NOTABLE DHAMMA TEACHERS

Notable Dhamma Teachers — Guy Armstrong

Clear and compassionate teachings on insight meditation and the Brahma Viharas

Guy Armstrong

SOURCED FROM DHARMASEED.ORG

Contents

GAIA HOUSE RETREAT

Self Acceptance	59 min	15
From Ego to Expansiveness	47 min	32
Fear	59 min	46

VIPASSANA RETREAT

The Nature Of Awareness	56 min	63

NOVEMBER 2003 AT IMS - FOREST REFUGE

Judging Ourselves	57 min	79

NOVEMBER 2004 AT IMS - FOREST REFUGE

Fear and Fearlessness	1h03	97

THREE-MONTH RETREAT - PART 2

Kamma & The End of Kamma	1h02	115
Right Attitude	31 min	134
First Noble Truth: Dukkha	55 min	143
Working With Difficult Emotions	1h00	158
Second Noble Truth: Craving	1h00	176
Third Noble Truth & Nibbāna	1h00	193
Loving-Kindness and Gratitude	1h01	210
An Attitude of Mindfulness	54 min	228
Working With Difficult Emotions	1h01	244
The Five Aggregates Are Not Self	1h00	262
From Ignorance Come Impulses	1h01	279

Kamma and the End of Kamma	59 min	297

NOVEMBER 2005 AT IMS - FOREST REFUGE

Working With Difficult Emotions	57 min	315
Mudita, Joy and Gratitude	55 min	332

MIND LIFE RETREAT

Closing Talk - Mind and Life Retreat	17 min	349

VIPASSANA INTENSIVE

Mindfulness of Breathing (Ānāpānasati)	52 min	355

IMS AUDIO FILES

Working With Difficult Emotions	57 min	371
Money as Dhamma Practice	16 min	388

INSIGHT MEDITATION 1-MONTH RETREAT

An Attitude of Mindfulness	52 min	394
Mettā, Tenderness And Connection	59 min	410
Consciousness, Awareness And Nibbāna	1h03	428

FROM AWARENESS TO WISDOM: EXPLORING THE MIND

The Attitude of Awareness	53 min	446
Awareness Is Like The Unconditioned	1h01	462

LIVING FREEDOM: INSIGHT MEDITATION RETREAT

The Pure And Luminous Mind	1h00	479

DZOGCHEN RETREAT

A Brief History of Buddhism in India - Part 1	56 min	496
A Brief History of Buddhism in India - Part 2	1h12	513

METTA

Mettā: Near and Far Enemies	55 min	534

INSIGHT MEDITATION FEBRUARY

The Seven Factors of Awakening - Part 2	1h01	551
From Ignorance Come Impulses	1h01	570

TWO-MONTH RETREAT

Impermanence	1h01	587

THREE-MONTH RETREAT - PART 1

Starting A Long Retreat	54 min	605
The Sources of Happiness	58 min	621
Working with Difficult Emotions	1h01	637
The Seven Factors of Awakening (Bojjhaṅga)	1h03	655
Unentangled Knowing	1h00	673
Keys To A Long Retreat	58 min	690
Working with Difficult Emotions	1h03	707
Five Aggregates: Self and Emptiness	1h02	726
Unentangled Knowing	59 min	745
Mettā: Tenderness and Connection	1h01	763
Kamma and the End of Kamma	1h04	779
Day One Instructions For the Three Month Retreat	40 min	798
Morning Instructions - Intentions	2 min	802
Morning Instructions - Intention or Cetanā in Pali	44 min	804
Working With Fear	1h01	808
The Five Aggregates Are Not Self	1h01	826
Seven Factors of Enlightenment	1h00	844
Impulses Come From Ignorance	56 min	863
Joy and Happiness	59 min	880

