagine a kind of takeoff from what we already know. I know in my mind I want to know something ahead of time—peaceful, nice, we use all these pleasant words—but we don't really know. We don't know what to aim for. We want a sense of what awakening is going to be like, something I can compare to now that keeps me going, but the only thing I can say about awakening in words is really freedom of heart and mind, freedom of mind from non-clinging. Real awakening is not going to be some state that confirms us and makes us feel all comfortable and secure. It's not going to make us feel good, because it's the sense of us that gets seen through. But from the sense of me trying to understand, that's the only way we can think about it.

So along the way, at different times, we're really inspired, really energized. Beautiful things happen, really amazing insights. The heart develops, we're open, we feel love, we feel compassion, we see the change. And then at other times, we're really challenged. All of our views and assumptions—and the ones we don't even know we have—are going to get challenged. It can get to where I love it, usually, when all of a sudden I think I'm really ill at ease and then go, oh, that's how I thought things were. That's the view in the background that is running the show right now. Oh, great. Great to see that. It's not how it is.

So to me, this is really why we need to keep finding, in each of our own ways, the energy, the commitment, the determination, the aspiration to just keep putting one foot in front of the other. One moment, one moment, opening to what is without needing to know what it's going to be like, where it's going to go, how our life is going to unfold.

In terms of aspiration, I want to offer this: find for yourself not only what aspiration comes up for you, but explore—and probably you already know for yourself—what helps you in the times of difficulty, or when it's just dry, or when you've lost touch with that inspiration. Find ways to reconnect with what keeps you going.

For me, one of the reasons I read the story about the Tibetan woman is because it really gets me back in touch with inspiration, with aspiration. And for me, calling to heart, to mind, various people, beings that I know—they don't have to be completely awakened, but they may manifest different aspects of beautiful qualities that brighten the heart and mind. And the way it works is that aspect of that person wakes up that same aspect in our own heart and mind. Finding that connection, different people—like I thought today of this monk I know in Burma. I've known him for about fifteen years. He's just a very simple, peaceful guy, U Jayanta, very mettā-filled. And he's just looked the same for fifteen years.

I don't know, he doesn't look a day older. We go to visit him every year when we're there, and he's just simple and friendly. You feel metta and peace in his very simple monastery up in the Sagaing Hills. I have a picture of him. He doesn't say much—it's not like you get this deep wisdom—but you get metta and peace and love. It's just who he is. I get chills when I think about him. And that's because if I couldn't access that in my own heart-mind stream, it wouldn't inspire me. So when you think of other people that bring whatever aspect alive in you, realize that it's coming alive in you.

I know lots of different nuns in Burma because I go there every year. There are many, many women in Burma who are nuns. And it's not that they're all really super awakened. Being a nun has been one of the not-so-many avenues, especially in the past though it's changing a little now, for women who weren't married or didn't have kids to live a safe and healthy life. And many of the nuns also take in poor orphan girls, or girls whose parents or the monk in their home village have asked the nuns to take because they're very poor, or they only have one parent, or they can't really get an education where they live and the nuns can help them go to school. So a lot of the nunneries function as a kind of safety net for poor young girls.

These nuns—I can think of a lot of them, but I'll just tell you about one. Many of them don't all do what we think of as intensive meditation practice, although some have that deep aspiration. But what many of the nuns do as their practice is Buddhānussati, recollecting the qualities of the Buddha. They do this with chanting and contemplation, every day, every day. And you can feel it brings them really deep faith, a deep kind of inspiration that shines out of them and gives them the energy to do what is often quite a hard life, quite a demanding life.

One nun became a nun when she was sick in her twenties and almost dying. Her parents were about to sell their last things, give their last money to support her and get doctors. And she said, "Forget it, I'm going to become a nun instead, so you don't have to give up your whole farm." She became a nun and she had so much faith that it healed her. This was about not quite twenty years ago. It healed her, and then her sister also became a nun. They came to Rangoon, really excited to become deep meditation nuns. They went to a meditation center, and this is really what they wanted to do.

Then there was a big cyclone in their home village down in the Delta, and the Sayadaw, the head monk of the village, sent them maybe ten or fifteen young girls to take care of. This is very common. So they had to do a complete 180-degree turn. This is Daw Uttara, that's her name. A 180-degree turn—they left the meditation monastery, found some little piece of land that they had to raise money to buy, built a little shacky bamboo hut, and started taking care of these little girls. The girls become nuns, and they all live on donations, alms food, money for their clothes. They're completely dedicated to taking care of these little girls.

So this is a twenty-year project. Their lives just turned around completely. They're totally doing it with complete love and tenderness. I've visited them every year for about the last nine years, and you can see the little girls growing. New ones come, of course—it never really ends. But the tenderness, the care, the love, the friendliness—it's not like, "Oh, we've got to do this and then we're going to go meditate." This is now their practice. And the faith and love just shines out.

They still say, "When the girls are grown, if they don't want to stay nuns, great. But we've given them a grounding in morality, in how to live a good life." They help them go to school, and the schools, by the way, are run by other nuns who have devoted their whole lives to starting these schools, because a lot of poor kids can't afford the government school fees. And so they're helping these kids with all the love in their heart, and this is their dharma practice. They still say, "And then when the girls are gone, we'll go back and do our meditation."

So I think of Daw Uttara. She really inspires me too, with this sense of deep faith, and that you turn around and what life presents you becomes the practice of compassion and awakening.

So that's one way. Find in your own life, maybe a picture, someone you know. I was just talking to James, and he says he gets all teary about Audrey Hepburn. She really inspires him. It could be anybody who has particular qualities of goodness that come out for you. This is just who I happen to know that brings it out for me. It doesn't have to be Buddhist, it doesn't have to be holy—it's just whatever brings out these qualities and you can feel it touches your energy, your aspiration.

So find your own inspiration.

Thank you very much. Let's just sit quietly for a moment.

That unshakable deliverance of the heart—that indeed is the essence of the holy life.

CHAPTER 163

Investigating Dosa with Wisdom

Carol Wilson · 1h03

> In this retreat talk from Spirit Rock, Carol Wilson offers a comprehensive exploration of dosa—the Pāli term for aversion, hatred, and ill will—as one of the three unwholesome roots (akusala-mūla) that cause suffering. Drawing from decades of personal practice and teaching, she examines the wide spectrum of mental states that share dosa's essential quality of pulling away from experience: from obvious states like anger and rage to subtler manifestations such as boredom, disappointment, self-judgment, and fear.
> Wilson explains how dosa functions through the process of paṭicca samuppāda (dependent origination): when unpleasant feeling (vedanā) arises at a sense door and goes unrecognized, the mind reflexively pulls back, creating a gap where proliferation (papañca) floods in with stories, memories, and reactive patterns. She emphasizes that this pulling away distorts perception—we literally cannot see clearly when ill will is present, as the Buddha taught. The talk offers practical approaches for working with dosa through satipaññā (mindfulness-wisdom), including meeting experience directly at the sense door, recognizing when awareness needs refreshing rather than forcing attention on overwhelming states, and understanding that each moment of tender awareness without reactivity is itself the cultivation of compassion.
> Particularly valuable is Wilson's discussion of self-judgment as a form of dosa, often arising from unexamined views of perfectionism, and her teaching that compassion naturally emerges from being willing to meet our own suffering honestly. She concludes with a moving story illustrating how facing our fears transforms into genuine connection with others' pain.

So what Sally was so subtly alluding to is what I'm going to talk about tonight: exploring the three unwholesome roots that the Buddha speaks of all the time—really the cause of our suffering in our minds and hearts on a moment-to-moment basis. Tonight I want to offer some thoughts about exploring one of them: dosa. You know, that moment when you want to throw something against the wall—that's the moment of dosa.

I really want to talk about it in terms of inviting us to explore how this root arises and functions in our moment-to-moment experience. I'm going to be speaking mostly from a being-in-retreat point of view, because retreat gives us, as we know, the stillness and opportunity to explore sometimes on a less complex level how this root—how everything—functions in our mind. This talk is by no means comprehensive because there's so much to say, but I wanted to share different aspects from a lifelong exploration of this particular root in this particular mind-body system.

Dosa is often translated as hatred, and we often talk about it as aversion, but it has a whole wide range of different moods or mental states that partake of its particular function. I made a list of some of them, just so you can start to feel the common flavor: hatred, aversion, ill will, irritation, boredom, frustration, disappointment, impatience, denial, resistance, self-judgment, grief, despair, sorrow, depression, guilt, shame, anger, rage, aggression, regret, hostility, cruelty, fear, anxiety, terror.

Feeling better now?

You see, some are really very intense emotional states that, when we're not aware of them or when they're stronger than our mindfulness, can lead into unwholesome speech and action that bring harm to ourselves and others. Obviously, this is suffering. Some are perhaps more subtle but pervasive—like background states of heart and mind that we may not quite recognize are present, but they're still having the effect of coloring and distorting our perception. The suffering aspect of dosa is rooted in the fact that when it's present, we don't perceive ourselves, others, or reality accurately. I talked about this in the very beginning with Right View. Once perception is inaccurate, it gets fed by more dosa-thoughts, and we get farther and farther from what's really true. Our actions and speech can cause ourselves and others more harm, more suffering.

I want to talk about dosa tonight not to say that aversion and all these things are bad and we should get over them now—that we have to purify our mind and these states are bad, so stop it. That's just meeting dosa with more dosa. It doesn't work. This is really an invitation, with a wise attitude of interest, to not take it personally but to truly explore how these particular mental states act in the mind. How do they create more suffering in our own experience and for others?

This interest becomes possible in the moments when we recognize that dosa is a conditioned habit, a human experience—not just me being a bad person. The other side of being a bad person is really reveling in the anger or self-righteousness, thinking, "Yes, this is the right thing." I'll talk a little bit about that too. But really seeing this as just part of the human condition is essential.

In most cases, dosa and aversion are more obviously suffering states to us than greed or delusion. We tend to notice them more quickly. And when we're acting from them, we tend to get more feedback from other people—they don't like us so much. That feedback can further feed the dosa if it's going into self-judgment. Even though dosa may be more obviously a suffering state than greed or delusion until we explore them, that doesn't make it easier to understand. So just to have this interest to explore and not take it personally—that's so huge.

I remember for myself, quite some years ago now, having an aversive tendency doesn't mean you go around being angry all the time. As I mentioned when discussing the brahma viharas, there can be a habit of mind that just tends to notice the unpleasant first. That's simply the habit. Another habit might notice pleasant first, and another doesn't really notice much of anything—greed, hatred, delusion, as tendencies.

I had been branded while on staff at IMS as "clearly the aversive type," to which my first response was, "I don't like that." Then we'd just joke about it: "Yeah, Carol's the aversive type, Joseph's the greed type, Sharon's the deluded type." Because it's true—people tend to respond differently to these. No one goes around to Joseph saying, "Oh, you're so greedy." I just have to look cross-eyed and people say, "Oh yeah, you're such an aversive type."

But I didn't realize that when little aversion would come up in my mind, there was a kind of subtle sense of not quite wanting to see it—taking it more personally than other experiences that arise. I remember one time I was with a particular teacher, not even a Buddhist teacher, and everything was just arising in the space of awareness, to use the language we're using here. Whatever was coming, no problem. Then a really aversive thought came up. And I saw in that moment that it just came and went like everything else—because it was just another thought.

Wow.

Aversion is just another arising mental state, just like anything else. And I had been really identifying with it, making it more of a thing, which actually prevents clear seeing. So that was a really freeing moment. I'm just offering that in terms of the space we can bring to explore this, or anything else that's difficult in our experience.

So the first thing I want to say, talking about the moment-to-moment level that we can at times explore here—and it may seem very subtle and precise, but it's still the same way our heart and mind functions in more complex situations in our daily life—is what's going on in a moment of dosa.

The whole dependent origination: there's contact, feeling, unpleasant feeling arises, and as we've talked about, the habit of mind really is the dosa of unpleasant. The habit is to go into dosa if we don't see it clearly—aversion or fear, just to say it that way, with all the ramifications.

How that functions is: in a moment there's unpleasant, whatever the sense contact is, and the dosa just pulls back, just doesn't want to connect in a way. I'm personifying it, but it's like, "This is unpleasant," and there's just a pulling back, like a knee-jerk reaction. So there's a disconnect in that moment. The attention, the awareness, just isn't really landing wholly in whatever the experience is. It could just be an unpleasant sound—it doesn't have to be anything dramatic. It just pulls back.

And in that response of pulling back, first, whatever is occurring that's unpleasant—that pulling back of dosa is occurring in response to a sense contact that's happening right now. Right now. So even if there's a thought, a really painful memory of ten years ago, and it shoots into all the memories and it's really painful—it's shame or it's fear or whatever—because of the pulling back and the not recognizing accurately, the awareness may not actually recognize that it's something occurring now that's unpleasant, that's giving rise to that dosa reaction.

We go off, because there's that gap. This is the gap between dosa and becoming. But it's not the gap that's freeing—it's the gap of delusion, the gap of disconnect. And in that comes flooding, because the mind is so fast: thoughts and memories and emotions and reactions and a whole story, so quick that we may not even be able to find our way back to what's the sense contact that triggered it.

But even if, say, shame—just pick shame, that's a huge one, really difficult to land in and feel—even with all the stories, the memory is a thought that's occurring now. The shame that's being felt is a physical, mental experience that's occurring now. The content may be about the past and about our whole life, or it may be about the future. Fear projects into the future: "It's going to feel like this forever, I'm going to keep acting like this forever." And you see how we're in the story in no time.

We may be aware that it's shame, that it's fear, but because the tendency is to jump away from the contact, it may be that without steady sati-pañña, mindfulness and wisdom, we may not recognize: "Oh, this memory is a thought arising now." And mindfulness can just meet that thought arising now. This shame is a feeling arising now. Sometimes if mindfulness is balanced enough, we can meet that thought arising now.

I don't know if this seems simplistic or unworkable, but to me this has been incredibly freeing and useful. Because when I get all involved in my daily life in some really suffering dynamic, and I'm trying to figure it out and think it through, I go, "What's happening now?" I just relax into the present moment, not looking for an intellectual answer. What's happening now? And I may just feel something in the pit of my stomach.

Couldn't even name what it is. You don't need to. It's difficult, unpleasant, whatever. Mindfulness just can be with that for that moment. And then it moves into whatever happens next.

So this is where we cut through all the papañca to see: whatever it is, it's being triggered by something occurring now, because that's all there is. Past and future are thoughts. But it really is amazing when we can watch how quickly everything can flow into that little quick gap of pulling away.

A simple example—I'm making this up. There's some unpleasant sound. You're sitting in the hall and there's some sound from a person, and it's unpleasant. You don't quite notice "hearing, unpleasant." The mind immediately does that pulling away when we don't quite notice it.

And that reminds me of my father. Maybe that's not even clear—there's just a feeling of my father. He used to do that. I remember all the times he used to do that. And it was unpleasant, and we'd get in these arguments, and he didn't respect me, and nobody respects me. And in two seconds, it's down the road—not recognizing sati right at that sense door. Maybe I'm aware of the story, but maybe I'm not quite in touch with the resentment or the aversion that's fueling each new thought and each new memory. I'm not quite present with each thought and memory. And pretty soon it's amazing how fast the mind moves. We're in a whole storm of resentment and all the times that I wasn't respected, back through my life.

Sometimes we can bring mindfulness to that and actually it unwraps a whole—it allows to arise a whole personal insight into habits that have developed in our life, and we really see it in a purifying kind of way. You all know what I mean. But that feels different, because at some point your attention lands in the middle of that process and you're no longer fighting it. You just go, "Oh, wow, no wonder I feel disrespected. That's how it all worked. That's how it is." We don't spin on it anymore. We're just seeing how it is.

But when we don't recognize, we can get into a whole cycle of judgment or fear. Sayadaw U Pandita used to call it like we're a cow chewing the cud. We get all upset about something—that sound, my father, the past—and then it passes. And then we think, "Yeah, that sound, that really bugged me. And that's because..." It's like we regurgitate the cud and chew it some more. Let's just chew over that unpleasant thought one more time. Some of you have mentioned noticing how the mind does this when things get calm. Nothing's happening now, so let's just call up that unpleasant experience that happened and really think about it some more. That's when you know—the Buddha said puthujjanas, the unenlightened worldlings, are mad. We're crazy. As Buddhadasa says, who wants to volunteer for suffering? "Me! Things are calm. Let's get all activated."

We don't always do it a lot. It's just that we pull away.

One of the significant things about when dosa is coloring and distorting the citta is that we don't recognize accurately what is occurring. This is really one of the biggest suffering aspects of it. The Buddha says a similar thing about greed and about delusion too. I'm just reading the one about dosa: "Again, Brahman, when one dwells with a mind—which is citta, mind-heart—obsessed and oppressed by ill will, by dosa, one does not understand as it really is the escape from arisen ill will, arisen dosa. On that occasion, one neither knows nor sees as it really is one's own good, or the good of others, or the good of both."

I have taken this so much to heart—to really just notice. Whether there's greed or dosa or confusion, as soon as you can even notice it's tinging the perception—maybe it's huge, you know you're in total rage. That's not rocket science. You can tell rage is going on. You may not be mindful, but you can tell rage is going on. Or it may be more subtle disappointment. But as soon as you keep recognizing that this quality is present in the citta, in the heart-mind right now, and you can tell you're not really quite able to be mindful of it, that it's distorting things, then you know: you can't really trust whatever assessment or evaluation thoughts are making then.

You just can't trust it. Is it right? Is it wrong? You can't trust it because the perception is distorted by risen ill will, by risen greed. As the Buddha says, you just can't see your own good or the good of another or of both.

And even more, you can see sometimes how dosa in the mind really distorts the actual perception. It's not uncommon when you're really in a negative mood, or really particularly angry at a person, and you look at that person—they look more ugly. You know what I mean? Or you look at yourself and you look more ugly. When there's that pulling away, the dosa coming in, every time the sound comes it's louder and louder, more and more obnoxious.

I'd forgotten this, but once I was on a long retreat at IMS and the radiators there in the winter would make these pinging sounds. They'd been doing that forever. I'd lived there for years. This was not new information or a new experience. But one day—one of those days when you kind of know there's dosa in the mind but not quite, when suddenly your body hurts, everything hurts, nothing works, the pillow's too hard although it's been fine for three weeks, the people next to you are disgusting even though you loved them yesterday, the food is repulsive—and it takes a while to notice that maybe there's a lens going on here. It really takes a while.

So this was a day like that. And then the radiator sounds literally started to sound like little explosions. A little explosion and I'd jump, and there'd be so much negative, unpleasant feeling radiating out of that. And then the next radiator sound would be even more of an explosion. It just builds and builds when we're not aware. You might have a sort of mindfulness—you kind of know it's there—but there's still this pulling away, which can manifest as blame, aggression, or it can manifest as fear, which is like retreating dosa, retreating aversion. But it can literally distort perception, and then that will distort our judgment.

The only escape we know is to escape from unpleasant feeling by getting the hell out of there. If the best you can do is have a pleasant fantasy, you'll do that. But if there's something else available, you'll get out of there—or do whatever you can to avoid the unpleasant feeling that's giving rise to dosa. And because we're not seeing the dosa, we can't see clearly.

A friend of mine told me a story from her daily life a few years ago. She was in Massachusetts and was just beginning to teach Dharma some weekends. A very close friend she didn't see often invited her to come teach a weekend quite a few states away. The fact was that my friend was really busy, and to drive down to this state and teach this weekend would have been very difficult and exhausting. She really didn't want to do it. But the thought of saying no to her friend and imagining her friend being hurt or angry—that thought was so unpleasant that she didn't even want to go there. So the thought would come, she'd move away from it, and she was making all these plans to do this crazy weekend because she didn't want to feel the unpleasant feeling that came when she had the thought: what if my friend's upset?

She went through quite a long time of not being able to actually call her friend and say, "You know what, I can't do this." And then she saw: this is crazy. Look at everything I'm trying to do to avoid feeling this unpleasant feeling of hurting my friend. And I don't even know if that's even the truth—it's just a thought occurring now that I don't want to feel. Can you relate to that? So she finally called her friend, who was of course totally fine. It was no problem. If we just tell the truth in the first place.

So that kind of thing—maybe you've noticed this. I see it all the time in my life and talking to many of you, sometimes on retreat. Things have been going fine, whatever that means to you, or good, or calm—in quotes, whatever that is for you. And then, as one yogi used to come and say to me all the time, "It's all gone to hell in a handbasket." And I used to say, "What does that mean?" I get the drift, but anyway. You come in and say, "It's all over, it's gone."

What's happening is that all of a sudden there are lots of thoughts going on, or you're in a lot of self-judgment, or there are dosa-laden thoughts happening. All different patterns, and you really feel caught and spinning. It's what I call in my own experience "the crazy place." There's a certain intensity to all the different things that are coming up, but it feels disconnected. There's this sense of why is all this happening, and what really is going on?

And then, after some time, I recognize that certain kind of crazed intensity—all these unpleasant, really difficult patterns coming up, whether avoidance or thinking about past things or anger at someone. But it doesn't quite hold together in some sensible way. And then I'll say, okay, what's happening now? Just feel my body. And I'll say, oh.

loneliness feels like that, or I really feel hurt, or whatever it happens to be. And it's a particular pattern, emotion, feeling—one of the ones that in the conditioning of my life I've either been afraid to feel, or conditioned myself not to feel, or it's just too unpleasant, or whatever. I have the habit of being afraid to feel it.

This is all unconscious. I'm not saying, "Oh, here's shame. I'm afraid to feel it. Let me go make up a bunch of stupid stories." You just don't know what's happening. You land in it. Just touch it with mindful awareness—oh, it's like this. And I always know that awareness has touched what's happening because all the hoo-ha, all the papañca, just for that moment dies away. And there's a sense of relief. It's like, "Oh, yeah. Really unpleasant. It feels like this."

And so I see it's that same habit of the mind doing all this stuff not to feel a particular really painful feeling that I've been in the habit of not being able or wanting to touch. As I say, this isn't something you can force. There can be many good reasons in our lives—past trauma and such—where you don't force your way in. I'll talk a little bit about that. But I'm just talking about the process now.

So even just recognizing this process is going on, or that there's something happening and you don't know what it is—maybe you can touch it, you don't have to stay there—but just to see: when dosa is in operation and we don't see it, and we're pulled away from experience, it just keeps feeding on itself and complicating and complexifying, and we're the one who's suffering.

The Buddha said, in talking about how aversion, how ill will arises in the mind—this is in terms of the hindrances—that it arises from unwise attention to the unpleasant aspect, the repugnant aspect of an unpleasant situation.

The example that Thich Nhat Hanh always gives, which I find easy to relate to: if you have one tooth with a little chip in it, it doesn't actually hurt. All the rest of your teeth are fine, but you have one tooth with a little chip. Do you notice how often your tongue goes to that little chip? You're sitting there—you're not usually running your tongue over your teeth while sitting—but in this case? And a little bit of aversion, a little bit of aversion. "Yeah, that's really bad. I've got to go to the dentist. Why did my tooth chip? My body's crapping out. I'm getting old. It's all over." Just unwise attention to the repugnance of an unpleasant thing. So simple. And it can go so far, so fast. So just noticing that.

I want to mention the particular dosa experience of self-judgment, which one or two of you might have experienced during this retreat. It very much grows and builds in the same way. The reason it's a condition in your particular mind-body system—we can all look in our past and see the reasons why the particular habits are there. I find they may come up on retreat, but are in therapy to explore. It can be useful. For me, once I've seen why a pattern's there, it really helps my mind not take it personally anymore. I don't have to go back to my mother and my father and my upbringing. "Yeah, right, I understand why that's there." These conditions come, it's unpleasant. Without awareness, this habit comes. It's impersonal.

So for whatever reason in each of your minds that there may be this habit of self-judgment, recognize it's basically an expression of dosa—a pulling away from, a rejecting of, either not wanting to see the particular experience that's arising, the particular sense contact. One of those six, as I think Sally said—that's all that's happening. And really, on a very radical level, even when it's extremely intense, and sometimes we can't see what's really happening—we can't, that's not in our control sometimes—but on the radical level, all this going on, total self-hatred, and I look and what's happening? Well, it started with a pain in my toe.

This is a real story. It started with a pain in my toe that went unrecognized as I was walking. Each step brought a little pain—not even a big pain—but unrecognized. The mind didn't want to see it. It went into more negativity, more dosa. And that took the form of self-judgment: "Well, you're not doing it right now. You're in aversion."

Self-judgment is almost always arising from a dissatisfaction with whatever the particular experience is that's happening now. It's similar to doubt. When things are going well, are you racked with self-judgment? Unless craving comes up and then you can find a way to rack yourself: "Well, but now there's craving, I blew it," right? But usually self-judgment comes as a reaction of dosa to some particular thing that's occurring.

It's often in response to a view—that's a whole other talk, but we've mentioned views. The view is "it's supposed to be like this and not like that." The view, in talking about dosa, is that we're here to really purify our heart-mind. Dosa arising is a suffering aspect, causes suffering to me and others, therefore it's bad, I'm wrong. I've been practicing all this time and dosa is still arising—I'm hopeless. It shouldn't be. And all the views, right? Have you noticed that happening at all?

When the view comes and our experience doesn't match it, there's an unpleasant feeling, a pulling away, and then it can totally feed into self-judgment. And because each self-judging thought is unpleasant in itself, the experience of self-hatred is very unpleasant. Again, because dosa is functioning, the mindfulness isn't landing on the experience and it just keeps spinning out, spinning out, spinning out.

There's one last thing about self-judgment. Notice what can often feed believing in self-judgment: an unseen view of perfectionism, basically. That somehow things are supposed to be perfect. We think, "Well, no, I know things aren't supposed to be perfect." But look and see in your mind. We think, "Well, no craving should arise. I've understood now that craving brings suffering and I'm going to let it go." We expect—you know—that's how it should be. When we talk about open awareness and noticing things come and go, people think it should all be neat and tidy.

But it's chaotic. It's chaotic. "What am I doing wrong? It's supposed to just be come and go, come and go, nice, nice, nice. But it's not. Things are all coming and going. I don't see the beginning and the middle and the end. It's not like—how can I see the beginning and the middle and the end? It doesn't stay there. Something else comes. What am I doing wrong?" And then we go off into self-judgment. So just check it out. That's just a little side hint.

So our practice of mindfulness-wisdom, sati-pañña. Just a few little hints—this is by no means comprehensive—of how we can use sati-pañña to begin noticing how to be with the various forms of dosa, and also how to work with wisdom and compassion when the intensity of the dosa is stronger than the energy and the mindfulness, and we actually need to balance the attention by doing something else. That's not the same as running away, the knee-jerk avoidance of dosa.

The Buddha, as always, taught the middle path. And I think—again, this is very simple sketching—the two most common responses to really strong, unpleasant dosa states, whether anger or hatred or fear or whatever we notice, are these: One is that it comes up and there's the self-judging. It's obvious suffering, we don't like it, others don't like it, it shouldn't be here. And so the tendency is to disconnect, to avoid it, to repress it, to not even quite let it up into consciousness.

And sometimes we sort of—you know how denial works—you kind of know you're doing it, but then you don't. But sometimes we really don't even know. It's way below the level of consciousness. This is when sometimes on retreat a really strong pattern—I'll pick shame again—comes up that we really hadn't consciously felt, because the system in our mind of keeping it out of sight, out of mind, has really been very stringently cultivated over our life.

So that's one—we think it's a mistake when it comes up. And then the other side, the flip side—the Buddha says neither of these—is to really completely, fully embrace anger, rage, aggression, fear, whatever it is that comes up. And as you know, anger particularly is very energizing. So the energy comes, and we think, "Well, I can't just push this energy down. I've got to really, really embrace it. This is the way to go." Especially sometimes if we're just discovering that we've been repressing it our whole life, and we really don't know any other way than letting it up. So I'm not saying we don't let it up, but I'm saying it's the total embracing of it that's a little different.

This is what the Dalai Lama says. He's talking about compassion, of course. When someone asks him why there is a lack of compassion in human society, he says, "Perhaps we just pay less attention to compassion and caring. We reinforce it less. Whereas in some sense, we fully embrace hostility and anger as an emotional state, fueling or reinforcing it. If we were to give the same amount of energy, attention, and reinforcement to compassion and caring, they would definitely be stronger." And I say that's also what we're doing with mindfulness, with awareness—giving the same energy to mindfulness and awareness.

So not fully embracing and identifying and going with it and acting from dosa, and not pressing it down—the middle way of the Buddha, of satipanya, mindfulness wisdom at the sense door. Ideally. This is ideally, and then with all different ramifications of how it is in the moment. So please, if the ideal isn't working for you in a moment, here are the other things I say too.

Ideally, it's like the awareness wisdom can just fully meet that. So say it's anger—let's pick that. Anger arising in a moment can be a really strong energy. Mindfulness can meet that energy. It's not trying to deny it or push it away. It can really let the energy roar, but with mindfulness we see it—this is mental state, this is physical energy—we can see what it is, and it's not necessary to act on it, it's not necessary to be afraid of it. It can come, it can go. We're not denying the energy, but we're not getting into the content so much. Do you see what I mean? Simple awareness is really powerful that way.

I think for some of us—we're all different, but for some of us, like for me who's been in the habit of not really wanting to let that up—there can almost be a kind of fear of experiencing the powerful fear or anger or hostility energy, even just sitting here. Afraid of: if I really feel it, I'm going to act from it. So really learning that with mindfulness, we can trust it.

Sayadaw U Pandita said to me one time in an interview—I actually don't remember what was going on with me, but it really stuck with me. He said, "You know, with mindfulness, you don't have to be afraid of anything." He was talking on retreat, basically, but I don't have to be afraid of anything that arose in my mind, in my body. Mindfulness could be there with it. And that was really impactful for me. I hadn't even realized I was afraid of something, but he was so astute. He could tell what was going on.

Something Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche says really helps me with a strong energy of anger, for example, or any of the dosa states. You know, Dilgo Khyentse was a very great awakened Tibetan master. He's saying thoughts and feelings have no intrinsic solidity, form, shape, or color, right? So when a thought of anger arises in the mind with such force that you feel aggressive and destructive—is that thought of anger actually brandishing a weapon? Can that thought really burn things like fire, crush them like a rock, or carry them away like a violent river? No. Anger, like any other thought or feeling, has no real self-existence, not even a definite location.

And this is what he says: it's just like wind roaring in empty space. I love that. I love that. Let the energy come up. Just sitting here, it's roaring in empty space. Thoughts of aggression can come up. We don't have to be afraid of them.

If there's awareness, we're not going to get up and hit the person next to us upside the head. Hopefully. So far, so good.

These thoughts come up in—I want to say to all of us, maybe not in some of you really cooled out folks—but stuff comes up. Let it come. Let it go. Really see. It's like wind roaring in empty space. Awareness doesn't have to be afraid of it. Yes, it's unpleasant. Okay. It's unpleasant. Half of life is unpleasant. Let it roar.

The last line: "Instead of allowing wild thoughts to enslave you, you can realize their essential emptiness."

So this is really one way the Buddha was talking—sati at the sense door, as best we can. Either just that simple sense of the sound that's triggering it, or the wind roaring in empty space, when that's possible.

Sharon has a line I really like: "The opening to truth is what frees our heart from fear and selfishness." And Dogen Zenji said, "If you cannot find truth right where you are, where else do you expect to find it?"

So when anger is rising, and we can really let it roar like empty space, bring awareness and mindfulness to it—that's the truth of this moment. And the opening to that truth is what frees our heart from fear and selfishness. Not the avoiding it or trying to pretend it's not happening. And knowing we're not going to be perfect. Of course it's not always going to be like that. But that as a possibility.

So these are some nuts and bolts, a few little hints on working with different ways of aversion or dosa coming up in our mindfulness practice.

The first one is simply bringing your attention. None of these are always possible, just different approaches. When something keeps eliciting anger, aggression, aversion, fear—whatever—it keeps happening and we're maybe even mindful of the state, but not quite able to notice the sense contact. Maybe you can bring your attention there. That really helps.

Here's an example. There's always a practicing-in-Asia example. One time I was sitting at a retreat center in Burma, and for whatever reason—well, this is normal—they were doing construction. It's extremely rare to sit at a retreat center in Burma where they're not doing construction. But they're doing construction, and just across the little road outside my kuti, not even as far as the wall back there, they started with electric sanders. Two different ones on two different frequencies. From 7 a.m. to 5 p.m., all day. And it would stop, and it would start, and it would stop. So you can imagine all the different things you go through.

Finally, out of total desperation—which is, of course, the last thing we ever do is surrender, right?—out of total desperation, I just brought the attention right to the ear door. Just hearing. Just quit resisting the hearing and be there. So that's what just hearing really meant. And because there's just being with it, without the gap and without all the stories—what are they, insane?—and all that stuff, it's just what it was. Really, it's just what it was.

So that's one way. Definitely not always available, but sometimes we don't even want to try it. It's amazing sometimes.

Another approach: when there's a bigger thing going on and we can see, "No, I don't want to, I can't go there." A friend years ago who sat a lot of three-month retreats told me how she related to this. She said she was a middle-aged woman, not a real athlete or anything, and sometimes she would go to the beach with her grown sons. She'd be at the beach, and they'd be in the water near the shore, and whenever a big wave would come, she'd see it and turn around and run to try and get away from it. She said the wave would always come and clobber her, turn her over and over. And her kids would say, "Mom, don't turn and run. Face the wave and just dive into it, and then it won't bother you."

She said she was only able to do that once or twice because the habit of "Oh no, here it comes, turn and run" was just so strong. But she was relating this to her practice on retreat, when some unpleasant, difficult thing would come and she could see the reaction: get the heck out of here.

Larry Rosenberg, a great teacher in Cambridge, used to love to watch old movies. He said—I don't know if this is true—that he read somewhere about a compilation of the most commonly said line in movies, and it was, "Let's get out of here."

So anyway, she would say that would come up for her. "Let's get out of here." Turn and run. But it doesn't work.

Then sometimes—and Bonnie always reminds me of this because she says she heard me say it in a talk years ago—sometimes when the anger's there, it's wind roaring in empty space, but it's not quite that empty. You want to be with it. You really don't want to act on it. You don't want to speak from it, but it's so strong. And kind of, "Oh yeah, let me just be mindful of the contact, seeing, seeing..."

It's like, forget about it. But mindfulness isn't always neat and tidy. So this is what I call stomping meditation. There's this energy, it's really strong. You can't just sit here and go "mindful, anger, anger, anger," because you feel like you're going to explode. But that doesn't mean we can't be mindful. Mindfulness can be precise, it can be wide.

So go outside, hopefully where no one can see you—and not in the hall up there where you're two inches away from somebody else. Go away from people and just stomp. Anger, anger, you're feeling it. Let that energy move, but you're aware it's anger. You don't have to try and be precise, thinking "Let me see, where's the sensation here?" It's just stomping. But I found that extremely helpful. The thoughts roar and the energy's moving, but you're aware. You're aware. That counts. It's awareness. It'll cool out eventually.

And the other approach, the last to mention, is what I was saying first: sometimes you can tell something's going on, but you can't tell what. So remember to tune into the subtle background state. Really noticing the attitude in the mind, as Sayadaw U Tejaniya is always talking about. Take care of the awareness first.

Notice when you start to see there's a lens of ill will over everything. Just tune in and see. You might feel tightness in the heart and the mind. You might notice there's aversion. And that's the place to bring the attention—not trying to fix it, not trying to deal with each specific object that's occurring. It doesn't even matter. But take care of the awareness, as he says. Just notice that's what's going on.

Sometimes you might see something really simple that's giving rise to all of it. A friend told me about a three-month retreat years ago. He noticed—it took him most of the day to notice—that he'd had a real ill-will aversion lens on his perception about everybody and everything. And finally he noticed it. So that was good. That's awareness. Then he was kind of wondering, well, what's happening now? So he just tuned in and he saw—and he was laughing as he told me—he noticed that a sweatshirt he'd been wearing all day was too tight. That was it. When he'd move his arms, it was a little unpleasant. He didn't notice. And it led into a whole day of ill will. Mindfulness is our friend. We don't need to be afraid to check this stuff out.

Not recognizing—to me, this is the most profound suffering of dosa, of all the three roots: when we don't recognize it, it blocks the radiance of the pure mind, the pure heart of simple awareness. Once we make friends with—I can't say make friends, but we can just be with. My friend could be with that dosa covering his experience. He could say, "Okay, my sweatshirt's too tight. This unpleasant feeling's like this." And that radiance, just the sense of peace and ease, is available again. This pulling back, all this confusion that comes in through the knee-jerk response of dosa—it prevents, blocks the recognition of that. To me, that's the deepest suffering.

Bankei, the Japanese Zen master, said: "When you do not set yourself in contention, in conflict, with things, then your primary nature reveals itself in its true form." That's really the heart of the suffering of dosa—and the freedom when we're not fighting with it.

Pema Chödrön makes a beautiful simile about our habit of shutting down in the face of even just fearing the unpleasant—not even the unpleasant itself—comparing it to a sea anemone. You know what a sea anemone is? A soft sea creature with tentacles, and if you just touch it, it closes around itself. She likens our habit of closing off to avoid unpleasant experience to that protective reflex, which is really a movement to protect, in a way, our tender heart. But the effect is to shut ourselves off from ourselves and from everyone else.

That's the drawback of the way things are. We can't shut down selectively. We don't get to just get rid of the unpleasant aversion and hang on to the pleasant.

I've noticed in myself—often in retreat, but even more in daily life—that the times I feel most alienated or disconnected or just out of sync, my mind can be telling myself any story about why. But I've noticed again and again that when that's true, when I finally stop and look, I find that it's because I'm somehow trying to avoid or deny or repress some unpleasant or difficult experience. Just trying not to be there for it.

It could be so-called internal or so-called external. It could be some unpleasant thing going on with me in relationship to a friend, or it could be that something really difficult or painful or sorrowful is happening with a family member or a dear friend, and it's really painful. It's like, okay, I want to know, but you don't really want to completely let it in and feel it. And as soon as I recognize, oh yes, right, that's really sorrowful—she's really suffering right now and there's nothing I can actually do about it, and it feels like this—then the whole sense of opening into feeling alive again. Feeling connected again. Feeling open to the sorrow but also open to the beauty, open to love, open to connectedness, to how it is. It all comes together in that way.

This is, to me, the jewel in the heart of our practice, the jewel in the heart of mindfulness and wisdom: being willing and able to be with all the aspects of dosa, which are suffering in themselves, and the unpleasant that gives rise to it. The jewel is that by landing in this, even just for a moment with mindfulness and wisdom, that's the arising of compassion. That's how compassion comes.

As the Dalai Lama has said over and over, compassion develops through deep insight into what suffering is, and this insight comes from being with our own experience. What else? Being with our own experience, and it naturally widens and strengthens into a sense of empathy with all beings.

So when something really difficult is happening and all the forms of dosa are present—the dosa itself could be the difficulty or the instigating sense contact—that's arising due to past karmic conditions. That it's happening in this moment is out of your control. You can't change this moment; it's already gone. How the mind and awareness are meeting this moment of our experience—that's what can affect the shift of habit.

Meeting aversion, fear, resentment, or whatever—the attitude of how we meet this arising moment—that is the path of purification, of change, of opening the tender heart. This is really how compassion is being cultivated on a moment-to-moment basis here. Not just in the Brahma Vihāra practices, but every time there's something painful or difficult. It's okay, it's like this. Just for a second, that moment of tender awareness without dosa, without greed—just like this, now. That is the cultivation of compassion and wisdom. That is the shifting, the purification of habit. Just a mind moment, but it's all mind moments. And this is not something to overlook. It's really being present with it.

I don't have time for all the practices, but I need to mention that Shabkar, the great Tibetan yogi, said: meditating without compassion is simply to inflict hardship on yourself.

So sometimes just the meeting itself is compassion. But there are times, as I referred to earlier, when the intensity of the difficulty coming up—the painful emotion—is just so intense. Either it comes up so strong and fast, or it's such a deep traumatic habit pattern, and in the moment the mindfulness awareness can touch it but bounces off. It's just too strong to stay with. Compassion is recognizing this is how it is right now. It's not good or bad. Don't go to the judging, "I'm not perfect" place. Recognize this is how it is right now.

And then, as Sayadaw U Tejaniya says, when we realize that the ill will, the fear, the terror, the rage is stronger than the mindfulness right now, stronger than the awareness—and the more we're trying to be mindful, the more the dosa is being fed, we can see it's spinning out of control—well, that's just wisdom to recognize this is what's happening right now. So Tejaniya says it's not necessarily skillful mindfulness to drown in the difficult situation. Check what's going on in the mind, whether it's a mental state or physical pain. Don't keep paying attention to that. We need to refresh the awareness—to move the attention away from the triggering physical or emotional pain and refresh the awareness.

It may be that we bring the awareness – we don't abandon awareness, that doesn't have to be our first line – but we bring the awareness to something neutral or to something beautiful.

Thich Nhat Hanh used to talk about cultivating seeds of joy. In the midst of the Vietnam War, when he was working with social workers who were in really difficult situations, he'd say, "Just go out in the fields and smell the herbs at night." You may think, in the midst of horror, smelling the herbs at night – what's that going to do? It refreshes the awareness. It brings balance back to the heart and mind. It moves attention away from getting lost in dosa. And it can bring, just for a moment, balance. This is really important. This is an act of compassion.

Thich Nhat Hanh says it's very important to adjust your attitude first. Take care of your awareness, the way the mind and awareness are looking at the situation, before you do anything about adjusting the environment. As I said before, we can't recognize accurately with ill will, with dosa.

There are many ways to shift the attention to refresh the awareness: something neutral, something pleasant, going with seeing, going with hearing, the Brahma Viharas, or contemplating something the Buddha offers. Contemplate your own wholesome moral conduct. Contemplate, bring into heart and mind, all your acts of generosity of thought, speech, and action. This isn't an ego thing – it actually brightens the heart, the mind. Contemplate whatever brings you faith, whatever your aspiration is.

The Buddha often used this. He'd look over a group of people and see someone who he thought could hear the Dharma, but their mind wasn't ready. So he'd talk about sila, he'd talk about dana, he'd talk about faith, until the mind and heart were brightened, the awareness was balanced, and then they could hear the Dharma. We can do that ourselves. Find ways to refresh the awareness.

It's not like we've got to get to the bottom and get rid of all the dosa and all the unpleasant right now. Forget about that. Each moment that we're cultivating, either you start with sati-pañña, or when that's not possible, refresh the awareness. You're still practicing sati-pañña, mindfulness and wisdom. You're cultivating the wholeness and the balance that can then again meet the difficult situation.

I want to end with a story that speaks to what the Dalai Lama was saying – that by being able to meet our own difficulty, our own suffering in whatever form it's taking, whatever dosa, not letting dosa run the show but recognizing it, this widens that compassion for ourselves into empathy and compassion for all beings. And really, for me, so-called internal and external are not separate. Why is someone else's pain hard for us? Because we don't want to feel it here.

I heard this story on the radio last fall. It was about the migrant crisis in Europe, which I'm sure you're aware of – so many people in so many wretched and horrible situations. A reporter was talking about interviewing people in Calais, France, on the coast. I don't know if you remember – in Calais there's a huge refugee internment camp that they call "The Jungle." At that point, a lot of refugees were caught there, basically trying to get to the UK and not able to make it. They were kept there in really horrible conditions, of course, not wanting to be there. At this time they were trying to close the camp, so it was in the news a lot.

This reporter had gone there, reporting about the conditions and how hard it was. Then he went into Calais and was talking to just ordinary French people. He was speaking with one particular woman, a middle-aged French woman, and she was saying how this camp is so horrible, and the people in it shouldn't be here, they should go back where they came from, and they're really bad, and it's bringing trouble to Calais. All the usual kind of things you can read. She was clearly coming from anger but also fear – you could hear that.

As he spoke to her, he got her to agree to come to the camp with him. This is already huge for someone feeling that way. She was already willing to just meet her fear. So she went to the camp with him, and they walked in. She's looking around, seeing how people were living out in the elements, in crummy tents, packed in, with nothing to do. She's just going, "Wow, these conditions are horrible. Nobody should have to live like this" – just seeing it. But that meant she was willing to touch that pain in herself.

Then the reporter mentioned he was talking to one young man who was describing how hard it was being there without his family. All he wanted to do was work, but there was no work, nothing to do. If they went outside the camp, he felt preyed upon by various truck drivers and the police. He just felt completely vulnerable and attacked.

And she got so moved. She saw, oh, this is a really lovely young man, an educated young man. He just wants to work. He just wants to live in safety.

So then she ended up by going to the office of the camp and saying, "What can I do to volunteer here to help people?"

It's amazing—just the willingness to face our own suffering and fear naturally morphs into connectedness and compassion.

As James Baldwin says, an enemy is someone whose story we have not heard.

So just hearing what story is coming up in this mind moment, in your citta.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 164

Mingling Our Minds with the Dhamma

Carol Wilson · 1h00

> In this heartfelt talk, Carol Wilson invites us to consider how we can mingle our minds with the Dhamma so thoroughly that the teachings become inseparable from who we are. Drawing on the insight that citta (mind-heart) is not a static entity but a moment-to-moment flow of cognizing, she emphasizes that transformation is always possible—one moment at a time.
>
> Wilson explores the Buddha's three pillars of practice: dāna (generosity), sīla (ethical conduct), and bhāvanā (mental cultivation), showing how each addresses different levels of the kilesas (mental torments). She explains how transgressive defilements are purified through restraint, obsessive mental patterns are calmed through samādhi, and latent tendencies are ultimately uprooted through paññā (wisdom). Rather than viewing these as a hierarchy where meditation is superior, she encourages practitioners to honor whichever practice is accessible in any given moment.
> Through personal anecdotes and inspiring stories—from a football player who taught himself to read to Sister Chân Không's patient activism—Wilson illustrates how conscious intention can transform ordinary actions into profound practice. She shares the Buddha's teaching to Mahānāma about recollecting one's own generosity and virtue as a practice available while walking, sitting, or even at home crowded with children. The talk concludes with Eleanor Roosevelt's reminder that human rights begin in small places close to home, suggesting that purifying our own hearts is where meaningful change in the world must start.

Dingo Kenzi has a phrase that has always stuck in my mind, one that I like very much. He talks about mingling our minds with the Dharma, which I just love. That's what I want to talk about tonight.

The rest of how I remember it—I'm not sure if this is accurate or if I made it up—is mingling our minds with the Dharma until it's so mingled that we die with no thought of Dharma in our minds. You get it? It's so mingled that you don't think about the Dharma as some separate belief system or anything. It's just how our minds are—purified. I can only assume that would be the mind of an arahat. Who knows?

But mingling our minds with the Dharma really means using all the aspects of our life and realizing that all the aspects of the Buddha's teaching—not just meditation—are about purifying these troublesome habits of mind we've been talking about the whole time: these torments of greed, hatred, and delusion. As we know, the cessation of dukkha, the third noble truth, is the remainderless cessation, the relinquishment of craving, of the torments.

This purification of the habits of our mind, what I'm calling mingling our mind with the Dharma—this is the work of our whole lifetime. Our whole lifetime, at least. We don't have to know what happens before or after, but it's at least this whole lifetime. Not one retreat, not ten years. I don't say this to be depressive; actually, it's been more and more inspiring to me when we realize the actuality. In the last some years, I've come to appreciate more and more how everything the Buddha taught comes from some different angle of helping us purify and transform these suffering habits of mind. All of it is to be used, not so much in a hierarchy.

It's been helpful to me in my own practice, and also in speaking with people, when—you know how on retreat we can get caught up in questions like: Should I do concentration practice or vipassanā practice? Which is better? Which do I need? Which is going to get me enlightened faster? If I miss one, do I not get it? And if I'm doing vipassanā, which form? More precise? Do I do noting? Do I do open awareness? Choiceless awareness? Just resting back? If I don't do the right one, I'm going to miss it. And then: which things do I have to know? Okay, dāna and sīla are pretty good—you do that if you can't do anything else, but that's not the real thing, right?

Trying to figure all that out can be—I'm making it a little funny—but it can really cut close to the heart. I've talked to plenty of people, and myself included, who are really in a state of suffering frenzy about it: "Oh my god, why didn't I know about this practice before? I've been wasting all my time and I didn't know about this one. This is the real one!"

Starting to actually realize—and this is me thinking—the Buddha taught all these ways, offered all these different approaches, because at different times, different approaches are what's accessible to us. We need them all, in all times of our life. When, say, concentration isn't available but the practice of sīla is, we shouldn't think, "Well, okay, I'll do sīla, what the heck, until I can get concentrated again—that's the real thing." That attitude is klesha-driven. We need to actually come to respect and honor all of these practices.

I just want to touch lightly on several of these. None of this is new information, but I'm trying to bring it together under this way of looking at it.

We know that transformation of these habits, as deep and long-lasting as they may seem, is absolutely possible. It's possible because citta, what we call the mind, is not a static entity. It's not an entity at all. Andy Olenski had a description of citta I liked: this moment of mind-heart. In Buddhism, the mind is not a subject that has objects as content. We talk about it that way—"the mind"—and right away we think of a thing, just from the use of language. But the mind is not a subject that has objects as content; it is rather the activity or process of cognizing a flow of events.

This is, to me, one of the most freeing things I've realized: the so-called mind is simply a moment-to-moment arising activity of cognizing. Moment to moment to moment to moment. When we try to look at a whole lifetime or even a whole hour, we can't do it. But moment to moment? That's workable.

That's possible. And that's what we're cultivating. We're cultivating sati—mindfulness is moment to moment, one moment giving rise to the next.

When anger is being cultivated, it's also moment to moment. A moment of anger, unrecognized, being fed by attention, gives rise to the next, to the next. But because it's a flow of events—really much how Guy was describing kamma, you know, the past is over, but it's moment to moment, how intention works, moment to moment—this is where all of the different tools the Buddha offers us come to bear, where we can work and where we can really see change.

And also recognizing—and this again, not to be demoralizing, but it just seems to me so true and it's helped—recognizing how subtle and deeply ingrained the habits of the torments are. All of you have seen that. And instead of getting frustrated when you think you're clear of it and suddenly it pops up—has that happened to anybody? Suddenly it pops up. You say, "Oh, right. The conditions arise. Without mindfulness, they pop up."

So this little example from my life occurred to me today when I was thinking about this. Just so little, nothing. But I was on a self-retreat, I think it was last year—it all blends—in Switzerland, in a place I like very much. I'd been on retreat, quiet, for about two weeks, and I was just walking on the country roads there and the hills and mountains. People walk by, not many people.

So I was on retreat, which makes this all the more striking—I really had to notice this was happening, because I should have been more mindful. I was just walking and present, and a woman came walking up to me, passing me on the road, and came over to me with some kind of piece of paper in her hand, like a brochure. She said something to me in Swiss German. I couldn't understand it right away, but I could have understood a little bit had I paid attention.

Instead, what immediately came up—and I could track it later, what the conditions were—was a kind of pulling back, a turning away. It was like, "No thank you," and turning away and walking away. An aversion, a "no thank you, don't." I realized later, and I felt bad of course, that she was probably just asking me for directions or something. I mean, I didn't even really stop to see.

But I realized it was all the years of walking somewhere in the street and someone comes up to you with something they're trying to sell or something they're trying to get you to take, or the Watchtower, and just, "No, please leave me alone." That's what was coming up, just like that—boom, like that. I kept on walking and she walked, and then within two seconds the sense of moral shame came up. Aversion, just like that, so quick. The conditions come when I'm not paying attention, when I'm not mindful.

Now, to see that without judgment is really important. This is mindfulness coming back into play again, and we understand. I picked such a simple little example because that's what helps me see: "Oh right, all my life really needs to be dedicated to using whatever tools are accessible in the current conditions to help purify the habits of mind." Because they just pop up so easily. They're so comfortable otherwise.

But change is possible when we really are committed—which all of you are, or you wouldn't still be here. We can use all the different ways, but change is possible.

I just want to tell you this story that Sally was very kind to point out to us. It was a little interview with someone on the news a few weeks ago, with a young man who is a rookie in his first year as a wide receiver—which is an American football term—on the New England Patriots, which is a fairly successful team. That's a primal spot for some young guy in football.

But the interview with him was very touching because he was talking about how when he was in college in Georgia—he went there on a football scholarship—he realized that he could only read on a junior high level. Junior high is about ages twelve to fifteen. So he was reading on a low level for someone in college.

He decided he really wanted to get better at that. He really wanted to learn how to read, and he really committed to it. He would start trying to read and it wasn't easy—not easy for him. In his spare time, when he was getting massages, they showed in the interview a picture of him getting worked on after a football game, reading away in some book.

But the interesting thing was this: he was in a Barnes and Noble looking at books, and he struck up a conversation with some middle-aged lady.

He's a young African-American guy, and this is a middle-aged white lady, and she says, "Well, why don't you come join our book club?" And he goes, "Okay." He joined this book club, went to it every month for two years. They show a photo, and it's all these middle-aged white ladies and him. They're all twice his age, and they're all sitting there talking about books and what's going on, and he's so happy being there. He did this for two years.

Now he's on the New England Patriots, and he's just written a children's book about the magic of learning how to read. He's also started a kids' literacy foundation. He's talking to the interviewer, and he says, "You know, sometimes people have called me a nerd." The interviewer said, "Well, how does that make you feel? Usually that's kind of an insult." And he goes, "Wow, you know, actually I'm proud of it. It's like a badge of honor for me." He said, "The football, that came naturally. That was a gift. I didn't have to try. But this reading, I really had to try. I really had to commit. So coming from where I came from, to be called a nerd—that's a badge of honor."

His vibe was so sweet and loving, sharing with all these kids with his book, teaching them how to read. And then he goes out and plays football and knocks people over. He was in the Super Bowl—you couldn't do better than that in your first year.

Just seeing this reminds us that when there's commitment and dedication and the willingness to keep going, change is possible for all of us in all the different realms. Not to underrate the power of conditioning, but we can embrace what the Buddha called the three pillars of the path: dana, or cultivating the intention of generosity; sila, non-harming behavior; and bhavana, mental cultivation—along with various other tools I want to mention. They all work together, whichever one is accessible at a particular time.

As Sally was saying last night, we really are often, in cultivating the happiness of a wholesome heart and letting ourselves feel it and trust it and move in that direction—we are so frequently moving in the opposite direction of the stream of culture, the stream of society.

Thich Nhat Hanh wrote, a long time ago, something I know he stood by: "Society makes it difficult to be awake. We know that 40,000 children in the third world die every day of hunger, but we keep forgetting. The kind of society we live in helps us forget. So that's why we need exercises for awareness, for mindfulness. We've lost our taste for silence. Every time we have a few minutes, we pick up a book to read or make a telephone call." This was before the days of cell phones—and it was bad enough then. Now it's overwhelming, right? We know that. "We do not know how to be ourselves without something else to accompany us. The first thing for us to do is to return to ourselves in order to recover ourselves, to be our best."

That's what the Buddha is offering us, asking us to do, giving us so many ways to practice.

I want to mention a little bit about generosity and moral conduct, just in terms of how it works to purify our heart-mind. I don't have to go into it extensively because we've talked about it all. In the early days when I first began to practice Vipassana in the West—I first learned it in India, but in the West, at the Insight Meditation Society, when it wasn't with Goenka anymore—I think it's not everybody, but it's kind of a Western thing. In the beginning, we were all really enamored and fascinated by the meditation aspect, whether concentration or vipassana. That's really where it's at, you know? And it is very powerful, don't get me wrong—it's the main thing we're doing. But it's almost as if a glance would be made to sila. You take the five precepts at the beginning of the retreat. Dana—we'd say, "Oh yeah, generosity is good." Not that much said about it, kind of assumed. And if anything much was said, it was because it helps the mind not have remorse, so you can practice better. I'm glossing it a bit, but it was sort of like that.

Joseph always tells us how Munindra, his teacher, at one point came to him after listening to the Western students and said, "What are you doing? It's like you're sitting in a rowboat and you're rowing as hard as you can, but you forgot to untie it from the dock."

You really need Dana and Sila. It's all part of the purification process, and sometimes that's what's available to us. Sometimes that's really where we can touch. We've talked about this through the retreat—those moments when kilesa is not distorting our perception, not distorting our heart, where you just feel that sense of purity. And you may not think of it as much, just this kind of cleanliness. Someone described it to me as their awareness feeling squeaky clean, like right after you've cleaned a window—just squeaky clean, nothing there.

Sometimes we look for that in a meditative state, but this sense of the happiness of a wholesome heart and mind can be recognized in acts of generosity, in moments of virtuous conduct, or simply refraining from harmful states. That's often where it's available. You don't have to wait for a deep meditation state.

So thinking about the practice of generosity in this way—as a transformer of consciousness, as a transformer of the habits of clinging, obviously, but also the habit of me and other, the habit of self-reference, the habit of fear too. Think of generosity that way.

And to me, the secret teaching that I didn't really get here, that I didn't get until I'd spent a lot of time in Thailand and Burma, was the really powerful happiness, the joy that comes about through moments of generous intention. Whatever it is one is being generous about is almost secondary. But that moment of generous intention—it comes in three phases. First, the idea of a generous thing. And there's really this thing in Burma of "Oh, an opportunity for Dana!" That's the phrase that's used. "This is an opportunity for Dana."

In my growing-up Western way of hearing it, generosity is good, and if you have more you should give to those who have less. It's well-meaning, and sure, that's good to do. But there was a kind of "should" there, and a little bit of hierarchy, a little bit of separation. What I got in Burma is just this sense—just the idea of an opportunity for Dana—people would get happy. They'd perk up: "Oh good, this is a place I can be generous," whatever it was.

We know people there who amazingly give so much. They have good businesses and they give so much money. And then there are people who have nothing, but they'll just —a little boy came up once whom I never saw before or after and just gave me this tiny little flower in the street. This little seven-year-old boy, probably fifteen but looking seven, gave it to me and bowed and walked away. I thought, what little kid here is going to do that when I'm walking down the street? Can you imagine? But he was so happy to offer and go away. That happiness.

And then in the receiving, there's that equal happiness. You let it in. This quality in that moment—the moment of thinking about it, the moment of actually offering the generosity, a smile, whatever—and then the moment of reflecting on it later if you've been the one who's been generous. It also brings up joy. Not the joy of "I'm such a great generous person," but the joy, the happiness of a wholesome heart in that moment. That's really what's being cultivated and developed with this practice of generosity. It's something we can really look at in little ways all through our life.

Again, it's not that I should be generous. Still, that's better than doing nothing, I guess, but that's not the transforming of the habit, the purity of the habit that I'm talking about. It's really letting yourself feel just that happiness, because the sense of barrier goes away.

I had to learn to receive as well with that same openness. Because when someone comes and offers and you go, "Oh no, I have so much more than you, don't offer that to me"—you feel what that does? It just shuts the whole thing down.

And the joy is really in the mutuality, in the sense that separation is gone in that moment, the sense of clinging and the sense of ownership. It's a beautiful, just a beautiful thing to include in our lives as practice. And it's something that is available, you know, in times when we think other things aren't.

I'd always heard, and I didn't understand it for a few years, that if you're really annoyed with someone, you should give them a gift. I'd heard this as a Buddhist teaching, and I kind of thought, I didn't really get what that was. And then I started getting suspicious if anyone gave me a gift.

But I can see now, if you're talking from the point of really the intention of heart of generosity, that transforming intention. So if you're giving the gift, it means truly giving it. It doesn't mean, "Here, take this gift and be gone." To really be generous, you open your heart and hand the flower. And in that moment, there's not ill will. When there's really that intention of generosity, there's not clinging and there's not ill will. So it's not to give them a gift for them. It's to purify your own heart and mind.

Things like this are available to us when you can't find your breath, when you can't find a moment of concentration, when you think bhavana, never mind mental cultivation. You can just do a little something. Smile at a lady in the store who looks really grumpy. Be kind to the person behind you in line who has a whole lot of bags and you don't have much, and just really with kindness let them go and not look for something back, but just do it. And let yourself feel the happiness of that.

That's not an ego trip. That's really one of the wonderful things about how mindfulness wisdom works, and we've said this before, but you can really trust it: when you put mindful attention on the wholesome, to use the Buddha's language, it feeds the wholesome. So when you're feeling the happiness of generosity with awareness, it lets that grow. That's not the same as "I'm so great." It's really feeding the wholesome.

And mindfulness on the unwholesome—being mindful of "I don't want to give that, this is mine," and just being mindful of how that feels—starves it. It doesn't mean it naturally goes away, but you're feeling that this feels really crummy. Mindful awareness notices that. So it's trustworthy to explore the difficult habits. We don't have to be afraid to look at them with mindfulness. It's not that if I see it, it's going to get worse. It's just the reverse, just the opposite.

So that about dāna. And sīla—this moves into actually the Eightfold Path, where the Buddha talks about sīla, samādhi, paññā. Virtuous behavior, samādhi is the whole bhavana meditation aspect, and paññā is wisdom.

To start with sīla, the teachings talk about three called the three rounds of kilesa, the three different levels you could say that kilesa acts out. And I think Sally talked some about this last night in talking about motivation. But the first round is called the transgressive. It means you actually act or speak from unwholesome, from greed, hatred, or confusion. And what purifies the transgressive level of defilements, of kilesa, is sīla—restraint, not acting out, consciously restraining, non-harming behavior.

And this isn't just, "Oh, that's the best we can do." This is the Buddha saying a fool is characterized by their actions, a wise person is characterized by their actions. It is through the activities of one's life that one's discernment, one's wisdom shines. So it may be at the beginning of the rounds of the transgressive, but it actually shines through our whole life.

So the transgressive: actions of speech and body motivated by greed, hatred, and delusion. And we're protected from that simply by restraint, by wise restraint. We may still feel, be quite aware of, a thought coming up of wanting to say something aversive or do something unpleasant or harmful. But the actual conscious refraining from doing that is a wholesome act.

You've seen it all here, how when we do act or speak from unwholesomeness—and bring mindfulness along with you—it has an effect of keeping on feeding. It affects other people and the whole thing grows. You're feeling a little bit impatient, and you go into a store and you say something in a really impatient way to someone in the line in front of you, or to the lady who's checking out your groceries. You can see right away it affects that person and you can feel it come back. Maybe they're a little more grumpy to the next person coming after them, and then that affects that person, and it's a whole chain reaction.

Or the person is just nasty back to you, and so you leave the store in a worse mood than you came in with, and you slam the door in somebody's face, and someone says, "Can you give me some money?" and you go, "No way." It just keeps feeding itself. We can see that.

So the simple restraint—the lady checking you out is making a mess of it, and you manage to keep your mouth shut and not say something—consciously recognize that restraint.

That's a wholesome action. And we really tend—maybe you don't, but I tend to—go to the fact that I'm still thinking the unpleasant thing, and so I'm still bad and wrong. But to notice the restraint really feeds it.

If it's possible, you could even feel—you know, there's still the unpleasant, there's still the unwholesome thing in your mind, so it's not quite so clear that it's a happiness as with generosity. But you can get a little bit of a sense of the purity of not speaking in that way. You really can feel that. Restraint.

On retreat, you can practice restraint at the sense doors. Off retreat it's a little harder, but here it's like when you can see grumpiness in your mind or greed really strong, just going out through the eye door. You can just bring mindfulness in right at the eye door, feel the greed, and kind of keep the attention here. Not feed it by going looking for something to want.

Do you find yourself sitting on—well, I don't know if they have it here—at IMS, when you're sitting on the toilet and they have the cleanser on the back of the seat, and you just sit there and read that thing avidly for ten minutes? What is hydroxychloroquine? What could that be? Let me compare it to this one over here and see which one is... A little bit of restraint at the sense doors can actually be helpful not to feed the greed, and you can appreciate that.

And the more we practice, there can be a happiness. The Buddha says it's not an act of will that freedom from remorse arises in one who is endowed with virtue. It is in the nature of things. It's just natural. If you are acting with virtue, refraining from unwholesome speech and actions, it is natural that you would experience freedom from remorse.

The more we practice with this, it really is purifying the habits, so that—I imagine you all can taste this, I'm sure you all can—you start to recognize and appreciate how natural aspects of sīla become for you. How in a place where maybe earlier there would have been an urge to act on something, nobody's looking, and it just isn't there anymore. You don't. Appreciate that. Feel the purity of that. It's something that can really bring us happiness.

So I'll give a simple example. Oh, I forgot I had some examples I wanted to give of the happiness of generosity too—I might go back and read that. But anyway, a simple example. I've said it before. It happened here with a friend of mine.

We were in the old Spirit Rock bookstore before it moved. We went down, and I wanted to buy a little statue that I had seen there. You know how it's self-service, and no one was there at all. But my friend had often helped Marianne on days, so she knew how to get the little magnet thing that opened the big cupboards out in the other room—the ones that don't have handles, but you get this magnet and open them.

So she opened it, and this one huge closet was just full of tens and dozens of statues. We were piling through all of them trying to find the one that I wanted. I took out one and she took out one. Almost simultaneously—they were very delicate—and this one was Manjushri. It had this little sword. We just barely touched it and the sword broke. It happened to both of us, and we were like, "Oh, it broke! It broke!" These things are like sixty dollars. We didn't say anything. We just looked and said, "Okay," and we took it over to the office and confessed to Marianne.

She was like, "Ah, it doesn't matter. It happens all the time. We glue it together and sell it again, half price." But we were ready to pay for it.

Later we discussed it. And the thing that made us both so happy is there was a fleeting thought in the mind: we can put it back.

No one will know. No one was there. And that thought came up in each of our minds and got absolutely no traction whatsoever. It arose and then it wasn't even a possibility.

Later, my friend sent me an email and she said—I liked how she put it—"To see one's mind have that thought, and then one has the choice right away to see what karma is one creating in this moment." And in that moment, there's no choice. It's so clear.

This is the effect, the vipāka, of previous purification, and it's something you can really appreciate. There was no possibility that either of us would have done that. And instead of going to bad that the thought arose, it's like—wow, feel how lovely it is to be able to trust the purification that is going on in your mind and heart. To trust that sīla is really available. And the more you let yourself feel that happy wholesomeness, the more likely it is to arise again in the future. So just very simple things, but really letting it in.

What I wanted to read—two things about generosity—because the other thing about generosity is that hearing about others' wholesome actions can bring joy to us too. It's contagious. Just in the same way that acting in an unwholesome way can start a chain reaction going, so too can generosity.

So I just want to read you these two little stories. Maybe it won't make you feel good, but just see. How do you feel? Because if it touches something in us, that's touching it because that happiness of the generous impulse is available in our heart and mind.

This I cut out a long time ago, many years ago, about a seventy-eight-year-old man, Matt Dawson, who had worked for fifty-nine years for the Ford Motor Company in Michigan, and he was still working. He could have retired. But he didn't, because he gives most of his money away. And when this was written, he had just given two hundred thousand dollars to Wayne State University. But over the course of his life, he gave away more than a million dollars—this guy working at the Ford Motor Company. His first gift was to the United Negro College Fund, fifty thousand dollars, and since then he gave them almost two hundred thousand more. And he gave two hundred thousand to Louisiana State University, money to churches in Detroit and Louisiana, thousands of dollars to the NAACP and to community colleges.

And when people asked, "Why do you do it?" he said, "Well, I get joy. I get happiness out of this. I can go home and sleep good." He said, "No matter how much you make or how little you make, you've got to save a little of that to share. I was raised like that, to help others. I have more than enough for myself."

See, it's hard to not feel good, right? You can try, maybe, if you're in a really bad mood—I understand.

This is another thing, from a woman at a retreat a few years ago, and she wrote this to me. She had heard some of us talking about offering support to some poor nunneries in Burma, and she had offered some dāna. And then this came, just out of the blue. She said, "I've been on the verge of quitting a job I no longer 'need'"—in quotations—"and wondering if or how this job serves me. I've decided to keep the job for five or six more months and give all the earnings away to causes that I love. And this one is the first of many." So she was saying, "Thank you, because this gift brings me great joy and opens a whole new chapter of work as dāna to the world."

It's really available to us, you know. You don't have to be in deep retreat, or retreat at all, for this to be available. And we can call on it when we can't find bhāvanā.

Okay, so back to the three levels of kilesa. The transgressive level—we're protected by sīla, restraint. The next level is called the obsessive torments. You can already figure out what that one is, right? And for that, we're protected by samādhi, by collectedness of mind.

The obsessive level—you can guess—it's not just wandering mind. It's really the spinning, the spinning, whether it's a self-hatred story or a greed story or a lot—it doesn't matter what it is. But that spinning, spinning, where we just feel assaulted by it. Not just a once shooting up, like when I was walking past that lady in Switzerland, but really constant, relentless.

And so samādhi, in all the different ways that it shows up—not just one-pointed focus, although that's one way—but samādhi really meaning the collectedness of mind, heart, citta, the unification, the steadiness. So you've all experienced it in different ways. It doesn't have to be a deep state.

It can be that many things are still happening, but there's this sense that the citta just feels collected. A lot can be going on, but it's not as if your attention is all distracted, flying all over the place. There's a sense of stability.

Samadhi can be samatha, one-pointed concentration. All the Brahmaviharas, in the way we've been sharing them here, are samatha practices. They kind of do double duty, because it's samatha—the collectedness of mind—but it's also cultivating the wholesomeness of the Brahmaviharas, which is obviously another way of purifying the habits of mind through bhavana, through meditation.

But the steadiness, what that does is this: when the mind is steady like that—and really it can be one-pointed or wider—it's a protection from the hindrances arising, from the obsessive kilesas coming up. It's almost like when the collectedness is strong, the hindrances can't get in. I don't know if you've noticed sometimes that something which usually would bring up self-hatred, and it would spin and drive you crazy, but you're pretty present, the attention's steady, the mind is focused. And the self-hatred thought tries to come up and it just bounces off. It can't get in. Or it comes up and you just look at it and it's gone. It's a little different from wisdom—it just can't arise in that moment. The mind is so clear and steady. That's samadhi. And that can go, of course, as the Buddha said, to depths we can't imagine.

This is really useful. Whatever state you're in doesn't have to be one-pointed. It can be what we've talked about as khanika samadhi, what Mahasi Sayadaw called momentary samadhi—the same steadiness, but the object can be changing from moment to moment. The level of steadiness and collectedness and unification can still be quite strong. I think when Sayadaw U Pandita talked about Vipassana Jhanas, he was alluding to this kind of equal level of collectedness, of steadiness, but we're with changing objects, not moving into one-pointed practice.

So when it's like this—not to engender clinging—but one of the reasons it's so pleasant is because the hindrances aren't there, distorting the citta, the mind and heart. And this purity is a kind of happiness, a kind of peace. You can experience it in different ways and to different degrees. But one of the reasons why doing samatha one-pointed practices can be very supportive is because it can give us a much more obvious taste of what a pure mind-heart moment feels like. So that we can actually say, "Oh yes, there is something better than having another M&M. There is something actually more beautiful than fulfilling the next desire." And it doesn't matter if what's going on is pleasant or unpleasant—it can bring a kind of confidence in the power of the mind.

And then it can lead to attachment, because that's just how the hindrances work. But in the moment of the steadiness, the unification of mind, let yourself taste that. And I want to again make the point: it's not dependent on one-pointedness. It can be when a lot of things are going on, but there's still that steadiness that isn't distorted by kilesa.

So this I really appreciate. But it's not a state that we can cling to, and it doesn't bring us to the end of the habits of mind. Often people will see, especially in a very focused samadhi state, that it may seem really strong—and it is really strong—and the hindrances can be very far away. And then that state either ends or it decays. It's going to decay sooner or later. And sometimes it happens that within not too long a time, people are really surprised that the hindrances or the difficult patterns come back. Sometimes they come back slowly and not too strongly, but sometimes it's like they hit you upside the head. You go, "What's going on? I was so in there. I really had it. And now this lust is coming up like crazy. What's going on?"

And it's because that protection from the obsessive defilements is temporary. It's conditional. It's useful because we really can appreciate that quality of protection and that purity of heart and mind, and it strengthens our faith and trust. But it's not all. It's not the end of it.

And so the third level we talk about is the so-called latent kilesas, or the underlying ones. These are the ones that drive us crazy. These are the ones when you think you're so clear, and people tell me this story—they're walking so mindfully down to tea, and they say, "I'm not going to have anything to eat this tea." They're walking extremely mindfully past the table, and suddenly their arm reaches out and grabs something, and they go, "Who did that?"

"That wasn't me," right? It wasn't you. It was greed. It just sprang up. When the conditions are there, they say the seed is there, latent. And if the conditions are right—which are simply the conditions for greed plus a lack of awareness, a moment without mindfulness—poof, they can spring up.

Has anybody noticed that? And you think, "I was done with this pattern. I've seen through this pattern. It was over. What's the matter with me?" Don't take it personally. This is why we need all the different ways of practice. But they can really spring up.

And that's a little one. That's a funny one. But I heard this interview on NPR a couple of years ago. Two men were discussing work they were doing in prisons, in men's prisons with young men. They were calling their work "interrupting violence." I missed the details of how they were actually doing this, but they were quoting one young man in the prison. He said, "I wish I could take back that three to five seconds of my life when I did the violent act"—the act that put him in prison and completely changed his whole life.

That haunts me, actually. That three to five seconds. Latent defilements come up, and we're all so affected by the conditions and the society and where we live. We can't think we're separate from that. We can't be separate from that.

I'm not saying we never know what our latent defilements are—you've been looking at your minds for a long time; we know what's there, we know what they are. And so it's about really having trust in the potential of purification moment to moment, and the willingness to use all the tools at our disposal.

It's wisdom—paññā—that uproots latent defilements. The Buddha says they are abandoned not by acts, but by wisely seeing. This is what Thich Nhat Hanh says, what we've been saying all along: wisdom is the result of the long process of continuous awareness. You've seen that here, right?

And the difference between an obsessive defilement that's kept at bay through samādhi and one that's seen through with wisdom—you can kind of feel the difference. It feels more truly gone.

Someone gave an example, and you've all seen this. Say the old habit arises: you're seeing something, and the comparing comes, and the judgment comes, and then the self-judgment comes, and the aversion is coming, and that whole self-hatred—you know how that can happen, just like that. I know a lot of you know that. We can see it sometimes; we can be mindful while we're really in it. Or we can be really concentrated and it just doesn't quite come up.

But with wisdom, it would be different. An example—and I'm making this up—the seeing comes up. You see the seeing. The comparing comes up: "They're better, they're worse, they're doing this better." And then suddenly it's like, wow. The wisdom comes that everything's in constant flux, in constant change. Their conditions are completely different from my conditions. What is there to compare? Comparing makes absolutely no sense.

And this isn't like a thought train. This is a sudden perception, and in that moment, the craving, the comparing, the conceit—in that moment, they just completely drop away. Completely gone. And I know, at moments like that, that's the moment of wisdom seeing through a latent kalesha.

Do you get a sense of how this works? It might come back—when it's completely uprooted it won't—but it'll come back a lot, a lot, a lot. So we keep on purifying. We keep on cultivating the steadiness of awareness, because that's what allows the wisdom to arise. Steady awareness in a moment of heart and mind that's free from kalesha.

So when we get discouraged—on retreat, off retreat—when we see that we're trying to put all our eggs in the basket of meditation, or of one particular form of meditation, and that's not available at this moment, or it's available but it's not doing what we think it ought to do, just remember there are all these other ways. Sīla, dāna, the brahmavihāras are also practices of intention. It doesn't mean you have to be overwhelmed with muditā, but every time that phrase is said, that's a movement of intention in the heart. It's different from "Oh, who cares?" It's "Oh, I really am happy for your happiness."

That's shifting the channel. That's transforming the habits in a little way.

Two other things I just want to mention. One is wise contemplation. We've mentioned it a little, and I've alluded to it, but there's a sutta from the Buddha I like where he's talking to a layman, basically asking, "You know, we're busy in our lives—what can we do to purify our minds?" And he gives six contemplations, of which I'm going to refer really to two. The other four are contemplating the three refuges. So if contemplating the Buddha, the Dharma, the Sangha—the beauties of those—is something that really speaks to your heart, then really do that. As I mentioned, a lot of the Burmese nuns use contemplations of the qualities of the Buddha that really inspire their faith. The other one is contemplating the devas, so if that is something that meets you, use that.

But the ones I want to highlight are recollecting your own virtues and recollecting your own generosity. I just want to read what he says. He says the same thing about both, so I'll do it with generosity. He says, "Furthermore, there is the case where you recollect your own generosity or where you recollect your own virtues." So just thinking about how generous you've been: "I live at home, my awareness cleansed of the stain of possessiveness, generous, open-handed, delighting in being generous." And then for virtue: "They are unbroken, unspotted, liberating, conducive to concentration."

"At any time when a disciple of the noble ones is recollecting generosity or recollecting virtue—your own generosity, your own virtue—their mind is not overcome with greed, is not overcome with aversion, is not overcome with delusion." So he's saying in that moment you're cultivating purity of heart-mind. Their mind, their heart, heads straight, based on generosity, based on virtue. And when the heart is headed straight, the disciple of the noble ones gains a sense of the meaning of the Dhamma, experiences joy connected with the Dhamma.

"So Mahanama"—that's who he's talking to—"you should develop this recollection of generosity, this recollection of virtue, while you are walking, while you are standing, while you are sitting, while you are lying down, while you are busy at work, while you are resting in your home crowded with children." In other words, anytime—anytime that we can remember to do it.

And to me, that's something I never did. You know, just feeling lost and thinking, "Let me recollect my generosity." Does that occur to you all very much? "Let me recollect all the times I didn't act in a harmful way." This is something that's so available. It really brightens the heart. It leads us straight.

The last thing I want to mention—I know I'm going through these quickly—is coming off of Sally's talk last night on motivation: at times we can consciously work to tune into our motivation. It's always helpful, but sometimes we can consciously work to transform it in very simple ways—before, during, or after an action. That was the Buddha's advice to his son Rahula: whenever you can, notice the intention. If you notice it before an action, great. If you notice it only in the middle, good. If you notice it only after, good. But if it's wholesome, keep doing it. If it wasn't wholesome, stop doing it, even if you're in the middle.

It's also recognizing that we can sometimes consciously take the time to transform our intentions before an action, if we have time to do that. This is from Sister Chan Khong, who's the nun who's been with Thich Nhat Hanh forever. This is from her autobiography years ago. They were peace activists during the Vietnam War, but she's writing this much later. They'd been living in France, and the Vietnam War was long over. But this was a period when the Vietnamese government was arresting a lot of artists and monks and activists.

She said, "Every time I received news of a new arrest, I became angry. And I knew that I had to do walking meditation." Is that the first thing you think when you become angry? It's not a bad idea. "Sometimes I would walk several hours in order to regain my calm. Sometimes I needed several days or even weeks to relax my heartbeat, knowing how unfairly the authorities have acted in arresting such a lovely monk, nun, or artist. I always waited until I felt serene before beginning any campaign." Because she's quite an activist. "Thanks to this serenity, my words were gentle but firm, and people found it easier to cooperate."

She was involved in all kinds of activities and letter writing. And this is someone who'd been doing this since she was sixteen years old and was still doing it. We never just stop.

We say, okay, there's anger. I do want to act. Let me really cultivate non-anger before I do it. I love that. It really inspires me.

And on a more simple level, Mingyur Rinpoche suggested in one of his books something I know from Tibetan practice, which they do a lot: just as you're going through the day, here on retreat or in your life, consciously setting an intention can transform a neutral everyday activity into a really wholesome activity—a beautiful quality of heart and mind.

For example, when you're washing your hands, you might say, "May my hands become clean so that I may be of benefit to all beings." Or when we're eating, "May all beings have delicious food." The example he gives that I love is about sleeping. When you're going to bed at night, when you're going to sleep, he says when we get into bed with the mind of bodhicitta, we aspire that our sleep be the cause of increased capacity to help all beings. Isn't that great? If you do it with sleeping, you can do it with anything.

And it may seem, okay, la la la—but keep saying it, keep saying it, just like with the metta phrases. Sooner or later, you start to actually feel it a little bit. It's a wonderful practice, and it's really fun.

I want to end with some words from Eleanor Roosevelt. Last year, I was visiting a relatively new museum in Atlanta, the Museum of Civil and Human Rights. It had just opened a couple of years ago, and I found it very powerfully organized. The first two floors are all about the civil rights movements in the fifties and sixties—the Freedom Riders, and Martin Luther King, of course, because he came from Atlanta. It's very powerful and interactive. Then the top floor addresses different human rights and some of the human rights abuses going on in the world today. It was very immediate.

There was one quotation from Eleanor Roosevelt that I want to end with, because I think it really works in the sense of working to transform our motivation, even in little actions—using all the tools at our disposal, all of them, whatever is available at any moment of our life. It's all working to purify. It's all working to free our hearts and minds.

Eleanor Roosevelt wrote: "Where, after all, do universal human rights begin? In small places, close to home. So close and so small that they cannot be seen on any maps of the world. Yet they are the world of the individual person. Without concerted citizen action to uphold them close to home, we will look in vain for progress in the larger world."

I think mingling our minds, our hearts with the Dharma—that's the closest to home we can get to start to activate human rights in the world.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 165

Perception of Impermanence

Carol Wilson · 1h02

> In this talk, Carol Wilson illuminates how the perception of impermanence (anicca) can become a profound vehicle for liberation when it moves beyond intellectual understanding to direct insight. Drawing from the suttas, she shares the Buddha's teaching that when the perception of impermanence is fully developed and cultivated, it eliminates sensual lust, craving for becoming, ignorance, and the conceit of 'I am.'
>
> Wilson explains the three levels of wisdom (paññā): heard wisdom (suta-mayā paññā), reflective wisdom (cintā-mayā paññā), and insight wisdom (bhāvanā-mayā paññā). She illustrates how we often remain at the intellectual level, believing we understand impermanence while our perceptions continue to assume permanence. Using vivid examples—from Magic Eye images to a friend's colored blanket—she demonstrates how perception shapes our entire experience and how steady, non-judgmental awareness allows accurate perception to arise naturally.
> The talk examines three obstacles to perceiving impermanence: denial (resistance to change, particularly unpleasant feelings), misperception (seeing things as stable between their arising and passing), and inattention (the lack of continuous mindfulness). Wilson draws on the Buddha's teaching about vedanā (feeling tone) to show how our habitual reactions to pleasant and unpleasant experiences keep us trapped. She offers practical guidance for noticing assumptions of permanence in daily life and concludes with Hafiz's poem celebrating how recognizing impermanence deepens wonder rather than diminishing care.

In the particular style of practice we've been offering here, we've been speaking about how the steadiness of mindfulness, of awareness, is the condition for wisdom to arise in the heart, in the mind. And when wisdom arises, it's wisdom that does the work of freeing habits of our mind, of freeing us from confusion, from suffering.

So I want to try and explain how that works a little bit, using steady awareness of impermanence—how wisdom into really understanding this aspect of all existence arises.

All of the path, all of the different techniques that may be offered, not only here but in all aspects of the Buddha's practice that I'm familiar with—they may come from different angles, accentuate different aspects of our experience, but they're all in service of releasing the habits of our heart and mind from the obsessive relationship to objects and experience, from the suffering of wanting and aversion and confusion that arises from this obsessive reaction. It's like the chicken and the egg kind of thing. It just keeps going.

So all the aspects of practice are to help us see through wisdom. When wisdom recognizes the fallacy, when it senses that this clinging, this aversion, this confusion is based on inaccurate understanding, then wisdom allows it to basically drop away, evaporate.

As Steve said at the end of his talk last night, he was talking about seeing with steady awareness these strong torments of heart and mind. But that same process of steady, non-judging, non-engaged, non-involved awareness is what brings our heart-mind the wisdom to see, to understand the aspects of impermanence, of anattā or not-self, and of unreliability—the three aspects of all conditioned phenomena. Recognizing that accurately isn't depressing. It frees us from reacting and responding and trying to make ourselves happy in a way that completely doesn't work because we're misperceiving the world.

I want to use anicca, or impermanence, as a jumping off place to talk about this. The Buddha said: "Bhikkhus"—bhikkhus is the Pali word for monks, but really it means anyone who's engaged in practice, so it's us—"Bhikkhus, when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated, it eliminates all sensual lust. It eliminates all lust for becoming, for getting, for becoming another existence. It eliminates all ignorance. It uproots all conceit, 'I am.'"

Those things—that's a description of a completely awakened person who's no longer caught in the grips of self-involvement, of greed, of aversion. To me that's an incredibly powerful statement: when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated.

If you turn it around, it's saying that when we don't perceive impermanence, that leads to this habit of lusting for sense pleasures, of trying to become something different, something better, the sense of self that feeds the sense of "I am."

So how can just this perception of impermanence have such a powerful effect? This perception of impermanence is pointing to the nature of insight. When we talk about insight understanding, it's really about a shift of perception. It's not that when there's insight, somehow we understand intellectually. There could be insight into all kinds of things, into personal experiences in your life. You're sitting and some problem in your life is going on and suddenly you see it in a different way. Another way to deal with it you hadn't thought about. That's the shift of perception.

What the Buddha is saying with this is not that when there's deep insight understanding, the world has changed. When the Buddha awoke under the Bodhi tree, free from suffering in his mind, in his heart, he didn't wake up into a different world. It's the same old world, with the same old problems, same old people running around doing the same old stupid things. And also nice things, also compassionate things, but the same world.

When we talk about the awakening, the insight that comes through our steady practice, it's not that we become different. It's that the perception becomes accurate. It aligns with how things actually are. This is really the shift that is insight.

A simple example: you know those visual things, they used to have books called the Magic Eye, where you'd have all these blocks of color that didn't look like anything, and if you looked at it with a steady, steady gaze, but soft gaze, not trying to see, at some point all of a sudden an image would jump out like 3D soccer players. And it's still just the same blocks. Then you'd go to the next page and you think, well, let me see the 3D soccer players, and you're looking for it hard, and you don't see it. You have to just relax, but be steady. If you look and relax and then look away and then come back, it doesn't work either. But once you've seen the 3D soccer players in there, even though the next time you look you don't see it right away, you know it was there.

Because you saw it, you know it was there. So there are these two ways of perceiving, and in a way they both have their accuracy. But if you never saw the 3D soccer player—like for instance, my mother. We were in a mall one time and they had big posters of this, and she just couldn't see it. It was driving her crazy. She's like, "Come on, come on." And the tighter she got, of course, the harder it was to see it, because she's bugging her eyes out trying to see. "Relax, Ma, relax." She never did see it.

That's how it is with us and impermanence a lot of the time. This is the really powerful level of insight—the level of perception.

We've talked about perception, right? It's that simple recognition of a sense experience happening in every mind moment. Useful! It's just neutral, but it's extremely useful. If we didn't have perception, you'd walk in—well first of all, why would you walk in? You'd hear the bell ring and go, "What's that sound? What does it mean? What am I supposed to do now? Where am I? What the heck is going on?" So perception is extremely helpful.

And the second there's perception, the whole world arises around it. What we perceive, this is from the Buddha, we think about. And what we think about, we often complicate with associations and memories. This is when we get off track. But it all starts with perception, and that's extremely useful.

However, as Dilgo Khyentse said, when the sense organs encounter an object—a sound, for example, in the ear—the only part the object itself plays is to initiate the process of perception in your consciousness. From then on, as your mind reacts to the object, influenced by all your accumulated habits and past experiences, the whole process is entirely subjective. So when your mind is full of anger, the whole world seems to be a hell realm. Have you ever noticed that? When your mind is peaceful, when your heart is peaceful, free from clinging or fixation or reactivity, then you experience everything as primordially pure.