Mindfulness of Breathing	58 min	897
Morning Instructions	43 min	913
Morning Instructions: Thought Game	47 min	916
Morning Instructions: Choiceless Attention	47 min	921
First and Second Noble Truths	1h00	927
The Five Aggregates Are Not Self	1h02	944
The Third Noble Truth and Nibbāna	1h05	962
Transcendent Dependent Origination	1h02	980
Mindfulness of Breathing	58 min	998
Morning Instructions	1h01	1014
Morning Instructions - Thoughts	1h00	1021
Working with Difficult Emotions	1h00	1032
Morning Instructions: Choiceless Attention	1h00	1051
Seven Factors of Awakening	1h03	1061
The Five Aggregates Are Not-Self	1h03	1080
Forgiveness Meditation	49 min	1098
Kamma and the End of Kamma	1h00	1106
Morning Instructions	55 min	1124
Mindfulness of Breathing: Ānāpānasati Practice and Its Central Role in Buddhist Meditation	57 min	1134
Morning Instructions: Mindfulness of Sensations in the Body, with Special Attention to Bodily Pain	1h00	1151
Concentration	1h03	1163
Choiceless Attention	1h01	1182
Seven Factors of Enlightenment (Satta Bojjhaṅga)	57 min	1193
Working With Difficult Emotions	1h03	1210
Q&A on Noticing Non-Self and Selfing	14 min	1229
Kamma and the End of Kamma	1h01	1234
Q&A on Kamma	21 min	1253

EMPTINESS: A MEDITATION AND STUDY RETREAT

Introduction to Emptiness Retreat	49 min	1260
Formation of Self-View	1h11	1273
Morning Instructions on Dhammavicaya (Investigation)	39 min	1293
The Emptiness of Phenomena	57 min	1298
The Empty Nature of Awareness	1h08	1314
Emptiness and Karma	1h00	1331

FEBRUARY MONTHLONG INSIGHT RETREAT

Where Does Happiness Come From?	55 min	1347
The Seven Factors of Awakening	1h02	1363
Mettā: Tenderness & Connection	1h01	1380
Nature of Awareness	56 min	1398
Unentangled Knowing	58 min	1412

METTA RETREAT

Loving Kindness; Reflecting on our Goodness	36 min	1429
Mettā: Near and Far Enemies	59 min	1434
Loving Kindness, Movement of the Heart	46 min	1452
Brahmavihāra: Equanimity	58 min	1459
Mettā and Connection	59 min	1471

JULY INSIGHT MEDITATION RETREAT

Working with Difficult Emotions	1h03	1489
Unentangled Knowing	1h00	1509

SUTTA STUDY CLASS SERIES WITH GUY ARMSTRONG & RICHARD SHANKMAN

Week 1, Part 2: Introduction to the Suttas	1h01	1527
Week 1, Part 1: Introduction to the Suttas	43 min	1544

INSIGHT MEDITATION RETREAT, FEBRUARY MONTH LONG

Patterns of Becoming 1: Introduction	1h02	1557
Patterns of Becoming 2: The Five Aggregates	1h00	1575
Patterns of Becoming 3: Unentangled Knowing	1h03	1592
Patterns of Becoming 4: Kamma and Rebirth	1h04	1611
Patterns of Becoming 5: The End of Karma	57 min	1631

INSIGHT MEDITATION RETREAT FOR SCIENTISTS AND EDUCATORS

The Three Characteristics	1h01	1649
Morning Instructions - Choiceless Attention	52 min	1667

AWARENESS AND WISDOM: AN INSIGHT MEDITATION RETREAT

Working with Difficult Emotions	1h01	1675
Factors of Awakening	59 min	1693

EMPTINESS: A MEDITATION AND STUDY RETREAT

Formation of Self-View	1h12	1710
The Emptiness of Phenomena	57 min	1731
Morning Instructions: Big Mind	42 min	1747
Emptiness and Karma	59 min	1749

FEBRUARY INSIGHT MEDITATION - 1 MONTH RETREAT

Brahmavihāras: Mettā	58 min	1766
Self and Proliferation	1h01	1777
Morning Instructions	15 min	1795
Morning Instructions, Day 7 - Mindfulness of Thoughts	29 min	1799
Morning Instructions Day 12	45 min	1804
Afternoon Brahmavihāra Practice - Compassion	46 min	1809
Unentangled Knowing	1h02	1817
Brahmavihāra Practice	45 min	1835

THE NATURE OF AWARENESS: INSIGHT MEDITATION RETREAT FOR EXPERIENCED STUDENTS

The Attitude In Awareness	55 min	1842
Morning Instructions	54 min	1858

THREE MONTH - PART 1

The Five Hindrances - Part 1	1h02	1864
The Five Aggregates Are Not Self	57 min	1882
Seven Factors of Awakening	1h02	1900
Unentangled Knowing	1h00	1917
Joy and Happiness	1h02	1935

FEBRUARY MONTH LONG RETREAT - 2014

The First Noble Truth	59 min	1953
Morning Instructions Day 5	17 min	1970
Morning Instructions: Day 9 - Mindfulness of Thinking	17 min	1974
Morning Instructions: Day 14	13 min	1979
Morning Instruction - Expansive Awareness	43 min	1983
Connection to Life	58 min	1985

FEBRUARY MONTH-LONG

Delighting in the Wholesome	58 min	2002
Day 3 Morning Instructional Sit	43 min	2019
Day 6 Brahmavihāra Instructions: Mettā for Self, Benefactor and Dear Friend	55 min	2023
Day 7 Morning Instructional Sit	44 min	2034
The Power of Loving-kindness	58 min	2038
Day 11: Morning Instructional Sit - Choiceless Attention	43 min	2056
Day 14 Brahmavihāra Instructions: Mettā - All Beings-Pervading Mettā in All Directions	46 min	2061
The Five Aggregates Are Not Self	58 min	2068

Day 16: Brahmavihāra Instructions: Compassion: Suffering person, benefactor and dear friend	47 min	2086
Unentangled Knowing	1h01	2093
Big Mind Meditation	42 min	2112
Day 20: Brahmavihāra Practice: Muditā for the neutral person and the difficult person	44 min	2115
Muditā for the Neutral Person and the Difficult Person	31 min	2123

THE FOUR NOBLE TRUTHS: A RETREAT FOR EXPERIENCED STUDENTS

Four Noble Truths: An Overview	56 min	2127
Third Noble Truth & Nibbāna	57 min	2144

THREE-MONTH PART 1

Entering the retreat: refuges and precepts	56 min	2161
Morning Instructions—Mindfulness of Moods and Emotions	46 min	2178
Working with Difficult Emotions	1h02	2184
Morning Instructions: Choiceless Attention	46 min	2203
The Five Aggregates Are Not Self	1h02	2209
The Power of Mettā	1h01	2228
The Five Aggregates Are Empty	1h01	2246
Transcendent Paticcasamuppāda	1h01	2264

FEBRUARY MONTH-LONG RETREAT

First and Second Noble Truths (Retreat at Spirit Rock)	1h00	2282
Kamma and the End of Kamma (Retreat at Spirit Rock)	59 min	2299
Brahmavihāra Instructions	46 min	2316

MONDAY AND WEDNESDAY TALKS

Suññatā: A Practical Introduction for Meditators	1h03	2321

IMCB REGULAR TALKS

Emptiness is Everything	1h06	2339

JUNE 2019 AT IMS - FOREST REFUGE

Chanting And Morning Instructions: Mindfulness of Breathing	45 min	2359
The Power of Loving-kindness	1h01	2363
Morning Instructions: On Mettā Practice	40 min	2381
Morning Instructions: The Practice of Compassion	47 min	2387
Morning Instructions: Practice of Muditā	43 min	2394
An Appropriate Response: The Brahmaviharas as a Roadmap of the Heart	1h01	2400
Morning Instructions: Pervading Mettā for All Beings	45 min	2417
Morning Instructions: Objects, Space, and Awareness	42 min	2423
The Nature of Awareness	1h02	2429
Nature of Awareness, Part 2	1h01	2446
Morning Instructions: Natural State	41 min	2462
The Aggregates Are Empty	1h02	2464
Morning Instructions: Abiding in Emptiness	44 min	2481
Morning Instructions	42 min	2486
Emptiness and Kamma	1h06	2489
Morning Instructions	48 min	2508
Taking the Practice Home	1h00	2515