The thing is, pretty much until we start really exploring this, the tendency is we believe our perceptions. We think this is really how it is.

I'll give a simple example. I was with a friend at her house, and there was just a blanket thrown over the back of the couch. I said, "Oh, could you hand me that blue blanket?" She says, "What blue blanket?" "That blue blanket on the back of your couch." She says, "That's not blue, that's green." And we're both—I could not see it as green. She could not see it as blue. Luckily, that's pretty benign, right? We didn't come to blows or have an argument or whatever. But it's really interesting to see how quickly the whole world can come up based on perception.

There was a great example Alexis gave the other day when he was meditating in Burma and he heard that sound. Really, the accurate perception was that he didn't know what it was. But with one perception—the sound outside—came all the responses and reactions of mind, the compassion for the poor worker suffering. All of that is what we perceive, we think about, we complicate based on our experience, right? And if we don't question it, we believe this is really what's happening. Then it's so fun to be able to shift to, "No, it's the guy snoring"—and a whole different series of thoughts arise. The thoughts lead to reactions, to moods, to how we respond to the world. If they'd been talking, Alexis might have turned around and said, "Wake up, you're wasting your life, wake up!" But luckily we're in silence. And that's why we're in silence here, folks.

Perception is really powerful, and the whole world comes out just like that.

I picked up a Dharma book that I was looking for something in it. And I found a little note in this book. It had been lying around for years. I picked it up and looked at it. "Wow, that's my handwriting. This is right in the place I was looking for." So I thought, "Oh yeah, right, okay, some things don't change."

But the sense of just looking at it and seeing my handwriting in a flash—this whole sense of me and my life and my past and teaching—it just came up like that. Sense of self, my whole history, like a whole blanket of self arose. Just from the perception of seeing pencil on paper.

So it's just so interesting. With steady awareness we watch how this process works. Nothing right or wrong, we just really watch how it works. Without the steady awareness, we can so easily get caught in just totally believing our perceptions.

So, back to perception of impermanence and to the aspect of insight. The Buddha spoke about three levels of wisdom, three levels of understanding. Sayadaw U Tejaniya talks about it frequently. They're all useful, and we kind of bounce back and forth between them, but it explains why we think we know something, but it doesn't really change how we live our life.

The first level is called sutamayā paññā, and it's really heard wisdom. When Steve was talking about Right View the first night and saying from the suttas that the Buddha said the first thing you need is to hear—hear it somehow—that's heard wisdom. So, say we're talking about impermanence. We've read about impermanence, we all can go, "Yeah, we hear that, everything's changing." That's heard wisdom. We may or may not believe it, but even when we do, it's still on that level.

But it's something. When Steve was talking about injecting right view, sometimes even on that level it can help. If I'm in the middle of a strong emotion, really caught in it, and I can remind myself, "Right, this is an emotion"—in that moment, I'm still really caught in it. But I'm injecting the first level of wisdom, heard wisdom, which reminds me still: it's an emotion, this isn't the whole world.

The second level grows from that first level. We really think about it. We use our intelligence, we explore it, we start noticing in our life. So in terms of impermanence—the first level, that things are changing—probably you wouldn't argue with that. Would anyone here argue with that? You wouldn't dare, would you?

This is why I wanted to pick impermanence to talk about, because on the level of the first level of wisdom, it's the most obvious one. We think, "Yeah, we know everything's changing." So why am I talking about it as this big insight that can free our heart and mind if we perceive it? We think, "I know it." But it's just that first level, and it doesn't change anything.

The second level is really thinking about it, analyzing it. You mull it over, you start to notice things. You can go outside—the sun's setting, it's impermanent. You're consciously trying to notice. And it's going a little deeper. This is important. Bringing it up might make us inquire, might give us the energy to keep cultivating awareness. But you think, "Well, okay, I'm really getting it. I'm noticing every day the sun goes down, every morning it comes back again. I notice people are wearing different clothes today, some days your hair's different—a good hair day, a bad hair day." You notice these things, unless you have no hair—then you're saved from that. But you have to shave every day, so that's a drag too.

But somehow it doesn't really change stuff.

The third level, bhāvanāmayā paññā, is really insight-level wisdom. That's the level where our perception—not just our thinking about it, but the moment-to-moment spontaneous perception—actually shifts, comes into alignment. You could say in a way we cellularly know, even just for a moment, that nothing is static for one fraction of a second.

And I can say that, and I've experienced that in the past, but I'm not experiencing that right now. So when I say it, that's the second level. But once there's a shift of perception where impermanence is really perceived on that immediate level—not thinking your way into it, you can't think your way into it—the perception shifts.

Of course, then it shifts back, like those magic eye things. But knowing it, having experienced it cellularly in lots of different ways, it changes something. You know somehow that the perception we don't even realize we're perceiving—that things don't change—has shifted.

We don't even recognize that—and that's what I want to talk about. But on some level, a shift occurs, and we know something in a cellular way that we didn't know before.

That's the third level of insight. Insight isn't like intellectual knowledge; it's an understanding, you could say. It's not like knowing information—those are the first two levels—but it's an understanding that simply happens. And then, in that perception that has arisen from being accurately aligned with how things are, what we perceive becomes what we think about. What we think about becomes complicated; it hardens into view.

Instead of the perception being off—actually a misperception leading to thoughts and views that are not in alignment with how things really are, taking us far away—the perception is accurate. And this is really when the perception matches experience. Then how we think about things, the response to the experience, to the situation, is appropriate.

So what happens is that wisdom abandons the strategy of clinging in the face of the perception of impermanence—not because clinging is bad, but because it doesn't make any sense. I mean, when you see the sun going down, do you break out in tears? Because it's beautiful, that's a different kind of tears, okay. But if you see the sun going down, you're not like, "Oh no! Oh no! Oh my god, it's gone!" Maybe if you're in a certain mood, but mostly probably not, right? Because it doesn't make any sense. The thought doesn't even really arise. It just doesn't make sense.

Well, that's how it works. It's not like, "Wow, everything's impermanent!" No, no, no. It's like—oh, the clinging just doesn't arise. And we're just really present, so aligned with how things are. It's not that we don't care about things. We're actually able to care. Care and attachment aren't the same thing.

When we're not attached—when it's not "I need the sun"—it's just, okay, it's beautiful. It's gone. Now it's like this. That's got its own beauty. We can just be so present when the clinging isn't there. But it's not something we can talk ourselves into.

So what allows for this shift of perception? What sets the conditions for it? Guess what it could possibly be? The steady awareness that we've been talking about. Not looking for impermanence. Not looking for anything. But this—well, we've talked about it non-stop, I don't have to say it again, but I will. The sense of settling into, relaxing into: it's like this now. It's like this now. But steady, steady, steady. Without a supposition, without an assumption of what it should be, then the truth of things reveals itself over and over and over.

So why is it so complicated? Does it seem complicated? Why is it? It's so clear—everything's changing all the time. It's so clear. Obviously, it isn't so clear, or we'd all be free.

Why is it not so clear? I want to talk a little bit about these habits of mind—the same ones Steve was talking about in all their full-blooming mess—but in a more subtle way that they show up.

What blocks the accurate perception, put it that way. So it is, of course, our old friends—visitors, but they're there a lot. The three, the big three: greed, hatred, and delusion. Delusion, confusion, greed or the tendency to cling, and resistance, fear, aversion—those three.

This is how I want to talk about it in terms of impermanence and perception. The three ways these habits show up—the habits in the heart-mind of relating to experience, particularly in terms of things changing and going away.

The first is that of denial, avoiding, leading into clinging. That's basically resistance and clinging to change, a kind of block to the clear perception of "this is gone now."

Another one is misperception—recognizing wrongly, the inaccurate perception.

And the third is inattention. Lack of steady attention feeds the perception of permanence.

So let me talk a little bit about each of these.

The first one, the kind of denial. Denial that things change. Do you ever have any experience of that at all? When something changes and you feel, "Well, this shouldn't be happening"?

There's a sutta about Assaji, who was a very well-practiced monk at the time of the Buddha. He'd had good practice, good concentration, and he's basically dying—he's sick and dying. The Buddha hears that Assaji is really upset, feeling that he's falling away, filled with remorse and fear.

The Buddha comes to him and says, "What's the problem? Are you feeling remorse and fear? Have you been harming yourself or others? Have you been breaking the precepts?"

"No, not at all."

"Well then, what's the matter?"

Assaji explains, "Formerly, when I would be meditating, when I'd be paying attention, I could really achieve stability of mind, concentration of mind, steadiness of mind. But now I can't. When I try to do it, I can't, and I'm afraid I'm just going to fall away."

And the Buddha says, basically: Hello. You're dying. Your energy, your physical experience is completely different from how it was before. The conditions that were present when you could easily get concentrated are not present now. It's not that you're falling away. And besides, concentration, focusing, isn't the liberating aspect of the path anyway. So it's not about that.

But even someone with as much understanding as Assaji—and he had the Buddha around to help him, while we're floundering around on our own—even he didn't notice. Completely different conditions are here. Of course the effect is different than before.

Have you ever noticed here, you have one day where you go for a walk in the woods and you're so clear and present and mindful? So the next day what do you do? You go walk in the woods at the same time, with the same idea that it's going to be clear and present and mindful. And it's not. You trip over roots, everything's a mess, the black flies are out, you're filled with aversion, it's raining, and you think: What happened? I had it, I knew, and it's gone. I blew it.

I'm not really exaggerating that much, am I? Yes, it's a shame, but that's how it is. And we don't really notice. It's a completely different set of experiences. You're not the same person even, and everything else is different.

These are simple examples, but denial. I read an article, a little snippet in a newspaper years ago, from some little town in Spain where the mayor said the cemeteries were completely full. There was no room to bury anyone else. So he sent out a memo to the people in the town that nobody should die until they could find more cemetery space.

That was major denial.

But the denial comes in many ways. One of the ways it comes, in my experience, is through the habit that is so deeply ingrained in all of us—this habit of resistance to unpleasant experience and leaning into the pleasant, which leads to not even noticing the neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

This is something I could give a whole talk about, but I've got to condense it to two minutes. I think this is the genius, one of the genius things of the Buddha, where he says—and this is really clear in his teachings—that all these sense door experiences we're having, seeing, smelling, tasting, thinking, whatever the six are, you know them, you're experiencing them all day, constantly changing. When each one arises, just like saññā, perception, arises quite naturally in the mind, what also arises is that each experience, say a sound, is experienced by the mind as having a quality of pleasant or unpleasant or neutral.

It's quite quick and quite subtle. It's not inherent in the sound—it's again conditioned, how it's perceived in our particular mind stream. So this sound, one time it could be pleasant in your mind, another time it could be neutral or unpleasant. It might be pleasant for you in that moment and unpleasant for me. It's not inherent, but it's just another mental experience. And this is happening with every sense door experience of all six senses.

To me, this is genius because I never would have noticed that if I hadn't read about it, if I hadn't practiced and gotten in the habit of looking at it. And what's so brilliant is that in the not noticing, the habit comes.

He says, what's the difference between an awakened person and an unawakened person? Both types of people experience painful feelings, pleasurable feelings, and neutral feelings. It's the same. It's not that when you get awakened all the unpleasant stuff stops. I would just like to say that again—it doesn't stop. The same amount of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral keeps happening.

So what's the difference? He's saying, and I'm shortening it, the tendency in the mind when we're not recognizing—and he starts with the unpleasant—when we don't recognize unpleasant experience, say a physical unpleasant experience, then the tendency of the unawakened person is as if they were shot by an arrow that sticks you in the leg. And on top of that, he says, you yell and scream and beat your breast and pull your hair and lament. That's the language. So basically we get all upset because it hurts. Can you relate to that so far? Yeah, a little bit, right.

So it's as if we shoot ourselves with a second arrow. And that goes on, and it just seems normal. I mean, it is normal. It's, unfortunately, our habit. Then it becomes a tendency, a habit that underlies the mind—resistance to unpleasant experience. That just feels normal.

And then, in the presence of unpleasant experience, the only escape a worldling knows, someone who doesn't really see clearly, the only escape we know from unpleasant feeling is to go try and get a pleasant feeling. So we lust after pleasure. We move away from the unpleasant and go look for something pleasant. Again, can you relate to this at all, even a little? I'm not saying good or bad—I'm saying this becomes the habit.

And so underlying the mind becomes this habit of craving for pleasant. We don't realize as it really is the nature of what's going on, or the nature of the feelings themselves. They come, they go. They just last for a second. But in a way we're putting all our eggs in the basket of getting more pleasant feeling, thinking that's going to make us happy.

This is where the whole dynamic of craving for pleasant and pushing away unpleasant arises. And it's so deeply in us.

I mean, it's just so deeply in us. I'm not saying this is good or bad. If you had a choice, you could tell the difference between pleasant and unpleasant. Neutral—maybe you would notice neutral once in a while. The Buddha's not saying who cares, you can tell the difference. If you had a choice, you wouldn't go for the unpleasant.

But so often this is arising in every moment, and when we don't know it, we're just on this ping-pong—oh, get me away from that, go to this. And the whole way that we tend to perceive what's good and what's bad tends to be based on what's pleasant and what's unpleasant.

Check it out. If you're having a good sitting, it's rare—unless you've really been playing with this for a long time—it's rare that there was a lot of unpleasant stuff going on. Right? Usually, it was pleasant. As you go on and on, though, and as mindfulness and awareness get stronger, awareness doesn't need to be touched. Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—equal. Awareness can meet it equally. When we can start to take refuge in that steady awareness, rather than taking refuge in running away from unpleasant and needing to get more pleasant—that's been our refuge so much, you know. Even just to the point of, I don't know, you're a little bored, you go to the refrigerator. Pick up the phone. None of these things are bad. The things aren't bad necessarily. But just watch. I'll talk more about this tomorrow morning, but watch as you go through the day. How much of what we pick is to have more pleasant feeling?

Ajahn Buddhadasa, who was a great Thai meditation master, a forest monk who died in the late 1990s—he said, just first, just notice pleasant feeling, how ephemeral. A feeling tone just lasts like that, you know? And then just kind of contemplate all the decisions you've made in your life. How many of them have been based on moving towards more pleasant feeling? He says his guess was ninety-five percent. Now it's not saying bad; it's just that we're giving pleasant feeling a power it doesn't have to make us happy. And in terms of our understanding of what's right or wrong, good and bad, it's so based on pleasant and unpleasant.

So back to the denial of change. So often, when something beautiful or someone we love dies or goes away, or something that's important to us changes, or our body changes, or we get sick, or your car gets wrecked—or even down to, you know, you didn't get the second piece of pizza. I mean, it can range from really life-changing to little. But let's go big. It brings up a lot of sadness, you know, a lot of grief often. Especially when someone we love dies, it brings up grief. And grief and sadness are pretty unpleasant.

And if we're not aware, if we don't have steady mindfulness, the habit is to try and move away from that, to not be at ease with just resting at ease in the sadness. And even deep underneath it, almost an unconscious interpretation sometimes: something's wrong because I feel sad. Right? This shouldn't be happening in some way. Even though we all know everything ends and everyone gets sick and everyone dies. We all know that. But as if when we feel grief about it, there's something wrong, and there's a subtle moving away—let's not look at it, let's not look at it.

So for me, I feel like grief, sadness—if we can open to that as part of life... You know, it's not that "Oh yes, she will not be seen by me again." I mean, the Buddha could say that maybe. But for me, when someone I love is gone, there's a deep sadness. But we don't have to be in denial, thinking either there's something wrong with us or something wrong with that situation. It's like this now. And being able to just, with gentle awareness—sadness is like this. Grief is like this; it's part of being human. You know, it's a sign of love, the love really, in some ways.

So then we don't have to go into denial, try and resist—that's the resistance to the unpleasant—and then the craving for the pleasant, you know: okay, let me go party so I don't have to feel unhappy.

This is kind of weird, but I just read this headline yesterday about the English royal family. Not like I follow them so much, but I just read this headline about Prince Harry, whose mother, Princess Diana, died almost twenty years ago. He was just saying how when she died—I guess he was twelve or something—he just basically pretended like nothing had happened.

He just couldn't deal. So now he's speaking out for mental health. He's in his late twenties or something, but he said for years and years, up until just a few years ago, he basically said, "Well, okay, that happened." Boom, now everything's fine, and I'm going to play and be a boy and fly planes and do all this stuff, and everything's great. And that's the other way—completely going after pleasure and just pretending this never happened. Until now, you know, the stuff he's starting to get in touch with, the grief and the sadness, and he has to learn how to be with it. That it's quite okay. It's part of life.

There's a lovely story in the suttas when the Buddha was dying. He announced he was going to die in three months or something, and his attendant Ananda, who had been his attendant for twenty-five years, his cousin, very close—and if you haven't read any of the Buddha's suttas and you do, Ananda is like this really lovable human character. He humanizes things. He's not perfect. He makes mistakes. He's very friendly. He's always trying to help people get access to the Buddha. You can't help but like Ananda. A lot of the other monks and some of the nuns too, they're kind of remote, but Ananda feels really human.

So the Buddha's announced this, and then he's giving a Dhamma talk to a bunch of monks, and he looks around and goes, "Where's Ananda?" And it turned out, they went and found him—Ananda had gone to his hut. And Andy Olinsky, who was the director of the study center for many years, a Pali scholar, tells me this is a famous artistic rendering of Ananda: he was standing in his doorway, just leaning against the doorpost and weeping and weeping and saying, "Oh, what's going to become of me? My teacher, who's been so compassionate to me, he's going away. What will I do without him?"

So this image of Ananda's grief is very famous. And of course the Buddha calls him back. "Ananda, haven't I told you? Everything that comes together goes apart. All conditions change." But with so much compassion—not "you stupid jerk"—but with total, total love and compassion. I love that because it's like, this is human. It's our conditioning.

And if we can really understand there's pleasant, there's unpleasant, neutral, we don't need to run from the unpleasant. When we just—it's like this now. It's unpleasant, but we're present, we're alive, we're whole, we're really completely in tune with this is how it is in this moment. And it again will change. It's not like, "Oh, I know, I'm sad now, and then it'll change." That's a resistance. Just like this now. And it will change.

So when we notice that resistance, let it be a wake-up call. And then it's not that we stop caring—we're really much more present, more free to respond in an appropriate, kind, compassionate way.

That's one way, I think, that perception of impermanence isn't seen—because we're lost in that reactivity, the fear of the unpleasant, going for the pleasant, and thinking that's just the natural response. It's steady awareness that lets us see through that. And that simple willingness to just, as the Tibetans say, rest at ease in whatever arises. So what we're saying is just relax. It's just like this now. You don't have to think about the past, the future—just this moment. It's like this now. And the way things really are shows itself.

The Buddha said at one point, "The search for a resting place is burning. Not to need one is cool and peaceful." I love that. Cool and peaceful—kind of neutral.

We're still in that wanting the pleasant, away from the unpleasant. Cool and peaceful sometimes isn't so attractive. So see where you are with that.

That's one way to start noticing how the perception of impermanence gets blocked. The second level where we misperceive—where we actually are perceiving something, where even intellectually on the first level we might think we're seeing it as impermanent—is this: we see something, we see its beginning, and then we see it end. So we say everything's impermanent. This retreat had a beginning, and soon it's going to have an end. Maybe not soon enough for some of you in a particular mood. In another mood you might say, "Oh, I could do this forever." And five minutes later it's, "Please God, get me out of here." We tend not to notice how that changes.

But we see that something has a beginning and an end, and we think, "Oh, I see change." But what we don't notice—the misperception—is that we're not noticing the momentariness of change. I remember hearing a talk by the Dalai Lama once where he really accented this. He said, "We see something arise, then it exists for a while, and then it passes away." I thought, wait a minute—come back. This "exists for a while"? No. There's no existing for a while. Everything is changing momentarily.

This perception of "it's like this, and then it's going to change"—this has been my life, I've been like this for sixty-six years, and at some point I'm going to die, so I know there's change. But my perception might be, you know, even though I look pretty different from how I looked when I was five years old, every day is different—but we don't notice that so much. So we have the intellectual sense that we're perceiving impermanence, but we're not. We're seeing this steadiness, and then we're really surprised when suddenly it ends. That's a misperception. Endings take us by surprise.

The Buddha said once, picking up a little bit of dirt underneath his fingernail, "There's not even this much of form, of mind, that is permanent, that is stable, that is not subject to change, that will remain the same. Not even this much." He said, "If there was even this much form, mind, perception—anything that was this permanent—this living of the holy life for the complete destruction of suffering could not be seen. But there isn't even that much that's stable, that's permanent."

We don't like that too much. The mind that's looking for ease—this habit of looking for ease in the pleasant, in the comfortable, in knowing how it is—we tend to like that. I tend to like that. I want to settle down and not be shaken up all the time. I want to rest at ease. Not in whatever arises—I want it to stop arising. I want it to just be kind of mellow, and I'll rest at ease. So there's that clinging that comes in, even to just a particular moment. We don't notice how it arises, how the conditions are always changing.

Someone was describing to me what I think is a great example. A time-lapse video of a plant growing—you see the plant growing, it turns, the buds come and the flower comes and the leaves come and the fruit comes, and it all just keeps going. There's no one moment that it's stable. There's not a moment saying, "Now this is the plant, now this is the flower, now this is the bud." It's always one thing morphing and transmuting into the next, into the next, into the next. There's no way you can extract something out and say it's discrete, that it's just that. And even so, how can you separate the plant from the soil or the air or the sun or the water, even if you're not seeing all of that?

It's all coming together all the time. Same with us. I mean, that is exactly the same with us.

On the actual visual level, walking through our daily life, we don't really see that so much. But sometimes in the quietness of meditation, when you're just sitting and feeling sensations, sometimes you can notice. It's ch-ch-ch-ch—lots of sensations. Some of you have mentioned not just sensations, but the whole six sense doors. You know, there's seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, thinking, thinking, thinking, sensation—and stuff's just coming, coming, coming. Someone said in a group, "Is it going to stop?" No, it's not going to stop. This is it.

We start to see sakkāya—just the constant morphing, arising and passing, arising and passing, every instant. This is what's going on in our life. When we're fighting it, you know, the search for a resting place—"Please, God, let it stop"—there are times it feels like that. That's burning. But when we can meet it with "It's just like this now," and then "The next is like this now"—when the clinging goes away, the trying to stop it, trying to slow it down, trying to just make it be what it is for a certain amount of time—when that goes away, the sense of dissonance, the sense of being at odds and in contention with life, with experience, that also is gone. And we can really respond in an appropriate manner with sensitivity, with tenderness, with seeing things the way they are rather than the way we wish they could be.

The third level of delusion, of moha, which supports not recognizing impermanence, the perception, is inattention. So this is really where the steady awareness comes in. The steadiness, the continuity of awareness, the continuity of mindfulness, is actually the tool—it's the tool that reveals life as it is. Nisargadatta Maharaj said, "We miss the real by lack of attention and create the unreal by excess of imagination." I love that.

So we're paying attention, we're really cultivating. It's not in our power to be aware every moment, but the amount of clear aspiration and intention each of us is putting in, the fact that you're still here—that's how we know there's a deep commitment. Because, you know, if you're not really trying to cultivate awareness, it's pretty unbearable hanging out here. You're just eating and you can't talk to anybody and there's nothing to do. It's not really what you would choose. So we know—plus we talk to you all every day too, and it's really quite inspiring.

The steadiness of awareness starts to reveal ways that we've been assuming permanence without realizing it. One big way in our experience through the day is the sense of our personality—sakkāya-diṭṭhi, personality view. Steve was talking a little bit about this. People say, "Oh, I'm such an angry person," for example. And you think about all the times you've been angry. There's an assumption of permanence about that. Remembering the past, imagining the future, but not really a sensitive moment-to-moment-to-moment awareness. Because if we cultivate that, we see there's no statement like that we can make that's really true, except for in this particular moment.

A good friend was describing an experiment she did. She'd been practicing for a long time and she was working somewhere with other people. She was a cook, and they were telling her, "You know, you're such an aversive person. You're a real aversive personality and you're just aversive all the time." And she was like, "Yeah, I am an aversive person. I know I'm an angry person." But she said, "Let me check." So she took one day to just sit and not work. She said, "I'm just going to watch the mind. Just watch what's coming up in the mind."

And of course, this is how it's going to be when you're just steady with it. She said, yeah, angry thoughts came up—a lot of them. But she said, maybe it was ten percent of the day. There were plenty of moments of appreciation, moments of just being neutral, being hungry. There were lots of generous moments in the heart and mind. There were lots of moments of love and compassion. How could she say she's an angry person, you know?

But think back on the day-to-day. Or if you go to bed at night, do you ever go to bed at the end of the day and go, "Oh, this has been such a hard day"? Or "I've been sleepy all day." A lot of times people come in and say they've been sleepy all day in an individual interview.

I say, "Really? What about at lunch?" "Well, no, I wasn't sleepy then." "Were you sleepy every single sitting? Were you sleeping?" "No." "When?" "Well, the sitting before breakfast I was sleepy. And at four o'clock I was a little bit sleepy." "And?" "Well, that was it."

But without the steady awareness, we make these assumptions. We think, "I'm angry," like my friend. So even if it's not manifesting, we think it's lurking under there. We believe it's our true nature—it just isn't showing up right now. Maybe I'm feeling compassionate, but that's a scam. What's really under there is this angry, worthless person. And I know it's going to show up again.

This is assuming permanence. This is misperception. What's happening right now? This is where we can start to trust the simplicity of awareness rather than the assumptions we make about everything.

I want to offer some ways of noticing when you're assuming permanence. If you're relating to any experience that comes up in the day with the thought, "Oh no, how is it going to be like this for the rest of the retreat?"—have you ever had that thought? Whether it's a beautiful experience or a difficult one. Often it doesn't even last five minutes. "How am I going to get through the day feeling like this?" Or a little twinge comes in your knee and it's, "Oh my God, this is it for the rest of the retreat. I might as well hang it up." And it doesn't even turn into anything. Notice how you relate to experiences like that.

With steady awareness, you can start to see the habit of assuming permanence—fear, anxiety, self-doubt projected into the future, brought up from the past. It's just a particular moment that we notice and highlight. Notice when you do that. Notice when you try to repeat a beautiful experience, like I talked about going into the woods, where we think we just have to do that and that's how it's going to be—not seeing that conditions are constantly changing.

You can't step in the same river twice. The same person can't step in the same river twice, because you're not the same person from one second to the next.

During the last three-month course, the five teachers would have dinner together every night in the dining room. We know each other for years—thirty years. We know each other so well. But every night it's different. We're each in a different mood. We've had different experiences. We come together as a team and might think it's all the same, but every year it's different because we're never the same person. All five of us are five different people with five different experiences. You can't have the same thing twice. Really noticing that all causes and conditions are constantly changing—physical, mental, environmental.

Also notice when you're experiencing something difficult and waiting for it to go away. Or something beautiful—the beautiful ones you notice when they go, because you suffer. The difficult ones, say you're anxious, and then suddenly it's lunchtime. You're having a nice lunch, thinking about this and that, taking a walk. Then later you realize, "Oh, I was so anxious before. What happened to it?" You didn't notice it was gone.

But when you do notice it's gone, take a moment to really register the gone-ness with awareness.

To me, that's really important. Not just, "Oh yeah, it's gone, that's fine, la la la." Register that it really isn't here. Not that idea that it's under there somewhere, but you don't want to look for it because surely you'll see it—you know it's there. Register: it really isn't here now. It's like this now. It's really different and constantly changing. Let it in. Conditions are always changing.

Ajahn Chah had a great practice. He would just say to anything going through the day: "And this is uncertain." So, this is uncertain. How we assume—you know, you assume I'm going to stop at 8:30? You don't know. It's uncertain. I don't know either. They're hoping, but... I've got to talk fast. But it's more amazing that the schedule actually goes on as we think, because this is uncertain. We never know. And we all know a million stories about sudden amazing things—horrible or beautiful things that happen. I'm not going to tell any. But just: this is uncertain. I wonder, it says on the menu what lunch is going to be tomorrow, but this is uncertain. Maybe it'll be tempeh again. It's uncertain.

Anyway. All right, I am going to stop at 8:30—you're lucky.

But the thing I want to say is that these are just some ways that the perception of anicca, of impermanence, is blocked by the habits of mind—of misperception, delusion, not recognizing accurately—fed by the habits of greed, of clinging, and avoidance of unpleasantness. From that deep, deep habits of not recognizing unpleasant, pleasant, and neutral. All of that seen through with the simple steadiness of moment-to-moment awareness. Not trying to see through, just the willingness to drop into this moment just as it is, free from expectation, free from judgment. That's what we're practicing.

And that's what's so beautiful to me—not just about the Dharma, but about the way things are. When we recognize accurately what arises, it isn't like, "Oh well, who cares, everything's changing, the hell with it." And that's what people are often afraid of. If I really realize things are changing and I'm not attached, I won't care about anything. But it's just the reverse. Like I was saying with the sunset—the sense of when we're not afraid something's going to go, when we know it's going to go. So the clinging doesn't come, and we're free to just be fully present with tenderness, appreciating. The beauty, the poignancy—even in the sadness there's a sense of being fully present and alive in it. Kind of like really opening to the wonder and the mystery, rather than just trying to keep it all copacetic and as comfortable as we can, and when a big change comes maybe I'll be ready for it.

Just this. Just this.

I want to end with this poem that expresses that to me, from Hafiz:

Deepening the Wonder

Death is a favor to us, but our scales have lost their balance. The impermanence of the body should give us great clarity, deepening the wonder in our senses and eyes of this mysterious existence we share and are surely just traveling through.

If I were in the tavern tonight, Hafiz would call for drinks, and as the master poured, I would be reminded that all I know of life and myself is that we are just a mid-air flight of golden wine between his pitcher and his cup.

If I were in the tavern tonight, I would buy freely for everyone in this world, because our marriage with the cruel beauty of time and space cannot endure very long.

Death is a favor to us, but our minds have lost their balance. The miraculous existence and impermanence of form always makes the illumined ones laugh and sing.

Let's just sit quietly for a moment.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 166

A Wise Person Is Known By Their Actions

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson addresses a question that often arises in practice: if the heart-mind is free from greed, hatred, and delusion, what remains? Drawing from the Buddha's teachings, she demonstrates that wisdom naturally gives rise to beautiful wholesome qualities—renunciation (nekkhamma), loving-kindness (mettā), and compassion (karuṇā)—which form the second factor of the Noble Eightfold Path, Right Intention (sammāsaṅkappa).
>
> Wilson shares the Buddha's own account from the suttas of how he observed his thoughts, dividing them into two classes: thoughts of sensual desire, ill will, and cruelty on one side, and thoughts of renunciation, non-ill will, and non-cruelty on the other. Through diligent awareness, he noticed that unwholesome thoughts naturally subsided when clearly seen, while wholesome thoughts could be sustained without harm. As the Buddha taught, whatever we frequently think and ponder becomes the inclination of the mind.
> Through powerful contemporary stories—from Maha Ghosananda's teaching of mettā in Cambodian refugee camps to a dinner party transformed by non-complementary behavior—Wilson illustrates how this ancient wisdom applies to modern life. She emphasizes that true renunciation is not external giving up but inner contentment, and that mettā, as Ajahn Sumedho describes it, is simply witnessing the unpleasant without creating anything around it. This steady awareness, meeting each moment with openness rather than reactivity, is the very essence of the path.

So tonight, I want to talk about something that came up last night. A couple of people said things, wondering, you know, if in the heart-mind there's no greed, hatred, and delusion, is it just like a big, vast wasteland? And that question actually comes up a lot. I find it quite poignant. People have said to me, not here, but elsewhere, "If there's no greed and aversion, what do I do? Just sit in my room for the rest of my life?" It touches me—we're so immersed in those habits that become the intention for action that we say, "Well, what else could there be?"

So I'll say there is something else. And I want to talk about that tonight.

The Buddha was very clear. One of his statements is: "A wise person is characterized by their actions. A fool is characterized by their actions. It is through the activities of one's life that one's discernment shines."

So this isn't just an esoteric practice that we can engage in because we have the time and can really watch all these subtle movements of mind and clinging and aversion. It's not just a mind game. Buddhism isn't just a mind game—it's really about the bottom line: how we act in the world, with ourselves, with others in relationship, is how the understanding, the wisdom of heart and mind, shows.

And that's because, as the Buddha often said, intention is the seed of all action, the heart of all action, and it comes from the mind. I'm sure you've heard this, the most famous opening of the Dhammapada: "All experience is preceded by mind, led by mind, made by mind. Speak or act with a corrupted, impure mind—basically a mind of kilesa—and suffering follows, as the wagon wheel follows the hoof of the ox. All experience is preceded by mind, led by mind, made by mind. Speak or act with a peaceful mind and happiness follows like a never-departing shadow."

So knowing, being aware of what's arising in the mind-heart—same word, you know, in the Pali, citta, mind-heart—knowing what's arising, knowing the habits, what gives rise to the mental intention that gives rise to action: this is the seed of freedom from suffering in our own mind and heart, and also in how we relate with the world.

One of my favorite quotes comes from Maha Ghosananda. He's died now, but he was a Cambodian monk, a peace activist, sort of like the Cambodian Thich Nhat Hanh. After the Khmer Rouge had basically killed millions of people in Cambodia and destroyed most of the nunneries and monasteries, people were all living in refugee camps in Thailand. He was a Cambodian monk, but he had been out of the country during the years this was happening. Most of his family members were killed, so it's not that he wasn't touched by this.

He would go into the refugee camps, and as Cambodia had been essentially, largely a Buddhist country, people had a familiarity and respect for the Buddha's teaching and for monks. He would just go and start talking about metta—the core teaching of the Buddha: hatred is never ended by hatred, only by love alone. Can you imagine going into a refugee camp where everyone's there because their family's been killed and saying that? Coming not from his head, but from what he really knew.

He led peace marches through Cambodia after that. And once, in a speech at a demonstration against landmines, he said: "All the landmines in the world have been planted by the landmines in our own hearts. So to understand and thus remove the landmines in our hearts is the way to remove them in the world."

Really, this is where we start. And it may seem daunting, but I want to connect it now to just what we've been doing here—this whole practice of steady awareness, watching all the subtle and not-so-subtle habits of our mind. We've been emphasizing noticing the kilesa habits, but there are also many beautiful, wholesome habits of mind, which I'll talk about in a minute.

But we can have—have you noticed how we can have a really good intention? Like understanding the landmines in our hearts. We can have a really good intention: "I'm not going to get angry anymore." How does that work for you?

But we mean it, don't we? We say it because we don't really know—not just intellectually, but on that bhavanamaya-paññā level—how these habits of mind work. We don't really know deeply the habits of our mind.

And without wisdom, the wisdom that arises from steady mindfulness, steady awareness... really, the wisdom sees the false lure of greed, the false lure of aversion and hatred as a response to difficult situations. It sees through that. And that seeing through is what allows for the natural emergence of the beautiful, of the wholesome, that the Buddha talked about. I'll get there in a minute.

But until we really are recognizing moment to moment our habits, I like to say, they drive the bus. We don't think so, but just that sense of, "I'm not going to get angry anymore." You leave here: "I'm going to sit every day at 7:30 in the morning." We know how hard that is, right? Even when we really mean it.

Or a great example from a retreat here, when U Tejaniya was here one time. A woman said in a group—so since it was twenty people, I feel okay to share it. She was saying, "I'm really watching the habit of my mind, and I went into the dining room at lunch here, and the menu's up on the blackboard. The menu was something that I know is really not good for me, that I'm allergic to, that makes me feel unwell." So wisdom was there. She said, "Well, I'm not going to eat that." That was wisdom in the mind. But then somehow she filled her plate with that stuff and ate it. She was asking, "How come? There was wisdom. How could I do that?"

And Tejaniya, being as he was, said, "Well, superficial wisdom, real kilesa."

And so this is where the sense of bringing the awareness along with us, while the unwholesome habits are running, is where the wisdom starts to come. But what I'm assuming she did—I don't know, but it sounds like—you go in, you have the wise thought, and then you think, "Well, that was good enough, basically. I had the wise thought." I mean, you don't really think that, but that's what happens. And awareness goes on a holiday. And you're sitting there eating whatever it is that made her ill. And then you go, "How could that happen?"

So part of the job of awareness is—it's not going to automatically stop that. We can't stop the habits with an act of will. We know. We try, and we'll keep trying. You're not going to stop trying. I guess it's better to at least recognize it's unwholesome and try to stop it than not know. But generally we say, "Okay, that's wisdom, I've done it, done, dusted," and we stop paying attention. So that's how it happens: "I really wasn't going to get angry the next time my partner did that totally stupid thing. But somehow I did, even though I was going to cultivate compassion."

So, you know, they're good ideas, but we really need the steadiness of awareness that isn't judging. That's why when someone comes in and says they've been watching how aversion was coming up in the retreat here, and they describe seeing it all, and they think they were failing—I say, "That's great." I mean, awareness is watching all of that. And I can see people kind of go, "Geez, whatever I say, she's just going to say awareness is watching it. That's a big help." But I only say it if I mean it. And it is great that awareness is watching.

Of course, then we think, "Okay, I saw it once, right? That should be enough." Don't we say, "I saw it already. It's not going to come back"? But some people start to notice, as the mind gets quieter, the heart gets quieter on retreat, and as the awareness is getting more momentum, spreading out—being in a hurry, the mind thinks then everything should get better. And what people often comment—because it's true—they say, "My God, I'm just seeing craving everywhere I turn around." Anybody notice that? Yeah, right. How could it possibly be so much? And then, if we're taking it personally, we go into some story, trying to push it away or beat ourselves up or think there's something wrong with us.

But the Buddha, out of the whole field of experience for the second noble truth, the cause of suffering—he picked tanha, craving. It must come up once in a while. It must have a big effect in our life. So when we start to see how often it's coming, I'm serious, that's when the wisdom mind is starting to kick in. It's like, "Look at that." The awareness can keep on watching it. It starts to—maybe not as fast as we want—but it starts to lose its glitter, its false promise, even a little bit.

This is what we're doing here, and it's not just esoteric playing with the mind. This is to really see and know what our habits are. Our particular ones. I mean, they all come down to greed, hatred, and delusion—and that's not particular. This is how human minds work. But as Steve said, they're habits. They're not the only possibility. Here they shine up more because we're looking at them, but that's great, because in our daily life—like that woman eating all that food—they're in the background. And that's often what gives rise to intentions, to action, if we don't know, if we're not aware.

So even when we can, on some level, control—like using the precepts—that's great. We can make a commitment not to act in certain harmful ways, and hopefully for all of us that hasn't been super hard: not to kill, not to steal. Well, if you had a tick on you, you know, at least you'd look at what was going on in the mind—and that's the point, right? So we do make some commitments: "I'm not going to do this, I'm going to refrain from that." And we can do that in life on a gross level.

But on a more subtle level, when we're not aware of how these habits work, when we don't really see them, when we've just continued our habit of looking away when they come up—then if the seeds are there in a situation that's unexpected, they can sprout.

There's a quotation I say a lot from a book I read, because it really touched me. It was by a man named Hassan Bayev, a Chechen surgeon. If you remember in the 90s, there was a big civil war between Chechnya—which is part of Russia, an Islamic part—and Russia. It was very violent, very horrible.

So he was a Chechen surgeon who had been living in Russia doing surgery, but when the war started, he came back to Chechnya, to Grozny, the main city, just to work in the hospital and offer his skills. The whole book was called The Oath, and it was just about his experience, which was more horrible than we can even imagine. The conditions sounded about like the mid-1800s here in terms of medical facilities. And he was the only surgeon after a while in this hospital.

He would treat whoever came, from either side—the Chechen patriots, the Russian foot soldiers, the Russian officers, anybody who came. And because he wasn't taking sides, he said, "I'm a Chechen patriot, but I'm not taking sides in terms of healing people." So he was actually under danger from both sides. He ended up being kidnapped, had a very severe concussion, his life was threatened, and he had to escape to Boston. It was actually the Chechen side that kidnapped him and hurt him.

But the point I'm getting to—just to give you the picture—he said: in a situation you've never been in before, where he'd never held a gun, never been in such danger, he said, "You don't know how you'll behave." And he said, "I was fortunate because I have my surgeon's oath not to harm." He felt so clear in his heart, in that wisdom. He knew it wasn't just an idea but that in his heart-mind he was committed to non-harming. He said, "I felt very fortunate I had that."

I think it's a wise thing to say. When we're in a really difficult situation we've never been in, the habits of fear and anger that come up in response to difficulty, in response to the unpleasant—they zoom up. Or the habits of greed that come up when there's just something we want so much to get away from. They just come up. The seeds are there.

So it's the deep aspect of our steady awareness practice. Seeing all this is what's going to free us from that.

I was listening to NPR a couple of years ago, an interview with two men discussing work they were doing with young men in prison. They were doing a project called Interrupting Violence. They were talking about some of the young men who were in prison for really intensive crimes—murder, assault—in prison for a long time.

And just a quotation from one young man, very young but in prison for maybe life, if not many years. He said, "I wish I could take back that three to five seconds when I acted in that violent way."

It gives me the chills, you know?

I might think I wouldn't do something violent, but you don't really know until you really know. It can't be theoretical; it can't be what we wish. It has to be that we've trusted awareness—the steadiness of it, the willingness to stay with what's going on in our mind.

And this is where the beautiful part comes in. Through wisdom, through that steady awareness, as we've said, it allows for, gives the condition for, wisdom—clear seeing, just recognizing what's going on, the truth of things. It lets wisdom arise.

The natural effect of wisdom, when there's wisdom-awareness-mind turned toward aversion or clinging—if there's really enough wisdom in that moment, it's not feeding the kilesa. You can be aware of the kilesa, but it doesn't get stronger and stronger. Wisdom can watch how it behaves, and it can fade out. The kilesa, not the wisdom. Sometimes the kilesa goes and the wisdom fades too. But this is really how wisdom works. We see it clearly.

When the kilesa fades in terms of an intention as a motivation to action, what the Buddha describes is how the three unwholesome thoughts or intentions that lead to action can transform with wisdom. We can try to transform them by wanting to, by making a resolution in our mind that we're going to do it. But when there's really strong wisdom that sees through the greed, the ill will, the thoughts of cruelty, it does in a moment naturally transform.

The Buddha talked about three—there's a whole sutta where he talks about wise thought. Thoughts of greed and thoughts of lust transform in the light of wisdom-awareness to thoughts or intentions of renunciation, of generosity. Thoughts of ill will naturally shift when they're seen through. It's not like you're just left with this big empty void. The response, the quality that comes in the aware, awake, responsive heart-mind at that point, would be one of metta, of friendliness—or if it's been more a cruel kind of thought, of compassion.

The Buddha was exploring this in his own mind. I want to share his attitude. This is one of the suttas where he's talking about his practice before he became a Buddha. He starts it out by saying, "When I was still only an unenlightened bodhisattva..." So his unenlightened bodhisattva was pretty good, you know, but he's describing his practice.

I want to read a little, because listen to the tone he's saying it in. He said, "Suppose I divide my thought into two classes. On one side are thoughts of sense desire, ill will, and cruelty. On the other side, thoughts of renunciation"—which is really like the clinging evaporates—"non-ill will," which is metta, "non-cruelty," which is compassion.

So you see, noticing these two kinds of thoughts—and even in saying it I can see in my own mind how just even a little subtly comes up: "Well, these are the bad ones, and these are the good ones," with a little hint of aversion. Maybe not you, but...

So he's just noticing these two different kinds, and then he's just practicing. He says, "As I abided, diligent, ardent, and resolute"—this is the language that's in the Satipatthana Sutta. He's not saying, "As I was lolling around under a tree having a nice tea and spacing out." He's saying, "As I abided, diligent, ardent, and resolute, a thought of sensual desire arose in me, and I understood thus: this thought has arisen."

Is that what we say? "You're filled with greed!" No—"I understand a thought of greed has arisen." We could follow the Buddha's example.

And so the awareness keeps looking. "This leads to my own affliction, to others' affliction, to the affliction of both. It obstructs wisdom. It causes me difficulties. It leads away from Nibbana." But he's not shaking a stick at himself. He's looking at the qualities that come up in his mind with this thought of greed. "And as I considered thus, it subsided in me, in my mind, in my heart." He's just noticing.

Same with thoughts of ill will, same with thoughts of cruelty. As he's abiding, ardent and diligent, thoughts of ill will come up, thoughts of cruelty come up. And he just notices them, just like that, and says, "Oh yes, when this thought of cruelty is here, it's for my own affliction. It gets in the way of Nibbana." He understood that.

Not intellect—I understood that. And in understanding it, it starts to fade. It fades out.

Then on the reverse, he noticed the thought of renunciation arose. And as he abided thus, he thought: "This thought of renunciation has arisen. It does not lead to my own affliction or others' affliction. It aids wisdom, does not cause difficulty, leads to Nibbana. If I think and ponder upon this thought, even for a night, even for a day, even for a night and a day, I see nothing to fear from it."

So this is a thought. He's not saying, "Bad thought, go away." He said if he was pondering this thought for twenty-four hours, he sees nothing to fear from it. But—he's so practical—but with excessive thinking and pondering, I might tire my body. And when the body is tired, the mind becomes disturbed. So I quieted my mind. So practical! Yet there's no judgment going on. He's just seeing how it works. That's what wisdom does.

And then this is the famous line: "Whatever a bhikkhu, a practitioner, frequently thinks and ponders upon, that becomes the inclination of the mind. If one frequently thinks and ponders upon thoughts of sensual desire, thoughts of cruelty or ill-will, one abandons the thought of non-cruelty to cultivate the thought of cruelty, and the mind inclines to thoughts of cruelty." And just the reverse. If one thinks and ponders about thoughts of compassion, then in that moment the mind has abandoned thoughts of cruelty and it will incline to thoughts of compassion.

It makes sense, right? It's not rocket science really. But it's this willingness to just keep looking. And that's what's so beautiful—what I appreciate is that wisdom sees: "Wow, this thought of greed is really an intention of greed. It brings you to act on it. It causes suffering for myself and others." Just noticing that, not with a big stare. And noticing too that the thought of renunciation actually brings happiness to myself and others.

So I want to talk just a little bit about each of those three, to support bringing the same steady awareness to noticing the wholesome, to noticing the beautiful qualities when they're present in the citta, in the heart-mind. And realizing that just as awareness-wisdom starves the unwholesome—to use the Buddha's language—wise attention to the wholesome feeds it, strengthens and supports it.

This is the reason Guy Armstrong once said, in a talk he was giving, that he thinks it's a beneficent universe. And I was sitting there in my "the world is dukkha" mode, thinking, "Beneficent universe?" But I saw what he was saying. It's like it's the natural order of things that when there's steady awareness and wisdom and clear seeing, the heart-mind inclines to the wholesome. It's natural. We can help it along, but it will happen naturally. So don't believe me—but look. Keep looking. And we'll see how it happens even here on retreat.

I want to say a few things first about the intention of renunciation. These intentions—renunciation, generosity, metta, friendliness, non-greed, non-ill will, non-cruelty, compassion—are actually the second step of the Eightfold Path. The first stage being Right View, which we've talked about quite a bit, leading to sammā-saṅkappa, which is variously translated as Right Thought or Right Intention. And these three are specifically named as the Right Intention that arises from Right View, from Right Understanding.

So renunciation—it doesn't mean what some people might think. We tend to think of renunciation as external, as a giving up of things. Going into the monastery with a narrow wooden bed and nothing else—that's renunciation. And we think, well, that doesn't really appeal. As the Buddha said, his heart did not leap up at the thought of renunciation when he first heard about it. He didn't really understand. But as he came to understand it, that really changed.

What I want to say about renunciation is that it's wise intention. An intention is what's inside the mind and heart; how it manifests in the world can have many different forms. So it's not about the external giving up of things so much as the inner contentment of being with what is—that allows for this feeding of greed to just dissolve. Because the greed starts to be seen as a cause of dissonance, of suffering. And the allowing of that to simply evaporate brings a real sense of joy and peace in whatever kind of simplicity.

So exploring that internally. Someone, again, was saying to Tejaniya, who's a monk—and he became a monk later in life. He's not one of the Burmese monks who started when he was seven years old; he'd had a whole life. Which is part of why he really pushes this practice of noticing, this gentle awareness of everything, because he did this in his daily life, not as a monk.

So they were saying anyway, all this projection—"Oh, as a monk and renunciation, it must make you so pure"—they were doing all this, and he would never really take that kind of projection anyway. He said, "You know, you can be a monk, and all that desire, all that craving—it still can be there. It's just narrowed down into only two objects. But you can still have just as much craving as ever." That's not renunciation.

And conversely, you could live what looks like a normal life in the world, but you're not bound to things by that craving.

So, playing with this sense of inner contentment, the simplicity that can come when the craving really isn't being fed. And we tend to think also, when we think of craving, we skip over it—tanha, this wanting—and look at the objects. People will always say, "Well, what's wrong? I'm craving peace. I'm craving enlightenment. I'm craving a happy family. What's wrong with a happy family?" It's like, no one's saying that. We're missing the whole boat, which is what we do. We go to the object. It's not about the object. It's the craving itself that's the deluded source of suffering. And renunciation arises when the craving evaporates. There's this sense of real presence and peace and contentment leading to generosity.

What happens on a retreat, or off-retreat—when we start to, with a steady awareness, as I said before, see how much craving is popping up—if you can hang with just watching it, you start to see how craving works. And some of the magic of it starts to go out. Because isn't craving like this siren call? "If you do what I'm telling you that you need, you'll be happy." We're leaning into whatever the thing is. And then we get defensive: "But that's a good thing to want." Or we blame ourselves: "That's a bad thing to want. I shouldn't be wanting that." It's not the object.

So I just want to share what someone said in a group. I thought it was so insightful, really, because it's true. They were seeing there was a huge craving to scratch an itch. And have you noticed there can be a huge craving when you're walking just to look at who's walking by? Have you noticed? And you feel like you're going to die if you don't look at who's walking by. How strong that craving can be.

And this person noticed it was that kind of craving for something—scratching an itch, whatever. They noticed, "Oh my gosh," it just popped into their mind: "This is the same level and intensity of craving I remember back from high school when I had a huge desire crush on somebody." It's the same level of craving for something so innocuous as scratching. That's right. That's it.

So seeing craving on retreat, when you think, "How can I have craving for looking? It doesn't make sense"—and then we dismiss it because the object seems insignificant. No, don't dismiss it. This is how we really see. It is the same quality of craving. So whether it's craving for enlightenment or craving to look at the person next to you—and what happens when you look, if you keep paying attention? You look, and pretty much you judge, right? "They're better, I'm better." It really did you a lot of good.

So you feel worse. You feel worse from looking. That was great. And then, you know, if you're aware that happened, then you get aversive towards yourself. Or then you say, "Well, I can't handle this anymore. I'm going to go have tea. Let's blow the whole thing off." It really did a world of good.

But if you keep noticing, you see—wow, this promise of craving doesn't really pan out. Unfortunately, we have to see that about a hundred million times. But watch it, watch it, and you'll see. Don't you notice? It's the craving itself that's creating the disease. Not the itch, not the looking or the not looking, whatever it might be.

So say it's for something like enlightenment. We can have a sincere aspiration and intention to do what is necessary in our practice. It doesn't have to be from craving.

Renunciation is this: in a moment when craving is seen through and it drops away naturally, there's just this sense of peace and real contentment and ease with what is. The more the wisdom awareness notices that, there can be times when craving starts to come up, and there's the wisdom that allows us to be with it. So there's also the wisdom that lets us, with awareness, rest with the unpleasant.

Which is also the next one. All of this is rooted in not wanting to be with the unpleasant. Taṇhā—it has the story that it's pleasant. Have you had times when you go into a daydream? We even make the confusion of thinking the craving itself is somehow happy, is somehow pleasant. We're lost in this pleasant story, not noticing it. But if you really look and hang with it, without feeding, without getting rid of it—it's mostly unpleasant. It's dissonant. It takes us out. It takes us away. It brings dissatisfaction in the moment.

Seeing that, the more we know that on the bhāvanā-mayā-paññā level, then craving can come up and you notice it quicker. Awareness can be with it, and it just drops, really. Play with that in little ways. The food time here, lunch, is a great place to play with that. So many people mention experiences they have around the eating and the wanting and going for seconds or not going for seconds and watching the whole thing. A lot of people bring that up, right?

And if you can really just get interested in exploring—I remember the first three-month retreat I sat. It wasn't full like this, maybe fifty people. But the food... I mean, it was a poorer time for IMS, shall we say. At tea you would get an apple, and every second day, two spoons of peanuts. I'm not kidding, that's what we had. Some days there would be enough food, but not the sense of plenty. And I would, you know, the bell would ring, I'd be there, go eat.

There was this one guy. I didn't know anybody. He would come wandering in late, twenty minutes late, twenty-five minutes late. And again, it wasn't as many people as here, and some of the food would be gone. There wasn't just tons of it. And he would come in very carefully, eat whatever, and I'd think, "God, he must be enlightened." You know? It's amazing. He must be so enlightened. And I'm not even a huge foodie, but just, you know, that's the hit of the day.

Well, sometime later, years later, it wasn't like a big thing, but I started to notice on retreat that I was walking in really late and I wasn't thinking about it. I could be sitting before noon and some craving would come up. "Oh, I smell baked potatoes" or whatever. And it would come up and I'd see it—oh yeah, okay, craving's like that—and it would just go. Didn't get all into it, didn't feed it, and there's this sense of peace. You do what you do, you get up, you walk in and eat. There's baked potatoes, there's not—there was always something. I didn't starve.

And that's the sense of renunciation, not a willful thing. But the willingness, the steady awareness that can be with craving, sees how it works—it loses its allure.

You just hang out with it, and then you can make a choice from awareness-wisdom. Maybe you're really hungry, so you get up and go eat—that's fine. We still take care of ourselves. You can still appreciate the food. But this renunciation just starts to occur quite naturally, and we appreciate it. And from there, it can move into generosity.

A friend was telling me some years ago that she was studying with Sogyal Rinpoche, and he had many projects, one of which was to support poor nuns in Tibet. You would kind of adopt a nun and give a certain amount every month to help her eat and clothe herself and be able to keep practicing. My friend was really inspired by this. First, there was the generosity—she wanted to do it, and that made her really happy. But in order to have that money, she had to consciously take it out of her clothes budget, so she didn't buy new clothes. She would give that money to the nun instead.

So there's the renunciation of the new clothes, and there's the generosity of giving, and both of them made her equally happy. It wasn't this wrenching sense of not having what she wanted. She said, "No, I'm not buying this. This money goes to the nun." And that thought of letting go—the craving would simply dissolve, and generosity would arise to replace it very naturally.

Then you bring awareness. Let the awareness notice it. Feel that sense of contentment in not wanting. Feel the happiness that arises in the heart-mind with generosity. You keep paying attention. And that's awareness-wisdom strengthening the wholesome. That's really wise attention. So just playing with that.

Now, ill will and thoughts of cruelty—I'll put them together. It's more obvious. Ill will transforms into mettā, or non-hatred, which is really simple friendliness. Cruelty transforms into non-harming, or compassion.

Both of the unwholesome ones—ill will, cruelty, all the forms of aversion—arise as our conditioned response to difficult, unpleasant, painful experiences. Whether it's physical pain, some action in the world, some interaction, or some thought in your mind, when something is unpleasant and difficult, the habit tends to be some form of pushing away: fear, aversion, aggression, ill will. Get away from me.

Now, mettā. Let me read you what Ajahn Sumedho says, because when I've mentioned mettā or non-ill will, something goes through the mind: "What, so I'm supposed to love this stuff? Somebody's really acting in a very aggressive way and I'm supposed to feel all this love in my heart for them? How do I do that?"

Ajahn Sumedho on mettā, in regards to difficult people or situations, internal or external:

"Mettā does not necessarily mean loving it. One is simply witnessing the unpleasantness in a situation, in a thing, in a person, or in oneself, without creating anything around it. That's what I consider to be mettā."

I'll say it again: witnessing, really present with, the unpleasant in a situation, in a person, in oneself—in space, without creating anything around it. In other words, the heart-mind is not reactive. It's not making a story about me, about them. It's not getting into aversion. It's just: Oh, this is happening. It's like this.

Does that sound like anything we've been talking about all week, only calling it awareness? Sometimes mettā and awareness can have the exact same qualities. That's what we're talking about here. Not loving, but simply the ability to start from witnessing the unpleasant in ourselves, in the situation, in a person. This is awareness. And the steadiness of it is what allows wisdom to arise—the wisdom being, hopefully, starting to see the possibility of a different response.

It's so ingrained in most of us that the natural response to aggression, or the safe response to anger, or the safe response to difficulty, is to get the heck out of here, or get rid of them, or meet anger with anger. It just seems like that's what we do, and anything else would be weak or letting ourselves be walked on.

The Dalai Lama, when asked about why there seems to be a lack of compassion in human society, said: "Perhaps we just pay less attention to compassion and caring."

We reinforce it less. Whereas in some sense we fully embrace hostility and anger as emotional states, reinforcing them. If we were to give the same amount of energy, attention, and reinforcement to compassion and caring, they would definitely be stronger.

To me, this reinforcing of compassion and caring, the ability to be present with the difficult without responding, without the mind only knowing how to go to the unwholesome—this is what awareness and wisdom offer us. And it starts with that willingness to be with the unpleasant. As Joko Beck says, "Can I find in myself a willingness to rest in this confusing and painful situation?" I ask myself that a lot.

And that's what we can start with—what's happening here, silently, in your own experience. It's not just a lucky first-world problem, being able to look at your anger, at your grief, or how somebody walking loudly really got you ticked off and you're in a murderous rage and then you try to talk yourself out of it because, well, look at the stuff in the world, I have no right to be in a murderous rage. No—look at it! Just like with craving, let awareness be with it and see: how does the anger work? What happens with it?

You'll see. We do see. We know, as the Buddha said, it causes us suffering, it causes others suffering. Keep looking, because then we think, "But what's the alternative? What else can I do? It's the only way to protect myself." We have to see that's not true.

James Baldwin, the great American writer, says an enemy is someone whose story we have not heard. I love that. So when there's that anger—now, not being angry doesn't mean, "Okay, do whatever you want." But it means there might be another wholesome quality, compassion, mettā, that actually provides a great, really strong intention for action. And we can see more clearly than we can when the mind is filled with anger.

The Buddha says: "When one dwells with a mind, a heart, obsessed and oppressed by ill will and does not understand as it really is the escape from arisen ill will, on that occasion one neither knows nor sees as it really is one's own good, or the good of others, or the good of both."

So when we're lost in fear, in ill will, in anger—even when we're trying to do the right thing—you know, it's why it's such a tricky place when there's so much injustice and so much suffering in the world and we really want to engage with it. Whether we want to engage with climate change, whether we want to engage with the refugee crisis, whether we want to engage with homophobia, with racism, with just somebody mistreating someone we see on the street. And if what we've been giving unconsciously the power to is anger, hostility as the source of strength, then that's what's going to come out.

The Buddha's saying even when we're trying to do the right thing, if the intention's coming from ill will, from anger, we can't see clearly the good of others or the good of ourselves or the good of either. So how can we learn to really trust? And again, it can't be done just by an act of mind, an act of wishing. But when we start by connecting with awareness, as we're doing here, without creating anything around whatever the suffering aspect is—and we practice on the little ones here, sure, to give us some trust, some faith.

But you see, do you see at times in your practice when you just connect? You're filled with aversion from something, you know, something essentially stupid—some sound or whatever. You know it's essentially stupid. That doesn't help, because then the aversion goes on you. But you're filled with it. Or say a pain, which a lot of people have experienced. And seeing the aversion, seeing the fear, eventually by being able to rest with the aversion without creating anything around it, rest with the pain without creating anything around it—at times you'll see the whole sense of suffering drop. Maybe the pain's still there. Sometimes people can't even call it pain anymore.

And then there's clear seeing. So sometimes with a knee, you know, there may be something you really need to do to take care of it. When you're in that whole world of reaction and aversion, who can see what you need to do? You can't tell. You think you're either going to have to have surgery tomorrow, or it's absolutely nothing—it's a dharma pain. And you can't tell. We're just all wrapped up in the kleshas.

When we can see clearly, when the aversion drops, when there's connection with things as they are, wisdom lets us see what to do—in little picture, in big picture. But it goes against the stream of what we know, and against the stream of society. And it is hard to try—even when we start to know for ourselves—reacting from aggression, reacting from self-aversion brings more suffering. I know, if I could meet it with mettā, there's more peace and more ability to act appropriately. But everything around you is saying, "Are you crazy? You got to protect yourself. Are you crazy? Tell those people what they're doing wrong."

Get out there and, you know, whatever it is.

So to this point, I think Steve said—or the Buddha said—if you can't be with wise people, be alone. But sometimes we're the wise people, you know? And we're so affected by other people; none of us can live in isolation. So when we go out, we'll be getting all kinds of signals: "Want! Want! Be angry! Get upset! That's how you are in the world."

We need sangha to help us remember what we already know for ourselves. But sometimes we're the ones who—when you have that deep sense, you know that you don't want to come from anger, that there's another choice—then your being able, or my being able, to act that way can really affect other people.

I heard this great story on a public radio program. It's called Invisibilia, and it's talking about all qualities of mind that aren't seen that affect our life. It's really interesting. So this is called non-complementary behavior, which I would say really is responding to aggression with metta, or kindness, or non-aggression anyway.

So this group of people—two families, I think—were together outside in the evening in their backyards. It sounds like a suburb somewhere. They were having a lovely dinner together on this lovely evening, outside eating, drinking wine. And all of a sudden, a guy came out of nowhere—they didn't see him coming—and he had a gun. He just showed up, stuck it to one of the people's head, and said, "Give me your money."

They're freaked out, of course, don't know what to do. And they said, "We don't have any money. We're just having—" "Give me your money."

So the first response was someone saying, "What would your mother think? What would your mother think if she saw you doing this?" And he says, "I don't have a mother. Give me your money." And really, the gun was to somebody's head.

And at this point, one of the people said, "Would you like a glass of wine?"

He said, "Huh?"

So, okay, well... and he sat down, had a glass of wine, they started talking, kept on going. And they were scared—it's not like they're like, "Oh la la"—they were scared. But they really had wine, they were having a conversation with him, and after a while he goes, "You know, I really see... I came to the wrong place."

So he said okay, he'd go, and he got up and he wanted hugs from everybody. And then he took a glass of wine and went off.

Well, they ran into the house like crazy, locked all the doors, right? But he went off, he didn't come back. And then later when they went and opened the door, he'd taken that glass that he'd drunk the wine from—he'd left it very carefully on the curb and went away.

Cool, huh? Yeah.

So to come from that place, it takes a real trust, doesn't it? And knowing that's what can come from steady mindfulness and awareness.

I love stories like that.

And then I think what also can bring it in is when our habit of not wanting to bring full attention to difficult, unpleasant situations—how that feeds the thoughts of separation. Like James Baldwin said, "An enemy is someone whose story you haven't heard." So we don't want to hear their story. We don't want to connect. It's a lot of what goes on in the world.

So another story I heard on the radio, about the refugee crisis in Europe—this was last fall, I think. You remember, there's one of the big refugee camps in Calais, just in France. I think they've actually destroyed it. So it was last fall, and there were a couple thousand people there living in really not very good conditions, and they were all trying to get out and go to England. There was kind of a lot of upheaval, but they weren't being violent or anything.

And so the BBC reporter was going around just talking to normal citizens in Calais. He ended up talking to this one middle-aged French lady, and she was just saying how she hates these refugees and they should go back and they're just causing trouble—typical of what we'd hear, right? Aversion.

And he said, "Well, have you ever actually been there in the jungle?"

And she said, "No."

And somehow he talked her into going there with him.

And so she went in with him. And this is it—this is like awareness, just connection with what is, different from our ideas about it.

So she went in there with him, and he was talking to some young men, and she was talking to one of the young men from—I don't know if he was from Iraq or Syria—and he was just describing how hard it was. He's in his early twenties, he just wants to work, and there's no work there, and there's nothing to do. If he goes for a walk in the street, he feels really unsafe, targeted by the truckers, targeted by police. All he wants to do is work.

And so she's going, "Wow, these conditions are awful. These people are good, they don't have enough food, they don't have anything to do."

So she went to the main office of the camp and volunteered. She became involved in wanting to volunteer and help. Just like that. It's a natural effect of clear seeing—non-hatred arises when we see things as they are. We can also know that and turn our attention to that, and wise attention will strengthen that possibility.

But this is what the guide means when he says it's a beneficent universe. This is how it works. When we see clearly how hatred brings separation, how fear brings separation, how aversion even to a pain brings separation and more suffering—just the willingness to recognize, "It's like this." Not wanting something, just "it's like this now," can change everything.

So, you still have some time here. Notice. Just notice the little times. Because it's the same mind, it's the same process, it's the same habits as in the big pictures. And you can learn to trust it from the little—that's the beauty of practice. But it doesn't mean we can't see the same thing in our daily life. So that's our path.

The attitude that the mind, the awareness, is meeting the experience right now—how we meet, not "we," but how awareness, mindfulness meets this experience, whether it's with simple interest, curiosity, kindness, or whether it's through buying into delusion. But when we meet it with just this open kindness, this sense of not making an enemy, that's our path. That's the whole practice. And it doesn't matter what's occurring—something subtle on retreat or our daily life practice. The path is how the heart and mind is meeting this moment. That's where the awareness is.

As Steve was pointing out this morning, it's always available. Always. You just have to remember it. And when there's more steadiness of awareness, the truth of how things are reveals itself. That's just like the law of nature, like gravity.

So we can take in information—I mean, I'm blabbing, you're taking in information or not—but we can know, okay, maybe non-greed is more wholesome and more happiness-producing than greed. So that's a piece of information. It can incline us to look and see: Is this so? Look and see how we meet when we're dealing with the neighbor in the upstairs apartment who's stomping around every night at four in the morning. How we meet all the aspects of that—that's our path of awareness and wakefulness and wisdom. Changing the diapers, driving in traffic—great one, you know. So it might not be as refined awareness, but awareness is always available. This is what we do here, this is what we take with us no matter what aspect of our life.

How do we meet this moment?

A few years ago—I won't even get into it, but the politics in Burmese monasteries is baroque and pretty out there. Anyways, a whole bunch of bad stuff was going on with Sayadaw U Tejaniya. He was kind of the target of gossip. That's how they do it in Burma. They go, "Oh, everything's fine," and there's all this background gossip. And people were saying bad stuff about him and trying to isolate him, saying lies and things.

I was just having a conversation with him, and I said, "Well, this other monk is saying all these lies about you, trying to turn people against you." And he was just being quiet, he wasn't doing anything. I said, "Well, why don't you just at least say what's true? You don't have to say something bad about him, but just say what's true."

He says, "You know, I just don't—" kusala means wholesome, akusala means unwholesome. He goes, "You know, I just don't want to add any more akusala to the situation."

I love that. Just kind of see this, all this unwholesome stuff going on, and he's just not adding unwholesomeness to it.

It's out of our control. All we can know if there's awareness is our motivation—and even often that, not clearly. We never know how our actions are going to land. We can't know the effect of any action.

The awareness and the motivation, the quality of our mind—that's all we can really know. So he's saying, okay, taking a stand there, not creating more akusala. That's really our practice of mindfulness, awareness, wisdom.

I'll just end with one line from Desmond Tutu. He was giving a talk to a bunch of young college students in Boston. One of them was saying, "We live in the midst of a culture of violence. There's violence all around us. How are we supposed to love? We grow up with hate."

And Desmond Tutu said, "No, we learn to hate. That's not our truest nature. That's not the truest nature of mind and heart."

And he was looking at each person, going, "You make a difference. You can make a difference. You, you, you. One person can make a big difference. So start with yourself."

That's what I wanted to talk about tonight. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 167

Mindfulness and Right View (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Carol Wilson · 53 min

> In this retreat talk from Spirit Rock's one-month Insight Meditation retreat, Carol Wilson offers a profound exploration of how mindfulness (sati) and right view (sammā diṭṭhi) work together as the foundation of liberation. Drawing on the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, she emphasizes that the Buddha's teaching isn't merely about mastering technique, but about experiencing mind and body directly with wise understanding.
>
> Wilson illuminates how suffering arises not from external circumstances but from our reactive relationship to experience—particularly through the filter of personality view (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), the habitual tendency to take experience personally. Using accessible examples—from a child learning to match shapes to circles of light in photographs interpreted differently across cultures—she demonstrates how our conditioned perceptions create struggle, while accurate recognition naturally dissolves it. She shares the inspiring example of a 90-year-old practitioner who finds walking across her room to be "the most interesting time of my life," illustrating the freedom available through simple, moment-to-moment presence.
> The talk offers practical wisdom for retreat practice and daily life: rather than trying to eliminate the sense of self through willpower, we can meet each arising experience—including self-referential thoughts—with non-judgmental awareness. When we stop fighting with things as they are, the purity of heart-mind (citta) naturally reveals itself. Wilson concludes with the Dalai Lama as an example of complete presence, wholly available for each moment and encounter.

I'm sure you remember everything James said, and remember him saying that in the Sutta, the Buddha describes the direct way for the ending of suffering, sorrow, lamentation, and despair as cultivating and developing the foundations of mindfulness.

I want to elaborate a bit on that—which, of course, everything we say is an elaboration of that. Saying that it's the direct way to freeing our hearts and minds from suffering, I want to start with that, to really make the punctuation that the heart of the Buddha's teachings, and why we all practice and share and live our life as best we can from within the heart of the Buddhist teaching, is that the point is really this possibility, this potential to truly free our hearts and minds from confusion, from delusion, from greed, hatred, and confusion. When we act from those things, we bring them about in the world as well. That's really the heart of the Buddha's teachings.

And he says, in different places, don't settle for anything less. Don't settle just for wholesome states of mind, of heart. That's a vast statement. Because really, when we're suffering and a happy, wholesome state comes, that's wonderful. That's onward leading. But how much of the time is it like, "Well, okay, that's really good. Good enough. I'm ready to go home." And it gets more and more solid. These are wonderful, and don't settle merely, he says, for wholesome states of heart and mind.

I want to put that out again—that even, especially at the beginning of a retreat, at the beginning of our path, not waiting until fifteen or twenty years into our practice to say, "Oh yeah, maybe this could happen." He's laying it down: this is why we can take up a path. This is what's possible.

To echo what James said last night when he was talking about faith, about confidence—just opening, I find for myself anyway, just opening my mind, my heart, to read those words, to hear them, to talk to people, to admit it as a real possibility, real potential for this mind, this heart, in this world, in this life. Never so much looking to a future goal, but really saying: how we practice now, how we explore, how I explore what's occurring in this moment in this heart and mind—in this moment, it's possible to get a sense of what this liberation could taste like. It's not something we wait for twenty years.

So having that as we begin a retreat and as we continue on our path shores us up, supports us. As James said, with the faith it gives us—it gives me anyway—the confidence, the willingness to do. That's one way that Sayadaw U Pandita translated saddhā. It gives us the willingness to do, as James was saying, the strength, the courage to just show up, be present with, bring this quality of non-judging, relaxed, accepting mindfulness to whatever is arising in this moment, in this body, in this mind, in this heart.

That's a huge challenge, an incredibly beautiful possibility, and in a way it holds everything. It's like the container for everything we go through in our practice here, in our practice in our life.

From that, I want to then talk about how the simplicity of mindfulness can be so powerful—to be, really, one of the central tools, central supports for this at least one-lifetime journey of purifying the habits of our heart and mind, of really opening to the potential of freedom. How is it that mindfulness is so central? What does it do? What is it? I want to talk about that a little bit in my own way.

But rather than start from the doing—you know, so frequently I find, having grown up in a middle American, middle-class culture, there's just this sense of doing and achieving, and we're kind of assessed by what we've done. Isn't that such a common way of greeting when we first meet somebody? "How are you? What do you do?" That's not every culture; that isn't the first thing you say.

So here I want to talk about mindfulness, but not to begin by talking about the technique. Even though meditation is a skill and an art, and we're going to be giving all instructions that we very carefully discuss and think about—you may not be able to recognize that, but we do—I'm not here sharing this to help you master a technique. The technique is secondary. It's rooted in wisdom, in right view, in wise understanding.

So often we start by saying, "Let me do it, let me get it right, and then I'll get to understanding." But the Buddha, when he gave the Eightfold Noble Path—the path of the Fourth of the Four Noble Truths, the path of life, of practice—it begins with right view, right understanding. Everything else springs out of that. It's really more like a circle than a path.

Of course we don't begin our practice with completely understanding everything. Then we wouldn't need to practice. But there's a definition of meditation that I'm liking a lot these days. I think it's from Sayadaw Tejaniya. I've been using it for so long I kind of forget where I got it, but it sounds like him: Vipassana meditation is experiencing the mind and body directly from moment to moment with the right understanding. I love that description of Vipassana meditation—experiencing the mind and body directly. That's essentially mindfulness, what I'll be talking about.

What does that mean, directly? From moment to moment—that's the continuity that James was talking about, where you don't just keep taking the kettle off the flame. From moment to moment, with the right understanding. With some sense of wisdom about why we're doing what we're doing.

There are many ways to talk about this, but that's what I want to speak about for the rest of this talk. What does it mean, "with the right understanding"?

The Dalai Lama said—and you can read this from many different sources—so much of our unhappiness originates within our own minds and hearts, in how we react to events in our life, so-called internal, so-called external. And that's what the Buddha was talking about when he spoke about freeing our hearts and minds from suffering. He wasn't talking about rearranging the world so that nothing bothers us anymore.

I mean, we've all been trying to do this. Maybe you're not, but many people I know, including me, spend an inordinate amount of time trying to rearrange the world and other people so that we're not bothered. And then even more time—if you're a thinking person like me—rationalizing it so we don't really acknowledge to ourselves what we're doing. Rationalizing what's really wrong with that person's behavior, or this situation, and how we can fix it and everything will be okay.

The Buddha is saying just what the Dalai Lama said: seeing that what frees our heart and mind isn't going to come from fixing everything. And we kind of know that on some level, right? But not really. Don't we somehow think everything's got to get better? I wish everything would get better. But the Buddha wasn't saying, wait until everything gets better.

What truly frees us from reacting to experience in ways that increase our unhappiness and suffering is literally right view—recognizing what's occurring in this moment in our mind and body accurately. This, to me, is incredibly radical. He's saying that freedom isn't about everything getting reorganized. In some ways, even we don't get reorganized—certainly not as an act of will. But when there's this moment of experiencing the mind and body directly, fully, with complete attention, with the right understanding—in other words, recognizing accurately, without dragging in all our views and concepts and filters, which we mostly don't know we're doing—without that, we see how things are. And boom, the suffering reactions don't arise because they don't make any sense.

It's so inspiring to me. And then, of course, really frustrating. Because why the heck can't we just do that? The Buddha said, come and see for yourself.

So that's the miracle of mindfulness, as Thich Nhat Hanh often phrases it. Because in a moment—just one moment, and all that we can ever experience is just this one moment—in a moment of really clear recognition of what's occurring, that's the moment we get a little taste of the freedom of heart-mind that's not lost in fear or greed or reactivity, responding in an inappropriate way. This is the miracle of mindfulness. This is what we're practicing here.

In some ways, when I do a retreat for myself—I just had a month-long self-retreat in November, it was so lovely—I thought, should I do this practice? Should I do that practice? Should I do this technique or that technique? And in the end, it doesn't matter. Well, it matters—I mean, you've got to do what we tell you. But what I thought was, it doesn't matter. It's a month just to practice awareness moment to moment. It's not to make a particular experience happen. It's to practice being with this moment's experience just as it is.

How many moments do you have? Don't count it up. How many moments do you have to practice that for this month, or two weeks, or two months? That's amazing. It's an amazing gift to yourself and the world. And we'll forget ten million times, because that's the habit.

So that's what I'll talk about now—habits. But then mindfulness will reassert itself. It'll do itself. Suddenly there will be awareness again. Also ten million times. It's amazing.

We come to trust that more and more.

The Effect of Accurate Recognition

Let me give a simple example I've been using lately, because I have a new nephew. I never had a niece or nephew until the last four years, and it's fun for me watching how kids learn and grow. This example, to me, is just the perfect illustration of how right view frees us from internal suffering.

You know those games for really young children, maybe two years old, with wooden blocks of different shapes—triangle, circle, square—and a big board with holes of the same shape? They learn to put the right shape in the right hole. They still do things like that with their hands, even though two-year-olds can work my cell phone better than I can. My nephew picked it up—I have four screens of apps, and he flips through them, goes to one that does some kind of spin art. I didn't even know it was there. He opens it, starts drawing colors. The kid was two and a half years old. It's shocking. But that's another story.

Back to the simplicity of squares, triangles, and circles. To us, the matching is just obvious. But to a child who doesn't know, who doesn't yet see shapes as distinct categories, they watch the adult do it, they try to do it, and it doesn't work—because they don't have the concept of the right shape fitting in the right matching hole. You watch them trying to put it in, and it doesn't work. The adult does it, and it does work. The frustration. The anger. They want to throw the blocks, get mad at the parent, throw the whole thing away. And if it were an adult person having that kind of experience, the thought trains might be things like, "I'm so stupid," or "They're holding a secret from me. They're not telling me how it really works. I hate them." All of that.

And then at some point, the penny drops. He gets the triangle in the triangle hole, the circle in the circle hole. Maybe first it's an accident, but then two, three times—he gets it. And as soon as he gets it, all that other stuff just vanishes. There's no more anger.

There's no more sense of "you're hiding a secret from me." There's no more frustration. It's gone. Because it simply doesn't apply anymore when there's accurate recognition of the experience.

It's so simple, really. That's a simple example, but that sense of ah, that's how it works—there's no more struggle. The mind-heart is at peace in that moment. This is how it is now. That's really right view. This is how it is now.

I think of that as an insight moment, whether it's a personal insight or a dharma insight. It's like, "Oh, it's like that now." It's not something we can plan or create with an act of will, because we don't even know what we don't know. But this is what mindfulness does, this careful attention, just seeing what's going on. Suddenly—oh, it's like this. That's right view. And the struggle stops.

When we see things as they really are, what's the effect? It's like we don't fight with gravity, right? Gravity is one of the laws of nature. Somebody said that dhamma means the laws of nature.

So for instance, gravity—when we really understand it, we aren't going to waste our time getting upset because if we jump off the roof of a building, we're going to fall. We know that. That's just how it is.

Right view, which is a result of steady, simple mindfulness, has that same effect. We stop fighting with things as they are.

Last fall, I had lunch with a woman I've known for many years—a dear friend, very wise, a deep practitioner, and a mentor and benefactor. She's now in her early nineties. She has had a really rich and full life, with many wonderful things she's done.

Now she lives in a retirement facility. Externally it looks like her body's quite frail. She can walk, but gingerly, and she doesn't go out and do things so much. So externally it would appear that her life has gotten quite constricted, quite narrow.

But she began her introduction to Buddhadharma and meditation practice, I'm guessing, in her mid-fifties. She wasn't at all in Dharma before that. And she just devoted herself to it—even in the midst of her full life, devoted herself to it. Many, many years of long intensive retreats and practice, really one of the more profound meditators we know.

What she said was so inspiring. We were just hanging out, very simple, had a little lunch. She liked my socks. Just very simple and normal. And then she said, "You know, this is the most interesting time of my life. This is just so interesting."

I said, "Really? How so?"

She said, "Well, for instance, when I walk across the floor to the little kitchen, I'm just so mindfully present—just walking across the floor. That's everything. That's what there is. And then when I'm making the water for the tea, it's just what there is. It's everything. It's so interesting. Noticing what's going on in the body, in the mind, whatever I'm doing. The most interesting time of my life."

This to me isn't just some simple thing somebody's saying. I do know her a long time. It's really the effect of a heart and mind that's quite awake in the moment. And in that wakefulness, that ability to be just fully present with walking across the floor, the mind, the heart at that moment isn't distracted by thinking, "I used to be able to walk better." It's not distracted by looking for something more interesting to land in. It's not wishing for something else—not looking anywhere else for fulfillment, not caught in wanting, not caught in judgment. All that energy is just present without looking for anything. It's like this now, with total presence and wakefulness.

This is really the purity of citta—heart-mind energy. There's a purity of presence that comes when we're not so caught up in recognizing inaccurately, when we're not looking for happiness and ease and peace in ways that can't offer it, that can't bring it. Instead, we see that happiness, that freedom, isn't about any activity or any object. It's just as available walking across the floor as being in some really deep state of meditation—which this person had experienced many, many times. It's just as available in pouring the tea, because it's got nothing to do with the activity or the object or being fulfilled by some experience. It's that collected purity, that presence of heart-mind that is recognizing accurately: it's like this.

Given my choice, if it was an act of will, I'd live like that. Maybe you would too. Maybe you're thinking, "I don't want to walk across the floor and be happy. I'm looking for something a little more oomphy than that." But here you are—you're going to walk back and forth, back and forth, back and forth. Why not try it?

See if it's possible, instead of wishing you were walking into Bhutan or something. Just walk back and forth and explore the quality of heart and mind that's just being fully present with this, without bringing in all our filters.

That's why the Buddha talks about right view—the filters over our perception that get in the way of accurate recognition. It's just our human condition. Mindfulness can help us recognize this, but without mindfulness, we don't know.

Simple examples of what I'm saying: perception is just this recognizing what's happening. Feeling a sensation in my foot, or seeing light, or hearing a sound and knowing. If I ring the bell, you just hear that sound. But without mindfulness—or even with mindfulness if we don't recognize it—when we hear that bell, the perception of "bell," whatever our past experience might have been around bells, is somehow there. It may be mild, that's a pretty mild thing. But maybe when you were in school the bells drove you crazy, and you hear a bell now and you still tense up. Maybe you hear this and you think, "That's the most beautiful sound I ever heard," and then you're off thinking about all kinds of things. Where did they get that bell? Or you think of the person who rang it—rang it too loud, rang it too soft, they were this or that. All this garbage. And this is just a little nothing thing.

But that's normal. We're all the product of our whole life, the conditions of our life, our family, our culture, our schooling, what we've grown up to believe, the way we've been viewing the world. That's inescapable. It's part of being human. And where we get caught is when we don't recognize that it's a filter. We don't even know that there's a filter on how we're perceiving and recognizing and responding. We just think... we don't even think "that's how it is." We know that's how it is.

And then we have also the pain of different people and different cultures from different backgrounds not understanding one another, feeling threatened, feeling angry—and just not really having... how can we have that sense of recognizing that you relate to the world in a very different way than I relate to the world? Of course I like the way I relate to the world. It's comfortable. It feels true. Can I know, though, that that's a cultural conditioning? Yours is different. Neither one's right.

Mindfulness is like a stepping outside of the views of all of our cultures. It's really radical in that way. It's the stepping outside of the comfortable, often unrecognized, familiar view of self and the world. And even though there are a lot of teachings from the Buddha, it's not positing another view. The Buddha gave many teachings, many descriptions of how the mind and heart work and how the world works, but at the end he's saying, as Greg and James have said, Ehi Passiko—come and see for yourself what's true. What brings freedom and ease of heart and mind? What strengthens compassion, love, and connectedness? What strengthens greed, hatred, and confusion? Look and see. Believing what he said, believing what I say, isn't going to free you. It may just give you a way to look. So he's not positing another view. I love that. Just staying or being in the "okay, this is what I think, and I don't know—what's the bare experience right now?"

That's so freeing. But it's also often not so comfortable. Mindfulness is just practicing this, moment to moment.

So a simple example is a story I often tell, because I love the sense of our different worldviews. I've spent many years in the winter going to Burma with friends. We go to different nunneries. There are many, many women who are nuns, and young girls who are nuns—very poor, many of them, rather simple in terms of a different kind of education from what I had here in the West. And the worldview of the nuns that I know is very classical Buddhist—different realms and devas and hell realms and all of that. That's just the worldview.

So we were there once after a huge cyclone, like a hurricane, had destroyed the crops in many areas of the country. We were just going to a couple of small villages and offering donations of rice and food—a one-time donation. So we were doing that in a big room with many people offering and receiving, very good energy. And I was taking tons of pictures.

We looked at the photos when we got back to the monastery where we were staying. And in some of them, through many of the photos, were these perfectly round circles of light—just bright light, circles of light all through the photos. So we're looking at them, and a couple of friends, Burmese women, and also another friend who'd been living as a nun there for many, many years, they all said, "Oh yeah, well, those are devas"—devas being celestial beings. "That's how devas look in photos."

"Oh, really?"

And then another friend, who has equally been there many years, but she's a scientist—she's from a medical background, a PhD scientist—she looks at it and goes, "Well, that's some refraction of the light, some water in the lens," and all this stuff.

And we're like, oh, yeah, it could be. Who knows? But she was positive.

So we were caught between these two views. And I could see how my mind worked—I didn't have a big investment in it, but my mind immediately went to "yeah, right, refraction of the lens, water in the lens, of course." I didn't go right to "it's devas."

So we left it at that. Then later I looked on my computer and I had some photos from a different camera—same thing, circles of light all over. Different camera, but the same phenomenon. That's interesting. Maybe there were devas after all.

The thing is, who knows? Who knows? But each person, coming from their particular background, was really sure that's what it was.

So we played with it. We'd show the pictures to people back at home in the monastery, and the scientifically-minded ones would say, "Oh yes, that's refraction, light particles, whatever." Other people, really more faith-based, would say, "Oh no, that's devas. That makes sense to me."

Some years later—two or three years later—the scientist friend went to Ramana Maharshi's ashram in Tiruvannamalai in southern India. There's a sacred mountain there, Mount Arunachala. I find it a very powerful place. On every full moon, people come from all over India to circumambulate the mountain. It's quite some miles to complete the whole thing. And when we talk about people coming from all over India, we're talking hundreds of thousands of people. On this particular full moon night, it was some especially auspicious one. She said they were estimating a million people—a million people coming from all over with great faith, circumambulating this mountain at night, because they do it at night.

So she sent me a photo, which I haven't been able to find again. There were just perfect balls of light all over that photo. She said, "I give up. I give up. Maybe it's devas."

Who knows? Who knows?

Sometimes Greg does his deva chant, and I love it. We don't have to determine what's true or what isn't. But seeing the filters, recognizing them—that's valuable. It's fine. We're human. We're all going to have those filters. It's not a problem when we recognize them.

So then, to say what being mindful would look like: if I was looking at the photo, it would really be not needing to make an assessment or a story at all. I'd be aware of seeing. I'd be aware of the mind thinking. I'd be aware of liking or disliking or whatever. That's what's occurring in this moment. Then if I had a memory of devas or whatever, I'd be aware of that thought and that memory. Very different from looking and declaring, "It's this" or "It's that," and "You're right and I'm wrong."

This is really the quality of mindfulness. That's kind of how it works. The power of mindfulness is just this willingness to completely land for just a moment. It's like this, now. You don't even have to know, you don't even have to be able to recognize what's happening—but you're just walking and there's a feeling. It's like this, now.