JUNE 2022

Mindfulness of Breathing	55 min	2530
Mindfulness of Breathing Combined with a Body Scan	49 min	2546
Mindfulness of Breathing: 3 Sensations in Inbreath & Outbreath	56 min	2553
Awareness: Turn, Recognize, Rest	52 min	2560

UNIFICATION OF MIND: CONCENTRATION RETREAT

Tranquility and Insight	50 min	2571

THE NATURE OF AWARENESS: A RETREAT FOR EXPERIENCED STUDENTS

Morning Instructions	59 min	2586
The Nature of Awareness, Part 1	1h01	2596

SEPTEMBER 2024

Instructions: Energetic Impact of Breathing	50 min	2613

STANDALONE TALKS

Facing Our Fears: Living With A Courageous Heart	1h01	2620
Refuge in Calmness	48 min	2635
Our Karma Is Our Dharma: Family Course 1997	47 min	2647
Seeing Deeply Into Experience	47 min	2659
Dharma in the Workplace	2h03	2669
Trust & Courage	59 min	2707
Karma, Forgiveness & Equanimity	55 min	2720
The Spiritual Warrior	45 min	2734
The Courage To Live Your Aspirations	56 min	2746
The Five Hindrances	1h00	2761
Death and the Three Characteristics	48 min	2780
Accepting Life's Characteristics	49 min	2794
Accepting Ourselves	1h01	2809
Relating Wisely With Anger	55 min	2827
Relating Wisely With Fear	53 min	2844
Healing and Freedom	49 min	2860
Mettā & Concentration	1h00	2876
Faith (Saddhā)	50 min	2895
The Five Hindrances	46 min	2910
Dharma in the Workplace	2h03	2926
Uncovering Ego: Renunciation and the Hindrances	53 min	2965
The Five Aggregates - Part I	58 min	2981

The Five Aggregates - Part 2	1h00	2997
Renunciation	52 min	3016
Purification of the Heart	59 min	3032
The Three Characteristics	57 min	3049
Karma	54 min	3066
The Practice of Loving Kindness	1h00	3083
Motivation In Practice	59 min	3100
Faith and Awareness	56 min	3117
The Five Aggregates (Pañcakhandha)	59 min	3133
Renunciation	51 min	3150
Mettā: Effort and Fruits	1h01	3166
Paṭiccasamuppāda: Dependent Origination	1h02	3185
Transcendent Dependent Origination	59 min	3204
Purification of the Heart	50 min	3222
The Buddha Knows the Dhamma	1h02	3236
The Eight Worldly Conditions	57 min	3255
Cascading Pools of Mettā	45 min	3272
Cascading Pools of Mettā	45 min	3286
The Power of Mettā	48 min	3300
The Fruits of Mettā Practice	50 min	3315
Vicissitudes of Life	1h05	3330
Vicissitudes of Life	31 min	3348
Meditation in the Noble Eightfold Path	57 min	3358
The Four Noble Truths	56 min	3374
Dependent Origination	1h00	3390
Faith and Awareness	50 min	3407
Since Feeling Is First: The Role of the Brahmavihāras	58 min	3422
The Joy in Renunciation	56 min	3438
Empty Knowing	57 min	3455