You're sitting and there's a noise that's bugging you. It's like this now. That doesn't mean you suddenly like it. "It's like this now" means I feel really annoyed. It's like this now. Annoyance feels like this. It's just relaxing into, with fullness of presence, just what's occurring in this moment—again and again and again. We like it, we don't like it, but not needing to make the story. The sense of just opening with wonder. The sense of discovery. Each moment is new and fresh. It doesn't mean we love each moment, but it means we're not in struggle. We're not fighting.

And then there's the possibility to recognize accurately. Because what gets in the way of recognizing accurately is the habits of mind of aversion. Right away we don't like, we push away. There's no way to even be fully present. We're already holding the situation at a distance. Or wanting, which is again looking out there, looking out there. Or trying to keep it like this instead of just acknowledging it's like this. Let it go. I don't even like to use "let it." It's not in our control. It's coming. It's here. It goes. That's what's happening. Whether you let it or not, it's going to do that. So it's just this sense of relaxing fully into what's occurring now. This is our practice.

And it's not easy. What really fuels the habits of pushing away, of aversion, of not liking, of wanting it to be a certain way, of just getting completely confused and lost in thoughts and stories—really the bottom line is this: the moment-to-moment relating to any particular experience as being me or mine.

I just read something from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche the other day, and I thought he gave a very pithy explanation of this. He writes: "The very root of delusion is the thought of 'I,' the habit of clinging to the notion of self. This notion is simply due to a failure to investigate. There's no such thing as a truly existing autonomous self. Our minds fabricate this concept in the same way that it makes up all of our thoughts. Then, after constructing this self over and over again, we get so used to our invention that it seems to really exist as a distinct entity. And then, when the thought has deeply taken root, we demand that the self should be happy and comfortable, enjoying wealth and pleasures. If it could be the center of the universe, that would be the best. This attitude is the very basis for our wandering around and around in samsara."

This attitude is the very basis for not recognizing what's happening accurately—relating to it in terms of whether it's going to make me happy or unhappy, and then taking that response out into the world and suffering.

But I bring this up not to suggest that we should hate or fear or judge or think we're here to somehow dig up and uproot the self. As Rinpoche says, and Ramana Maharshi says the same thing, the self exists just because it's not investigated. Investigated. So you don't even have to go investigating self. The steady, moment-to-moment mindfulness—what's happening now? What's happening now?—reveals things the way they are. It's not like you have to actively will yourself to go out and stop creating a sense of self. I'll tell you right now, you're not going to do that. But the sense of self is simply another thought, another experience that can be met with mindfulness, as with anything. So it's nothing to fear, or to hate, or to think, "I'm so bad, I have such a strong sense of self." You hear people say that. I hear people say that.

And then you listen to it. It's like an unfinished loop. "Oh, sense of self is like this right now." Simply another arising experience.

So I'm trying to take the mystery out of it. Don't make it a big bugaboo. But we must start to see that when we don't recognize this, it becomes the strongest filter blocking accurate recognition, right view. It's kind of like the core habit of life—just a habit of mind, just a habit of thought that, unrecognized or recognized but taken personally and reacted to, leads us into all realms of confusion and suffering.

This brings us back to that definition of vipassanā: experiencing the mind and body directly, moment to moment, with the right understanding. This doesn't mean that you can come in, or any of us can come in, saying, "I'm giving up sense of self. I will no longer have that thought arise, and when it does arise, I won't believe it." We can't do that. But the right understanding is simply starting to recognize that we don't have to take experience so personally. Even the sense of self is just a habit.

So whatever's arising, when we're taking it personally—you know how that feels, right, to take it personally—but what's actually going on? One of the ways the Buddha describes experience, and we'll explore this as we go through the days: What are we experiencing? Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, physical sensation, and the whole mental world—thoughts, emotions, perceptions. Those are like six things that just keep happening over and over and over. The mental world is of course much more complex, and it constructs whole stories about whatever is occurring.

But notice: say you're walking. There are many sights and sounds and touches on the body and thoughts that come. They're just coming and going. No big deal, right? And suddenly there's a sight or a sound or a thought, and the next moment of mental energy grabs that thought. It really identifies—it's me, or it's mine. That particular thought has become personal.

It was simple. I was walking outside and I felt chilly. So the moment-to-moment experience was a sensation of walking, coolness, chilliness, a kind of contraction in my body. I felt that—that's the experience. Then there could be just that. It could be unpleasant. There could be a thought, "It's chilly," noticing all of that. No big deal. Then there's, "It's chilly. It shouldn't be like this. I should have worn another sweater. What if I get sick?" And on and on and on. The whole thing has become contracted and all about me. And then it takes off into the infinite universe. Have you noticed that? It doesn't usually stop with one thought—"I'm cold and it's not good for me. Okay, la la la." It usually keeps going. That's taking it personally.

It doesn't mean you can't go put on a sweater. I'm not saying that. But so much of the time, experience moves immediately into aversion, into wanting, into stories of me, into taking it personally. And often when difficult stuff is happening, we get really lost in self-blame, in self-judgment, taking it personally.

So when we're saying "recognizing what's occurring with the right understanding," when you're experiencing something difficult—say aversion is coming up, or fear is coming up—taking it personally would be somehow thinking, "It's my fault," or "It's me, I have to fix it." Especially when we're seeing unpleasant stuff. As James said, the whole world of difficult stuff will come, the whole world of beautiful stuff will come.

When we take it personally, awareness in that moment kind of ends there. It stops, and it becomes all about how can I hold on to this, how can I get rid of this, how can I fix everything. We remain caught, and we don't recognize accurately.

Recognizing with right understanding means understanding that whatever's arising, there are conditions. Everything arises due to the conditions that came before. We can't see all the conditions—just sitting here, there are conditions going back to the Big Bang that led us all to be here. You can't ever really stop somewhere. But we can't say that it's all about me.

When we start to see that aversion is arising, instead of thinking, "Another sign of what an aversive person I am. It's hopeless. I'd better do metta from now until the end of time"—instead of that, there's the possibility of simply recognizing, "Ah, aversion's like this now." Awareness just notices it without making it personal. We notice it arising and then simply being there without all the extra. We might experience coldness, notice the shivering, notice that it's unpleasant, notice the mind doesn't like it. And when there's no awareness of that, the not-liking-it leads into aversion, leads into a whole story of aversion. "Oh, that's how it works."

Mindfulness lets us see how all this works. And when we see how it works, when we can drop the triangle block into the triangle hole, we don't have to throw the blocks. We don't have to hate the parents. We don't have to get all whacked out because there's aversion or wanting going on. We can see what's happening. We can take our refuge in the awareness, in the mindfulness—not in having the perfect experience to make it okay.

Ajahn Sumedho—I find him a wonderful, inspiring teacher. He's an American man who's been a monk in the Ajahn Chah Thai tradition for many, many years. I heard him say once that he'd thought you shouldn't talk about in teaching or in practice the concept of no permanent self, the concept of sakkāya-diṭṭhi—personality view, grabbing hold of any experience and making a "me" or a "mine" out of it. That's what I was just describing: personality view. He thought it shouldn't be talked about until you've been practicing for a long time because it's too subtle.

But then he reconsidered and thought, "You realize that's crazy. Why spend twenty years practicing from wrong understanding?" All that time thinking it's me doing this to get that particular state and be happy, when there's no particular thing to get that's ever going to last. The happiness isn't about my personality being happy or getting a thing, but about—as I described with my friend—just the purity, the simplicity of total presence, recognizing things as they are and not adding extra. We start to recognize what perhaps wasn't able to be recognized when we're caught behind that idea of self, looking through it at the world and all of our experience.

Archbishop Desmond Tutu—you know who he is? The South African archbishop who was a Nobel Peace Prize laureate, one of the chairpeople after apartheid ended in South Africa of the Committee for Truth and Reconciliation, a very powerful person. He described an African concept: "A concept that we have at home, the concept of Ubuntu. It says a person is a person through other persons. Ubuntu says, when I have a small piece of bread, it is for my benefit that I share it with you, because after all, none of us came into the world on our own. You realize that in a very real sense, we are part of a profound complementarity. It is the nature of things. You don't have to be a believer in anything. I mean, I could not speak as I am speaking without having learned it from other human beings. I learned to be a human being from other human beings. We belong in this delicate network. It is actually quite profound. Unfortunately, in our world we tend not to recognize this until times of great disaster."

I'm offering this as a possibility of perceiving in a whole different way that isn't me at the center and everyone else out there. But that's not something we do with an act of will. This is really where the trust in this steady, simple, moment-to-moment mindful awareness of just whatever's arising becomes so powerful. When we start looking for what we think we should see, we're already in some kind of wanting, some kind of moving away.

To experience Ubuntu, complementarity, as he describes—I can't think my way into that. It may have been something my thinking mind would never have come up with. But when the filters of me and other and wanting aren't arising in a moment, then things as they are become accessible, perceivable. The filters may come back again in the next moment.

And a good clue that the filters have returned is that we're going to start feeling stress again. We're going to start feeling some tension, some wanting, some discontent. Don't take that personally. Simply notice: all right, so what's going on? Discontent feels like this. Whatever's occurring in this moment—that's the only moment there is—that's the doorway to present moment awareness. And the steadiness of present moment awareness is the condition that allows clear seeing wisdom to arise.

To me, that's a huge relief. It's not that I or you have to generate wisdom. In fact, you can't. But it's a law of nature that when there's steady, non-judging awareness, suddenly the clarity arises naturally—oh yes, that's the triangle, it fits in the triangle. It just emerges on its own. We can trust that.

This is where the tool of steady mindfulness and awareness becomes so powerful, because it's something we can recognize and practice again and again and again. If we can trust enough to let that land in whatever is happening, rather than continuing to get sucked into trying to organize what's happening to match some idea we don't even know we have. There's just a moment of recognition. Ah, we're not dragging in the past and the future. It's just this. Just the sensation of warmth on my foot. It's enough.

I want to end with a description of what full presence looks like. When the Dalai Lama greets you, he takes your hand and then rubs it tenderly, as a grandparent might. He looks into your eyes, feels deeply what you are feeling, and touches his forehead to yours. Whatever feeling—elation or anguish—is in your heart and reflected on your face, it is mirrored in his. But then, when he meets the next person, those emotions are gone, and he is wholly available for the next encounter and the next moment.

Perhaps that is what it means to be fully present: available for each moment and each person we encounter, untethered by the memories of the past and not lured by anticipatory worry about the future.

This is our practice. This is our practice—moment to moment, simple mindfulness.

CHAPTER 168

Investigating Craving and its Ending in our Experience

Carol Wilson · 55 min

In this retreat talk, Carol Wilson offers a deep investigation into taṇhā—the Pāli term for craving or thirst—which the Buddha identified as the origin of dukkha in the Second Noble Truth. Drawing from the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta and other canonical sources, she explains the three types of craving: craving for sense pleasures, craving for being or states, and craving for non-existence (wanting things to go away).

Wilson clarifies an important linguistic distinction often missed in English: taṇhā refers specifically to a quality of heart-mind, not to the object of desire. This differs from chanda, a neutral energy that can manifest as wholesome aspiration (dhammachanda) or as sensual excitement (kāmachanda). She explores why we remain bound to saṃsāra through the seductive nature of craving—how it creates tunnel vision, leads us endlessly from one object to another, and most poignantly, obscures our recognition of the citta's natural purity and peace.

The practical invitation is to turn mindfulness toward taṇhā itself whenever it arises—noticing its physical sensations, its mental textures, how it distorts perception, and what happens when it naturally dissolves. Drawing on Ajahn Chah's teachings about the mind's inherent stillness and passages from the Sutta Nipāta, Wilson emphasizes that craving doesn't end through willpower but through nibbidā (disenchantment)—the wisdom that sees through craving's false promise. When we truly see what contact does, craving simply stops making sense, revealing the natural peace that was always present.

In a way, what I want to talk about tonight could be seen as a follow-up on the question about purification—purification of heart-mind.

As Dara said, it's not exactly something we do, but essentially it's transforming the habits of the habitual mental states that arise in the citta, the mind-heart. I think I explained before that the word citta in Pali means both mind and heart. It doesn't have the split we give it in our language. We're transforming the habits that obscure the clear and accurate recognition of reality—yata-bhuta, things as they have come to be in this moment—the habits that obscure it: greed, hatred, confusion, and that lead us into all kinds of unnecessary suffering, both internally and in our speech and actions.

Essentially, this is at the heart of the Four Noble Truths, the essential primary teaching, said to be the teaching of all the Buddhas—certainly this Buddha that we have some teachings from. What I essentially want to talk about tonight is the second Noble Truth, the cause of the unsatisfactory as the Buddha explains it, which is the Pali word tanha.

Now, I know we haven't gone through the Four Noble Truths. We will. I'm just going to mention them briefly. The first, of course, is to be understood that there is dukkha, unsatisfactoriness, unreliability in life—both the aspect of pain, obvious suffering, sickness, death, and all of that. The fact that these happen, and waking up doesn't stop them from happening. There's the unreliability of constant change. There's nothing to hold on to, and there's no inherent self-existence. That's dukkha, the first noble truth. Unsatisfactoriness is the word I like.

The Buddha then says that the cause, the origin, is this tanha. That's what I want to talk about tonight. The third noble truth is that there is a cessation, an ending of dukkha with the ending of tanha, of clinging, of craving. And the fourth is the Noble Eightfold Path—the path of life, of practice, for understanding, waking up, exploring this, what we're all doing now.

Regarding the second truth, I want to read from the Sutta. I use dukkha because suffering, I think, is too narrow a translation. It leads us to think that all unpleasantness is going to go away when we understand tanha, and it isn't. So I'll use dukkha as unreliable.

"This is the noble truth of the origin of dukkha. It is this craving, this tanha, which produces repeated renewal of being, which is bound up with delight and lust, and which seeks pleasure now here and now there. Namely, craving for sense pleasures, craving for being, craving for states, craving for existence—that's the second one—and craving for non-existence." Vibhava-tanha is also like craving, the wanting stuff to go away that we don't like.

I want to talk about exploring this, but tanha isn't only greed. It really encompasses all of it—the craving, the thirst. The best translation, the closest translation for tanha is thirst. This thirst for pleasure, this thirst for being, this thirst for something to not be. It encompasses all the kilesas, all the confusion.

Tanha does not vanish; we do not abandon it through an act of will—which we probably know, but we keep trying. "Okay, I get it. You talk about it tonight, you read about it, I get it. She finally convinced me, it's no good, so I'm giving it up. It's not the path of happiness." If only, right? It's not abandoned by an act of will. Conversely, it doesn't mean you're a sad specimen of a human being because you haven't yet given up tanha, and you would if you had any strength at all. That's not really how it works.

But wisdom, paññā, recognizing accurately, and the stability through steady mindfulness and samadhi, stability of mind—this is the condition for clear seeing. And the clear seeing, the wisdom, is what allows paññā, what allows tanha to, in a moment, evaporate. Not because wisdom hates it—hating is really an aspect of tanha. It's because when we recognize accurately, in that moment—and there's only moments—craving doesn't make any sense. So it's abandoned.

There's a word, one talked about in the whole train up to liberation, called nibbida, which is often translated as disenchantment.

That's really what it is. The wisdom sees through the craving. There's a disenchantment with what's craved, and it drops away.

The example that's often given for disenchantment is this: if you have a hungry dog, a wild dog that comes running up and finds this big bone, he grabs a hold of it. But that bone has been out in the desert being bleached for a hundred years. There is not one speck of anything that could give that dog anything—no marrow, no nothing. Just a dried up old bone. So the dog starts on it, but immediately it's apparent there's nothing there. As much as the dog wants some pleasure, there's nothing there; that bone can't give it. You see, "Oh, that's just how it is." You don't keep wanting the bone. Wanting makes no sense. You put it down and walk away.

That's nibbida. That's disenchantment. That's, in a moment, the freedom from tanha, the freedom from the dukkha, the unreliability.

A lot of people aren't really very interested in disenchantment. And therein lies the problem. That wasn't casually said—it's actually quite deep in us.

My intention with this talk, of course, is to give a lot of information, but really my intention is an invitation to all of us to actually turn to mindfulness wisdom, to actually explore this aspect of experience that we call tanha—as it arises, how it acts, how it passes. Because it's simply a mental state that arises and passes in a particular moment of citta, many, many moments of citta. When we're meeting it with right attitude, with just the attitude of this interested mindfulness, it's as worthy an object of mindfulness wisdom as anything else. So really that's my invitation here, and everything I'm talking about is to just let us turn the mindfulness onto the tanha, to explore it, see what it actually is so that it loses its mystique, quits driving the bus. We can actually see what's going on. What is its nature? How does it arise? How does it behave? And then how do we behave when we're not recognizing that tanha is in the forefront of the mind at the moment?

What we call mind—moments of consciousness with mental qualities arising and passing—is not a steady state at all. It's an activity. Every moment is a new arising quality of mind and heart. And that's what allows our practice, that's what allows investigation. That's what allows us to notice, in this case, tanha arising, notice in the moments it's present how it acts, notice when it goes away. And then notice that you expect, "Now I've conquered tanha, and it's gone." And how come I have to keep going through this over and over and over? We think, "Okay, once done, that's it." We're so disappointed. But who knows? Ten million mind moments in a day—actually, they say seventeen trillion in the blink of an eye, but let's stay with ten million in a day. It's already a lot. And our job is just to keep coming back and look and explore.

So everything I say tonight is from that—trying just to pique our interest, our exploration, and our trust in the Dhamma, our trust that when the obscuration isn't there and there's accurate recognition, you don't have to figure out how to abandon that craving. It stops making sense in that moment. And it's like—wow.

First, let me start talking about maybe some ideas we have about tanha, craving, often translated as wanting, desire, greed, all the different words. But as you know, this is not only greed; it's also pushing away.

One of the confusions that comes up a lot when we're thinking about it—not exactly just being there feeling that thirst, but thinking about it—is this: What's wrong with wanting things? We only would do something if we want things. What's wrong with wanting a better world? What's wrong with wanting a good relationship? What's wrong with wanting peanut butter at dinner? Whatever—what's wrong with wanting awakening? What's wrong with wanting to practice? And then we get all confused.

Something—and this is my particular thing—is recognizing that tanha is referring to, is a label for, a state of heart, a state of mind. Tanha is about the quality in the mind and heart, not about the object. All of those questions—what's wrong with wanting this or that?—all the attention gets focused on the object. And then we start getting confused.

But tanha, thirst, this leaning of "I need to have, I want to have"—and then it strengthens into grasping, upadana, holding on, clinging—it's the state in the heart, in the mind. And so there comes to be a linguistic confusion, because in English the word "desire" or the word "want" can actually be referring to very different qualities or states of heart and mind, very different mental states.

It's kind of symptomatic of the whole way our delusion works on so many different levels: all our attention is focused on the object, and we don't actually notice what's going on in the mind-heart. So it's a linguistic thing.

In Pali, tanha, this word that I've described as thirst, is very specific. There's another word, chanda, that is essentially neutral. Chanda is translated as a kind of excitement, a desire to do, an energy, an interest. Sometimes it's translated as zeal, a desire to act. So depending on what it's paired with—there's a word dhammachanda—then there's this interest, this zeal, this willingness to act that is a wholesome quality, one that gives us the energy, the aspiration to practice the Dhamma.

So when we say, "What's wrong with wanting awakening? You have to want in order to be able to practice"—we're talking about this chanda energy. We're not talking about tanha. They're very different states of mind and heart. If we're only looking at the object, we never even notice the difference. And then we get really confused. "So there's good desires, there's bad desires"—and we go, "Well, what the heck?"

Chanda is also found in another pairing: kamachanda. Kama—not karma, but kama—kamachanda is the excitement of sense pleasures, leading into what is really the first hindrance. Not wholesome. That same zeal energy, but focused on the excitement of sense desires, which takes us into tanha. So that's chanda. There can be dhammachanda, zeal to do totally wholesome things.

The same object, though—even take wanting enlightenment. My guess is maybe many of you have experienced this: the thought is, "I really am dedicated to wanting enlightenment," but the internal experience is one of huge suffering and frustration. Have you ever experienced that? Am I making that up?

So we look and we say, "Well, but what's wrong with wanting enlightenment? It's the aspiration. What's the difference?" We get all worked up. Turn the attention around. That's tanha—this thirst, this craving, this quality that when it's present in the citta and unrecognized, we suffer. We don't see accurately. So here we want to really start exploring it.

The same thing with peanut butter for tea. You're just hungry. You need to go eat. Nothing wrong with that. We say, "I want to eat." Maybe you're hungry, maybe you're not. But "I've got to have peanut butter" or "I do not want another peanut butter! If they have peanut butter again, I'm going to scream! I'm going to write a note and put it on the bulletin board—for the well-being of all the yogis. It's not my personal preference; it's for everyone's well-being."

And I just want to say here and now: when that thought occurs to you about anything, we beg you—we beg you—do not put the note on the bulletin board. Take a twenty-four-hour period. See if it's still life and death, for the benefit of all beings, that this note goes up.

It may have changed in a 24-hour period. The qualities in your mind state may have changed. So we call that "yogi mind." It's wonderful terminology because it captures exactly what happens. It's like the kilesas—greed in this case, or aversion—exaggerate. They do, don't they? It's like peanut butter becomes the bane of the planet when you're feeling that way. It exaggerates. And concentration magnifies. When those two come together, it's not a good combination.

We call it yogi mind. It happens. It happens to all of us. Because there is strong concentration. And again, you might be quite much more focused than you were ten days ago, even though you don't think it. You might be with the breath or something neutral or something wholesome. But then an unwholesome kilesa comes roaring up. We don't quite see it. And all that focus, that magnification goes in and—boom—it takes over.

We all have that. It's like, "Oh, I'm just the worst person who ever existed," for whatever reason. And when you say the reason the next day you go, "Huh?" You can't even imagine it. But anyway, that's a sidetrack.

To begin, I want to invite us to explore so we learn to recognize and see. Don't believe me or the Buddha, but as he said, he offers his teaching for us to come and see, explore, and learn to recognize with mindfulness and wisdom—sati-paññā—when tanha, this craving, this thirst, is present. How do you recognize it? And what's the effect of it? Why is it a problem? Why did the Buddha pick this out of everything as the cause of dukkha? So we turn around and take a look at that state.

I'm going to say some things about it. You may see your own things. Most of these we know, but if we really knew, right? We know, but we forget. Because it's so seductive. We've spent our life really in the thrall of craving—it's the only way we really know to be happy, to be at peace, to have some pleasant experience. That thirst, that leaning into it is just what we've learned. And because we keep getting focused out on the object, we don't recognize what's actually going on. We're giving all the potential for peace, for ease, for happiness to that particular object of mind—physical or mental—at that time. And it's just so seductive, it just pulls us along.

My brother used to have a hound dog, a red bone hound, a sweet dog. A hunting dog bred for hunting, which of course it didn't get to do in downtown Atlanta, but he did have a backyard. Sweet dog, but the nose was so highly bred for scents. That dog was led by his nose. He would come in the house and just follow his nose to every new smell, every new thing. When I would come to visit, if I left my suitcase open, he'd be immediately in the suitcase sniffing any dirty clothes or anything that had a scent of person on it. He was immediately in there, pulling it out of the suitcase and chewing on it. When he'd go outside in the yard, he couldn't just go play like a dog. He just had his nose on the ground and had to go around following every scent.

That, to me, is craving. That's how it works. We're just led by it, led by it, led by it, and we have no clue that there's another way, that there's something else going on here.

So it gives us this kind of tunnel vision too. When the craving is strong and we're on the thing, that's all we want. Everything else is in the way. Have you noticed that, even with little things?

Or like when you're in line. I can see I'm really sidetracking here. A friend told me about this—when you're in line to get on a bus or something, and there aren't assigned seats, so you don't know if there will be enough seats, and there's a big crowd. I'm from New York, so my New Yorkness really comes out. I could blame it on New York, but I have to blame it on craving. It's like, shh, go for it, and everyone else is in your way. In the way. You get the seat, you sit down, and then—ah, may you be happy, may you be peaceful, everybody else. I hope you all get a seat once I have mine. But until I have it? Tunnel vision, craving, get away.

My friend told me that many years ago he was somewhere in China, way out in the middle of nowhere—Dunhuang, I think. And like one bus a day came to get out of there. So he'd been there, done his thing, and then he's waiting at six in the morning for the bus. The bus comes, and it's like a mob of people. While fighting, they all get on the bus, it fills up, and it goes. And he's just standing there. He didn't want to fight. He's trying to be the nice tourist. So they all get in, and it goes away. He's like, oh, twenty-four hours till the next bus comes. So he made sure he got on the next one.

Abandoning craving doesn't mean we can't see what's going on.

So it's like that—it leads us by the nose, creates tunnel vision. But the seduction is that real promise of happiness. As you know, we really think this next thing is going to do it. And of course we've talked about it and will more—the whole sense of not being sufficient, how craving accentuates our lack of wholeness, all of that. But I'm going to stay really with exploring it in our present moment experience as a quality of heart that's often experienced concomitantly. There are physical expressions that may come with it, so that we can really explore and see what's going on in the mind and body when taṇhā is present.

It has that seductive quality too—the next one's going to do it if this one didn't. The next one's going to do it if this one didn't. Watching professional sports is a lot like that, isn't it? I happen to be, for God knows why, a big fan of professional tennis. And it's been really interesting the last couple of years to watch what goes on in my mind around that. Really interesting.

The mind wants to pick one person that it's kind of wanting to win. And once that happens, all this energy—every back and forth, every point, there's a sense of wanting it to go a certain way. Wanting, oh, okay, that one was good. There's happiness. Well, no, that one wasn't good. Unhappy—but now there's another one. This one will be good. Oh, that was good, but now there has to be another one. This has to be good. This has to be good. And no, no, no, this has to be good. And then finally they win the match. But that's one match, then there's seven matches, and finally the tournament. The tournament's over, and if that one person out of a hundred and twenty-eight won the tournament—phew. What happiness. But it never ends. You get a day and then there's the next tournament, and the whole thing starts over again.

And I notice in myself—if I'm watching and it's two people I really don't care about, it's actually much more pleasant. I'm really watching and it's like, wow, this is really nice. I'm not wanting, no, wanting, no. It's more like, oh, look at that, that's very interesting, very skillful. I can turn it off when I've had enough. I don't have to keep watching.

Or going online shopping, like looking for a rug.

Just pick one website, go to eBay. Put in the size rug you want—10,200 choices, right? I'm not exaggerating. You think, well, there's no way I'm going to look at 10,200 choices. But it comes up and you know, well, just one more page. Just one more page. Five hours later.

And we think this is making us happy. That's the seduction. We're clueless. As the Buddha said in the definition—seeking delight, now here, now there. And what's so interesting is that if we don't turn around and look at the craving, we can easily mistake the craving itself for the delight. We mix it up.

So seeking delight. You get off after five hours. I do turn it off before that, the eBay. But you feel horrible. You have a headache. Your eyes are bugging out. Half the day is over. You didn't find a rug anyway. And even if you did, it doesn't look like what it looked like online. So it's a waste of time completely. And then we turn around and say, oh, what could I do now? Maybe I'll have some ice cream. What's the next thing? What's the next thing?

I have a very wise friend who knew this perfectly well. We were having a conversation. This is a person who's very careful, always likes to have a couple of cookies after lunch. Not pigging out, not a lot, just two cookies every day after lunch—but has to have two cookies every day after lunch, certain kinds of cookies. So we were laughing and talking about craving, and I said, this is really the essence of samsara. Thinking those cookies will make you happy. "But they do make me happy," he said. I said, right, okay. But what about when you can't get a cookie? He says, "Oh, I'll always get a cookie."

This keeps us bound to samsara. Samsara, the endless round—the red bone hound, the next, the next, the next. Wanting sense pleasure, wanting to become, wanting a state, wanting—and all the while thinking this is what's going to bring peace and happiness. Not really recognizing it. It's really poignant, really touching that we do this.

The Buddha speaks about what Bhikkhu Bodhi describes as three movements in the unfolding process of insight. You see it around tanha, you see it around many things. The three movements are recognizing the gratification in a particular experience, recognizing the danger in a particular experience, and then recognizing the escape.

This is from the Buddha himself: "Before my enlightenment, O bhikkhus"—bhikkhus technically means monks, but it also means anyone who's practicing, so bhikkhus, like he's speaking to us—"while I was still a Bodhisatta, it occurred to me: What is the gratification in the world? What is the danger in the world? What is the escape from the world? Then it occurred to me: Whatever pleasure and joy there is in the world, this is the gratification. That the world is impermanent, bound up with dissatisfaction, with unreliability, and subject to change—this is the danger in the world. The abandoning of desire and lust for the world—this is the escape from the world."

Notice he's saying the abandoning of desire and lust. He's not saying abandon the world. There's a huge difference. When we talk about renunciation, renunciation is the abandoning of the craving that keeps us bound to samsara. It doesn't mean we're necessarily abandoning the world.

So, that there is gratification—there is. Even though the Buddha talks so much about the danger of sense pleasures—the danger being because they're so seductive, because we get so lost, because we don't bring in mindfulness wisdom, satipañña, and investigate what's really happening—we just keep getting sucked in, like the examples I gave.

But it's true that there's gratification. Sometimes people say—and we hear this frequently—"Well, if there's no clinging, if I'm not supposed to cling or have thirst for pleasant experience, what if everything's just all the same? Who cares? You don't like anything. You go out in nature—so what? It's green, it's gray, who cares? It's a turkey, it's a worm, who cares?" And I think, again, people aren't interested in nibbida because of this misunderstanding. But that's not what it is at all.

It is important to distinguish between indulging in sense pleasures and the joy and happiness that we experience when we are mindful and at peace. Attachment to sense pleasures brings about suffering and entanglement, both in the present moment and the future, for ourselves and others. The Buddha often talks about agitation through clinging—that's what Thich Nhat Hanh is pointing to, the attachment to sense pleasures. But the joy and happiness of a peaceful mind bring neither suffering nor attachment in the present or in the future, for ourselves or for others.

So we can really explore the difference here. Not putting a "should" on it, but genuinely explore the difference. Let's take nature as an example. You go out and see the beautiful moon. There can be a real appreciation, there can be a sense of joy, or there could be a real sense of craving and thirst. These will feel quite different in the heart-mind. Explore that.

To explore it means we have to have the willingness to trust, to understand that when craving arises, it's arising due to causes and conditions. It's a habit of mind. So we're not talking about craving to say, "I'm not going to let it come. I'm not going to see it." We don't have to be afraid of it. If we meet it with wisdom—well, we can't control the wisdom, but we keep meeting it with mindfulness, and the wisdom comes. We don't need to be afraid of craving. It's another mind state.

So it comes. There's joy, you're appreciating the moon, and the craving comes in. Notice that narrowing. Notice that kind of leaning forward. The craving actually brings a sense of dissatisfaction with it. Rather than trying to fix things, it tries to fix them, but it actually is what brought up the dissatisfaction in the first place. Don't believe me—look and see.

So, not to be afraid, but really watch. See the difference. There is appreciation. We don't hate sense pleasures. But we really want to see the difference between just being with "it's like this now"—exquisitely silent, just like this, the happiness of the mind at rest, of seeing clearly—versus "I wish I'd gotten up at five to see that moon the other night and I didn't do it, and it won't happen for another 150 years. Oh, that's nice, but it's only a quarter moon now and it was so beautiful..." You know, now we're in a whole other world. Be there with that too.

So the gratification is real. But the danger—we really start to notice what the Buddha points to—the danger is the fact that craving can't satisfy us because of impermanence, which intellectually we know. But I want to emphasize even more the danger being that seductive quality that we don't really recognize. Something changed, but we don't really see it. Like with tennis, we just go, "Okay, the next one, the next one, the next one." Or the cookies, or the next page on eBay. Instead of seeing that everything's changed, that there's nothing to cling to, the clinging just keeps propelling us to the next thing.

This seductive quality, this onward-going quality that just keeps us locked in—to me, just me personally, that's one of the biggest dangers if we don't see it. If we overlook the heart-mind space of clinging and keep focusing on the object, we miss this danger. Because even though the object changes, we always find another object. And even if we don't get it, we have reasons why we didn't get it. And the object isn't necessarily a sense pleasure—it's a state of mind. Often we can get really locked into craving for states of mind here.

Probably that hasn't happened to anybody. But you know, it does happen sometimes to a rare meditator that they're craving a particular experience. And if you get it, then you lose it and it's suffering. If you don't get it, you're miserable. So either way, look at the craving rather than being satisfied with the object.

So that's one danger—the narrowing. All the craving mind sees is what it craves, and everything else is in the way. Like I was saying about getting on a bus or getting on a plane. I do that a lot, get on planes, and I get to watch this all the time. You're waiting. Am I going to have an empty seat next to me? Will there be an empty seat? And everyone getting on is the enemy until they're past me. Until the doors close, you know, just watching that. That's the suffering—the constriction, the separation, a sense of me versus others. And that's the unwholesomeness that we can't see accurately.

To me, the biggest danger, the most poignant one, is what I mentioned in the beginning: that when there's taṇhā in the mind, in terms of greed, in terms of aversion, in terms of delusion, it distorts accurate recognition. That is the veil that blocks recognizing our true nature. That is the veil that keeps us locked into saṃsāra, that keeps us from recognizing the radiance of the pure citta, as the Buddha talked about. And we get locked into wanting more, wanting more, wanting more. We don't see that it's the very wanting that's the thing that's blocking—as Ajahn Amaro likes to talk about—the natural peace and ease of mind and body. It's our natural peace and ease. The taṇhā is what blocks it.

I think someone, maybe Dara, said this quotation about how wisdom, paññā, when citta is recognizing accurately, when there's wisdom in the mind—it recognizes the natural characteristics of whatever the object is: sense pleasure, seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, mental experience. So wisdom recognizes, maybe a sound, it might recognize it as a bell, but it also recognizes that it's impermanent, that it's changing, that it's got no intrinsic inherent stability, that it's unreliable. I don't mean that with every sound, if there's wisdom, you go, "Oh yes, hearing, impermanent, unreliable." It just knows that. It recognizes it accurately. Craving doesn't arise. Aversion doesn't arise.

Delusion, when these qualities are present in the citta, distorts perception and we don't recognize these qualities accurately. But the object is recognized. So there's still hearing. There's still a bell. But the impermanent qualities, the unreliable non-self qualities, aren't recognized. And that's when we just get into a whole lot of trouble. Because the way we respond and relate is what keeps the taṇhā going. It distorts our perception. So to me, in a way, that is the most poignant aspect of the danger of taṇhā, of craving, of aversion, of confusion.

Escape. Well, first, to begin with, rather than jumping to complete absence, complete abandonment of taṇhā—when you notice it arising, our tendency, in itself, and you don't know this unless you explore, but in my experience, the experience of thirst, of craving, of leaning forward mentally and physically, is unpleasant. And our deeply conditioned way to escape from unpleasant is... what? What do we do when something's unpleasant? What do we do to get happy?

The Buddha said it's the only escape an unenlightened worldling knows. That's most of us, I would assume. I love that word, puthujjana, unenlightened worldling. The only escape we know, we know no other escape from unpleasant than the seeking out of and experiencing pleasure. So the minute an unpleasant experience arises—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral, just this simple vedanā that James introduced the other morning, and I think Aaron will talk about more fully in a couple of nights. It's such a key experience. It's so subtle. We don't notice it. Unpleasant vedanā in a sight, a sound, an internal feeling, a mood comes up, and boom, the mind goes towards something pleasant. That's just what we've learned.

And as the Buddha said, we know of no other escape, the worldling, from unpleasant than the seeking of pleasure, and then that becomes the habit that underlies the mind. We seek pleasure, we have the habit of resisting the unpleasant, and neutral—what? Is there neutral? We've got no clue in life what's going on with neutral.

That is really, to me, so poignant. It's one of the most poignant things.

Knowing that this is the case, perhaps it wouldn't be our first response to keep the sati, the mindfulness, going when tanha arises—when you notice that closing in, or that leaning forward, or the tightness, however you notice it. Rather than jumping to get something else, or going to aversion and blaming yourself, just recognize that this is the next arising experience. It's a mental experience. Let the mindfulness meet it. How does it feel? What does it feel like? Is there a reflection in the physical body? I generally find it unpleasant, but look and see. Turn the attention back whenever you notice tanha.

This is something we're going to have many chances to explore, and that's wonderful. Instead of it being a problem—and it is a problem when we're not aware of it—but instead of being a problem, people often come and say, "Oh no, it's hopeless. I'm seeing cravings so much," and they get disheartened. Understandably so. Why? Because we don't want it there, it's unpleasant, and we want to be happy.

But if we could say, "Okay, every time you notice craving, that's an opportunity to meet it with mindfulness and wisdom"—not to make it go away. That's not mindfulness. We know that, right? We know that if you're mindful properly, it doesn't mean the difficult thing disappears. Do we all understand this? That's not the point of mindfulness. The point of mindfulness is to meet what's happening just as it is. And the steadiness of mindfulness allows for wisdom to see how it acts.

So when you notice tanha, explore it. Some useful inquiries might be: How do you even know it's there? Is it a thought? Is it a physical experience? I get a kind of tightness in my chest—it's almost like physically leaning forward. Sometimes I notice what feels like a measurable tightness in my mind. Sometimes it's just a thought. You notice you've been planning for the last five minutes: "And then when I get to lunch, I'm going to do this... Five more minutes and I can go to bed... How am I going to manage to get the shower at this time?" And after a while you notice—hmm. This could be tanha. It's possible.

So then, instead of going, "Oh no, how can I stop it?"—land in it. Bring in the attention. How does it feel, mentally, physically? What thoughts does it bring up, if any? How does it affect perceptions when it's present in the mind? How does it feed our intentions and our choices? How do we act when there's tanha in the mind? Really hang out with it and explore it.

And sometimes, you know, it's so strong that you just cannot help doing the thing. I'm speaking of simple things here, within the bounds of the precepts, but simple things—you just can't resist.

Well, something that happens for me in walking meditation—somebody walks by, and I just want to look. Why? It's not like it's a horrible thing to look, but the craving to look can be so strong. So I'll notice the craving, and sometimes it's so strong I can't not look. Basically, the craving is stronger than the mindfulness. That's all that's happening. So I look.

You do it. Bring the mindfulness along with you. You're acting from the craving, but you can still bring the mindfulness along with you and see what happens.

So an example for me: I was walking, quite present with mindfulness, and then craving arises—I've got to look, I've got to look. I look, and right away there's seeing, right away there's a judgment. They're better than me, they're worse than me, oh that person, or what are they... So there's the judgment, and that's unpleasant. Then there's self-judgment for judging. And it was like, "That was really a good move, right? That was really a good thing to do, to look there." Then you come back and you're walking again, and it was fine before.

Bring the awareness along with you. That's where the wisdom comes in. Sooner or later, the mind goes, "Oh, that craving doesn't really make sense. It really doesn't."

So first we're able to just hang with it. Okay, it's unpleasant. You're not going to die from it—I really promise. You're not going to die from it. And if you keep hanging with that particular craving, walking back and forth, make yourself a pact once in a while if you get interested: you're just going to keep walking until that particular craving dies away. It will, and probably a lot quicker than you think.

Keep watching. "Oh, it died away, good, I'm out of here." No—keep watching. Keep the mindfulness going. Notice what it's like. For me, when the craving goes, if you stay mindful, it's like... ah, peace. And that's the natural peace and ease of mind that we were looking for in the first place. Why in the world the mind thought looking at the person passing was going to give me that peace and ease, I don't know. But notice when the craving goes.

Over and over we do this, and we really learn. We can see: okay, it's an unpleasant experience, and it's telling me a story that is really hard not to believe. Don't set yourself up—if you set yourself "I can't" or "I shouldn't do this," then you're just bringing in more tightness. Rather, just say, "Okay, you're really going to let mindfulness be there, whatever you're doing," and the wisdom comes.

Because this is yathā bhūta—things as they've come to be, as they really are. You really see that the craving is not serving the purpose we think it is, that it's actually the cause of the dissatisfaction. Literally, in the moment, as well as in the future, as well as in our understanding—in the exact moment, it's the cause of the dissatisfaction.

So hanging with cravings. Okay, it's just mental and physical sensations. It's really not such a big deal. A lot of the time. Sometimes it is—don't beat yourself up about that. But there are a ton of little times when you can really explore it here. Ah, peace. Just the peace of mind and heart being with things as they are.

I want to read a couple of quotations because I like them. From Ajahn Chah, on why we don't recognize the craving—he talks about the flood. He's talking about sense pleasures, but I want you to know this is also about mental experience. Views and opinions is something the Buddha talked about very much as a source of grasping. And I think I'll talk about it in a whole other talk, because it's really huge. We hold on to a thought, a view—"It's like this. This is true, everything else is false." Of course, we don't say that. Then we're attached to it. The attachment is the problem.

It brings us into conflict with ourselves and others. So it's not just sense pleasures, but it's that same craving, that narrowing, that inability—in the grip of the craving—to see that there's any other possibility, to appreciate anything else. It's just this.

So we're sunk, as Ajahn Chah says. Sunk in sights, in sounds, in smells, in tastes, in bodily sensations. You might think that sounds like our mindfulness practice—we're aware of all of these—but we're sunk because we only look at externals. We don't look inwardly, meaning looking at what's going on in the mind at that moment.

This is still Ajahn Chah, and I'm sure you've probably heard this, but it's so beautiful. He says how the mind within itself is already peaceful. That the mind is not peaceful these days is because it follows moods. The real mind is simply an aspect of nature. It becomes peaceful or agitated because moods deceive it. Sense impressions, including mental ones, come and trick it into happiness, suffering, gladness, and sorrow. But the mind's true nature is none of those things. That gladness or sadness is not the mind, but a mood coming to deceive us. The untrained mind gets lost and follows these things. It forgets itself. But really the mind is unmoving and peaceful, just like a leaf which is still as long as no wind blows. If a wind comes up, the leaf flutters. The fluttering is due to the wind. The fluttering is due to the sense impressions. The mind follows them. If it doesn't follow them, it doesn't flutter. So if we know fully the true nature of sense impressions, we will be unmoved.

That's the key. This is the power of mindfulness and stability of mind—to allow us to know fully the sense impressions, to allow us to know fully, for wisdom to know, not personally, the qualities of the taṇhā in the mind and the qualities of the peace and stillness when it vanishes.

James reminded me of this—one of my favorite quotations from the Buddha, from the Sutta Nipāta. Bhikkhu Bodhi just put out a new translation of the Sutta Nipāta, which is wonderful. The Sutta Nipāta is generally accepted as one of the earliest of the books of the Suttas, so some people think it's maybe the closest to what the Buddha actually taught. And some of it's quite radical, particularly when talking about non-attachment to views.

This is from the Sutta Nipāta: "For some people contact—the point where sense plus object meet—is enthralling. And so they are washed by the tides of being, drifting along an empty pointless road. Nowhere is there any sign of broken chains. But others come to understand their sense activity. And because they understand it, the stillness fills them with delight. They see just what contact does. And so their craving ends. They realize the total calm."

I just love that. We're not trying to get rid of anything. We see just what contact does, and so their craving ends. It's not an act of will. It's the natural effect of a moment of wisdom in the heart, in the mind. And the steady mindfulness with just what is occurring—taṇhā is a perfect example—is what gives us that possibility.

I'll end with two other quotations. This is from Chökyi Nyima Rinpoche, who is a brother of Mingyur Rinpoche and Tsoknyi Rinpoche. He's also a wonderful teacher. He says—this is in a more Tibetan framework—that the mind, the pure mind, is the Buddha. When the mind is free of reference points and grasping at characteristics of sense impressions, then it is unobscured, unveiled. And when in that state, it is the Buddha. Because in that state, all obscurations, all phenomena, naturally dissolve. Just the arising and the passing.

They're naturally dissolving anyway. But in that state, that's what's recognized.

I'll end with a suggestion from the Buddha, a reflective contemplation. I was doing a self-retreat in November, reading various teachings from the Buddha. And this is so different from the habit of how my mind works.

This is a specific instruction regarding disenchantment or dispassion. Often what we're encouraged to do is notice the drawbacks of being involved—much of what I've been talking about tonight: the danger, the drawbacks of taṇhā, and why it doesn't work. But another way to approach this is to actually incline the mind towards the deathless, to incline the mind towards that natural purity.

This is the Buddha offering a reflection: "A bhikkhu reflects thus: This is peaceful. This is sublime. That is the stilling of all activities, the relinquishment of all acquisitions, the ending of craving, dispassion, nibbāna."

Instead of being all caught up in "What should I do? How can I do it? What can I get? How can I stop it?"—just this:

This is peaceful. This is sublime. That is the stilling of all activities, the relinquishment of all acquisitions, the ending of craving, dispassion, nibbāna.

Let's just sit for a moment.

CHAPTER 169

Liberation through Non-Clinging: Undaunted Courage (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Carol Wilson · 57 min

> In this retreat talk, Carol Wilson illuminates the Third Noble Truth—the cessation of dukkha—not as a distant goal but as something we can taste in every moment when the heart-mind is free from clinging. Drawing on the Buddha's original teaching and insights from Ajahn Buddhadāsa, she explains that liberation through non-clinging doesn't depend on what we're experiencing, but on the quality of awareness meeting that experience. These moments of coolness, free from the fires of greed, hatred, and delusion, are available to everyone and nourish our lives.
>
> Wilson addresses the common challenges practitioners face as understanding deepens: the discouragement when insights seem to fade, the pain of seeing habitual patterns continue even with awareness, and the fear that arises when our views and sense of self are challenged. She draws on teachings from Ajahn Sumedho, who described how awakening can feel like annihilation as our strategies of self-interest fall apart. Shantideva's three aspects of transcendent patience—patience when wronged, patience to bear hardships for the Dhamma, and patience to face profound truth without fear—offer a framework for meeting these difficulties.
> Practical guidance includes recognizing moments of freedom throughout the day, connecting with aspiration rather than expectation, and cultivating adhiṭṭhāna (determination) as a wholesome quality that brings energy together in service of awakening. Wilson emphasizes that everything arising in our experience—whether boring, scary, or repetitive—is the path itself, not something to get through before real practice begins. The talk concludes with an invitation to trust awareness rather than personality and moods, finding the courage to surrender into each moment.

I used to think I would talk about the third noble truth, but somehow this teaching is headed in another direction. We'll start with it, though.

Since we have talked about the first truth of dukkha, the second truth—the cause of dukkha, this tanha, this craving that I spoke about a couple of weeks ago—the third truth being that there is an ending, a cessation of dukkha, and the fourth truth being the path, the Eightfold Path, which I believe Greg spoke about at some point. Everything we talk about is the Eightfold Path.

I just want to read to you the Buddha's definition of the third noble truth when he first taught these four truths: "This, bhikkhus, is the noble truth of the cessation of dukkha—the remainderless fading and cessation, the renunciation, relinquishment, release, and letting go of that very craving, of that very tanha that is the cause of suffering."

One way that I find quite accessible in our moment-to-moment experience of our mind and heart—one way of describing, really meeting, understanding, experiencing moment-to-moment the third noble truth—is in the moments when the heart, the mind, is completely free from clinging. Liberation of heart-mind through non-clinging.

Because of the fact that the mind-heart, the citta (that word for both), is a phenomenon arising and passing, changing in every moment, you don't have to wait for total, complete, absolute cessation of clinging to touch, to taste, to experience a flavor of this quality of liberation through non-clinging, moment to moment to moment.

As Joseph Goldstein really likes to say: liberation through non-clinging, and it doesn't matter to what the mind does not cling. Just like I say awareness doesn't care what it's aware of—it doesn't matter to what the heart-mind doesn't cling. Because it's not about the what. It's about that quality of non-clinging in this moment of heart-mind, in this moment of consciousness, this moment of citta.

So now we start to veer.

All of you really, even if you don't believe it, have moments where you know for yourself that it's the clinging, the craving in the heart, in the mind, in a particular moment—you really see when it ends, when it dissolves, that it was simply that clinging, that craving, that was blocking. As someone said today, it was so clear that it was clinging that was blocking the perception of emptiness. When the clinging is gone, that perception is available.

Even more, many people see that when the clinging lets go in a moment—whether the clinging is to any of the five aggregates, to whatever experience—in the moment when the clinging dissolves, so does that particular sense of self.

One of my favorite quotations about this comes from Ajahn Buddhadasa, the great Thai forest monk and scholar from the last century. He says the sense of self is simply a condition that arises when there's grasping or clinging in the mind. That's it. We make this big brouhaha about the sense of self—it's got to go, it's always here—and then when we stop and look at it, it's simply a condition that arises. Okay, it arises a lot. But every time it arises, it passes. Every time.

You say, "Well, not this time. It's here now." You just didn't see it arise. It's kind of fast. And because we don't look, we assume it's always this same sense of self. But it's every moment of sense of self arising, clinging to some different particular experience. That's a whole other talk—I have like seventeen talks in this talk.

But there are times when we really see it, when we really experience: the clinging goes, and there's no particular sense of self. And it's not a huge experience. It's just so normal and natural. And there's that sense—well, this is really where I'm going—"Well, this is obvious, isn't it? How could I possibly get caught up in it again? It's so clear. Yes, emptiness, everything is insubstantial. How could I possibly get upset about that noise of the beeping smoke alarm? How can that possibly bother me when I know all phenomena are empty?"

And then you find yourself up in the middle of the night throwing pillows at it and writing notes about it as you're mumbling, "Empty phenomena rolling on." Doesn't feel too empty.

But when we really see it, when we really get it, it's not an imagined thing. We're not making it up. We really do know in that moment that when the focus of attention, of awareness, is on the object—whatever of the five khandhas the object is: smelling, tasting, thinking—when the focus is on that, we're looking to the object for fulfillment, for meaning, for sense of self. That's where the clinging comes in. That's where the whole suffering, the whole phenomena ball gets rolling.

And we know as soon as there's that kind of Tai Chi move, that stepping into the awareness of the same object, the same experience—just the stepping into refuge in awareness instead of sinking into looking into the object for self-reference—oh, the same experience is occurring without the Velcro. It's just happening, just as it is. Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. That extra suffering isn't there.

I really want us all to trust in those moments that this is a real perception, that this is a true understanding. And just as it arose, it passes away.

This is what I really want to talk about tonight. We really get it, but—so how can we, this is kind of a pep talk—what can we do? How can we keep on finding the courage, the trust, the determination to continue to open into, with totality of presence, this whole path, this one particular moment? That's what I want to talk about.

People are really in different places, and you all keep changing places, right? Because that's how it goes. Everybody's path is unique. But there are times when each of you has been really experiencing deep insights into Dhamma, into freedom, into the three characteristics, into emptiness, maybe into aspects of your personality, habit patterns that you hadn't seen, really understanding, seeing through them. And then you turn around and you're doing the same thing again and you're really caught again, and it can really take us into discouragement. Or am I the only one? Yeah, I don't think so.

Or you know it's going well. And I think if you come into any of this and say, "Oh, it's going well, it's really good," we never let it sit there, because what does that mean, you know? But it's going well, there's insights, it's flowing, and then all of a sudden some really deep, difficult, painful thing comes up. Or even worse—a lot of just niggly, stupid thoughts, and you can't focus on anything. At least if some big thing comes up, you can feel like you're working with something, right? But when it's just, "Oh, I'm thinking this, I'm thinking that, it's not even about anything, but I just can't focus"—that's when you're really ready to hang up the towel.

Doubt, impatience, frustration, despair, really—can it be? I'm in despair because I was in walking meditation and thoughts kept coming up. I'm in total despair. We hear this stuff all day. The thing is, you are in total despair. And so this is where we want to bring our awareness to understand what's going on here and not to let ourselves get caught in these emotional reactions to what's happening.

Ajahn Buddhadasa had a translation of a talk he gave, and I'm sure many of you have heard quotations from this, where he was talking to Thai lay people. "Nibbana for Everyone" is the title of this talk. I'm just reading very briefly from it. He's talking about how Nibbana is a natural condition—a natural condition, not some amazing huge thing only for special people. That's what he's telling Thai lay people. Don't just think it's for nuns and monks who are going to be arahants and you just have to wait for another lifetime. Nibbana is for everyone.

And so he's calling it a natural condition, the cool state of mind, of heart, without any kilesa, without any torment. It's just what we've been saying all along. And just a little piece—he goes on to say that if we really look at this, we see that the kilesas, greed, hatred, confusion, are also sankhara-dhamma, compounded, conditioned phenomena. They come together when the conditions are ripe, and when those conditions change and cease, then those causal conditions are not present, and the kilesas, the torments, simply become extinct.

So this is in any moment when there's suddenly clear seeing—kilesas in that moment have become extinct. And he says, although the extinction is temporary—don't dismiss it. In other words, the coolness takes place temporarily. The phenomenon has the real taste of Nibbana, even though it's not the lasting one.

And he says we all experience many, many moments of this coolness of heart and mind, of the moments free from kilesas, because without it, the fire of the kilesas, he said, we'd die. This is what nourishes our life. This freedom, these moments of freedom from kilesa—to really notice that through the days here. These aren't about any amazing thing happening. This isn't about big insight: "Oh, non-self!"

It's just the little moments where the heart-mind is cool. It's not burning with the fire of greed, the fire of hatred, the fire of delusion. So just notice this—in the walking, in the sitting, when you're eating, sitting in the bathroom, anytime. I often experience it as just a little exquisite moment. Or one of those moments of what the Zen people call the is-ness of things.

Often when we're in a place like this where the nature is really beautiful, there are these moments of pure presence when you're outside. What can easily happen is that we overlook that it's the quality of the coolness, the absence of kilesa, that's creating the sense of purity of presence. We tend to attribute it, or can attribute it, to the circumstances or the object. You walk out and there's the beautiful crescent moon and the sky is just... so beautiful. And we forget to notice that really what that coolness is—in that moment, consciousness is free from kilesa. It's a moment, a little taste of liberation of heart-mind through non-clinging.

But our habit is... so just notice these moments. Many, many, many through the day, they come and go, no big deal. Let it start to be no big deal. Then we'll stop striving so much to achieve some idea of nibbana. Whatever idea you have can't possibly be correct, because it's not about an idea or words. So put the ideas down. Let go of the views and just notice a little nothing-special moment of putting down your foot. There's just the sensation of pressure and tingling. The mind isn't saying, "Okay, a couple more steps and I go to lunch." Just the sensation of pressure and tingling and wakefulness. And it comes to, well, nothing's happening. I'm just walking, feeling pressure. Notice that—just that moment of purity of heart and mind. Many, many moments, so that we can really trust it more.

As Ajahn Buddhadasa says, nibbana is for everyone.

So that's on the one side. And on the other side, our tendency, as I said, is so much to attribute experience to the object, to the circumstance, that we forget to notice the purity of heart-mind. And then we're kind of sucked back into the story, sucked back into this place of confusion and doubt. "It was so beautiful. I was just at ease. And now I go in my room and I'm lost in all these weird emotions. How can that possibly be?" And then we start spinning.

Nibbana is for everyone, but the true liberation of heart and mind through non-clinging is also really challenging for everyone. These moments, yes, they're absolutely natural. They're free from effort because effort gets in the way. They're absolutely available to all of us much of the time. But they come and they go, and the habits are so strong.

I want to talk a little bit about some of the ways that, as we deepen in practice, as we're really touching and experiencing freedom—maybe as I described it just now, or seeing through your patterns, or some of the things I said before—and then seeing that go away. Even though we may tell ourselves, "Oh yeah, well that's okay, it's really okay, it's all one, I don't mind"—maybe there's a moment when it's okay, but it starts to spiral down and we start to believe it more.

Freedom from clinging is absolutely uncompromising. There's no aspect whatsoever of our experience that's exempt from that. So at times, as our practice is deepening and understanding is growing but going back and forth between understanding and getting caught—the language I use is that we hit a wall in different ways. We're really practicing very sincerely, and actually understanding is deepening, but at times we hit different places that are really challenging in our practice, in our life. I want to mention a few tonight so you won't think there's something wrong with you, but also so you can see it's all part of the path.

As I was saying, freedom from clinging means nothing is exempt—freedom from greed, hatred, delusion. When we think about what freedom from clinging would be like, what nibbana would be like—which we do, because that's what we do—of course we're going to have some idea about that. We want to know ahead of time: What am I doing this for? What's it going to be like? How's it going to be? How can I steer my experience in that direction? Isn't that what all the techniques and all the instructions are about?

We lose the fact, we lose noticing, that the steering has become wanting, and the wanting is in service of some idea we've made up. We forget that we can't know, that what's required moment to moment to moment is just this—just in one moment.

Remember, it's only ever one moment, which to me is the only thing that makes it workable. So what I'm saying is about this one moment. What's required is full commitment in this moment to open with fullness of presence into the unknown of what's occurring right now. Without having it all sussed out, without being able to put it in a trajectory of where it's going, without knowing—if I really open into this scary thing, what's going to happen? What will I get out of it? What will I know? You don't even know. Just to completely open into the unknown in this moment, with mindful awareness, with kind attention. It's what we've been saying all along. But there are no guarantees. Ever. Just into this moment.

And at times this is really freeing when it happens. It's like, "Oh yeah, how could I forget?" But there are times it's really challenging. Really scary.

Awakening is not a self-improvement project. As Ajahn Sumedho said—I remember hearing him say once—it's not our personality that gets enlightened. Awakening doesn't confirm us, make us feel all good about ourselves, give us a sense of self-fulfillment: "I'm such a better person now that I'm enlightened." It's actually the standpoint of "me" that gets seen through. As I was saying, really noticing the arising and passing of the sense of me, the sense of I. When we recognize that in those moments, we can't take it so seriously, and that's freeing. When we don't recognize it, again, it's really serious and not so freeing.

So along the way, what happens is that all of our views, our beliefs about ourselves, about what the world is like, about practice, about anything—at some point all of our views, our beliefs, our attachments, our strategies of self-interest are going to be challenged. Not to say they're all bad or wrong. But at some point as we practice, any view that we're holding to is going to be challenged. Because the Buddha talked a lot about not attaching to views—views of enlightenment, views even of the teachings, views of who you are, views of anything. Even the teachings are not to be held on to. No view to be held to.

And so many times when we're in places—happening to some today and some not—where what I call "hitting the wall" occurs, we're going along and actually we can tell the practice is going great. It's just that what's coming up is unpleasant or disconcerting or not what we'd expect, or we don't quite know how to be with it. And so we think our view of what practice is, is what's being challenged. But actually our path of awakening is going along just fine.

A lot of what our job is—I don't know if you've noticed—we kind of pat you back into shape. "Okay, that's okay. Shake yourself up. Keep going. It's going along fine." Have you noticed how often we do that? Because it's all about just keeping on meeting the moment with open awareness. It's not about making the moment different or better, or making us feel better about ourselves. But God knows we'll keep trying.

So just a few of the ways—there are a million ways, but just a few that came to my mind that are very common in my experience, and I know I'm not the only one—of how we hit a wall or don't recognize we're running into a view we're holding, a personality view, particularly sakkāya-diṭṭhi.

One is simply when things are going along and you think it's going well, and then it changes. There's that deep sense of "I had it, I was doing it, I understood it—and what did I do wrong?" Have you ever had that experience? "I blew it, how can I get it back?" And so it's not only a sense of discouragement because basically now it's unpleasant and before it was pleasant—let's face it. But also really feeding into self-judgment, the whole personality of "I can't do it, I did it wrong, somehow I'm controlling this whole scenario and I blew it."

But really it's just seeing—we call this anicca. I think we've mentioned that once in a while. Things change, conditions change, and it's not just us. This is a sutta from the time of the Buddha, one I often use.

He's talking to a monk, a bhikkhu, named Asaji. And it says, on one occasion, the Blessed One was dwelling at Rajagaha in the bamboo grove. And he heard that Venerable Asaji, a long-term dedicated bhikkhu, was very sick. He was afflicted. He was gravely ill. And the Buddha went to see him, and Asaji was not only ill, but he was upset. He was basically saying that he was troubled by remorse and regret.

So the Buddha questions him and is saying, well, do you have something in terms of your virtue, your sila, to reproach yourself with? Something you've done wrong that's bringing up this remorse and regret? And Venerable Asaji said, no, no, no, Venerable Sir. So the Buddha said, so what, basically, is your problem? And he probably didn't say it like that, but who knows?

So Asaji says, well, formerly, Venerable Sir, when I was ill, I was able to keep on tranquilizing the bodily formations, but now I cannot obtain concentration. And so it occurs to me, let me not fall away. In other words, he's lost his concentration, he can't tranquilize it, and he's thinking, oh no, I've lost it. Don't let me fall away, I'm sick.

And the Buddha basically says, Asaji, haven't I told you, whatever phenomena are subject to arising are subject to ceasing when the conditions change? He's basically saying, you're sick. You're sick as a dog. You can't cultivate concentration because the conditions of mind and body aren't present. And that's freedom—recognizing that. The freedom isn't getting the concentration. The freedom is recognizing that's what's happening. That's the essence of the path.

So the lack of freedom is really making a whole personality view around the belief that it should be different. In fact, I think often when we're in conflict with experience and we don't quite know why, it helps to check what's the view in the background, in the back of your mind. I find for me, it can almost always be boiled down to either it should be better or it should be different. And that's of course an endless one, right? It should be better, and no matter what's happening, it could be better. And so to really see that's what's going on can be a moment of freedom.

So that's one—not recognizing causes and conditions and taking it personally.

Another one, and this is like a whole phase in practice that's really important: when on the personality level, we're really starting or continuing to see with wisdom some of our particular habits of mind, of heart, that bring us suffering or unhappiness, that bring others suffering. They don't have to be huge ones, just little habits, like a habit of impatience, for example. And we start to see it and really understand it. As we become aware of it, we feel the pain of it more. We think, well, I really see how that's not helpful.

And then we turn around, wait in the food line, and there's impatience springing up and we're acting on it. But we're acting on it with awareness, which the Buddha says is more useful—but it happens to be a lot more painful. Because as you're cutting to the head of the line and taking all this extra food and you're so embarrassed because everyone's looking at you, you're so aware: oh, this craving is still running me even though I know it's painful. Have you ever experienced that? Just to see.

And even more when we go out into our lives and see the habits still running, and we're really aware, we can get so discouraged. What's the point? I'm more neurotic now than when I started the practice. I'm doing these neurotic things more. Not really—we're just much more aware of it. And if we don't really bring in mindfulness and wisdom here, we can really talk ourselves out of practice, because it's discouraging.

What this is requiring of us is that willingness, that courage to keep dropping into this unpleasant, painful experience with awareness. When we're saying, I don't want to see this anymore, and maybe the practice isn't helping—no, bring it in. Bring the awareness in. Meet it. But that's what's really hard. Really hard.

Another obstacle, and this is again obvious on one level but on another level can be quite profound: sometimes there's just too much pain—physical pain, emotional pain.

And for sure, for all of us, there are moments when an emotional thing coming up is simply overwhelming. The physical pain is too strong. You need to shift your attention. That's just part of practice.

But I mean something larger, where it's more like the fear of: "Oh no, if awakening means I have to incorporate the awareness of this in my experience, no thank you. I'd rather not." Or just some unpleasant sensation—not even a killer pain, not pain that's going to damage you. We're not talking about that. But sometimes, take an itch. I'm not going to die of the itch. But sometimes it's so hard, so hard just to be with it. I'm using a simple example, but imagine something stronger than that, where you think, "I cannot bear this another moment. I cannot bear to see this pattern again in my life." And if we're not aware of that, the habit of avoiding the unpleasant reasserts itself and we abandon mindfulness. We abandon awareness.

But again—moment to moment.

Another line I love from Ajahn Sumedho. He was describing his early years practicing in Thailand in the hot season in his kuti. Believe me, I've done it—hot. In a kuti with a tin roof, it's like 105 degrees and the sun's beating down and you're inside with long-sleeved robes on. You're cooking. So he's sitting in that kuti. There's no AC. You can't go get an iced Coke or something. You're just sitting there, and there's no food—it's afternoon, that's it for the day. So he's just sitting there, sweating through his robes, thinking, "What am I doing here? I can't bear this another second." And then he'd find that he could.

I love that. I'll be sitting, thinking, "I can't be with this for one more second." And then—it's like this, now. That's all. The one moment. The releasing of the clinging to the idea "I can't bear it," and just that relaxing, surrendering into the moment. Not with a sense of, "If I do it this moment, I have to do it the next moment, I have to do it forever." Just this moment. That complete surrendering with awareness. Coming out of the cage of sakkāya-diṭṭhi.

We don't know where it's going to go. It really requires us to keep connecting with, to keep finding our aspiration, our motivation, our trust and confidence. Which is why I started this talk with really acknowledging for yourself, recognizing the moments of wisdom, the moments of freedom. Not to try and hold on to them, but to trust them. To have confidence that those are true and will happen again. And that gives us the courage to say, "Okay, there's nothing but this moment. Truth is only available in this moment."

As Dōgen Zenji said, "If you can't find the truth right where you are, where do you expect to find it?"

Something in this gives us the courage to just surrender for one moment. Not for anything—just to be here.

Now, a different way that we can hit a wall is one that Sayadaw U Pandita called "stopping within." One way this happens—and here I'm extrapolating, I don't know if this is exactly how he meant it—is when our practice or our life is going along well. There's maybe been a lot of insight, or particular levels of suffering that brought us into practice, that brought us on the path, have really been ameliorated. We're not suffering as much. And there really is a difference. It's like, "Wow, this is great!" And then it's kind of like... "And it's good enough." It's good enough, you know? We might find—and sometimes people say this, and I've seen it in myself too—

It's just part of our journey. As we go along our path, we discover this is good enough. And we might think, "Oh, maybe I wasn't really in this for full awakening. I was in this to make life a little bit better." Which, of course—I mean, why does any of us start? There's nothing wrong with that.

But the stopping within is when we say, "Okay, that's good enough"—and maybe we're not quite conscious of it. And then if you're on retreat, for example, you might find something else comes up that's a little difficult, but you have a way of thinking, "I don't need to go with that. This is good enough. Let me go and open to the stars. Beautiful."

Now, there are times that's totally appropriate, right? Like when James was talking about really accessing the uplifting qualities, the joy—there are times that's totally appropriate. I'm not saying no. But that's to bring us back into balanced awareness, to keep on being fully present for whatever presents itself.

What I was just describing now could sound like it's the same, but it's really more like, "I've had enough. Okay, the stars are so beautiful. Where did Greg say that Andromeda was? Maybe I could go write him a note. Oh, if I could get my phone from the managers, I could look on that app someone was telling me about..." And Rachel was saying you point it at the sky and it shows you everything—and then we're gone, right?

So just look and see, and this is not about judging. We really want to see deep in our own hearts and minds. We keep finding what our motivation is. And for me, I found that it keeps deepening and changing over the years. We come to more understanding. "Oh yeah, this is pretty good. But real freedom might be possible." But that means to keep on going, to keep on looking. And it means we'll come again at some point. We'll keep coming back into facing some aspect of our views or ideas about ourself, or ideas of what freedom is, that are going to get challenged. There's no way around that.

Or sometimes we're starting to get the intimation of that—wow, some aspects of my personality, I'm really going to have to let go of. And then we get these ideas that aren't necessarily true, but like, "Wow, if non-clinging is really uncompromising, that means I'm going to have to let go of the beauty of nature." Whatever our mind comes up with—all kinds of stuff. "That means I'm going to have to let go of loving my family. That means I'm going to have to let go of caring about the environment, or of doing social justice work in the world." Whatever we come up with. "Well, if liberation means that, I don't want it."

Or sometimes—and this is weird, but I've experienced it, maybe I'm the only one, I don't know—there's a sense of certain aspects of my personality, even kind of suffering ones, but they're so familiar. They're so comfortable. It's like putting on an old comfortable bathrobe that you don't want to take away. Who would I be without this impatience? Who would I be without whatever it is?

It doesn't make sense, but I've often felt it's like a small death of some idea about my personality. I want to go back to the pleasure garden that the Buddha had before he was the Buddha, when it was all nice—but it was nice because we were in complete delusion of what was going on. I want to go back. I don't want to see that there's dukkha in these aspects. Let me just get all comfy in my delusion.

You know it's too late for that, right? It's too late for that. But we want it. Chögyam Trungpa called that nostalgia for samsara. We want to go back, we want to go back. We've done all this work, but let's pretend it never happened.

This is from Ajahn Sumedho, again from his preface to that book, The Island, that Adrian mentioned.

As one begins to realize or recognize non-grasping as the way, emotionally one can feel quite frightened by it. It can seem like a kind of annihilation is taking place. All that I think I am in the world, all that I regard as stable and real, starts falling apart, and it can be frightening. But if we have the faith to continue bearing with these emotional reactions and allow things that arise to cease, to appear and disappear according to their nature, then we find that our stability is not in achievement or attaining, but in being—in being awake, in being aware.

That really is where the stability is, where the freedom is. Taking refuge in the awareness that's receiving whatever particular phenomenon is arising, existing, passing away. Awareness receiving, awareness receiving. We take our refuge in that, moment to moment.

And that awareness receiving is also really feeling whatever is occurring. It's not holding experience at a distance. To me, this is really where the courage comes—to find for ourselves that courage, that patience, to take a breath and just surrender into this moment.

Stephen Batchelor has another way of saying the same thing. He says emptiness is not just an experience of oceanic bliss. It's a falling apart of all of our strategies of self-interest, of self-centeredness, of seeming protection. And although it's freeing, at times it can bring about a great sense of disconcertion, of dis-ease. It's like being in no man's land, no person's land. You don't know where you are. You don't have the familiar reference points.

Shantideva talks about three aspects of transcendent patience that we bring to our practice. The first is patience when wronged—that's the way we normally think of it. The second is patience to bear hardships for the Dhamma, and that's a lot of what I was talking about, all the different difficulties. Patience to bear the hardships for the Dhamma, for awakening. And the third is the patience to face the profound truth without fear. Not that fear doesn't come, but we don't let it run us.

So when Stephen Batchelor or Ajahn Sumedho is saying that it's a falling apart of all of our strategies, all of our ideas about things—the patience to face that, the patience to meet that with awareness, whatever arises—that's really taking refuge in awareness. That sense of courage, determination, really finding how we connect with it, how we keep connecting with it. We all have our own ways.

I'm mostly talking about this tonight just to remind us that this is the path for all of us. Everything that's occurring—these most scary, difficult experiences, these boring ones, these hard ones, these repetitive experiences that you think you've seen seven million times and it's happening again—these are the path. They're not what we get through to get on the path. This is it.

In the moment when awareness, when citta, meets the arising experience—that's the place of freedom and purification. The freedom isn't getting rid of the experience. It's in that moment when, like Sayadaw was saying, "I can't be with it" and it's aversion, it's me, it's all the stories—and then it's like this now. Just that simple moment of heart-mind free of kilesa, free of clinging. It seems like nothing. You're sitting here sweating through your robes, the same as you were a second earlier. But in this moment, the heart-mind is free. It's the same sweaty robes.

Everything is our path. Trusting that, connecting to it, remembering the moments of freedom, of wisdom, of understanding—this really helps so much to reconnect with whatever your deep aspiration is. Aspiration, not expectation, right? But we need to remember what it is, because it takes a lot of courage to keep going in this way.

To discover the wisdom, the courage, the humility to keep just surrendering again, no matter what. We think we had the biggest insight, and the next hour we feel like we never meditated before, and you have to go in and tell the teacher that you're completely hopeless. Can we find the humility? This is just another arising experience. How is the awareness meeting it? That's the place of freedom or the place of suffering.

One thing that helps is connecting with the aspiration. Another thing that really helps me sometimes, when it's real dukkha, real suffering, and I can see I'm caught in the personalness of it, a lot of sakkāya-diṭṭhi around it—it's a little bit of a reflection, but often it moves into a real perception experience. When I'm all caught in my own story, whatever it is, I just start to recognize that this is a particular expression of an aspect of dukkha that is shared by all humans.

You could try really hard, but I bet no one can come up with something that, when you get to the nub of what it's about, you're the only human being that ever experienced. You say, well, the particular story—okay, but that's not it. Whatever it is, I start to recognize: oh, this experience of unbearable loss...

This experience of fear, losing the sense of who I am. This experience of just hating having this cough. To start to expand it and see it as a representative expression of the human condition.

And when I do that, it starts as a contemplation sometimes, but it almost always—not always, but almost always—really moves into empathy and compassion. That sense of compassion that we're all in this together, that this is just a unique expression of the human condition. May I meet it for the benefit of all beings. It really helps to die again into this particular moment.

Another mental quality we don't talk about too much but that really helps is one of the pāramīs, one of the ten perfections, the ten wholesome qualities that are developed. In Pali it's adhiṭṭhāna. It's translated as resolution or determination.

When it's wholesome, it's a very wholesome quality. It's a pulling together of the energy. It's that resolution of "just do it"—not "I'm going to do it, by gum!" Just do it, like the Nike thing. Just do it.

I use a simple example. In the morning, your alarm goes off and you're lying there thinking, "Ah, I don't want to get up." You can wander around in the thoughts for a while, you can think about your dream, you can get into the aversion. Or you just get up. Just do it. Without any big production, you just get up. That was so much easier. So much easier.

Starting to recognize this quality of determination, it's like a bringing together of the energy in a moment—the energy and the aspiration in the moment. Okay, just do it. I don't want to go to the sitting hall, but the bell rings and you just go.

Have you noticed how that starts to happen? The bell rings for the sitting, and instead of deliberating—should I walk? Should I have tea?—you just go and walk. It's so much easier than all that hoopla. You just walk and then you sit and then you walk and then you sit. It's so easy. And determination is just, "Oh yeah, just do it."

We can do it on small levels. Sometimes it's with wisdom. When there are obsessive thoughts going on, sometimes you can really just see: not now. Not with the hammer, not with aversion, but those times you just see—what Joseph calls the sword of wisdom. Not now. That's determination. Energy coming together.

In a larger picture, this is how adhiṭṭhāna, this resolution, works when we have a sense of our aspiration. For example, if I feel that my aspiration is the path of practice—which is really all of life, not just being on retreat—is really to free the heart and mind from clinging, of course I'm not thinking that every moment. But then when something gets really difficult, or not even difficult but too pleasant—"I'll practice later, right now I'm going back to the pleasure garden for a while"—the sense of tuning into the larger aspiration can give strength to our present moment motivation.

Not with a "should" or anything, but with wisdom I might say, "Should I go do that?" No, it's okay. I think I'll just go sit right now. Or in daily life, when you're getting all confused—"I've got so much to do in the morning, make my toast, make my coffee, do this, I don't have time to sit"—and you're spinning around like this. You know what? Just sit. Just sit. Just a moment of determination, resolution, in service of your larger aspiration.

The larger aspiration becomes a guideline to bring our moment-to-moment motivation into alignment with what's really important to us. Determination can really help in this way.

Again from Ajahn Sumedho: I think it was in a retreat where I heard him say this. He was talking about a point when he was the abbot of Amaravati, during one of what I'm sure were many very difficult phases interpersonally in the monastery. A lot of difficult stuff was going on over a long period of time.

And he said that he felt very blamed, he was feeling very blamed, and he said, "My personality hated it and feared it." He was getting caught up in hating and fearing the blame. And then he said, "And then I really got in touch with my aspiration, and I determined to put my trust in awareness, not to put my trust in my personality and moods."

This was his whole practice—trusting in awareness. But we have to remind ourselves. We all get caught up in it, right? We make the determination to trust awareness, to really take refuge in awareness, not in the moods, not in the personality. Not denying the personality, but not relying on it for freedom, for ease. Because we never know what's going to come up.

When I talk about surrendering into the moment, surrendering into what's happening, I don't mean by that abdicating choice or decisions or actions. In some ways, I think it means really sometimes taking much more courageous choices, much more courageous action—really, because there's no other choice if we truly want to wake up.

There's an example I often use from a documentary I saw some time ago, about two friends who were mountain climbing in the Andes. It's called Touching the Void. Some of you may have seen it. It's really quite intense.

The short version: They're climbing very high mountains in the Andes, roped together, just the two of them. One of them slides and falls over the edge of a deep crevasse. So they're roped together, suspended like this for hours. The one still up on the mountain can't pull the other up—there's no purchase, he can't do it. He tries for hours, but he can't pull him up, and if he goes any closer, he's just going to get pulled over himself. So he has to make his decision. He cuts the rope.

The other guy falls into the crevasse. The one above can't see down there, can't go down. So he makes his way back to their base camp, waits there for a few days to see if his friend might come. But he figures he's probably dead.

Meanwhile, the one who fell dropped into that narrow crevasse but hit a ledge and didn't go too far down. He broke his leg from the impact, but he's caught on this ledge, and the crevasse is completely dark, just going down and down into blackness. He said the deepest fear he had was of that abyss. To go into that abyss was his absolute deepest fear.

So he's just hanging on that ledge with his broken leg overnight. And then he realizes: nothing's going to happen. Nobody's going to come. The other guy couldn't get there, and there were no other people. Finally he said, "I had to do something. I could not just abdicate. I had to do something." And all he could do was try to lower himself back down into that abyss—the very thing that was his deepest fear.

So he did it. And it turned out that it wasn't so deep. He hit ground, and it went a little bit upward, and he saw light at the end and could scramble his way up. Mind you, he has a broken leg. So he scrambled his way up. The rest of the documentary—this was a recreation about twenty years later, but it really happened—shows how he's scrambling over amazing terrain with that broken leg. It took a couple of days, over rocks and all, making his way back.

By the time he was almost there, without food, without water, in all that pain, his friend was just in the act of packing up camp, thinking he couldn't have survived this long. The guy crawling out was so out of it, totally delirious. And the only thing that brought him back to consciousness as he got close to camp was the smell of the acid from their latrine. That smell was so acrid to someone who hadn't eaten or drunk anything for days that it shot him back into awareness, and he made his way back.

It's intense, isn't it? But that moment of deepest fear—the way out, the only way out, was in. It won't always be that intense for us, but it feels like it sometimes, doesn't it?

It feels like it sometimes, though, doesn't it? It feels like it.

So, never abdicate. But it's just this moment of awareness. What's happening now?

The Buddha said, "Two things I never lost sight of: not to shrink from the struggle, and not to rest contented merely with wholesome states of mind."

The Dalai Lama said, "One day you will become bodhisattvas in reality. So whatever obstacles there are, however long it takes, do not be discouraged."

There's only this moment we can meet with mindfulness. Notice those moments of purity—when you're looking at the stars, or whatever it may be. Just this moment of awareness.

Thank you for your kind attention.

CHAPTER 170

Simple Awareness: Conditions For Wisdom

Carol Wilson · 49 min

In this opening evening talk from a retreat on natural awareness, Carol Wilson addresses a fundamental question: if we're practicing to free ourselves from suffering, isn't that just more aversion? She responds by exploring the Buddha's motivation for teaching—his recognition that beings sincerely wanting happiness continuously create more dukkha through misunderstanding themselves and reality.

Wilson introduces the Pāli phrase yathābhūta ñāṇadassana (knowledge and vision of things as they have come to be) as the essence of liberating wisdom. She explains that awakening isn't about rearranging circumstances but about seeing clearly without the overlay of views, particularly sakkāya-diṭṭhi (personality view or identity view). Using the simple metaphor of a child learning to match shapes to holes, she illustrates how confusion and its accompanying suffering naturally dissolve when reality is accurately recognized.

The talk emphasizes that awareness itself is pure and impartial—it "doesn't care" or "cares equally" about whatever arises. Wilson shares an inspiring story of a 90-year-old practitioner who finds walking across a room to be "the most interesting time of my life," demonstrating how complete presence transforms ordinary moments. She encourages practitioners to explore their experience with curiosity rather than judgment, watching how the mind privileges certain experiences as "me" or "mine," and trusting that wisdom arises naturally through persistent, accurate recognition of each moment.

So, end of the first day of a retreat—not quite the end. You've got to stay awake another couple of hours. First day of retreat, which can go all kinds of ways.

Tonight, I just want to talk a little bit about this practice we're sharing with you and why—just some simple ways of understanding why mindfulness, why simple awareness is so powerful in freeing our hearts and minds from confusion. Not all the reasons, but pointing to the background of this practice.

Someone asked today, "If we're practicing to free ourselves from suffering, isn't that just more aversion?" In a way, that question can take us into the heart of how the Buddha taught, why he taught, why he decided to teach—which I'm sure many of you know—but it speaks to the heart of our dilemma.

You probably know this story well. When the Buddha first awakened, he wasn't very inclined to share or to teach, because he said people wouldn't get it, and it would be burdensome to schlep around for the rest of his life trying to explain it to people who wouldn't understand. But he was moved, cutting the story short, he was really moved to compassion because he said that with his omniscient eye he could look through the world and read people's minds. And he could see that really each of us, each human being at least, just wants to be happy. We all want to be happy. And in our sincere trying to be happy, we basically keep doing the things that keep us spinning in suffering and confusion—because we just don't understand what suffering is and what can bring happiness. We don't understand ourselves and reality accurately. That's what motivated him to teach.

So it's true. He said, "I teach suffering, or dukkha." I don't like "suffering" as the translation because it's too limiting, too always unpleasant, and dukkha is not always unpleasant. But anyway—teaching dukkha and the end of dukkha, certainly leading to happiness. The highest happiness is peace. He's not saying we're doing this just for the heck of it and you're not going to feel any better.

But the heart of it is that we suffer, and the confusion that we wake up from—it's not that the world changes. It's that we misunderstand ourselves, the world, reality. And in misunderstanding, we do the things we think will make things better for us, but those very actions just keep us spinning in confusion. That's the loop that's called samsara: wanting and getting and wanting and getting, just spinning and spinning because we don't know how to step out of it.

When you look at the Buddha's life, when he woke up, he kept on living in a body, in the world, and the same stuff happened. The world didn't get better. People didn't all start acting filled with love. The same stuff was going on. So his freedom of heart and mind had to be something different from being able to organize things the way we want them to be.

But don't we keep trying to do that somehow? We can't even organize our own mind, right? That's what we see here. My God, that's the first insight. If you haven't done an insight retreat before, the first insight is: your mind is not yours. It's not in your control. Causes and conditions come together, a thought comes, and you are not in charge of it—though we keep thinking we are.

So at the heart of awakening, it's not about rearranging everything. It's about seeing, recognizing—using "seeing" for cognizing; I don't necessarily mean visually seeing, I'm using it as a shorthand for knowing—a moment of reality just as it is.

There's a phrase, one of the highest insights. It's called yathā bhūta ñāṇa dassana. I love this phrase. It translates as "knowledge and vision of seeing things as they have come to be in this moment." Recognizing things as they have come to be. That is liberating wisdom—not somehow achieving a certain state that gets us out of this hell of being in a human body and mind. No. It's seeing what's really so.

And that has an amazing power, because the Buddha is saying that when we misunderstand, when we misinterpret, when we misperceive, we put a whole story on top of what's happening, and then that's how we react. That's how we respond.

And it just takes us more and more into confusion.

So the miracle of mindfulness, to borrow a phrase from Thich Nhat Hanh, is that it gives us the way to begin to recognize, just to rest with full attention, full awareness, full presence in this one moment. And when it's mindfulness that's not clouded by confusion, then there's an accurate recognition. And moment after moment of that changes everything.

This is the definition of vipassana meditation that I like from Sayadaw U Tejaniya. He says, "Vipassana meditation is experiencing the mind and body directly from moment to moment with the right understanding." You can hear that's what we've been saying all day. Mindfulness is experiencing the mind and body directly—not through the veil of all our ideas about what it means. And that's what I'm going to talk about for the rest of this talk, because we don't even know that veil is there. We think we know what's going on.

Experiencing the mind and body directly from moment to moment—so that's the continuity through the day. Not just, "Oh, here's a moment of feeling tingling," and then we're off for three days. It's the steadiness, with the right understanding, which I think Alexis talked about: right view, wise view.

"Right" is a tricky word because we immediately go into right and wrong, good and bad. But take that away. Right view means seeing or being with experience fresh, just recognizing whatever is occurring in this moment, how it has come to be as a result of so many different conditions that we can't see. But it's just like this, free of any overlay of our idea about what it means.

And that's the tricky part—free of any overlay about what it means. This is what we're practicing.

I think it's really interesting, this definition, and this is the way we're trying to share this particular style of vipassana: the emphasis on right view. The Eightfold Path begins and ends with wise understanding, wise view. And you might think, "Well, I can't start the path by having the end of the path already—wise view." No. But we can start with some understanding, a little bit intellectual, a little bit practice, of right understanding of just this: that whatever's occurring is not me. It's arising due to conditions, many of which we don't control.

But when we don't see that, we take everything personally. If it's a pleasant experience, we congratulate ourselves—we did it right!—and the whole story gets going. Then it goes away, and we're having an unpleasant experience, and we blame ourselves, we blame that noisy person next to us, we blame somebody because something went wrong. And all the different moods and thoughts and stories and reactions follow on that. We're so far from just the actual moment of experience, so fast. This is how we don't even know that there's been this overlay put on experience.

This is why we're practicing the simplicity of mindful awareness. It's radical. Because in this wise view, right view in terms of mindfulness, we're not trying to make something happen. Even—I know, it doesn't really compute, right? You come here, you're sitting, you're walking, you're not talking, there's all these things you're doing differently, and we're saying every moment that you're awake, remember awareness. And then we say you're not trying to make something happen!

We're not. We are trying to keep recognizing awareness. We're trying to shift our refuge. But it's not our MO to do that without wanting some kind of better result. And that's such a habit. We talked about it already today—it just slips in. It's so hard. "Okay, I've remembered awareness a lot today. Where's the goodies? When's something going to happen?"

I said patience. It's only been one day. We're talking our whole life—I've got news—at least just this life. Just stay with this life. But we're like, "Okay, something should happen, and it should be better than it was when I came. It shouldn't be worse, right?" It just slips in there. And it seems so normal. We don't even recognize it.

So it's not our MO just to try to be with what is without any "so that," without any reference really to what's it going to do in the future and what did it do yesterday. It's just like this now.

In the moments of that kind of presence—which I'm sure many of you have experienced today—if you recognize that moment, it's really quite peaceful. Because the mind's not making a big hullabaloo about whatever's happening, good, bad, or indifferent. You're just hearing. Bird. Not "oh, the bird" and then all the commentary. Not "oh, the black flies" and everything that follows. Just hearing. Hearing. And nothing around it.

That's peace. That's not the idea we're thinking about when the Buddha looked around and said we want to be happy. We're not thinking, "I want to just hear, and nothing should be created around it. That's my idea of real happiness." Maybe. Maybe not. Probably not at the beginning of practice.

So it's radical, this learning how to just be with what's happening. And then we start to recognize the views that overlay, the ideas that we overlay—and this is where it gets really interesting. Because we're not here to say stop those views. We don't even know what they are. But as we start to recognize just moment-to-moment awareness, and as we've said, just one moment is simple, is not exhausting—that's all, just one moment, you don't have to project it into the future—the more steady it becomes, the more that awareness mind, which is not personal, allows us to recognize the views that are overlaying. Because ultimately they don't really match. And it's really interesting to see.

When I was on retreat this last month, one thing I started noticing—I like to do walking meditation a lot—I'd be walking and just watching what's going on in the mind, seeing, hearing, noticing the thoughts and the moods, and I would see how it would always keep slipping in some sense of "just get a little bit better" or "what does this mean?" And then I would start analyzing, you know, some Buddhist philosophy thing, looking at vedanā and looking at clinging and all of that, but forcing it out of some wanting to understand. And then this line kept coming to me: just let reality reveal itself. Quit looking so hard. Just moment to moment, let reality reveal itself and tell its own story. Quit making up a story and putting it on top of it.