Living in a World of Change	55 min	3471
Faith as a Spiritual Faculty	50 min	3486
The Three Characteristics	55 min	3501
Transcendent Dependent Origination	54 min	3518
The Power of Mettā: Is Insight Enough?	59 min	3536
Purity and Purification	52 min	3553
Relating With Emotions; Plus Mindfulness, Consciousness And Awareness	1h04	3569
Bodhisattva Path: Plus Rigpa & Nibbāna	1h03	3586
Non-Dual Awareness: Bridging Theravāda and Vajrayāna Understanding	1h02	3603
Integrating Vipassana & Dzogchen	48 min	3620
Delighting in the Wholesome: The Power of Mindfulness	53 min	3635
Awakening Concentration	56 min	3650
The Power of Mettā	58 min	3667
Mettā: Purity And Purification	1h01	3684
Healing and Freedom	59 min	3703
Brahmavihāras and the Vicissitudes of Life	53 min	3721
Anicca: A Characteristic of Existence	1h00	3738
Impermanence	59 min	3755
Mettā: Its Near & Far Enemies	56 min	3773
An Appropriate Response	55 min	3792
The Five Aggregates	58 min	3809
Mindfulness	50 min	3827
Concentration	1h03	3842
The History of Buddhism in India - Part 1	44 min	3862
The History of Buddhism in India - Part 2	1h04	3876
Practicing Rigpa - Part 1	54 min	3894
Practicing Rigpa - Part 2	46 min	3910
Rigpa Consciousness and Nibbāna	1h14	3924
Taking the Practice Home	55 min	3944
Working with Difficult Mind States: The Third Foundation of Mindfulness	1h00	3961

The Practice of Joy and Gratitude	1h02	3980
The Benefits of Mettā	53 min	3999
Mudita: Practicing Joy and Gratitude	1h01	4015
The Five Aggregates Are Empty	1h02	4032
Sutta Study Class: The Honeyball Sutta (part 2)	1h12	4050
Sutta Study Class: The Madhupiṇḍika Sutta (part 1)	1h30	4070
Sutta Study Class Series: Majjhima Nikāya; All the Taints, Part 2 of 2	1h07	4090
Sutta Study Class Series: Majjhima Nikāya; All the Taints, Part 1 of 2	1h02	4109
Deepening in Emptiness	1h06	4126

CHAPTER 1

Self Acceptance

Guy Armstrong · 59 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines self-acceptance as a fundamental factor in both psychological and spiritual development. He explores how the universal feeling of "I'm not okay" develops from childhood experiences - whether through parental criticism, lack of affection, or overwhelming emotions we couldn't handle as children. Armstrong describes how suppressing difficult emotions creates lasting inner division, manifesting as constant self-judgment, need for external approval, defensiveness, and relationship difficulties.
>
> The talk traces how this inner split affects our meditation practice, making it impossible to truly accept the present moment when we cannot accept ourselves. Armstrong draws on insights from Gestalt therapy's "top dog/underdog" dynamic and the cycle of perception-view-action that perpetuates our conditioning. He addresses how self-rejection continues through school competition, young adult transitions, spiritual idealism, and aging.
>
> Offering practical guidance for healing, Armstrong emphasizes awareness as the primary tool, alongside cultivating personal joy, remembering our strengths, engaging in service to others, and maintaining meditation practice. He concludes by noting that integration at the ego level - achieving self-acceptance - is necessary before the deeper spiritual work of letting go of self can truly begin, quoting the Zen text Xinxinming on developing the "trusting mind."

I'd like to talk tonight about the factor of self-acceptance in life. I mentioned a few days ago that this practice really operates on two different levels. One is the psychological—the level of our emotions, thoughts, our personality, what makes us individual. The other is the level of the spiritual, the level where we feel our connection with all life, where we find what in us is shared by all living beings, where we find that relationship to life itself.

This feature of self-acceptance, I feel, is one of the root issues in working on the psychological level and for many of us lies at the core of many of the problems that we encounter in living. So I'd like to go into this area and see where this difficulty arises, how it manifests, and how to work with it.

When we talk about a lack of self-acceptance, it's as though somewhere along the way in our lives, we've picked up a belief that if we were to express it, takes the form of something like, "I'm not okay. There's something wrong with me." This is the basic feeling when we're not able to accept ourselves fully. And it's as though we look around the world and we think, well, everyone else seems to be getting by okay, and I guess it's just me that's having this problem, this difficulty. Because what we don't realize is that virtually everyone, to some degree or another, feels that they're not okay either. And so we're all sort of not okay in the same boat, if we knew the truth of it.