So this is where we start to see how the belief we have, the view we're holding in the back of our mind about experience that we don't recognize—how that affects how we react, respond, and the moods and the beliefs. It can take us way down the road.

Here's an example I've been using the last couple of years, a very simple one. I have a young nephew, and I've been watching how kids learn things. When he was two or three—this is very simple—you know those games where you have a box and wooden blocks of different shapes: triangle, circle, square? Children learn how to put the right block in the right shape. Before he knows how it works, an adult will show him, and to him it looks like magic—you put it in and it just goes in. He tries it, and it doesn't work. Because he's putting the circle in the square and the square in the triangle, and it doesn't work.

And you can see, I could see, how he doesn't just go, "Oh, it doesn't work." It's like, "They could do it and I can't. What's the matter?" Frustration and anger arise. In the little mind, if it were an adult, there might be either self-blame or blaming the adults—they're keeping a secret and not telling you how to really do it—or deciding this is a broken game, or "this stinks anyway, throw the whole thing out the window, let's go outside." All of that gets going. And it can build up. Even with a little kid, it can build up into a whole tantrum.

They keep trying, and then suddenly, maybe by mistake, the right block goes into the right opening. And when he suddenly sees the shape, it's like the ignorance, the cloud of confusion in the mind, went away at that point. Then they see: oh, every time, that's just how it is. All that other stuff—the anger, the blame, the wanting—you don't have to talk yourself out of it.

It goes away because it doesn't make any sense. As soon as the realities recognize the way it is—oh, okay, you put the blocks in here. And if I want the square to go in the triangle, it's not going to work. That's just how it is. There's no blame. There's no suffering. That's just it.

That's the difference between yathābhūta and yathādasana—recognizing things as they have come to be in this moment, versus when we put the overlay: "If I could really do this right, I would get this block in here no matter what. There's something wrong." That's simple. But I like that example because it's really a metaphor for the whole thing. The overlays, the views that might be in the back of our mind, could be a lot more complicated. And so we can get caught in many aversive or wanting reactions and stories about ourselves and others and what this means—without actually, without mindfulness not being colored by the aversion, the clinging, we can't recognize accurately. We can't recognize accurately when that's going on in the mind.

There are many different ways, many different views, of course, that can be held in the back of the mind as we go through practice. But the most pervasive one—and Alexis touched on it, I'm just going to touch on it, but just play with noticing it, not try to think your way out of it—the most pervasive view, kind of at the heart of the Buddha's teaching, is this overlay, this interpretation on so much of our experience, of taking it personally. It's me, or it's mine. That just feels true, doesn't it? And that's the thing with a view. It's not like we're thinking, "Oh look, now I am putting on the overlay of self to this sitting that was so terrible, and I just couldn't even focus, and thoughts were coming all the time, and I remember my last retreat—it was better, and now it's not, and what am I doing wrong?" At times you can see, "Oh, that's an overlay of self, taking it personally." But more often we're really caught up in, "Well, what is wrong? If I could do it right, I wouldn't be thinking. If I could do it right, I wouldn't lose awareness."

As long as there's that taking it personally, that clinging to a particular idea or experience, the clinging and aversion distort the awareness, the mindfulness, the consciousness that's meeting the experience, and we can't recognize it accurately.

The Buddha even said, in one place, "This nibbāna, this freedom, is visible here and now." And someone asked, "To what extent is it visible here and now?" He said, "To the extent that greed, hatred or fear, negativity, and confusion are not present in the consciousness, in the mind." When they're not present, they're not distorting, they're not caught. And this is a moment-to-moment thing. So in a moment when you may feel quite aware, but it's filled with resistance to what's happening and not recognizing that resistance, there's not going to be accurate recognition of what's happening.

For example, it's like, "That noise is the source of my suffering." And that just seems clear. We're caught up in that. That unpleasant noise, and that person shouldn't be making it, or they shouldn't be running the lawnmower during a sitting, or whatever—clearly the source of my suffering. Or there's a really pleasant experience. You're feeling really light and happy and good, and you think, "That's clearly the source of my happiness." So this happy, pleasant experience should definitely be strung out, made to happen again, made to last long—and we get into a clinging, a wanting, a holding on to something that cannot last. Because we all know intellectually, but it doesn't really get down in the gut: nothing, nothing, nothing lasts. No state of mind, no thought, no mood, no sensation in the body, no experience in the world—nothing lasts. Some things seem to last longer than others. But the sense of thinking, "This unpleasant experience is my suffering, this pleasant one is my happiness"—that's where we get caught. That's where greed and resistance, confusion, are coming into the mind, into the awareness, and we're not recognizing accurately.

The sound, I find, is more easy to work with. When we really can just, in a moment, experience this awareness of hearing—and you can just notice, "Oh, no, no, no, that sound"—it's just feeling the hearing. And then notice the thoughts arising, the aversion with the thoughts, the sense of self-blame or other-blame, and the whole story that's going on. We see, "Oh, that's the suffering." The sound is just a sound. As Ajahn Chah, the great Thai forest monk and meditation teacher, said, "The sound isn't bothering you."

You're going out and bothering the sound.

It's kind of like that—just a little shorthand—but this is what we keep exploring. These are the qualities that block accurate recognition, that block right view in a particular moment.

For me, one of the most freeing realities about how our mind and body works, the one that truly supports me, inspires me, and gives me the trust and energy to keep looking at all this, is the fact that our mind is arising and changing moment to moment to moment. And by mind, I mean mind and heart. Chitta is the word in Pali, which means all our mental activity. I'm not trying to create the kind of split we can get into here between thinking mind and emotions. I mean all mental activity.

It arises. Conditions come together—physical, mental, inner, outer—and there may be sadness arising. Fine, that's what's happening. It's going to last a while, and it's going to change. So there'll be a moment when maybe there's resistance to the sadness, not recognizing it, and there's a real sense of struggle. But then there's a moment: "Oh, resistance is like this." The awareness is recognizing resistance. So it stops fighting resistance, and resistance is just the next arising experience. The whole sense of struggle and "me" drops away. There may even still be the sadness, but the shift is from owning it, believing it, holding on to it, resisting it—to something more like a qigong or tai chi shift. From "this is me, this is me, I like it, I don't like it" to "oh, it's like this now." A shift into the awareness. Taking refuge, just for a moment, resting in the awareness.

And that's the thing: everything's only a moment. So we're all caught up and not having awareness, really identified with greed, and then suddenly there's a seeing through it. There's a moment of purity of heart and mind where there is right view, wise view. It's not like it's all distorted, all greed, hatred, and delusion, and then finally one day—boom—it's all gone. Every moment is a new moment. Every moment, awareness can be accessible. And it doesn't matter what the awareness is noticing. I say a lot that awareness doesn't care what's arising. It's equal with anything. It's not like if what's arising is resistance, the awareness is thinking, "Oh, I don't want to be with that. It's going to get me all dirty. I only want to be aware of the nice things." Our identification says that. Awareness doesn't care.

Or as someone else said to me, "No, you should say it cares equally." So whichever fits your personality pattern—you can go with "it doesn't care" or "it cares equally." Either way, awareness is just pure. It's just clear. Whatever's arising is the perfect gateway to re-recognize awareness, because that's what's happening now. And there's always a new moment. It's not like we're stuck. We don't have to be afraid.

Sayadaw U Pandita, he was a very tough teacher, very demanding, but I found him incredibly compassionate actually. He said to me once—I don't remember what was happening in my practice—but he just said so kindly, "You know, you don't need to be afraid of anything that comes up." And when we start to, and begin to, and continue to trust the sense of awareness, even the most difficult stuff, when we can touch it with awareness rather than identification, it really, really shifts things. I'm speaking from personal experience here. It's completely different. From being all caught up to "Oh, look at that, the body's doing that, and these are the conditions of the body"—and then it moves from resistance to compassion automatically.

That's one of the beautiful things, actually, about moments when the awareness, when the mindfulness is not distorted by the habits of greed or aversion or just confusion. The wholesome, beautiful qualities of response arise naturally. So when there's not greed or aversion, if you just happen to notice the body's hurting and awareness simply sees it—instead of "Oh no, stupid body"—it becomes "Oh, poor body. What can I do to help it?"

So if you're sitting here, for example, and there starts to be some pain in the knee, and the first reaction involves that sense of taking it personally—back up a minute. The way that sense of taking it personally can work, it's really fun to explore as you go through the practice here. And please, don't take taking it personally personally. This is just what our minds do. If you're going to get disgusted or overwhelmed by it, that's not helpful. The whole attitude we're bringing in with this awareness practice is, "Wow, that's interesting. Look how the mind works."

So one way, I think Alexis mentioned, that the Buddha described our moment-to-moment experience—and which I also find very helpful in terms of exploring and running a retreat like this—is through the six sense experiences. He mentioned that.

If you go through the day, you're seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching—the whole mental world. And that one, yes, that seems to take an inordinate amount of space, but that's just arising too. Thoughts, moods, emotions—these things are just occurring over and over and over. Seeing, smelling, hearing. A lot of the time we don't quite notice what's happening, but there are many, many moments of sense contact all day. That's what's going on.

There are many short little ones that happen that maybe you don't notice at all. Or maybe we do notice, but they're no big deal. You're walking, maybe feeling the sensation of the foot on the floor, but not making anything of it. You hear a sound or whatever. But then there are other perceptions—a thought, a sound you like or don't like, a smell of the food at lunchtime and you're hungry, a memory that comes up and you're off into a whole world of your past life that goes along with that memory.

So certain of the six sense experiences come and the attention really gloms onto them. It's me, or it's mine. The mind, the consciousness, privileges certain sense experiences, certain perceptions as me and mine, and immediately goes into them and hangs on tight. Until awareness starts to get momentum, we don't quite notice that's what's happening. We're just walking along and suddenly we're like, "Oh no! I remember when I was doing that thing in third grade, and it just shows that horrible aspect of my personality, and it's coming up now in the way I'm looking at people when they walk by in the hall." And it all seems so real and so true and so unpleasant—although it could be completely different in five minutes. You have a whole different memory about how great you are and what you're going to do and how you're going to change and what wonderful things you're going to do when you leave here.

We don't notice that a thought came up that was pleasant—oh, that's me. Or a sound came up that was unpleasant, and there's immediate aversion—oh, that's me. And the sense that we can control, as I said, we take credit or we take blame. We congratulate ourselves or we react. Like my nephew—we react with "How can we fix it? How can we keep it? How can we hide this so people don't see how horrible we are?" Whatever it is, we get into a whole story, and the wanting and the resistance and the sense of me, me, me just keep growing and growing. And then it's gone. You're just walking. But we don't maybe notice that it's gone.

This is a really interesting practice, just to see that this is the habit of our mind. When we see it, great. We can see how it works. We can see how it puts on this overlay, how everything gets so much more complicated and full of suffering. We can see how when it goes away, there's just hearing, there's just seeing, and things are simply as they are. Exploring this is a huge part of our practice.

We start to see that what's occurring is arising due to all the conditions that came together in this moment—not because I decided, "Now I'm going to get really concentrated." Sayadaw U Tejaniya said once, and it's like, oh yeah, right, why didn't I think of that before? He said, you know, getting concentrated in meditation is a result of certain conditions. You can learn what the conditions are. Wanting to be concentrated is not one of them. And when we're wanting—I'm picking that because it's very present when people are on retreat—wanting to be concentrated completely blocks seeing what the conditions are. We can't just look and see.

A Tibetan lama friend of mine, Lama Drimed, said that when all these different experiences are coming or going, we're just part of nature. It's just nature. There are sounds and smells and tastes and physical sensations. We're here. We think of ourselves as this body in nature, but there's really no separation. We're all just part of nature. But when we solidify around a particular experience—and we do that all the time—when it feels like me, he says we're like locked into what he called the narrow bandwidth of being a separate human being, separate from all of nature. And that's what we do a lot.

We can't think our way out of this, which is our usual approach. Don't even try. But this is an invitation to trust present moment mindfulness.

That's what's so amazing about something that seems so simple. This is called sakāya-diṭṭhi, personality view, identity view. The Buddha talked about it a lot. It's really one of the core confusions that keeps us spinning, not recognizing accurately.

We used to think you don't talk about that at the beginning of a retreat because it's too subtle and people think about it too much and get confused. But it's at the core of our misperception and our suffering.

Ajahn Sumedho—you know who Ajahn Sumedho is? He's an American man who's been a monk in the Thai forest tradition for forty, fifty years. I've found him quite inspiring, the way he talks about practice. He said he used to think, and people would think, that you have to practice for a long time before you can even start to talk about or explore sakāya-diṭṭhi. But then he thought, why practice for twenty years with the wrong understanding? Why practice for twenty years out of the delusion that I'm practicing to achieve something, to get somewhere?

So start looking now. We're practicing to be fully present with things as they are in this moment. And that's what frees our heart and mind from greed, hatred, and confusion. It's amazing. All this practice we're doing isn't to get somewhere else. It's just to retrain the habits of our mind to land here. It's like this now. It's like this now. That tai chi move is so powerful. You can see how immediately the personality view springs up and we're the center of everything.

Just a funny story Joseph Goldstein tells on himself. He was on retreat, I guess here, and in the food line for lunch—long, long line, everyone's there. He was the second one in line. The first person took the lid off the big pot and dropped it, and it made a heck of a racket. You can imagine, everyone's there, it spills all over, huge racket, everyone's looking. And Joe said his first thought—and he had to restrain himself not to actually say it—was, "It wasn't me."

That's what we do, right? Immediately, whatever happens, it's all about me. Right there.

So with awareness we see that, we laugh at it. Wow, look what the mind's doing. Even that isn't personal when we can see it. There's nothing our mind can do that need be outside of awareness. We start to learn to trust it. Laughing helps. Wow, look at that. And in that minute, it wasn't me—it was awareness noticing. It really shifts.

In the moment of simple mindfulness, the whole concoction falls apart. For that moment. The Buddha talked about consciousness as a magic show. It puts everything together. It seems so real. But if you look behind the scenes of a magic show and see how the tricks are done, it loses its interest. This is like the concoction of self.

So don't even try to see through that. I'm saying all of this just to support our willingness, our interest, that whatever's happening, see if we can simply re-recognize awareness. It's like this now. I feel completely confused. It's like this now.

And the more we trust it, the awareness becomes more—it could be joyful, it could be peaceful, it's interesting. It becomes a refuge, more than needing to have every experience confirm us or tell a story about us or explain what it means about us. The awareness really becomes the refuge.

Recently, a few months ago, I was visiting a friend, a person who's in their early nineties now, a very inspiring person. This is someone who has lived a very rich, full, and varied life, and is a longtime, very deep practitioner of this practice—a very wise person. Being ninety, their body is frail, they're living in a retirement place, pleasant but a small apartment, can't get out much, can't do much.

And this person was saying—and this is a very sincere person—that this is the most interesting time of my life.

And I said, really? Why?

I said, well, if I'm just walking across the room here to the teapot, that's totally my life. That's everything. That's what I'm doing. I'm just walking across the room. It's everything in that moment. If I'm pouring the water for the tea, that's everything. That's my whole life.

This person wasn't referring to something in the past, wasn't looking to the future. Total presence. It's so alive, so present. Everything is so interesting. And it was so inspiring to me. This sense that this person is really living in the understanding that it's not about the object, it's not about the activity. It's really the living itself, the wakefulness, the purity of the heart and mind in that moment. Purity meaning just really being present with what is, without needing anything extra. That's the most interesting time of their life.

When our life is in that moment, it's complete. That's what we're practicing. From that, response is possible. It's not like we become some kind of zombie. From that moment of pure presence, if there's some action that needs to happen, wisdom sees. Wisdom knows what to do. It's obvious. One teacher called it "doing the obvious." It's just a knowing. It's not even me. It's wisdom that knows because there's clear seeing.

So that's really what we're doing here. And that's why we talk about the third aspect: the simplicity and honesty of mindfulness with right view. We notice when it's not right view because there's struggle, there's tension. Then we notice, what's going on? Wanting, aversion—oh, look at that.

And the continuity, the simple perseverance. Whenever we forget, the next moment we remember, here we are again. That's why every moment is Dhamma. Every moment is a moment when the truth of reality can reveal itself. Reality isn't more real when it's a pleasant moment. Reality isn't more real when what we want to happen happens. Or when what we don't want to happen happens. It doesn't matter what's happening now.

The willingness to meet any moment of the day, to treat all moments as equally valid—that doesn't mean you're not going to forget a million times. It's not a holding on. It's this perseverance, this willingness to wake up no matter what the activity, all day. This is what we're practicing here.

So these eight days, it really isn't about pushing in a short time to get to some particular state. I was thinking the same thing during this last month I was sitting. It's a time to have the conditions where we can really just practice recognizing awareness, whatever's happening. Whether we're in our daily activities, whether we're doing formal walking meditation, whether we're in the movement session, whether we're doing our work meditation, whether we're lying down, whether we're in the sitting—there's really not a hierarchy. It's not like sitting is better and you go to your room and check out. It's not like sitting is worse. It's whatever's going on.

That's one of the reasons, actually, that starting this afternoon and tomorrow, we don't have such a rigid timetable for the sitting and the walking. Because that means we're noticing what's going on in the mind. Instead of just sitting until the bell rings, which can be fine, maybe you're sitting and after thirty minutes, as I talked about today, you're just lost in aversion. You're just sitting thinking, oh my God, I have to sit till the bell rings, and you're just feeding aversion because you're not recognizing it. When, if you could recognize in your mind, let me stand up, refresh the awareness, go do some walking—then the awareness comes back in a more balanced way. You actually can find you're more continuous. I found this myself. When you're in your own rhythm, you're paying attention to what's going on in the mind.

You don't just walk because the bell rings. You don't just stop walking because the bell rings. You don't say, "Well, now there's no bell, so I'm going to my room to space out." Whatever's going on, you watch what you're doing and why you're doing it. And that's what's interesting.

It's not about setting up rigid rules—"I can never go to my room." You can. As Alexis was saying, if you're tired, rest. But watch why you're doing it. Don't set up some framework of "I should do this, I shouldn't do that"—within the bounds of the precepts and not harming ourselves or others, of course.

I'll use taking a nap as an example, because in some forms of practice you're really pushed not to take naps and not to sleep much. And I'm a person who has a lot of tiredness; I don't have huge energy. But you can watch.

Say you go to take a nap on a retreat. The first time, the mind is really dull and tired. The body is tired. You can see you're trying to sit and you're just falling asleep. And it's not aversion—you really need to sleep. This will help refresh. So you go and take a nap. You wake up, and you can see the energy is a bit refreshed. It was helpful. You start walking and think, "Oh, that was helpful."

The next day, it's a little unclear. You're not quite sure. "Maybe it'll be good, though. Let me try it." And you're watching the mind that's trying to repeat what happened the day before. You can't really tell—do I need the rest or not? So you just watch that. You rest or you don't rest, whichever you do, and you keep noticing. Say you rest. You wake up. It was okay. You feel all right.

The next day, you're not really tired—you're just sick of sitting and walking. So you think, "Maybe I'll go take a nap." But here, see, we're not trying to fool ourselves. You're not saying you can't take a nap, but you're watching what's going on in the mind. So you watch. You go take a nap, but you're really seeing: it's wanting, it's aversion to what's going on. It's just "I want to be unconscious for a while. I'm sick of being aware." And you take the nap, and you wake up, and you're more logy, more out of it, more dull. And you go, "Okay. That's an interesting piece of information."

That's what we're doing—exploring it all. As soon as you set up "I can't do this" and we don't look anymore, we don't learn.

Or we do the thing we think we shouldn't do. "I'm not having seconds. I've had enough to eat. I'm not going back for seconds." And the next thing you know, you're going back for seconds.

So don't turn off the awareness. We do that a lot. "I'm doing the bad thing, so I'm not going to be aware of it because that makes me feel worse." No. Bring your awareness along with you. Pile that plate with food and notice the greed. Shovel that food down and notice how it feels. Notice the self-disgust. Notice the whole thing. Because none of it's personal.

This is really where we're learning, and it gets interesting. That shoveling the food down was as valid a moment as a moment in sitting where the breath is really refined and subtle and there's light and bliss. It's the awareness—that's what we're cultivating.

To end with two quotations, one from Sayadaw U Tejaniya: "As mindfulness is remembered more and more frequently, it gradually develops its own momentum. We come to appreciate moments of awareness more than we get lost in our entrancements with the reactions of mind to whatever's arising."

That's really it. We appreciate awareness more than we're entranced with our reactions. But this is a natural occurrence.

And Sayadaw U Pandita: "When mindfulness is persistently and repeatedly activated, wisdom arises. This is the natural effect of the momentum of mindfulness."

We don't create wisdom. It naturally arises through steady, accurate recognition. It's amazing. It's not an act of will. It happens naturally.

This is back to Sayadaw U Pandita: "There will be insight into the true nature of body and mind." This is really the natural law. This is the Dharma.

So just this moment, remember awareness. That's our practice.

Thank you for your kind attention.

CHAPTER 171

Investigating How The Deluded Mind Works

Carol Wilson · 58 min

In this mid-retreat talk, Carol Wilson draws on teachings from Ajahn Chah, Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche, and the Buddha to illuminate how the deluded mind operates. She explains that understanding delusion is essential for recognizing the non-deluded mind—our intrinsic awareness that remains peaceful regardless of circumstances.

Wilson examines two of the five aggregates (khandhas) that arise in every moment of sense contact: saññā (perception) and vedanā (feeling tone). She shows how perception is conditioned by our experiences and can be distorted by the kilesas (greed, aversion, and delusion) when we're unaware of their presence. Drawing from a sutta where the Buddha distinguishes awakened from unawakened beings, she explains how the untaught person, struck by unpleasant feeling, shoots themselves with a second arrow through resistance—and then seeks escape only through sensual pleasure, reinforcing habits of craving and aversion.

Through vivid examples—from mistaking a texting nun for a devotee circumambulating a Bodhi tree, to a meditator blaming others for creaking sounds caused by her own breathing—Wilson demonstrates how unexamined perception combined with vedanā generates papañca (mental proliferation) and unnecessary suffering. The teaching points toward recognizing that awareness itself is inherently calm, offering peace and stability independent of pleasant or unpleasant conditions. She concludes with the Buddha's reflection: 'This is peaceful, this is sublime—the stilling of all mental activities, the ending of craving, release.'

At this point in a retreat—in the middle of a retreat—I'd say almost every retreat, and it's true for this one, I start to feel, after talking with people, really touched by how much everybody's going through. It's just life. It's just a microcosm of life. All the moods and emotions and fears and beautiful stuff. A lot of it is just coming and going with awareness, and that's fine.

But how often do we get, as Mark was talking about last night, to that tipping point where we get really caught up in the struggle? It becomes a huge thing, and then it calms down so much. We sit here and tell you: just be aware of it all. Just be with it. Everything that's coming—you're caught up, it's like this. You're not caught up, great, just be with it all. That's the whole point of mindfulness.

There are times when that seems so real and true and there's no question. And there are other times when you're thinking, what the heck are they talking about? What good is any of this doing? Am I the only one? So what's the point?

I want to talk a little bit about some aspects of this. Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche, who was a wonderful Dzogchen master and died some years ago, said the main purpose of these dharma teachings, of dharma practice, is to find out what is the nature of the non-deluded mind, the non-deluded heart, as well as how the deluded mind works.

We're spending a lot of time on both. But how the deluded mind works is an essential aspect. Learning about that is really one of the main things that frees us to recognize the non-deluded mind.

Nyoshul Khen goes on: meditation practices work to uncover our innate wisdom and purity by recognizing the obscurations for the changing, insubstantial appearances that they are, thus revealing what has always been available.

Now, no one said that the time spent on each of those is equal. There's probably a lot more time spent exploring and coming to recognize the way the deluded mind works. But that's okay. It doesn't take as many equal moments of recognizing natural awareness and purity.

Did you notice that? You're all caught up for however long—it feels like forever, maybe it was five minutes—but suddenly awareness comes in. You go, "Oh, it's like that." And the whole thing passes. You don't have to have that fantastic feeling for the equal five minutes. That one second just clears it all, because awareness is pure no matter what was going on.

You're saying, "Yeah, right, that's not my experience." Look for it. You'll see.

I want to talk about one way the confused mind works that is really interesting, that the Buddha spoke about, just to help us see: when we get all caught up, it's not random. You feel like you're minding your own business, being mindful, and suddenly—whomp—out of nowhere. Not just that a mood comes, that's fine, but we're really caught in it. Yesterday the same mood came and you weren't caught. We can feel like a victim, but it's not just happening randomly.

Once we get more interested in watching the process with awareness, it really gets interesting. We can see the lawful nature of how these things work. That's where the wisdom comes in, and we don't always go down the same path.

I noticed—I wrote this the last time I gave this talk—I had just had this recognition in my own practice, noticing how when I first started practice, very reasonably, I think quite many people would, what I really wanted was to get away from the confused and unpleasant and difficult aspects of my personality. We've been waiting for those to change into the bodhisattva of the ages. Really thinking that would all change. You'll become the most loving, compassionate person on the planet—waiting for that. And all the difficult stuff of my life would disappear. That's why I started practicing, probably. Not quite saying it that bluntly.

But I couldn't have imagined from that place—most people couldn't—that the peace, the freedom, the moments (not all the time, okay), that the peace and freedom that's available, that arises, comes in a totally different way. It's not from getting rid of all that stuff.

But it's actually from this purity of awareness—of being with what's arising totally, without being lost in resistance and wanting. Being with what's happening, surrendering into it. The wisdom comes from the total presence, not from getting rid of the stuff we don't like.

You can't imagine that. You can't imagine that. That's why we keep saying, "Oh great, you're feeling sadness? Feel it with awareness." We kind of just push you into it because the Dharma reveals itself. You don't have to figure it out ahead of time. It will show you.

If we just keep learning how to bring full awareness, full tenderness, full presence to whatever it is that's arising, we start to see it clearly. We can't not. Ajahn Sumedho often says the practice of freedom is awareness. Or I put it differently: awareness is the practice of freedom. We don't always notice it because it's just little easeful moments, not a big thing.

One of the wonderful aspects of steady sati, steady mindfulness, steady awareness, is that we do begin to see, to recognize some of how this process of getting all caught up and identified occurs in a moment. What Mark was mentioning last night about a tipping point—where maybe some difficult memory or mood or experience comes up, and there's awareness, so you see it's difficult, that's okay, difficult's like this. There's some thoughts, awareness is noticing the thoughts, it's a little uncomfortable, but it's awareness, it's not really suffering. But at some point there's that tipping point where suddenly it's like, wow, now we're really in it and this is really not okay. What can I do to get out of it? And we're back into all the old patterns.

What we forget is the intrinsic purity of awareness.

Ajahn Chah—you've probably heard this, it's very well known—about this mind: "Within itself, it's already peaceful. The mind, the heart—remember it's the same word—the mind-heart is not peaceful these days because it follows moods. The real mind is simply an aspect of nature. It becomes happy or agitated because moods deceive it. Sense impressions come and trick it into happiness, suffering, gladness and sorrow, but the mind's true nature is none of those things. That gladness or sadness is not the mind but only a mood coming to deceive us. The untrained mind gets lost and follows these things. It forgets itself. And then we think it is we who are upset or at ease or whatever. But really this mind of ours is already unmoving and peaceful, really peaceful. Like a leaf which is still as long as no wind blows. If a wind comes up, the leaf flutters. The fluttering is due to the wind." The fluttering is due to those sense impressions. The mind follows them. If it doesn't follow them, it doesn't flutter. "If we know fully the true nature of sense impressions, we will be unmoved."

That's really what I want to talk about tonight. "Our practice is simply to see the original mind. So we train the mind to know those sense impressions and not get lost in them. Just this is the aim of all this difficult practice we put ourselves through." From Ajahn Chah.

So one way of describing our moment-to-moment experience, or what can happen, how we get lost in sense impressions—to use Ajahn Chah's language—I want to talk about two aspects of experience in the mind that the Buddha spoke of, that are arising in every moment of sense contact. They're subtle. They're rising every moment. So sometimes we see them, sometimes we don't. But really seeing how they can, unrecognized, lead us into all this morass of whatever's going on—just by not recognizing what's happening.

These two aspects are two of the five aggregates, things that are rising according to the Buddha's way of looking at our experience in every moment. One of them is perception in English, saññā in Pali. The other is vedanā in Pali, which is feeling tone.

So I'll just describe them and then talk a bit—more than a bit, probably—about each of them.

Saññā, perception, is that simple quality of recognition. This just happens naturally. You hear a sound and immediately the mind, first it knows it's a sound. And then if it knows what it is—oh, bird call. Or if it doesn't know what it is, it makes something up. That's what I'll get into in a minute. But perception, this recognition, is just natural. It's happening all the time. We're not trying to stop that. It's not thinking about it. It's just "oh, that's a robin" or "this is a chair."

And then vedana, this feeling tone, which we've mentioned, is also arising in every moment of sense contact. It's this subtle feeling in the mind of experiencing each sense contact as having a pleasant or an unpleasant or a neither pleasant nor unpleasant neutral flavor. This is a subtle thing. I've always been really amazed that the Buddha could pick this out, because as you see when I talk about it, it goes so quickly into wanting and aversion that we don't even notice this subtle, quick vedana. But it's arising with every sense contact.

Now, they're both coming together. Sometimes you'll notice one more than the other. You can't necessarily tease them apart. But when we're not aware, the habits of mind with these two things can get us into big trouble—when we're not watching. When we watch, we can just see the lawfulness of how it works.

This is one way it's described by the Buddha: What one feels, one perceives. What one perceives, one thinks about. This is assuming deluded mind. What one thinks about, one complicates with associations, with memories, with ideas, with comparisons, and these notions then assail and overwhelm a person. Like the monk who painted a tiger on the wall of the cave and then turned around and it scared him. This is concocting—the concoction of sense of self, of everything that gets us confused.

I'm going to describe a lot more about that. But to start by just talking about perception: it's happening in every moment, and a lot of the time we don't necessarily notice it. It's a useful thing because one perception can kind of describe—in a way, it puts us in place of the whole world of what we're doing. You hear the bell a little while ago and you know it's the bell, you know what it means for the time of day and the time for the talk, and you know to come in here. And when you come in here there's the perception of zabuton, and which one is yours and which are others', and it's all very helpful because we're having more or less joint perceptions—which is not always the case in this world.

Because perception, as the Buddha talked about, is informed by our life experience. It's really based on our experience and our memory. If I know it's a bird call, it's because I've heard birds before, or someone's told me it's a bird, and I know it.

This is why, depending on how we've grown up in different cultures, in different families, in different ways of looking at the world, the same experience can be perceived very differently by different people. And perception is something that seems so—I mean, it's easy to just take it for granted that my perception is accurate, don't we? We do. Even very simple things.

An interesting little example: I was at a friend's house, and I said something about the blue shawl that was over the sofa. She said, "What blue shawl?" I said, "That blue shawl." She said, "That's not blue, that's green." And then we got into discussion. I really tried—I could not see green. And she could not see blue. And you wonder, is there some objective reality out there? Is it azure? And there's not.

It's all perception. And that's something simple—we weren't going to come to blows about whether it's blue or green. But take that to any other level. Look at different cultural experiences. What's the whole thing with culture shock?

Whenever I've practiced in Asia, the relationship to personal space is very different from the relationship to personal space I grew up with. I want space. I want my room alone. But my Burmese friends—they don't want to sleep in a room alone. The more people, the better. It's scary to be in a room alone. And then they have to have the light on at night. We Westerners are going, "Turn off the light! We can't sleep with the light on." And they're saying, "No, we can't sleep with the light off." Little things like that, but the perception is just "this is how it is." It's safe with the light on. No, can't sleep with the light on.

Once when I was a nun, I was staying at a monastery, and they were very kind to me. They kept moving me around, but at one point they put me in this huge second-story room—it was like a barn or something. I just had my little mosquito net in the corner. I was the only one in it. Then one day they came and told me I had to leave because some people were coming. Some people. A whole busload of women moved into this room—fifty women moved into this room that I'd had all to myself. They were perfectly happy to be all together.

So perceptions are very different. You see how we can really not recognize that our perception is conditioned—and come to blows about it. That's just one thing. But beyond that, our perceptions, as different as they all are, often aren't really accurate. And this is where we start to get into even more trouble. This is where we're moving into the area of insight.

When I was talking about the experience with my nephew, suddenly the perception got accurate, and then my experience matched his reality and there was no more dissonance. There are a million examples, but here's another simple one.

I was in Burma at a meditation center, walking up this little pathway. At the end of it is a Bodhi tree planted with a round concrete form around it, creating a circular little path. I was walking up, and I saw up by the tree—not that far, maybe halfway to the hall—a nun walking around it with her hands in añjali like this, circumambulating the Bodhi tree. And I thought, "Oh, isn't that sweet? There's so much faith here. It's really inspiring." I was having all these pleasant feelings and thoughts and the perception of faith.

Then I got closer, and she was texting on her cell phone. That burst my bubble. That first perception was delusion, moha. I didn't have all the information. And a lot of the time we don't have all the information. Someone has asked, "How do we know when we have all the information?" And a lot of times we don't. So let's always take things with the grain of salt.

I got closer and then realized, oh, she's texting on her cell phone. It didn't have to be a problem, but you just see the delusion and how with perception, the mind—I've noticed this many times—when it doesn't have all the data, it fills in something that's close. It uses some memory: "Oh, that's what it is."

Once I was walking in the woods in Switzerland and I said, "Oh, what's that yellow and white striped circus tent doing here?" I was walking with a friend, and he said, "What, are you out of your mind? Circus tent?" It was just a big rock with yellow lichen on it, with kind of stripes. I want to say I didn't have my glasses on. Let's hope so, but you never know. The mind will just make stuff up.

So just be willing to see that we may not have all the information. That's not really suffering—that's just seeing how perception works. With steady awareness, we start to see clearly instead of just saying, "Okay, that's what it is. She's doing that." You keep on going. You keep on looking. And oh yeah, there's more information. It's different. Steady awareness reveals more accurately. That's what we can trust.

Now, other ways that perception is distorted is when there's kilesa in the consciousness and we're not aware of it. Kilesa is the Pali word that Sayadaw U Tejaniya translates as "defilements" in his book. I prefer kilesa or "torments," which refers to the qualities of greed, of taṇhā, of grasping, aversion, rejection, fear, and moha, delusion.

When greed or wanting, desiring, or aversion, rejecting, resisting is affecting the perception—when it's in the mind, in the consciousness, at the same moment as that perception, and not recognized—then it really can distort the perception. And we don't know. Like, if you're really hungry, what happens if you go to the supermarket when you're really hungry? Have you ever noticed? Not the time to do it. I get home with all this stuff that I'm never going to eat, that I don't even like. "Wow, that looks good," and you just buy it. When the craving's gone, from the perception you look at the thing and go, "What?"

Or when you have a crush on somebody. You look at them, you think about everything about them. It's so wonderful. It's so lovely. You love all their little peccadilloes. And then when the—as one of my friends says—when the desire eyes have fallen off, you go, "I loved that little peccadillo? That's driving me crazy now."

Or later when you're angry at somebody, they look ugly when you look at them. They're not more ugly than they were the day before. It's the distortion of our perception through the anger mind or the desire mind.

Now, that's just, as Sayadaw U Tejaniya has said, desire and aversion doing their job. That's how they act. When they're present in the mind, that's what they do. Steady awareness helps us start to recognize that's what's happening. That's why we're always on about this: Notice when there's a sense of dissonance, a sense of dis-ease in your awareness. You know you're aware, but there's a sense of dis-ease in relationship to what's happening. Check it out. Just check out and see. What's the tone? What's the attitude? What's the flavor in the mind that's aware?

For me, often I'll look and I'll be looking—I know something's there, so there must be craving—and no, there's no craving. It's just open and natural. And I just hang there for a minute, and suddenly it's like, "Oh my God, it's filled with craving. It's so filled with craving I didn't even notice it."

It was just comfortable and easy.

So this is just a short introduction, but I want to emphasize how perception is completely subjective, completely conditional, and how easy it is for us to not even notice this and to absolutely think "this is the truth"—and how perception gets distorted when we're not recognizing the presence of suffering mental states in our mind.

When we do recognize them, as I described with my nephew, when there are difficult mental states and we suddenly recognize accurately, all that extra stuff drops away because it doesn't make any sense anymore. We simply say, "It's like this now." The actuality doesn't change—that's the power of correct perception. The actuality doesn't change, but our understanding of what's happening comes into alignment. And then there's not the dissonance, there's not the struggle, there's not the trying to change it. We're not relating to something that isn't happening, which is what we're doing much of the time.

This is a whole other talk and I don't have time to go into it fully, but the Buddha speaks extensively about inversions of perception, or what might be called hallucinations of perception. In the really deep Dhamma understanding, the perceptions that are inaccurate—that are continually reinforced by the habits of our mind—include seeing permanence where nothing is permanent. We simply don't recognize the changing nature of things, so often. Intellectually we know it, but the perception is "no, it's steady." And when it goes, we think, "Where did that go?"

In terms of dukkha, we don't recognize the unsatisfactory nature of experience. Something can even be pleasant, but we think it's going to hang around—not seeing the impermanence—and really make us happy, not recognizing that nothing can truly do that.

And the third, of course, is the frequent perception of a self, a solid self, where there isn't one. Because perception arises in every moment of experience, and we're not recognizing this, the sense of self feels like, "Yes, sure, that's just how it is." So there are countless moments of that reinforcement. When we're not exploring, when we're not bringing in steady awareness, that pattern just keeps getting strengthened. It feels—I was going to say comfortable. It may not feel pleasant. The sense of self is often the biggest pain in the neck there is. But it's like an old comfortable bathrobe. You just want to cuddle up in it, even though it's disgusting. I don't know where that image came from.

Anyway, my point is that inaccurate perception isn't just a superficial thing. It's happening every moment.

Now I want to move into vedana—feeling tone. Putting perception and vedana together is how things really get rolling.

I'm sure most of you, though perhaps not all, are familiar with the way the Buddha described vedana: that sense of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral that arises in every moment of sense experience, often without our really noticing.

So we're going through our day, and every sight, sound, thought, mood, taste, smell, sensation in the body—how many sense experiences happen through the day, if you count every thought as one? I don't know, millions perhaps. You know how many, because it's every waking moment, very quickly. Each one of those moments involves a perception, and there's the vedana, quick as lightning: pleasant, unpleasant, or neither one.

And here's what the Buddha saw with real genius: when this goes unnoticed, the tendency of mind is that of course we like pleasant, we don't like unpleasant, basically. Neutral—maybe we notice it, maybe we don't. In our kind of hopped-up culture with so much information coming in, neutral almost veers into unpleasant for some people. We don't know what to do with it. We've got to fix it.

Going through our day, going through our life, our mind is practicing the habit of liking whenever it's pleasant, not liking whenever it's unpleasant. You're probably sitting there thinking, "Well, of course. Who likes unpleasant?" And so that just seems normal and natural. It is—it's nature. But because this seems to be just how it is, the sense of pleasantness and unpleasantness comes to be the way we really describe and define ourselves and the world—what we do and what we don't do, what we want, what's beneficial and what's not. At times this is really gross and obvious, but at other times it's extremely subtle.

The habit—and I'm putting out information here, so don't believe me, just keep looking and see for yourself because it gets fascinating—see if this is true for you. We've really cultivated this habit. So the sense of unpleasant experience that happens, often an unpleasant mood arises, and we turn it against ourselves: "There's something wrong with me."

An unpleasant mood came up. The sense that pleasant is better and that—let's come back to practice, really at the bottom line—look in the back of your mind. I keep finding this; it keeps slipping in there. I think I'm practicing to see the truth, but it veers into what's more pleasant. If it's going right, shouldn't it be more pleasant? Isn't that a sign that things are going the way they're supposed to? And when a sudden unpleasant thing comes up, it's a problem.

And this again is because of the moving into the pleasant. Then we end up just with the habit of desire—getting more pleasant, getting more pleasant, getting more pleasant. And with unpleasant, it's like push it away. Don't be with it. I don't want to be with it. I don't know how to be with it. And I shouldn't have to be with it because it should not be happening. It should only be pleasant.

Ajahn Buddhadasa, who was quite a great Thai forest meditation master and also a scholar—and a character; I spent some time there, and he was a character—he said once that ninety-five percent of everything we do is for pleasant feeling. So that's where we get even more to it: we think we're wanting the thing, but really what we want is this pleasant feeling. And it's so ephemeral. It's like this. Same with unpleasant feeling—it's so ephemeral. And we're not used to noticing it, and we get lost into the greed, into the aversion, and that just feels like, of course, the normal response.

This is what the Buddha was talking about when he saw that we really want to be happy, and we keep doing the thing that keeps us suffering. Because in following this—going for the pleasant, going for the pleasant, feeding the craving, feeding the habit of craving, feeding the habit of aversion—that's never going to work. But we don't see it because it didn't work this time, or this one went away, so then there's the next one, then there's the next one, then there's the next one. Endless, right? That's samsara. Just the leaning into the next thing, the leaning out of this thing. This one doesn't work, go for the next one. "Ah, I finally was with this unpleasant—ah, thank God it went away, I finally learned how to do mindfulness right"—and then there's the next, and then there's the next, when we're really in it.

The Buddha has one sutta where he talks about this that I love, because he's just really describing how these habits get inculcated in our heart and mind. And I find it poignant—that's the word I use—because it really touches me about our human condition. He's saying, what's the difference between an awakened person and an unawakened person? So that gets our attention. What's the difference?

And he says both—awakened and unawakened people—both experience pleasant vedana, unpleasant vedana, and neither. Both. He's not saying that if you get enlightened, unpleasant vedana stops. Both experience all three. So what's the difference?

And he says when a regular person is touched by a painful, by an unpleasant—and he uses bodily sensation to start with—he worries, he grieves, he laments, he beats his breast, he weeps and is distraught. Can you relate to that? When your knee starts hurting? It's as if you were shot with an arrow and you shoot yourself with another arrow. So we can notice how we do that. Something unpleasant happens, and immediately we go to aversion and we start railing about it. We've ramped it up.

But this is what really touches me. Having been touched by the unpleasant feeling, she resists it and resents it. And so then in one who resists unpleasant feeling, the underlying tendency of resistance, of aversion, of negativity, comes to underlie the mind. It just becomes a habit to resist the unpleasant.

And this is the pain. Under the impact of that painful, unpleasant feeling, one then proceeds to enjoy sensual happiness. Why? Because an untaught worldling does not know of any other escape from painful, unpleasant feeling except the enjoyment of sensual happiness. And so then that becomes the tendency to crave, to lust for sense pleasure, just for pleasant feeling. And that craving comes to underlie the mind, becomes a habit.

I just find that so, so sad really. That in the normal world, and certainly how I grew up, the only way—even if it's unconscious—the only way when something painful or unpleasant is happening, the only way out, he's saying, that ordinary people know, is to go do something pleasant. You know, open the fridge and eat some ice cream when you're feeling bad. It's not like it's a bad thing. It's not like it's wrong to go enjoy something pleasant. Sometimes it can be helpful when we're all lost. But when that's the only out we know, then the habit of aversion and resistance to the unpleasant, the habit of lusting and going toward the pleasant—that becomes the habit that underlies the mind.

And then he goes into neutral feeling, and he says there's a tendency to ignorance as to neutral feelings. You don't even know them. This becomes the habit of mind.

And then he says you experience these vedanas, these feeling tones—I say feeling tones because we use "feelings" to mean moods and more complex mental experience—one experiences these feeling tones as if fettered by them, as if chained by them. Like, oh, this is unpleasant. We don't even notice the unpleasant itself; we're lost in all this world of suffering around it.

And the difference in the case of an awakened person? When they're touched by the painful feeling, they don't worry or grieve or lament or beat their breast or tear their hair. So they experience one kind of unpleasant feeling, not two kinds of unpleasant feeling. And because they understand, they understand according to facts how these feeling tones work—the arising and the ending of these feelings—they don't need to run away from it.

So they understand. Touched by the painful feeling, they do not resist it. So there's no underlying tendency of resistance. They don't need to go searching for sensual pleasure, so there's no underlying tendency or habit of greed. Just able to be fully present with whatever feeling comes, experiencing the feeling tone as one who is not fettered by it. It's just what it is. There's no need to run away, there's no need to do anything. It comes, it goes.

Really, it's the knowing of impermanence, but also of the fact that pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—is rotating through life. And that's not the way to happiness, to get rid of one. It's not the only way to evaluate what's useful.

So you put these two together: inaccurate perception and the tendency to get lost in wanting or aversion. And it really can take us very far, very quickly. To start to watch it is really quite interesting.

I just want to say something about the escape, because this is part of why practice is so hard. Even if you haven't recognized how the concoction came to be, you know you're in, say, an unpleasant experience. And there's aversion there. And you can see that—there's enough awareness, you know the aversion. But we can see aversion, and it's really hard to be with, isn't it? It's like all our training says: get the heck out of here. And so it just feels so wrong to hang out with aversion. Aversion has really been driving us.

Or the reverse: when there's strong desire in the mind and the heart, we really focus on the thing desired. But one interesting thing about retreat is that the same strength of desire and aversion can come up about little things. Have you noticed that? And it can make it easier to be willing to hang out, just hang out with a desire without acting on it.

Because sometimes it's harder to convince yourself absolutely that that thing is the most important thing in your life. You can see that whether you get a banana at breakfast or not—you can't really totally convince yourself that it's absolutely essential.

So going against our habits, sometimes when the desire isn't so strong, this is where we let the awareness stay steady. We take our refuge in awareness and hang out with the wanting. If you're walking and wanting comes, keep on walking and just let the awareness be with the wanting. See what it does, see how it feels. It's unpleasant. We're trained to do anything not to feel it. But it'll go away. And then there's the peace that was there before the wanting. You didn't have to get the banana for peace. Peace is available. We can move into the awareness. Learning that.

Same with aversion. Something Tejaniya says, in terms of really bringing awareness when there's kilesa in the heart, in the mind, distorting perception—he talks about how the degree to which the suffering mental state comes into the mind could be like from one to ten, how strong it is. And we tend, like say with aversion or fear or even grief, when it's little we think, "I don't have to pay attention to it yet. I'm just being mindful. There's a little aversion, it's okay." We don't want to pay attention. We wait till it gets really up to number eight or number nine, and then it's—forget it. It's stronger than the awareness. We're lost.

So he always says, take care of your awareness. Notice it as soon as it's there, when it's little, when it's like a one or a two—notice it then. And it's really true. I find now in my life, I'm often, not always, but kind of happy when I see a little aversion come up. Not a big one, but just some little thing. I'm driving, someone cuts me off, a little aversion. Wow, great to see. Great to see. Because in the seeing, then the awareness is really where the trust is. "Oh yeah, that's aversion. See it come, see it go." I'm not landing in it. It's not making the decisions. But when we're not really recognizing it, it's making the decisions a lot of the time.

So when we decide to do something, that intention—that's a mental movement that is informed by whatever particular mood or mental state is in the mind. And it's conditioned like everything else. If you make a decision, it seems like you're making it, but you walk into the dining room and you're deciding where to sit at lunch. Just a little thing. Just be aware of what's going on in the mind. Notice the perceptions. You walk in and people are there already. "Ah, I don't want to sit next to that person." Unpleasant.

These are little. You maybe don't even say it, you don't even feel that unpleasant. "Oh, I'm going over there. Oh, that's in the sun. I'm going over there. That'll be nice." First bummer, negativity. "Where else can I go?"

Just watch how much subtle aversion to unpleasant, how much subtle going towards something we envision is going to be pleasant, is driving the bus. It's really fun to watch because we want to know these things.

We don't want our only escape from unpleasant feeling to be getting something pleasant, because then when the pleasant doesn't come, we're lost. We don't know what to do. We think peace isn't available until we get the pleasant again, and that's way too conditioned.

So how can these two come together to create a big story? I use this example often, but just to see how perception and vedana—pleasant, unpleasant, aversion, and greed—can create a whole storm. This is papañca. We think about it, we complicate it, it creates all kinds of moods and responses that assail us and torment us.

A friend of mine was doing a retreat many years ago in a rented facility in Switzerland. They have these old camp houses, like two or three-story wooden houses that they use for children's camps in the summer. But they're not winterized, not insulated, so they can't use them in the winter. Just at the end of summer, they would rent them for retreats. This was her first retreat, so she didn't have a lot of experience, no experience, no dalai lama wisdom.

In this house, on what we would call the second floor, was the big room that was the meditation hall, and then an equal room below it was the walking room—sort of like here, but no insulation at all, just thin wooden floors. So anywhere you moved in that house, she said, creak, creak, creak. You could hear it everywhere.

They were in a scheduled sitting. This was scheduled sitting and walking all day. And this was Switzerland—you follow schedules in Switzerland. That's part of the cultural conditioning. You follow the schedules.

So they were in the sitting, and she was doing ānāpānasati, following her breath. Remember, she's new to this, so she's just trying to get really present with the breath. And then she heard creaking—somebody walking downstairs, back and forth. Creaking, creaking, creaking. It was completely distracting her from the breath. You can probably relate.

The immediate aversion arose: "This is ruining my meditation! I was finally getting to feel the breath and this person starts walking." So there's the perception of the person walking, the unpleasant feeling of that, and then the thought, "They're disturbing my meditation." There's a perception, a view of how the meditation was and how it should be, leading into more views. And every time a creak came, the attention just got glommed into the unpleasant.

Have you ever noticed that? There's something unpleasant and your attention just gets glommed into it. So every creak, she glommed in. "It's ruining my meditation, I can't feel my breath, and you shouldn't be doing it, and it's the schedule..." She got all worked up. And there was nothing to do, because she would never get up and go downstairs in the middle of the sitting and yell at the person.

So finally—whether it was out of wisdom or just out of dumb luck—she just dropped back into the present moment experience and started feeling the breath again, just however it was. It's sort of like we tell you: when the mind's all caught up in something, just shift the attention to something more neutral. So she did that. She went back to the breath and started feeling the physical experience.

And then she noticed she was leaning against the wall. Whenever she breathed in, her back went into the wall, and that's what was making the noise. It wasn't somebody walking downstairs.

Well, you can imagine all that anger about that person. The perception was wrong—delusion, fed by aversion, the whole story fed by aversion. She was really suffering a lot. Seeing that, that whole mass of suffering went away. Now, she probably—knowing her, and it being her first retreat—replaced it with self-blame and aversion, because she didn't really see the whole process. But I love that example because we can see in it exactly how perception and vedana, unaware, when we're not aware of the process, can take us anywhere. And we really can suffer.

So you get a sense. We can play with this here on retreat. That's a simple one I told, but this is where we go all the time anyway. There might be a difficult mood coming up. That's okay. There's going to be sadness. There's going to be grief. It's not that the stuff shouldn't come up. It's the difference between meeting what's happening—"It's like this now"—with awareness.

"Oh, I'm angry because of it. I don't know why I'm angry." But anger's arising. And sometimes it will come and you don't know the reason. You can just be with it, with a kind of purity. Feel how it feels in the body. Notice the thoughts coming and going, but not going into story, not going into changing it, not going into aversion. Just perceiving it as it is without needing to have all the information. And it goes—it really goes—in the light of awareness.

These are subtle things. You're not always going to see this process clearly. But what happens as we take more and more refuge in awareness is that we start to get more and more interested in the process itself, rather than jumping into each particular experience—"this is good because it's pleasant, this is bad because it's unpleasant"—and getting entranced by our reactions and all the perceptions. As we get more and more interested in the process, awareness gets stronger. And as it becomes a bit more continuous, you really start to see the whole conditionality, the cause and effect relationship. You really start to know.

There are times when you see clearly: "I could really... that's unpleasant. I want... I could really pick that up, but I need to just be with unpleasant right now." Wisdom comes in and starts to make those decisions in little ways.

This is nothing major, but it's just popping into my mind as an example—the dining room thing again. On retreats, I like space. I don't like to be cramped up next to people. So I'd always try to look for the right spot when I was on retreat here. And the same with food. I'd want to go and be sure I got there before it ran out. It's not going to run out, don't worry. We used to run out when we didn't have enough money. It doesn't run out now.

Then I noticed one retreat, I just wasn't even thinking about it. I'd go in and maybe I'd look and think, "That's not such a good spot," and I'd just sit down wherever there was space. And I'd just go and whatever food was there, I'd eat it. It was so peaceful. It was so peaceful. And all that agitation—"I've got to get the right thing"—it takes so much energy. This is what we start to discover with the steadiness of awareness.

This is from Mingyur Rinpoche: "Discovering our own awareness allows us to access the natural steadiness and clarity of the mind, which exists independent of conditions and circumstances, independent of our emotions and moods. Awareness does not increase or decrease whether we are happy or sad."

So if we cultivate a sustained recognition of awareness—and that's what we're doing, just in a simple way—if we cultivate a sustained recognition of awareness, we comprehend that awareness itself is inherently calm, no matter how turbulent the mind is. That's really interesting. Don't think about it too much, but let that idea drop in. This allows us to discover a sense of peace and stability that is not dependent on the presence or absence of pleasant or unpleasant feelings.

I can say I know this is really true. There are little moments we can experience it—not a whole steady state all the time—but play with this. Just that sense of being all caught up in suffering, and then that tai chi move into awareness: "It's like this." You're touching, just for that moment, that inherent calmness, that sense of ease, that sense of peace. It's not a huge peace, just "ah." Let yourself notice those moments. Don't make a big deal of it—go home and write a whole book about it and it's gone.

These moments often involve neutral feeling, and this is where I think neutral can be kind of interesting. They say neutral is where the kilesa that comes out is moha—we just space out, we just don't notice. But many things like calm and peace and stability also have the quality sometimes of neutrality, neither pleasant nor unpleasant. And it's really interesting to see that the habit of moha around neutral means that sometimes when you're actually experiencing peace or freedom from kilesa, you kind of don't quite notice it. We don't quite notice it. We're looking for the big lights to go off—enlightenment! We don't just notice, "Ah, there's this ease. This unpleasant experience is like this, and in the awareness there's an ease, and the unpleasant thing's still going on." Awareness doesn't care. Notice these little moments. Then you start looking for them, and you notice the craving, and okay—you notice that, and there it is again.

So neutral is really an interesting thing. I think I mentioned this, perhaps in a group: often on long retreats—three-month retreats or month-long retreats—people will come in and say, "Well, nothing's happening." Deep into the retreat, I ask, "Nothing? You're sitting there, absolutely nothing?" "Well, no," they say, and they describe all this stuff they're seeing and hearing. But nothing, you know, nothing really interesting. I ask, "Could that be calm?" "Oh, calm. Oh, yeah, calm." And then they notice their mind creating all kinds of imaginary difficult scenarios, because that's better. The mind will create trouble because it amps up the sense of me. Calm—there's not so much "me" hanging around. It's just calm.

So start to notice that, generating a contentment with just the simplicity of awareness, a contentment with the mind that doesn't have to go get pleasant or run away from unpleasant. In just little moments, the mind not going out to experience and getting over-involved, just letting experience come and go and really feeling it, but not with this looking for some big meaning out of it, looking for fulfillment. The awareness itself, the sense of steady awareness, the sense of this natural peace and ease, comes to be more and more trustworthy. And we lose it—we know we lose it a lot. But it's not like it has to be created over time. It's, "Oh yeah, right. Awareness of unpleasant is like this." That's what we're practicing here.

Upasika Kee, who was a Thai laywoman and a great teacher, wrote this book called Pure and Simple, which is a lovely book if you want to look it up. She was very much "this is how it is"—tough. I mean, you read about these old Thai forest people and how they were practicing, they were tough cookies, I tell you. Anyway, she says, "What is, is. What is not, is not. There's no need to add anything extra." That's like the whole teaching in a nutshell, right?

Does that sound unbearably bleak? It's not, you know. We think, "Oh well, it's nothing. It's calm. It's just this big, empty, dull space." And it's not at all. When we're not needing something from experience, when we're not having to push it away, we're able to be fully present in this moment. It's what it is—I'm not going to say it's always delicious and beautiful. Sometimes it's unpleasant. But it's like a totality of presence with just this. That's really, to me, much more alive than chasing after pleasant whatever-it-is, or having to run away from unpleasant.

And sure, the more unpleasant something is, the harder it is to see through our habits. But when there's just a little fraction of a moment of this peacefulness of awareness, even in the midst of some difficult thing—just a little moment shot through and then the difficulty, you're in it again—to me, that's extremely powerful. It really strengthens the faith, the sense of "Yes, I know this is true." The habit right now of getting lost and identified with aversion is in this moment stronger. But suddenly there's a moment of, "Oh yeah, it's like this now. What is, is. No need to fight it." And there's that peace, that contentment, that stability of mind. This is really possible for all of us.

I'll just end with this from the Buddha. There's a sutta in this book, The Island—I don't know if you know this book—that Ajahn Amaro and Ajahn Pasanno from Abhayagiri Monastery put together. "The island" is a reference to Nibbana, and they're pulling out various suttas. They're great scholars.

One's Canadian and one's English. And this is in California. But they're both scholars. They've been monks in the Thai forest tradition under Ajahn Sumedho for many years. And so they've pulled out—it's quite a thick book—all different suttas talking about various aspects of Nibbana and enlightenment, along with their own understanding. It's a great resource.

From this book, they point to a sutta where the Buddha speaks about how a great deal of our practice leads to disenchantment—getting out of this entrancement with our reactions, with wanting, with aversion, with "me, me, me." So much of our practice is just what I was talking about: seeing how the deluded mind works. And the more awareness sees it, the magic show falls apart. We don't get so caught up, and there's more ease.

But also at times, they say, the Buddha talked about simply inclining the mind toward the peacefulness of Nibbana—almost as a contemplation. Not always so caught up.

And this is the reflection. He says: "A bhikkhu reflects thus: This is peaceful. This is sublime—that is, the stilling of all mental activities, the relinquishment of all acquisitions, the ending of craving, disenchantment, release."

Now, that's not a craving, but just—how often do we incline our mind simply to this? This is sublime. A sense of peace. A sense of not craving. Not a whole lot of action going on, but just beginning to incline toward appreciating that. It's a beautiful thing. Something to drop into your mind from time to time. It's not always a struggle.

So that's part of what we're doing here with our steady awareness practice.

Thank you for your kind attention.

CHAPTER 172

Awareness Naturally Strengthens A Beautiful Mind/Heart

Carol Wilson · 57 min

In this illuminating talk, Carol Wilson addresses a common misunderstanding about awareness practice: the concern that non-reactive observation might lead to passivity or disengagement from life. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching that "intention (cetanā) is action (kamma)," she explains how the quality of our motivations—not just external results—determines the wholesomeness of our actions. She references the Dhammapada's opening verses on how mind precedes all experience, and explores a sutta where the Buddha describes his own practice of observing thoughts imbued with sensuality, ill-will, and harmfulness, noting how they naturally subsided through clear discernment.

Wilson emphasizes that steady awareness creates the conditions for wisdom to arise, which naturally weakens unwholesome states while strengthening wholesome ones—not through willpower but through the lawful unfolding of cause and effect. She describes how greed transforms into renunciation and generosity, ill-will into mettā (loving-kindness), and harmfulness into karuṇā (compassion). Using Ajahn Sumedho's definition of mettā as "witnessing unpleasantness without creating anything around it," she presents these qualities not as lofty emotional states but as simple, non-resistant presence.

The talk includes practical examples from retreat life and daily situations, teachings from the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Desmond Tutu on interdependence (Ubuntu), and encouragement to trust that moment-to-moment mindful awareness—even seemingly unremarkable moments of "it's like this"—is actively cultivating wholesome mental habits. Wilson concludes by suggesting we orient our practice around sincere aspiration while trusting in the honesty of our motivations, moment by moment.

So I guess the overarching topic I want to talk about tonight could be called just action.

A lot of times there can be confusion or misunderstanding, or at least sometimes we can feel as though, as we've been practicing like this, cultivating awareness, we just keep saying whatever occurs, just being with it, being with it—really total radical non-interference, right? Which is amazing for truly understanding what's going on. But in the beginning, it can be confusing when people think about, well, when I'm in my life, what does that mean? Does this mean complete, radical—I mean, you don't do anything, right? It doesn't make sense, but it's something that sometimes people get confused about. They wonder, are we somehow abdicating engagement, choice, decision in life?

Does living with awareness mean awareness doesn't care, and so I don't care about whatever's going on in life? And of course, that's not true. But I want to talk about how it works.

Another thing that sometimes comes up, quite frequently, is underneath that a sense of, well, doesn't it seem like anything we do—and quite a few people have said this, some here and on other retreats—that we're supposed to see that wanting is suffering and confusing, but it seems that anything I do is from wanting. And then we think, I want to be enlightened. If I didn't want to be enlightened, I wouldn't practice. If I didn't want to support my family, I wouldn't work. And some of that confusion comes from using the word "want" in a very global way. But I remember someone on a three-month retreat years ago said, "Without wanting and aversion, what would I do? Just sit in my room for the rest of my life?" I feel kind of sad at that, but that's the bottom line of what we're used to.

This Buddhist teaching is certainly not about becoming passive and quiescent in life. Even the Buddha, as a monastic renunciate, was an incredibly active, engaged human being, engaging with people all the time. So that's not what this is about. In fact, there's one sutta, just one line, where the Buddha says, "A wise person is known by their actions." Their actions. It is through the activities of one's life that one's wisdom, one's discernment shines. So that's really getting right to the point. The heart of how our wisdom manifests, he's saying, is in our actions—that's how we can tell.

So what does that mean? What does it mean when he's talking about actions in that way? That's more what I'm going to talk about.

You can see that awareness practice is not to abandon acts in the world—I mean, we couldn't—but to allow wisdom, when there's a moment of understanding before we act, that gives our mind, our awareness, a moment of choice. Without awareness, it's like that person said: our knee-jerk reaction to so many situations is to respond with wanting or aversion. Or at least it's all about me, me, me. It comes from what's going to make me feel the best. That just seems normal. But as wisdom grows, and as there's more steady awareness, there's just some knowing of what's going on. When a situation presents, there's the potential to respond in a much more wise and appropriate way. So it's not about not responding, but about not responding out of this reactivity.

But what does the Buddha mean by action? When he says the actions of a wise person show who's wise, does it mean that every action we do has to be somehow amazing? Does it mean that every action is somehow only serving being? You can't just go to the store and buy some pretzels—everything has to have a huge meaning? And that's of course not it.

Action is very specific, the way the Buddha talks about it. He says, "Intention"—the word cetanā, volition—"I tell you, is action, kamma." The word kamma or karma literally translates as action. "Intention, I tell you, is action, is kamma. Intending, one does action by way of body, speech, and mind." So what he's saying is the heart of every action isn't in the movement, how it looks, or even the results, which is out of our control anyway, but it's the movement of mind, this cetanā, this volition, that's at the heart of every action. That's what determines—"determined" is kind of too strong a word—the wisdom, the wholesomeness, the unwholesomeness.

So intention, many of you know, but if you're new: it's just a little mental impulse, in the way the Buddha talks about it, that leads to action of even thought, speech, and body.

It's like a little movement in the mind. The energy gathers together and then leads to action. Without that intention, there wouldn't be movement, there wouldn't be speech, there wouldn't be action. And it's meant to be happening in every moment. So most of the time we don't notice it. And often when we do notice it, it's something that's very easily identified with as "me." But it's just another piece in a train of cause and effect.

A very simple example: we're sitting, an itching sensation arises in the body. There's a little unpleasant feeling, not quite noticed, a little bit of aversion, and there's the intention—oh, move and scratch it. It's just a whole chain of cause and effect going on. So that intention, then, is said to be—the quality of that intention, what makes it wholesome or unwholesome—is the qualities of the state of mind that's coming along with it, that's conditioning it. So that was pretty mild, barely any aversion, just a little scratching. But without intention, we wouldn't scratch. You can be sitting and there's an itch and the mind is very calm and there's awareness of the itch. And for whatever reason, aversion, reactivity doesn't come up. And there's no movement. There's no need to scratch. We're not saying you shouldn't scratch. I'm just saying that's how the cause and effect works.

We tend to focus on the actual action and the effect or result of it. And the Buddha is saying the whole heart of suffering and wholesomeness in actions is in this intention together with the qualities of mind.

You've probably heard these very well-known two stanzas from the very beginning of the Dhammapada, which is one of the texts in the canon, the suttas:

All experience is preceded by mind, is led by mind, is made by mind. Speak or act with an impure mind and suffering follows as the wagon wheel follows the hoof of the ox that pulls it.

All experience is preceded by mind, led by mind, made by mind. Speak or act with a peaceful mind and happiness follows like a never departing shadow.

That's a very well-known couplet in the Buddhist teaching. And I think it's really quite profound—it comes to the heart of why we see the power of really devoting ourselves to cultivating and trusting this moment-to-moment receptive awareness that's willing to see whatever's going on in the mind. Because the mind, moment by moment, is really the seed of all the things—all the speech and action and even thought, though that's harder to see—that we do in the world.

So it's not that looking at our mind is some kind of esoteric, removed activity that has nothing to do with, that's somehow divorced from, living a full, rich life, from becoming a more useful person in the world. It's the absolute heart of that. It's the best—if there's any other way to actually come to understand why we're doing what we're doing and actually have the chance to change that, it's because we're really seeing it at the source. You know, we have the idea, "I'm going to stop doing this." Forget it—you just decide "I'm going to stop," whatever it is, but we're not seeing the motivations that get it going. We're just kind of lost.

Or as Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche said, "Actions are the servants of the mind." When you think of it that way, when the Buddha is saying someone's wisdom shines through their activities in the world, this is what he's talking about—the motivation, the intention, the quality of heart and mind that's giving rise to our actions.

Without mindfulness, of course, it's really easy to miss the motivation a lot of the time, isn't it? Even when we're looking for it, half the time we can't notice it because it all moves so fast. But just to begin to tune in and see—because you could say in actions, sometimes you could talk about three parts of it. There's the motivation, there's the result of the action, and there's the external circumstances, the situation. That's one way of talking about the elements of an action. And usually, as I said before, what we tend to really notice is the action, and we judge whether it's good or bad usually by the result—if we get the result we want. But that's not so much in our control.

I always use this example because I think we can all relate to it really easily. The same action could come from very different motivations. And it may or may not have a similar result in terms of what the Buddha is saying. Say you have someone you're close to and you have something you really, out of all the love in your heart, want to give them some feedback about. But it could be feedback that you actually know—

It's not just because you don't like it, but it's something they do and you really do care for them, and you can see that it's alienating other people. It's not simply that you don't like them personally. So you really, out of love, do want to tell them.

There are many different ways that could play out, aren't there? Part of the situation is that you wait. You're really aware of your motivation and you don't say it until you're genuinely feeling clear, feeling metta, not feeling aversion, truly caring for them. So that's one piece—the motivation. That's the best we can do.

And there's always a good chance we sort of think we are ready. "I'm going to wait till I really feel like that." But then something happens and they do the thing, and you're a little bit off balance. You get thrown over and suddenly blurt out, "You know, I've really been meaning to tell you this thing." It comes out completely different, and it impacts them completely differently.

Or consider the ambience. They come home from work and you're there, but you actually don't wait to see—maybe they've had a day from hell. You don't know because they're just looking fine. You think, "Okay, here we are together, have a little drink and let's just talk about stuff." But meanwhile, they're a mess inside. So you share this thing with all the love in your heart and it just crushes them, because you didn't have that information.

So on one hand, you're doing it out of real metta. But even if you do it out of real metta, and it's the right time and everything, it's still not in your control. The other person goes, "Oh, thank you so much. I've been waiting all my life for you to tell me this." That would be rare—but it's a possibility. That's the result we want, right? And you feel like, "Oh, this was a good action." Or they throw something at us and we think, "Well, you stupid jerk."

But anyway, you get a sense. The Buddha is saying that a great deal of the time, the result is out of our control. And this is because we don't know what's going on with the other person. Often we don't know the situational information. Sometimes we could find out and sometimes we can't. So that's a kind of ignorance—not that we're foolish, but simply that we don't have all the data. We don't have all the information. Everything's like that, you know? It's just not in our control.

So to learn to think about what's wise action and what's unwise action, and what we can actually be aware of—it comes home again to this: What's happening in this mind and heart? That's what awareness can see. And that really is the seed to our ongoing suffering or happiness. It keeps going; it's lawful. This whole practice is lawful.

So here's the good news, which somebody reminded me of today. They said I mentioned this a couple of years ago, and I thought at the time, "That's just a crock. That isn't true." So I don't care if you believe it or not—just keep looking. But it actually is true in my experience, and someday it may be in yours. Probably it already is, but I'll keep talking about it.

With steady awareness—the kind we're cultivating, which isn't "I should do this, I shouldn't do that," but just interest, seeing what's going on—we start to notice the motivations, the thoughts, and what they lead to. That steady awareness is the condition for wisdom to arise. And when wisdom recognizes what's happening, it naturally feeds wholesome states of mind and heart.

It's really amazing. When I started to trust that—which is the way Sayadaw U Tejaniya talks, though he didn't make it up, he just emphasizes it—I started to realize: that's really true. I don't have to figure out the wisdom. I just put in the trust and the steady awareness.

The more wisdom recognizes craving and keeps on watching it and sees the suffering, the wisdom isn't feeding it. It's going, "Look at that, look at that," and at some point—not forever, but just for a moment—the craving is put down.

When wisdom sees the peace of no craving, or wisdom sees generosity, it strengthens it in a way. It's like leaning in. Just as when delusion is feeding anger the anger gets stronger, when wisdom is meeting the wholesome, it strengthens the wholesome. We feel how that feels, and the inclination of our mind and heart is to move towards that—because it's really more happiness-producing.

This is something the Buddha

This is something the Buddha really examined closely for himself. There's a well-known sutta where the Buddha is talking about the time before he was the Buddha, when he was still doing his practice. He was probably a little farther along than some of us at this point, but it's a sutta where he's talking about two kinds of thoughts.

He says, "As I remained heedful, ardent, and resolute, thinking filled with sensuality, filled with greed, arose in me."

So have some faith. He's about to be the Buddha. He's ardent, he's resolute, he's heedful, and thinking filled with sensual desire arose in him. Cut yourself a break.

But then, this is how he meets it, which is our lesson. He says, "I discerned, I saw thinking imbued with sensuality has arisen in me. And that it leads to my own affliction or the affliction of others or the affliction of both. It obstructs wisdom. It promotes vexation. It does not lead to unbinding, to release."

This isn't a judgment he's making. He's looking at it with discernment, with wisdom, and saying, "Oh, here's thinking with sensuality." He's watching what it does. He says it promotes vexation. It leads to his own affliction. It leads to the affliction of others. This is what happens. He's simply watching, and this is what he sees.

"As I noticed that it leads to my own affliction, it subsided."

Isn't that what we've been saying? As he noticed, it subsided. As he noticed that it leads to the affliction of others, to the affliction of both, as he noticed that it obstructs discernment, promotes vexation, and does not lead to release, it subsided. Whenever thinking filled with sensuality had arisen, thus it was simply abandoned.

Do you really hear that what he's saying is just what we've been doing? And then he did it again the same way, the exact same thing. Thinking filled with ill will arose in him. And then thinking filled with harmfulness arose in him. The exact same process—it led to affliction and vexation, and on recognizing that and paying attention, it subsided.

So whatever a person keeps pursuing with their thinking and pondering, whatever we think about frequently, that becomes the inclination of our awareness, of our consciousness. If a person keeps pursuing thinking filled with greed, then the mind is bent by that thinking imbued with greed. In other words, just as we say, it becomes a habit. If we keep in the habit of following thinking with ill will, then the mind gets in the habit of going in that direction of harmfulness. But this is good—he's simply seeing, watching how his own mind works.

And then, again, the other direction. "As I thus remained heedful, ardent, and resolute, thinking filled with renunciation arose in me."

Renunciation really means the releasing of clinging. That's what he means. He doesn't mean renunciation in terms of thinking about objects or activities that he should give up. He's talking about this as a quality of heart, a quality of mind—renunciation as the letting go.

So thinking filled with renunciation arose in him, and he discerned that thinking filled with renunciation had arisen. And that leads neither to his own affliction, nor to the affliction of others, nor to the affliction of both. It fosters discernment, it fosters wisdom, it strengthens wisdom. It promotes lack of vexation, and it leads to freedom.

"If I were to think and ponder in line with that renunciation, even for a night, even for a day, even for a day and a night, I do not envision any danger that would come from it."

So if you want to get lost in thought for a day and a night, get lost in thought of renunciation! He didn't see any danger that would come from it, except—and he's so practical—except that thinking and pondering a long time would tire the body. It's just totally practical. When the body is tired, the mind is disturbed.

And a disturbed mind is far from collectedness. So I steadied my mind right within, settled, unified, and concentrated it. Why is that? So it would not be disturbed.

He says the same thing about thinking filled with non-ill will, which we could call metta or friendliness, and the same thing for thinking filled with harmlessness, which moves us into compassion. He says exactly the same things about all of these. And the same principle: whatever one thinks and ponders upon frequently, that becomes the inclination of the mind.

So there's good news here—it isn't just that we're stuck with the kilesas. Even in steady awareness, really steady awareness, the wisdom that comes from that naturally works. In the first case, when you see the thinking filled with greed, for example, and wisdom mind is just watching, watching, watching, it naturally releases in a moment. This really happens. And then it starts to become more natural for the thinking, the motivation of non-greed, of renunciation moving into generosity, to arise.

This is really what we mean when we talk about the lawfulness of the Dhamma—this is lawful. It's not necessarily an act of will. It's what happens when wisdom is steady, recognizing the suffering and delusory aspect of that craving. Whoa, I don't need that. And we put it down.

People have given little examples of this. It happens on retreat where you can notice it in small ways. Different people describe different experiences. We go somewhere we expect greed to come up, and just for some reason one day there's no greed. It wasn't an act of will, and it's like a surprise. Where's the greed? It's not here now. And that absence of greed is like a renunciation, and the person describing this felt it as a kind of calm, a kind of peace. Recognize that. That's a natural unfolding. That's the natural result of wisdom.

It's a little moment, but recognizing these actually helps. It's what gives us more verified confidence that this is actually happening. Don't just say, "Oh, this is some weird thing—there's no greed right now but it's coming back." Really notice: the wholesome motivation has arisen. And when we feel it, when we get familiar with it, it's actually more pleasant than greed.

So even though we do tend towards the pleasant, the Buddha uses that tendency. But we tend towards wholesome pleasant, and it's more pleasant than the unwholesome pleasant. It kind of is that way—until we get to where either one doesn't matter.

The same with aversion. People describe going into situations here where just being around people can trigger aversion or judgment or whatever, and then sometime you're waiting for it and it doesn't come. Just a sense of friendliness. Just a sense of, Oh, okay, you too. When that first would happen with me, I'd go, "Whose mind is this? This ain't my mind!" It's like, no, it isn't my mind. The other one wasn't my mind either. But just to notice. Don't think, "Oh, I must have been spaced out because I just missed the aversion. For sure it was there and I just missed it." No. Really feel where there's just a tender connectedness. And that's non-ill will.

In terms of non-harmfulness, one of the ways it really comes up for almost everybody on retreat is towards our own really difficult experience. Have you even had a moment where you've been struggling with some painful experience of body, emotion, mind, internally, and you're trying to be mindful, but basically there's that blame, there's that negativity, there's that whatever it is towards it? And at some moment, that shifts. What was it that Mark said? "Honey, it's okay"? Is that what he said? Honey, it's okay. But really, it's like, "Oh, oh yeah, it's like this now." That's the shift.

The harmfulness—because that digging at ourselves, that blaming ourselves, that judgment—that's really a kind of abusive mind towards ourselves. It's almost cruelty, you could say. And when that drops, and it's like, "Oh, it's like this now"—what's changed is that motivation in the heart-mind. It's shifted from harmfulness to compassion. Compassion is the quality of awareness of heart-mind, of citta, that just totally meets the suffering without any negativity. Out of that is where compassion arises.

These aren't acts of personal will. This is where the trust really has to come. I can't decide, "Okay, from now on, no more greed in this situation."

You know how we try that. "Oh, I got it! Now, every time this really horrible emotion comes up, I'll just go, 'It's okay, honey.'" That works once, right? Then the next time: "It's okay, honey. It's okay... How come it isn't working?" Because we're back in the outer action and not noticing again the motivation.

And what do we have to do to fix it? Yes, yes. That's all. After we go through trying everything—"How do I get back the good motivation?"—oh, right. I discern that thinking imbued with harmfulness is arising right now. And that's already shifting things.

So in the course of our ongoing practice here, cultivating awareness, it really is the lawful way it works that these suffering habits of speech and action and thought do start to shift. Because we're spending many more moments not pondering them.

The two different ways of thinking that the Buddha talked about—greed and lust tend to switch to renunciation, generosity. Ill-will tends to switch to non-ill-will, or mettā. Harmfulness to harmlessness, or compassion, karuṇā.

I just want to talk a little bit about those three. They're not esoteric; we all know all of them. But just to mention them a little bit, to recognize how they arise in small ways through the practice.

As I say, awareness and wisdom in awareness function in both directions. They help the unwholesome to dissipate, and they strengthen the wholesome. It's actually an amazing arrangement. And we can trust it because it's not something we create.

I keep saying it's not an act of will because that's so hard for so many of us to either trust or believe. If it feels like I did it, that's the identification with the cetanā. And when something comes up and shifts in one go—wow, it just changed—it feels like magic. It feels like magic because in that moment there wasn't a sense of noticing or identifying with that sense of volition. It came just... instead of a volition to have an unwholesome thought, the volition to have a wholesome one came. Just out of the causes and conditions coming together. This is what makes it wholesome.

It's really helpful to understand that as the conditions are being set in motion, if we continue with steady awareness, wisdom is going to grow. It's not that we're just going to magically not have any more greed, hatred, and delusion. No, that's a long way down the road. But these little moments, like the ones I just mentioned—they're going to happen. You may not notice them, but you'll start to. It's inevitable. It's just the way nature works. The same as nature growing.

I was walking yesterday outside and it was still nice, and I was just thinking how in this last week you've all seen how spring is just like... it's amazing, right? It's just sprung up. Every day the plants are a little bit higher and the buds are opening. It's amazing to see. And it's just lawful. It comes in its own time. We thought it should have come back in April, but it didn't. There's a whole long winter, like two months longer than you want it to be. And you can want and try and water and do whatever you want—those buds aren't going to come up. Those plants aren't going to come up.

There's nothing you can do about it. And at the right time, with all the conditions, they come up. You couldn't stop them if you wanted to. I suppose you could rip them all up, but you can't really stop them from growing. You can't make them grow faster. You can't make them grow slower. This is just what happens.

I loved that reflection yesterday. But then today came, and I thought, "Oh, that's perfect too." Because that's how it is with our minds. It isn't just better, better, better, better—everything's good. It's more like, "Wow, I'm really seeing something!" and then, big time, lost in the well of delusion. Whether it's from one moment to the next or one day to the next, that's just how it goes. Up and down, up and down, up and down.

So we have to really, again, like the Buddha said, discern: "Thinking imbued with ill will has arisen in my mind." Not "Oh no, forget it," beating your breast. Simply noticing. And then as I notice, it fades. And there's a moment of compassion towards myself. Having a long-range view, the patience to trust that this really does occur naturally.

As we get more familiar—or a lot more familiar—and trusting of these qualities of heart-mind, of renunciation, the opening up, the release of clinging, of mettā, friendliness, of compassion, then we can also consciously incline the heart, the mind, in the direction of renunciation, of generosity, of mettā, of compassion. As we learn to recognize the wholesome, it becomes an act of wisdom. There are times when you can actually choose in a more conscious way to move into the wholesome.

Let me give a simple example. Take renunciation. Food is a good place to play with this on retreats. Say you're walking into the dining room. Maybe that's a place where greed doesn't arise naturally, and you notice, "Okay, great, no greed." But another time you walk in—I'm just making this up—say you're heading towards the back table and you came in late, back where they put the desserts. There's one piece of cake left. You see it, you're not all crazed, but you see it and you'd like to have that piece of cake. Then you notice there are still more people behind you, and you think, "You know what? Yeah, I'd like to have it, but I can leave it. I don't need it. Let someone else have it."

A simple sense of renunciation, moving into generosity. And then you keep watching, and you really feel the happiness of watching someone else take that cake and eat it. It's actually a nicer happiness than shoveling that thing down your throat. It's gone in two minutes and then what? Did it make you that happy? Maybe. You had a hard day, maybe you needed it. But other days you can really say, "No, let someone else have it."

That's more like conscious intention, where we incline the mind and keep paying attention. In regular vernacular, we notice how it feels. You notice the quality of ease, of peace—that's how it would be for me; it might be different for you—or a kind of happiness at being able to let go. Then we may cling to it, whatever. But actually appreciating the happiness of wholesomeness isn't necessarily leading to clinging at all. So don't be afraid to let that kind of pleasantness, that kind of happiness, into awareness.

Don't think, "Oh no, that's just ego feeling happy. I'm so great, I'll let him have the cake." Don't do that to yourself—unless it actually is that. But if you really feel into it, I mean, it might be. But then it wouldn't actually feel happy. It wouldn't actually feel so good. There's a quality of genuineness we can recognize: "Wow, look at that. It makes me happy."

This is something we can actually contemplate. As I mentioned earlier, the Buddha said to contemplate your generosity because it actually brightens the heart and mind. It leads onward to more wholesomeness. It inclines the mind and heart in that direction, which is a lovely direction—one that doesn't lead to the affliction of oneself and doesn't lead to the affliction of others. Do you get a sense of what I mean? These are just small examples, but we can do this in big ways in our life or in small ways.

Sometimes the renunciation doesn't always move into generosity, but there's simply the simplicity of not needing to let yourself be run by the craving. Whatever it is becomes more simple. And again, recognizing renunciation, we're talking about a quality in the mind, in the heart, more than how it looks externally. One could live very simply and be filled with greed, not renouncing anything inwardly. It's probably harder to be really wealthy with many possessions and be truly simple—I wouldn't know—but I would say it's probably possible. Because it really is the quality in the heart and mind of non-clinging. Play with it. See how it feels.

Another thing we recognize from all of these—from non-clinging, generosity, friendliness, compassion, non-harming—is a certain feeling of connection. With generosity, for instance, you feel the other person receiving the cake, or whatever you offer. Feeling their sense of receiving and your sense of happiness creates this sense of not being separate. You don't have to get all mystical about it, but the generosity of one person is the happiness of another. The happiness of another is the happiness of the person who is generous. How do you separate it?

This brings to mind Archbishop Desmond Tutu from that wonderful book where he and the Dalai Lama have these long conversations about joy. He speaks about the concept we have at home in Africa, the concept of Ubuntu. Bhante Buddharakkhita, whom we teach with and who is from Uganda—I mentioned this in the fall—said, "Oh, I loved that you mentioned that, because that's absolutely what we have at home, this concept of Ubuntu."

Ubuntu says a person is a person through other persons. Ubuntu says when I have a small piece of bread, it is for my benefit that I share it with you, because after all, none of us came into the world on our own. And you realize that in a very real sense, we're meant for a profound complementarity. It is the nature of things. You don't have to be a believer in anything. I could not speak as I am speaking without having learned it from other human beings. I learned to be a human being from other human beings. We belong in this delicate network. It is actually quite profound. Unfortunately, in our world, we tend not to recognize this connection until times of great disaster—you know how we respond then, we really want to help other people, we recognize it.

That's really what he's pointing to, this profound connection. What he's saying is just what the Buddha said. It's not some kind of woo-woo idea, but when we're not acting and seeing and viewing ourselves in the world through the lens of greed or hatred or self-interest, that's how the experience actually is. You can still tell I'm me and you're you—it's not that distinction disappears—but it's that sense of what I do affects you, what you do affects me. And this is onward leading, actually, to more wholesome states.

The Dalai Lama expresses something similar. He says that Buddhism essentially consists of two things: the view, which means an understanding of the interdependence of all things, and action, which can be loosely defined as nonviolence. But if one were to summarize the Buddha's teaching in one word, we would have to say that it is universal interdependence, of which nonviolence is a natural consequence.

Since we are all dependent on each other, and all other beings want to be happy and not suffer, just as I do, my personal happiness and suffering are inextricably linked with those of others. This nonviolence does not mean weakness or passivity. It is the deliberate choice of altruism in our thoughts and actions, so that it becomes inconceivable to knowingly harm others.

From that teaching, I want to emphasize the deliberate choice. The point I'm really trying to make through our practice here is that without awareness wisdom, we could make that choice, but we really couldn't follow up on it. Because when something comes hard and we're afraid and we don't even recognize it in the mind, we're going to act out of fear, we're going to act out of anger, we're going to act out of greed. The habits are just too strong.

But this is his way of saying it, or Bishop Tutu's way of saying it—this is the truth of how things are. When the kilesas aren't distorting our perception, the movement of non-clinging, of generosity, of friendliness, of compassion, are just going to be the natural response, in little ways. I'm not saying we should have the idea now that we have to go out and act out of compassion in every moment, because we're not going to be able to do it. But this is what's going to give us, hopefully, the trust to keep at least having the motivation to re-recognize awareness over and over and over. Trusting that the natural wisdom, seeing things as they are, goes in the direction of compassion, of metta, of non-clinging, of other wholesome states. Because that's the way it is. But we keep recommitting again and again to ourselves just to look and see.

To say a little about friendliness and compassion—we know what they are. Metta, non-ill will, non-hatred, friendliness. I think of metta or non-ill will as simple connection. Even when we use the word metta or loving-kindness, often people get the idea it's some real big emotion. It has to be this love, this all-encompassing love where all beings are connected. You get the drift. But listen to Ajahn Sumedho's definition, talking about metta or non-ill will in regard to difficult people or situations: "It doesn't necessarily mean loving it. One is witnessing the unpleasantness in a situation, a thing, a person, or in oneself without creating anything around it. That's what I consider to be metta."

I actually love that. Something difficult, a pain in the knee, and one is witnessing that with awareness without creating anything around it. It's just like this. It's like that short quotation I read from Upasika Kee: what is, is. What is not, is not. You don't need to add anything extra. That's what Sumedho is saying about metta. Simple, complete connection. It's like this. Out of that arises acceptance, clear seeing, friendliness. Not making any aspect of ourselves or another person or experience the other, so to speak. Because really, in the light of the connectedness of attention, of awareness, there isn't the other—it's just what it is.

As the writer James Baldwin says, an enemy is someone whose story we have not heard. So a lot of our practice with awareness is just to hear the story of this knee pain. I don't mean making up a story—I mean just to hear the knee pain, the sadness, somebody else's pain, whatever it is that's going on. What is it? Without adding anything extra, but without needing to pull away.

And this is really what compassion is. The Dalai Lama—he's of course Mr. Compassion, so we always use his definitions—compassion is really when the heart-mind is meeting suffering fully, without resistance, without adding anything else. Compassion is that tenderness of heart that's meeting the suffering, in oneself, in another, no different.

What the Dalai Lama says is: how does compassion arise? By being with our own suffering. By being present, without adding anything extra, with our own suffering. From that, not needing to shrink back, not needing to resist or turn away from our own suffering, he says that naturally opens up and spreads out to empathy with other beings. We can really see this. We can really feel the natural interdependence that comes from opening, just being willing to be present with suffering. And so that's why it's so important on retreats, the difficult things that happen and all the stuff we go through, because that's where we're starting to see. What's the difference between all the fighting and "it's okay, honey"? Just the being with it.

How different is the experience when there's compassion and when there's aversion? Huge. And from someone else, you know, even when you try to do something to help someone who's suffering, but really the seed is our discomfort to be with. Because if someone's suffering, we're uncomfortable with it because we're uncomfortable with our own suffering.

So have you ever had someone really trying to help you, and they're trying to help you, but you can feel that the seed is their discomfort with your suffering? If you can feel that. I mean, if you've been sick, you maybe feel that. I've had, in the past—I'm fine now—a chronic disease, and everyone wanted to come and tell me, "Try this, try that, drink this, do that." You know, all the good intentions, and ten million things to do, and now there's even more. There wasn't so much internet then. But you could really feel—and this wasn't a judgment—but I could really notice when someone, with really full intention, but there's a little pressure, a little pushing, and you could feel their dis-ease about it: "Do this, come on, fix this, we don't want to see you like this." Or someone else who'd been through similar things kind of goes, "Yeah, it's really hard, isn't it?" You feel the difference.

And that's not to put any of us down, but that's where the motivation really is what informs the connectedness. When there's compassion, we're able to be there. And a whole different way of relating opens up, our views drop away. Compassion and mettā both arise from just the simplicity of total contact, surrender into it. It's like this, without resistance. It can change everything.

So I'll tell this story—some of you have heard it—that I heard on the radio a couple years ago. Remember during the big refugee crisis in Europe? I mean, not that it's over, but when it was up in the news. And there was in Calais, in France, this really big refugee camp that was called The Jungle, that sounded really, really packed, really awful. Refugees from Afghanistan and Syria and all over North Africa, Southern Africa were packed into this place, basically trying to get to England, which didn't want them. So they're trying to sneak out and sneak on trucks and go under the channel and get to England. So they're in this camp and contained in the camp. Really, it's like a prison. They're not allowed out.

So I heard this reporter on the BBC went, visited the camp and talked to different people, and then he was just walking around in the city of Calais, and some of the people were having a big demonstration against having the jungle there, against all the people. So he's interviewing them, and they're all, you know, just the general "they shouldn't be here, whatever, get rid of them." But he found one woman, just kind of an average middle-aged, middle-class woman, very negative: "These people are horrible, they shouldn't be here," in the protests. And he said, "Well, have you actually gone there?" She said no.

So she was open enough that she was willing to go with him into the jungle and meet people. They did, and they went around and talked to people. She talked to some young men who had come and had to leave their family, and they're saying, "All I want is a job and an education. When I walk outside the camp just to try to go buy something, some of the truckers kind of beat me up, the police kind of beat me up, they throw me back in here, they won't let me leave." And she saw there were horrible conditions, and she thought, "Wow, I thought this was a free country. But maybe it's not." And she was, just from talking to people—that connection broke through her view, really strongly held view. And like all our views, we never have all the information. It broke through her views, the connection just with individual people. And she decided to go back and volunteer. She went back and became a volunteer there.

Sweet story. There are millions of sweet stories like that. Just one person doing one thing, not to be a great bodhisattva of the ages, but just because it's doing the obvious, as I heard one teacher say, when the connection is there, when the wholesome motivation is driving our actions.

So, we can't figure all out how our life should be and what we're going to do and how we're always going to come from the right motivation. But one thing I want to say first is to recognize—part of what's changing, not part, it's a big part—the habits in the mind. When we say what we frequently think and ponder on, that becomes the habit. And you maybe think, "Well, I'm not thinking and pondering on compassion all that much. It comes up sometimes, but not all that much. I'm not pondering on non-greed a lot sometimes." But every moment of mindful awareness that's just not distorted by kilesa, where you just—it's like this.

Every one of those moments is a moment of cultivating wholesome intention. A moment of "it's like this." It's non-greed, it's non-hatred, it's non-delusion. And so it's actually shifting the habits of where our mind tends to dwell. We don't notice it because there's nothing special going on. You know, my toe hurts—it's like this. But if it's not aversion, that's actually strengthening the habit of wholesome attention, of non-ill will in the mind.

It's happening kind of like getting wet in the fog, where you don't really notice it, as Suzuki Roshi says. You go out in a rainstorm, you know you're soaking wet. But this is like you go out in a fog and you don't really notice it, but you get drenched to the bone through your clothes and you couldn't point to any moment it happened. This is the power of moment-to-moment awareness. This is what we're doing.

So just one last thing. I'll simply drop it in. I was saying, how do we keep it up? We do tend to want to go home. I used to go home and plan how I'm going to always act only from compassion and kindness from now on. How long would that last? I'd be beating myself up—at least, if not anyone else—within two hours for not being compassionate. You're not compassionate enough, I'd judge myself. Because that's coming from a "should" up here.

But using the understanding of moment-to-moment motivation as really being the heart of action—how do we keep it up? In the bigger picture, it's like when we want to be enlightened. "I want to be enlightened"—it may not be this thirst, but it's an aspiration, a direction to which we incline our activities. It's been so helpful for me, and someone brought it up in a group, but it really can be so helpful to take some time with yourself again and again. Get really quiet. Go into what is really important, most important to you in your life.

We go through life making all kinds of choices—every day, a million choices. And I don't mean you have to, every time you're going to the supermarket, have a meditation and say, "What's really important and what things should I get?" Not that. But one or two things.

So say, just to make it easy, say liberation from clinging—say that was what's really important to you. Not to set that as wanting, but to see, okay, that's really important. And then when I'm making smaller decisions in the moment, I can tune in: what are the conditions that will support that result? The conditions being bringing in awareness and not acting from greed, just seeing what's going on. We kind of use whatever our larger aspiration is as a beacon, a goalpost to tune into in bigger decisions. But it's not like we're always looking there. It brings us back here to help us orient when we're deciding things.

Because there's no way we can know what's going to happen, how things are going to turn out. We could plot our whole life for the next ten years, and all kinds of stuff is going to happen we never even thought about—good, bad, and indifferent. But what we do have, moment to moment, is the sincerity of our own motivations.

This is something the Dalai Lama says a lot. People ask him how, with the Chinese government, he can keep advocating nonviolence. How can he keep having compassion? And besides saying that maybe the Chinese government took his country but he's not going to let them take his heart and mind—that's one thing. But what he says again and again is, "I can only trust in the sincerity of my motivation. I can't know how my choices and actions are going to play out in the future." We can't know that. But all we can do is keep coming back and looking at and trusting the sincerity of our own motivation, just with honesty. And when we blow it in our mind, then we meet that again with the sincerity of awareness, with the sincerity of non-ill will. This is really our action in the world. Whatever way in the bigger picture we choose to show up, whatever it is we're doing, it's going to be informed by our motivation in the moment.

So that's just what I wanted to share tonight.

Oh, I just want to read one little haiku, which doesn't really fit in—but it does in a way. Because sometimes when we say awareness doesn't care, or even talking about the wholesome, there can still be that feeling in the back that somehow either life gets better and better, or we don't feel the poignancy, we don't feel sadness. But we do.

Everything still happens. People we love die, and things get hard. That isn't going to change. And the tenderness—it doesn't mean we don't feel it. We feel it more, but perhaps without aversion.

So just this haiku I love, from Issa, a Zen master a couple of centuries ago. He wrote it on the death of his young daughter. It simply goes:

This dewdrop world is a dewdrop world, and yet, and yet.

That's our koan. A dewdrop world that's always changing—and yet, and yet.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 173

Relaxation and Wisdom

Carol Wilson · 42 min

In this talk from the Forest Refuge, Carol Wilson illuminates how the instruction to relax in meditation is far more profound than a superficial beginner's technique. She reveals that genuine relaxation with presence is actually the entryway to wisdom—the recognition of an awake mind and heart free from clinging and resistance.

Wilson examines how our habitual approach to meditation often involves subtle forms of greed (wanting to see clearly), aversion (resistance to what's arising), and delusion (trying to match background views of how practice should be). She points out how easily we confuse awareness with focusing, directing attention, or trying to see objects more clearly—all of which create unrecognized stress and strain. Drawing on the teachings of Sayadaw U Tejanīya, she emphasizes that we're not trying to make things turn out the way we want, but simply to know what is happening as it is in this moment.

The talk offers practical guidance for cultivating receptive awareness—meeting experience with the simple recognition "it's like this now," using Ajahn Sumedho's phrase. Wilson explains how replacing effort with genuine interest transforms practice from a chore into engaged curiosity about how the mind-body presents itself. She also discusses skillful means for when difficult experiences threaten to overwhelm awareness, suggesting we temporarily shift attention to something neutral to refresh the quality of mind. This relaxed, interested presence becomes the doorway to recognizing moments when greed, hatred, and delusion simply don't arise—not through personal will, but through seeing reality as it actually is.

I wanted to say a few things about the relaxing aspect of how we do this form of practice.

We've said it a few times, but I want to give a sense that this instruction about relaxing is much more than a superficial introductory thing to do, just so we're not striving in the beginning. It actually goes through many levels of how we're noticing how the mind and heart is working. In my experience, exploring what it truly means to relax with presence in the moment is really the entryway to wisdom—to cultivating and recognizing the quality of awake mind and heart that is free from clinging and free from resistance. So we're not just saying relax in a superficial way, go take naps. That's the beginning of it, but really it goes through many levels.

In the way we start with relaxing, what we've said is just, as you're sitting here, without really aiming the attention, just notice how the posture feels. Sensations in the hands. Hearings arising. There may or may not be meaning, but hearings arising. If there's meaning in thinking, that's just happening. Maybe you feel the way your knees feel, the butt on the cushion. Just whatever's naturally arising in this moment—physical, mental experience. The relaxing is this quality of simply being with just as it is, without resistance or clinging, without needing to explain what it means. Just this now. This is the relaxation of not being in contention with this moment's experience.

Of course, for many of us, as we know, we're meditating, we're sitting here meditating, so we are more aware of what's going on in the mind and body. It can be so easy or habitual for many of us to confuse awareness, presence, mindfulness, with really thinking we need to focus on the object, direct the attention, really see or feel the object clearly—that that's what meditation means. Just noticing when there's this extra effort, which is extra at this point, and it can so easily be overlooked. We're really focusing, trying to see more clearly, know what's happening, give it a name, see the beginning, see the end—all these things, these ideas we have in the back of the mind. And we might overlook the sense of stress, of strain, of exertion that can be arising moment to moment in the mind that's aware.

Rather than this focusing, this directing, as Sayadaw U Tejaniya says, when that's going on we don't recognize it in a subtle or not so subtle way. That focusing, that looking, that trying is very often driven by wanting—a form of greed. Wanting to see clearly. That little push is a form of greed. Or resistance. Too much thinking is happening. Too many thoughts. Really feel that sensation. Get in there. Resistance. Or trying to match a subtle view in the back of the mind: it should be clearer, I should be able to notice one object at a time. There's lots of thinking and it's all messed up, but there is actually awareness of thinking. But I should be able to pick out each thought. I should be able to stop them as soon as I'm aware. Noticing that view in the background—unnoticed, it is delusion, trying to make it be a certain way.

So the relaxing isn't about trying to even make that tension stop. Relaxing is: oh, it's like this now. Tension is like this. "Oh good, I saw it, now it should stop"—wanting is like this. The relaxing is just the sense of meeting, just letting reality reveal itself in this moment just as it is.

If our habit is to go into the object, just explore receiving. Awareness receiving hearing, thinking, greed, wanting, confusion, spaced out, whatever. This quality of relaxing is really a moment of being fully present without contention with reality. It's a moment of beginning to recognize that quality in heart-mind when there's awareness not flavored with greed, hatred, or confusion. Not making a big deal of it, but that sense of relaxing—feel how it's different from the striving. We just keep exploring, letting it be. The striving, the wanting things to be different, is going to come up like ten million times, but it's simply another experience that awareness notices. Or not. And in the not noticing, at some point we start to feel some sense of dissonance, some struggle.

It's so easy in that sense of struggle to fall into our habit of thinking something's wrong, I've got to fix it. What am I doing wrong? It shouldn't be like this. Receptive awareness of the struggle: it feels like this. Using Ajahn Sumedho's way—I use it all the time.

Oh, it's like this now. Just opening into this moment.

As our sense of awareness and attention begins to trust this relaxing attitude, this receptive quality of awareness, you might find—you will find over time—that the meditation, and I don't mean just sitting, I mean everything through the day, can really start to be less of a chore. It becomes more interesting, because we're not trying to massage or direct our experience in some kind of way. We replace this trying to make something happen with the quality of interest. What's happening now? How's the mind working right now? Oh, look at that, it really wants things to be different. Oh, that's interesting.

And really, in going through the day, you start to find that this quality of coming back to awareness, remembering awareness, gets easier because the so-called meditation becomes less of a struggle. It's more a kind of interest, just seeing what's going on. How is the reality of the mind-body presenting itself? We're just interested and willing to show up, not trying to make it be different.

When we really start to trust this through the day, it's a huge relief. It's watching what's occurring rather than judging and assessing everything. For me, that quality of interest—I mean it's not always there, nothing's always there—but the quality of interest really comes from not being too identified with experience. So let's just really see what's going on. What qualities in the mind are bringing up suffering? What is the heart and mind like when things are at ease and calm and interested? Just noticing.

So we let interest do the work rather than our ideas, our wanting, our resistance. Some of you know, and some are learning, it can take a while to begin to trust this. So we're just exploring, playing with this now. This relaxation is a quality of really interested presence. As Byron Katie says, if you fight with reality, you will lose. Just interested in how it is right now.

As Tejaniya says, we're not trying to make things turn out the way we want them to happen, to be happy. We're trying to know what is happening as it is in this moment. That's all. When we want this or that to happen, when we think things should be this way or that way, that is expectation, which gets us caught up in aversion, greed, confusion. So we just notice: it's like this now. Even expectation is like this now.

When we really start to trust this, it's so much easier. And this is the doorway to wisdom, to freedom. When we recognize moment to moment the way reality really is, these delusions of self and needing to fix and greed and aversion don't arise in those moments because they don't make sense. It's not an act of personal will. And that is a huge relief when we start to trust it. You don't have to figure it all out. In fact, we can't. You don't have to make the right thing happen. There's not a right thing. And whatever we think it is, it just gets us all messed up anyway.

That's it right now. What's being received in awareness? What's the quality in the mind that's meeting it? Just now. That's all.

One skillful means we do employ from time to time is really about taking care, refreshing the awareness, not letting the awareness get overwhelmed with greed or resistance. This is for when something's occurring and there's awareness of it, but it's just so difficult, so painful—physical or emotional—or some really pleasant fantasy so strong that even as you're being with it, the resistance, the aversion, or the greed is so much stronger than the awareness. You're just in a fight.

More useful then to make the choice to consciously switch the attention to something more neutral, simple and neutral. That could be hearing, or a neutral sensation, or opening the eyes and just seeing. And it's not so much about the object, but about noticing that we can begin to again recognize the receptive, non-reactive quality of awareness. And then if the difficult experience again calls, fine. Awareness is a bit fresher meeting it again.

So we do employ skillful means, but it's not to get rid of the experience or make it be a certain way. It's always about the quality of refreshing the mind that's aware, bringing it back into presence.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 174

Wisdom and Awareness

Carol Wilson · 56 min

In this Forest Refuge talk, Carol Wilson examines the profound relationship between awareness and wisdom as the foundation of Buddhist practice. She begins by emphasizing the Buddha's central motivation—freeing hearts and minds from suffering—and encourages practitioners not to settle for anything less than complete liberation, not even wholesome states of mind.

Wilson explains that the freedom the Buddha offers isn't about changing external circumstances or eliminating unpleasant experiences, but about recognizing ourselves and the world accurately. Drawing on teachings about sammā diṭṭhi (right view) as the first factor of the Noble Eightfold Path, she illustrates how suffering arises from inaccurate perception and inappropriate reactions. Using the simple analogy of a child learning to match shapes with holes, she shows how accurate recognition naturally dissolves frustration and confusion without requiring effort to "uproot" unwholesome states.

The talk addresses how greed (lobha), hatred (dosa), and delusion (moha) distort perception when unrecognized, yet can be met with simple, interested awareness rather than aversion. Wilson emphasizes that steady mindfulness—what Ajahn Sumedho calls "taking refuge in awareness"—allows reality to reveal itself naturally. She draws on teachings from Ajahn Chah, Ajahn Buddhadāsa, and Mingyur Rinpoche to show that moments free from the kilesas are accessible throughout each day, and that the sense of self is merely a construction that arises and passes moment to moment. The practice becomes one of radical trust in awareness itself, which is inherently calm regardless of mental turbulence.

Tonight I want to talk about wisdom and awareness. That's pretty much it for the month. But really, I want to start by talking more about wisdom.

As you are aware, wise understanding or right view—however you want to translate it—is the first step of the Eightfold Path. You could think of wisdom, or freedom of heart and mind, as the beginning, the thread that goes through all of our life of spiritual development. And it keeps strengthening wisdom throughout.

To begin our practice, to begin each day, we really need to remind ourselves again and again of the heart of the Buddha's teaching. Again and again he said why he was even teaching was to free our hearts and minds from suffering, from confusion. That was the really deep—and maybe not only, but the main—motivation of everything that he taught.

When we come to our spiritual life, our spiritual practice, it is essential to begin from this, to really hold it in our heart and mind. As the Buddha said, do not settle for anything less than real freedom of heart and mind from suffering. Not even wholesome states of mind. How often have we said, "Okay, that's good enough. It's pretty good right now." We don't actually say "I'd settle for it," but there's a sense of "it's enough already." Not even settling for wholesome states of mind.

This is what can really bring us a depth of commitment, of faith, and the willingness to hang in there—not only on retreat, but in our whole life. The willingness to hang in there when everything gets tough, to really embrace this potential, this aspiration, in whatever language is true for you or touches your own sense of aspiration. This isn't to create craving. That's why I like chanting the Refuges and Precepts—it's really a way of honoring the depth and power of what we're doing and reminding ourselves why. It gives a whole strength to our practice, even when we're just schlumping along one foot in front of the other, thinking, "What am I doing here?" We don't think of this every moment, but it has an effect in the mind stream. It strengthens our faith.

I was listening to a talk by Chokyi Nyima Rinpoche. He's the older brother of Tsoknyi and Mingyur Rinpoche. He seems like a very sweet man. I don't know him, but he said liberation practice means that we practice the Dharma with deep motivation, not only for some ease and happiness in this life. When we start our practice with this understanding, with this potential of really freeing our heart and mind from suffering, it will bring faith and confidence and real strength to our practice.

I'm saying this here for people who are on a month-long retreat. I might not say that to a group that had a lot of beginners in it, because saying "not only practicing for some ease and happiness in this life"—I mean, mostly why do any of us begin practice? We'd like some ease and happiness in this life. That's not a bad thing. We're not throwing that out the window. But by the time we've done as much practice, as much commitment in our life as people here, I know I'm not saying anything new. I just want to highlight the power of reconnecting with the depth of wisdom that the Buddha is offering and reminding ourselves that's why we're doing this. This isn't an aspiration of "I'm no good, I'll never get there." It's like, "Yeah, right." It's not just to feel good. Doesn't that help in the fifty percent of the time that you don't feel good here? That's what we're here for.

Whatever type of technique of meditation we're doing—we're doing one particular one here—whatever aspect of bhavana, of mental cultivation we undertake coming from any aspect of the Buddhist teaching, it's all with this potential for real freedom from suffering. All the different techniques are coming out of that and offering us a way to wisdom, to understanding.

What is the wisdom, the freedom from suffering, that the Buddha's talking about? How am I going to talk about it? Let's put it that way. I am in no way saying that I am encompassing all the wisdom the Buddha talked about, please.

The freedom he's talking about—of our hearts and minds not being caught in suffering—is not that we get a different world or a different body, or that people start acting more appropriately in this world, doing what we want, or that injustice and bias and hatred and war and racism and everything stops. No. But it's really that we understand ourselves and the world differently. This is what I love about the freedom, the wisdom of heart and mind that the Buddha is talking about.

It's like right here—the way things already are doesn't have to change. The confusion and suffering arise simply because we don't recognize ourselves or experience the world accurately. And when we recognize inaccurately, we respond inappropriately, and we suffer.

The Dalai Lama has said that so much of our unhappiness originates within our own minds and hearts. It originates in how we react to events in our life—so-called internal, so-called external. The freedom that the Buddha is offering us is not freedom from the events or the experience. It's not freedom from the unpleasant.

We all know that on one level, right? But how many times do you find yourself—I certainly do—getting caught back up in that subtle or not so subtle assessment that this experience is wrong because it's unpleasant. We don't say that exactly. It is unpleasant, and so the assessment is it's wrong, or I'm wrong. And we carry this sense that our freedom is heading us toward a beautiful land of pleasant, pleasant, pleasant—just getting better and better, going up and up in a nice steady way. More and more pleasant until finally it's just a big blast of pleasantness, and we never have to experience ourselves or anything we don't like again.

Yes, we laugh, but look in there. What are you really thinking sometimes? It's a riot when you really look at it.

So the Buddha really shared what he recognized when he woke up. The world wasn't different, but with the eyes of wisdom, the heart-mind of wisdom, we see things the way they are. We simply recognize nature, Dhamma, the way it actually is. And our reactions and responses that are based in confusion just stop for a moment. We see that the seeds of suffering and the seeds of freedom are rising moment to moment, here and now, in this mind, in this heart. This is what we can really come to understand. This is what I think our practice is about—recognizing accurately.

Mingyur Rinpoche, the younger brother of Tsoknyi Rinpoche—quite the family those guys, you know. Their father, Tulku Urgyen, was one of the greatest Dzogchen masters of the last century. Anyway, Mingyur says, "If we want to be happy, we must figure out what causes and conditions lead to well-being. Similarly, if we don't have a clear understanding of the conditions that create suffering, how can we possibly expect to free ourselves from it?"

You can see how this is leading into our steady awareness practice. Right view, right understanding—we can think of that on so many levels. One level of right understanding or right view is really quite literal: recognizing experience accurately. Just recognizing accurately in a moment—that's a moment of insight. That moment frees our heart and mind. Little moments, but they count. Notice them. It frees us from the suffering of inappropriate reactions.

This is really amazing. The wisdom, the freedom the Buddha's talking about isn't that we have to have some amazing experience somewhere. It's the natural order of things. When our perception, when our awareness is really present and not confused, we see how things are. Then the suffering aspects—basically greed, hatred, and confusion—they don't arise in that moment because they don't make sense.

A lot of the translations use words like abandon and uproot, and that can be useful in a way at times when we say, "Okay, not now." But I know for me, those words slide into a subtle sense of bad, aversion, get rid of. And the way my mind works—and I doubt I'm the only one whose mind works this way—as soon as I think, "These are the causes of suffering, I must uproot them," what's going on right away? Bad, get rid of, aversion. And that's exactly back in the same cycle.

That's why the steadiness of simple awareness without judging, without picking and choosing—the willingness to be with what's happening and see how it works—is so profoundly liberating. It really doesn't seem like much of anything. You're just being aware of clinging for the ten millionth time, right? What the heck? This doesn't seem like it has anything to do with freedom, because we want it now, and we want it the way we want it.

But this is really changing the whole show. The more we come to really trust, to take refuge—or as Ajahn Sumedho says when he's really caught up in something or having a hard time or his personality's being challenged—"I would just determine to take refuge in awareness." Sometimes we have to just say to ourselves, "Yes, I'm going to cultivate awareness, even though this is a complete mess. I'm totally caught in it. There's no way. It's hopeless. It's like this."

Sometimes we just determine. So this is really the power of awareness to reveal reality. Reality reveals itself. And that is the wisdom that leads to freedom of heart and mind.

A simple example I often use of the effect of accurate recognition—of how it just frees the heart and mind from suffering—involves a small child. I got this from watching my young nephew growing up. He's four now, but when he was two, he was learning those simple games where you have blocks of different shapes—square, triangle, circle—and you have a board where you put the right shape in the right hole.

For a little kid who doesn't know how to do that yet, they see the parents do it. You go plop, plop, plop, and it looks simple. And then he would take the block, but he'd have the triangle and try to jam it in the circle, and it didn't work. And he didn't know why it didn't work, because all he saw is if you put it in, it works. So he's trying, it's not working, and frustration and anger arise—whatever's going on.

Expand it as if it were an adult. It's either like, "There's something they're not telling me. There's a secret of how to do it, and they're not telling me." Or they are somehow setting me up, or I'm really stupid, or this is a stupid game anyway—you know, all the things, until the blocks go flying across the room.

And at some point with a little kid, as they keep doing it, maybe there's a mistake the first time and the circle goes in the circle. Ah! But he doesn't really see why. It was just by chance. But little by little, the attention gets a little older, there's a little bit more steadiness of attention. And at some point, the perception matches what's happening. He really sees the difference of the shapes and how they match the holes. And then it goes in. And every time it's simple.

And all that other stuff just goes away, doesn't it? It doesn't make any sense anymore. He doesn't have to say, "Now I need to uproot this frustration," because it's gone, right? "Oh, they were telling me the secret." It just doesn't make sense anymore.

So that's just natural. That's nature. That's what happens when we recognize, or the mind-heart recognizes, accurately. But we can't exactly think our way into this. Lord knows we've tried, but we can't really think our way into it, because we don't know what we don't know. You know what I mean?

The nephew doesn't know why it's not working. And then when it's working, you can go back and see why. But we don't know what steady awareness is going to reveal. And if we think we're looking for something, that gets in the way. The insight is just that sense of, "Oh, it's like this now." It's just so clear. There may be thinking about it, some understanding, something mental, but then you don't really need to hold onto it. It's an understanding that's there for that moment, for that particular experience.

So this is really like a very simple corollary to the wisdom that the Buddha's talking about. It's nothing personal. It's just that when the awareness is not steady, or when it's distorted by wanting or confusion or thinking about something else or looking for something—just not really present—when it's like that, we just don't recognize how things are. But when it's cleared up, it's just like the laws of nature. A triangle fits in the triangle hole. That's not really going to change. It's the laws of nature.

So we stop fighting when we see how things are. The classic things that are talked about, of course, are recognizing impermanence, recognizing not-self, recognizing the unsatisfactory nature.

I'm not going to go into those tonight. But I'm sure all of you have had moments when one or the other, or all of those ways that experience truly is, becomes really palpable. Am I right? In some sense we forget it later, but when it's there, it's like, "Oh, there's no point in arguing about the fact that everything's changing, because it's just how it is." All the arguing does is create the suffering. All the resisting does is create the suffering. And that's so obvious. It's just nature. It's just how it is. It's like fighting gravity. Or fighting the body that's aging—which we do, which really helps a lot. I'll just tell you, it really, really helps. It just adds.

Everybody's body is aging. I'm just noticing it more lately, I don't know why. And I can really—it's fun to play with, actually. It is. Because I can see certain moments when it's, "This is not okay. It can't be like this. It wasn't like this two years ago, and it is not okay that it is like this now." And then at some point it's like, "Get a grip. This is how it is." And when the mind, the attention, arrives at, "Oh, this is how it is right now"—there's not a past, there's not a future, there's no fighting—it's just like this now. It's fine. It's just fine. Because the problem isn't in what's happening; it's in the mind making up a whole story and wanting and confusion and holding around it. It's like this now. There's nothing to fight about that. Remember I said the other morning, Byron Katie's line: when you fight with reality, you lose.

So this is really the wisdom that the Buddha's talking about—just the laws of nature. It's how it is. It's kind of sad and shocking, in a way, that so much of our energy, so much of the stories we tell ourselves, the ways that we perhaps unconsciously describe or think of ourselves in the world, are not in sync with how things are. And I'm not about to go and ask, "Why did it start like that?" The Buddha lists four things—and I'm only going to mention one of them—four things that will make you crazy, basically, to think about. And one of them is the beginning of things. So we won't go there. But we can look at how it is now.

So how do we recognize accurately? What does block or obstruct the arising of wisdom? As I say, this arising of wisdom, accurate recognition, is a lawful process. It's not like what I thought when I first started practicing. I thought I did whatever they told me, and I tried, tried, tried, and push, push, push. But in the back of my mind was the feeling that at some point, some kind of magical occurrence would happen. Something would descend from the clouds, or something would blast apart in my mind. And somehow—I didn't know how—boom, wisdom and freedom would come. But it's extremely lawful. Everything has cause and effect; nothing arrives just magically from the sky. And mindful awareness, the steadiness, the perseverance of mindful non-judging awareness, is absolutely the key. It's such an amazing tool for its simplicity, for its availability.

I'm sure you've heard the Buddha talking about Nibbana, saying this Nibbana is visible here and now. To what extent? For Nibbana you can substitute freedom from suffering. To what extent is it visible here and now? To the extent that greed, that hatred, that confusion are not present in the citta, in the mind stream, in the heart stream, in a particular moment.

Because these distort. This is what obstructs, what prevents accurate recognition.

Now, right here this starts to get a little bit tricky in the ways a lot of our minds work. Because I'm saying that these three qualities—and we talk about them all the time—are the qualities that when they're present and not recognized, perception is distorted, understanding is distorted. They lead to suffering and confusion.

Can we hear that without the mind jumping into the habit of "this is good and this is bad," "I like this, I don't like that"? Right away, we're into "these are bad, they must be uprooted, they shouldn't be happening." Does that come up at all? I mean, that's just how the mind has been trained to think, really.

And so this is where the steady awareness is a complete game changer in the ways that we meet moment-to-moment experience. Yes, when these qualities are present in a moment of mind, a moment of citta, and not recognized, they do lead us astray. We recognize inaccurately, we draw the wrong conclusions from experience, and then we act on them, even very simply.

Say there's a really loud sound, and the aversion—unrecognized—that that sound shouldn't be happening. "I'm suffering because of that sound." We may or may not then act on it, do something about it. We may even stop the sound. And then we think, "Now I'm not suffering anymore. I fixed the sound"—which is adding delusion on top of the aversion, because that just keeps feeding the ideas we have: if I can control experience, then I'll be happy. That's what happiness is, right? That's the definition, really, of samsara. The Tibetans say samsara is the urge to correct. Fix it, fix it, fix it.

And so whether it's that or whether it's a really nice experience—a beautiful sight, a lovely smell, the sight of lunch, or whatever—and we don't quite recognize that sense of greed coming in, the going after, the sense of maybe excitement or uplifting or getting something and tasting something good. There's nothing wrong with any of that. But not recognizing the greed when it's there really focuses us on the object and makes that particular object or experience the source of our ease, the source of our happiness. And again, we just keep on in samsara, in suffering, not seeing clearly.

With all of these three, but particularly with greed and aversion—two sides of the same coin. You know, tanha, when the Buddha talked about the cause of suffering, the second noble truth, the cause of our confusion. He chose tanha as the cause, which could translate as craving, as thirst really. Thirst. We use "desire" in English to cover a lot of different states. So tanha is thirst, and that can be the craving for or the craving to push away. Either way. So we get aversion and clinging both in there.

And the thing about it—we're so seduced. Our hearts and minds are so seduced by the habits of craving and the habits of aversion. This is really, in a way, what we've been taught through the culture, through growing up: that the unpleasant is what makes us suffer, the pleasant is what makes us happy.

The craving, even in the definition in the second noble truth—the Buddha says something like, "tanha, accompanied by delight, now here and now there, looking for happiness now here and now there." But that phrase "the craving accompanied by delight"—I think that's a really interesting way of phrasing it, because we do so often mistake the craving for a kind of happiness.

Which, as you know, those of you who've been watching craving arising ten million times and just can't bear it another moment, you go, "How could I ever mistake this for happiness?" And that's part of the mystery. But basically, it's so habitual—okay, I'm speaking for myself—it's so habitual to arise. It's become such a deep habit that as soon as craving comes up, we go with it. It feels right. It's so comfortable. We don't tend to question it in normal life.

If we're not even looking at our experience—just going with it—we don't even think craving is a problem. We don't even notice craving, frankly. We just go after the thing. Or with that unpleasant sound, we may notice aversion, but still it's all about the sound. And of course I don't like to be with the unpleasant—what masochistic person does? Only a masochist would want to be with the unpleasant, so that's really sick. Of course that's normal.

We're so seduced by these patterns. It just feels like the right thing to do. To even shift the attention from just going with it to instead saying, "Oh, let's just look at this. Let's just keep steady awareness being with this whole process rather than getting sucked into following the craving, following the aversion"—before we start really exploring steady awareness, that might never have occurred to us, because it's just so obvious that's how things are.

That's what our invitation is when we're talking about simple, relaxed awareness of whatever's occurring. That "whatever's occurring" includes, a lot of the time, these qualities that arise moment to moment in heart-mind that obstruct clear seeing. They're also simply mental states that awareness can notice. They're not outside of awareness. When we abandon awareness, we get lost in them, just out of habit, just out of familiarity.

But when we take our refuge in awareness—or as Ajahn Sumedho said—we go, "Oh, yeah, right, I'm really caught up right now. It feels like this." That's all. You don't have to analyze. You don't have to figure it out. You just kind of take a breath and go, "Right, it feels like this now."

Sometimes I was looking for craving and I don't see any craving. It's just—everything's fine. It feels like this. And I just surrender into the moment. And suddenly—this has happened so much—I would have sworn there was no craving. The mind was clear. I was just mindful of what was happening. But everything's all caught up. I can tell something's going on. So, okay, it's like this now. I'm just looking, looking, and all of a sudden, it's like a huge mountain of craving comes shooting up into my mind. I'm like, "Oh my gosh!" It's so much, occurring so frequently, it's so familiar, I didn't even notice. And I was even looking for it, and I didn't even notice.

Have you ever had that experience? It's like, wow.

But then the trick is this: you simply allow awareness to notice the next moment. We don't take that personally. We don't go off into a whole story about how bad we are because we didn't recognize the craving, and it's hopeless, and I'm hopeless. That's just the same thing—aversion.

So this is the invitation with the steadiness of simple mindfulness. You don't have to think about what to look for, but it's bringing interest in. As Mingyur Rinpoche said, if we want to understand suffering, we have to get interested and see: How does suffering arise? How does it dissipate? In just a moment. You don't have to look at your whole life. Just a moment. It's all happening right here in this heart, in this mind, in this moment. That's all we have, this moment. That's all there is.

So instead of going with the habit of thinking greed is bad, aversion is bad—

I'm bad. It's hopeless. It shouldn't be here. Instead, it's more like, "Oh, here it is." How do you know it should be here? Because it's here.

This moment has arisen through all the different causes and conditions that have come together, stretching back to the Big Bang, really. There's no way we can ever isolate which causes and conditions brought us to this point. They've all come together to create this particular moment, which in this moment couldn't possibly be any different. Because it's here, it's what it is.

So when there's greed here, okay, awareness gets interested. How does it feel? Explore it as it comes and it goes, watching it come together, watching how it behaves. What is its nature? Or as Tejaniya likes to say, how does greed do its job? What is its job? It has a lawful job: go get that thing, it'll make you happy. And if that one doesn't do it, the next one will. Keep on wanting. Keep leaning forward. Keep going for it. That's greed's job, and it does it very well.

So we always want to bring awareness to see how it works. How does it arise? What conditions? Not thinking about it so much—I mean, I have to say it to talk about it, but you're not thinking about it. You're just watching. Seeing what conditions bring it up. Seeing how it behaves when it's here. What kind of thoughts come up? How does the body feel? How do we behave under the influence of strong greed?

The more we see it—and that's actually the positive side of seeing greed arise ten million times. When there's willingness, the moment of awareness that's just interested in greed isn't distorted by greed at that moment. This is tricky, but you can get the feeling. Sometimes you know there's greed, but you really feel caught in it, or aversion. Other times you feel it, you still feel it, but there's this little bit of interest. "Look how it works." I'm walking to get the food and I'm not even hungry, but then I smell a particular smell and I notice this upwelling of, "Oh my God, this is going to be so good." And the next thing I know I'm sitting at the table shoveling it down. Whoa, I missed a little bit there. That's how greed just kind of took over.

We see that a lot in different ways, and we start to see, without having to think about it, the lawful way it acts. And without hating it, without trying to just shut down—the awareness watching it—this is the condition that allows natural wisdom to surface. The steady awareness that's just recognizing the causes and conditions, how experience acts, how greed does its job. Keep on watching.

The fact that the presence of unrecognized greed ends up causing us suffering—it doesn't have to be something you believe. It's not a philosophy you should take on. We can take it as a piece of interesting information and then follow the Buddha's invitation: Ehi Passiko, come and see for yourself.

So the willingness to just keep with steady awareness as the greed, as the aversion are coming up and doing their job—stay with the awareness rather than saying, "Well, awareness isn't strong enough, forget it. I'll pay attention again when it's doing better." Do you notice how that happens? And that happens in our life too. "Well, I can tell I'm going to eat this whole quart of ice cream, so I'm just going to tune out right now. I'll wake up when it's over and say, 'Why did I do that?' But during it, I'm not going to pay attention."

But we bring attention along during these things. And at some point, now or down the road, it's just a law of nature that it starts to become obvious that the greed isn't really the way to happiness. We don't have to believe it. It's just actually how things are.

That, to me, is what's so wonderful about the wisdom the Buddha talks about. It's not that we have to memorize all the philosophy and then try to bring our experience into alignment with it, and when it doesn't match, we get really dissatisfied. I don't know if that ever happens to any of you. But rather, you take it in and go, okay, maybe I can get interested. When greed is arising, it's like this. When it's gone, keep paying attention. When the aversion is gone, we keep just being steady with the awareness. And notice what the heart and mind feels like when it has this quality of purity—purity meaning it isn't distorted by the kilesas.

Maybe nothing special is going on, but notice that there are many, many moments throughout every day when the heart-mind is not in the thrall of greed, hatred, or confusion. It's just simply present and peaceful. It's often neutral, and we often don't notice neutral, but just begin to tune into that. Because we notice how the kilesas cause confusion and suffering, but it's equally important to keep the steady awareness going. And we notice, oh, there's a kind of peace that's not dependent on having things the way I want.

I'm sure everyone here, we all know this. We've all had moments. You couldn't get through even a week retreat or two days of retreat—you certainly couldn't get through a month. None of us could get through all the amount of practice we've been doing without many moments of that.

You know Ajahn Buddhadasa's talk we often quote from, where he talks about Nibbāna for everyone. It's a whole long talk, but he was a funny, funny guy. In that talk, he's discussing the kilesas. I don't like to use the word "defilement" just because it feeds into my connotation of negativity and aversion right away. It isn't helpful for me. So I use kilesa, that's why, or "torments."

But he says, really seeing that they arise due to causes and conditions—you can see, when greed is arising and we don't see it and we're going with it, it's like that is being practiced. That's being fed. When we sit in the sitting this morning, like I was talking about, with a lot of pain and we're not moving, but what's really being fed and strengthened is moment after moment of aversion. That's really what's being practiced. That's lawful. So when you get up, there's a lot more aversion, because one moment of aversion in the mind stream makes the next moment a little easier, then the next moment, then the next moment.

Luckily, the same is true for the wholesome. So that's what Buddhadasa was saying. The kilesas arise due to causes and conditions. And when the conditions dissipate, the kilesa vanishes. Everything arises due to conditions and everything vanishes when the conditions change—and they always change.

So he said—what I was trying to get to—he says, you know, if there are many moments a day that the heart and mind is pure, free from kilesa, he calls it the coolness. He's using a pun because the word Nibbāna in Thai, they use the word "nibon" to mean cool, like to cool the rice. So he's playing on that—the coolness of no torment in the heart and mind. We can feel that. He said, without that, if we didn't have many moments a day of that, we would die. Or we'd go crazy, and then we'd die. It's just unbearable. But we tend not to notice because the kilesas make a lot more noise. The reactions in the mind are more familiar, and we just get entranced by our reactions. We just believe it. "Well, I'm really not going to get through this."

So this quality of steady awareness, not picking and choosing what should be happening, not judging or evaluating what should be happening or how good the awareness is, but the willingness to, whenever we can remember, just come back into this steady being present—this is the key that allows wisdom to arise.

We're also using wisdom, or right attitude, kind of on an intellectual level when we keep reminding ourselves that the quality of wise attitude in the awareness isn't about wanting to make something happen, but just simply recognizing—as both Sayadaw U Tejaniya and Buddhadasa use this same way—recognizing that everything that arises is simply nature arising due to causes and conditions. They've come about, that's how it is. And they'll change when the conditions change. It isn't personal. Nothing's personal. And so when we keep reminding ourselves, if there's a lot of wanting coming up—

Not to think there's something wrong with me, but rather that interest can come in when we realize, yes, wanting is arising due to conditions. Let's just get interested and see how that's manifesting. It isn't about me having a lot of greed. It's not about ownership at all. It really changes the dynamic, again, to just seeing things as they are.

One insight that's often described as a high level of insight is called recognizing things as they have come to be in this moment. That's like a really high level of freedom, just yathā bhūta ñāna dassana. I like the yathā bhūta—recognizing things as they have come to be. It doesn't sound very glitzy. It doesn't sound like some amazing insight, but this is really moment to moment, this willingness to just recognize that whatever's happening is happening due to all the previous causes and conditions. It's not mine or me. It doesn't mean I'm good or bad. It doesn't mean anything about me. It's just nature.

As Buddhadasa says, the Pali texts use the phrase "throwing back." When the mind is free, he says, we throw everything back to nature. He says we've been thieves all of our life by appropriating the things of nature as I and mine. But we've been ignorant and suffered for it. When we become wise, we can realize, oh, this isn't mine. It's just an aspect of nature. So we throw everything back to nature. And we never have to steal anything again. It's all just natural things happening.

This is perhaps one of the most deeply rooted aspects of clinging and aversion—this habit, this view of clinging to, holding to any particular experience as I or mine. We all know this, but it's really just another habit of clinging. We can also recognize that with awareness. We don't have to uproot it, get rid of it, extirpate it. Just notice how it comes together. Notice how it goes apart.

This is from Ajahn Chah: "The Buddha talked to us about being free from attachment to the five aggregates, but we can't give them up because we don't really know them for what they are. We believe happiness to be ourselves. We see ourselves to be happy. We believe suffering to be ourselves, and we see ourselves as unhappy. We can't pull the mind out of this view, which means we are not seeing nature. There isn't any self involved, but we are always thinking in terms of self."

So it seems that happiness happens to us, suffering happens to us, elation happens to us, depression happens to us. The chain of self is constructed just through thought and attachment to any particular experience. And with this solid feeling that there is a self, everything seems to be happening to us. But when we are free of this constructed belief that there is a self, then the condition of selflessness is naturally revealed.

The main thing here is to really keep remembering that everything in the mind is moment to moment. So when we talk about being free of this construction that there is a self, it's not helpful to posit that as some kind of future great insight that's going to come and we're done with the sense of self and we never suffer anymore. It's all moment to moment.

As Andy Olendzki says, the mind, citta, in Buddhism is not a subject that has objects as content. It's not a thing. It's the process of knowing. And it's informed by whatever particular mental qualities are arising in that moment. And it's changing. So there's no there. We just know the mind by its activity. And it's arising in each moment due to conditions, including the previous moment. So each moment is new and fresh.

To me, this aspect of impermanence—and this is really the moment-to-moment quality of impermanence—this is what is so uplifting, so inspiring. It's what makes freedom possible. It's what makes it accessible to my mind to be willing to really explore greed and aversion, to really be willing to hang in there when it gets tough.

Because it's not that I have to be aware, aware, aware for ten years of suffering, suffering, suffering, and at the end of it, finally it all blasts through. That would be impossible. But there are moments—again, as I mentioned before—just simple moments when there's not greed, hatred, or aversion. There may be nothing special about them. Notice those moments.

The sense of self is constructed. You can see it happening. It's constructed moment after moment. And then that construction falls apart moment after moment. So there are equally many moments when, as Ajahn Chah says, there is no construction of sense of self, and there isn't the suffering around it. Again, there's nobody there to appreciate it, so we tend not to notice it so much. It's just, "Oh, isn't that nice?" And then the self is back. We don't notice it.

We can watch with steady awareness because this is just how it is. I mean, I'm saying that—don't believe me, don't believe the Buddha—but get interested to explore. We can really see.

All day long, the six sense experiences are just cycling, cycling, cycling. Seeing, hearing, smelling, touching, tasting, thinking, thinking, thinking, emotion, emotion, emotion, seeing, wanting, whatever's going on. Endlessly. How many mind moments have there been in the day? I don't know. It feels like millions. Who knows how many? Not every single one of them has been a moment of sense of self.

Notice—and this is where it gets interesting—how they're all happening, different things coming and going. And out of the field, it may happen quite frequently, but it's not everything: a particular experience, a sight or a sound, an emotion, a smell, a feeling in the body, suddenly there's some clinging, some sense of "that's me" or "that's mine," a little contraction. It just feels like a little contraction around it. It comes up, and that particular experience out of the whole field is like it's been pulled out, privileged in some way. This one is me or mine or says something about me. It's unbearable, or it's really great, or we have to do something about it, or we have to keep it going. The thoughts that come around it and the story of me keep coming.

If we don't notice that this is just construction—different building blocks being piled on top of each other—there's the unpleasant sound, there's the attachment to the aversion to the unpleasant, there's the thought about what I can do, there's the sense of self-judgment, there's the memory of all the unpleasant sounds, there's the thought telling yourself, "Well, if you were deaf, you would love to hear this sound, so what's the matter with you?" And then you think about... and this can go on and on and on. Out of nothing, nothing. And then we come up and go, "Ah, the sense of self is horrible. I'll never get rid of the sense of self."

Just keep watching. Just keep watching. As strong as it is, at some point that dissipates. You hear the bell for lunch and that's all gone. That's all gone. We're just walking, happy as a clam. I don't know what that means—are clams happy? Why do we say happy as a clam? And you're just walking to lunch. No sense of self. And then you see the food. Oh wow, this is a new one.

Just keep watching. What I love is that if we're willing to just keep taking a step back into awareness—that Tai Chi move—the way things are reveals itself.

Reality reveals itself. We don't need to be—in fact it doesn't help—to put our concepts on top of it.

So this sense of self, when it's there and unrecognized, is really one of the stronger habits. Talk about familiar! Talk about really feeling like the old bathrobe we never want to take off, even though it's totally disgusting. That's like the sense of self—no, don't take it away from me! Just sitting here with peace? No, I want something.

Have you ever seen your mind make up a whole, really suffering scenario that isn't true, simply because things were calm? It's quite amazing to see that. "What's going on? Well, I'm at least here suffering. That's better than peace." And that's really the habit. It's so strong.

So we don't have to figure that out. Steady observing—I don't like the word observing—just being present with what is. It's really a surrendering into this moment. It's not that we get a piece of knowledge, a piece of wisdom, but the natural processes reveal themselves through steady awareness.

It's not an act of personal will. I feel this is a huge relief. We don't have to figure it out. We don't have to create wisdom. In fact, we can't, because we're trying to do it out of some idea. But the natural laws, just as how greed does its job—steady awareness that isn't too distorted, steady, steady, steady—reality reveals itself. And that's wisdom. Wisdom does its job. "Oh, it's like this now." And then if there's a response needed, wisdom makes the appropriate response.

There can be many different responses. That loud noise that's bothering you—wisdom sees, "Oh yeah, that's unpleasant. Oh yeah, this is aversion. Aversion feels like this, just like this." And that's what's happening. No need to create anything around it. And there's peace for that moment. It's all just moment to moment, but this is really the power—the power of simple awareness.

So rather than accumulating knowledge, it's more like, I find, a deepening of radical trust, radical faith that the truth is accessible, only ever accessible in the totality of this moment's experience. There is nothing else. Dogen Zenji said, "If you can't see the truth right where you are, where do you expect to find it?"

So it's like this radical trust that when I remember awareness, there's more and more trust to just drop into: it's like this now. We never know what will happen next. There's no "so that," there's no fallback plan. But there's the trust that with clear seeing, with steady awareness, wisdom naturally arises. And wisdom recognizes that the responses that bring suffering to our heart and mind don't make any sense.

You've all had that experience. You're caught in something and suddenly it shifts and you see it clearly, and the wanting goes away, or the aversion, or the self-judgment goes away. It feels like a miracle because it wasn't through self-will. Have you noticed that? When an insight comes, it's not like you did it through an act of will. Wisdom is doing the work.

Are there times when there's a steadiness of awareness? Some people have mentioned that. And you can't make it happen through wanting. That's right. But you see, it's the effect of natural causes. We learn to trust that more and then just keep falling back into the awareness.

I just want to end with another line from Mingyur. As we cultivate a sustained recognition of awareness,

We begin to comprehend that awareness itself is inherently calm, no matter how turbulent the mind. This allows us to discover a sense of peace and stability that is not dependent on the presence or absence of pleasant or unpleasant feelings.

I love that. Just take a moment with this: awareness itself is inherently calm, no matter how turbulent the mind. Learning to trust that.

So we have a month here—not to have some big experience, but there are so many moments just to remind ourselves, learning how to recognize and trust awareness. So simple. And the truth and freedom reveals itself in its own time.

Thank you all for your kind attention. I appreciate it.

CHAPTER 175

Three Levels of Wisdom

Carol Wilson · 41 min

In this talk, Carol Wilson offers a clear and accessible exploration of the Buddha's teaching on the three levels of wisdom (paññā). She begins by establishing the foundation of relaxed, light-touch awareness—receiving experience without hierarchy or struggle, allowing mindfulness to naturally become more continuous through its own lawful momentum.

Wilson explains how wise view (sammā diṭṭhi) becomes increasingly familiar through practice, enabling us to recognize when mistaken understanding creates dissonance or struggle. Rather than diving into content or story, awareness learns to notice the quality and attitude of the mind itself. She then unpacks the three progressive levels of wisdom: suta-mayā paññā (heard wisdom), which can serve as a helpful reminder that experience is 'all nature, not personal'; cintā-mayā paññā (intellectual understanding), where steady awareness 'gathers data' and starts recognizing patterns of conditions arising and passing; and bhāvanā-mayā paññā (insight wisdom), the spontaneous, transformative 'aha moment' when understanding arises directly through experience.

Practically, Wilson emphasizes that these levels work together—even after profound insight, we may find ourselves reactive again, and can skillfully return to heard wisdom as a starting point. She reminds us that awareness itself is unstained by any experience, equally available in moments of difficulty or ease, inviting practitioners to rest simply in this moment without comparison or anticipation.

No need to try to understand or recognize more clearly, to make things different somehow, to do it correctly. Just getting more and more comfortable and at ease with this sense of light touch awareness, just receiving whatever's occurring. Gross, subtle, precise, vague, broad, seemingly many things occurring at one time—totally fine. Or naturally more precise. There's not a hierarchy.

And you'll see, as awareness naturally gets a bit more continuous, because each moment of remembering mindfulness in that moment of citta makes it more likely it arises in the next moment. It's lawful. So as we go along naturally, as Tejaniya says, as we keep practicing, right view gets more familiar and we clearly recognize when there's wrong view distorting or flavoring the awareness. We recognize—not that we're thinking about whether this is right or wrong, but with so-called wrong view, mistaken understanding (put it that way, rather than right or wrong), there'll be some sense of struggle, dissonance. It just feels like something isn't right.

And our tendency without awareness is to go into the object or into the story. We think that's what's not right. But now we start to recognize—our awareness actually recognizes, as impersonal—oh yeah, the attitude in the mind is actually out of sync with reality. Oh yeah, it's like that. Just noticing that, that's already wise view again.

As Tejaniya says, the object of awareness becomes more and more the mind, the quality of the mind, not the story. We're aware of the story, of course, but the interest is in the process, what's occurring in the mind. So as we go on, we begin to cultivate naturally a keen interest in the state of our mind, in the process. And just through the steadiness of willingness to remember awareness—we can't control how steady it is, but through the perseverance, the willingness to, with a light touch, recognize, oh yeah, here it is again—the recognition of process, of causes and effects rolling on without me being in charge, just naturally begins to be more obvious.

Natural wisdom, paññā, arises not from our personal doing. So this is the wise view that arises on the deepest level, just recognizing accurately: it's like this now. Of course that level of paññā, wisdom, also arises when the conditions are present, not because we wish it were so, which can be a relief. We can quit trying so hard and just be here for this moment.

The Buddha spoke of three levels of wisdom, and we can access the first two as skillful means.

The first level is simply heard wisdom. For instance, when we hear, "Oh, wise view—it's all nature, it isn't personal." That's something we've heard. And maybe it makes sense. It doesn't transform us in the moment, but at times it can be a wise use of thought. When there's a recognition—awareness recognizes, whoa, really caught up in something now, a difficult emotion, a lot of aversion or craving, reacting to it, or just taking the whole thing really personally—awareness recognizes that. You can just drop in this heard wisdom, sutta maya paññā. All right, it's all just nature. Causes and conditions creating, coming together as it is right now. It's just a thought one can drop in, and then continue with awareness. Sometimes that can just help as a reminder. But if it leads to thinking, analyzing, not so helpful at that time—drop it.

And then the second level, cintā maya paññā, is a kind of intellectual understanding. Tejaniya likes to talk about it as the steady awareness gathering data. Not with a tally sheet, not taking notes, but just the steady awareness starts to recognize: maybe it is all nature. It starts to see some instances of conditions coming together and, oh, that's how the sadness comes up. Oh, that's how the conditions fall apart and sadness ends. Just gathering data, it starts to make more sense. It brings a little more confidence. Again, it's natural. It's not thinking about stuff. It's steady awareness gathering data.

This kind of understanding is not transformative in itself, but it really supports the confidence to keep showing up.

And the third level, of course—bhāvanā-mayā-paññā, insight-level wisdom—is what spontaneously occurs when suddenly the conditions come together and awareness is recognized. It really is all a natural process. I'm not doing anything here. That "aha" moment—that's the mental factor of paññā, real wisdom arising in that moment. Also arising when the conditions are appropriate, not through an act of personal effort. And in that moment, it is transformative. For that moment there's a real seeing and understanding. And that moment changes. Awareness notices, and the next moment arises.

Perhaps later—the next day, or two minutes later—the mind feels all reactive and caught up in something again. Our old habitual tendency might be to immediately chastise ourselves: "Ah, you understood it, now you've lost it." But now, rather, we can pop back up to that first level of wisdom, heard wisdom. "Oh my god, I lost it—oh yeah, it's all causes and conditions. It's a natural process." Let awareness just explore through being present how it's happening. And we're back in the second level, steady awareness gathering data.

So the moments of difficulty, the moments of seemingly lost insight, are equally valid moments for the arising of wisdom as a subtle, really interesting experience of impermanence, for example. Awareness doesn't care what the object is. It's not stained or damaged by difficult experience. It's not made better by a lovely experience. As soon as there's the remembering of awareness, it's available—whatever is occurring in this moment.

So just resting with awareness, attention into this moment's experience, not looking into the next moment, not needing to compare to the past moment. Just this.

CHAPTER 176

To Study the Self

Carol Wilson · 59 min

In this profound dharma talk, Carol Wilson takes up the investigation of sakkāya-diṭṭhi (personality view) as the deepest of the three distortions of perception. Drawing on Dōgen Zenji's famous teaching—"To study the Buddhist way is to study the self; to study the self is to forget the self"—she guides practitioners through the moment-to-moment arising and passing of the sense of self.

Wilson weaves together teachings from multiple traditions, including Ajahn Sumedho, Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche, Ramana Maharshi, and Buddhadāsa Bhikkhu, to illuminate how the ego is simply a conditioned phenomenon—"like a ghost caused by the play of shadows." She explores how steady awareness naturally reveals the constructed nature of self, showing that the sense of "me" arises hundreds of times daily around the simplest sense contacts, yet dissolves the moment it is clearly recognized.

The talk offers practical guidance on distinguishing genuine insight into emptiness from spiritual bypassing, emphasizing what George Orwell called "the power of facing unpleasant facts." Wilson explores the delicate balance between recognizing the non-personal, conditional nature of emotions while fully feeling them—like "wind roaring in empty space." She concludes with the teaching that true liberation doesn't mean losing our humanity, but rather caring more deeply while not being caught, captured beautifully in Issa's haiku on impermanence: "This dewdrop world is a dewdrop world. And yet, and yet."

When Andrea spoke last time, she talked about delusion in a very helpful way, and the three distortions of perception—the third one being the distortion of perceiving a sense of intrinsic self-existence where there is none. So I thought I'd go off and talk a little bit more about that.

Really, I've been thinking about this. When I was on retreat a couple months ago, a very well-known line from Dogen Zenji kept running through my head. One simple translation goes:

To study the Buddhist way is to study the self.
To study the self is to forget the self.
To forget the self is to be enlightened by the 10,000 things.

It's nice, isn't it? What the hell does that mean? But it's nice. That's the framework of what I'm talking about. Whether that translates to you, I have no clue.

I want to begin with something I love talking about: just exploring what we see through steady awareness—not going looking for it, but recognizing again and again how this distortion of perception arises and gets us all confused, this particular one about sense of self. And of course, it's resting on what Andrea spoke about. When there's any delusion, there's going to be greed or hatred or delusion. With greed or hatred, there's always delusion. There can be delusion without those two. But when any of these are present in the mind stream, in the consciousness, in the awareness, and not recognized, it's impossible for the perception, for the awareness to recognize accurately what's occurring, what's happening. The Buddha says that over and over.

This really is, in some ways, the most poignant aspect of tanha. The Buddha talked about tanha, or thirst—whether it's wanting or pushing away, fed by delusion—as the second noble truth, the cause of our suffering. There's the obvious suffering of just the wanting and not getting, but really the deeper point is that it's obstructing the clear recognition. As I spoke about the other night, that clear recognition is simply what allows wisdom to arise and the mind and heart to just put down the burden of wanting and aversion and getting so lost in this me, me, me. It's really poignant. But without recognizing that that's what's occurring, as Andrea said, the perception is distorted. There's a quotation from Anaïs Nin, the French writer, that we see the world not as it is, but as we are. It's really like that. We just don't recognize what's going on.

In terms of how that works with the sense of self, the personality view—to me, this personality view, sakkaya-ditthi, is of the three vipalasas the one that's the most deeply entrenched, the one that really is kind of beneath all the other sufferings. And it's just so frequent, so familiar. It feels like home, doesn't it? We don't always like our home, but it feels like home. So we keep going back there, keep recreating and believing it moment after moment.

But it's not that there's something real, this sense of self. You all know this, but I have to say it anyway. It's not that the sense of self, the ego, is some real existing thing that when you finally hit accurate recognition and uproot every strand of clinging in your mind, then you'll finally get rid of this nasty sense of self. It's just another conditioned phenomenon, arising experience like anything else. As many people say, it's a concoction that arises due to conditions, due to perception, due to contact, due to feeling, due to the thoughts that come from it. There's distorted perception, then distorted thinking, and then view—sakkaya-ditthi, the personality view.

The Buddha gave it such importance that of the three fetters that are seen through in the early Buddhist way of talking about the four stages of awakening, one of them is sakkaya-ditthi—seen through, understood not to have self-existing intrinsic existence. It doesn't mean the sense of self stops arising. It just means sooner or later the awareness understands it again, then it arises again, then it understands it again.

I want to bring in some other voices, not just mine. Ramana Maharshi says, "The ego is like a ghost caused by the play of shadows. If you look closely, the ghost vanishes. The ghost was never there. So also with ego, with sense of separate self. So long as one does not look closely at it, it continues to give trouble. But when one searches for it, it's found not to exist."

That's how it is. How do we investigate the nature of mind and the root of samsaric delusion? The very root of delusion is the thought of "I," the habit of clinging to the notion of self. And this notion is simply due to a failure to investigate. There's no such thing as a truly existing autonomous self. We fabricate this concept in the same way we make up all of our other thoughts. Then after constructing this self over and over again, we get so used to our invention that it seems to really exist as a distinct entity. And once this thought has deeply taken root, we demand that the self should be happy and comfortable, enjoying wealth and pleasures.

If it could be the center of the universe, that would be the best. This attitude is the very basis for our wandering around and around in samsara.

But it's not just because we're stupid and stubborn. The habits, the way that the kilesas do their job, the frequency of how fast the mind works—all of this feeds into this arising over and over again. This is really the biggest suffering: this concocting of the sense of me, the sense of I. But that's really what's happening. It's just arising in any particular moment due to particular conditions. It arises, it exists, it passes away.

If you remember reading—probably years ago—Zen Mind, Beginner's Mind, it's one of those early books that we all read. It has so many wonderful one-liners in it. The one that hit me, I think I was on retreat when I was a nun in Thailand, and just happened to have one book. This is the book I happened to have. I don't know how I had it; it was a long time ago. Different lines from that book are burned into my memory in a really uplifting way.

This one line, Suzuki Roshi says: "Every existence is a flashing into the vast phenomenal world."

I love that. It's like each moment of existing is just a flashing into the world. It flashes and dissipates, flashes and dissipates. That was just so real for me at that moment. And when you have an insight like that, it just stays real. That's what the sense of self is, just like any other moment of existence—it's just a flashing. Conditions come together, it flashes into the universe, and it dissipates when the conditions change.

And it seems so real and solid only because it's not investigated. In the terms of how we're practicing here, with really steady awareness, there's no way not to recognize this is happening—not every moment, but frequently. That's the power of the subcontinuity of awareness. We see the conditions coming together, doing their little job, and falling apart.

Ajahn Sumedho says we create the world through our perceptions, our views, through the mental formations that come, and then it falls apart when we recognize with awareness:

"So then the self arises. I start thinking about myself, my feelings, my memories, my past, my fears and desires, and the whole world arises around Ajahn Sumedho."

Can you relate to that? Although it wouldn't be your world that arose around you, right? It takes off into orbit.

"My views, my feelings, my opinions—I can get caught in that world, that view of me that arises in consciousness."

You recognize right there the shift of attitude: from "this is me" to simply a view arising in consciousness, simply another thought arising in awareness.

"If I know that, if I recognize that, then the refuge is no longer in being a person. I'm not taking refuge in my personality or my views and opinions. Then it lets go, and the world of Ajahn Sumedho ends in that moment."

I think that's another important habit to notice: we tend to take refuge in our views and opinions—as Andrea talked about—not even recognizing they're views. Even more, we take refuge in being a personality. We may really dislike our personality, wish we had a different one, but that's still taking refuge in the personality.

So as Ajahn Sumedho says, the world of Ajahn Sumedho arises simply—it can arise around any sense contact, all day long. Just the slightest sense contact and the whole world of me can arise, just as he describes it.

Like the rain this morning. Wake up hearing gentle rain, and immediately: "It's really pleasant lying in bed listening to the rain"—which could just be a perception. But then the mind goes: "So pleasant, and it's really nice to be able to lie in bed, and it's lucky it's not a big rain. It's just a little rain, not like the hurricanes they have in the South. It reminds me of times as a child when I went camping with the Girl Scouts and the rain on the tent—not the time it washed us out, but the time it was a nice rain on the tent. But oh no, now I have to get up. And do I walk up there?"

Do I take my car up there? Is it going to rain later? And just like that, right? That's a matter of two seconds—less time than it took me to say it.

That's not a particularly dramatic example. I mean, we wouldn't necessarily notice that without steady awareness, would we? Because it's not a big flashing of obvious suffering or intense joy. It's just a simple little moment. How many little moments like that are in our day, around any sense—including mental ones, including a thought or a memory—the whole sense of "me" arising? With steady mindfulness, with steady awareness, this presents itself, this reveals itself.

We can't really hide the fact that these arisings of self come and go—if we're steady enough, if awareness is steady enough. And if you're really looking, it's a different self, isn't it? Each time different feelings, different emotions, different thoughts. Unexplored, unexamined—or when we pay a little bit of attention to it, then we don't pay attention when it goes away. Then there's awareness when it comes back, but there's not awareness when it goes away. That's how the wisdom mind doesn't arise, doesn't see the impermanence, doesn't see, as Ajahn Sumedho says, how the sense of "Ajahn Sumedho" fades away.

So I've told you that little story about the rain. I don't remember noticing when that particular little sense of Carol went away. Because without awareness, you're sort of half aware, right? I was doing things, so it shifts—then you're taking the shower, you're doing this, you're doing that. And without the steady awareness, it doesn't have to be really intense focus, but without it, the habit of just assuming "this is a steady me" is running in the background. So it felt like the steady Carol doing all the different things she did. And how many different ones today? Innumerable.

This doesn't have to only be noticed on retreat, but it's certainly a lot more supportive—more opportunity to see this—just because there's more space and less doing. I certainly notice when I'm doing and having to do the next thing, and that habit of the mind reaching forward, that it's just a little easier to overlook this subtlety. But we don't have to overlook it. It's really, really obvious when we do look.

So we notice the arising, but we also notice the dissolution. As Ajahn Buddhadasa talks about, the birth and death of self happens hundreds and hundreds of times in a day. And we can notice that. And then there are many other moments in the day when the mind, heart, consciousness is empty of grasping. These are his words—empty or void of grasping, of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, of the sense of self. There are many such moments, just as we talked about in another context—moments that are just cool or plain or neutral, nothing special. Steady, steady awareness also notices those.

Buddhadasa's language is not exactly what we're doing here, but he talks about the importance of noticing the birth and death of self. And equally important—of course it's all equal, right? We notice everything—equally important to notice the moments of just simplicity, of coolness. He calls it voidness, and that's how it's translated in his book: to generate a contentment with these moments of voidness, of emptiness of self.

That's really interesting—really being equally present and interested with the neutral. It's come up in a couple of the groups; I think I mentioned it in a talk, but a few people have mentioned it from their own experience. Seeing how, maybe they had to track it back—I'm just going to say it in the order it would have happened—seeing how when the experience of the mind is present, but it's a little bit neutral or calm or nothing special, seeing how the mind kind of whips something up. It brings up not even just a pleasant fantasy but an unpleasant fantasy, because it's a little juicier. It's like, because it's me, really, that sense of me. And somehow we really, I think I said in a group, get addicted to that little sense of oomph about me. We don't want it to go away.

That's just a habit. I'm not saying we don't want it, but it's familiar. It gives us a sense of me. Where would I be without the sense of me? This is from Ajahn Sumedho.

So when there's not those moments of voidness generating contentment, when there's not a sense of self arising, you could call that recognizing non-grasping. Because essentially, the sense of self arises when there's a moment of clinging or grasping to that particular sense experience, or the pleasant feeling, or the thought. You can feel that—I can feel that contraction, that sense of limitation, that sense of clinging come in right around any experience. So the rain: a very simple, pleasant thing. It didn't have to go anywhere.

As soon as the thought arises—"Oh, I like this"—and suddenly I'm thinking about Girl Scouts, it's not a huge contraction, but it's limiting. It's smaller.

The Buddha said in one of his suttas—he's talking about the measureless quality, the measureless mind and heart—and he says the kilesas, greed, hatred, and delusion, are makers of measurement, makers of limitation. You can feel that. You can feel it as soon as there's that contraction, like a contraction of self. But somehow it's just so familiar, it's a habit.

Ajahn Sumedho writes: "As one begins to realize or recognize non-grasping as the way, then emotionally one can at times feel quite frightened by it." I want to say it's not necessary to feel frightened by it. It's not like that has to happen. It can be a huge relief. It doesn't have to be frightening. But it can happen. "It can seem like a kind of annihilation is taking place. All that I think I am in the world, all that I regard as stable and real, starts falling apart. But if we have the faith to continue bearing with these emotional reactions and allow things that arise to cease, to appear and disappear according to their nature, then we find stability—not in achievement or attaining, but in being. Being awake, being aware."

I love that. It's really the sense of finding our stability in the inherent calmness of awareness, not in any particular experience.

So, this "maker of measurement"—there's one way that Sogyal Rinpoche talked about it that really conveys how the clinging sense of self, this distorted perception-thought-view, is a kind of measurement. He talked about how in Tibet, when they're measuring to make the footprint of the foundation of a house they're going to build, they start in what would be the middle, and they have a piece of rope that's the diameter. Then they measure from there all the way around to determine how wide it's going to be. He says that's what we do with the sense of self, with the sense of "me here." Every momentary perception is measured back to the sense of me. Me perceiving this. Me wanting. Me not wanting. Just the simple sense of me that immediately makes the measurement of "other."

Seeing how that's the habit—we kind of laughed about it in some of the groups, how immediately the simplest little thing, like where do I sit when we sit down, can come back to "what does it say about me?" And it's all about me. It's really quite fun to watch if you're not taking it personally. And it isn't personal. We're really seeing how the habits of mind work.

So there are many, many moments in the day with arising and passing where we can really recognize the not-self, but also recognize that when there is a sense of self, that's also equally empty of self. It's not like that's a real thing, as I said in the beginning, that we have to see through. It's simply another conditioned phenomenon arising due to a sense of clinging at a particular experience and then the interpretation of that as being

"me" or being "mine." And then that interpretation, that thought, becomes a view, a belief. As Andrea said, we don't recognize it. We don't get a neon sign: "View is arising! I think I'm a self!" It just feels true. That's how it is. We don't question it. But we can really see it arising due to lawful conditions and causes. It dissolves when those causes change, and it's also just nature.

In a way, I kind of love watching when the sense of self comes and when it goes. Seeing it takes the sting out of it, but also reveals just how much it comes, how strong it can be when unseen. And seeing it, it's just—again, it's just perception and vedanā, feeling tone and thoughts concocting this whole story. Ten million stories in a day. When you look at it, it's no wonder we're so tired so much of the time. Because we have this story, and then we react to it. And then we think, "How are other people thinking about me?"

And everybody that walks by, what are they thinking about me? And everyone else is thinking that. My god, the energy that's going around in here.

You wonder sometimes—one time at the retreat center, because there's so many more people, there's more energy bopping around. I remember one three-month retreat, about November, so it was two months in. You do your own thing when you're yogis. You may not have a sense of how it is on the staff and teacher side. There's a lot of energy roaming around. And as you know, sometimes it's a little bit identified with kilesas. That does happen sometimes.

I remember one time years ago, I was out somewhere, and I wasn't really paying much attention. I came bopping in the front door, opened it, and the energy was so strong—I opened it and went, "Whoa!" I felt like it almost knocked me down the steps. I thought, "Oh, I better bring my awareness in here, walk it into here." So something goes on.

I wanted to read this: The fact that even the sense of self is an equally valid object of awareness. All objects of awareness met with awareness are equally valid objects for wisdom. They all exhibit the Dharma. They all show the same aspects of impermanence, of not-self, of unreliability, of nothing to rely on. They all show the same kind of emptiness of intrinsic existence and the same opening into the purity of awareness.

This is Dilgo Khyentse again: "This troublesome ego, which is so concerned about itself, has in reality never begun to exist. It does not exist anywhere now, and so it cannot cease to exist. Not the slightest trace of it can be found. When one recognizes this empty nature, therefore, any notion of there being an ego to dissolve vanishes. And at the same time, the energy to bring about the good of others dawns, uncontrived and effortless. Here you will see the unity of emptiness and compassion."

I just love this kind of absolute way of describing things. But that's how it is. When the awareness, the wisdom mind—sati-pañña, mindfulness-wisdom mind—really sees that there never was and there isn't now, all that clinging in that moment dissolves. And it doesn't just leave us like a blah nothing.

Really, when we see in how we're practicing here, when the awareness is steady and wisdom arises and the kilesas aren't being fed, many of you see how—not as an act of will—the kilesa, the wanting, the aversion, the confusion vanishes. When there's just this momentum of awareness and wisdom recognizing, it may slowly dissolve the kilesa, or it may just vanish. And it's really not a sense that you did it.

But that doesn't just leave an empty nothing. What's really important in the big picture—and by big picture I mean of our whole lives—is the steady cultivation, the steadiness of awareness and wisdom. What naturally occurs is also lawful, the Dharma: the wholesome arises when the kilesas aren't making so much noise. The wholesome arises, and wisdom-mindfulness feeds the wholesome. This is lawful.

So that's really what Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche was saying. In that moment of wisdom really recognizing the absolute emptiness—that there never was, there isn't an ego now—in that moment, the energy that's released from the clinging, from the holding, from the concocting and holding to it, naturally goes into compassion, mettā, equanimity. I don't mean that as a hook to make it worth exploring, but it does happen.

So I was thinking again—it kept coming up in my mind when I was on retreat, which is really why I was thinking about this: "To study the Dharma is to study the self, to study the self is to forget the self, to forget the self is to be enlightened by ten thousand things."

I was noticing in my own practice, but also from talking to so many people, that in a period of intensive practice—say a retreat like a month like this—it's different for everybody, but there can be a general trajectory, although nothing's linear, of course. In the early days of a retreat, the content—I mean, we're still cultivating steady awareness, and it doesn't matter what the content is—but the content tends to be more on the personality level of things. When you come into a retreat, the stuff you've been doing at home, the thoughts, are a little more engaged with our everyday life. But also, in really seeing—and this is a necessary and important aspect of practice—there's a great deal of practice where, with the steady awareness, what's naturally being revealed is aspects of our personality patterns.

A lot of you have been saying that. And it's very insightful and very liberating. We're seeing our personal conditioning. Maybe we haven't recognized from some of our past experience how that's affected habit patterns and emotional patterns that arise with frequency here and in our lives. And we start to see that. Or we already thought we knew it completely, but information comes up and we recognize it on a deeper level.

It's really interesting. But with awareness, it's not like this isn't equally important practice, because awareness is able to recognize, wisdom is able to recognize this. It's fascinating—we can see it on the level of how the conditions come together to create this particular mood, this particular habit. And even though it seems like it's all about sakkāya-diṭṭhi, all about me and my personality, if you really look when there's mindfulness and wisdom, that's the content, but we're really seeing the process—the process of conditioning, the process of how that works.

And then when there's wisdom that notices, there's often a moment where the knee-jerk reaction doesn't have to happen. Do you know what I mean? I noticed for myself that it was really kind of fun to watch, just watching the conditions roll out automatically when there's a particular trigger.

Just a silly little thing I wrote down when I was on retreat, when I was aware. I was pretty aware. And my phone vibrated. And I was in quiet, didn't want to talk to anyone. So immediately—and this is all like ten times faster than I can say it; I wrote it down because I wouldn't remember it all—the phone vibrates, and immediately: "Oh, who's calling me? I get all these phishing phone calls. I should call the do-not-call list, but I did put it on the do-not-call. Why are these all happening? I don't want to answer it." And there's this immediate aversion, very solid, very solid me—just like that, maybe a second.

And then awareness came in and just said, "Wow, look at that. Just a vibrating phone and this whole habit pattern of craving and aversion in a particular state came up like that." You just punch the button and the whole thing rolls out. But as soon as there was awareness, the whole thing dissipated. And it was really interesting to see.

As Sayadaw says, awareness breaks the chain of events. So instead of going on or saying, "Oh, what's the matter with you? You should feel compassion," or whatever—look at that. Press the button. Boom. It comes out. Awareness is here. It dissipates. Really fascinating.

And that is really not about taking it as a personal thought, but really seeing the causes and conditions that give rise to a sense of self. And then the conditions change. Awareness comes in. They dissipate. It's nothing to get upset about, but it's really interesting to understand. There's a lot more wisdom, and there's the chance for those conditions not to so absolutely take over every time.

Once we see it, once awareness-wisdom sees it, the next time it happens, if there's a modicum of awareness—I mean, it'll happen and there isn't, but then the awareness will come and you'll see it—there's a chance not to react with the aversion, not to react in that way.

This is really equally important as objects of awareness leading to wisdom, not just personal wisdom. I mean, when it's happening in our practice, it's really interesting, for sure. But sometimes people can think, "Well, that's okay, but we're still on the personal level, and we want to get down to the nitty-gritty. I just want to see perception and vedanā arising. I just want to see how the thought comes up. I just want to see dependent origination. I don't want to be bothered by all these personality patterns."

But as Dīpama Kenzei was saying, it's equally empty. It's just a different content.

With mindfulness and wisdom, with right attitude, we're really seeing the emptiness. This is from Tejaniya. He says that emotions, although being experienced in the moment, are there because of past causes and conditions that are having an impact in the present moment. That's really what we see.

I don't know about you, but I find that my mind takes emotions so personally, especially unpleasant ones—even when I absolutely know. I guess that's not absolutely. I think I absolutely know. I sort of absolutely know, but not absolutely yet. Emotions are just as he's saying. They're causes and conditions. They come together. I know they're going to pass.

When you're in the middle of that despair, or just that aversion again, or that hot flash, and you think, "I know this is going to pass. I know it's going to pass." But part of the emotion itself is the belief that it's going to be like this forever. That's the emotion doing its job: "I'm going to be here forever, so just get used to it."

So we see that emotions are arising in the moment because of past causes and conditions having an impact on the present moment. But we need to remind ourselves that it is a process. It's natural. And so we just recognize that it's natural and allow ourselves to observe it. We need to appreciate that we are actually aware—even when it seems we're in the midst of a difficult emotion—appreciate that we're actually aware, and to initiate awareness rather than complain about the experience. This is practicing Right View.

Talking to many people these past couple of days, hearing about difficult emotions or some turmoil or just another conditioned habit like mine with the phone—there's this sense of, "Yeah, I know there's some mindfulness, but it keeps going." You can feel a discouragement, a not really recognizing that mindfulness and awareness are quite activated. But that doesn't necessarily mean the pattern stops. It just means consciousness has the ability to observe it, to recognize how it's working a little better. It doesn't mean it stops working, but really recognizing that you can activate awareness.

It can be flipping back and forth, especially with strong patterns. But just keep remembering awareness. Take refuge in awareness. Not because "I hate this thing, and if I take refuge in awareness, it'll go away." That's not refuge in awareness—that's aversion. But just recognize, "Oh, it's like this now." Just recognizing that.

So calling this "studying the self" is also part of our process of purification and part of deepening understanding. Then at other times in our practice—whether in retreat or daily life—the same habits or similar emotions can arise. Of course they're not exactly the same; it's a different time. But it's a pattern we really recognize, one that previously felt like it was being met with right attitude. There was a brightness in the mind, the interest.

But later, the same things can come up, and this is where we move into "to study the self is to forget the self." Something arises and it's just kind of like, "I really don't need to go there." Not out of aversion, but out of really seeing that at this point, it's an old habit—like a shadow of an old habit arising. We could jump into it and go down the whole path, but it's actually completely unnecessary. In that moment, there's enough awareness listening. "I don't need to feed that." Change the channel. And this happens naturally.

I'm not saying you should do that. But here's an example: some years ago, I wasn't on retreat, but I was sitting and—I don't know what was going on—but the habit of self-judgment and self-hatred, that familiar "you're not good enough" arose. Sometimes it's just thoughts, but sometimes it comes in like this really heavy cloud. I can feel it coming before I even recognize it's already there. I feel it, and I sense this negative tinge over everything, and it's really heavy.

So seeing this coming in, seeing why, just watching it. And then there's this habit, a belief really, that since it's here, to be wise and mindful I have to really be with it—note it, feel it, not avoid it, name it, feel the heaviness, really be there.

But then some piece of wisdom came in and asked: Do I? I actually completely know all the antecedents. I know why it's coming. There's no personality reason I need to explore this. So I thought, what if I don't go "oh, it's so heavy, heavy, hatred feels like this"? What if I just say one line of mettā?

And it was like that—like a wise presence. It was that sense of relaxed awareness, not aversion. Just say one line of mettā. Not "I've got to do mettā." Just say one line.

Okay. I said, "May I be happy and peaceful."

And the whole thing just dropped away. Not the mettā—the other thing. Just dropped away. Oh yeah, may I be happy. It wasn't like I went into the bliss of oneness or something, but it just shifted to a wholesome mind state. I realized that when there's wisdom in the mind, it's not that we have to follow the personality seven million trillion times ad nauseam. It is empty. In that moment, the emptiness is apparent. Let's cultivate the wholesome, and it's right there. And you know it's possible like that because it is right there. You're not fighting about it.

But there are other times, of course, when the whole personality story just isn't what's arising. This isn't like it's better. It's not like you should make that happen, or that it's linear. But sometimes it's just like that—it's enough already. That stuff loses its interest, completely loses its interest. Sometimes the Carol story is the most interesting thing going. And other times—really?

One time I was doing a three-month retreat, and I had seen a movie just prior to that retreat. I don't know if any of you have had that unpleasant experience. You should really pay attention to what movies you put in your mind before you come on retreat, I tell you.

So this was some thriller—Harrison Ford in The Fugitive, I remember. I was sitting there, and the Carol story would be going, and then Harrison Ford would start with all of that, and then my story would start, then Harrison Ford would start. After a while, I realized they were equal. It was just images and thoughts and emotions coming up. One wasn't more or less me than the other. Actually, the Carol one was less interesting.

But I really saw: it's just conditions coming together. And it's a view that makes whatever was going on with the Carol story—I can't even remember what it was—seem more real.

So we can really start to explore that. And that kind of forgetting the self is partly when it just isn't arising.

That happens naturally. But also when we can just see we don't have to feed that interest in me. Sometimes there's a belief we have to explore it too much.

Ajahn Sumedho made an interesting comment in one talk I was listening to. He was, of course, talking about awareness, and he says, you know, awareness has been available to us since our childhood. But we just don't recognize it because we've been so absorbed with attention into ourselves. We're absorbed into attention into our bodies, our emotions, our personality. He says we're obsessed with ourselves.

And I can see that, right? It's so interesting that there's any other object, but ourselves is usually the most compelling one, that we just don't notice the possibility of awareness. And so this sense of forgetting the self—it's interesting that he kept on talking about that.

I use his phrase a lot where he says, "It's just like this now," as a way of just relaxing, surrendering into just what is. And as I said, I use that frequently myself. And I notice when I use that, when it's helpful as a wisdom prompt, is when I'm feeling all caught up and circling around something. If it's just unpleasant and I know it, that's okay. But when somehow it's all confused, all coagulated, usually caught up, identified in some way—he says, "It's like this."

But then he goes on to say, and I totally related to this—he said, "When I say 'it's like this,' I used to try and see why it's like this. But now I just go, 'It's like this.'" Because the trying to see why would take me into analyzing. It would take me back into the whole world of Ajahn Sumedho.

And I really have found this so frequently with myself. This can be more—not so much when I'm in the Carol's story—but at times when the Carol's story can come up in the background, but I think I'm just looking at subtlety in practice. And I'm looking at saññā. And I'm looking at vedanā. And I'm looking at how things come together. And I'm just seeing the emptiness and seeing awareness. But somehow, it seems like I see the clinging come, I see it go, and I think I'm mindful of it all, but it's feeling like it's getting more and more tight in some kind of ball or something, right? And it feels like I'm mindful. It's not spacing out. I can't see why, so I'm trying to see. "It's like this now." Like what? Well, there's clinging. I can really see—she completely takes me into whatever's going on. "It's like this now," without trying to analyze, without trying to see what.

Because with that awareness—this is Sumedho again—awareness does not get involved in the sankhara. You know, sankhara, the mental formations, everything that's going on. Awareness isn't trying to figure them out at all. It's radical. You relate to that quality, but we're like, "Okay, it's like this now. How?" It doesn't matter. You don't need to know. Is it clinging or is it aversion? Who needs to know? Who wants to know? "It's like this now." No, I have to know that, right? I have to know how it works. If I'm caught in clinging and I don't know it, I'm going to get caught more and I better see it. "It's like this now." Tightness, boss.

And that awareness isn't getting involved in sankhara. No need to fix the self.

No need to improve the sankhāras. No need—this is Ajahn Sumedho again—no need to do anything. "It's like this now" is again taking refuge in awareness. Sumedho calls awareness the escape hatch from saṃsāra, from birth and death. So in that moment, he's calling that moment—"it's like this now"—an escape hatch from saṃsāra. Saṃsāra, the wanting, the spinning, the trying to figure it out. Just, "Ah, it's like this." In that moment, nothing's born and nothing dies. That's what he's talking about.

I find it, at times, really hard to trust that radical surrender. And so we have talked here about when awareness is available but we're not so completely absorbed, when it doesn't have so much momentum—the times when the trust is easy. But it isn't always that clear. And the trust isn't always so easy. We think, "Ah, it's like this... but I've got to figure this out. This awareness is so feeble. What awareness?" And then we're off on it.

So to really determine, as Ajahn Sumedho says, to trust awareness in those moments—this is really what, in a way, is strengthening the habit of freedom rather than the habit of identification, forgetting the self.

I just want to acknowledge that it's a really delicate balance between recognizing the emptiness, the non-personal, conditional, contingent nature of all of our emotions, all of our conditions, all of our personality patterns—not just some of them, all of it—and what's sometimes called spiritual bypassing, or delusion. "Oh yeah, right, I know what that is." Subtle pushing away. This is something I want to mention so we can have an awareness of it and explore it in our practice. I'm not saying I have the last word. I just want to make a couple of comments about that.

In terms of recognizing the emptiness, the conditional nature of any strong emotional experience, that doesn't mean not feeling it. But it means it's not an identification, it's not resistant, we're not caught up in the "all about me."

One of my favorite quotations is from Dilgo Khyentse about this:

"Thoughts and feelings have no intrinsic solidity, form, shape, or color. So when a thought, a feeling of anger, arises in the mind, in the heart, with such force that you feel aggressive and destructive—is anger brandishing a weapon? Can it burn things like fire, crush them like a rock, or carry them away like a violent river?"

He's not talking about the body acting. He says, "No, anger, like any other thought or feeling, has no intrinsic self-existence, not even a definite location in body, speech, or mind. It is just like wind roaring in empty space. So instead of allowing wild thoughts to enslave you, realize their essential emptiness."

We feel it, but we just let the wind roar in empty space. That's really kind of how it is. "When you can see through the hatred within, you discover there's not a single enemy outside." I just like that line—the wind roaring in empty space. Really seeing that.

Recognizing the non-personality, the emptiness—it doesn't change what's occurring. Emptiness is a mode of perception, a way of looking at experience. It adds nothing to and takes nothing away from the raw data of physical and mental events. So it's really present with what's going on. We may get information from it. We may not. But you can tell it's not bypassing, it's not delusion, because you can see there's that quality of wise attitude. There's a kind of brightness, an interest in the mind. It's not contracted. It's not closed off. We can start to recognize that.

The bypassing can be obvious, just illusion. "No, I don't want to feel that. That's not happening."

Denial is an amazing force. Have you ever noticed what an amazing force it is? For example, say you get into a relationship, and then some years later it ends. When it ends, you think, "Wow, look at all those qualities in that person." And if you think about the things that led to the ending, if you really think about it, you knew that. You knew that from the first week—those things were obvious. It's really amazing. It's totally amazing to me, the power of denial.

So it's tricky. We're not always going to see through it. The bypassing can look very similar to genuine mindfulness, but there's this quality—it can be gross or much more subtle—of just a little bit of pushing away. The difficult thing or the habit pattern comes up and we're sort of mindful of it. You could name it all. Like when I was describing the self-hatred, I could name it all. But if it had been bypassing, it would have been, "Okay, I know all that. I don't need to go there. Let's do something else." The quality in the heart-mind, the quality in the awareness wouldn't have that brightness. And it wouldn't just automatically vanish—it would just kind of push it away and go somewhere else. It can be a very, very subtle habit of aversion, of not seeing.