But when we come to believe in this way, when we take up this view and hold on to it, subscribe to it, it's the source of a lot of conflict in our life and the ground for a lot of suffering. To some extent, it's something that we all share. I don't think there's anyone who's grown up, certainly in this sort of culture, who hasn't come away with a bit of this self-doubt, lack of self-acceptance on some level.

And so I'd rather think of it not in black and white terms. It's not a case of "Do I accept myself or do I not accept myself?" Rather, it's working with different degrees of self-acceptance. So for all of us, I think there are many ways to work with this issue wherever we're at, coming to greater and greater self-acceptance in life.

I think the universal nature of this problem is shown by the sales of a book that came out a few years ago in America. I think it's also been quite popular in England. The title of the book is I'm OK, You're OK. It was written by a psychologist who was interested in a type of therapy called transactional analysis. He looked at all these different combinations of how we relate to others based on whether we feel we're OK or not OK, and the other person is OK or not OK. These different combinations of interactions make up a lot of our different relationships with the world, as it turns out.

This book, which is in the field of psychology, hit the bestseller list in the United States and sold hundreds of thousands of copies. Most books on psychology sell 1,000 or 2,000, and this was in the hundreds of thousands. I think that shows that it was hitting something in people. There was a real response to that theme.

Another testimony to the universality of this problem lies in the popularity of a particular American comedian who is sort of the apostle of self-rejection. I wonder if you know who I'm thinking of? Exactly, Woody Allen. One of whose famous lines was, "I wouldn't want to belong to any club that would have me as a member."

This sense of not accepting ourselves, not accepting aspects of ourselves, comes, I think, from encountering somewhere in life, somewhere along the path of our life, some emotion that we couldn't handle. It was too strong for us. It was overwhelming. And this, I think, is why the emotional life is so central to spiritual practice. I feel that it really needs to be considered an integral part of spiritual development.

Because for many, many of us, somewhere along the way, in coming into contact with an emotion that was simply too strong for us at the time, we've stopped our growth. Our growth has been blocked in some way. It may be a feeling of fear. Maybe an insecurity in life. Maybe a feeling of loneliness that we didn't feel we could live with. Maybe a sense of unworthiness that we came across. Maybe a degree of anger that we just felt we couldn't handle, couldn't cope with.

What we have tended to do, not understanding, being young, not knowing how to work with these difficult emotions, when one came along that was too much for us, the only way we could see to keep going was to push it down, to suppress it, to try to block it from our consciousness so that we could get on with the business of living. We hoped in that way that we would become free of it, that we would get out of it.

But the difficulty is that anything that we suppress, anything that we push down into the psyche, unfortunately tends to stay on and on and on. So whatever strong emotion is pushed down, pushed under, begins to pervade our mind, pervade our being, pervade our life. So that suppression is no escape. Rather, it prolongs the particular state of mind.

When we try to suppress fear, for instance, our lives become full of fear. If we try to escape from the fact of loneliness, our lives become full of loneliness. There's a constant struggle to keep that emotion from surfacing, to keep it suppressed. And that constant struggle begins to take a lot of our energy. So we're no longer able to respond to life fully.

So the personality splits, creating a perpetual inner drama between the critical parent and the defensive child within us. This division manifests clearly in our meditation practice as well. If we cannot fully accept ourselves, how can we accept the present moment? Our experience is simply a manifestation of ourselves, and when self-acceptance is absent, we remain in constant conflict with whatever arises. The moment is never good enough, never quite right, never feels complete. There is no peace in meditation, no rest, no natural settling, because there is always this underlying struggle with what is.

Living without a fundamental sense of our own worth creates an unbearable situation. No one can truly sustain feeling fundamentally unlikable or unacceptable. The mind simply cannot settle into such a painful self-perception. When we cannot generate this essential sense of okayness from within ourselves—when we cannot feel genuine affection for the full range of our being—we become driven to seek it from external sources.

This creates a desperate dependency on others for validation and approval. We begin organizing our lives around gaining acceptance from the outside world, constantly looking for signs that we are worthy, lovable, or acceptable. Our actions become motivated not by authentic expression or genuine response to circumstances, but by this underlying hunger for external confirmation of our worth.