This is where I think we're starting to see through this—if we are, because we flip back and forth in this kind of bypassing or subtle denying—where our steady mindfulness and all our years of practice in all the different traditions we do, where we're not picking and choosing, only paying attention to what we like or what feels valuable. The steadiness of awareness gives us the power of what the British writer George Orwell called "the power of facing unpleasant facts." I think that's a huge liberating aspect of our awareness practice. It just gives us the power of being present with unpleasant facts. And this is where spiritual bypassing or just pushing away a certain pattern—we don't quite see it because we aren't quite resting in that unpleasant fact.

A simple example: I was on retreat, a self-retreat in Switzerland, staying in a friend's apartment near the meditation center where we teach. It's kind of up in the mountains—lower mountains in Switzerland, about four thousand feet, not really mountains, more like hills, but pretty. I was walking on the road, just a regular road with farms around, and I was aware, nothing special going on. A lady came approaching me, and she had some kind of pamphlet or something in her hand. She came up to me and said something in German, which I can understand some of, but my mind goes into a kind of panic when someone addresses me that way. I didn't get what she said—I could only construct it later—and she's showing this thing to me.

Immediately I saw a lady with a pamphlet and I went into this whole thing: "This is like Jehovah's Witness, and they're trying to pull me into something." And I responded, "I don't understand, I don't speak German." And I went away with this aversion, just like that. It happened in no time, just the habit coming. The sense of it being unpleasant, her coming at me with the thing. I associated it with Jehovah's Witness, I didn't want to deal with her, it was unpleasant. So I pushed the whole thing away—get out of here, lady—and I walked off.

Then one second later, I reconstructed what I thought she had said, and I think she was asking for directions. Definitely wasn't Jehovah's Witness. And I felt really bad. But I saw—I really appreciated it—because I could see, even though this awareness came in after, I could see again how that whole pattern comes, and how I respond out of that.

And the response, if I hadn't been aware, the response is really, "I don't want to feel that discomfort of this person asking me for something."

I can feel that when you're driving and there's so many more people these days standing on the highways, on the intersections with signs that they're homeless, they're vets, they don't have jobs, they need money. And I mean, it's just heartbreaking. And I can see that same habit come up in my mind. I don't want to have to interact. I don't want someone pushing something in my face.

And so the bypassing, in a way, going with that habit is just bypassing being able to be with the unpleasantness of just feeling that awkwardness, feeling that discomfort. But awareness lets it be okay. You don't need to bypass. You can really have the power of being with the unpleasant fact. This person's putting this thing in your face. You think it's unpleasant. You don't even know. Can you hang out with that? Can you just hang out with that? And then we're not bypassing anymore.

But you see, it can be so subtle. "No, I don't need to do that. I don't need to do that. Go away." And we don't recognize that it's just a habit of avoiding.

Okay, that's all I have time for, so I'll just end by saying those are just some things I wanted to drop in about looking at the different ways of studying the self and forgetting the self and opening to be enlightened by the ten thousand things—meaning what I said Doug had said earlier: the truth is right where you are. Where else can you expect to find it?

And it doesn't mean we don't feel or don't care or lose our personality. I'm sorry to tell you. You just get like more who you are in some way when you know it's empty.

And so just with two quotations, let's finish. The line from T.S. Eliot: "Teach me to care and not to care. Teach me to sit still." In a different way, from a different angle. And sometimes it's even more deeply touching when it's not personal. It's not that we don't feel things anymore.

So I'll just end with my favorite haiku from Issa. He wrote this on the death of his young daughter. He said:

This dewdrop world is a dewdrop world. And yet, and yet.

That's how it is.

Thanks for your attention.

CHAPTER 177

Recognizing the Non-Deluded Mind

Carol Wilson · 55 min

In this Forest Refuge talk, Carol Wilson draws on teachings from Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche, Ajahn Buddhadāsa, and Ajahn Sumedho to illuminate the dual purpose of Dhamma practice: discovering the nature of the non-deluded mind while understanding how delusion operates. She emphasizes that nibbāna is not merely a distant goal but a natural condition—moments of coolness and freedom from kilesa (mental torments) that arise many times daily, often unnoticed.

Wilson explores the Saṃyutta Nikāya passages on the third noble truth and the famous teaching that the citta is luminous, only temporarily colored by visiting attachments. She examines the Dvedhāvitakka Sutta (MN 19), where the Buddha describes two types of thinking and offers practical similes: when kilesa are strong, we must be careful like a cowherd protecting crops; when the mind is wholesome, we can rest like that same cowherd under a shade tree, simply mindful.

The talk addresses how latent tendencies (anusaya) operate below conscious awareness, driving habitual reactions before we notice them. Wilson shares personal examples of how subtle craving hijacks attention, and offers skillful means for both situations—careful attention when caught in difficulty, and conscious inclination toward the peaceful and sublime when the mind is settled. She concludes with the Saṃyutta Nikāya teaching on directed and undirected meditation, inviting practitioners to recognize that contentment arises naturally through steady, non-interfering awareness.

There's a statement from Nyoshul Ken Rinpoche that I often use to preface what I'm talking about tonight. He says that there are two purposes to this dharma practice that we do: one is to discover the nature of the non-deluded mind, the non-deluded heart, as well as learning how the deluded mind works. Both of these are what's going on in our practice here.

Awareness recognizes the wisdom mind and goes back and forth between these two modes. Sometimes—maybe a lot of the time—we're recognizing how the deluded mind works. But equally, we're recognizing the nature of the non-deluded mind. Steady awareness with wise attitude and right view are equal support, the tool, the avenue for clear seeing and wisdom in both cases.

Sometimes the skillful means could be a little bit different depending on which modality is going on. That could be one of the reasons why people sometimes say it seems a little confusing—they know it's really not, but sometimes you say this, sometimes you say the other, and it seems like you're doing two things at once. Or neither one.

The nature of the non-deluded mind: this is from the Samyutta Nikaya, the Buddha talking about the third noble truth, the ending of dukkha. I just love this translation:

It is the complete fading away and extinction of this craving. Its forsaking and abandonment, liberation and detachment from it. The extinction of greed, the extinction of hate, the extinction of delusion. This indeed is called nibbana. And for a disciple thus freed, in whose heart dwells peace, there is nothing to be added to what has been done, nothing more remains to do. Just as a rock of one solid mass remains unshaken by the wind, neither the desired nor the undesired can cause such a one to waver. One is steadfast in mind, in heart. One who has considered all the contrasts of this earth and is no more disturbed by anything whatever in the world. The peaceful one, freed from rage, from sorrow, and from longing, has passed beyond birth and decay. That unshakable deliverance of the heart—that indeed is the object of the holy life. That is its essence.

I think it's so wonderful, and we should repeat that to ourselves every day. Not as a wanting or a goal orientation, but as a reminder. And not as some distant state, because I know that's said in a lot of superlatives—the complete extinction of all these things.

But how I want to talk about it tonight, and how we explore and recognize in our practice day to day, on or off retreat, is recognizing that the citta, the mind, the heart, is not a steady state. It's not a thing, a subject, that has objects as content. It's an activity, the process of cognizing, a flow of events. And as such, as everything, it is changing. Even "it" is not the right word to use because that makes it a thing. But this flow of activities is changing from moment to moment. This is how it is. And this is the only thing that makes practice, that makes liberation possible.

Thinking of it this way, it's not that the ending of craving is only some distant state, but there are many, many moments of heart and mind, recognized with awareness, when there isn't greed, hatred, or delusion arising in that moment of citta. As Sayadaw U Pandita says, a moment of mindfulness is a moment of freedom.

If we hear or think about or contemplate what I just read—this potential of freedom of heart—and are afraid that's going to put us into some goal-oriented clinging mind so better not to think about it, we're really doing ourselves a disservice. That's delusion. Really recognizing, as Ajahn Buddhadasa says, that nibbana, or freedom of mind, is a natural condition. The cool state of heart and mind without any kilesa, without any torments—this is a natural condition arising in all of us many times a day, often unnoticed, because it's just kind of cooled out. There's no big greed or fancy object to get entranced by or try to get rid of.

It's a natural condition that arises. As he says, without moments of this coolness, of these moments when there are no torments or kilesa identified with in the mind, we would die. We just couldn't live like that.

And so that means in any moment, as awareness is steady—and this is one of the wonderful things about steady awareness—these moments of purity of heart and mind, coolness, the mind of non-clinging: this is the deathless, namely the liberation of mind through non-clinging.

As Buddhadasa says, nirvana for everyone. It's a natural condition. Through steady awareness, we start to see more and more moments of this. But do we even let it in? Can we let it in? Do we even notice it?

A great deal of the awareness in our practice is more involved in recognizing the suffering aspect of the torments, of the kilesas—hopefully recognizing the suffering aspect. That's when there's wisdom in the mind. When there's not wisdom in the awareness, we're just in them, thinking, "This is really going to do it for me." But to start to see the power of the kilesas...

Once the Brahmin Jāṇussoṇi approached the Blessed One and said to him, "It is said, Master Gotama, that nibbāna is directly visible. In what way, Master Gotama, is nibbāna directly visible, immediate, inviting one to come and see, worthy of application, to be personally experienced by the wise?"

And he answers: "When, Brahmin, a person is impassioned with greed, with lust..."—and by "person" it just means that moment of mind. It's not like, "I'm a person who's impassioned with lust and that's who I am from now on." Just don't go there. A moment. "When the mind of a person is depraved through hatred, bewildered through delusion, overwhelmed and infatuated by delusion"—he gives that one a little extra emphasis—"then they plan for their own harm, for the harm of others, the harm of both." Basically, he says that when there's lust, hatred, and delusion, one cannot recognize one's own good or the good of another or the good of both. You just can't recognize what's true and what's helpful and what's good when the mind is clouded with these things. "But when lust, hatred, and delusion have been abandoned, then, Brahmin, one does not experience in their mind suffering and grief, nor plan for the harm of oneself or others. In this way, nibbāna is directly visible, immediate, inviting one to come and see."

So for us here, the invitation is to really continue exploring—because this isn't new information for any of you—to continue trusting in the steadiness of mindfulness, awareness with right attitude. But recognizing that sometimes it's really about seeing, recognizing, feeling, getting familiar with, trusting this coolness, this purity. Other times we're much more involved in reacting to—or hopefully, if there's wisdom, seeing how—the torments obscure the truth, the way things really are.

Both modalities have to be here. They support each other. And in fact, without some knowing, even if we don't know we know it, some experience or some intuition of this pure, cool quality of heart-mind that's unobscured, we wouldn't practice at all. It's like we know it.

There's that very famous quotation from the Buddha that speaks to this: "Luminous is this mind, luminous is this citta, brightly shining, but it is colored by the attachments that visit it. This unlearned people do not really understand, and so do not cultivate the mind. Luminous is this mind, brightly shining, and it is free of the attachments that visit it. This the noble follower of the way really understands. So for them, there is cultivation of the mind, cultivation of the heart."

That's what we're all doing here. There wouldn't be cultivation—you wouldn't be sitting here all these months and years—if there wasn't the knowing somewhere in there, the touching somehow. Many of you really know it, but sometimes we lose the trust that we know it. But it's there, this nirvana for everyone, the coolness of the heart, the mind that is free from greed, hatred, delusion. That touching—whether you call it radiance or just purity or just coolness—that freedom from suffering, that steadfast heart-mind that just for a moment isn't bothered by whatever's occurring.

And so our practice can have these two aspects: recognizing the moments of clinging, or hours of clinging, of the aversion, of the confusion—at times really caught, but then suddenly there's the wisdom, the recognition—and then noticing the absence, the dissolution, the cessation of that moment or hour of clinging. Really, with steady awareness, being present with that cessation, with those moments of coolness, really observing. And then with that steady state, you're bound to notice, awareness is bound to pick up, when the obscuring kilesas arise again—usually all too soon. Whenever it is, it's too soon.

This is really how it works. But for many of us, as we go on and on and can taste at times those moments of freedom, the times when you're just tuned into it—it's no big deal, but it's just so obvious that that's the way things are—in those moments of wisdom, the clinging really doesn't make sense. It's so obvious that it's based on delusion and suffering. And then it comes back again. Many people have described how you can feel the sense of the mind about to start clinging. You can tell. It's just changing a little bit in there. And everyone goes, "No, no..."

Get away. Get back. And it's already over by then. But still, we can see the mind doing that. This is how it works.

And in some ways—this is my opinion, not only my opinion, but it is my opinion—you could look at all aspects of the Buddha's teachings and all the aspects of our practice as really being about simply purifying, shifting these habits that arise in the heart-mind. It's just this nature, it's just habits. That greed arises so much, that aversion arises so much, isn't because it's an act of will. It's just the habit of how the mind has been working, how it's been responding. And in moments of not really much attention, that's what comes up.

But everything in practice is shifting those habits. You could say purifying, but really just shifting it from taking refuge in the greed, the hatred, the confusion, to this real trust of the coolness, the purity.

And I just want to say: every moment of this awareness with wise attitude, just meeting what's occurring without getting involved in pushing away or identifying, just meeting it—that is actually a moment of shifting the habit. Even awareness of greed, and the greed is really there, but there's moments of awareness back and forth. The awareness isn't greedy. Awareness isn't aversive. And that's a very different moment of response than the usual.

And because awareness is getting more and more steady, but it's nothing special—it's just really, as many people are saying and noticing, more ordinary—it's easy not to recognize that this is actually this quality, this kind of purity, this simplicity, this non-involvement in kilesa that's going on.

So, the skillful means—whether the awareness is really caught up in a lot of kilesa, or whether it's more steady awareness and there's more moments of coolness—sometimes the Buddha gives a little bit different instruction, and we do as well.

I just want to read a little bit from one sutta. This is in the Majjhima Nikāya. It's translated usually as "Two Types of Thinking." This is a long sutta with lots of little nuggets in it that we quote all the time, but I'm only going to focus on a particular one this time. It's the sutta where the Buddha is talking about before he became a Buddha, when he was doing his practice and he noticed two types of thinking—one unwholesome type and the other wholesome. The unwholesome would be thinking with, guess what? Greed and cruelty and hatred. Not delusion—delusion's part of all of it. And then the wholesome is, of course, the opposite of those.

So he was just noticing in his mind that the difficult states would come up, and what it would be like if he kept thinking about those—that it led to suffering and tiring. The wholesome states would come up, and if he kept thinking about those, he couldn't see any problem that would come from it. Except if he thought about it for a day and a night, no problem would come except his body might get tired. He's very practical.

So there are two different ways. He says that when he noticed that the unwholesome led to his own affliction—so when awareness noticed that, wisdom notices, "Oh, this is causing suffering"—because of the wisdom, that type of thinking subsided. But he was watching carefully. And he noticed that it leads to the affliction of others, the affliction of both, that it obstructs clear seeing and wisdom, that it promotes vexation. It subsided. So the steady awareness allows the wisdom to arrive that lets it subside.

But this is the skillful means he mentions. "Just as in the last month of the rains, in the autumn season when the crops are ripening"—he always gives all these agricultural metaphors—"a cowherd would look after his cows..."

He would be looking very carefully. He would tap and poke them, make them move this way, make them move that way. He's looking at them very carefully. Why? Because he's trying to keep them from wandering into the crops. He knows if they wander into the crops, they'll cause destruction. And not only that, he'd get in trouble—fine or public censure.

So the Buddha says, "I foresaw in unskillful qualities drawbacks, degradation." And so he was being very careful. Here he's saying we're careful with the awareness. He's not saying kill the cow so it doesn't get into the crops, but watching carefully.

This is really what we've talked about when we say just be with steady awareness, notice whatever occurs, don't get involved, there's no doing. But then we'll also say, when you recognize that the mind is really caught up in the kilesas, and the more awareness that's given to it, the stronger the kilesas are getting because they're really stronger than the awareness—then we give all kinds of suggestions: avert the attention to something neutral, brighten the mind, do something else. It's like being really careful. It's not running away from it, but it's not "okay, whatever happens." We're not saying whatever happens, just follow it. With wisdom and awareness, when there's wisdom in the mind, there's no need. But when the kilesas are stronger, that just kind of gives us a little clue: oh, that's going on. You don't hate it, but let's just have a little care in the attention.

But then he talks about when the wholesome states are in his mind. He said, "I noticed when thinking imbued with harmlessness, for example, has arisen, it leads neither to my own affliction nor the affliction of others nor the affliction of both. It promotes wisdom, lack of vexation. It leads to freedom. If I were to think and ponder in line with that for a night and a day, I do not envision any danger that would come from it except, as I said, it would tire the body. When the body is tired, the mind is disturbed. And a disturbed mind is far from collectedness." So he steadied his mind.

This is all just very practical. The simile he gives for this is about when there's wisdom, when there's wholesomeness, and the steady awareness sees that there's wholesomeness—then there really isn't anything you need to do. He said, "Then it is in the last month of the hot season when all the crops have been gathered into the village. A cowherd would look after his cows in this way while resting under the shade of a tree or out in the open. He simply keeps himself mindful of those cows. In the same way, I simply kept myself mindful of those mental qualities."

Do you get a sense of that? That's really a lot of what we mean when we say just be aware, noticing what's arising. Imagine yourself lying under the shade of a tree, watching the cows go by, watching the mental states, the thoughts come and go. You can see they're wholesome and there's no need to get in there and do anything. When it's like that, we'll notice when all of a sudden something comes flying up. And that's not a problem.

So we start to see how the kilesas obstruct, how they do their job to get in the way of just recognizing this simplicity, this coolness of heart-mind.

Ajahn Sumedho, in speaking about the third noble truth, the cessation of clinging, says a normal person doesn't notice the cessation of clinging or the cessation of most objects. Our attention tends to be too flighty, too jumpy. We're not really able to take boredom. We can't really take just a moment of nothing. We all know this, right? The mind jumps into the next thing. And especially these last years with social media and phones and this immediate gratification—it's really quite something. Just noticing.

You see it with kids—it's a million times worse. But I just notice it in my own mind. I'll be sitting, having a cup of tea, which I enjoy. It's like the nice point of the morning. And I can see, within a minute, my mind going... Let me just check—the phone's right there. Let me check this. Let me check the weather. What's the weather going to be tomorrow? I already checked it last night, but I forgot, you know. Or just something. And I can feel that flightiness, that restlessness, that subtle wanting of—what? It's nothing really, because the actual checking and looking at whatever it is, just keeping awareness going, I notice the mind gets a little bit tighter. Everything gets a little bit more constricted. Remember the maker of measurement—where it was really just kind of peaceful and open the minute before. But as a normal person's mind, it's a little bit flighty. It doesn't really recognize.

But as we cultivate steady attention, we do start to recognize—this is still samādhi—that what arises, ceases. We start to see, as Andrea was speaking about the other night, that everything is conditions. All the qualities that come and go in the mind are constructed phenomena. And with steadiness, we can see them arise—this is still samādhi—arise and cease in consciousness. With steady awareness, seeing this again and again and again: arising and ceasing, arising and ceasing. And we start to get—or wisdom starts to get—a little bit disenchanted with all this endless arising and ceasing.

Disenchantment doesn't mean—it's often translated with words like disgust or revulsion, something that has an edge of aversion. That's neither accurate nor helpful, I think. Disenchantment is a better word because the habit of the kilesas is to be enchanted with the object, with the reaction of wanting, or just the restlessness, or "give me something not to feel this subtle, unpleasant restlessness." We're enchanted with that. And with steady awareness, we start to really see how this works—the sense of purifying the habits of the kilesas, seeing how, as that quotation I read about the luminous mind, they obscure the purity, just the simplicity of ease.

This is from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche: "What then is meant by pure perception? The way we usually experience the outer world, our bodies, and our feelings is impure in the sense that we perceive them as ordinary, substantially existing entities. From this erroneous perception come the negative emotions which perpetuate suffering. However, take a closer look at all these appearances"—I don't mean peer; the steady awareness takes a closer look—"and you'll find that they have no true self-existence. From a relative point of view, they appear as a result of various causes and conditions"—that's what we were just saying, the conditionality—"like a mirage or a dream. But in reality, nothing that arises from causes and conditions has any true self-existence whatsoever. In fact, there is not even anything to appear."

I love getting into this real radical teaching. As it is said, one who realizes this emptiness of the self-existence of anything is the true sage.

Remember, moment to moment. It doesn't have to be all or nothing—that's when it can get discouraging. But recognizing in moments: this is the way things are. And for all of us, to really get interested. We don't create awareness—we recognize it. The steady awareness with wise attitude is shifting the habits, as I said.

So in terms of carefulness: when it's the middle of the rainy season and you don't want the cows to get into the crops, when there are kilesas going on and they're all too familiar and comfortable—

And there's enough wisdom and enough awareness-wisdom to recognize that that's going on. And we all know that. You'll be caught in it and then out of it, caught in it and then out of it.

But what we start to really see—and I don't know, to me this helps me, I don't know if it's discouraging to you, but it helps me—we start to recognize and continue to recognize, to respect the power of the habits of conditioning, of craving. And craving can be like the wanting or the aversion, this sense of identity, of identification with things.

Many of you have been mentioning in the groups and interviews, as the awareness is getting more steady, and experience is getting a little bit more subtle—you've been here a while now—people are seeing different habits, really more subtle habits of mind. Self-judgment, wanting, fear, whatever it might be. And then they say, "Oh, I recognize this from my life, but this is much more subtle." Seeing all these little things—this is really great, because this is starting to see when the subtle is operating.

In the beginning of practice, the big fears and aversions and greeds take us over, and they're really hard to be with. They seem so strong. But as practice goes on and we notice those more, you start to see—and this is what I really have so much respect for, it makes me interested—it's these subtle habits that are almost below the level of consciousness that are running the show when we're not aware of them.

Tara Brach gave the example of how the habits under the level of consciousness operate. When you're driving and changing lanes on the freeway, there's so many little things that go on in consciousness and perception and thinking and value and judgment. You're not naming each one. You're probably not even thinking about it. But there's so much happening, kind of under the level of consciousness. Sixty miles an hour, five lanes, and you're doing all this stuff. It's kind of amazing. If you tried to think about all of it while you're doing it, you'd probably have a wreck. It's too much.

So it's like that—the habits are under there. A simple example: you're sitting, and there's a pain in your knee. You think, "Well, I'm just going to be with it." And the next thing you know, you've moved. Not that it's right or wrong to move, but it's more the sense that conscious mind is saying, "Oh no, I'm not going to move from aversion, I'm just going to be here"—and the next thing you know.

I remember one time I was sitting on a long retreat in my room over at the retreat center, just doing my own thing, not the schedule. I was sitting in a chair, really in there. I wasn't just thinking about something—I was really in there, noting, noting, noting. And all of a sudden, I was at the door with my hand on the knob, thinking about cake. It woke me up so much. How did that happen? It's just under the level.

So it's great when we're seeing it here. Respect that. Because this is what happens in our daily life, doesn't it? When you go home, or to your partner, there's some issue that's really hard. I used to go home to visit my parents, and you think, "Well, I'm really not going to get sucked into the dynamic this time." Have you ever tried that one? "No, I'm going to go and just be filled with metta." And you mean it. It's a sincere, conscious intention in that moment. Unfortunately, you can't string it over. And the unconscious is so subtle and so quick. So you walk in, the mother or father says one thing, and it's off to the races. And you say, "Oh..."

But this is just how it is. So we still keep on trusting the steady awareness in these situations at home, and I'll talk more about that next week. Here's the same thing—really seeing how it works. Understanding this is called the latent tendencies for lobha and dosa, greed and hatred, to arise. Not the really gross ones, but given a particular set of conditions—one of which would be just not quite having awareness at that level of subtlety—that habit will arise. It's kind of latent.

That doesn't mean no matter what happens it's going to arise, because then there would be no point in practice. But it's understanding why. Why, when I thought I was really aware, suddenly there's greed and I'm at the door thinking about cake, and that's like a tenth of a second. Not to get into a whole, "Oh no, I'm bad, I wasn't mindful." It's like, wow, isn't that interesting? Look at that.

But in the moment of awareness, with my hand on the door—oh, look at that—awareness and wisdom noticing it, that awareness-wisdom didn't feed the greed. And it wasn't aversion. Aversion also feeds the same kilesas. It was just, "Oh, look at that." So right away, with the steady awareness, the wisdom is there. It's not that we need to fear it. In the seeing of it, even a moment of greed coming out of latent tendencies and mind-lessness becomes the catalyst for wisdom, for clear seeing, for a moment of coolness, of non-clinging.

To experience the peace, the coolness of the heart and mind that's free from kilesa—it doesn't mean the externals have to be beautiful and nice, with only nice things coming up in your mind and body. It doesn't at all. We see the drawbacks of the kilesas, but that doesn't mean the conditions have to be perfect.

In fact, I personally find, and people have mentioned this too, that often it's in the more difficult times that—especially now that we've been practicing a lot, everybody here—in the difficult times it can kind of wake us up to say, "Oh, okay, this is the place to really take refuge in awareness." As Ajahn Sumedho says, really determine to bring awareness, to trust awareness.

I know times when there's something physically very difficult going on and the mind wants to either go unconscious or find some way to distract, or there's a subtle aversion. And the last thing the habituated mind wants to do is say, just really drop into this with total awareness. It's like this now. Although from a hundred thousand times in my life, the thinking mind knows that the way in is the way of freedom. It knows that. Not freedom from that unpleasant experience—freedom from the kilesas that are obscuring that quality of ease, of coolness, that isn't bothered just for a moment by whatever is occurring. As I was saying this morning, my body may be afflicted, but the mind doesn't need to be afflicted.

So as much as we know that and recognize it through the steady, non-interfering mindfulness, we still have to sometimes take a breath and remind ourselves: yes, refuge in awareness. Just because the subtle tendencies of kilesa are so strong—not because we're somehow hopeless, useless meditators. That's the habit of kilesa speaking. We just have to remember to shift the habit. And every moment of steady mindfulness is shifting it.

As we see more of the drawbacks of the kilesas, we're less seduced by that unrecognized belief that craving is taking us in the way of happiness, that aversion and pushing away is taking us in the way of ease—as if we could be separate from this difficult and unpleasant experience. The more we recognize that, the more steady the awareness gets when we're just lying under the tree, being present with what is. That sense of becoming disenchanted with the ceaseless coming and going of objects, of kilesa.

So that's the way the aspect of practice that is understanding how the deluded mind works leads to the abandoning of craving, the abandoning of identification.

But also inspiring to me is that it doesn't have to only be that we endlessly focus on the kilesas to get rid of them. There are also times when the kilesas aren't strong. When there is that peace, we can consciously incline the attention, incline the mind in that direction.

There's a quotation I was reading in The Island. I could read that again and again—that compilation by Ajahn Amaro and Ajahn Pasanno of quotations from the suttas dealing with awakening. All different kinds of quotations, and you get great sutta references. This particular one speaks about just this: nibbida, disenchantment, losing one's taste for. You just lose your taste for it. You know that example of a dog that comes upon an old bone, and he's all excited, chewing on it.

But the bone is so old, there's not one drop of anything in it—no marrow, no nothing, just an old, dried-up thing. So the dog chews it, and then, "Ah, there's nothing here," and just goes away. It's not hatred or disgust. It's just losing one's taste for it.

So that's from seeing how the kilesas work, seeing the constant coming and going of conditioned experience—we lose the taste for it. But as well, and this is something the Buddha said, at other times when we're not so engrossed in kilesa, a bhikkhu—and bhikkhu can mean anyone who's practicing—can reflect thus. It's like inclining the heart, the mind, to the deathless. Not thinking about it, but just recognizing, "Ah, this is peaceful. This is sublime. That is the stilling of all activities, the relinquishment of all acquisitions, the ending of craving, disenchantment, nibbana."

Bhikkhu Bodhi notes that this is a reflective contemplation. But I found it to be something subtle—just not always being so engrossed in the kilesas, in the impurities, in the coming and going. Just that sense of peace, coolness. This is sublime. As Buddhadasa says, generating a contentment with emptiness.

At first, we don't so much have that contentment. At first it's a sense of, okay, it's like putting down the bone, but then what? We're still a little bit used to wanting things.

There's a very famous quotation from Ajahn Sumedho about this—very famous in our little Vipassana Buddhist circles. He says: "Try to think about knowing the unconditioned, knowing the deathless. Would that be interesting? You might think, 'I'd like to know God or Dhamma. It's going to be incredibly fascinating.' So you look in your meditation for that kind of experience. You think that getting high is getting close. But the unconditioned is as interesting as the space in this room. The space in this room—is it interesting to look at? Not to me. The space in this room is like the space in the other room. The things in this room might be interesting or uninteresting, good or bad, beautiful or ugly. But the space—what is it? There's nothing you can really say about it. It has no quality except being spacious. So one recognizes space only by not clinging to the objects in the room."

When the clinging stops, when you let go of the absorptions, judgments, criticisms, and evaluations of the beings and the things in the room—when that isn't arising—you begin to experience the space of it. But mostly we're so involved in the absorptions and the judgments about everything: the beings, the space, the room, the mind. When there's no grasping, and there's just the space within which things are arising, that's that place. Someone was saying we often don't recognize it—the mind gets restless, too flighty. But here we do start to notice it, and we don't just have to stay bored with the space.

This really did inspire me—recognizing just that moment of peace, nothing special going on. And you might just, as a little skillful means, incline toward it: "Ah, this is sublime. This is peaceful." Not "Oh God, I've got something." But just letting it in—that sense of the peace, the coolness that isn't reacting off of anything or creating any sense of me in relation to anything. You don't think all that stuff. But you're kind of noticing what that feels like. We get more tuned into that quality in the heart, in the mind, in the awareness.

I'm using words that are all too gross, but it's kind of like purity. A friend of mine described it as feeling squeaky clean. Just squeaky clean. There's nothing there—just that awareness with nothing extra.

A lot of times when we have little moments like that on retreat, and off retreat too of course, but it's easier to notice on retreat—in the past, I would think about certain moments that were so vivid, but I would attribute it to the circumstances. It was beautiful weather, I had finally finished worrying about whether I was going to get a new job, this little lizard went by and it was so lovely, the people were so nice. You remember it in the context. But I would tend to give too much credit to the context, to the conditions, not recognizing that the sense of happiness or peace or freedom—whatever way your particular mind stream would name it—that is just the quality of that purity of heart-mind, and it's nothing to do with what the conditions are.

So that can be experienced—not so easy, but say in the midst of a bad headache, just for a moment. Yeah, it's easy.

OK, it's easier. It's easier when it's a beautiful day and you're outside and the peonies smell good and you're not sneezing from pollen. But maybe not. Maybe that's actually what sucks the mind into "isn't this wonderful."

But anyway, the skillful means, as the Buddha was teaching, is just that we can recognize and incline the mind to appreciating this—to the wholesome, to the heart-mind that isn't colored or distorted by kilesa.

I want to mention one other sutta from the Buddha where he's again giving two ways of giving attention. And this is, again, when the mind is pretty steady, as we're talking about now—not lost in gross kilesa. He's teaching that it can be skillful to brighten the heart-mind.

I like this sutta because it starts with Venerable Ananda taking his robe and bowl and going to a settlement of nuns. He's going and meeting with a group of nuns. Ananda, by the way, in the suttas is the friendly monk that we can more easily identify with. He makes mistakes. He's really friendly. He's very supportive of the nuns all through the suttas.

So he's approaching the nuns, and they say to him, "There are a number of nuns here who abide with our minds well established in the four foundations of mindfulness. Their understanding, their wisdom, their freedom is becoming ever greater and more excellent."

And he says, "So it is, sister, so it is."

Then he goes and tells the Buddha about this. He's basically talking to the Buddha about these nuns, these women, who are really well established in the four foundations of mindfulness. It's very steady. Their wisdom is growing. Their compassion is growing.

And the Buddha says, "Yes, very good." And as a monk or a nun abides contemplating—and he gives the four foundations—the body as body, feelings as feelings. Just in the simplicity of like under the tree, just a body. Just aware of the body, just to the extent necessary to know there is a body. Aware of feelings to the extent necessary to know there are feelings. This is this subtle, steady quality of mindfulness.

Still, in that time, it can happen that a bodily object or bodily distress arises, or as one translation says, a fever of kilesa might arise in the body, or sluggishness might arise in the mind, and either of those might arise and scatter the mind outward.

So he's saying, even when the practice is getting much more steady and refined, yeah, hello, this can happen.

And he says, so then the bhikkhu could direct their mind to some inspiring sign, some inspiring image. Basically, this is to direct the attention to something wholesome. This is where this sutta is called "Directed and Undirected Attention."

The mind gets scattered outward by some fever of kilesa in the body, some sluggishness in the mind. And so he said—this is what we've been saying as a skillful means—refresh the awareness. It may just be moving to something neutral, but here, when it's much more refined, we can really consciously tune into the wholesome.

So for example, "This is sublime." That's been really working for me lately, like a reminder. That's so peaceful, just the mind of non-clinging.

But it may be aspiration, as I mentioned the other day. It may be an image or a memory of someone who really inspires you, or an insight that you had.

I know when I'm in Burma, many of the nuns that we visit—sometimes for many of them, their main meditation practice is Buddhānussati, which is reflecting on the qualities of the Buddha over and over and over. Now for me, that particular practice doesn't particularly inspire me. But being with them when they're doing it, the faith and the brightness that practice brings up in their minds—that faith and brightness then does inspire me.

So I can call up some nuns I know and just get a sense of their faith and brightness. And then that's like a sense of the wholesome. And the mind gets collected again.

And he's saying, from this happiness, joy is born. With a joyful mind, the body relaxes. A relaxed body is more content.

The mind of one content becomes more collected. So the bhikkhu then reflects, "The purpose for which I directed my mind has been accomplished." In other words, the mind is balanced again. I withdraw attention from that particular wholesome object. I no longer think about it, no longer pay attention to it. And inwardly mindful, I am content.

That's directed meditation—skillful means, even when our experience is quite subtle.

And what is undirected meditation? Not directing one's mind outward or to any specific thing, one knows, one understands: "My mind, my attention is not directed outward, not focused on before or after, free, undirected." And one understands, "I abide being aware of body as body, ardent, fully aware, mindful. I am content."

I just love that. This is really what we're practicing when we say "just the steady awareness, just to the extent of knowing what's occurring." And knowing that that's what's happening—I am content. Nothing to want, nothing to get rid of.

So we have these two ways. With the steady awareness practice, sometimes we need a little more care. You see the kilesas coming, they're too strong, so you think, "Okay, a little more attention." Not knocking them away, but a little more taking refuge in awareness. And maybe you need to shift attention to something else. But when it's more steady, you don't need to do that anymore. The mind is aware. Just whatever's occurring—no before, no after—I am content.

This is really our practice. And as Ajahn Sumedho says, the practice of freedom is awareness. Just one moment, one moment, one moment.

Thank you for your kind attention.

CHAPTER 178

Big Sky Meditation

Carol Wilson · 43 min

> In this guided meditation, Carol Wilson offers a practice rooted in the recognition of awareness itself as vast, boundless, and sky-like. Drawing on imagery that resonates with both classical Buddhist teachings on the nature of mind and contemporary contemplative approaches, she invites practitioners to simply rest in open awareness while observing how all phenomena—sounds, sensations, thoughts, and emotions—arise and pass like stars and clouds moving through an infinite sky.
>
> The meditation systematically deconstructs the sense of a solid, bounded self by releasing identification with the body's usual coordinates: no arms, no legs, no head, no inside or outside. Instead, sensations appear as "points of light" flashing into awareness, thoughts move like shooting stars, and emotions gather and disperse like clouds. Throughout, Wilson emphasizes that the mind naturally knows and contains all experience without being made up of it or affected by it—pointing toward the Buddhist understanding of awareness as luminous and empty (suññatā).
> This practice cultivates the quality of spacious awareness that supports insight into impermanence (anicca) and non-self (anattā). It offers a restful yet profound approach particularly suited for retreat settings or times when a practitioner needs to release effortful striving. The meditation concludes with a traditional sharing of merit (puñña), dedicating the beneficial energies of practice to the awakening and peace of all beings everywhere.

Let yourself sit in a way that is comfortable. Just relax into being present, same as always. It is helpful if your eyes are gently closed.

In a very easy way, imagine the mind—or awareness, consciousness, whatever word you want to use—as vast as the night sky. Just sitting here, really wide and open. Notice any sounds, any hearing that arises and passes. There is no need to go towards it or make anything of it. Just sounds arising and passing in the wide open space of the mind.

Sound, silence—it is pretty quiet here. But just relax. Wide open space. Hearing just comes and goes, like stars in the sky. No trying to hear. Just imagining the vast night sky of mind. Sounds appear and disappear in the vast sky of mind.

The mind is vast, wide open, no boundaries. Sounds arise and vanish by themselves in this wide open space. There is no inside, no outside. Just sounds, hearing arising and vanishing.

Physical sensations arise and pass by themselves, like points of light shooting into the vast night sky of mind. Points of light arising, passing. Sounds come and go. The mind is vast, limitless. No borders or boundaries. Sounds come and go. Sensations like points of light. They arise and pass, but the mind contains them without being made up of them.

There are no arms, no legs, no front or back, no head. Simply sensations, points of sensation, points of light, arising by themselves, passing in the wide open sky-like nature of mind.

Sounds come and go. Sensations flash into the sky like points of light. The nature of mind has no boundaries, no center. Sensations and sounds flashing into existence and passing away again in the wide open space of mind.

Thoughts flash through like shooting stars. The wide open mind contains these things, recognizes them, but is not affected by them. It contains all experience but is not made up of that experience.

The mind is vast, wide open. It is, but it has no self-existence, no limits, no boundaries. In this wide open space, sounds come and go. Sensations like points of feeling arise and pass with no particular location, just flashing into awareness and dissipating again. Thoughts come and go like stars moving across the sky. Experience is known by the mind quite spontaneously.

Moods, emotions, feelings come together like clouds drifting across the sky and come apart again, all arising in this vastness of mind, recognized. The mind knows all things but is untouched by them.

This wide open sky-like mind. Sensations come and go like points of light. Sounds spontaneously arise, vanish. Thoughts like shooting stars through the wide open emptiness of the mind. Moods and emotions move like clouds. There is no center, no boundary. No head, no body. No near or far. Just sensations, sounds, moods, thoughts arising spontaneously, known spontaneously, vanishing spontaneously.

There is nothing to do, nothing to change or fix, and no one to do anything anyway. Simple things arising and passing in the wide open space of mind.

May the beneficial energies of our practice be shared with all beings everywhere, in all realms. May it be a cause, a condition for their awakening from suffering and confusion. May all beings live in peace and with compassion.

CHAPTER 179

Awareness and Wisdom

Carol Wilson · 50 min

> In this opening retreat talk, Carol Wilson addresses a question that arises for many practitioners: how can the simple practice of moment-to-moment awareness possibly counter the forces of hatred, fear, and confusion in the world? Drawing on the teaching of Mahā Ghosānanda that 'all the landmines in the world have been planted by the landmines in our own hearts,' she illuminates how understanding—not willpower or aversion—dissolves the roots of suffering.
>
> Wilson explains that the Buddha's path begins and ends with sammā diṭṭhi (right view)—the accurate recognition of experience as it actually is, rather than through the distorting lenses of craving and aversion. Using the simple analogy of a child learning to match shapes, she demonstrates how confusion and frustration naturally fall away when we finally see clearly. This same principle applies to our deepest patterns of reactivity: when recognized accurately, they simply don't make sense anymore.
> The talk explores how unrecognized greed, hatred, and delusion—particularly the habit of taking everything personally—shrink our world and perpetuate suffering. Wilson emphasizes that this practice isn't about trying harder or fixing experience, but about relaxing into receptive awareness and letting life reveal itself. She shares the inspiring example of a man who lost his wife in the Christchurch mosque shooting yet responded with profound wisdom: 'We are one people.' This transformation of heart and mind, available in each moment of clear awareness, is the liberation the Buddha offers—not escape from the world, but a complete change in how we understand and respond to it.

Sometimes I go through periods when the things happening in the world, the news, just seem to hit me harder than usual, overwhelming me for whatever conditions are present. There's always something happening, but the cycle of fear and hatred and violence, fear and hatred and violence—the big picture we see and the small individual picture—sometimes I can feel quite overwhelmed by it. I imagine I'm not the only one.

The last few weeks were a time like that for me. Occasionally, when I'll be coming on retreat during one of those times, my mind will engage in samsara questioning: How can this commitment, this practice of steady awareness leading to wisdom, possibly match and counter the force of delusion, hatred, fear, and anger in the world? How can it possibly be met? Not whether it's useful, but how can it possibly be stronger?

Actually, in a way, I kind of like it when these questions come up for me because then I take a deeper look. I really reaffirm in my own experience, in my own mind and heart, the power of the awakening heart and mind, the power of the wisdom, the clear seeing that arises from this practice of steady awareness.

What I appreciate about re-recognizing—not rediscovering, it didn't go away—is that this force of truly understanding things as they are, not just intellectually but kinesthetically in our gut, is the power that really transforms our own hearts and minds. I like that I keep reconnecting with that rather than just assuming. Assuming is never the way of awakening. What's happening right now? Look and see. Look and see for myself. Look and see for ourselves. Is this a path? Is this a practice that's actually leading to less pain and suffering and hatred and fear and anger in your own heart and mind? Because that's the place where this practice works.

One of my favorite quotations is from Maha Ghosananda, a wonderful Cambodian monk and peace activist. He was speaking at a conference in D.C. about landmines—you know, there are landmines sprinkled all over the world, many in his home country of Cambodia from the time of the Khmer Rouge. He said that all of the landmines in the world have been planted by the landmines in our own hearts. To understand and thus remove the landmines in our hearts is the way to remove them in the world.

To me, that's one way of saying the essence of the Buddha's teaching, certainly what we can undo, explore, and come to see. This isn't about believing it intellectually—you can think all kinds of things. It's really looking and seeing: What are the landmines in my heart? How are they created on a moment-to-moment basis? How are they dissolved on a moment-to-moment basis?

As Maha Ghosananda said, through understanding, landmines in our hearts are dissolved. Through understanding—not through willpower, not through hating and digging them out, not through saying, "Okay, that's it, I'm never going to be angry again." Have you ever tried that? Does it work? It would be good if it did, but it doesn't.

This is what I want to talk about tonight: how amazing the power of this simple, receptive, moment-to-moment awareness is—awareness that seems like so nothing. The way Alexis was talking about it this morning: just notice you're seeing. Notice I'm seeing? Go around all day noticing I'm seeing and this is going to liberate my heart and mind from suffering? I don't know about that.

But luckily, here you are with nothing else to do. We make it that way on purpose, really, because if you had anything else to do, if you don't have a trust built from your own experience in this, you'd go do the other thing. I'm sure you've tried many things today, most of which probably weren't that interesting—for a while. When you're reading the ingredients on the toilet cleaner, you know you're sinking.

Just notice reading. That's all you have to do. Just notice reading. Wanting. Incredible boredom. That's awareness. That's awareness.

You can't get away from it.

But the Buddha, in his awakening, was speaking about the wisdom, the understanding that frees our hearts and minds. It may seem that this practice is a turning away from all the conflicts, all the difficulties, all the pain in the world. Certainly, as we come to a secluded, supported, relatively safe place like this, we are very privileged to be able to be here. That's not a put-down—it's something we can genuinely appreciate.

But as you see, as we were saying last night and perhaps this morning as well, all the ups and downs of life are going to happen here. Each of us, even though our personal, familial, and cultural histories may be different, each of us is a microcosm of the human condition. And so what we see in the world—this seeming cycle of confusion and fear and violence and hatred—there's also a lot of goodness. It doesn't get as much airplay, but you can find it if you look. We're a microcosm of that.

What we are setting up in a retreat, in our whole life of awareness practice—the Buddha is saying that what he's offering us isn't an escape from the facts of the world, or from connection with people, or from relationships. He's saying that what frees our hearts and minds from suffering is understanding things as they actually are.

The Buddhist path begins and ends with wise understanding, or right view. The first step of the Eightfold Noble Path is right view, but then it's really more like a circle. You move through sīla, appropriate non-harming behavior, through meditation, cultivating energy and mindfulness and collectedness of mind, and then it comes back around again to right understanding and right intention. It keeps deepening and spiraling.

What I love about the translation "right view" is that in a way I find it very literal. Viewing, recognizing our experience accurately—as opposed to our ideas and assumptions about what's happening—is actually what frees the heart and mind. The wisdom that arises from accurate recognition is what frees us from the suffering and confusion brought about by the habits of reaction. We're reacting to something we're not even recognizing accurately, so we respond in ways that are inappropriate.

The Buddha, in his awakening, when he came to understand and free the heart and mind, awoke and lived in the same world. So if we're waiting for the bolt of lightning—there was a lot last night. Did it do it? No, here we all still are. If we're waiting for the bolt of lightning to take us into an alternate universe of happiness and freedom, give it up. There's not an alternate. Maybe there is, I don't know. I have a friend who's going on about black holes, showing me pictures and trying to explain them. Maybe there is an alternate universe if you go through a black hole. I have no clue. But that's not what the Buddha is offering us. We don't have to do that. He woke up in the same world. But recognizing it accurately—that's what changed.

So when we understand the landmines in our own heart, that understanding, that accurate recognition, is the wisdom that allows for the habits of mind to release from responding with anger, with hatred, with greed, with self-judgment. This is the liberation of heart-mind that the Buddha's teachings offer us.

Remember, I read from the Dalai Lama the other night: so much of our unhappiness originates within our own minds and hearts, in how we react to the events in our life. That's very much to the point. The suffering the Buddha is talking about, that we can explore here on retreat—even if it seems small, or you might even say insignificant if you want to put yourself down—but it's not helpful to call your suffering insignificant compared to that in the world. The mechanism is the same.

This is what we can truly understand: that the suffering which arises from this moment in our own mind and heart, from how we're perceiving and responding to experience—the suffering arises in this moment. And the freedom from it, the dissolution of the suffering, the compassion and the wisdom, also arises in this moment, in this mind and heart.

The suffering is not because circumstances are as they are. And awakening from suffering doesn't change all the circumstances externally. It's not going to. But it does affect a complete change in how we understand and how we respond, both internally and externally.

We can't simply decide that from now on we're not going to act out of anger. To some extent we can, and that's where the precepts are helpful. We come up against certain strong impulses toward harmful action. Even then, sometimes the energy of anger or greed can be too strong. But often the precepts will bring us up against a wall, and we see what's going on in the heart and mind. "Oh, I don't want to do that." That's great. It's as if the precept is letting wisdom come in and say, "Oh, that's a harmful thing—don't do it."

But the anger might still be arising, right? Yet it's not just about external action—it's also this wisdom of accurate recognition. And that's all it is. Accurate recognition really changes the heart and mind.

As Martin Luther King said, in talking about nonviolence, "Nonviolence means avoiding not only external physical violence, but also internal violence of the spirit. We not only refuse to shoot a person, we refuse to hate them." That's really the internal place that all of our practice is bringing us into, again and again, moment after moment.

Because just thinking about it, without the experience of really recognizing things as they are—in my mind, it can be easy to think that when these horrible things happen, of course the normal response is anger, fear. Well, that is the normal response. That's the habitual response. But is that the right and appropriate response? What else could be possible?

And then there's someone like Dr. King. Or actually, I was quite inspired a couple of weeks ago. I was listening to the BBC, and they were interviewing people a day or two after all those people in New Zealand were killed in the mosque. I don't know how they do it—they go and interview people who survived it, like the next day. I don't know how you can do that. But anyway, it was very inspiring because they were talking to a man. It seemed like he was an elderly man who had been in the mosque with his wife. And his wife died in the attack and he didn't. They described him in a wheelchair—she had been his caretaker. And they were talking to him maybe two days after his wife had died.

You could hear him talking. He just sounded amazing. He said, "We are one people." And he didn't mean just the people who were worshiping in the mosque. He meant everyone. It may have been just New Zealand or it may have been the world, I don't know. But he wasn't just talking about the people in the mosque. He said, "We're one people." And he said, "Perhaps someone who acts like this, like the killer, is hoping that there will be retaliatory violence from Muslims." But he said, as far as he's concerned, that's not going to happen. "We are one people. We need to change within ourselves to be able to live together."

How can someone have that depth of clarity and connectedness to be able to respond in that way? It's possible. This is really very inspiring to me. It's possible. And this is, you know, one person, one person, one person. It doesn't end all the hatred, but this is where we're starting. This is really what the Buddha is offering us: the same world, recognized differently.

Starting from our own experience, really with interest—look and see what's going on. It's so elegant. When we recognize accurately—all of the responses of confusion or wanting or whatever—they don't make sense anymore. So they just drop away.

Let me give you an example of what I mean. It's very simple, one I've been using a lot recently, because it's simple but it really illustrates how this works. It's about my young nephew when he was really young, when he was two or three. Now he's old—he's five. Just watching how kids learn, you know.

This is a simple example with those old toys where they have a box with wooden blocks in the shape of circle, square, triangle. And then you have a big wooden box with holes cut in those shapes. The kids just learn to put the blocks in. We say it's not rocket science. But first a kid, you know, you show them and it looks so easy. So they think they can just pick up the block and put it in. But he's not differentiating circle from square from triangle. So he's trying to put the circle in the triangle and it doesn't go. He tries again to put the triangle in the square—it doesn't go.

Different kids based on personality respond differently. But I could see the sense of confusion leading to frustration, leading to a kind of antsiness. If it was an adult trying to do it, the thoughts could be things like, "What's wrong with me?" Turning the frustration inward. "It looks so easy for them. What's the matter with me that I can't do it?" Or more like, "There's a secret the adults aren't telling me. What is it?" And you can just see the frustration building. It doesn't work, it doesn't work, until you just want to throw the thing against the wall and go do something else.

But keep trying and all of a sudden something clicks. The triangle goes in the triangle. And it's like, "Ah, that just seemed like an accident." But all of a sudden something clicks and they see the shapes and they see how it works and it's just normal. It's just a law of nature. It's not like they suddenly had this brilliant change. It's just seeing, "Oh, that's how it works."

And all the frustration goes away, because it doesn't make any sense. It doesn't relate to the actual experience at all. The sense of "I'm stupid" or "they're not letting me know what's going on"—all of that's gone. Okay, yeah, you put the triangle in the triangle. That's just the law of nature, like gravity. And so you stop trying to put the triangle in the circle because that doesn't make any sense. And then, of course, you get bored and move on to something else—but that's extra.

You get a sense of what I mean. That's what we're talking about with right view. That's insight. Oh, it's like that. All my excitement and upsetness and thinking I've got to get angry—that's just because it doesn't relate. This is how it is.

This is the right view that the Buddha is offering us. When we recognize ourselves as we are, moment to moment. Not a big concept, but what's happening right now in this moment? What's actually happening? Not what I think is happening or how I think it ought to be or how my breath ought to be or how it ought to feel if I'm aware every moment—just what's happening now. Oh, sitting, reading the toilet cleaner, boredom. That's what's happening just right here, right now. And you know what? In that moment of awareness, just resting in it, it's totally okay.

You're thinking, "Yeah, right." But no, it's totally okay. In that moment: "Oh, this is what it is now." And all the wanting and the comparing and the looking for something else just drops away. We see that what was making the problem isn't that the experience isn't giving us enough—it's that the heart, the mind, the consciousness in that moment is so covered over, distorted by wanting it to be different, by trying to make something happen, by comparing to some feeling we had in the past. And we're not even recognizing that this is going on as a kind of overlay upon simply just being here in this moment, fully present with things as they are.

So this beginning to explore what's really going on is the power of this simple, steady, moment-to-moment awareness—mindfulness.

Mingyur Rinpoche said once that if we want to be happy, we need to recognize what causes and conditions lead to well-being. And similarly, if we do not have a clear understanding of the conditions that create suffering, how can we possibly expect to be free from it, to free ourselves from it?

The understanding he's talking about here, again, is not thinking, "Oh, what do I need to make me happy? Let's see—if my body didn't hurt and if I had a new car and I had a better job and there was peace in the world, then I would be happy. Or if at least I could go to bed early, I would be happy." Those are just ideas. Just ideas. The understanding he's talking about is the simple, clear, and accurate perception, recognition of what's happening now—not being in contention with reality. That's mindfulness.

One definition of vipassana meditation, I think this is from U Tejaniya: vipassana meditation is experiencing the mind and body directly from moment to moment with the right understanding. Does that sound familiar, like what we were exploring today? Experiencing the mind and body directly means just this simple awareness, relaxing into experience, just being here with it. Directly—not through the veil of how we think it ought to be, or how it was yesterday, or whatever I like or I don't like. Oh, it's just like this now. It's just like this now. Just feeling the sensations, just noticing seeing is happening.

It seems so simple, so nothing. But the steadiness of this—and it's the steadiness that's the key—starts to reveal just how life is working, the cause and effect of how things are happening. We start to recognize for ourselves.

If all it takes to really feel some liberation from the landmines in our hearts, to be present in a moment of life fully, without feeling in contention, without feeling self-judgment, without it being such a struggle, without needing it to be other—if it's so simple that all we have to do is just recognize what's occurring, why is it so hard?

Because it's simple. And it's really difficult, isn't it? Difficult not in the sense of you have to try harder. Because trying harder... trying harder generally means a sense of wanting to have a certain thing happen or wanting to have a certain thing stop happening. So we try harder. Wanting, wanting, wanting. Get away, get away—I'm trying harder. Aversion, aversion. This is exactly what blocks and obstructs our resting at ease with clear awareness. It's what obstructs accurate recognition. It's what obstructs really awakening.

Not that wanting can't arise, not that aversion can't. It can arise, it can be recognized. But unrecognized—that's really where we get into all these reactions. Like the young child throwing blocks across the room. Really, the frustration and the aversion is unrecognized, and that's what's cultivating the response. That's what keeps us confused, what keeps us from recognizing what's happening.

From the Buddha: "This liberation, this nibbana, is visible here and now." To what extent is it visible here and now? To the extent that greed, that hatred or fear, that confusion are not present in the heart-mind, are not clouding, are not obstructing our clear presence. When we don't recognize these states, they run the show.

And you can be trying really sincerely, with full effort. And you're mindful of what's happening. You're walking. Let's take walking. As I think Mark said this morning, you can be walking and feeling every single sensation—sixty sensations in the lifting of your foot. That can be done with wisdom, or it can be done with incredible wanting and striving and pushing. You feel mindful because you're present, but what's being missed—the elephant in the room—is how much wanting and forcing is going into that. At the end of a period of walking, you feel like your whole body is just going to break in two. Sometimes I'll notice my tongue is glued to the roof of my mouth.

I feel the sensations, I'm present. What's the problem? But oh, there's a little wanting going on here, not quite noticed—the attitude in the mind.

As the Buddha said, when the heart-mind, the citta, is filled with or obsessed with wanting, greed, or aversion, or ill will, and we don't recognize it, we can't see our own good or the good of another or the good of both. We can't recognize accurately.

And so it's not—we think, "Okay, I'm going to really get rid of greed," and we start hating greed. That's not really the point. It's more like looking and seeing: how does it work? Greed is just another aspect of nature. It's a habit that's been cultivated in the heart-mind. It makes sense. This is pleasant, let me get more of it, because that's the avenue to happiness—that's what we've learned. It's just cause and effect. This is unpleasant, let me get away from it, because it's miserable to be with the unpleasant. Who wants to be with pain? If you can get away, of course you should. But that aversion part is extra. We don't recognize that, and so it distorts. We don't quite know what's going on.

There's a funny, simple example of how that works. I think it was from Andrea Levine. She spoke about how you can't trust your mind—you can't trust your perceptions when they're distorted by greed or aversion. If you can recognize it, that helps. So she gave a simple example: You're eating a big piece of chocolate cake, and there's another big piece, and your mind goes, "Come on, have another piece. It'll be really pleasant. You'll really like it. It's good for you. Have another piece. You deserve it." So you eat the other piece, at which point you're not feeling so well, and your mind goes, "I wouldn't have done that if I were you." We think it's the same mind, but that's what craving does—it tells us it's going to make us so happy. So you just can't trust it.

We need to start recognizing that these mental qualities are just habits, forces of nature. We're just nature like everything else. When they're present and unrecognized, they keep us spinning in confusion. It can really start from just a little "I don't like that sound," all the way up to being caught in rage or fear or terror. It can go really quickly.

And the greed and the aversion—this not wanting to be with what's happening, wanting it to be better—the strongest or most familiar cloud of delusion, the way they show up, is that sense of it all being about me. I don't know if you can relate to this at all, but just the sense of taking whatever's occurring personally.

And that can be just noticing this. Don't take it personally that you take it personally. It's like, "Oh no, I'm doing it again." That's another habit of mind. The thing with steady awareness—remember, awareness isn't picking and choosing. "This is okay to pay attention to. Oh, this is ugly, I don't want to see how much I'm identifying with stuff. So let's pretend it's not happening. All beings, may all beings be happy." No, no, no. Just see what's really happening. Awareness is just interested.

And watching how it all works—that's where the wisdom and the freedom come in. So watching how this sense of taking it personally arises and what the effect of it is, just in small things.

What do I mean by that? Just the sense of, as we're going through the day, there are all these things happening. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, all the different physical sensations. And how many thoughts and moods and emotions and images have come in this day? Millions. Every moment something's arising. I'm really pretty sure—I'd say I'm one hundred percent sure—your mind didn't take every single one of those personally, because it would really be unbearable. Unbearable.

Because when we take it personally, it either is me, or it's mine, or it's happening to me, it's doing it to me. The whole world comes to be about me, and it really just shrinks everything.

So, for example, there's a sound that's unpleasant and it's occurring over and over. That's just what's happening. But when there's that sense of "that sound is affecting my practice, that sound is upsetting me"—then immediately the mind either goes into "I should be able to just be equanimous with it" and gets negative toward oneself, or it goes into "This is a meditation center. They should be a little more in control. Their heat shouldn't make noise. The lightning shouldn't come. The rain—they should have fixed the gutters ages ago so that we wouldn't have to sit in the meditation hall and listen to all this noise. What's the matter with them?"

And it can go on and on. If you're here on a three-month retreat, sometimes we used to have these wars over the windows. How much are they open? How much are they closed? It's just endless. But that's all about me. I shouldn't be hot. I shouldn't be cold. They should make it better. It just complicates everything.

And we really believe that story. It shouldn't be. How can they fix it? It's their fault. It's my fault. How can I get more? And we don't even recognize it. We get completely entranced by the reactions of mind. At some point, we're not even noticing it's an unpleasant sound anymore. We're way down the road—I mean, it might be literally way down the road—but you're way down the road of "how can it be fixed, what's the matter with them, I should have gone to this other place," whatever it is. And seeing how it shrinks our world.

This is from the Dalai Lama. Because we're paying attention, the steady awareness is really being with our own experience all day, we really are giving a huge amount of attention to seemingly me. So of course we're going to be noticing how much the sense of me taking it personally comes up. But keep watching. Keep watching. Don't stop watching.

The Dalai Lama: "The paradox is that although the drive behind excessive self-focus is to seek greater happiness for yourself, it can end up doing exactly the opposite. When you focus too much on yourself, you become disconnected and alienated from others. In the end, you also become alienated from yourself. With too much self-focus, your vision can become narrow. And with this, even a small problem appears out of proportion and unbalanced."

Maybe you haven't been here long enough to experience this, but there is a phenomenon that occurs on retreat—and occurs off retreat too, but I'm talking about on retreat—that we call "yogi mind." Around day two, day three, it starts to happen.

It's normal, this sense of taking things personally. Something pleasant or unpleasant, a small thing, gets really exaggerated. It becomes so important that you find yourself needing to write a note to the cooks with this incredible vehemence.

I got a note once when I was a cook here long ago. It said, "If I never see another wheat berry for the rest of my life, that would be for the good of all beings." And it was signed "Mettā." These notes are always signed "Mettā." And I believe the people who write them really think, "I am writing this for the good of all beings. If you ever serve this again, I won't be responsible for the other yogis' mind states." Actually, a teacher said that to us once: "If this is served again, I won't be responsible for the mind states of the yogis out there."

Or you burst into the office demanding, "Don't you have this particular kind of cold care in the yogi needs closet?" with this incredible vehemence. We call that yogi mind. The world is shrinking, and it becomes all about me. Whatever's occurring is all about me.

Joseph Goldstein tells a great story—simple but great—about how this works. He was on a retreat, in line for the meal, maybe second in line. Big pots of soup with the covers still on. The person ahead of him took the cover off and dropped it. You can imagine the racket it made, everyone looking. And he says his first thought was, "It wasn't me." You want to stand aside and announce, "What's with me?" That's what our minds do when the world shrinks like this. That's what happens with this sense of taking things personally. And that, again, serves to strengthen the habits of fear and aversion and greed, because we think that's what makes us happy.

We'll talk more about how these patterns work in the coming days. But here's the thing: you don't have to try to get rid of any of this. This is the beauty, the simplicity, of simple moment-to-moment receptive awareness. Because if you heard Alexis this morning, we're not trying to make anything happen. We're not trying to get rid of anything that's happening. We're just trying to see, to be with this moment's experience as it is. Let life reveal itself. Let life tell its own story in the light of this simple, steady, moment-to-moment presence.

It's so much less we have to do than trying to fix. How can we fix? We don't even know what's happening in the first place, and then we're trying to fix it to match some cockamamie idea we come up with.

Basically, bottom line—maybe I'm wrong, and you'll look and see for yourself—but generally, if you're trying to fix it, you want it to be more pleasant. Just look and see. Don't believe me, but look and see. When you think of being free from suffering, does that include any more unpleasant experience? No, right?

We were just talking today about suttas where the Buddha starts to give a talk, then turns to Ānanda or Sāriputta and says, "My back is hurting. You finish the talk—I'm going to go lie down." Did you ever think of the Buddha having a backache? He had a body, right? The body keeps doing its thing. It doesn't stop. That's not the suffering the Buddha can free us from. The body is still going to grow and decay and get sick. Things are still going to happen in the world.

So if we're trying to get in here and fix our experience, if we're using awareness practice to try to make our experience better—well, in my experience, that agenda keeps slipping in more and more subtly. Don't blame yourself when you notice it. Just check: "I'm being with what is." Is there tension? Is there struggle? Check it. "I'm being with what is... but it would be a little better if it was like that."

Once I was practicing in Burma, having been there quite a long time, doing walking meditation. I was just being present, aware, and it was fine. Awareness was pretty natural, easy, nothing spectacular. But I noticed this little niggling sense, a subtle feeling of struggle or something.

Sometimes it's helpful to take a moment and actually see what's the thought, what's the expectation lurking in the back of the mind. Sometimes it's helpful to bring it up into the light of day, because when you see it, you go, "Oh." This one was: "It could be better." That was the thought. Just a little bit of striving, pushing—it could be better. What could be better? I don't know. I didn't know. It. Something could be better. Walking up and down could be better. Really?

But without recognizing that, there's wanting. It's wanting, it's like this now. Because what we're developing, what we're cultivating, what we're coming to trust—this refuge—is the simplicity and totality of receptive awareness. It's like this, whatever's occurring. The seeing, hearing, smelling, thoughts, thinking, whatever's happening—that's the catalyst to re-recognize awareness. Any moment, whatever's occurring, knowing it's happening: here's the awareness again.

This starts to become more interesting, more enlivening than deriving our sense of happiness, unhappiness, and personal meaning from whatever particular experience is arising. Notice how much we might think, "Oh, it's going well now because my body's not hurting and I'm really enjoying this food," or whatever it is. Or, "It's really going badly now—there's this sound and there's aversion and there's a tingling and people are moving." But there's actually really steady awareness. That's fine.

The steady awareness, this mindful awareness, the simplicity and honesty of that—just relaxing into whatever's presenting itself due to causes and conditions. We never know what's going to arise in experience in the next moment, do we? You can plan it all out, but we sit down and you never know what's going to arise in the next moment of a sitting. Do you? I love it when I've been on retreat long enough that I sit down and it's like, "Okay, what happens next?"

Our whole life is like that. It's not just a sitting. Whenever you stand up thinking, "I'm going to go walk," and the next thing you know you're sitting in the dining room drinking tea. How did this happen? I thought I was going to walk. Awareness kind of took a holiday and didn't notice all the different motivations coming and going.

All we want to do is just relax into this moment with the simplicity and honesty of awareness, and let life tell its own story. It's so much easier than what we can imagine. But the awareness, the sense of awareness—it's nothing fancy going on. It's almost ephemeral. But like when Alexis asked, "Are you aware of seeing or not?" and you could know you were aware of seeing after he said it—that difference between seeing and not being aware of it and being aware of it is palpable, but really subtle. It's like almost nothing, but it's something.

How do we trust that enough that it can actually be the condition that leads to the wisdom that transforms our understanding of ourselves and of life? That really transforms the habits of our heart and mind from confusion and self-interest and fear and greed to wisdom and compassion. That allows us—like that man in the wheelchair in New Zealand, whatever his natural response—to actually be able, in a moment, to have a sense of more of the connectedness of all of us and not just our own particular story.

The effect of living in this fullness of awareness, just being with what's happening in the heart-mind in this moment, is really the condition that leads to liberating wisdom.

I want to share an experience with a friend I was visiting a couple of years ago. She's an elderly woman in her nineties, a very long-term and deeply serious practitioner with a great deal of wisdom. Her life had been extremely rich and varied and full, all kinds of experiences. But now the body was frail. The mind was still clear, but the body was frail, and she was living in assisted living. Her life had become extremely confined—maybe she could go out of the facility once in a while if her daughter took her, but mostly she stayed in the apartment.

And she said—we were just visiting, she'd been a really deep Dharma practitioner for years—she said, "You know, this is the most interesting time of my life."

I said, "Really? How so?"

She said, "Well, it's just like when I'm walking across the room to go put the tea kettle on. That's everything." She didn't say it this way, but she's so present. Walking across the room, that's all of life right here. There's nothing else. It's so alive. "And when I'm pouring water into the tea kettle, it's just so interesting. It's just all of life right here."

And this wasn't an intellectual thing. This was a deep message from her heart. I could see it's really all of life in that moment, so present in that moment. It's not about the activity that's making her feel interested and alive. It's the quality of the pure heart and mind that isn't lost in stories of me—that in that moment isn't distorted by wanting things different or thinking it could be better. It's just total wakefulness. There's a quality of purity, you could say, in the heart-mind, just not clouded by these confusions.

And it doesn't take some incredible thing in life to be alive and interesting. It's the quality of present moment awareness. Steady, steady, steady. This is really what our practice is.

And just let the knowing, let the wisdom arise by itself. It will. It's a fact of nature, cause and effect. Just like if you plant a seed and water it and there's sunshine—the right conditions—it grows. Nothing we do. Steady awareness without picking and choosing—that's what's so important. Letting all these difficult and beautiful things come and go and being really present, watching it with interest. Reality reveals itself.

And the natural effect of wisdom is that wisdom cultivates, inclines towards the beautiful, the wholesome qualities of heart and mind. The suffering qualities don't make any sense. They become irrelevant. And so they're abandoned in that moment.

I want to end with a couple of quotations from two very different Burmese teachers. One is from Sayadaw U Tejaniya: "As mindfulness, awareness, is remembered more and more frequently, gradually it develops its own momentum. We come to appreciate moments of awareness more than we appreciate our entrancements and reactions with whatever the mind is noticing." So we appreciate the awareness more than the reactions.

This is from Sayadaw U Pandita: "When mindfulness, when awareness, is persistently and repeatedly activated"—which is just simply remembering, that's it, repeatedly activated—"wisdom arises. There will be insight into the true nature of body and mind." This is not an act of personal will. You don't have to make it happen. It's just a natural law.

So relax, settle back. What's happening now? That's our job. This moment, and then the next moment. Then we forget for five and a half hours. Then—oh, what's happening now, right now? That's all. Just not being in contention with this moment.

Thank you for your kind attention. Let's just sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 180

Perception of Impermanence Stabilizes Understanding - Aniccā

Carol Wilson · 55 min

In this profound talk, Carol Wilson illuminates how accurate perception of impermanence (aniccā) serves as a gateway to liberation. Drawing from the Buddha's teaching that when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated, it eliminates all sensual craving, craving for becoming, ignorance, and the conceit of 'I am,' she explores why this single recognition holds such transformative power.

Wilson examines the three characteristics of conditioned experience—aniccā (impermanence), dukkha (unreliability), and anattā (not-self)—showing how they interweave. She discusses saññā (perception) and its distortions, explaining how our habitual perception of permanence keeps us in contention with reality. Using vivid examples, including the story of Ānanda weeping at the Buddha's approaching death, she illustrates our natural human tendency to recoil from change and seek refuge in pleasant, familiar experiences.

The teaching emphasizes that insight arises not through intellectual understanding alone, but through the three levels of wisdom (paññā): hearing (suta-mayā paññā), reflection (cintā-mayā paññā), and direct development (bhāvanā-mayā paññā). Wilson points to steady, non-preferential awareness as the key that allows accurate perception to arise naturally, revealing the momentariness of all experience. She concludes with Ajahn Sumedho's insight that true stability is found not in achievement but in being awake, and reads poetry by Issa and Hafiz that beautifully captures the tenderness of fully embracing impermanence.

So we've spoken quite a few times about right view. Alexis described it some more now—the sense of just understanding in the beginning of our practice that we're simply perceiving nature without taking it personally, without adding an assumption on top of it. But in another way, right view simply means recognizing things as they are already, living in alignment, understanding in alignment with life as it actually is.

Right view, as it continues to cycle and grow with wisdom—wisdom is simply recognizing accurately what's occurring, as we've said. Steady awareness is what leads to, is the condition that allows for this clarity of wisdom to arise.

What I want to talk about a bit tonight is what the insight is, what it is that right view recognizes. This is not new information to anyone who's been practicing, on the intellectual level. But of course, right view, the real cellular understanding of things as they are, is not just on the intellectual level. So we keep on bringing awareness to whatever's occurring.

What is it that wisdom recognizes? There are different ways it could be talked about. Tonight I want to talk about it in terms of how the Buddha described all conditioned experience as having certain characteristics. All conditioned experience, without exception, has the characteristic of being impermanent—anicca—constant change and flow. Of being dukkha, the word in Pali, meaning unreliable, unsatisfactory, nothing one can place one's trust in as a way to happiness or peace. It will always disappoint. And anatta—that no conditioned experience has an intrinsic sense of self. There is no steady self. It's about all things, but of course, what we care about is me. So there's this quality of not-self.

These three qualities are just how things are. It's not that as wisdom develops, suddenly the world shifts and everything starts to change, whereas before it was steady state. It's not that the nature of insight is, "Oh, now that I've moved through that black hole into the alternate universe, everything's unreliable and shifting and not-self. Before, it was really solid and didn't change. It just somehow—I wasn't happy about that."

The nature of insight comes back again to the literal meaning of right view: accurate recognition. The nature of insight actually begins with perception, with the shift of perception.

Perception, saññā in Pali, refers to a very specific state of mind—that quality of whenever there's a sense contact, like hearing, the mind has a recognition of it. Hands clapping. It just happens. It's not right or wrong. It just happens. We're not trying to stop it, but we can recognize it happens. It's based on memory. If you've never heard that sound before, the mind might not know it's hands clapping. But the habit of perception, what the mind tends to do more often than not, is make something up. Rather than, "Oh, I don't know what that sound is," the mind goes, "Oh, that's such and so." It may be right, it may be wrong. So even a very simple perception like that can be inaccurate, and we don't know unless we come back and look carefully.

Some inaccurate perceptions are very simple to recognize. But the perception of impermanence, the perception of the unreliability and unsatisfactoriness of particular experience, the perception of not-self—these are not so easy to recognize.

The Buddha talks about it as inverted perception, the distortions, the hallucinations of perception. So much of the time, the perception of impermanence isn't there. We may even think, "Sure, I know everything's impermanent," but our perception is actually pretty solid. I look at that zabuton. I'm not thinking about it, but I'm not seeing change going on there. My mind, without thinking, assumes that's the same as it was yesterday, the same as it's going to be tomorrow. There's this whole assumption of permanence without even recognizing that's going on or questioning it.

Reality doesn't change, but insight starts with perception. The shift of perception into alignment with how things are is really the movement of insight. Perception is so important because it doesn't just stop there. The Buddha talks about the distortions of perception, or accurate perception, and how perception gives rise to citta—how we think about things.

And then that gives rise to diṭṭhi, or view—wise view or inaccurate view. So perception gives rise to thought, which gives rise to view. "This is how it is." We think this is how it is. And all the accompanying thoughts and moods and actions arise from that, just in the blink of an eye.

A simple example. I was reminded of this by Alexis's experience two nights ago with the chirping, which hopefully didn't happen again. So it's a story Joseph told—I'm allowed to tell it, but it's his story. Very possessive, dharma teachers are of their stories. Although it didn't happen to him. I mentioned it at the table and he goes, "That's my story." I said, "Well, I heard you give a talk where it wasn't only my story, it actually happened to me, and you were using it and you didn't ask me." So, payback time. This is what goes on. It's really highbrow stuff.

Anyway, this couple—and we can't remember who it was, so I hope there's no one in this room because we can't remember who it actually happened to; it was a long time ago—a couple of our friends moved into a new house, and they were settling in, and then they started hearing this little chirping from the basement. It sounded like a little nest of birdlings. Isn't that sweet? And they'd hear the chirping. "That's so sweet." This went on for a couple of days, and the thoughts—so nice—and all the happy emotions, all this stuff going on.

After a couple of days, they thought, "You know, it's a little too regular. I don't really..." So they actually went down and looked, which can help. And of course it was—Alexis is chirping—it was the fire alarm thing. Chirp, chirp, chirp, chirp. So then that was accurate recognition. And all the thoughts changed, and all the moods changed, and all the story around it changed. Deflated, unhappy. It wasn't like the end of their life, but everything around it changed, just from the perception becoming accurate. You get a sense of that.

So: perception to thinking to view. And then once there's a view—"Oh, it's like this"—we have views all the time. Once there's attachment to it, and most of the time we don't even recognize it's a view, never mind that we're attached to it. We won't say, "Oh, it's a view that that chirping sound is birds, and I really love it." It's like, no, that's what it is. That's basically how views are.

So when we're talking about perception—accurate perception or inaccurate perception—inaccurate perception takes us into the realm of looking for ease and happiness in experience that's changing, that's unreliable, that has no steady, stable self-core, and then not understanding why it isn't working. Why doesn't saṃsāra work? Because we're looking in the wrong way at the wrong thing.

So just to go into this a little tonight, I want to pick anicca, because I could talk all night about each of them, and to try and do all three at once... let's just stick with anicca. They all come together anyway.

The reason experiences are unsatisfactory and unreliable is essentially because they're constantly changing. And the reason that there's not a steady, stable self is because there's no steady, stable nothing to be a steady, stable self. So it's really kind of just roped around together—three angles of the same reality.

So I'm just going to talk about impermanence. This is from the Buddha:

Bhikkhus—which really means practitioners—bhikkhus, when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated, it eliminates all sensual craving. It eliminates all craving for becoming—for becoming any particular state, any particular experience.

It eliminates all ignorance. It uproots all of the conceit, all of the view of "I am."

This is shorthand for complete awakening—those four things. The perception of impermanence, when basically really deeply known, uproots, eliminates, dissolves the craving and the confusion that comes from the view, the conceit, "I am."

Well, that's a pretty powerful statement, in my opinion. Really powerful. And it's not saying you've got to go out and get rid of it. It's just coming back to the power of accurate perception.

And probably I could just say this next point, and that could be the rest of the talk. What do you think gives us accurate perception? Have a guess. Based on what we've been talking about ad infinitum this whole retreat—steady awareness. Steady awareness reveals what's already so.

Okay, that's enough. Go do it.

Basically, it is. Everything else I'm saying is just intellectual information to kind of encourage you to be willing to keep coming back into steady awareness and exploring why we don't. And it's not because we're recalcitrant and stupid—just because of the habits of mind. That's a powerful statement, the power of perception.

I pick impermanence also because on an intellectual level, of those three characteristics, I think for most people the concept of impermanence isn't really rocket science. I mean, the fact that everything comes to an end at some point—is anyone going to dispute that? Yeah, I get it. We get it. We think we get it.

But remember—do you remember?—that Alexis mentioned three types of wisdom, three levels of paññā, you could say. And they're all important. They work on different levels.

So one, what he talked about as heard—information, data that's coming in. On that level, I'm talking about perception of impermanence. That's information coming into your mind. And it's useful. We know we can't really learn without hearing correct information. It's useful to us.

And it circles around in our own experience, our own mind. It kind of deepens to the next level of cintā mayā paññā—thinking about it, not just analyzing, but kind of owning it, feeling it, noticing change, for example. It's not just disconnected information. We're really understanding it, thinking it through. But it isn't yet really transformative.

And the third level, bhāvanā mayā paññā—bhāvanā means mental development—I would say that's the insight level. That's the level I'm talking about of insight, of like a shift. It's like, "Oh!" You know, that aha moment when something really changes, something really shifts. Like I talked about the little kid with the blocks. Remember that night? "Oh, that's how it works!" It's a shift of perception that immediately leads to a change in how we think and the view. And that's the level of insight. That's what's transformative.

And it's not like you just have one insight and it's all over, okay? It keeps on going, keeps on going, keeps on going. Because as much as there's that—say the perception of impermanence is suddenly really deep in that moment, wow—there are moments where you just, not even thinking, it's so clear there's nothing stable and solid. And half an hour later, you know, that's all gone and it's really solid again.

That's not like you did something wrong.

But how fast the mind moves! A new mind moment arising every moment, and we're back to the perception of permanence—permanence, permanence—it keeps being fed. Without what? Right, without steady awareness. We fall back into the habits.

So yes, I've been pointing to this lack of steady awareness, or awareness kind of checking out. And that's assuming we're interested in awareness in the first place. Without it, in normal life, we're not even really looking at things. We're just assuming our perceptions are accurate, and we get all ruffled and confused.

But here, where we're starting to bring steady awareness, what are some of the aspects—and there are many—but just some that I want to highlight? These are natural habits we all have that may condition awareness to check out, for us to look in the other direction.

One is the fact that it's so much a habit to place our sense of what's going to make us happy or peaceful on some kind of stability, on some particular experience—either getting it or having it. It can be something really beautiful and important: a relationship, family, the job we have. Just that you can walk outside and the earth isn't going to rumble and move. We can walk out thinking it's more or less peaceful here, that at the moment we're not in a war zone. Whatever it might be. Or just the fact that my back isn't hurting and it hasn't hurt—may it never hurt again! Holding on to that for dear life, but not quite recognizing that we're doing so.

The habit of moving toward or feeling comfortable in the pleasant, trusting in what's familiar, finding the place where we feel we can let down and relax and feel at ease—does that make sense? Can you relate to that? It's rare that we go, "Wow, this really feels awful. Let me relax and feel it." We've been saying that, right? But it's not our natural tendency. The natural tendency is to recoil in the face of unpleasant or difficult experience. Just that habit of resistance and aversion to the unpleasant, which we've talked about.

Remember, Alexis mentioned in his talk that sutta about the dart. Everybody, whether awakened or not, experiences pleasant and unpleasant and neutral experience. That's just happening to all of us. The difference between one who's at peace and one who's not is that the one who's not gets reactive around the unpleasant. And the Buddha said the only escape a normal person knows—one not on a path of waking up—the only escape such a one knows from unpleasant experience is to crave after something pleasant.

So it becomes a habit of mind, he says: resistance and unhappiness underlie the experience of unpleasant. And that craving, going toward something pleasant as a way to escape the unpleasant—that becomes habitual. You can see this being acted out in our mind and experience so much of the time. I want to say all the time, but nothing's all the time. Except impermanence is all the time. But all the time, it just is, of course.

This is unpleasant—let's go to the pleasant. We're not saying you should run from the pleasant to the unpleasant. But the Buddha is pointing out: knowing no other escape. That's so poignant to me. That's so sad. Because that escape isn't an escape. That's what keeps us bound in the cycle of fearing the unpleasant and wanting the pleasant. And because both of those are impermanent, unreliable, and without intrinsic self-existence, that pleasant one can't do it. So then we go to the next pleasant, the next pleasant, the next pleasant—and that's the whole cycle.

The real reason we're saying on retreat, "Okay, it hurts a little bit, don't run away right away," is because there is an escape, but it's not just going to the pleasant. The escape is the shift into wisdom that comes from accurate perception. The effect of accurate perception is that the mind-heart releases the clinging. It really knows, "This isn't going to do it," and just releases the clinging. It's not an intellectual thing. And that's the escape. The escape is the release of the clinging, the release of the aversion. It's not getting into happy pleasant-land.

It doesn't happen.

So anyway, I think one of the common experiences that happens when we don't quite recognize or accept the naturalness of impermanence, of change, is this sense of recoiling from the unpleasant. Even with the big movements of impermanence—even though of course we know everything at some point goes away, every car is going to fall apart, every meeting ends in parting, as the Tibetans say—we really know we're all going to get sick and die, as is everyone we know and love. Just on the first knowledge level, right? But still, when something ends, it's sad. It's painful. The sense of loss, the sense of pain, the sense of "this shouldn't be happening."

And so this natural habit of recoiling, of resisting the unpleasant—it could manifest as denial, it could manifest as rage, but for sure we're going to feel sadness at loss. But sadness is often experienced as an unpleasant experience, right? So there can even be a recoil from the sadness.

What I've found in myself, and in talking to people, is that this sense of not recognizing or just being at ease with things going away—even though obviously they've gone, you can't really deny it when something's gone—but there's a pulling back from the sense of loss, the sadness, the grief, as if that's a problem. And this is where, again, the escape isn't to get rid of the sadness. It's just that sadness is okay. That's part of our being human. That might be part of what's going to arise on the emotional level in a time of something we care about falling apart, going away.

We don't have to—if we have enough steady awareness, this kind, non-preferential awareness—okay, sadness is like this. It's okay. It's just part of being human. All the emotions are part of being human. The awareness can keep on being here, and you'll see the sadness itself changes. When we pull back, it kind of freezes things, and we're back in this sense of contention with things as they are.

And just to say, this is part of humanity. There are different stories in the suttas, but the one I really love the most, quite famous, shows that this was the same back in the time of the Buddha. It's the story of Ananda, who, as most of you know, was the Buddha's cousin and loving attendant for the last twenty-five years of his life.

Ananda was a very personable person. In the suttas he's kind of like someone you can relate to—he's not a completely awakened being, so sometimes he makes mistakes. He says something that isn't exactly accurate, and the Buddha will go, "Not so, Ananda." And you think, "Oh great, I can be like Ananda!" But he's extremely kind. He has incredible memory—he could remember every single discourse he ever heard the Buddha give. And he made a deal with the Buddha when the Buddha asked him to be his attendant. One of the things he asked for was that if he wasn't present for a discourse, the Buddha would give it to him again later so he could remember it. So if you're ever reading the suttas, the suttas that start "Thus have I heard"—that's Ananda's voice. Thus have I heard, and then he goes on with the sutta. Just to give you a sense of a real person.

So anyway, in this one story, the Buddha had announced to his Sangha that he was going to pass away in three months. And then he's sitting talking to the monks and nuns, and he looks around and says, "Where's Ananda?" They all said, "Well, Ananda's gone back to his hut."

There's an image that Andy Olendzki, who was the director of the Barre Center for Buddhist Studies and a Pali scholar, told me about later. They weren't visual images at the time of the Buddha, but much later it became a known image in Buddhist imagery: Ananda leaning against the frame of his door, weeping, weeping, and saying, "Oh, how shall I go on? The teacher who's been so kind to me, the teacher who's so wonderful, who I've been with all these years, is going to leave, and I'm still a learner with much to do." Just weeping from sadness. It's just so human, right? I love it.

So the Buddha, of course—"Okay, get Ananda, come on Ananda, come back." And he says—and you can't tell the tone from reading it—but he says, "Ananda, haven't I told you? Everything that comes together, when the conditions change, must go apart. How can it be otherwise? It cannot be otherwise."

But then he goes on to actually cultivate wholesome qualities in Ananda's mind state at that moment. He says, "You've been so many years so faithful, so generous, so kind. You have all these really wonderful, generous qualities. Really recognize them, and don't worry."

You're on the path, and you'll wake up.

So he's not like, "You stupid jerk, Ananda." He's like, "Ah, you know, it's so sad. But really, look at all the wholesome qualities. Look at all the wisdom. Incline the mind to that, and awakening will surely occur."

I just love that, because this is our path. This is what it's like to be human. We don't need to recoil from sadness or grief or whatever, or take it as a sign that change shouldn't be happening or that we did something wrong. It's just part of the whole bigger picture.

But again, this tendency to pull back is a place where the steady awareness drops out, isn't it? Because we don't want to feel it. And it's a habit—that deep habit. We're not even purposely thinking, "I don't want to feel it." We're just gone, looking for pleasure. That's the big picture. So that's just one way of recognizing that.

In this way, clinging to anything is such a poignant strategy for happiness, right? Because it so doesn't work. It actually keeps us spinning in the dissatisfaction, in the sense of dis-ease.

Why do we cling? One reason is what I said the Buddha taught—to escape from the unpleasant. But I also think one of the things that perhaps many of us experience, though not everyone, is that what we're wanting is that sense of ease, which we can equate with a sense of stability or familiarity or control. I don't know—many of you may notice in the meditation this sense of trying to control something, just because God forbid what might happen if I don't have it all tightly together. Something great might happen, but I don't know—I'd rather know and just have it in this nice little packet so nothing bad could surprise me.

This sense of stability, this reaction to the unreliability—the fact of dukkha, the fact of constant change—is the mind somehow looking for something steady to hold on to. Whether it's a sense experience, whether it's a relationship, an idea, a view about things, a particular comfort with the level of people you're with, whether it's our ideas or views about ourself, a view about our personality. And it may not even be a nice view, but it's familiar. I know that's what I'm like. Don't try to tell me otherwise. It's familiar.

And that just increases the dis-ease, the disjunct, the being in contention with things as they are. The peace that comes from wise view is that we're no longer fighting with reality. It's just doing its thing. It's like this, and it's not a problem.

You know the teacher Byron Katie? She says, "When you fight with reality, you lose." I love that. When I feel like I'm struggling, I'm fighting with reality, and I'm losing.

There's a line from one of the suttas: "The search for a resting place is burning. Not to need one is cool and peaceful." Not needing a place to rest. Can you imagine that?

One Tibetan saying—it's like a meditation instruction: "Resting at ease in whatever arises." Just, it's this now. That's all. That's all. No sense of past, future, changing, not changing. Just resting at ease in whatever arises.

Again, "One abides in peace who does not abide anywhere." Abiding—having that sense of landing and trying to stay and hold and settle.

Now, I don't know how this is landing for you all, but I know my intellectual thinking mind doesn't like that very much. It's like, "What do you mean?"

Nothing, no abiding. One rests in peace who doesn't rest anywhere.

I want to rest. I like to be comfortable. And comfortable means I rest. I don't have to every single moment be changing and not abiding. This and this and this—it's exhausting!

But what's exhausting is the mind going on about that with aversion. That's what's exhausting. You don't even have to think about it at all. It's just how it already is.

So that's one way I just wanted to point out how the steady awareness can fall away and the perception of impermanence isn't perceived—because of the deep habit of recoiling, pulling back, denying, resisting, going to the pleasant in the face of discomfort, unfamiliarity, dis-ease.

Another way, again, is that we may not recognize—often we don't—the momentariness of change.

For example, once I was hearing a talk from the Dalai Lama. He was talking about this and said, "Well, everything changes, like my body. It came into existence, it's here for a while, and then it goes away." So it's changing, but it's kind of a steady state—the zabuton, steady state, whatever.

Then he said, "We're seeing change," but he clarified, "No, that's not really it, because that still is assuming a kind of permanence." What's not being recognized is the momentariness, the incredible rapidity of change.

It's said somewhere in the suttas that the Buddha talked about how many mind moments arise—a moment of seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking. Whatever measurement they used then translates to something enormous, like seventeen trillion mind moments in the blink of an eye. We're talking fast.

And so when perceptions are happening this quickly, it's so fast that it can look permanent. The example often given is if you have a torch, a fiery torch, and you spin it really fast in the dark—if you spin it fast enough, it looks like a solid circle of flame. Have you ever seen that? That's the rapidity, and then it looks solid.

In a way, that's what's going on with us. And of course, you can't sit down and say, "I'm going to notice seventeen trillion mind moments in the blink of an eye." That's just an idea. But it's meant to point in a direction.

What does it bring us back to? The steadiness of awareness—here, here, here, here, here. And various aspects of this change reveal themselves. How can they not? That's what's happening.

Sometimes I play with awareness of seeing. We talked about seeing—it's not that you don't have the concepts. It's more that seeing is like the awareness of the process that seeing has happened. And looking is more like being out in the content of what's being seen. Sort of like the difference between being lost in thought and being aware of thought. When you can be aware of a thought, you still might know the content, but you're not in there mucking around with it. Same with looking and seeing.

As we're walking around, first notice how often seeing is occurring, which we don't notice a lot. But if you start just playing with it, not worrying about the content—for every single instant, the seeing is different. It's never exactly the same. Even if I just sit still like this, this shows up, that shows up, different things are coming to the forefront. It's always different. And that's just one of the sense doors—never mind how fast the mind door is moving.

So just start to notice the momentariness of change. Don't make a big deal about it. Just let that go in. But as the awareness is getting more and more naturally steady, this starts to reveal itself. You see then how much the perception is really of permanence. And that's not a problem, but just noticing that—how many moments the perception is actually of permanence—it's interesting. It doesn't take an equal number of moments of perception of impermanence for insight to really come. Because how much of our life—has the perception been of permanence, and it keeps on being.

So for example, in your time here today, in your practice today, whatever you were doing—sitting, walking, having an emotion—was there ever, did it ever happen at all today that something occurred and there's a thought: "Oh no, now I'm going to be with this the whole sitting." "Oh no, here comes this again. I'm going to have to deal with this mental thing again all day. I was with it all day yesterday, and here it is again today." Did that ever happen to anybody?

And then it's often that we don't—not always—but there's a kind of selective attention. Again, this is why we talk about non-preferential awareness. We don't even realize it, but the selective attention often skips over the neutral. So even this thing—"Oh no, it's going to be here all day, and it's really a pain, and we don't like it"—but it's got some juice to it, so we notice. Awareness notices when that comes up. It somehow doesn't notice all those moments that there was boredom, that you were hearing the tree frogs, that you were wondering what was for lunch, that you were just a little bit sleepy, that you were thinking about last week, and then: "Oh God, here's this thing. It's been here all day. It's going to be here all day. I can't bear it."

Just notice that. Nothing is here all day. There may be—maybe there's only a fraction of a second that that pain wasn't there. But there was a moment. "No, it was there. I just didn't notice it, but it was there." That's what we do. Just check it out. Don't believe me. Check it out.

Really, sometimes we start to see there is no stasis anywhere. That's what His Holiness the Dalai Lama was pointing to. Sometimes I talk about the example of a time-lapse film of a flower growing. And we just found out yesterday that the camera set up in the front—I don't know if you've noticed it—they're actually doing time-lapse filming of the tulips growing. Don't ask me what they're going to do with it. That's going to go up on the website. This is what you can see if you come to a retreat—five weeks of watching the tulip grow. That'll pack the house.

But anyway, it's fortuitous, so I can use it in this talk. You can imagine, right, a time-lapse—you see it on nature shows—and the plant coming up through the dirt, so it's speeded up. But if you see that, it's continually changing. It's just speeded up. There's no moment that you can stop it and say, "That's the bulb," and it stopped. The next moment, it's changing a little bit, changing a little bit. You can't say, "Now this is the stem, now that's the flower," and it stopped. It never completely stops, becomes a thing isolated in itself. The conditions are coming together and changing and making it every instant. That's nature.

Guess what? Right view, right? Guess what we are? Nature. That's what's going on. Conditions coming together in every moment. They're slightly different in the body, in the mind, in all the different sense doors that are arising. Always different.

So the steady awareness isn't like—we don't have to think about this stuff. But the more we really pay attention, it starts to be highlighted. A friend many years ago was saying on retreat—she'd been sitting for like twenty years, years and years—

"You know, I really have gotten it," she said. "I've known for years, really known in my gut, cellularly—like insight—that everything around is constantly changing. But suddenly now I'm getting it: oh, me too. I'm part of that. Before it was like I'm here, solid, watching everything constantly change." Doesn't it feel like that? But she said, "Oh no, it's not like that at all. I'm completely part of it. There's no separation."

This is from the Buddha: "When one perceives impermanence, the perception of not-self is stabilized. And when the perception of not-self is stabilized, that perception eradicates the conceit 'I am,' the view 'I am'"—the same thing he said before—"which is Nibbana in this very life." Nibbana means liberation of heart-mind through non-clinging.

So you see, they work together. That perception of impermanence really stabilizes the perception of not-self. Because with that sense of constant change held within steady awareness, you don't have to think about it. That's just what presents itself.

Sometimes in sitting meditation—and I think both Alexis and Mark talked about how sometimes it's wild—people say sometimes it's nice and calm and we can stay with the breath, which is fine. But one of the things that can be a trap, if it becomes a trap—it doesn't have to be, it can be very useful—is when we feel like we need to go back there. Why? Because it's calm. Because it gives the illusion of stability. And when we open up, we think, "No, there's just stuff going on all over the place. This, this, this, and that. That's not good meditation. I'm not stabilized. I'm not concentrated. I've got to go back to the breath." Right? It happens a lot.

What are we opening up to? The thought arises: "Something's wrong. Everything's changing, and it's not in my control. Something's wrong. How can I fix it?" That's not meditation. If you're trying to fix that, well, keep trying until you notice how much suffering is increasing. Then just let go into it. You can't force letting go, but just notice it's like this and don't believe that it's wrong. Steady awareness is just noticing it's like this now.

When there's a wrong view—an unrecognized view—that's what happens when you think, "This is wrong. It shouldn't be so changing. There's something out of control. I'm doing something wrong." That's the result of the wrong view that things aren't supposed to change, that we should be able to be stable, that everything should be copacetic somehow. But steady awareness that isn't adhering to any view—not even right view—just noticing what is... you simply observe, "Oh, that's wild. It's like this now." And awareness is steady, and it's like this now.

Awareness isn't stained or damaged by difficult, unpleasant experience. Awareness isn't better or purer or clearer if the experience is pleasant or one we like or really subtle. Awareness is just receiving whatever arises. The meaning that this is good and this is bad is all put on by our thinking.

Nisargadatta Maharaj once said that we miss the real by lack of attention and we create the unreal by excess of imagination. I love that. So that's what we're doing.

This sense of the perception of impermanence stabilizing the perception, the recognition of not-self—we can see that. It doesn't have to be super subtle. We can just begin to notice it as we go through the days here in retreat. That's what's nice about a retreat: we have the space to notice what's going on anyway, but with a little more subtlety because we're not quite so distracted.

But just as I was mentioning before, in terms of physical sensations and mental states—a friend of mine said he noticed on retreat that he was really frustrated, but then he recognized it's impossible to be frustrated all day, even if you try. It's just impossible to be frustrated all day. So we notice the presence and the absence of mind states.

We can also notice the views, the personality view we have of ourselves. And it can be helpful to first recognize: "I'm a depressive person," or "I'm someone who can't meditate," or "I'm angry a lot"—whatever it is. We have a good friend who is a self-confessed aversive type. Not only self-confessed—all her friends are on her case: "You're aversive, you're aversive." She got kind of fed up, and she was sitting one day and she said, "I'm just going to really pay attention, just be really steady in awareness of all the mental activity, all the mental states that go on through the day, just out of interest."

And so she saw—of course, one can't help but see—that they're constantly changing. She said, "Yeah, there are a lot of aversive mental states. And there's a lot of generosity arising. And there was a lot of mettā arising. And there was a lot of just concentration or just equanimity or just being normal, doing whatever." So to come back and say, "I'm an aversive person," is again picking and choosing and just ignoring everything else that's occurring. Maybe something comes up frequently, but we don't have to land on it. Just staying with steady awareness, you'll see everything's changing. We can't land anywhere—good, bad, or in between. It's always in flux. So we simply need to notice what's actually going on.

In a way, it's taking refuge in the awareness rather than taking refuge in pleasant, unpleasant, our ideas about ourselves, good ideas, bad ideas. Just that willingness: "Okay, it's like this now." Let the steadiness of awareness, the willingness to just relax back into awareness, be the refuge, and let life reveal itself.

This actually has the effect of really opening and freeing the heart-mind. It really does release the clinging, the grasping. Because when we're grasping, trying to hold something, we recognize there's nothing to be held—it's all moving and there's nothing solid there anyway. The lack of struggle and the real presence opens us to the beauty and mystery and real presence in life, rather than this constant push-pull.

But it's true that there can be times along the way when maybe we first open in a deep way, one time or another, to the unreliability of experience, or to the fact that there really isn't some steady-state "me" that we thought there was. Just a moment when it's not there. Recognizing that at a deep level is peace.

But this is from Ajahn Sumedho, and I think this can be quite helpful: As one begins to realize or recognize non-grasping as the way—non-grasping at anything including self and ideas—then sometimes, not always, but sometimes, emotionally one can feel quite frightened by this. You know that everything's changing and there's no me, there's nowhere to rest. It can seem like a kind of annihilation is taking place. All that I think I am in the world, all that I regard as stable and real, starts falling apart, and it can be frightening. It doesn't have to be, but it can be.

But if we have the faith to continue bearing with these emotional reactions—what Alexis talked about last night, the faith, just the willingness to be here with kind awareness with these emotional reactions—and allow things that arise to cease, to appear and disappear according to their nature, then we find stability not in achievement or attaining, but in being awake, in being aware. The stability of just this moment of being aware. That's it. Not thinking about it.

So this refuge in awareness releases the struggle, even just for that one moment. It really opens us into a fullness of presence. But it's not a disconnected fullness of presence at all. Sometimes people say, "Why would I want to perceive this constant change? Why would I want to open to this? It sounds dreadful, this instability, and it sounds like maybe knowing everything's changing, you wouldn't care."

But it's just the opposite. Because it's a caring that doesn't come from a need to reify or justify or make myself okay.

It's a caring that's like… this is just how it is. The beautiful, the difficult, the poignant. The sense of presence and being alive becomes even more vivid. We don't stop caring.

Two examples. One is from the Dalai Lama. I read about him once—you know, he meets so many people, right? Every day. All the Tibetan refugees. You hear so many really heartbreaking, unbearable stories of people suffering. And then he meets people who are happy, and all kinds of people. Many people have said—and I've read this—that when he's meeting someone, when he's shaking their hand and talking to them, they always say they feel like he's just so totally with you. Like this is the high point of his day, meeting you. Whoever it is, he's 100 percent there.

And they can watch him. He's with someone telling a horrible refugee story, and he's crying with them. He's totally feeling with them. And then that's gone. The next person comes. He turns to that person. It's a whole different world. He's not weeping anymore. He's totally there with that person. Maybe they're laughing. Maybe he's just talking about some business.

Some say, "Well, how do you do that? How can you just drop it?"

He goes, "Well, it's totally present. That's what's happening—the sadness. But there's no holding on. It doesn't reverberate. It's this. Then it's gone. And the next thing occurs."

That can really be like that. It doesn't mean we don't care. We're able to be fully there because we're not held back by this fear of, "Oh my God, it's going to overwhelm me." Just to explore that possibility.

And to notice, in terms of impermanence—notice when your mental states, when a difficult one is gone. Sometimes we don't quite have the steadiness to notice it's gone. We jump into the next thing. Notice the absence of difficult mental states. Notice the presence of wholesome states. And notice the absence of wholesome. Because that really helps us.

You know, you've been so frustrated all day, and then you're not. Notice the absence. Not assuming, "Well, it's under there. I'm just not clear enough to see it." That's just some idea. You look around. It's really gone. It's gone. Sure, it'll come back. The conditions will change. But notice that.

And then the other thing—the other way of just saying this—the sensitivity, the tenderness to be with life as it is, I think is stronger, is deeper. It can really open to the mystery and the wonder.

I just wanted to read two poems to end. One is this very short haiku by Issa, which to me is just knowing the ephemeral nature of the world, and still, we're humans. It's written on the year anniversary of the death of his young child. And it's just very simple:

This dewdrop world is a dewdrop world. And yet, and yet.

And that's how it is for us.

And this is Hafiz. "Deepening the Wonder":

Death is a favor to us

The impermanence of the body should give us great clarity, deepening the wonder in our senses and eyes of this mysterious existence we share and are surely just traveling through.

If I were in the tavern tonight, Hafiz would call for drinks. And as the master poured, I would be reminded that all I know of life and myself is that we are just a mid-air flight of golden wine between his pitcher and his cup.

If I were in the tavern tonight, I would buy freely for everyone in this world, because our marriage with the cruel beauty of time and space cannot endure very long.

The miraculous existence and impermanence of form always makes the illumined ones laugh and sing.

So let's just sit for a moment.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 181

Dāna/Sīla Transforms The Habits Of The Mind

Carol Wilson · 1h01

> In this dharma talk, Carol Wilson addresses a common misconception about meditation practice—that steady awareness and non-interference might lead to disengagement from life. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching that a wise person intends for the welfare of self, others, and the whole world, she clarifies that wisdom naturally manifests in how we engage with life, not in withdrawal from it.
>
> Wilson explores the Buddha's definition of action (kamma) as rooted in intention (cetanā), emphasizing that the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness of any act lies in the motivation behind it. She references the opening verses of the Dhammapada: "All experience is preceded by mind, led by mind, made by mind. Speak or act with a corrupted mind and suffering follows." This understanding reveals why cultivating awareness of mental qualities is so central to practice—these qualities shape our motivations and thus our actions.
> The talk illuminates how dāna (generosity), sīla (ethical conduct), and bhāvanā (mental cultivation) work together as the three pillars of Buddhist practice, all serving to transform habitual patterns of greed, hatred, and delusion. Wilson shares moving stories from her time in Burma illustrating the joy and mutuality of genuine generosity, and explores how the precepts call forth empathy, restraint, and discernment. She encourages practitioners to notice and appreciate moments when wholesome qualities naturally arise—when ill will doesn't take hold, when restraint occurs, when generosity flows freely—recognizing these as evidence that the Dhamma truly transforms the heart and mind.

So I mentioned this afternoon that I wanted to talk a little bit more about dāna tonight, but it's kind of embedded in the whole talk. It's not just about that.

Sometimes it can sound, from the instructions we're giving—the steady awareness, the complete non-interference, really being totally present without changing anything to see how the mind and body work—it can give one the impression that really the culmination of this practice would be somehow abdicating involvement with life, abdicating engagement with life. You know that's not true, right? But that's what I'm going to talk about tonight.

Often people really think, well, if you never get involved, if you never change what's happening, how do we do anything in the world? And of course, that's not the point, but it works in a different way from what we think.

Another thing that people say to me frequently—and I think I mentioned this in one or two of the groups—but people have often said this as we're talking more and they're discovering how much greed and aversion are arising in the heart and mind, and how much they kind of lead us to action. And we keep hammering about the unwholesome aspect of that. People have said quite seriously, literally, "Well, if I don't act from greed and aversion, what do I do—just sit in my room for the rest of my life?" Very seriously. Which is to me really saddening, because that's the implication that these are the motivators of the world, these are the drivers of action—greed and aversion.

We were exploring it in one of the groups about strong aversion. Greed too can feel very enlivening, can't it? It gives us a sense of purpose; it kind of wakes us up from calm. Let's have some aversion going on, some greed—we feel really much more alive, and much more "me" too, which is really to the point. But it kind of overlooks the fact that there are many other impulses to speech and action than greed and aversion, which is of course all the wholesome qualities that we've been talking about.

But just to say from the Buddha, just so you know, that the point of awareness, the point of wisdom isn't to let us just be so cooled out that we don't engage in the world at all. This is one of the statements from the Buddha:

In what way is one a wise person of great wisdom? A wise person of great wisdom does not intend for their own affliction or for the affliction of others or of both. Rather, when they think, they think only of their own welfare, the welfare of others and of both, and the welfare of the whole world. It is in this way that one is a wise person of great wisdom.

So a wise person is known by the intentions of caring for the welfare. And you notice he also says the welfare of oneself—all equal. Sometimes we think, if I'm really wise and compassionate, thinking about my own welfare is somehow greedy. But the Buddha is saying we're all in this together. My own welfare is as important as the welfare of another and the welfare of both.

And in another place, he says a wise person is known by their actions. It is through the activities of one's life that one's wisdom, one's discernment shines. So he's definitely saying the understanding, the opening of heart and mind, the real wisdom, is going to manifest in how we are in the world, how we are with ourselves, how we are with each other.

So wisdom and this awareness practice—it's not about abandoning acts in the world, but it's to allow the wisdom to grow that gives us the choice, the space to allow wisdom to choose, to act from wisdom, from compassion, from appropriateness in the face of any situation, instead of being so automatically seduced by the call of craving or the vitality of aversion. The steady awareness, the wisdom that arises, just gives that space to see more clearly, and the appropriate response can naturally arise.

But I want to go a little more into what the Buddha means by action, which many of you are aware of. He's very specific. And this is where looking at these habits of mind, the wholesome and the unwholesome, is so key. Because for most of us, when we think of action, we think of the actual act as being good or bad or wholesome, or the actual words we say. But the Buddha was very clear.

The word kamma just means action. So he says, "Intention or volition, I tell you, is action. Intending, one does action, one does kamma by way of body, speech, and mind."

And so what he's putting out—and this is what's so interesting and so helpful and accessible in seeing why cultivating and transforming the habits of mind is so key to waking up and to how we are in the world with one another—is that the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness of any action, as the Buddha talks about it, is in the intention. That movement of mind, that cetanā is the word in Pali, that little movement of mind that gives rise to action. There would be no action without that movement of mind. We're not going to always notice it arising in every moment.

So that movement of mind arises together with whatever particular qualities are in the mind. Does that sound familiar? We've been hammering on it all week, right? Notice what are the qualities arising in the mind as you're being present, as you're eating, whatever. This is because these qualities in a moment leading to speech or action are going to be the motivation.

Again, this will be very familiar to some of you from the Dhammapada. This is Gil Fronsdal's translation:

All experience is preceded by mind, led by mind, made by mind. Speak or act with a corrupted mind and suffering follows as the wagon wheel follows the hoof of the ox.

All experience is preceded by mind, led by mind, made by mind. Speak or act with a peaceful mind and happiness follows like a never departing shadow.

So obviously, corrupted mind means with greed, hatred, confusion. And a peaceful mind means with any of the wholesome qualities, with calmness. Or as Dingo Kensey Rinpoche said, actions are the servants of the mind.

This is really very essential. It's clear—this verse is like the second verse in the whole Dhammapada. It's that important.

So the time that we've spent here seemingly just watching what's going on in the mind and the body, not engaging, just letting it all be—this is so essential to really coming to understand how the mind works, how it feeds motivations, and how motivations lead to action. It's essential even just to get in the habit of tuning into what's going on in our mind.

What leads to speech and action? Of course we're not going to notice that a lot of the time, but that's why there's so much emphasis on this steady awareness, recognizing what qualities are arising in consciousness right now. Because that's what leads to action, rather than focusing on the results.

You can see how the same seeming action—we can't really evaluate if it's helpful. We can't evaluate from the outside, if it's not us, what's the quality of the action, since it lies in the intention.

Speech is a really good place to explore that. You can say something that you think will be for the good of another, but you can say it with total irritation. "I'm telling you this"—but your motivation is so they'll fix themselves and stop bugging you. I mean, totally. We can kid ourselves, but if we're really paying attention, we know. And frankly, they always know too. You really can't hide it.

Or you can say the same thing with a lot of care and loving-kindness. Or you can say it kind of negligently—you meant to say it before and you knew it would be helpful, but right now you're just tired and you want to say it, so you just blurt it out without paying any attention to what's going on with the person, whether they're tired or they just got some bad news. Just completely oblivious—a kind of delusion. Or it can be done with real care. Same words, same words.

This is just a very simple example, but we can start to explore and recognize for ourselves that the intention matters. When the Buddha talks about suffering or happiness coming from speaking or acting with a corrupted mind or a peaceful mind, of course he's talking about the suffering or the peace in our own mind and heart. It's not that, as we all know, if we do an act that's really kind and good, then everything good always comes back. Not immediately, sometimes.

So if we're always looking at the external as the evaluator, as the assessment, we're going to get really confused and disappointed sometimes. But when we're tuning into ourselves—if you've done something from the clearest, kindest motivation you could, and it just doesn't land with the other person, and you're willing to hear that if it doesn't land and you want to know why, you keep on going with it. Or it could be something where they're just not interested. They're off somewhere else and they just brush you aside. But still, you have that clarity and kindness of your own motivation. And that's really where the peace is, where the ease is. It doesn't mean we can fix the world.

So that's why the quality arising in the heart and mind in this moment—which can lead to thought, speech, action—is the key. It's the key to really understanding suffering and happiness.

When we talk about purifying the habits of mind—have we used that term much here? Sometimes we do. Let's say transforming, in case purity is not a happy word for you. We're transforming the habits of our mind. Really, you could say in a way, we're not uprooting, but wisdom dissolves the habits of greed, hatred, delusion.

In some ways, I've been feeling and sensing more and more, the more I practice, that actually everything the Buddha taught—all aspects of what he taught, not just sitting, not just meditation—is about transforming these habits of mind. That's it. All of it.

And so when we think, "I'm just watching greed, greed, greed, greed, greed, greed—can't I do something more interesting?" This is it. This is it. Until wisdom comes in and you have a moment of non-greed. Then you can watch non-greed, non-greed, non-greed. This is the key. The Buddha said over and over that he discovered the liberation of heart, of mind, through non-clinging. Other times he said that Nibbāna is directly visible.

When? When the heart-mind is not obsessed with greed, or obsessed with ill will and hatred, or obsessed with delusion. So really, it's not just a sidebar—everything he taught, I truly believe, was in service of transforming these habits of mind and heart.

Meditation, the steady awareness we've been cultivating, and other forms too—this is the Dāna-Sīla-Bhāvanā. These are the three pillars the Buddha taught. Dāna: generosity. Sīla: non-harming behavior. Bhāvanā: mental cultivation, cultivation of heart and mind. We've had sīla and dāna embedded in this retreat, but the focus, of course, has been more on bhāvanā. Yet all of it—all of it—is working together. It's not just about bhāvanā.

So this may be the most direct way to insight: the steady, steady awareness that sees clearly until suddenly, ah, it lets go. But these other qualities of working with dāna and sīla, really embracing them as part of the path, are also very key, very supportive in transforming these habits.

There's a statement I read from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche that I really like. This is how it feels to me when the habits are transforming through what we're doing in all aspects of our life. He says, "We're mingling our minds with the Dharma until it permeates our whole being." That's what I feel we're doing. If it's just meditation, we're mingling our mind with the Dharma only in meditation—then we go out and we can't continue to find awareness, so we have to wait until the next retreat. But it's everything, everything in our life: mingling our minds with the Dharma until it permeates our whole being. That just makes me so happy, just thinking that.

And it's not like it's an act of will doing it, but it's the willingness to incline the heart and mind toward the wholesome. That's what I want to keep talking about tonight: transforming these habits of heart and mind.

In terms of the meditation practice here, we've talked a lot the last couple of nights about recognizing the wholesome qualities, because that's equally important. But I know it's been coming up in the groups—one or two people have noticed that greed arises more frequently than they might have realized. And once or twice, people have noticed, "Gee, judgment and ill will and aversion seem to come up once in a while. They seem to be driving things, and I didn't even know they were here."

Sometimes when we start to see this—not only start, but actually when we've been continuing to see it over years—we realize: let go. It takes years. It's not a couple of retreats, as people who have been sitting a long time know. These habits have been reinforced through so many mind moments. We've practiced them so much. But they are habits.

People can get a little despondent. It can at times feel overwhelming. Has it ever felt overwhelming? Just like, "Oh my God, look how much greed there is. There's no way." Because if you think you've got to get out the pickaxe and uproot each moment of greed, that's endless, right? You uproot one and then another one comes up. You uproot one and think, "Have I done it yet?" Oh, that was greed—I've got to uproot another one. That can seem a little overwhelming, and that's not how it works, thank goodness.

The wisdom does transform, and you may have noticed how sometimes it seems to happen quite naturally. Mark mentioned—or maybe both Mark and Alexis—what the Buddha called the three wise intentions: how greed transforms into non-greed, or generosity. You can see in the first one how ill will transforms into non-ill will, into friendliness; and how harmfulness transforms into compassion, into caring.

Many people have named or mentioned little moments here. They may seem insignificant, but it's important to recognize where just the steady awareness—and the wisdom that arises from that—naturally chooses the wholesome. These unwholesome motivations, in that moment, either dissolve away without seeming like an act of will, just by themselves, or they don't arise at all.

Simple things. People say, going to the meal and noticing greed, and then just not acting on it, and it drops away. Wow. Or going in at some time in the evening, expecting to have greed, and there isn't any. It just doesn't come up. It's just a little moment, but it's really significant to notice these things. This strengthens the confidence—not in your own ability, but in the fact that steady awareness leads to wisdom, and wisdom really does let go of these qualities, doesn't feed them.

With ill will too. Maybe you've been noticing how much your mind tends to judge.

This is a really common thing. You sit there in the dining room on retreat and everybody that walks by – everybody – gets some negative judgment. "I can't believe they're wearing socks like that. I can't believe that – they must have had that on yesterday. I can't believe they're making that much noise when they're walking. I can't believe they're going so slow." And on and on.

And finally you notice: maybe it's not them. It's possible. It's a possibility that there's aversion distorting the perception. And then, okay, this is what my mind does. I'm so aversive. You get used to it. You're making peace with it.

And then one day you're sitting there, and the person walks by, and nothing comes up. Just friendliness. "Oh, yeah, look at them. They're doing the best they can. Isn't that lovely?" You go, "Who was that? That's not familiar."

Let it in. Let it in. You notice it's not fake – you're not faking it. It's not pretending: "May you be happy, you schlump." No, you're really feeling it. The judgment doesn't come up. It's really different.

It's familiar, isn't it – the faking? We try. We're trying with the best of intentions, but that's delusion. We don't know what we're doing. But when it really doesn't come up, feel that spacious heart and mind that's empty of ill will. It really is, as Mark says, non-ill will. It may not be boundless metta, but it's non-ill will. Feel that.

Or consider cruelty. Here on retreat, hopefully we're not really being cruel to each other, but what kind of stuff does your mind say to yourself when things are going on that are difficult? Or when aspects of your personality come up that you're familiar with and you really don't like and you think should be really over by now – how friendly, how kind is your mind with that sometimes? There's this real harshness, why meditation is so hard often, because we're just so cruel to ourselves.

But then, have you noticed a moment when the same thing comes up, the mind maybe starts to get tight, and then: "Oh, yeah, that's really hard. It's okay. It's like this now." And that happens naturally. Again, let it just be perceived with awareness – the emptiness of cruelty, the space of compassion, just that simplicity of being with what is. It's not an act of personal will or forcing. It's natural.

And so the power of awareness-wisdom is really, in some ways you could say, maybe the most direct way of transforming the habits of mind. We know it's one moment at a time, but each moment like that, when the awareness is steady and you really notice the dissolving or the non-arising of the torment, it's a powerful moment. It's really transforming the habits. And they are habits, these difficult qualities. It's not inevitable. It can seem like it's inevitable sometimes.

I heard just a snippet of a talk by Bishop Desmond Tutu to some young men and women in their early twenties, living in a really difficult part of town, an area where there's a lot of violence. And he was telling them that no, it's really up to you. He turned to them and said very forcefully, "We learn to hate. Hate isn't natural. You don't have to hate. We learn to hate."

And as much as there's so much violence and hatred in the world, and how much the news often seems to feed that, giving us more examples of it, we can also always find examples of the opposite – where people in circumstances I can't imagine being in respond in a different way. Respond with compassion.

Respond with kindness. It just is a great thing to take in. Because I feel like when I look inside my own heart and mind, I'm seeing all the aspects of suffering and the potential for beauty, for wholesomeness, for love, for compassion. And I'm this microcosm of human beings. We all are. So we look in ourselves, we see the difficulty, but also the beauty, also the potential—and the same out in the world. So when I hear something like that, somebody saying something that's just inspiring, I just take it in and really appreciate it because it brings up faith in me. It brightens the heart and mind.

The latest one I heard was a couple of weeks ago on the BBC. It was the day after the attacks on the mosques in New Zealand. The BBC reporters were down there interviewing survivors—I don't know how they can do that. They were talking to one man who had been in the mosque with his wife, and she had been killed. He was an elderly man living in a wheelchair, and she had been his main caretaker. So they're interviewing him, asking the kinds of questions like, "Who do you blame?" But he was just saying—I wrote it down because I really liked it—he was saying, "Perhaps someone who acts like this person did is hoping that there will be retaliating violence from other Muslims, but that's not going to happen here." He said, "We are one people." He was talking about all the people in New Zealand, not only the people in the mosque. "We are one people. We don't want vengeance. We need to change within ourselves to be able to live together."

I just thought that was so beautiful—his wife had just been killed, and he says we have to change within ourselves to live together. And that's true. It's out there in the world. There are many, many people cultivating and committed to waking up in whatever way, to transforming their hearts and minds, to developing the wholesome. Sometimes we can see it in ourselves, and that can strengthen faith. But when we see it in others, that can also strengthen faith, because in a way, we are one humanity—different stories, but the same way that the heart and mind and body work.

So I want to speak a little about dāna and sīla as the Buddha taught them—as aspects, as ways to embrace transforming the habits of our heart and mind. As most of you know, whenever the Buddha would begin a teaching, always to lay people especially, he would talk about generosity first.

I have to say, just to be honest, in the beginning of my practice—it started in India, but then here—the emphasis and the interest was very much on bhāvanā, on meditation, for all the different reasons. And of course, generosity is always, "Yeah, generosity is good, you know." And sīla is also, "You need sīla so you can practice better"—as foundational. But I never really got it, and I'm not blaming my teachers. After my first retreat, I didn't even know it was Buddhism. I'm sure the teacher might have mentioned it. So I'm not really blaming the teachers. It changed my life. I didn't know why. I didn't know what was going on. It just shows we don't have to know that much—we just do it.

Growing up here too, generosity was always presented as a good thing. And I think my family was generous. People in this country are generous. But the sense tends to be focused on what was given and how much. People would say about someone, "Oh, they're so incredibly generous," and it's usually about someone who has a lot to give. It doesn't have to be, but it often is. But generosity, just as with everything else, is actually about the motivation in the heart, in the mind.

That opening of heart and mind that doesn't hold on to whatever it is—whether it's time or a smile or just a willingness to connect, or a flower, or money, whatever it is. At the heart of generosity, it's not about a "should," that you have to give because that's the right thing to do. It's because the act of generosity, the motivational act of it, is a source of real happiness. It's a source of real connectedness and happiness.

And I really didn't understand this until I spent a lot of time in Thailand and Burma, practicing in the Buddhist parts of those countries. There, it's a very deeply ingrained understanding. And it can get warped, because we can warp everything. But the sense of it—in Burma, they'll say, "Oh, this is an opportunity for dāna." And they get excited. "Oh, look at this, an opportunity for dāna!" They'll get really happy and go find whatever way they can offer food or whatever it is.

So in the moment of a generous act, whatever it is, tuning into the motivation—you can feel how in that moment of sharing, it counters ill will. There's not ill will in that moment. In fact, it was said somewhere that the Buddha suggested if you're feeling ill will towards someone, you should give them a gift. Before I understood the motivational aspect, I didn't understand what that was about. You'd get paranoid if someone gives you a gift. But it's not that. If you're really moving from generosity, in that moment there's not ill will. In that moment it's really an open-hearted connectedness, and it brings a happiness to the mind. It isn't ill will. So it's actually countering the ill will. And of course it counters greed and possessiveness, whether it's your time or a thing, whatever. And also self-cherishing. It strengthens the sense of connectedness, the recognition of non-separation.

You don't have to get all intellectual about it. I'm talking about it, but this is all happening in one moment when you're actually giving anything—to really do it with fullness of presence and a sense of appreciation and dignity. Sometimes I would feel a little abashed to be offering something. What if they don't like it? I'd feel a little self-conscious. And that really cuts the mutuality. The thing that really feeds and strengthens the happiness of generosity is the mutuality—the giving with dignity and mindful attention, and the receiving in the same way. Really conscious.

So when you give, really tune into the motivation to offer. And when you're actually doing it, stay present with that, really present. And then afterwards, later, you can actually reflect on the act of generosity. The Buddha suggests this. And that brightens the mind and heart. So there are three moments of brightness, of happiness, from an act of generosity: the motivation, the actual doing, and the reflection afterwards. And it's not happiness like, "Oh, it feels good, la la la," like eating chocolate. It's a way that it brightens the heart and mind. It's countering ill will.

One time when Sayadaw U Pandita was here and I was practicing with him for a couple of months, I'd heard he wanted a specific book. So I wrote a friend of mine who was on staff while I was sitting, asking if he would get this for me and give it to Sayadaw, which he did. He said it was from Carol and so on. When the retreat ended and I was just paying my respects to Sayadaw, he told someone to go get this book. He brings it out and hands it to me and says, "Okay, now give it to me directly."

It was really interesting. And I was nervous, you know. He could be intimidating. So I was handing it to him, and he's fully present. "Give it to him directly." And he said—I'm not sure he said this exactly, but it's what Burmese people say a lot. He said something similar.

And they mean it. Even just a little gift to a laywoman in a monastery—you give it and they receive it with full presence and say something to the effect of, "May this be a cause for you to reach Nibbāna in the shortest possible time." Isn't that nice? You give somebody five dollars and they're saying, "May this be a cause for you to reach Nibbāna in the shortest possible time." It's a whole different feeling around the act of generosity and the act of receiving.

Something I really learned about this, the sense of mutuality, is that in giving, it's equally important to receive. Spending time in Burma—where I've spent more time, near where Shwe Oo Min is—there's another place I've spent some time. And there are many, many small nunneries around there. Tons of them, and some of them really poor. Nunneries tend to get less support than monks, and these nuns live completely on dāna. They're not out there earning a living. Everything comes from generosity—building the buildings, getting their food, having toilets, digging a well, all of it.

A few friends have been giving us donations when we go over in the winter, and then we offer it to certain nunneries. They need a well. They need a toilet. So we offer, and we say, "This is from hundreds of friends. We're just carrying it and offering it." And then the beauty with which it's received—not like, "Oh, thank you, we're so poor, this is embarrassing." No, it's received with real appreciation, and then they get together and do a whole mettā chant, a whole blessing chant. It's a very formal ceremony.

And then—this is what I had to really learn—the nuns would want to invite us back and give us lunch. They would give us a lunch that was like twenty-five different curries for three people, and then another whole table of desserts. They don't eat like that. They're not eating any of that. And what we could leave over, which was most of it, they'd probably live on for a week. They wouldn't eat with us. But if we said, "No, no, no, we're well taken care of. You keep this. Eat it yourselves"—that completely cuts the mutuality, the sharing, the back and forth. They were so happy to watch us eat. It's really hard because they urge you to eat and eat and eat until you can't stand another minute. Finally, after a couple of years, we said, "Okay, we're just saying no to everybody because it's really too much."

But the sense of mutuality and not saying, "Oh, I have more than you, so you shouldn't give me anything"—saying that shuts off the oneness. It shuts it all off. The dignity and beauty in receiving actually brings joy and happiness to the heart. So it's really transforming a kind of holding separate into wholesomeness, into generosity, into mettā. Not compassion at that point—it's more mettā and generosity. And then the whole cycle of generosity becomes contagious. It just keeps on going.

I'll tell you one little story because I thought of it today—a friend who's practicing here started it years ago. Again, it was at Shwe Oo Min. I don't know, was it ten years ago or something? She had been sitting there and had gone over, and I hadn't been there before. I didn't know any of the nuns or anything around. She had wandered around and met a nun in a small nunnery that didn't have much, kind of made friends with her, and then offered her money to get electricity. She didn't have electricity, and you needed a few hundred dollars or something—it was complicated then. So she offered that, and she was really, really happy to be able to offer. And then she became friends with this nun—Daw Sumanacari is her name. And the nun would invite her for mohinga, which is this fish soup that's like one of the special dishes of Yangon. To make mohinga is a real gift. And then this friend invited me to come along. So I met her and had that great mohinga.

Anyway, so over the years, going every year, we'd meet this nun. This is just one example—I could give a hundred. We'd meet this nun, and she had a little nunnery that was slowly growing, maybe twenty nuns there. Frankly, she always seemed a little bit depressive. But one year, maybe... Well, just normal people, you know, just seemed a little pulled in.

One year she came, maybe four years ago, knowing that we had a little money to offer, but she said, "You know, I've just been not able to sleep. I'm so feeling that there's so many poor kids in this area that couldn't afford to go to the government schools." I mean, a lot. And she said, "I just want to start a school for these poor kids." Quite a few nuns do that, which is amazing considering what it entails. So she said, "I just want to do this, you know?"

And we thought, well, we can offer something and see what happens.

We came back the next year and she'd taken down one... She had two small buildings, and the twenty-five nuns lived in one and ate in the other. So she'd taken down one of the buildings, and they'd all moved and crammed into the other one. This is common. And she had a school—like a hundred kids were coming. She had a kind of lean-to. Now there's actually companies that come from Japan and build school buildings. But at that time she just had a lean-to, and these kids coming.

To do this means she's getting all of this on dāna, hiring teachers—regular lay teachers that you have to pay their salary every month—all of that on dāna.

And then she came to talk about it to us at the end of that visit. She was shining. Her face was shining. She was saying—wait, I wrote it down. I mean, I can't speak Burmese, but our friend Aria can. She said, "Even though now I must work so hard"—because really it's the head nun who ends up having to hold it all together, and that's her—"I have to work so hard to find support every month for the teacher's salaries, for the equipment. We still have to have food. We need more toilets. We need desks." And all of this is true. "Even though I have to work so hard to do this, all the energy is for the children and the school, and so my mind is so calm and happy."

And she really looked like that. She said, "I'm so happy if I can do this for the rest of my life."

And she's still doing it. It keeps getting bigger. And it's no exaggeration—she's working like crazy. She looks really tired, I have to say. But she's really happy at being able to help all these kids. And so it kind of keeps going around, going around. The generosity to her, and then her generosity to the kids.

And then one year—was it two years ago?—garbage pickup wasn't really a concept anymore. It's like you dump it on the ground or you burn it over there. It's just starting to happen, but at this time, not. One day we went out for a walk, and there was Dōsuman Ācāri with a whole group of the older kids. It was like the last day of school or something. And she had organized down the street, down Shwayumen Road—she had organized that these kids were going down with trash bags and picking up all the trash.

That might not seem like a big deal to you, but that's like an unheard of thing. We were so amazed. We were so impressed to see that. She looked around and said, "Okay, let's clean up the trash here." Of course, there's nowhere to take it. There's nowhere to take it. But it was wonderful. She's training the kids, you know—that you don't just throw your trash on the ground.

She's cleaning up this road that involves hundreds of people who live on it. And I don't know, the generosity just keeps cycling, cycling. This is how it transforms the habits in our mind, and it's contagious. Wholesomeness is contagious. It inspires us internally and externally.

So that's what I want to say about generosity. I could go on and on. I love talking about it because it makes me happy. Just contemplating your own generosity or your own sīla, as the Buddha talked about, really can brighten the mind.

In fact, there are various suttas where the Buddha arrives and sits down to talk to just a motley group of people. He doesn't know them—they're not his nuns and monks. And it was said that he could look around and simply tell what was in anybody's mind. So he would look around and see who in this gathering could hear the Dhamma, could really hear it, could let it in. Then he would zero in on whoever he thought it was.

It's often said he would begin with what he called a graduated teaching. He didn't just jump in and start talking about impermanence. In a graduated teaching, you talk about dāna, you talk about sīla, you talk about refuge, you talk about kamma—action and result—the joy of renunciation. And then, when he saw that the mind of the person was ready, pliable, uplifted, serene, bright, then he would talk about the deep Dhamma.

So it's all going together, transforming the habits. There's a great sutta where there's a man with leprosy named Suppabuddha, a beggar, and he sees this whole group around the Buddha and thinks, "Oh, maybe they have some food over there." So he goes over to get some food, and there's no food. He thinks, "Well, I might as well just sit and listen." And the Buddha looks out, and Suppabuddha is the one the Buddha sees who could hear the Dhamma. You never know. So the Buddha did this graduated teaching. And when the mind, the heart, was bright, pliable, uplifted, then he taught the Dhamma, and Suppabuddha got it.

This is what we can do for ourselves. When we're feeling down or lost—thinking, "I haven't been aware for three weeks, I haven't sat, I can't possibly do it, I'm no good"—just go give somebody a bunch of flowers. Just call a friend who you know is down. Send a check to your favorite charity, but do it really with clarity, knowing what you're doing. Or simply contemplate, through recollection, previous acts of generosity. And it really, as the Buddha said, sets the mind and the heart straight. When one is contemplating one's acts of generosity or non-harming, at that time there is not greed, hatred, or delusion in the mind. The heart-mind is set straight on the Dhamma.

So explore that. Don't say, "That's not really generous. All I did was give somebody a piece of fudge." It doesn't matter what it was. That might have been the best thing they had that whole week. Don't buy into this kind of negativity we get into, thinking, "Oh, that's just being egotistical." If it's egotistical, it won't brighten the mind and heart. You'll feel the difference. But I think I never really learned to sit and just think about, or call up, or let come up, times when there was generosity, times when there was mettā, times when there was non-harming. It really does make you happy. Just thinking about it makes you happy.

Okay, a little bit about sīla. Again, it works in the same way. At the most basic level, of course, the Buddha talked about non-harming behavior as the five precepts—the ones we took on the opening night, except the third one isn't celibacy but rather not harming oneself or others through one's sexual energy. So that's the basic sīla.

But again, even if we just set it as a rule—you don't do this—and you come up against it without much self-reflection and simply say, "Okay, don't steal," and you don't steal, that's already great, because that's transforming some motivation. Even if you want to steal, want to take something that isn't yours, but you come up against the rule and you don't do it, that refraining is actually a wholesome act.

We tend to just say, "Well, I wanted to do it. I just didn't because of the rule, but I'm such a bad person." But you didn't do it. That's the wholesome act. In that moment, that transformed the motivation from taking to restraint. And restraint is actually wholesome.

But as we look more deeply, really examining what's going on in the heart and mind around our actions in reference to non-harming behavior, we see it's actually quite profound. We begin exploring the movements, the motivations in our heart and mind that come up even in the thought of wanting to do or not wanting to do what keeping the precepts requires.

We read from Ajahn Sucitto talking about the five precepts. The transcendent point is not what they look like—not just "don't do this, don't do that"—but what they call forth in our heart and mind, what it takes to keep them, the efforts involved, and the effects that keeping the precepts have on your life. Really exploring what happens when we pay attention.

He says sila, like dana, is based in a sense of empathy. It's not a one-time thing —"Okay, I didn't lie today." It's making non-harming a way of life. The precepts are to be protected with a sense of truly valuing one's own mind, one's own body, and the context of the people one lives with. With these precepts, we extend that sense of respect and regard from our own mind and body towards all creatures, so that we impart value to this realm that we share with others.

Tuning into the motivations that help us keep the precepts is really profound. If we just kept attending to this, it would completely transform the habits of our mind. Because as we pay attention to see what effect just moving towards harsh speech has—just the effect of thinking of doing it—we notice the reverberations in our own heart and mind when we're tuning in. And then if we actually act on it, as Tejaniya says, even when we act on the unwholesome, bring awareness along with you. So we see, we learn the effects. That's how we learn.

I know now when I've said something thoughtless or harsh, it really reverberates with me. I can see it reverberate with the other person, but it really reverberates with me. There's a sense that respect for one's own being and respect for other beings are totally interrelated.

So I do want to say again: really appreciating restraint as a wholesome act. Because some of you think that if you have these unwholesome ideas come up—you know, this mosquito is driving you crazy and you just really want to slap it. You kind of slap at it on the side, trying to miss it, but this is in the middle of the night during a bad mosquito season. The worst little habits come out in the middle of the night when you hear that sound in your mosquito net. This is one of the worst things. And you can see the aversion and this urge to kill. It's a horrible feeling if you really tune into it.

So we need to bring awareness along to see that—not just turn off the awareness. The precepts aren't meant as a vow where if you break it, you're going to hell. They're really meant to bring us to pay attention, to see what's going on, and to appreciate that even feeling that hatred and then restraining the hand and not killing the mosquito—that's an act of non-harming. Appreciate it, and that will feed the wholesome. If you just focus on "I was going to do it and I'm so bad," that's just more ill will. Instead, focus: "Oh yeah, okay, I managed not to do it. Non-ill will came up." Let's appreciate that. That strengthens the wholesome.

This is Ajahn Sucitto again: "Morality carries with it the strength of restraint, the empathy of concern for how one's actions affect oneself and others, and the clarity of discerning the difference between short-term happy feelings and long-term well-being."

I love that—discerning the difference between short-term happy feelings and long-term well-being. Getting rid of the mosquito: short-term happy feeling. I don't have to hear that buzzing anymore. But not long-term well-being for the mosquito or for me. As the Buddha said, the wisdom to be able to be momentarily with the unpleasant but for a wholesome outcome—that's one aspect of wisdom.

There's something very interesting about the precepts. Being around people who really have strong sila is to me enormously inspiring. You can feel the purity. I was telling the group the other day—we were talking about sila—I remember the time when Sayadaw U Pandita was here teaching with a couple of other monks. He was a very strong teacher, but he was also a very strong holder of sila. All the monks' rules, but all the aspects of sila.

He was very strong in it. I remember one day—they were just eating, you know, they would eat in their own room and be fed. I don't know what I was doing. I must have been on staff at the time because I just kind of walked into the room. I wasn't a yogi. I came in to give something or take something. I wasn't really thinking about anything in particular, I just walked in. And I felt—I still remember this—the sense of purity in that room was palpable. It kind of knocked me back because I wasn't thinking about it or expecting it at all. It's an amazing thing, the kind of power that comes from non-harming, from really committing to that. It transforms your heart and mind, and you're going to see more clearly. This is the freedom of non-clinging.

So notice for yourself—it's a lovely feeling when you start to have more confidence in the wholesomeness in your heart and mind, in the wholesomeness of your sila. We're going to blow it, but there's more confidence that you can trust that, more confidence in the wholesome instead of thinking we're always going to fall into the negative.

A simple story I tell: I was with a friend at Spirit Rock, not on retreat, and I wanted to go buy a little White Tara statue from their bookstore. If you've been to Spirit Rock, you know the Jikundo bookstore with ten million things in it—my goodness. So I wanted this statue, and it's self-service, so we went in and looked all around but couldn't find it. My friend had sometimes volunteered working there, and she said, "I know where the closet is where they keep them all."

So we went, and she knew where the special magnet opener was, and we opened the closet. It's this huge closet with all these shelves just packed with statues—hundreds of statues, all different ones. No one's around. We're taking out different statues to look for the one I wanted. They were all organized, the same ones together. So we both took out at the same time a Manjushri statue. Manjushri has this little sword of wisdom. And at the same time, we just barely touched them and that sword broke for both of us. We're each holding one and both go, "Oh no!"

Later we dissected this. We both momentarily—in each of us—the thought came up, "I could put it back and no one will know." The thought came, and there was no way it landed in either of us. We'd never even thought about it. We both looked at each other and said, "I guess we have to go tell Marianne," who runs the bookstore and is a friend of ours. Like kids going to the principal, you know—we broke the statue.

But it was interesting because we both felt so good about that, really—that we could have put it back and no one would have known, and the thought never even landed. The thought came and just went nowhere because it was so obvious we weren't going to steal. It's just a little thing. It doesn't mean you're perfect with sila, but let stuff like that in. It really strengthens one's faith and confidence in the Dhamma, in the fact that it really works, that the habits of mind are being transformed. We don't have to just live in the inevitability of these difficult habits.

Just a couple of last suggestions to end. There are times when, as we're tuning into our motivation before acting, we can see that it's unwholesome. Take a moment, reflect on it. The Buddha gave this very famous talk to his son, Rahula, that before you do any action, reflect on the motivation. Is it for your own good, the good of another? Then do it. If it's not, don't do it. Or if you don't remember, in the middle of the action, reflect on the motivation. Is it for your own good, the good of another? Do it. If not, stop doing it. Or when it's over, reflect on what the motivation was.

We can do that ourselves. I'm learning to do it when answering emails, which is really a great place—especially if you think there's a little bit of aversion in there. "I've just got to tell them how to do this right."

And I really see it. The answer comes up really quick and I have all this energy and I'm typing the email. I'm learning to recognize that energy isn't discriminating wisdom. That energy is aversion. Don't hit the send button. Close the computer. Send it another day. And you read it the next day and you go, "Whoa, good thing I didn't send that."

We can reflect, find ways to reflect on what you're doing. Sister Chân Không, who is the nun who has been with Thich Nhat Hanh for years and years, she's really very committed to this. In her autobiography, which was written quite a few years ago, she's talking about when they were living in France. They'd been not allowed to come back to Vietnam during the Vietnam War because they were peace activists and weren't taking sides with either side, North or South Vietnam. So neither side trusted them and exiled them.

At this time, living in France, she's still a peace activist. I'll just read this from her:

"Many people were being arrested—nuns, monks, artists. Every time I received news of a new arrest, I became angry. And I knew that I had to do walking meditation." Is that what you do when you become angry? "I'm angry. I better do some walking meditation." "Sometimes I would walk several hours in order to rediscover my calm. Sometimes I needed several days or even weeks to let my heartbeat relax, knowing how unfairly the authorities had acted in arresting such a wonderful monk, nun, or artist. I always waited until I felt serene before beginning any campaign. Thanks to this serenity, my words were gentle but firm, and people found it easier to cooperate."

She spent her life being a real peace activist and a deep practitioner of mindfulness meditation. And you can see that willingness to tune into the motivation first, always first, with all these tools to help transform the habits.

To me, this is the work of our lifetime, and all of our life is part of it. There's nothing outside of it. Every time we speak, every time we act—we're going to blow it ten million times, but it's always an opportunity to see what's going on.

Thank you for your kind attention.

CHAPTER 182

Awareness with Thinking

Carol Wilson · 42 min

> In this dharma talk, Carol Wilson addresses one of the most challenging aspects of meditation practice: working skillfully with thinking. She observes how practitioners often believe that successful meditation means having no thoughts, when in fact the path to freedom lies in recognizing thought as simply another sense door experience—the sixth sense door in Buddhist psychology—equal to seeing, hearing, and other sensory experiences.
>
> Wilson shares insights from her own retreat practice, noting how the mind habitually prioritizes thinking over other sense experiences, treating thoughts as more real and more connected to a sense of self. She explains that the shift from being lost in thought to recognizing "a thought is a thought" is genuinely world-changing. Drawing on teachings from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche and Ajahn Sumedho, she illuminates the ephemeral nature of thought energy itself—how thoughts arise from nothing and dissolve into nothing, like a puff of air. The classic Tibetan analogy of the dog versus the lion illustrates the difference between chasing after thoughts and resting in awareness at their source.
>
> Practical guidance is offered for developing this skill: appreciating moments when awareness returns after being lost in thought, using neutral easily-observable experiences to refresh awareness when thinking becomes overwhelming, and approaching the exploration with curiosity rather than aversion. Wilson emphasizes that thoughts themselves aren't the problem—it's the unconscious believing in their content that creates dukkha. Through patient practice, we can learn to use thinking as a tool rather than being driven by it, fundamentally changing our relationship to experience.

So I wanted to just say a few things this afternoon about awareness with thinking.

We've talked about it a bit. Alexis brought it up this morning. Of course, the thought process is certainly one of the more significant experiences that we could possibly be aware of, right? Takes up a lot of airtime, doesn't it, in your practice? You wish it didn't.

How much of the suffering that we're experiencing in our practice here, on a moment-to-moment basis—the discontent or dis-ease—is connected with thought, with thinking? It can be so frequent, especially if you're new to this style or new to practice at all. The idea is so common that if we're doing well, we're getting to a point where we're not thinking, or hardly thinking at all. And that peace is really about not having thoughts.

Which, I mean, in one way that's true, right? When there aren't a lot of thoughts and we're aware, it is peaceful. But that's not like the peace to end all peace. That's a condition.

I remember many years ago, I read a short statement from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche. He said, you know, when we really look at the nature of a thought, what is it? It's like poof. It's so nothing. And so therefore there's no logical reason why thoughts should bother us so much and we get so caught up in them. That part wasn't so helpful, right?

But it's actually quite fascinating once we begin to—as we continue to for our whole life and practice—include thinking as the sixth sense door and bring in awareness with the quality of curiosity, that receptive curiosity that Alexis was talking about today, really just exploring what it is. It can be fascinating. And also, it's incredibly revealing, almost amazing, when the shift happens in one's experience—from being really in the thought, where the thought describes the world, describes us, and we don't think of it as describing reality but as actually being reality, even though the reality of one moment is completely different from five minutes later, we're caught, we're totally caught—the shift from that to recognizing, "Oh, a thought is a thought." It's world changing.

The same story can be going on in my mind, and I think, "Oh yeah, that's thinking." It's completely different from the believing.

So just to begin to explore, to continue to explore—it's quite fascinating. When I was doing a self-retreat for a few weeks earlier this winter, I was somewhere not home and practicing in this style, meaning being with awareness and not having a really rigid structure at all, just being aware with whatever was going on, all the sixth sense doors as we've described. And for some reason, just the interest was piqued in exploring thought more.

What piqued it was I was noticing, as I'm walking around, or I'm doing the dishes, or sitting, or whatever, all the sixth sense experiences are occurring, correct? You're seeing, you're hearing, there are physical sensations, maybe not as much taste and smell, but some, and thinking. And I started to notice, in terms of receptive awareness rather than planning, how much more priority or importance my mind or my attention was giving to thinking than it was to hearing or seeing. Thinking—that's the real thing, which was causing immense suffering. But that's the real thing. And I could see, oh, that's the habit.

So you're doing the dishes. And even if we think we're being mindful, we're thinking about doing the dishes. And sometimes, when we see this with awareness, it's fun to see. But then when you think about how much it's happening, sometimes the thinking about doing the dishes—it's almost like we take that for the reality. More in touch with the thinking about doing the dishes than just the simplicity of the sensations.

That is a simple example. But I've been exploring thought for years, and this was just a piece I hadn't seen: a sense of prioritizing the thought door as more important than any other sense door. In other words, that was more me. Let's face it, when it's important, why is it important?

Because somehow it's about me. It's creating a sense of me. Or I don't like it, or I do like it—that's creating the sense of me.

There is hearing, the beautiful birds, peace. Okay, that's nice. But what about me? Let's think about something. That's what the mind does. It's more interesting. We'd rather think ourselves into a suffering story about me than just rest at ease with seeing and hearing and thinking and sensing.

But I'm not getting anywhere with this. What can I do to make it a little more interesting? What can I do to get somewhere? What can I compare it to? What does this mean about me?

Nothing. And we hate that.

So first, noticing how—and it may not be true for you; we're all different, I'm not saying we all prioritize thought—but it was just interesting for me to see how somehow I gave thought more reality. And what's so interesting is it actually has less reality, the content.

When we're not recognizing thought energy as a thought, that's when we get so carried away. The thought arises: I like this. What can I do? How can I have more? What does it mean about me? All the different memories. And then there's a whole sense of me that gets created just like that.

Or the thought could be: I'm here to meditate and thoughts are bad. That's a thought, based on an idea. So when a thought comes, the other thought—that thoughts are bad—comes up, and that brings aversion. Then we have this resistance to thought, and thought becomes a real problem. But it's not thought that's the problem. It's the not recognizing: thinking is thinking, seeing is seeing, hearing is hearing.

Without recognizing that a thought is just a thought, it takes us so far, so fast. Thought is a useful tool—it's not that thinking is bad. It's not. We want to understand how it works so that it becomes an amazing tool in the world. But when we don't understand how it works, it's running us.

Have you felt that at all since you've been here? Whipped around by your thoughts? And doesn't it feel so real, what they're telling you?

When people describe their experience in the group, they'll talk about a period where it was so difficult. And something difficult is happening—something unpleasant that is difficult to be with. That's not necessarily thinking; that can be happening, for sure. And our training, our habit, isn't to be able to rest at ease with the unpleasant.

So something's going on that's difficult, and that unpleasant feeling gives rise to aversion out of habit. And that aversion usually gives rise to some kind of description, explanation, what's wrong, how can I make it better—an assessment of practice, an assessment of yourself, an assessment of your whole life. Really, all of that in just moments. And there's this strong sense that this is reality, isn't there?

We're assuming this is an unpleasant assessment at this moment because something difficult was happening. But it feels true. It's me.

And then people talk about later—the next hour or the next morning—and it's all completely changed. Because experience—seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching—is arising and passing in every mind moment.

There's no stability of objects. That's how our world is. And so, of course, it's changed. By the next morning, it's changed ten million times already. But we're just noticing it in slower motion—how our stories change. The next morning, something completely different arises: something lovely, or just the evaporation of that suffering, that dukkha, and a different story emerges. "Oh, pleasant."

Maybe there's just balance with it, no clinging, and then there wouldn't be much thought about it. Maybe there's a little clinging—normal—and we think, "What did I do? How did I get there?" Or, "This is so great," and whatever story follows. And that also feels equally true and real.

When we're not recognizing the actuality of thought as a thought, it's amazing how we keep getting sucked in. It really is. Just think a very simple thought: "The sky is blue." You've probably thought five others since that. "The sky is blue." It comes up, and where does it go? What is it? It's nothing, right? "The sky is blue." Look at the thought energy of that. It's really ephemeral. It's really nothing. Do you get a sense of that?

All thoughts are like that. A thought is a thought. The content of a thought can be anything—beautiful, neutral. It can be helpful, it can be unhelpful, it can be really awful. That thought energy itself is just a puff. And what makes it more solid isn't the thought itself, but that we're not recognizing it as such, believing the content instead. So then the scary thought arises, and then the whole nine yards, the whole thing starts. Emotions come with it. They keep the thoughts going.

Some thoughts are heavy. Some thoughts are poof, just like that—neutral. Notice those little neutral ones, because that's a way to keep exploring, reminding ourselves, "Oh, that's thought energy. It's empty." And notice when it's gone. Ajahn Sumedho talks a lot about noticing this. With little thoughts—the big ones you may not notice ending right away—when little ones are gone, there's often a little space before the next one. Honestly, sometimes there is a little space before the next one. Often we don't notice the space.

Where does the thought come from? Where does it go? It's nothing. The thought itself is nothing. Just let in the possibility that if there's a little space—don't grab it, then it's gone—but just noticing that. It's the ground that thoughts come out of. It gets really fascinating.

And this is, of course, something you can't play with when the thought has a lot of juice in it, when we're caught in the content or when it comes together with strong emotion. But there are so many thoughts that are just like—la, la, la, la—stupid, a hundred million times stupid. And you have them so many times. You sit down and you just can't relax until you think of the name of that actor who was in that movie in 2002, and you can't remember the name of the movie either, but it reminds you of something. And you just can't relax until you think of it.

A good use of our time. How many thoughts are just blah, blah, blah, blah, blah? So those ones—not to be aversive—that's really where you can play with recognizing the nature of thought. Honestly, the more we get familiar with it, it is so freeing.

I remember—not exactly when—but the first time that I actually recognized with something that was a little difficult: "Oh, that's thinking. Thinking." It was just like, "Oh, that's thinking. It's not the whole world describing itself. It's just a series of thoughts that are unpleasant. And there's fear, which is an arising experience we can be aware of as well." That's what's happening now. That's always available.

The Tibetan tradition gives this example—I've read it many times—of how a normal person not practicing relates with thoughts versus how a yogi would relate with thoughts. Maybe you've heard this; it's quite well known. It's like the difference between throwing a rock at a dog and throwing the rock at a lion. I don't know who of us would have had the experience of throwing a rock at either one, particularly a lion, but the example gives a good metaphor.

You throw the rock at the dog, and the dog looks and goes chasing all over, following the rock. It just gets into a whole flurry, and it doesn't ever see where the rock came from. It's just following the rock. You throw the rock at the lion, and it just sits there and looks right at the source of the rock—which is you. It doesn't go anywhere, just right at the source.

So they're saying that for an unpracticed person, or in our normal habit, the thought comes and we just go running off in it. Whatever it is, we just take off into that thought and the whole world it creates—pleasant or unpleasant, liking it or not, we're just off in it. But when we're with awareness, learning to just have awareness that thinking is happening, awareness simply notices the thought as it is. That's all. Whatever the content is, it's thought energy with some content. "Yeah, that's thought." And the nature of thought itself takes us right back into relaxed awareness, into the simplicity of non-identification.

So how many thoughts do we have in a day? A lot. So that's a lot of opportunity. Be happy with the next thought! It's a lot of opportunity to really explore this, to see without judgment. Thoughts are going to happen. The ear hears, the mind thinks. It's normal. And it's useful—we use thoughts.

So when we're feeling it's a problem, widen the awareness first and check. There will be some resistance, some disliking, some idea that this shouldn't be happening, once you've recognized it's thinking. But when you're all caught up in a story, see if you can just go, "Oh, thinking." Not push it away, but turn around and—like the lion—just notice. That energy of thinking. That's what we can play with.

It's not easy, so just a couple of little tips. We often mention these simple ways in our awareness practice: first, just recognizing that we can include thought, thinking, as simply another arising object, same as any other object. Really let that in, especially if lurking in the back of your subconscious is the idea that no thought is better than thought—and maybe that you like no thought better than thought. Just be aware of that. Because if we're not, then as soon as thought comes in, there's this subtle sense that it would be better if this weren't happening. We already know the suffering that comes from that. Then you notice that. But anyway, just having in mind that thought is equally valid—not better, not worse—an object of awareness like anything else.

But of course, it's trickier. Think of how slippery and quick and subtle thoughts are, and also what I mentioned before—the power we give them by believing so implicitly in their content or the energy underneath. So it's slipperier. This is where it becomes a practice, and we can really use skillful means.

We've all said several times: when you're lost in thought and suddenly awareness returns—not an act of personal will, just suddenly, "Oh, I'm thinking"—appreciate that moment of awareness. This appreciation helps us become familiar with how it feels when there's awareness while thinking is happening. Often the thinking will stop, and that's fine. Don't set up expectations like, "I should be able to keep thinking and be aware." There are many different ways this unfolds. Just start to appreciate when awareness comes with thinking. That's one thing.

And there are times when awareness arises and the thinking keeps going. You can be aware and watch what it does. You see how wanting comes up and makes this story, and then you're off in it. Normal. Don't get down on yourself—that's normal.

When we're starting to explore what U Tejaniya suggests, and of course we would all suggest it, you titrate, just as when something is difficult. You get interested in watching thinking, but then you're getting lost a lot. Come back. Pick again a neutral, really easily observable experience to refresh the awareness, to help steady and balance the awareness again. You probably won't have to wait long for more thoughts to come up.

There are times when the mind is more balanced—you're more calm, the interest is high, there's not a lot of suffering or resistance. That might be a time when you think, "I could really explore thinking a little now," because you're not in such a reactive space. And an hour later, you're doing something else, and you think, "I'll explore thinking," but you just get swept away. That's going to happen. At those times, come back to something easier to be with, to refresh the awareness.

So it's a skill, really a skill that we all can learn if you're not used to it. And it's so freeing. It can change our whole relationship to our experience, to explore thinking in this way and not be afraid of thinking—to be able to use thought rather than being driven by it.

Okay, that's enough. As I said, I could go on and on. So again, really patience with the thinking process. We're remembering none of it is personal—it's just nature. And the thoughts that grip us, there are causes that bring them about. What keeps it going? Widen the attention, and you'll see there's strong emotion underneath, or wanting that's feeding it, or some idea that keeps surfacing. Get curious: What's going on with this? It's a fine object of awareness—a fine object of awareness. And awareness is being strengthened in doing that.

So thanks for your attention. Just let yourself settle. Maybe take a moment to let your attention sink into feeling the body, just being present. It's been a lot of words. Just let awareness rest with a simple experience.

And just noticing how the body feels, how the mind feels, what the mood is. We're not trying to glom on to some experience, but just settling, opening, relaxing any wanting or resistance to just being fully here in this moment. No expectations, no needs. It's just like this now. And awareness just notices whatever arises now.

May the wholesome energies generated by our practice be shared with all beings for their happiness and well-being. May all beings live with wisdom and compassion.

So thank you all. And just let awareness accompany you, seeing what choice the mind makes to stand up, to go to awareness in movement, or something else. It's interesting to see what's making the choice for our own well-being.

CHAPTER 183

Unentangled Knowing

Carol Wilson · 44 min

In this profound talk, Carol Wilson weaves together teachings from multiple Buddhist traditions to illuminate the nature of 'unentangled knowing'—the simple, complete awareness of what's happening without adding anything extra. Drawing from the opening verse of the Visuddhimagga (Path of Purification), she explores the question posed to the Buddha: 'Who can untangle this tangle?'

Wilson shares Thanissaro Bhikkhu's insight that saṃsāra is not a place but a process—'the tendency to keep creating worlds and then moving into them.' She pairs this with Ajahn Sumedho's teaching that both saṃsāra and nibbāna are 'modes of perception,' with saṃsāra being perception through the lens of 'me, me, me.' The talk explores how misperception—seeing changing experiences as a solid, separate self—lies at the root of our confusion, echoing teachings from the Dalai Lama and Thích Nhất Hạnh.

Practically, Wilson emphasizes having 'confidence in awareness' rather than confidence in our reactive patterns. She shares Ajahn Sumedho's example of making a determination (adhiṭṭhāna) to trust awareness during difficult times. Through personal examples and the teaching of Thai laywoman Upāsikā Kee Nanayon, she illustrates how accurate recognition naturally dissolves confused responses without effort. The talk includes Thích Nhất Hạnh's teachings on interdependence and emptiness, showing how unentangled knowing reveals our fundamental connectedness and naturally gives rise to compassion.

Are you aware? Are you aware of being aware? And it doesn't matter what's past, because now—are you aware now? That's our whole practice, that's it.

I wanted to riff some more on the inner tangle and the outer tangle. It's the verse that introduces the Visuddhimagga, which is a really long commentary. It's not the original Pali discourses of the Buddha—it was written in about 500 A.D. in Sri Lanka. Some people really like it and some don't, so I'm not saying anything about the quality, but it's really huge.

The poem is, as Mark said, "The inner tangle and the outer tangle. This generation is entangled in a tangle. And so I ask of Gotama this question: who can untangle this tangle?" And then there's this whole giant book, which goes through all the different practices. The Path of Purification is what it's called.

Here's another description I've been loving lately, the last couple of years, that I think describes the tangle. This is from Thanissaro Bhikkhu. He's talking about samsara:

"Samsara literally means 'wandering on.' Many people think of it as the Buddhist name for the place where we currently live and the place we leave when we go to Nibbana. But in early Buddhist texts, samsara is not the answer to 'where are we?'—it's the answer to 'what are we doing?' It's not a place, it's a process. The tendency to keep creating worlds and then moving into them. As one world falls apart, your mind creates another, and you go there. At the same time, you bump into other people who are creating their own worlds, too."

Does that make sense? And you wonder why none of us know what's going on, creating all these worlds around. But you can see that on a moment-to-moment level. So untangling the tangle is finding a way to move out of this samsara-ing—not going somewhere else to nibbana, but being here in a clearer way.

Ajahn Sumedho, on the same theme, also talks about samsara. He says, "Samsara and nibbana are not places to go, but modes of perception." I love this because to me it cuts to the heart of it. Modes of perception. Samsara is perception from or through personality belief, personality view. Or to just cut to the chase, it's from or through the view of me, me, me—the center of everything. I don't know if you can relate to ever having experienced a moment like that.

So that's samsara-ing, the mode of perception. I did mention a few nights ago that this is how His Holiness the Dalai Lama and also Thich Nhat Hanh describe the source of our confusion and suffering—as being misperception. And this is really the heart of the misperception: perceiving any particular experience of the six sense experiences that come and go as me or mine, or having any kind of perception, in a moment—this is just moment to moment—of me as a separate ongoing entity.

This isn't something to think about. I mean, God knows we can think about it. But perception isn't something we think through. It's just suddenly you see in a different way. That's what insight is. You can't think your way into insight, but suddenly, boom, you see in a different way. That's the power of continuous receptive awareness.

So back to who can untangle this tangle. There's the whole of the Visuddhimagga, but there's a shortcut. And guess what that shortcut is? Continuous, steady awareness, pure and simple. There's a book called Pure and Simple that contains the teachings of a Thai laywoman from the last century, Upasika Kee. It's thick, but very, very powerful, very clear understanding.

unentangled knowing. And so it fits perfectly. Unentangled knowing is simply, in a moment, the simple, complete awareness of what's happening just as it is without adding anything extra.

So this isn't any new information. But the power of this steady, steady awareness as it begins to get momentum—that's the condition for wisdom. And you could describe wisdom as accurate recognition. When something is recognized accurately, all the confusing responses—the greed, the hatred, the confusion, the stories of me—tend to drop away. It's not like you have to think your way out of them.

Mark's story the other night about when he was in the bathroom is a great example. The music started playing. That's a great story. And it's good to see these stories in our own experience, even little ones, because it's exactly the same process as being in a big, really suffering, tormented story in our minds.

Seeing how samsara-ing works, how the mind creates a world and we enter into it—he didn't create that beautiful marble urinal, that was already there. But he entered into it fully, like, "Wow, this is so amazing." So just seeing how you go in and the mind is already in some kind of "Wow, this is an amazing place." And then the whole thing that went on—the music and all the thoughts about it. What he told us later, he was thinking things like, "I wonder how much it costs for them to put in this sound system. It's so good." So that's not an obviously suffering experience, but it's a world he entered into.

And in the moment when he picked up his phone again and saw, "Oh, this is coming from my phone"—if you don't add any extra, all the other stuff just falls away. The amazing sound system, well, you don't think anymore about it because clearly there isn't an amazing sound system. All the wondering, all the amazement—it drops because it has nothing to do with reality. And that's a moment of wisdom. That's how wisdom functions. The confusion, when the misperception shifts and is recognized accurately, all the confused ideas and responses just fall away. So we don't have to somehow dig them all up and put them aside. For that moment—that's the thing. They don't fall away forever.

But this unentangled knowing, what we're doing here—I'm saying all this to try and give us more and more faith, more and more sense of trust and confidence in this steadiness of awareness, because it so often doesn't seem like that much is happening. But with the continuity of awareness, which as many of you are saying, you can feel that growing—not having some idea you never space out, of course we do—but the more that there's confidence in awareness... This is a way that Ajahn Sumedho often talks. He talks about having and reminding himself to have confidence in awareness.

What we mostly have confidence in is all our reactions of mind. So when something comes up that's difficult, the natural response, the habit of mind—it's not that we plan it—is aversion. Unpleasant, aversion. We've talked about that. And then how fast that leads to a whole world. This isn't new information. But awareness isn't aversive. It isn't me. It's just watching the whole process. It's not trying to stop it.

But having confidence in the awareness—it's that foreground-background shift. The whole thing goes on, but it's a completely different experience. There's no me in it when there's confidence in it. There's me in the story. But awareness isn't me. And it just is unfolding. And actually, one feels more in it.

It's not unfolding over there somewhere while I remain detached, not really feeling it because I'm aware. Actually, there's no resistance anymore. Resistance is one of the effects of me resisting experience. When there's confidence in awareness, things are seen with continuity.

A moment of awareness, as we've said, isn't feeding the greed or the aversion. It's not feeding the story, and the story is always fed by greed or aversion or the sense of me. And the sense of me—that's really the misperception that feeds greed and aversion anyway. It's rare to find otherwise. I want to say it couldn't be any other way, but I wouldn't dare say that. But it's pretty rare. I'd like you to tell me if you find an example where there's a lot of greed or aversion coming up in your mind but no sense of me involved in it. I don't think so. Even when we're angry about how someone else is being treated, when we're really angry in the aversion—not a sense of kindness, but just really I'm angry—there's a way it's about me.

So interesting.

When Ajahn Sumedho talks about having confidence in awareness, that's inspired me a lot because he's about 85 now, I think. He's been practicing as a monk for fifty or sixty years. And what he talks about now all the time—I often listen to him online—is receptive awareness, intuitive awareness, he calls it. That's absolutely just every moment, the steadiness of intuitive awareness, unentangled knowing, to use Ajahn Chah's language. So it's not like that's new to him.

But not so long ago, I was in a small group at some retreat he was teaching. He was talking about how he would have to, at times, take a firm stand, like a resolution in his mind, to have confidence in awareness. He was describing a time at his monastery where there was really a lot of difficulty going on, very difficult stuff. He being the head of it, and some of his decisions were creating some of the difficulty. But anyway, being the head of it, all the stuff that was directed at him—the blame and the anger and everything directed at him. And he said, "My personality doesn't like that. I was really suffering with all this stuff coming at me. I really didn't like it and was starting to get involved in reaction."

And then he said, that's when he knew he had to really take a resolution. Determine—that's the word he used. "I made a determination to have confidence in awareness." That was very inspiring to me.

Resolution, determination—it's a specific quality of mind. It's a mental factor that we can actually experience. And it's neutral, because you could have a determination to do something unwholesome. So it's ethically neutral, depending on what the determination is. But it's a quality of mind that's like—you could say it's the Nike thing: just do it. But without aversion or judgment. Instead of flopping around—maybe I should, maybe I shouldn't, oh, it'd be nice to trust in awareness, but stuff's kind of hard right now, whatever it is—just do it. There's a sense of, in a moment—not forever, just a moment—of stability.

Adhiṭṭhāna is the word in Pali; it means resolution. So when he said "I made a determination," he was tuning into that mental quality in his mind, which we all can, but we often don't think to notice it. And it's not greed or aversion—just take refuge in awareness.

And that's really what we're practicing here. When something difficult or beautiful is going on and we feel all involved in it, taking refuge in awareness is like almost opening to the experience more, but just let the awareness in. We don't create it; just let it in. I find just remembering that again and again, the whole experience becomes all-inclusive, because awareness isn't me. In a moment of just receptive awareness, there's not Carol identifying with anything. When there's identification, then it's my awareness—that's different. You can feel the difference. But when it's just receptive awareness, everything's just happening. Not trying to name what's happening, the feelings are there, but it's a completely different way of being, as I'm sure you all know.

And it's nothing we can create with an act of will. I'm sure we've all spent plenty of time trying, and we still will. What we can do is set up the willingness to receive awareness and then just keep setting up that willingness. It seems to come, and then it goes. But the more we are willing to have that confidence, the more we are willing to see, to trust how steady awareness actually begins to release the particular tangle when it's seen accurately.

The tangle just releases. It's nothing we do personally. That's wisdom. Wisdom does the work. The more we recognize when that happens—and it's happening all the time.

Someone said today, you know, just entering into the world, seeing your mind create the world, entering into it, it falls apart and we enter into another world. Like someone said today—I hope you don't mind, you said it in the question period, but it was so perfect: "I'm the best yogi," and it's the whole world. And then the next day, "I'm the worst yogi," and it's the whole world. You're not the only one, right? And we totally believe each world.

And then there's the world of our memories and this and that. And then we're bumping into other people. And thank God we're not talking—that's one of the reasons we don't have talking on retreat, you know. Other people are in their world. But if they met you in the world where you thought you were God's gift to humankind, and you're talking to them, that's who they think you are. Then the next day, they're going to relate to you because that's who you think you are. But that day, you're no longer God's gift to humankind—you're a worm who doesn't deserve to live on the face of the earth. But they don't know that. And they're going through their different worlds too. And we're trying to have a society here... And we wonder why things are confused.

Sidetracking here. Okay.

I personally actually really enjoy—I love, actually—when there's enough awareness to receive, to see how in a particular experience the sense of me is arising and functioning, and how it is when that goes away. Because it comes and goes; it's just another world. There's not one "me" that we have to see through. It's just another world.

All aspects of the teaching, all aspects of the Buddhist teaching, are working to purify our hearts and minds, transform the habits. But the deepest transformation is through this element of wisdom.

And so, remember—I'm sure many of you know this quote from Shantideva, one of the Dalai Lama's favorite quotes, apparently. It's this: All the happiness I experience comes from wanting other people to be happy. All the suffering I experience comes from wanting only myself to be happy.

And it's easy to hear that as a should, you know, how we should be. But I want to say, I've just been noticing sometimes in little moments how that's actually a literal description. How when there's not that sense of referring it all back to me, the quality of heart and mind that comes out in a situation is actually a sense of happiness, whatever wholesome quality.

A simple little example I noticed last year. I was just sitting at home, and I guess I heard or read something—I must have been listening to news or the radio, I don't even know what. But somebody had done some nice, good thing. And it landed in a moment when my mind and heart was caught in a world of "you're not so good," in a world of very familiar self-judgment, right? So I kind of knew it was there, but not with confidence and awareness—just the kind of, okay, I know it's there, but it was coloring everything.

So the good thing, whatever the person did, was heard, and the immediate reaction was: Why didn't I think to do that? Right away, it's all about me. This good thing happens, and it's all about me—and it's suffering. It's not a happy "all about me."

Then later, I wasn't thinking. I was just watching.

Awareness was just watching that. Then I heard another thing—it was different. I wasn't thinking or trying to redo that experience. But I heard another good thing, something similar. And at that time, there was just an awareness that the other stuff wasn't there. The immediate response was simply, "Isn't that wonderful?" I felt so happy for the person, just so happy in general for that good thing to happen.

That's mudita, appreciative joy. It just naturally came—not thinking I should have it, nothing to do with me. When there's not the reference point present in the mind, the beautiful qualities come out. So just noticing when that happened, not clinging. I mean, it's gone. Of course we cling—that's the next thing.

But in terms of our steady awareness here, of course we notice when the difficulties are there. It's sort of like Alexis was saying today—you kind of feel some difficulty, and often that's like a little sign. It helps us bring awareness back in. Actually, Anam Thubten talks about that as a smoke signal for awareness, a smoke alarm for awareness. When you start to feel just a little discomfort in your body or mind, it's like, "Ah, bring in awareness again."

But equally important—notice when the difficulty goes. We often go, "Okay, nice," and then maybe space out. Notice the calm or the happiness or the mudita or the compassion. It's really important to let the awareness stay steady, to notice the whole thing. And so that little example with mudita—I've been noticing things like that more and more. That was a small one.

Sometimes, and this is only personal, it's different for everybody, but sometimes not listening to the news... I mean, there's plenty of suffering in the news. And you really have to titrate, pay attention to how much the heart and mind can take in before you're just going into a sinkhole. That's not out of avoidance, but it's always refreshing the awareness so we can open to what's happening. That's in our daily life, not different from retreat.

But I notice when I'm hearing something difficult and I'm in a me-space, it's either "I can't stand it" or "I think I shouldn't have this privilege because so many people are suffering"—which I can feel often. But there are other times when there's not the me, and the same tuning into something really painful or difficult occurs. We get plenty of chances to practice with this, but I'm not practicing. It just happens. There's not the me, and the pain lands. You really feel.

This is when awareness can open to the suffering, the dukkha, without any me-story about it. And it's just natural that some sense of connectedness comes up. I mean, I'm saying this, but it's just, "Oh. Wow, that's so hard. So many people like that." That's just a natural response of compassion. That's what's available when the me-ing isn't there.

Please don't take the sense of seeing that there's a lot of "me" personally, or that you're doing something wrong. I love watching it because it's just a deeply rooted habit based in the misperception that somehow we're a separate being, separate from other things and ongoing—that there's no changing nature. That's the perception, again and again and again.

With steady awareness, you'll see that even though it feels like a steady me, it's changing all the time. Like Tanissaro said, all these different worlds. It's a different me—a happy me, a sad me, this thought, that thought. What you're calling "me" might be a sensation. So just get interested, exploring it.

I wanted to go in a slightly different direction in terms of describing the misperception of a sense of separate self. You probably know how Thich Nhat Hanh always talked about it. He did die a couple of months ago, and I used to read and study with him a lot. I hadn't for quite some time.

And then I went back, watching little short videos of him, and was reminded of how sometimes the way he described things sounded almost too simplistic, or too nice. But there's actually a real depth of reality in it. So I just wanted to share a couple of things I'd written down.

He always talked about emptiness—empty of a separate self—as being really full of everything. If you've heard him at all, he would say a flower is nothing separate; it's full of the whole cosmos. You can't have a flower without the sun, without the oxygen, without the earth, without the earthworms. How did the earth get here? It's geological time—rocks ground down over millions of years. And where did they come from? The universe. It just goes on and on. You can't separate anything out.

He was describing a human being this way: as a human, you're full of your ancestors, the parents, the cells of your parents, back and back and back. Also all animals, minerals, plants. Take away any of these, and humans can't exist. So there's no way anything can really be separate from everything else. It's intellectual when we talk about it, but really, at times, that's what we're pointing to. Not that you have to think that way, but it's a misperception that somehow we're absolutely separate.

I found this note—I don't know who sent it to me, a couple of years ago. Maybe someone here. It's unsigned. But I just saw it today, and I thought, oh, that's kind of sweet: "I still only think about myself, but now I am the world." Delightful.

So how do we continue to discover this emptiness, this fullness? How do we perceive in this way? This is Thich Nhat Hanh again, talking about the kingdom of God, but he just means recognizing reality, freedom: "It's available twenty-four hours a day. The problem is whether we are available to know this. Or are we lost in the past, in the future, in wanting, in aversion?"

With mindfulness, he says, we're fully present in the here and now, fully alive in the here and now. Just one in-breath—no hard labor. Really, that simple. Just one in-breath, and we're fully alive in the here and now.

So you might notice, with awareness, that we all have moments—many moments a day—where there's this simplicity of unentangled knowing, this awareness he's talking about, present in the here and now. Just a moment. Maybe you could be doing anything: drinking tea, looking at the sunset, having pain in your leg. It could be anything. But where it's just completely this, and you may know other things going on, and there's no self-reflection about it. No "what does it mean about me?" No "I'm experiencing this"—although that might arise in the next moment. And it's not like big lights going off. It's just this, this, this.

Let that start to come in. Start to notice the alternate perception. The more the awareness gets steady, the more accurate perceptions can arise. The tangle—like the little story about the music—as soon as you see it, it drops away. More complicated ones do too. Many people here could describe some big storm that was going on, and then you see it somehow different, and it drops away completely. That's what's going on all the time.

So we're really just willing to have confidence in awareness. And that allows us to open into what's happening. The more we do that, the more we develop real trust—being with the beautiful is really important, recognizing the wholesome. But then we also become less afraid to be with the difficult, because we really start to understand that opening to difficulty also opens us into the sense of us all being in this together. Compassion naturally comes.

I think that's all I want to say. I thought there was some more, but I just want to close with this from the Dalai Lama.

He says, "Every morning I reflect on the truth of interdependence, that nothing exists as it appears. Nothing is separate, but all arising from connected conditions. And this understanding naturally gives rise to compassion for all beings suffering from being in this confusion."

So the steady awareness has the power to really change our understanding in amazing ways. Let's have confidence in awareness, quietly for a while.

May all the wholesome energies arising from our practice together—all of us here in this room, from our sincere intentions throughout the day—may all this wholesome energy be not for ourselves alone, but may we share it with all beings everywhere. May our practice truly be a cause for beings to be safe and protected. May all beings be free from fear. May all beings live with wisdom and compassion.

Thank you all for your sincere Dhamma energy, for being here together.

Continuing awareness now in whatever posture, whatever mode feels most supportive for you to refresh the awareness—whether it's walking or having tea or going outside. Come back to the next sitting if that seems appropriate, or do whatever supports awareness. Just trusting.

CHAPTER 184

Awareness and Wise Attitude (Online Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Carol Wilson · 53 min

> In this dharma talk from an online retreat in the style of Sayadaw U Tejaniya, Carol Wilson explores a profound teaching from Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche: the main purpose of dharma practice is to recognize the nature of the non-deluded mind and discover how the deluded mind works. She emphasizes that we don't need to create special conditions for the non-deluded mind—we simply need to recognize it again and again, while bringing genuine interest and investigation to understanding how the kilesas (greed, hatred, and delusion) function.
>
> Wilson offers practical guidance on tuning into the quality or attitude present in the mind that is aware. She distinguishes between moments of non-deluded awareness—marked by stability, calm, interest, or equanimity—and moments when kilesas color our perception and lead to suffering. Crucially, she explains that awareness alone doesn't liberate; it's wisdom (paññā) that arises through steady awareness which actually releases attachment. The five spiritual faculties (saddhā, viriya, sati, samādhi, paññā) naturally strengthen through this practice.
> Particularly valuable is her teaching on skillful means when difficult mind states become overwhelming. Rather than abandoning awareness or forcing ourselves to stay with an object that's too intense, we can consciously shift attention to something more neutral to refresh and re-establish balanced awareness. This isn't running away—it's honoring our commitment to recognizing wise awareness regardless of conditions. Wilson reminds us that dharma practice encompasses our whole life, including dāna, sīla, and bhāvanā, and that we practice not for ourselves alone but for the benefit of all beings.

What are you aware of as I begin to speak? Just noticing how it is—aware of body, mind, hearing, mood, emotion. There's a sense of what often happens to me: "Oh, now they're going to speak," and something relaxes. I'm sort of semi-aware but waiting for the entertainment. And I think, well, that isn't entertaining. I better go back to my own awareness.

But we never leave our own awareness. That's the thing.

So I'm going to speak a bit, as you no doubt expected. But please don't let that be some kind of break in awareness. Let awareness notice whatever is naturally occurring. If you missed some of my words, it probably won't make any difference in your life. If you hear them all, it might not make any difference either. So just being with whatever occurs—loving awareness more than needing something special to happen or stop happening.

What I wanted to speak about occurred in my mind last night: one of my favorite things that Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche wrote many years ago. I've always loved it. He says, "The main purpose of these Dharma teachings is to recognize the nature of the non-deluded mind, as well as to discover how the deluded mind works."

I love that. Recognize the nature of the non-deluded. Not create it, not create some amazing condition so finally we can get to a place where the non-deluded mind is sitting waiting for us. But just to recognize, again and again—as well as to discover how the deluded mind works.

Discover. To me, that brings in that quality we've been talking about in wise attitude: interest. Investigation. Allowing the mindful awareness to collect the data when the deluded mind is functioning—on the rare occasions that it shows up—rather than running and hiding and assuming we've failed.