This external seeking becomes compulsive because it can never truly satisfy the deeper need. Even when we receive approval or praise from others, it provides only temporary relief. The fundamental wound of self-rejection remains untouched, continuing to generate this restless searching for something that can only be found within. We become trapped in cycles of performing, pleasing, and positioning ourselves to gain the acceptance that we cannot give to ourselves.

The tragedy is that this external validation, no matter how abundant, cannot heal the split within us. It cannot restore the natural wholeness that was disrupted when we first learned to reject parts of ourselves. Only by turning toward what we have pushed away, only by learning to meet our own experience with kindness and acceptance, can this fundamental healing begin.

And so our relationships with other people revolve very much around a need and a search for affection and approval. We look for this in our friendships, we look for this in our intimate relationships, we look for it in our work situation, we look for it in school—anywhere we think that people might be able to like us or approve of us. We work very hard to convince ourselves that this validation is real, that it can be true.

Unfortunately, it never works. Deep down we believe it can't be true. Deep down we feel that we're not likable, we're not lovable, and so the message from outside that we may be likable, that someone may like us, can never really go very deep. We can never really believe in it.

So no matter how much affection, how much approval we get from outside, it doesn't satisfy this inner need. And we're committed to look for more, always looking for more. That need really can't be satisfied from outside, although we keep looking for it, keep wanting it.

Also in our relations with others, we feel we're not okay. We can't let other people see what we're supposedly really like. We can't really be honest with people because we know deep down that if you really let them see what you're like, they won't like you.

So we build a sort of false persona, a mask. We put on our mask in the morning and we go out and we present the mask to the world, and we hope that at least maybe they'll like the mask. We know they won't like us.

In this way, we're always hiding our true selves. Living like this, we can't really come in direct contact with the world because we can't let our true self out. The risk of rejection is too high. So we always have to pretend to be something we're not. And in that, there's a great deal of strain, a great deal of effort.

There's also great risk in this approach. When we live this way, any new person we meet is a threat, because anybody we meet has the potential to see through our disguise. We always live in fear that somebody's going to come along and say, "You're just putting that on. I know you're not really like that. I can see exactly what you're like, and you're nothing like that." We're always afraid of being unmasked, as it were, of having what we think is the true side of ourselves come through. We always live in anxiety of that.

Because of this, if we can't accept ourselves, we're overly sensitive to criticism. If you really can't accept yourself, then you can't acknowledge, fully acknowledge any of your weaknesses. And we all have weaknesses. Everybody on this earth has strengths and weaknesses.

But if we really are very concerned that maybe we don't have any strengths and it's all weakness, we cover it over with this exterior that's all strengths and no weaknesses. Then as soon as someone sees a weakness, we're afraid that the whole structure is going to collapse. So any criticism becomes threatening to the whole being that we have built up, the superstructure of self-image. And we can't take it.

Generally our response in that situation tends to be defensive. If you look at your defensive responses to criticism in life, it generally comes because the whole sense of worthwhileness is getting rattled, is getting shaken—it's fragile.

In our close relationships, in our friendships and in our love relationships, because we finally found some sort of affection that we can trust in a little bit, those relationships come to be very, very important. They become like a lifeline for our emotions. Without that lifeline to love, to affection, we feel we shrivel up inside.

So those relationships become extraordinarily important, and we depend very heavily on them. And where there's dependency, there's fear. There's the fear of loss, the fear that that relationship might be taken away, and with it our lifeline, our whole source of affection.

If we don't feel good about ourselves, still on some level we really wonder how other people can feel good about us. We're sure that there are a hundred thousand more people out in the world who are much more desirable than we are. And if our friends, and especially our relationship partners, start meeting all those people, they'll leave us like a shot. As soon as they find out what great people there really are out there, we know they'll get away from us as soon as they can.

So jealousy comes in, clinging, holding on to that lifeline.