In terms of Rinpoche saying the main purpose of these Dharma teachings, of our Dharma practice: I'm sure you know this, but just to highlight, we're not talking about only this meditation practice. We're not even talking about this way of being within recognizing awareness. Dharma practice for recognizing the non-deluded mind, trusting it, having faith in it, having confidence—that means our Dharma practice is our whole life. And what we're doing here, cultivating to recognize awareness that's available in our whole life, is really important. But the Buddha taught dāna, sīla, bhāvanā—generosity, morality, and mental cultivation. Our whole life. I just want to highlight that.

But now I'm talking about the slice of life of our practice here. The sense of recognizing and trusting the availability of awareness as soon as we think about it. And after a while, we don't have to think about it. It's arising, recognized naturally as it gets momentum.

And this aspect of getting more and more familiar with tuning into what we call wise attitude—the quality in the mind that's aware. Remember, we've been talking about wise attitude the whole time. But the more that becomes intrinsic, so much a part of recognizing awareness, the attitude in the mind, in the consciousness, becomes more and more obvious.

This is the place I want to speak to this morning: where we're really recognizing more and more moments of non-deluded mind, awareness of the non-deluded mind, and moments when there's awareness and the deluded aspect—the kilesas—is present.

The deluded mind is basically mind that in that moment is influenced by greed, hatred, or delusion, with delusion often manifesting as a sense of "me." When that's arising, not recognized in awareness, it influences perception, feeling tone, thought, action, and views—which is all too often how we're functioning in the world. From perception based on this awareness, but awareness influenced by greed, by aversion, by views. That's how we think about the world. That's how we act.

This awareness, though, and recognizing the awareness, recognizing the quality in the mind when it's deluded—that's an avenue into freedom from that.

So first, recognizing the non-deluded mind. Something that Andrea gave some examples of yesterday afternoon. Just in a little way. I'm not talking about going looking for the big explosion of nibbāna. That's nice. We're talking about moment-to-moment awareness of what's arising in the mind. And there are moments of presence of mind that are not kilesa-ridden.

I'm using kilesa because I don't really like the word "defilement." Kilesa meaning greed, hatred, confusion, sense of self—unrecognized. There are moments when, tuning in to the attitude in the mind that's aware, you might notice you're not really noticing greed or hatred.

There's maybe stability, maybe calm, maybe interest, maybe compassion, maybe just, "Ah, it's like this now." Equanimity. You don't have to make a big deal of it, but noticing—awareness noticing—"Oh yes, that's a moment of non-deluded mind."

And just as we're hopefully all getting more and more at ease with the naturalness, the non-excited flashiness of awareness, getting a sense of that—it's not some special thing—so normally we overlook it in our life. We get sucked into reacting to whatever's happening and just overlook awareness. Hence our practice together.

Often moments of non-deluded mind can be similar. We're looking for oneness, looking for the sense of love, and it just might be "just like this now." Just peace and space. Just lack of reactivity. Noticing those moments, you don't go clinging to them. Clinging might come, and then that moment's gone and clinging's here. Fine, next moment. But I just want to point that out. Stay with that.

And then there's discovering how the deluded mind works. Now, I would say—I'm not a mathematician or a statistician—I would say at least fifty percent of our practice, really I want to say ninety-two percent, but I'll stick with fifty percent of our practice, is discovering how the deluded mind works. Have you noticed anything about that during these few days? Have you noticed a moment of deluded mind arising? Yes? Thank you.

This is what's so wonderful about what we've been saying about awareness—that we're just recognizing what's the quality, what's the attitude in the mind that's aware. Because as we've said, though we need to keep learning to trust this: when there's greed arising, some kind of aversion, hatred, fear, delusion—and there's delusion under greed and aversion also—but the delusion, say, of a view: "It's supposed to be like this," and it's not, and we're really suffering and we don't catch that view, that attachment to that view. Or anytime there's a sense of me, sense of self, me or mine.

When that's arising in the awareness and we don't recognize it, awareness doesn't recognize it, that's when it colors the perception. Then we speak and act and wonder, "Why is everything so out of sync?" Have you ever noticed you're doing something, you think it should go like this, and it goes like that? Because what we're perceiving and what we're thinking is completely out of sync with reality. This is how the kilesas completely distort our perception, our views, our thoughts. This, folks, is what we're living with.

So just kind of hoping if we practice enough it'll go away—well, it hasn't worked yet for me. If it's worked for any of you, I'd like to know. "I just hope if I do this enough, it'll go away."

But what Sayadaw U Tejaniya talks about a lot—not only he, but I've learned so much from the way he speaks about it—is this encouragement: as we keep tuning into the attitude in the mind again and again, it becomes second nature as soon as there's awareness. And not just on retreat, but in our life. So you can't help but notice when there's wanting, when there's some kind of resistance or aversion. And it doesn't have to be so big it's rage—we tend not to miss that. But just the kind of, "I don't want to do this now. This isn't supposed to be happening." Or, "Oh, the greed is so strong." Or, "Oh me, I failed"—here's the sense of self again, believing it.

So our habit—maybe some of our habits, maybe you've transcended this habit, may it be so—the habit is we see this, and sometimes as awareness is strong and you're noticing the greed, the aversion, the sense of self, awareness just keeps on noticing it. So as we've said, that kilesa simply becomes the next arising object—a perfectly fine object to help us re-recognize awareness. No problem.

And sometimes just the awareness of noticing the greed, the aversion, the sense of me—awareness itself, when it's not distorted by that, is not feeding the kilesa. It's just letting it live its life in the light of awareness. So often, if the kilesa is not so strong and awareness isn't identified, then the kilesa may go away.

Awareness doesn't make the kilesa go away. Sometimes we think—and this is, you know—"I'm being mindful, but the greed is still here. What am I doing wrong?"

Have you ever had that thought? "I'm being mindful of this pain in my knee, and I recognize the awareness, but I still hate it. I'm not being mindful in the right way." This happens because we're imputing to awareness something it doesn't have. The title of one of Sayadaw U Tejaniya's books is Awareness Alone is Not Enough. Because it's not awareness that liberates. It's not awareness that releases the attachment. It's wisdom.

Wisdom is a quality that arises in the heart and mind. But the steadiness of awareness, bringing in the data of how the greed is working, how the aversion is working—this steady awareness is the condition that allows wisdom to come in and arise.

Have you ever had a time... let's pick greed. For me, greed is easier to watch somehow. It's not that I don't get caught in it, but I can observe it more easily. With sense of self, you watch it for a while and then boom, you're really caught. But you can really watch greed—"I really want this"—and there are times it just goes. Other times, the greed is really strong, and awareness is watching. But have you ever seen that somehow the greed gets stronger? You can tell. It's taken over. You're about to go with it.

So the habit can be to shut the awareness down. "Well, the awareness wasn't strong enough. It didn't get rid of the greed. I'm going to follow it." So we stop being aware. The greed doesn't want awareness there. It's like what Alexis was talking about when he got in an argument with his partner—you can see the aversion and the delusion, or the wanting to win, takes over. "I don't want to be aware. I want to go with the kilesa." Right? Kilesas have a life of their own. A moment of greed feeds the next moment of greed. A moment of aversion feeds the next moment of aversion. Delusion, of course, the same.

And the same is true with awareness, with sati. A moment of sati feeds the next, and the next, and the next. So it's really important when we become aware that the kilesa has gotten stronger not to check out of the awareness, thinking, "Well, it didn't stop it, so no good." There's awareness, but the wisdom's not there yet. The wisdom isn't strong.

When the wisdom gets really strong, that's the moment where the mind will go—and it's not you, it's not an act of will. It's different from saying, "Okay, I'm not going to go get this. I'm not going to go get this," and the greed's still there, but you're holding yourself back. Fine, that's restraint. And you can be watching the greed, but the greed's still arising. But there's a moment where the mind goes, "I don't need this." And the greed dissipates. Have you ever had a moment like that? Yes.

Aversion too—you're getting angry at somebody and you go, "Wait a minute, maybe I'm not seeing this right." The aversion dissipates. That's wisdom doing its job. It's not personal will.

And awareness, the steady awareness, brings along wholesome qualities: the interest, the energy to stay with it, the stability of mind to stay with it, the confidence, the faith to stay with it. And then the wisdom arises. Ah! This greed isn't really making me happy. It stops.

It doesn't feel like a willful, forceful action because you're not doing it. It's a letting go of doing. But what sets this up is the willingness. When the sense of self is really strong, don't think, "Oh, I failed—sense of self is taking over again." Instead—and this is what Sayadaw U Tejaniya says that has helped me so much—bring awareness along with you while the mind and body is acting out of kilesa. Bring the awareness along.

We don't like to. Why? Because it feels lousy. We don't like how it feels. So we pretend it's not happening and turn off the awareness. This is called delusion. It does not work in any terms of purifying the heart-mind.

Bring along the awareness. As Tejaniya is always saying, watch how greed does its job. I love that. Let's learn how sense of self does its job. Learn how aversion, how resistance does its job. Because that's just nature. The nature of the kilesas—that's a dhamma too. Kilesas are a dhamma too. Any arising phenomenon is a dhamma. It's part of nature. So we can't just turn away from it and hope that bad part of nature will go away. We can see the effects of that in the world in so many ways.

Bring awareness along. And this is where the confidence in awareness, the trust in the Dhamma, is really what feeds our heart and mind. Because sometimes it's a little thing—clinging, wanting to go eat something I shouldn't eat. I can be with that. Sometimes it's a big thing, where it's really painful to watch my stupid personality really identify with itself and go down that road again. Can I bring awareness along?

Awareness is okay to feel the unpleasant. We know this intellectually, but I keep finding it slipping in the back of my mind: "Oh, I want to go to the pleasant. Oh, this can't be right because it's unpleasant. Something's wrong—this experience moment is unpleasant." Hello, vedana! Pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—constantly changing every instant. You think if you keep getting more aware, the unpleasant and the neutral go away and you only get pleasant? Somehow that idea is back in there. It's not going to happen.

But awareness—that's okay. The pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. This is what we're learning to recognize and trust. That's the refuge in awareness rather than the refuge in object.

So the wholesome qualities that steady awareness and our trusting it brings along—the first of these is saddhā, faith, confidence in awareness itself, in our practice, in this. Sayadaw U Pandita said to me, "Awareness—you can be with anything." Just confidence. And that gives us the energy, just the willingness to hang with it for this next instant. Who knows how long it's going to last? And it's possible for experience to get stronger than awareness, and it can't be there—it's too hard. I'll say a little about that at the end, if I remember.

And then there's the mindfulness, of course. And all of this together brings the stability, the samādhi. And these together allow the wisdom to arise. The five spiritual faculties, all coming naturally with our steady awareness. And so this grows and grows.

We start to see and learn how the kilesas do their job. We discover how the deluded mind works. It's really helpful to see.

So when I start to notice aversion arising—hopefully I start to notice when it's arising, not half an hour into it—I'm not afraid of it, not thinking, "Oh God, I failed again." Here's aversion. That's the nature. Given this set of conditions, aversion arises. That's just the nature. But as soon as there's a thought of awareness, awareness also is present. We can watch that without engaging in it. We're feeling it fully. It's not at a distance, but awareness isn't averse. Watch how much wisdom comes in. It doesn't last nearly as long. And more and more, awareness is just understanding the nature of this life of mind and body—recognizing how the non-deluded mind is, discovering how the deluded mind works.

Awareness is equally available, always accessible. The refuge in awareness, the love of awareness rather than the attachment to what's occurring—this is really, as Ajahn Sumedho often talks about, awareness as a doorway to freedom. So we don't make it some big whoo-hoo, just right now. Awareness. And more and more, getting a feeling for the attitude in the mind. Not wanting it to be a certain way. It's like this now. It's like this now. Not leaning into wanting it different. Not expecting how it should be. Just this total, "Ah, it's like this now."

So let's just sit quietly together for some time, as it's like this now.

May this wholesome, beneficial energy that is created through our sincere practice together and alone, through each of our personal dedication to wisdom and compassion, to recognizing and living from goodness, our natural goodness—may these beneficial, wholesome energies spread out and be shared with all beings in all realms in this universe, as well as this world.

May the wholesome energies of our practice be not for ourselves alone, although may it support our awakening from confusion. May it also support the awakening from confusion of all beings.

Really knowing we're not practicing for ourselves alone can be a source of strengthening faith and confidence, willingness to meet whatever arises with awareness and interest and friendliness.

May all beings be free from suffering. May all beings know happiness and the causes of happiness. May all beings live with wisdom and compassion.

For me personally, it's nice to sit together with all of you after days of just sitting alone at home. It's nice. Thank you all for your presence.

One comment I wanted to make—I did remember, which in itself is amazing. We've talked about this before, but I just wanted to remind us that it's a skillful means thing. There are times when you're rested, you're aware, the attitude in the mind is interest, but the object is really one of the kilesas—strong rage or shame or greed or total personality view, identification, whatever it is. And you recognize there's awareness and the willingness to be with. It feels like you're really being aware in a very clear way. But the difficulty of the object is just getting stronger and stronger. That's out of our control.

So in a way, you could say that the energy of the object—the wanting, the fear, whatever—is stronger at that moment than the energy of the awareness, even with your sincere intention. And you can recognize it just because you can feel like it's getting out of control. Of course it was never in control, but you feel like the more you pay attention, the worse it gets—not just unpleasant, but the awareness is just getting too shaky.

So at that point, this is really very important. Remember that our intention here is not to fix the object, not to get to the end of that object, not to see it off. It's not to "note it off," as is sometimes said in the Mahasi system.

Our commitment is to keep on remembering to recognize balanced awareness, to keep refreshing the awareness.

So when the object is too much, this skillful means is to really consciously shift your awareness to some obvious and more neutral experience that's happening right now. It could be anything. It could be some sensation in the body, or your fingers touching, or hearing, or seeing. You're not abandoning awareness—you're shifting to an object that's more neutral, and then you can refresh, re-recognize what awareness with wise attitude feels like. "Oh yeah, right."

It may take a few moments, because the other moments are still having an influence. Let's say you're feeling your finger, but you're still lost in fear—just keep on bringing the awareness, awareness, awareness to something neutral. And then you'll start to re-cognize balanced awareness again. Refresh the awareness, and do this a lot. It's sort of what Sayadaw would do when he would stick that inhaler thing in his nose—sometimes it takes something strong. But it's just to refresh the awareness. It's not running away.

Running away is when we shut down awareness altogether, which sometimes is what we've got to do. And then awareness will come back, whether we want it to or not. Here it is again. We can't really run away. And that's a wonderful thing.

So I just wanted to put that out as a skillful means. And please don't feel like it's a failure if you use it. It's a success, because you're really seeing that your commitment is to refreshing and re-recognizing balanced awareness, no matter what's happening.

CHAPTER 185

Three Jobs of a Yogi

Carol Wilson · 49 min

> In this foundational talk, Carol Wilson presents Sayadaw U Tejaniya's elegant framework for vipassanā practice: the three jobs of a yogi. These are experiencing mind and body directly, maintaining moment-to-moment awareness, and cultivating right understanding. Wilson emphasizes the Buddha's practical approach—not creating elaborate philosophy, but offering tools to understand why we suffer and how we can be free.
>
> The talk explores how we habitually add layers of reactivity and assumption to simple sense experiences, using vivid examples from retreats in Asia where construction noise became a powerful teaching on the nature of aversion. Wilson explains how steady awareness with wise understanding—seeing experiences as nature arising through causes and conditions—transforms our relationship to both pleasant and unpleasant experiences. She references the insight knowledge of yathābhūta-ñāṇadassana (knowledge and vision of things as they have come to be) as the fruit of this practice.
> Practical guidance includes recognizing the shift from being identified with experience to resting in awareness itself, what Wilson calls "a shift of refuge." She draws on teachings from Mingyur Rinpoche and Thich Nhat Hanh's concept of "the miracle of mindfulness," illustrating how this simple recognition opens access to natural compassion and wisdom. The talk concludes with encouragement for continuous practice throughout all daily activities, reversing typical retreat priorities to emphasize awareness during ordinary moments as most essential.

So tonight I'm hoping to just give a general overview, a sense of what's the purpose, how this works in a very general way. The idea is that it'll give you enough impetus to keep going for another day.

What I've always been inspired by, what got me interested in Buddhism in the first place and why I trusted the teachings of the Buddha from the beginning, is because it seems so practical. Everything he was teaching, everything he was sharing—and he said this many times—was to help us normal people understand why we suffer and why we don't need to. What we're doing based on our confused interpretations of life that causes us more suffering. So he's being very practical and direct, not trying to give us a whole philosophy—then you look at how many Buddhist texts there are, amazing, right? But if you just cut to the chase, cut to the practice, what he's really teaching, it can really be quite simple and basic. And amazingly, it's amazing really, how this simpleness of mindful awareness, steadily recognized throughout all our activities with a mind that's not caught up in reactivity and projection, how that can be so liberating. We call it the liberating simplicity of mindfulness. Thich Nhat Hanh called it the miracle of mindfulness. It's really quite amazing.

It's not that the mindfulness takes us to creating something different or into a different world. It took me years to suddenly recognize that when the Buddha woke up, he woke up into the same world that he was living in before. He didn't float on a cloud somewhere, and he was called the peaceful one. But he still had to deal with all the regular aspects of life that we all have to deal with, for forty-five years. So the difference wasn't that somehow everything got pleasant and all the unpleasant things went away. Not at all. But the difference was in the understanding, how he recognized and thus understood reality.

And so that's really what our practice is offering us—the opportunity to explore moment after moment after moment in a very simple way. And it's a shift in understanding that's not about thinking about it. We talk and talk about all the different techniques, but it's all about our own moment-to-moment experience. That's what shifts the confusion that we don't even know we're living in. That's the whole point. We don't even know. We wouldn't do this stuff on purpose, right? We wouldn't say, "Let me choose how to relate to reality in a way that's going to make me really much more tense than if I just let it be as it is."

We do what we do because we think it's the thing, whatever it is in the moment, that's going to bring us happiness or ease or bring peace to other people or be helpful in some way. And then when—not all the time, sometimes it is helpful—but then when it isn't and it blows up in our face, we go, "Well, somebody did something wrong. Probably not me, but somewhere in the world something's wrong. It shouldn't be happening like this." This is taking us in a whole different direction.

So what the Buddha saw is really that, and what he's speaking to, the seeds of suffering that arise in our own mind and heart. It's not that the Buddha's awakening could fix the world. And our practice and our sincere cultivation of wisdom and compassion, it does bring more understanding and peace and compassion to ourselves. We do respond in the world differently. That does affect people, but it's not going to fix the world. He couldn't end war between his own clans of his mother and father. But the suffering that he was pointing to is the confusion and the pain and the stress that's arising moment to moment—not every moment, but a lot of moments, more than we want—in our own mind and heart. And also to discover the peace, the ease, the compassion, the beautiful qualities that also arise right here, right at home, in our own mind and heart.

So he's offering us in this simple practice—the way we're offering here from Santa Eutasia Nia—giving us a tool that's very available to start to and to continue to explore, so that we start to understand: how are these seeds of suffering arising? How are they ceasing? They arise in a moment, they cease in a moment. How do the wholesome, beautiful qualities of compassion, of wisdom, of interest, of mindfulness, of collectedness of mind, of faith—how do those arise? What's the effect when there's wholesome in the mind? What's the effect when there's the suffering?

So it's not that we're trying to parse it out and write it on a piece of paper. It's handing us the tool to really explore and learn for ourselves. And when we see things accurately, as they really are—this is the miracle of mindfulness, as Thich Nhat Hanh called it. Because the accurate recognition, recognizing things as they truly are, is actually what allows for the wisdom that changes our response. It's really quite amazing. We don't have to figure it all out. Thank God, we're not doing such a good job. But we can trust—the more we're willing to trust, able to trust—the steady continuity of awareness that sets up the condition for this clear seeing.

In one of the lists of different kinds of insights, there's one that's quite a developed insight called yathābhūta ñāṇadassana, which means knowledge and vision of things as they have come to be.

That's a very deep, profound insight knowledge—as they have come to be in this moment.

So that's always available, right? As they've come to be in this moment. It's not an insight knowledge of going somewhere else. It's like, wow, this is how it really is right now. It doesn't seem like much, does it? But that is really what this practice is about.

One definition of Vipassana meditation—I think this is Sayadaw Tejaniya's definition of how we're offering the particular practice here, and I like it a lot: Vipassana meditation is experiencing the mind and body directly, from moment to moment, with the right understanding. At other times he calls these the three jobs of a yogi. You're all yogis. These are the only jobs you have here on the retreat: experiencing the mind and body directly from moment to moment—that's the perseverance, that's the continuity—with the right understanding. That's it. Of course, it's not so easy to do, but that's really a great definition of what we're doing, what we're learning here.

To talk about experiencing the mind and body directly, that's mindfulness. With the right understanding—I want to speak about both of those, just introducing them in a way. What does that mean?

As many of you have been doing different kinds of insight meditation for a long time, I'm sure most, if not all of you, are familiar with the basic idea of mindfulness: simply feeling, knowing what's happening in this moment. Sensation in the body, or as Alexis described, hearing a sound. We're talking about knowing with awareness that that's happening. But the simplicity of mindfulness without it being distorted by any kind of reactivity or assumption about what's happening—just letting this experience be totally present without adding anything extra—that's what's so tricky. Because so much of the time we don't know we're adding anything extra. We think that's just how it is. That sound is bad. It's driving me crazy. I'm going to lose it if that sound continues. And it's wrong—we're in a meditation center, it shouldn't be happening.

I go to sound a lot for examples because it's so clear it's happening outside of us, but it's exactly the same for a mood or a pain in the body or anything else. And also because when we're practicing in Asia, sound is the most incredible teaching tool you can imagine—it's inescapable, really loud. I think most of the meditation centers have some kind of clause written in that there should be construction going on no matter when. I don't think I've ever been in one when there wasn't some construction happening. And it should be as close to the meditation hall as possible. And it's always loud.

The first place I ever went, they had rebar—bang, bang, bang, bang, bang. And then they had an electric sander machine with this one high-pitched sound, and it would go on all day from seven in the morning until four in the afternoon. It was closer to where I was sitting than the back of the hall. After a couple of weeks, I finally thought I'd made peace with this high-pitched sound. And then, my God, they brought in a second one that had a different pitch. You just think you're going to lose it. And sometimes we do lose it—in the privacy of one's own hut. Anyway, that was a digression. That's why I use sound a lot.

So we often don't know that we're adding to our experience. This is what the steadiness of awareness brings in: the right understanding. As Alexis said yesterday, this operates at all levels, but one simple way to begin bringing in the idea of right understanding, wise understanding, is thinking of whatever's arising as simply nature, arising as the effect of causes—which is true for everything that's arising, internally and externally. As Mingyur Rinpoche talks about, recognizing the same interplay between cause and effect that conditions other things in the world is also shaping our own mind and experience. So think in terms of looking steadily at cause and effect and not taking it personally. Gardening—you plant a seed.

If you know what kind of seed it is, it's naturally going to grow into that particular plant. It won't grow into a different kind of plant. But it will also need the particular causes and conditions—the right soil, the right water, perhaps fertilizer, the right weather. And if any of those are too much or too little, it may not grow, or it may not grow well.

But if we get upset because we planted a daffodil bulb when we really wanted peonies, it doesn't make a lot of sense. We tend not to do that. If the plant doesn't get enough water, we may not like it—we wanted the thing to grow—but we don't take it personally. It didn't rain. There's really nothing one could do about that. So we look at that series of cause and effect, and everything works like that. Everything.

As Mingyur Rinpoche says, we can look at how cause and effect conditions our own mind, and how that shapes our experience. We're not different from a plant in that way. He writes, "If we want to be happy, we must recognize what causes and conditions lead to well-being in our mind and heart, in our experience. Similarly, if we don't have a clear understanding of the conditions that create suffering, how can we possibly expect to free ourselves from it?"

This to me is just a very direct and simple explanation of what we're doing with our steady mindfulness practice. The quality of mindfulness with wise understanding is this quality of simple interest, not taking it personally, seeing what's arising and then seeing what happens next, and then what happens next. Not only when it's nice stuff—understanding what leads to more wholesome, beautiful qualities—but also when it's difficult. When sounds are coming and aversion is arising in my heart and mind, the invitation is not to stop paying attention, not to close down awareness at that time and think, "Well, I can't practice. This is too unpleasant and I can't really focus on my breath, so forget it until they stop."

That's what we tend to do—decide it's not working now. But as Mingyur Rinpoche says, if we don't understand the conditions that lead to suffering, how can we possibly expect to free ourselves from it? Without steady awareness paired with wise understanding, the assumption we make is that the sound is the cause of my suffering, or that my inability to concentrate because of that sound is the cause of my suffering. And we just go with that.

When we're seeing through the veil of assumption, of wanting, of aversion, we draw inaccurate conclusions. We don't know they're inaccurate. And we build our choices on that foundation, getting more and more confused or locked into a particular explanation. "It's impossible to really be present with that sound. It's impossible for me to be at peace while that sound is happening"—or this pain in the knee, or feeling sad, or whatever it is.

A simple way to describe nature: What's happening? All that's ever happening in our experience is the arising and passing of these six sense experiences. Seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, sensing sensations in the body, and the whole mental realm. I know it's a lot—the mental realm is complicated. But just one after the other, happening all day long.

Did you have a moment today where none of those things were happening? Well, maybe there were moments you didn't notice they were happening. But that's all there is. And it's not in our control. I use sounds as an example because they're so obviously happening outside of our control—and yet we think we should be able to control them. Can you control what sensations arose in your body today? Or, God forbid, what thoughts arose? Could you control whether it stayed pleasant? Could you control whether mindfulness remained? Could you control whether you felt bored or sleepy or whatever?

But without steady awareness, without seeing cause and effect clearly, we often think we can control these things. Our habit is to get really glommed into the experience, into the object that's happening.

We don't quite recognize awareness itself. We just get into the experience, and then we like it or we don't like it. This is really the huge habit of our mind.

We think whatever's occurring—one of these six sense objects, which is one of the brilliant things the Buddha articulated—a sight comes, a sound comes. Even being aware of seeing or hearing, it's experienced just as a little tinge in our heart-mind: kind of pleasant, kind of unpleasant, kind of neither one, not making much of an impact. That's just part of how things are. Not bad, not good.

But we often don't notice that. As something gets more pleasant, or we like it, we say, "Of course we like it." And that becomes our position. Or it's unpleasant, and we don't like it, and it shouldn't be happening. We like it, say in meditation, and that means we're doing it right and it's going to get more and more like this. We don't like it, it's a little bit unpleasant, and that means something's wrong. And neutral, neither one—that means nothing's happening and something better ought to start happening, like soon.

Sometimes people find their minds even create a whole suffering story just to escape neutrality. Why? Because at least then I'm suffering. And ultimately, it's all about me.

This is so familiar we take it for granted. Without steady awareness, we really don't tend to notice that the sense of pleasantness or unpleasantness—how we define and describe the world—is really what gives meaning to the experience. And we just assume that's true.

So as I say, if it's unpleasant, we assume there's some problem with the experience. And often: what does that mean about me? Or what effect is it having on me? Or if it's something happening internally, we think I'm doing it. If it's mental, then we think that is me, and there's something wrong with me. This assessment is so intertwined with the experience that we often don't even notice it. We just think, "Yeah, sure—it hurts and it's bad and something's got to give here." Or, "Yeah, sure, this is pleasant, and this is how it's supposed to be. Finally I got it right, and it's going to stay this way and get more and more this way because now I'm doing it right."

We don't even notice that. It coheres into a story just like that. We think that's an accurate representation of what's happening, and then the whole thing builds up. And it's so familiar. We're so used to defining and explaining, giving meaning to each experience based partly on pleasantness and unpleasantness, and then based on what it means to me, that it just seems real. We don't even notice it. It's like gravity, right? We don't think about gravity very much through the day. You don't really think, "Good thing there's gravity—we're staying on our cushion." But it's part of what we can notice when our attention opens up. Such a familiar habit.

So to say something's unpleasant—I'll go back to that sound, just to keep it simple. Bringing in awareness, first recognizing awareness, not just hearing and "I don't like it" and this whole story. The difference would be recognizing the hearing. A hearing. I can still hear it—it's like thirty years ago, burned in my brain. But that's just an experience; it doesn't have to mean anything else.

So there's the hearing, recognizing that hearing is arising. All the conditions for it are present; you don't have to think about it, it's happening. It's unpleasant. I can feel the quality of not liking it. That's another arising experience. That's a mental quality arising in my heart-mind—not liking it, aversion. That's a fine next object of awareness. It's the next object of awareness: an unpleasant vibration. Then there's irritation in the body. There's a kind of cringing back, a tightening. That's the next arising experience: unpleasant physical sensation.

Tension. "It shouldn't be like this." That's the next arising experience. Judging, not liking.

Do you see what I mean? Being present doesn't mean just being present with the lovely stuff. It means being present moment after moment, but without buying into the assumptions—watching how they're being created. Actually, that steady awareness with the wise understanding, "Oh, it's just this now, causes and conditions," that's what transforms everything. Of course aversion arises. I've spent my whole life cultivating aversion when unpleasant things happen that I don't want to have to be with. And I don't think I'm the only one.

As we said about awareness, every moment that awareness arises in the heart-mind, it's that much easier for it to arise in the next moment. But that doesn't just work with the wholesome, right? It works with whatever. The more you practice something, the more it arises, the more naturally it arises. So spend a long time with unpleasant physical experience, the cringing back, and aversion arises. Aversion is unpleasant in itself. The attention doesn't want to be there. And it just turns into a whole story, which is a way of trying to avoid. "Why are they doing this? I shouldn't have to deal with this. I need to move. I don't know..."

There's nothing wrong with thought. We're not trying to stop thought. We just want to bring awareness into that story, into that whole process. The steady perseverance of awareness feels that whole process and asks: Where is the suffering here? That's the question. Where is the suffering here? And when we're with that whole story, it becomes clear the suffering isn't the sound. The suffering isn't even the thought. The suffering is the identifying—taking that aversion as me and fighting with present moment experience.

When awareness recognizes, "Oh, aversion feels like this," there's a stepping into awareness rather than letting me be the aversion. It changes everything. This is really the miracle of mindfulness. It's not changing what's happening. But the shift from being the aversion, or hating the aversion, or being lost in that story—and that story could go on for hours—that shift is everything.

When we wake up from the story, pay attention. What was the effect? Is everything hunky-dory now? Do we feel free? Do we feel better? Usually we notice: it didn't do the job. The story just helped us not notice what was happening for a while, although it whipped everything up more.

The freedom is: "Oh, aversion feels like this." And the interest, the energy, is in the awareness. Awareness can include whatever's happening, but as I say, it's not stained by it. It's not about me. There's not that sense of personal suffering or personal needing something pleasant. That's the moment of intimation of freedom, of ease.

In that moment, all that mishigas is happening—the sound, and even the thoughts—"Oh, that's like a particular button: you push this button, these thoughts come out." Awareness notices it. And in that, just for that moment, resting in the awareness, there's ease, there's peace. And really, unbidden, often, rather than all this aversion, a moment of compassion comes up for those poor guys out there in that heat, working eight hours a day.

What's it like for them, holding on to that sander and having to run it eight hours a day? When I'm all caught up in identifying with the unpleasant, not recognizing it, it really is all about me. But in that moment of awareness—I'm not saying I should be compassionate—it opens up the world. It opens up the field. It's like, wow, those poor guys out there, it must be tough for them. And the next moment, the sound comes, it's still unpleasant. The sense of aversion might come, but awareness sees it. It just drops away that much sooner. It really is a kind of magic, just a simplicity of awareness.

And that's really the key. Where's the suffering now? What's happening now? When we say "with awareness, what's happening now?" you don't have to try and delineate it all, say it's a big, whole story. Like, what's happening now? "Oh, I really hate this feeling." Okay, start right there. Awareness notices hating this feeling. How does that feel? And with this quality of interest, awareness is just interested in what's happening now. It's not bringing in a judgment. Awareness isn't liking or disliking. It's like, "Ah, it feels like this." And that can be with anything.

This is where we really start learning to trust—to really trust being with the awareness rather than glommed into the object. Because that's our other habit: the habit of not noticing liking, disliking, pleasant, unpleasant, and using that to define everything. The other habit—and this can be a meditation habit too—is that there's an awareness of whatever object is arising: the breath, hearing, anger, boredom, just a sensation. We're quite aware of the object but not recognizing the mindfulness, not recognizing the awareness. So we get completely glommed into the object. You can get quite focused that way, and that's not a bad thing, but that's just one particular way of being in meditation, in awareness.

What we want to cultivate here is not just that, but a kind of widening out, a tuning in more and more to the awareness of any object. It's kind of like a little bit of foreground-background shift. It opens up the field. So this simple awareness, free from concept, free from trying to hold on to a particular object—we allow whatever's happening naturally to happen, and awareness can receive it. It's a whole different way of being, a kind of openness to the unknown in each moment. It brings a freshness, an interest.

Let me give an example that I like a lot, from somebody who really inspires me: Yo-Yo Ma, the very well-known cellist. Years ago, I saw a documentary about him on German television. Since I don't speak much German, I didn't understand a lot of it. But this part I did understand, and he just so inspires me. To me, he embodies this sense of freshness and wonder that comes from steady attention without preconception. It opens up the world.

In this part of the documentary, he was in a helicopter, going with his million-dollar cello to Africa, to some small tribe somewhere in what looked like the Kalahari Desert—a small tribe in Africa—to compare music with them. He's really interested in music from all different kinds of traditions. So he gets out of the helicopter with this million-dollar cello, and he meets the man who is the storyteller, the one who holds the stories of the tribe and serves as its musician, who sings. And this man brought his instrument. His instrument was a long pole, and the body—the round thing that would make the sound—was really like a big old oil can. Then it had strings, like frets coming up, and a couple of strings rising from that. So it kind of looked like a big bass fiddle or something, but it was just this oil can and a couple of strings coming up from it.

And so he's playing on that, and he has Yo-Yo Ma playing some beautiful classical piece on his cello. And then Yo-Yo Ma is so fascinated by this man, by this instrument, by how he can play it, by what he can do with it, by the kind of music he's making. Totally different kind of music. And he's just so entranced with it. He says, "I could never play that." And he's asking him questions. And he said, "Let's trade instruments and try to learn how to play each other's instrument." So he's using the man's instrument, trying to play. He says, "I could never do it like you could." And he's so entranced. Present. Enthusiastic. This wasn't put on in some kind of way. So free from ideas or assumptions, just looking fresh in the moment without bringing in the whole backlog. Not abandoning who he is, but bringing in this openness.

I love that. I think of it so often because to me it's the perfect example of the freshness of present moment mindfulness with wise understanding. Not bringing in preconceptions, not bringing in "I'm going to like it, I'm not going to like it." Just listening freshly and seeing what arises and then being totally present for it.

That's what steadiness of awareness can bring to our life. It's really a shift, but it necessitates a willingness to be with the beautiful, a willingness to be with the difficult, a willingness to be with the neither beautiful nor difficult. In other words, what's happening now? It's like this in this moment, just like this, without bringing in anything extra. And naturally we begin to notice a wider, deeper aspect of life and connecting circumstances.

So another little example of how remembering awareness shifts the picture, in whatever we're doing, not just meditating. It was a couple of days ago, here, for me. I got up in the morning, and I was a couple of days out of jet lag, because I flew here from California. I forget what I had to do, but I had to get up and go somewhere, do something. And I was just feeling really tired. My body was feeling really tired, and my mind was dull. I wasn't in aversion, which is already something, but I was noticing: "Oh, I'm so tired. I have to do this. I'm so tired." I was just being aware of tiredness, tiredness.

And suddenly it occurred: Ah, awareness is like this. Tiredness is like this.

I don't know if you get the shift. I knew I was tired, but my attention was really in feeling tired. "I'm so tired." So even without adding aversion, that was like the whole world in a way—Carol's world then. The body's tired, the mind's tired, have to go to this, dragging along, that's how it is.

And then: Oh. The shift into "it's like this now." That's the shift into awareness of what's happening. Still tired, still all of it, but the energy, the interest. It's almost like identification, but it's not really. It's just that you stop identifying so much with the tiredness. Just, oh. Tiredness is like this. But the awareness—you just recognize it again. Basically, that's all it is: recognizing awareness.

It took that narrowness out. Suddenly, awareness recognizing tiredness also recognized: Ah, it's a lovely day. I looked out the windows—the sun and the snow. It was really quite lovely. It felt really fresh. What a nice day. And then the thought came up: Oh, I get to come and help teach a meditation retreat. It's really such an amazing thing in this world. That's why I'm here, to spend this time sharing the Dhamma. What could be better in the world? That really feels like something useful.

I wasn't just telling myself that. Those were other aspects of experience in that moment. The release from being just in the object of tiredness, tiredness, tiredness—just allowing awareness of tiredness, just recognizing awareness—it allows whatever else is occurring to also be known.

You'll see as we go through this retreat that we tend in our instructions not to emphasize focusing on one object. In moments we are, but we're not going to say come back to that object, or it's better if you're focusing on one thing. Sometimes it's on one object, but sometimes not. There's often a much more broad sense of awareness, where whatever's arising—the experience, the object—is touched lightly with awareness, and then another, and we might have a bigger picture. It's quite interesting.

So that's part of what we're doing. But then the habit of mind—that was an example, my little example, where the habit of my mind is, thank goodness, once in a while shifting into really recognizing awareness and resting there, rather than always jumping into "Carol's tired, Carol's tired, Carol's tired." Yes, Carol's tired, the body's tired, and this is happening, and this is happening, and awareness is knowing it all.

It's what I call a shift of refuge. We don't even know what refuge is when we're caught in "me, me, me" and what this means about me and our unrecognized assumptions. We don't even know it's refuge—looking for the pleasant, trying to make it better. Basically that is what we're all doing, but it just isn't working.

So we're learning to recognize and trust the simple, whereas it really doesn't seem like much of anything. That's why we have this time together. This refuge of getting interested in the process of continuous awareness rather than trying to have a particular thing happen.

As Sayadaw U Tejaniya says, steady awareness with right understanding is not to create something. We're not trying to create any kind of particular state or experience. It's not to reject what's happening. And as things happen or stop happening, we don't forget to notice them either. "Oh, I saw that one already, so never mind"—no. That's what's arising now. We notice it. Whatever's occurring, we don't let go of being aware. We're not creating something, we're not rejecting something, but whatever's occurring, awareness recognizes it.

As this becomes more of a refuge, you'll see it pop up. You'll see it become accessible. We can remind ourselves in difficult times in life too.

This was something Anam Thubten, who's a lovely Tibetan teacher in the Bay Area, said. He was giving a talk, I think on Zoom, somewhere in the first year of the pandemic. He was talking about how now, just in the environment, in the world, we're easily overwhelmed. And it's only gotten worse now, if anything. We're easily pulled into the whirlpool of fear, of worry, of anger that is swirling in the world. Not always, but at times it can be easy to be pulled into it. It's a habit.

He said that in those times when we're pulled into that whirlpool, it just feels so natural—we lose touch with awareness. When we lose touch, we just forget about awareness and we lose touch with our innate dignity, with the access to love, with the access to compassion. We're pulled into that whirlpool of fear.

So we practice to re-recognize awareness. Our practice isn't going to end that whirlpool of fear and anger swirling in the world. But we practice to re-recognize awareness. And when we do, in a moment of recognizing awareness, we recognize that whirlpool, but then the access opens—it opens us up to natural compassion, to natural connectedness with beings in our heart, to love, to wisdom. And then that's what we can offer to the world.

So we practice to just re-recognize in any moment of the day, whatever is happening, just to re-recognize this simplicity of awareness.

It's come to be for me when I do a retreat, I think, "Oh, I have all this time now." It slips in that I want something to happen. But really, it's all this time, all these moments of the day to practice recognizing and trusting awareness, whatever's going on. I really think that's what we're doing here.

This is the third job of the yogi, Sayadaw U Tejaniya would say. Call it perseverance, or being present with what's happening in the mind and body from moment to moment. In some ways when we talk about right effort, in one way it's that quality we described this morning of just that simplicity—just feel your hands. That much effort. It's not striving, it's not tiring. And then again in the next moment.

And then again in the next moment. But it's still only one moment.

So when we talk about this simplicity of relaxed perseverance, or when we use the word "continuity"—one three-month retreat, we started calling it "the dreaded continuity." Because it's only just in a moment, but when our mind hears me say, "And now this moment, and now this moment, and now this moment," there's something in the mind that goes, "Oh my God, there's no way. Okay, this moment, all right, but oh, give me a break."

So what is happening in that moment? Projection or fear. There's only this moment. There's only this moment.

And so the third job of the yogi is that whatever is occurring through the day, however long it's been that we forgot to recognize awareness, as soon as we think about it, here it is again. Whatever we're doing.

The continuity is an essential piece. And that's why you'll see starting tomorrow—this is really thought out, the way Tejaniya teaches, but it's really helpful—you've probably noticed that tomorrow the schedule is more open, that we're not having so much sitting, walking, sitting, walking. This is not just because we felt like it, but it's not to make it less continuous. It actually gives you the opportunity to strengthen your experience, your understanding of what it means to recognize awareness—not limiting it to the sitting posture, not limiting it to the walking time.

Because consciously or unconsciously, when it's so structured in the day, doesn't it feel like we think, "Oh, thank God, okay, no structure. I can just go kick back"? So the downside of it is: no, you can kick back, but you have to be aware that you're kicking back. And that's not tiring, no matter what we're doing. Taking away the complete rigor of the schedule actually allows us to explore.

Sayadaw would say in terms of sitting—and it'll be talked about more tomorrow—but it's not like how long you sit means you're more aware. Sit and see with steady awareness, with this interest. What's supporting awareness? Maybe you're really tired and you've been sitting for fifteen minutes, but you can bring awareness to the tiredness, so you keep on sitting. Maybe you're really tired and you're falling on your face and you're trying to be aware of tiredness, but you're just feeding aversion, aversion, aversion. That's not so helpful. We want to cultivate awareness, not aversion.

So you might say it might be more useful to walk. Walking, you can be more aware. What brings in more awareness? What conditions support remembering awareness? That's what our job is.

So whether we're sitting or walking, notice why you sit. Notice when you get up. Why? Notice why you start walking. Notice when you stop walking. Why? Mindfulness, steady awareness, requires this real honesty with ourselves—because we're not judging. We just want to know why.

So we're walking and we're having a moment, really present, hearing and seeing. And then suddenly we're turning away and walking into the dining room. Now without awareness we might say, "I had enough and I'm tired and I need to have tea." With awareness we can see, "Oh, the image of tea arose. There was this feeling of wanting. There was this feeling of, 'Oh, how nice that'll be.' Pleasure, pleasure, pleasure, pleasure." And the next thing we knew, we're walking in to have tea. That doesn't make tea bad, but we want to know what's happening.

So this gives us the chance to do it. Whatever's going on in the day, that moment of noticing wanting as you have tea is just totally equal to a moment sitting on the cushion where you're really present, or walking.

Our friend and colleague Joseph Goldstein likes to talk about, in terms of retreat, the three aspects: the sitting meditation, the walking meditation, then all the rest—daily activities. Which, by the way, that's not just Tejaniya talking about that. When we would sit with Sayadaw U Pandita, it was very strict, a very strict schedule. But when you'd go into the interviews, he wanted to know what happened in the sitting.

He wanted to know what happened in the walking. And he wanted to know how your mindfulness was in daily activities.

So Joseph says he likes to present it as: reverse the priorities. The most important part of your practice is the daily activities—bringing in awareness when you're taking a shower, when you're eating, remembering awareness no matter how long it's been gone. Then the walking, then the sitting.

This is really it: we can take awareness with us anywhere we go. Appreciate it. Why? Because this is not a short-term thing where somehow we sit and sit and sit, we practice and practice for eight days, and then we have some kind of steady-state awareness that we're going to take with us.

Those of you who've done lots of retreats know very well—secretly—you keep thinking it's going to happen at some retreat. Secretly. Pretend you don't. I pretend I don't, but secretly, it was years before I'd end a retreat and realize, "Oh, it didn't happen." I was kidding myself. What "it" is, who knows—but something great that wasn't going to go away.

So that's not what we're doing. We're not pushing. But gradually, in the beginning, we have to remember, consciously remember, more and more frequently: "Oh yeah, am I aware? Am I aware?" But as we've said, that momentum starts to grow. It starts to get much more natural. We relax, we allow, and that becomes more and more our way of being.

In the beginning, it takes trust. It takes a willingness to remember—but only this moment. Perseverance, but in this moment; it doesn't have to be hard. Just the willingness to do that again and not expect a special moment. Any moment, because awareness doesn't care. Awareness of a boring moment is just as clean and freeing and present as awareness of a beautiful state of bliss.

I'll end with this from Sayadaw Tejaniya: "As mindfulness is remembered more and more frequently, gradually it develops its own momentum. We come to appreciate moments of awareness more than we appreciate our entrancements with the reactions of mind or whatever is arising."

That's really the momentum that builds—we appreciate the moments of awareness more than we get involved in the entrancements.

Thank you for your kind attention.

May the beneficial energy of our practice together, of our committing to the Dhamma, may that beneficial energy be shared with all beings everywhere as a support for their awakening from confusion and suffering.

CHAPTER 186

Unentangled Awareness

Carol Wilson · 53 min

Drawing from the opening verse of the Visuddhimagga (Path of Purification), Carol Wilson examines the Buddha's answer to the question: "Who succeeds in disentangling this tangle?" She explores how our difficulties arise from mistaken perception—the 84,000 destructive emotions and cognitive obscurations rooted in greed, hatred, and delusion (kilesa). Rather than annihilating these mental defilements, the practice works through steady, receptive awareness that creates conditions for wisdom to arise naturally.

Wilson draws on teachings from the Dalai Lama, Ajahn Sumedho, Thānissaro Bhikkhu, and Sayadaw U Tejaniya to illuminate how saṃsāra is not a place but a process—the tendency to keep creating worlds and moving into them. She explains how unrecognized kilesas, even subtle ones, distort our perceptions and color our interpretations of ourselves and others. Through vivid examples, she demonstrates how the sense of self (sakkāyadiṭṭhi) at the center of experience creates narrow, prison-like worlds of measurement and comparison.

The talk offers practical guidance for watching how mental worlds come together and fall apart throughout the day—during walking meditation, eating, or simple activities. Wilson emphasizes that wisdom is not a personal achievement but a natural quality of mind that arises when awareness is steady and balanced. When kilesas are recognized rather than fed, the heart-mind naturally manifests its true qualities: compassion, generosity, equanimity, and loving-kindness. This "coming home" to present-moment awareness reveals our fundamental interconnectedness—what Bishop Desmond Tutu calls Ubuntu: "a person is a person through other persons."

We'll talk tonight about steady awareness and hopefully some of the ways that it helps wisdom, how it supports wisdom arising—hopefully helpful little hints.

Alexis and I both were thinking today of a particular poem that's at the beginning of a long Pali commentary in the Theravada tradition called the Visuddhimagga, the Path of Purification. The beginning stanza is:

The inner tangle and the outer tangle—this generation is entangled in a tangle. So I ask of Gautama Buddha this question: Who succeeds in disentangling this tangle?

The Visuddhimagga is a long book. I'm not going to go on that long, but I love that. We're entangled in a tangle, the inner tangle and the outer tangle.

The Dalai Lama offers a couple of descriptions of our tangle. As you've probably heard him say, if you listen to him at all, he says with great confidence that our true human values—what I call our good qualities: wisdom, compassion, generosity, equanimity, loving-kindness—these he considers our truer nature. And he says this with real conviction. These qualities are what naturally manifests in our heart-mind in response to life in a moment when our heart-minds are not clouded by confusion, by the three gang members: greed, hatred, and delusion. And that's really what we can discover and explore—that when the heart-mind is not clouded, when those qualities aren't distorting, these beautiful qualities, these wholesome qualities, are what naturally arise in response to situations.

Again, His Holiness says this all the time: all of our difficulties come from mistaken perception. He doesn't just say it—Ajahn Sumedho says that all the time. Thich Nhat Hanh said that all the time. I say that often enough myself. But really, I see how that's true. All of our difficulties come from mistaken perception. This ignorance, this mistaken perception, is at the root of the 84,000 destructive emotions and cognitive obscurations.

Feels like that, doesn't it? We start with greed, hatred, and delusion, but somehow they blossom into 84,000 destructive emotions and cognitive obscurations. I like that phrase, "cognitive obscurations," because when delusion is present, you may not notice it as a destructive emotion. You may be feeling quite fine—everything's fine—but it's a cognitive obscuration. It's confusing perception.

So this is at the root of the tangle. And our path of awakening, as we're presenting and offering it here, as we're learning from the Buddha—this path of wakefulness, of practice and wisdom—it works, and hopefully you're getting that, not by somehow annihilating the destructive emotions or wishing them away or somehow destroying them or somehow moving into another plane. It's the simplicity of steady, receptive awareness that sets the condition for clear seeing, for wisdom to arise, for a moment of conscious awareness with interest present without cognitive obscuration. And the accurate recognition there in a moment is what starts to see through, to see accurately. And the accurate understanding—that's the wisdom that untangles the tangle.

Of course, that's only in one moment, because it keeps recreating, recreating. Have you noticed that? You think there's just one big tangle we'll figure out, but it's all a moment-to-moment arising and creation.

Samsara. Vance mentioned samsara last night, often described as the rounds of wanting and loss, birth and death. I like the way—I've really liked this a lot the last few years—a definition I read from Thanissaro Bhikkhu. He's an American man ordained in the Thai forest tradition, and he's very prominent in translating Pali into English. In the Theravada, he's one of the three most prominent translators, along with Bhikkhu Analayo and Bhikkhu Bodhi.

This is from Thanissaro Bhikkhu: "Samsara literally means 'wandering on.' Many people think of it as the Buddhist name for the place where we currently live, the place we leave when we go to Nibbana. But in early Buddhist texts, samsara is the answer not to 'where are we?' but to 'what are we doing?'"

I really love this. It's the immediacy. The action is no place. It's the answer to what are we doing. It's not a place. It's a process: the tendency to keep creating worlds and then moving into them.

As soon as one world falls apart, you create another and go there. At the same time, you bump into other people who are creating their own worlds too. Do you get a sense of that? You don't even know we're in our different worlds, and we bump into someone else. No wonder things are a tangle.

So the Buddha looked for and found a way to stop samsara-ing—like giving up an addiction that was really based on misperception. Ajahn Sumedho says in a similar way that samsara and nibbana are not places to go, but modes of perception. That's really it.

He's saying that samsara is when the perception—this is the deluded, confused perception—is from or through the self, which is personality view. In any moment, the perception—and here saññā refers to a very specific activity of mind—occurs in any of the six sense contacts. Say there's a sound. Perception occurs naturally. It's based on memory and conditioning, but it's like recognition. So it would register "bell." That would be the perception in that moment. You see how that perception then gives rise to how we think about things, how we feel about them, and then the whole world gets started from that moment of perception, from all the different sense contacts. And perception isn't always accurate.

So Ajahn Sumedho is saying that when that perception is through or from the sense of self, the sense of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, that is the core misperception—the core mistaken perception. Whenever perception starts through the sense of self without being recognized, it's already off, and that's the beginning of that particular world.

If anything came up in your mind just now—she's coughing, what about me?—that's what we do. That's exactly the beginning of a world. This is the core misperception we're so familiar with: that any perception comes from the sense of "me." And this is where these whirls that bring the tangle start.

With steady awareness, we can bring interest—awareness is interest—to see how it's working, not to annihilate, not to stop. Because we don't even know what to stop. That's just another cockamamie idea we make up. "We should stop this." We don't even know what. We make up some idea of what nibbana would be like, what it would be like to be free, and then we try to make that happen. Tangle, big tangle.

So with our practice, as we've been encouraging here, we can watch the complex worlds arising and dissolving in our experience all day long. Do you get a sense of that? Often we don't notice, so that's what we get to do here. This is in daily life too—this isn't something just happening on retreat. One of the reasons for not interacting too much on retreat is so we can watch this stuff. Otherwise, as he says, we're all creating our world, bumping into other people, and the worlds don't match. But here we can watch it come and go, hopefully with steady awareness and interest. It gets interesting. It's really quite fascinating to watch concoction—I love that word—a concoction, just things thrown together. To watch a concoction of mind, a world come together and fall apart, and watch how it happens again and again.

Let me give you a simple example. When the starting point is misperception, there's always delusion or kilesa—one of the kilesas: greed, hatred, delusion. But this can arise with any sense experience. Sometimes there's a sound. The sound arises. It's known as hearing. You recognize a sense of pleasant or not.

It's the bell. And nothing else happens, and the next thing happens. There's no concoction going on there. That's a sense of peace. This is just what it is. That could be with any sense experience as well.

So this example from a friend just popped into my mind. She said she was at work, sitting there, and one of her colleagues—I guess it was a big office—came in and frowned at her. My friend thought, "She's mad at me. She's angry at me. Why?" So that was her perception: this colleague is angry at me. But the colleague didn't speak. She went on by and was just on the phone doing her thing.

So all day at work, my friend was watching. Every time she'd look at the colleague, she could see that she looked angry and fuming and doing stuff, but she wasn't talking to her. And my friend was getting, you know, alternately self-conscious, angry, irritated—what's going on? There's this whole bubble world. And because there was a lot of aversion—dosa, the Pali word for all the kinds of aversion: greed, aversion, fear, irritation, the whole 84,000 varieties—because that was present in her awareness without being recognized, of course it distorted a lot of other perceptions. And as you can see, it was all about me. All about me. So the aversion in her mind affected her whole day, the decisions she made. And every time she looked at that person, the colleague looked more angry. My friend got more angry.

Of course, at the end of the day, she checked it out. None of that was accurate. The colleague wasn't angry at her. She wasn't even thinking about her. She had just come in looking somber because something had happened at home, and she was just going through her day. There was no connection with my friend at all. A complete made-up story.

This doesn't sound outside the realm of possibility, does it? At least she could check it out, but she spent the whole day in this crazy fuming. So the original misperception was: she's angry. That was the first misperception. But then the sense of sakkāya-diṭṭhi, the sense of self—she's angry at me. That's really the sense of personality view that riles up the concoction, because we put our self, the sense of self—which isn't accurate anyway—at the center of the universe, and it all just takes off.

So with steady awareness and an interest—the quality of interest that we bring to awareness when it's balanced—that is so helpful. There's one of the wholesome enlightenment factors of mind: dhamma vicaya, usually translated as investigation of dhamma, or interest. It's not investigation as thinking about things, as we tend to understand investigation. It's a mental quality, a mental factor, and it's really that quality of interest. It kind of lights up the field in the mind. So you're being with a sense—say there's a sense of pressure in the chest—and it's either pressure and bored, or pressure with aversion, or pressure and "I don't want to be with it," or it's "What's that like?" You're not saying it, but just really that quality of listening, almost of receiving, of just being really tenderly but fully present. Let reality reveal itself—that quality of interest. But that can only be present when kilesa is not, right? That's the thing with these three.

I'm going to keep using the word kilesa just because I find it... I don't really like "defilement." I don't want to keep saying "torments." Anyway, that's my preference. I'm going to keep saying kilesa. So you know what I mean, right? Greed, hatred, confusion.

Now, why I said that, I don't know. But investigation—we're used to thinking about stuff, but it's not that. It's just this quality of steady, awake attention.

This is one of my favorites. For twenty years now, this has been one of my favorite quotations from Thich Nhat Hanh: "Understanding does not arise as a result of thinking." I think I'll say that again.

Understanding does not arise as a result of thinking. It's the result of the long process of conscious awareness. Sometimes understanding can be translated into thoughts, but often thoughts are too rigid and limited to carry much understanding.

This speaks to the nature of experience, and why thinking our way into something unknown can't work—because thoughts can only think what they already know. So this long process of conscious awareness, that's what we're doing. That's exactly what we're doing here. And it takes the awareness, the alertness, the interest, and the patience to keep trusting and to keep coming back into the awareness. Not expecting some big understanding light bulb to go off every ten minutes and then everything's copacetic.

Watching, watching, watching—and then suddenly you see: Ah, she wasn't angry at me at all. Look at all the stuff the mind was creating about that. That's a kind of insight, a later seeing of how it all works. You may not notice it the next time, but you might.

There are a couple of points I wanted to make from this example of creating a world. I think you can sense that the mind is doing this all day long with all kinds of different sense experience. Do you get a sense of that? Some experiences are more gripping than others. Some are lighter—they don't have to take hold. Like I said, it can just be steady awareness: a sound comes and there's awareness; a thought comes and it can be of your mother and it can be a difficult thought and you feel it. Awareness knows it, feels the difficulty. And it goes. That's not creating a world. That's just seeing what's happening with awareness. The world is created when we take off, fed by the sense of me, by greed and aversion.

One point I particularly wanted to make concerns the power of unrecognized torment—kilesa—in the mind. Some people ask, "Why do we have to keep noticing? What's the point of continuing to notice these defilements when they come all the time?" Because without recognizing them—as in that little example I gave with my friend—the power of that unrecognized irritation, or anger at the person, or fear about what she's angry at me for, that unrecognized quality keeps distorting further perceptions. It flavors our assumptions. It flavors the stories we make. It can flavor our actions and our reactions. It's incredibly powerful.

And it doesn't have to be a huge, overwhelming anger. That we'll probably notice. We may not be able to be really balanced and aware of it, but at least we'll notice it. But the subtle or small aversions and greeds that arise—they can just be kind of niggling in the back of the mind. "Oh, she's mad at me, okay. I'm not really averse, it's okay. Not enough to have to pay attention to." So we don't.

Sayadaw—I went from Ajaan to Sayadaw; I was in Thailand, now I have to come back to Burma—Sayadaw Tejaniya sometimes likes to talk about recognizing the kilesas and how they do their job. One year when he came to a retreat, he had something he would keep repeating in every interview group. And it was really helpful. He talked about getting interested in recognizing kilesa in the mind and realizing that, of course, like anything, sometimes it's very subtle, sometimes it's gross. We can see that they arise in a range of zero to ten.

He would say it's like when you go to the doctor and they have those little smiley faces moving into frowny faces, and you're supposed to say to what degree you're in pain today—zero to ten. I never know what to say. Compared to what? But anyway, he says it's like that. So say with my friend, if there's a little bit of aversion—"It doesn't matter, I'm not really bothered"—

Don't have to pay attention to it. It's like a 1 or 2 level. And he said, that's what we tend to do. We think, "Oh, it's no big deal. I don't need to pay attention to it." We wait until it's up to eight or nine before bringing in awareness. And then, you know, the horse is out of the stable. It's at eight or nine, and awareness—we're gone, off into it. Then it's struggle.

When we bring awareness, when there's a sense of balanced awareness, stable awareness, and we become aware—"Ah, it's really, really wanting, wanting"—okay, be aware of wanting. When the awareness is truly balanced, it's not feeding the wanting. When we're not aware of the wanting or the aversion in the background, every new little experience makes it a little easier for the ill will, for the wanting to color the next experience. It can be subtly growing in the background. When we become aware—"Oh yeah, wanting, aversion, it feels like this"—then we're seeing it clearly.

As I think we said, Joseph Goldstein has said he'd much rather see a kilesa than not. He's happy when he sees it. I feel like that too, up to a point. Because when you see it, then it's not going to be behind the scenes, making choices, coloring our interpretation of ourselves and others and what's going on. So, "Oh yeah, here's aversion. It feels like this. It's like this now." Really taking refuge in the awareness, but seeing it.

The Buddha says, when one dwells with a mind obsessed and oppressed by ill will—and he says the same thing for craving, the same thing for delusion—obsessed and oppressed by ill will, craving, or delusion, and one does not understand as it really is the escape from arisen ill will, on that occasion one neither knows nor sees as it really is one's own good, or the good of others, or the good of both. He says this in quite a few different places, and I think it really cuts to the nub.

When our mind-heart is obsessed by ill will—and all we mean by obsessed is that in that moment it's unrecognized, coloring the perception—in that moment we can't perceive accurately. We can't really trust what assessment we make of how to act for our own good, for the good of others, or the good of both. Because perception is distorted. Perception is unreliable. When we don't know these qualities may be in the mind affecting our perception, that's when we really might be trying to do something good and maybe by luck we hit it, but we can't tell.

Notice he starts with, you can't tell your own good—what's good for you. So really, just starting to tune into that out of compassion for ourselves and the world.

"One neither knows, when one does not understand as it really is, the escape from arisen ill will." So guess what the escape from arisen ill will might be in this context? It's not a secret. It's not something we haven't been talking about. But really, this is the power: we take refuge, as I just said, aware of the ill will. It's still here. Awareness doesn't make it go away.

Sometimes people think that with mindfulness, if they're being mindful correctly, the difficult thing goes away. How many people have ever thought that? That you're not being mindful correctly because the unpleasant thing is still here. And then we know that's not true, but secretly in the back—right? I mean, we all do it. "I'm being mindful, I'm being mindful," and then, what's the problem? Well, I'm being mindful, and then—oh yeah, it's still here. "I'll be mindful. If I do it right, it'll go away." It gets more and more subtle.

Anyway, the awareness is the condition—the steady awareness: "Oh, ill will, it's feeling like this." Noticing the thoughts that it's sending up, noticing how it feels. The awareness is just watching how it's acting, or the greed. But it's not feeding it. And that steadiness of awareness not feeding it is the condition for wisdom to arise. It's wisdom in the mind. It's not a personal act of will: "I will now end this ill will."

I mean, we've all tried, right? "I will now end this greed." We can, with an act of will, choose not to act on it—and that's a good thing. That's why we have precepts. But the ending of the defilement itself is not an act of will. It's wisdom, a quality in the mind that sees clearly, and suddenly—ah.

Have you had a moment when ill will or greed just stops? And you didn't feel like you did something—it's simply gone? Keep noticing that gone-ness; that's really important too.

An example of how this works: Vance's story about the lungi. He wasn't bragging about his awareness. He was talking about the real destructive quality of greed—what it does in our heart and mind, and then how we perceive and act when it takes over. But he was noticing all of that because there was awareness present. Clearly, the greed was strong. The suffering was strong. It made sense—it wasn't a harmful greed or anything.

But the awareness of watching all of that—watching the craving, watching what came up—meant there was enough awareness present when that sense of the anglerfish arose. When that anglerfish with its teeth came up and he saw his friend as the enemy, that was awareness seeing it. And wisdom popped in: Wow, look what it's doing. That was a moment of wisdom. And he said, "I couldn't possibly take it then. What am I cultivating here?" That recognition isn't personal either, just as the aversion isn't personal. That's a moment of how wisdom functions. It's like, "Wow, I'm not going to do this." It puts down the craving. That's wisdom acting.

It's the steady awareness with interest in just being present for however the experience is manifesting that sets up the condition for this wisdom to arise. In that moment, craving is abandoned. These are really faith-inducing moments if we stay with the awareness and notice. We don't take it personally either. We don't take the kilesas personally, and we don't take the wisdom personally—but we recognize it.

This is something Sayadaw U Tejaniya talks about frequently, this understanding of wisdom. It wasn't new to me, but somehow he brought it home in a way that's been quite helpful—thinking of it more in these terms. It's a further taking out of the sense of self trying to do it right. "I think if I practice enough, if I do all the things, if I'm steady with awareness, then I'll have some wisdom. And I can act from wisdom. And I'll put down the clinging." But there's still all that me, me, me—which is a misperception.

Wisdom is another quality of nature arising when there's steady awareness recognizing things as they are. The wisdom—the natural quality of heart-mind when it's not distorted by kilesas—as His Holiness said, is to move towards the wholesome, to manifest the wholesome. So wisdom, when it's present, isn't interested in the kilesas. It abandons them and moves into the wholesome—in that case, renunciation, putting down the greed.

This is a natural occurrence. It's natural cause and effect. So it's not something that requires you to be some kind of incredibly wise person for it to happen. It's not about intelligence. It's not about personality. It's cause and effect.

If we practice anger, anger, anger, what's likely to be the first reaction that arises in an unguarded moment? Anger. We've simply practiced it. But when we practice awareness and clear seeing, bringing interest and non-reactivity—real presence, non-identification, because awareness isn't "me," it isn't identified—the wisdom comes. And in that moment of wisdom, that starts to arise more frequently. It's cause and effect, but it's not personal.

To me, that actually strengthened faith a great deal. Just cultivate steady awareness, and nature takes care of itself. All we do is get in and muck it up. Like if we're trying to grow a daffodil bulb and we get in and mess around and do all kinds of stuff, we end up killing the thing—overwatering it or pulling it up or whatever. Leave it alone and just watch what's happening.

With the steadiness of conscious awareness, as we're doing, you'll see as you go through the day—I already said this, but I want to highlight it again—really watch. As worlds come together and fall apart, really get interested in exploring, seeing how that's happening again and again. When you're walking or eating, whatever you're doing, just being a little more tuned in.

Thoughts come and go, but when it's a world, there's a real me in it, buying into the whole thing. I use this example frequently because it might change every five minutes. Say, walking meditation. Aware of walking, and somehow it's really pleasant, and the thought comes up, "I'm really an ace yogi here. I'm really getting it." That thought can come and go. It doesn't have to be a world. But it could be a world.

So it comes up. It's pleasant. There's a sense of me—you can feel that. "I'm doing well." There's a sense of gratification. This can be subtle, just a gratification. We feel good. There's nothing wrong with feeling good. Remember, I'm talking about just being aware of how this world is being created. Feeling good, and I've seen this in myself, and then all kinds of thoughts about me and memories of all the good times and all my great practice, and then plans for the future—all the retreats I'll go to, or I'm going to meet the Dalai Lama, or whatever it is. We go on and on. We might be aware of the thoughts, but it's not complete awareness because we're not noticing the clinging. We're not noticing the sense of me driving it.

So that goes on. That's a world. We're in that world. That's a happy world.

And then, I don't know, you trip over something, almost fall on your face. And just immediately: "Who saw me? What an idiot, what an idiot. And that person I was really respecting—they saw me trip. So they'll know. I think I'm so mindful and I can't even see the crack in the sidewalk."

A completely different world, right? Five minutes later. We don't notice they're different worlds. We think that's the same me. They're completely different worlds.

So that one goes on. And watch the thoughts that come. There's the identification. It could be you just trip, you say, "Oh yeah, how funny," and then the next thing happens. It doesn't have to be a world. But when it is, notice that gripping of me. In the sense that rather than gratification, there's a sense of the unpleasantness or the shame or whatever. And then all the memories that come.

I call this selective perception. We have so many memories of our life, but in that world, the only memories that come up are of all the times when you blew it, when you were a stupid jerk or you fell or you couldn't do it right. "I knew I couldn't do it. I'm so conceited. I was thinking that, and here I am. I can't even walk in a row without falling on my face." And that goes on for a while.

Then without awareness—or sort of awareness—we kind of forget. We don't really notice it go away. But the next thing we notice, we're just kind of bored. I think that's enough.

Maybe I should go have some tea. It's another world. This could all happen in the space of fifteen minutes. And none of them, thank goodness, require you to intersect with anyone else—you're just being quiet.

So do we notice that what arises ceases? This is really where the steadiness of awareness is so key. The worlds are no problem when awareness notices them. This is what the mind does. This is how identification works. Awareness isn't identified. We're not trying to annihilate identification. We're not trying to say there's no self, so don't feel this. Yes, the sense of self is felt very clearly. It happens to be a misinterpretation, but it's felt very clearly. Be with what's actually felt, as it is, with steadiness.

So watch as the story concoction comes together. It feels like maybe you're caught a bit in the middle, and then it drops away, and then it's gone. Notice the gone-ness. Notice with steady awareness—or do we just jump right into the next world?

Ajahn Sumedho says most people don't notice cessation of the concoctions, or cessation of any experience, because our attention is too flighty, too jumping around. Of course, that's the condition. And I think probably now it's more flighty than it was at the time of the Buddha because of the whole thing about attention spans. Just the fact of —my mind goes to Elon Musk's thing, Twitter. You can't have more than a certain amount of syllables. Nobody's mind can comprehend more than that. You've got to move to the next thing. Talk about flighty.

So our attention is too flighty. But that's just a habit. We're cultivating a habit of steady presence, steady awareness. And that's growing over days because we're welcoming it. With this steadiness, notice the world dissipate. Notice the world fall apart. Notice cessation. Notice that's not there and things are just coming and going and there's awareness. And then notice another world starts to come together. You don't notice it right at the beginning, but you notice in the middle, wherever you notice. And then you notice, oh no, another one. Oh yeah, sense of aversion. Just that comes and goes. So it can be really interesting just seeing how it works.

In a similar vein, sometimes on retreat here, as we're getting more and more tuned in to watching our mind—what's arising in the mind, which is what gives rise to these worlds—I like to play with this when I'm moving around on retreat, and then it comes into daily life. Just watching what quality in the mind—it could be kilesa, but it could not be, it could just be whatever it is—is giving rise to the intention, the motivation to make a choice, to act.

Like when you walk into the dining room to sit down, watch your mind choosing where to sit. How does it choose? Sometimes one just goes and sits down. Sometimes one can feel the greed. I like that place. It's over by the window. I can see that. How can I get over there? Or sometimes you feel the greed, but awareness chooses not to act on it. Or you've noticed it's "I want to sit there"—oh no, that person.

I can't be near that person. I have to go over there. I don't want anyone near me. Just watching all of that stuff. Or noticing how you eat.

I've started seeing this at home with all kinds of little things. It's almost funny, but I notice when I'm making tea, I really notice. I tend to always hold the spoon in my right hand and the honey in my left hand. And then sometimes I'll switch it, and I'll be noticing. It doesn't matter, right? But just noticing the different things we do. "I always go for this first. I always have to make my bed before I do that." Any kind of little thing—when you choose to go have tea or you choose to go do some walking. Not making it wrong, but just tuning in to these little things.

This is really training the awareness to notice what's arising in the mind. And then when it kind of gloms on and a more strong world starts to be created, you might notice it. So that's just something I wanted to offer as a way to play with practice—really seeing the effect of kilesa, but then also seeing how worlds come and go, and with steady awareness we can really watch that.

In the midst of a world, or when there's not steady awareness, I want to say another word about taking refuge in awareness, reminding ourselves what that means in the middle of something. Ajahn Sumedho describes awareness as a natural activity of awakened attentiveness. I like that phrase—awakened attentiveness. The mind is alert. Not created, but recognized. Very natural and often overlooked.

Alexis said this morning, referring to completely resting in awareness in a moment, one moment, as being home, coming home. It's funny because I was thinking that same thing before he said it. I was listening to a talk by Thich Nhat Hanh where he talks about this. You know, he talks about the miracle of mindfulness—that was his first book. But in this one talk, he was saying that this mindfulness, this awareness, this sense of really resting in total awareness in the moment, is our home. It's our true home.

He talks about coming home, and it's not a place. It's not an activity. It's just this sense of fullness of presence in the present moment. The totality of the present moment just as it is. To use Ajahn Sumedho's phrase: it's like this now. It's like this now. A kind of relaxing of any resistance that might be there—we don't even know—but completely coming into this moment.

Ajahn Chah talks about it in a similar way. He talks about the sense of this is home. Citta doesn't really reside anywhere, but you feel here, a sense of home, awakened awareness. And he calls it Grand Central Station. He says, just stay home in Grand Central Station. The thoughts are like the trains—they all come and go. They all start at Grand Central Station, and they all just end at Grand Central Station, the home of awareness, the home of present moment awareness. So we don't have to get on the trains and go out. Just stay home. Let the trains go. Let them come back. But just stay home with present moment awareness. No need to figure it all out. Relax and drop into.

We can do this in just little things and get a feeling for what that totality of present moment awareness feels like. Alexis, you mentioned the question someone was asking about what U Tejaniya meant by superficial awareness in his book. I'm going to talk about something similar. Joseph has a phrase—he's so good at coming up with phrases—of "more or less mindfulness." You know, we're kind of mindful. We're going through. We're walking.

We know we're walking. We know what we're doing, sort of. And it's not spaced out, but it's not really quite here. We do that a lot. It's not bad, but there's a difference between that and when the attention is wholeheartedly, fully present.

Like this morning, I was just doing the dishes, no big deal. And I was like that—more or less mindful. Thoughts were coming and going, but thoughts can be here with total presence too. I wasn't lost in thought. I knew I was washing the dishes. But it's subtle—there's a bit of disconnection. I know I'm doing it, and there's a thought, la la la. You're kind of here, but there's a disconnect. It's not whole. It's not really fulfilling. More or less mindfulness. And it feels disconnected and unsatisfactory if you tune into it. You're not quite here.

So somehow I just noticed that—oh, it's like this now. That wasn't a right or a wrong. It's just that suddenly I recognized it was kind of half disconnected. It's a delusion. Not really quite here. And then awareness just opened and dropped in.

For me, that phrase of Ajahn Sumedho's—"it's like this now"—that's one of my helpful phrases. You can all find your own, as some have asked. But when I say that, it's not like saying what it is that's like this. It's that whatever resistance or interpretation or looking was present just goes away. All my awareness drops into the body and however the mind feels. Oh, it's like this now. It's just a moment of total moving into what is. And whatever it is, it's fine. It might be unpleasant, it might be pleasant, but the sense of struggle, the sense of disconnect is gone because it actually brings me right in touch with this totality of awareness. Just relaxed, not thinking about.

It feels like home. A home of awareness is fulfilling, and from that the next thing arises, and one knows what it is. That's an always-available home.

Really, I think—and Alexis talked about this with the First Noble Truth—at least half the time when we drop into what's here now, it's unpleasant. And we're so conditioned, again by the sense of me, that we just naturally recoil, both our mind and even our body, from the unpleasant. Then we interpret that as being a problem—it's bad, it's wrong, we've got to fix it.

But when there's that sense of just dropping in—so when I dropped in this morning, I didn't even remember what was happening. But it could be that I drop in and maybe there was some unhappiness about some thought, or maybe my back was hurting, or maybe I was feeling in a hurry and doing the dishes in a hurry, which is unpleasant. But I can drop in and just say, "Oh, hurrying feels like this."

So that complete dropping in is letting go, but it's not a conscious act. Awareness just is here. It doesn't buy into the resistance.

Joko Beck said, and I find this helpful: Can we find in ourselves a willingness to rest in this confusing and uncomfortable situation? That's the invitation. Sometimes you can ask yourself that consciously. You just kind of acknowledge, I know what's going on, but what's happening? Oh, can I just rest with awareness in this confusing and unpleasant situation? And sometimes the mind goes, "No way!" But sometimes it goes, "Oh yeah, okay." And there's a kind of tuning into the possibility of peace and ease that is available when there's not resistance.

So as I was saying, the core misperception is that sense of self, or self-clinging. Any experience that arises—it's an aspect of craving, clinging—is clung to: this is me, this is mine, this is myself.

So just something to look at. I'm not going to go into detail, but as the Dalai Lama often says, just tune in to notice yourself. When there's that sense of self-clinging, don't fight it. Notice—just like with any kilesa—how does it act?

And we can start to notice the narrowness that's present in our interpretation of the world, in our field of experience, when it's all about me. It's a self-centered world. It's really so narrow. It can feel like a prison, and it gives rise to greed and aversion.

The Buddha spoke about the kilesas as being—this is a phrase—"makers of measurement." When there's greed, when there's ill will in the mind, when there's a sense of self, he says it's a maker of measurement. You can just see very much the sense of self: me and other, that's a measurement. Me and that, that's a measurement. They're better than me, they're worse—that's a measurement. And this sense of self creates that.

Just a simple example of the difference between a self-centered world that's created and one that's not. Very simple. A couple of years ago, I was just home, kind of present, but there was some aversion in the mind—not a big deal, but just an aversive, grumpy mood, annoyed at myself about something. Not a big thing, just a normal day going on. And I heard—maybe someone told me on the phone, I don't remember—but something a colleague, a friend, had done that was really a very generous, beautiful thing.

And the first response that came up in the grumpy, self-centered mind was: They're better than me. I should have thought to do that. I should be willing to do that. Look how generous they are. A completely self-centered world leading to more ill will and clinging. I recognized that. That's how we go through the world so much of the time, with that center of me.

Then the next day, a similar thing happened. It wasn't that I thought myself into feeling better about that person. But a similar kind of thing occurred where I heard in some way about someone I knew who'd done something really thoughtful or effective. But this time the mind was really clear and balanced. There wasn't any big sense of self

—it was just awareness. And immediately, spontaneously, without any thought, the quality of appreciative joy, mudita, arose. Like, wow! That's such a great thing. How generous. That's so wonderful.

And that's the joy. That's what the Dalai Lama was saying. When the heart-mind isn't distorted by these kilesas, that's what arises. So the world is so much more open and broad when it's not in that little circle of self.

Just to explore this, to see it, to see the self doing this again and again—and the wisdom will arise that at times just doesn't get so sucked into it.

Two quotations about that, one from His Holiness and one from Desmond Tutu. His Holiness says: "The paradox is that although the drive behind excessive self-focus is to seek greater happiness for yourself, it ends up doing exactly the opposite. You become disconnected and alienated from others when you focus so much on yourself. With too much self-focus, all about me and mine, your vision becomes narrow. And with this, even a small problem appears out of proportion and unbearable."

Have you noticed that? Even a small problem—our fears and our distrust are strengthened. But really the main thing is our vision becomes narrow. We become more alienated, even though we think focusing on ourselves is taking care of ourselves, making us happy.

But with compassion, with seeing clearly, with mudita, that's not abandoning oneself. It's all included. Our idea of taking care of you while not taking care of me—that's a self-centered view, that sense of separation. So noticing it, then thinking I shouldn't be like that—that's just more delusion. It's just another world that gets created from sense of self. Watch it arise, watch it fall away. Let awareness just see what feeds that world.

How does it feel when it drops away? How is it when it's not there, when things are arising and no world is being created? Just give attention to that. And then when there's not that narrowness of self, we can recognize how things are more accurately.

This is Bishop Tutu—one way he describes how things are in terms of us as human beings. The Archbishop of South Africa, a Nobel Peace Prize laureate. He says:

"We are wired to be caring for the other and generous to one another. We're wired that way. We shrivel when we're not able to interact. That's part of the reason why solitary confinement is such a horrendous punishment. The concept we have at home in Africa is the concept of Ubuntu. It says a person is a person through other persons. Ubuntu says that when I have a small piece of bread, it is for my benefit that I share it with you."

It's the same thing Shantideva says—not because I should, but because we're all connected. Because, after all, none of us come into this world on our own. So you realize that in a very real sense, we are meant for a very profound complementarity. It's the nature of things. You don't have to be a believer in anything. It's the nature of things. I learned to be a human being from other human beings. We are all part of this delicate network. It's actually quite profound.

So that's just another way of expressing how the tangle untangles—just in a moment, when the kilesas aren't coloring perception, when the world isn't being viewed through the lens of me and other. It's just very simple and natural. It's nothing we create with a sense of self. But with the steady awareness that allows wisdom, in a moment of wisdom, that connectedness, that complementarity, that lack of me and other—that's just how it is. We don't have to think about it. You don't even have to recognize it as such. It's just that sense of how it is. And what naturally arises are the beautiful qualities in response to anything: equanimity, concentration, wisdom. This is really the natural result of wisdom.

And this steady, steady awareness—even though it's so hard and we have to meet so much difficulty at times—it really is amazing, the power it has. The miracle of mindfulness, as Thich Nhat Hanh says.

So thank you for your kind attention. As I had this insight: awareness will never abandon you. Sometimes we abandon awareness, but it's always available when we remember again.

May the beneficial energies created by our sincere practice here together, our sincere commitment to awakening, be shared with all beings everywhere, in all realms of existence. May our practice truly be a condition for the awakening from suffering and confusion of all beings, including ourselves.

CHAPTER 187

The Two Darts

Carol Wilson · 55 min

> In this dharma talk, Carol Wilson explores the profound teaching from the Sallatha Sutta (SN 36.6), also known as the Dart or Arrow Sutta, which illuminates the difference between awakened and unawakened beings. The Buddha teaches that both experience pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral feeling tones (vedanā), but the untrained person adds a 'second dart' of mental reactivity—worry, grief, resistance, and craving—on top of the initial experience. This habitual pattern of resenting the unpleasant and grasping for pleasant sense experiences keeps us trapped in dukkha.
>
> Wilson examines how vedanā, the second of the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna), serves as a crucial gateway to understanding our conditioning. She references Ajahn Buddhadasa's observation that 95% of our actions are motivated by seeking pleasant feeling, and draws on the Buddha's framework of understanding gratification, danger, and escape. The gratification lies in momentary pleasure; the danger is in impermanence and the torment of constant craving; the escape is not abandoning the world but abandoning our attachment to particular experiences.
> The practical invitation is to cultivate steady, non-judgmental awareness that can observe these rapid movements of mind without being swept away. When we can simply be with experience as it is—'it's like this now,' as Ajahn Sumedho teaches—we discover the peace that doesn't depend on conditions. This sublime stillness, the relinquishment of craving, is available in any moment we're not caught in identification or reactivity.

I want to pick up tonight on what Greg was talking about last night, this idea of how our spiritual life is sort of against the stream of everyday conditioned experience—what we learn and how we're conditioned in the world. But we also see how it's, as the Buddha said, like swimming upstream against our own internal conditioning, our own ways of seeing the world. It's not all about the external. In fact, the whole path is really about purifying the confused ideas and confused perceptions and suffering in our own heart and mind.

This swimming upstream—what we really start to run into here on retreat, and people already are, is that it starts to get a little bit of a rub, or a lot of a rub. It's really starting to see, and this is helpful, this is good, that the habits of mind we're so familiar with, so comfortable with, so miserable with—but we're comfortable with them. That's who we are, right? Don't tell me to give it up, even though it's completely making me miserable.

The steadiness of non-biased awareness allows us—and the steadiness is key—to start to see what's actually going on on a more moment-to-moment level. We start to see how we're swimming upstream against assumptions we had, or unconscious ways of being, habits of our heart and mind. Big habits. Already today, people have written notes or mentioned in groups, and it's normal, it's part of it. You're feeling the rub, but the awareness mind, the wisdom mind, is also seeing: "Oh, this habit of mine."

Let's take judgment, which a minimum of fifty percent of people experience. We're seeing the habit of judgment or the habit of something else. You kind of knew it was there, but it's coming up all over the place. People have been saying they're seeing these habits of mind, seeing how the mind is throwing out judgment about all kinds of things that really don't need to be judged—and they're suffering from that.

There can be a spark, and people have expressed this, a spark of appreciating seeing it. You recognize: look at how there's aversion, how you start judging and judging everything, and then you're judging yourself in an infinite regression. You see, "Oh, this is so unnecessary. This is so much suffering." There can be a feeling of—well, maybe happiness is going too far right at the beginning of seeing it—but a sense of, "This is good to see. I'm glad to see this." Can anybody relate to that?

That's an aspect of insight, a kind of intellectual insight. But we really mean it: "I'm glad to see this, and I see this is useful, so I'll stop doing it." This is the next part. We mean that. We want to do that. We have no more use for this.

And what happens generally? It can be amazing. It keeps going and gets stronger. It starts showing up everywhere. It feels like we've walked into a giant waterfall of judgment and there's no way out. It's bigger than it ever was before. Am I exaggerating? At moments it's like that—coming up more clearly, but it can be such a mystery at the beginning, before we have the steady awareness to see what's happening, to understand why. Why does this continue? We've seen it clearly, we really understand this isn't serving a purpose, we don't want to do it—and it keeps happening more and more. We're just sucked right back down.

And not just on retreat, but in life. It doesn't end there. This isn't the end point. This is a beginning point. This is where I think it's like, wow, what's really going on? What's happening here?

So I want to start from that place and talk a bit about picking up again on what Greg said about field work.

This is what our steady, mindful awareness reveals—being with experience as it's occurring, not as we're trying to control and fix it, which is what we usually do. "I don't want to do this anymore, so I'll push it away, and then we'll pretend it's not happening." And then, as the Buddha said, it's like holding a snake by the tail—it flips around and bites us again. Because we don't really understand why it's happening. We don't really understand. We just see that this is a stupid thing to keep doing. It's like knocking ourselves on the head repeatedly without knowing why.

So the steady awareness—that's why the steadiness throughout the day, which we're cultivating, is so key. The non-judging awareness and the steadiness allow us to see this fieldwork of what's really going on.

Tonight I want to talk about just one aspect. We've mentioned briefly the vedana, the feeling tone—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral. I want to re-remind most of us, and perhaps introduce it for the first time to some of you, as a way of thinking about and then hopefully bringing attention to our experience to see what's happening.

This is one way, again picking up on what Greg offered, of how the Buddha described life, or our moment-to-moment experience. Greg said it several times: the six different sense experiences happen in contact. Contact is described specifically as a moment. And actually, I love this about the way the Buddha describes things, and the way I see in my experience—it's always only moment to moment. We extend it in our mind forever, but it's just what's happening in this moment. That's always workable. It's bearable. This moment projected ad infinitum into the future is unbearable—that thought. But in this moment? Okay, what's happening?

Contact is a moment where, for example with seeing, there's a visual object, the eye door is working, and there's consciousness. Those three things come together, and there's a moment of seeing. That's just what's going on all day, as Greg said: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking, thinking, thinking, seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking, thinking, thinking. A lot faster than that, going on all day. That's it.

Sometimes when you're really quiet and things are happening, stuff can be seen occurring so quickly that people go, "Oh my God, it's so exhausting!" But it's exhausting when we try to control or stop or have an opinion about each thing. That is exhausting. And that's the next piece we really want to get to, because that's what our habit of mind mostly is.

So I said it's happening fast, so many contacts occurring. The next thing the Buddha talked about is vedana—that with every sense contact, each one, there's a mental experience. We experience each contact in our mind. There's a seeing, and it has a slightly pleasant tinge, or unpleasant tinge, or neutral. That's not inherent to the object. That's something occurring in our own mind at that moment. For someone else at that same moment, the sight of a similar object is a different experience. You might have a sense of unpleasant, they might have a sense of pleasant—perception and all of that. Or neutral, where we don't even notice.

This is just a very quick mental experience that the Buddha said happens with each sense contact. Ever since I first learned about this, it's one of the first things that helped me think, "God, this guy was some kind of amazing genius. How did he come up with this?" Because it's so quick! All of those contacts, how fast I described them—each of them with a pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral experience. And a lot of it just goes by. We don't have to make anything of it.

But how much of the time does our mind make something of it? We like it, we don't like it, as Greg said. The pleasant, unpleasant, or neutrality goes unnoticed because it's so quick and subtle. Right away, most of the time, what happens is the mind goes into preference. We like it if it's pleasant, we don't like it if it's unpleasant. That's pretty universal.

And because we don't notice that it's just a reaction of mind, a habit—it's pleasant so we like it, we like it so we want it, we try to get more, we try to hold on, unpleasant the reverse—something deeper happens. Even more than that, this reaction comes to shape the very sense of whether something is pleasant or not. Look in your own life.

Don't believe anything I say or we say—this is just an invitation to look. So much of the way we consciously or unconsciously assess experience or life or anything is whether it's pleasant or unpleasant. And if it's unpleasant, there's something wrong. Basically, if you follow it through, the idea is that somehow unpleasant stuff or unwanted stuff—as I think Pema Chödrön likes to say—shouldn't be happening. It's a mistake. The pleasant, of course, is what we want.

And not only do we like it, but we assess ourselves by pleasant things or skillful things. When something's unpleasant or we have a really negative thought, and we don't notice the unpleasantness, we jump right on: "That's bad. I'm bad." It goes into a whole downward spiral.