Also, if there's a low sense of self-esteem, if we have a low regard for ourselves, people can easily take advantage of it. They can treat us in unkind ways, inconsiderate ways, and we think, "Well, that's only what I deserve. It's just what I deserve in life to be treated in this way." We at times lack the faith in ourselves to stand up for ourselves, to assert our own human rights and need for consideration in those situations.

Also frequently, with a low appreciation of our inner being, a lot of emphasis gets put on the outer. So a lot of care and attention goes into things like clothing and cars and the appearance of the house and the style of haircut and all these outer displays, hoping that the outer beauty can make up for the inner lack in some way.

These are the results, these are the manifestations of a mind that's divided, that isn't at one with itself. And they begin to percolate through our whole life to fill up almost all our relationships. Almost all the areas of our life are affected by this conflict, by this frustration, by this lack of satisfaction, where it seems that nothing can quite come right for us.

How did we get in this position? How did this arrive for us?

There are really many, many sources. And it can happen virtually at any point in our lives.

Let's take our life as very small children, as infants. I think probably almost all of us at that time got some sense of not being okay. And it's almost a necessity, being a very small child. Children come into this world with wild energy, no inhibitions. They don't know the social rules yet. So we've all done things like emptied the honey jar out on the new carpet and taken our crayons and painted all over the clean wall in the living room, or gone into our mother's closet and pulled down all the dresses and cut them up with scissors. And then we're surprised that that's not okay.

So we get these messages when we're very small that the things we're doing aren't okay. And we start to feel, well, maybe there is something wrong with me. I'm always being corrected. Maybe there is something wrong. And, of course, our parents seem like the ones who are really okay. Our parents are really in charge. They're in charge of the world. They can do these amazing things like walk and open doors. They can actually reach the doorknob and pull it open. They can drive cars. They can go into stores and walk out with things. Nobody stops them or shouts at them. So our parents are definitely okay. But we as little kids—there are a lot of questions about that.

Other people may have a relationship with their parents that doesn't have much love, doesn't have much affection. This is pretty common. Coming into this world, not getting affection or caring or love expressed very openly, we come to form the view that we're not really lovable. If we were more lovable, well, I'm sure my mother would pick me up and hug me more often. I'm sure my father would give me a kiss every now and then if I were really lovable. And because they don't do those things, I must not be a very likable person. There must be something wrong with me that the world isn't being affectionate.

This is especially true if our parents tend to be very critical, as many parents do. Many adults want their world ordered just so. And children to such a world are only a disturbance, only a disruption. So some parents are always criticizing their children. Their children can't do anything quite right. If we grow up with such parents, we really come away with the feeling that we can't do anything right. Not only are we not lovable, we can't even behave properly, can't do anything right.

This, of course, is a real mistake. To ever conclude that we're not lovable is a complete mistake, because this quality of lovableness has much more to do with the mind of the beholder than it does with the mind of what or who is being beheld. In other words, the ability to love comes foremost. After that comes what it's turned toward. So there's no one on this earth who can't be loved. There's no one on this earth who isn't lovable. We begin to see that it was just the limitation in our parents' own hearts and minds that kept them from feeling and expressing that love. But we believe in it. We have believed in it.

It's interesting how this idea is starting to really filter through the whole of society. I work in Totnes, just a few miles away, in an office that's above a shop where they sell electrical goods—televisions and tape recorders and things like that. The owner of the shop was having some renovation done, so some workmen were in: carpenters and plumbers working on the bathroom in the shop. These were just very ordinary guys, dressed in blue jeans and beards. I can guarantee they weren't reading the best-selling psychology books from the United States. I overheard a conversation between two of them one day while they were working. The owner of the shop was named Adrian. One of the workers said to the other, "You know, Adrian's problem was he didn't get enough cuddles when he was a baby."

Just at that point, Adrian walked into the room, and the worker called out, "Isn't that right, mate?"

Adrian looked puzzled. "What's that?"

"You didn't get enough cuddles when you were a baby, did you?"

Adrian was embarrassed but laughed it off, saying, "Oh no, we never get enough of that. Never get enough of that."

I found it wonderfully healthy that ordinary men could joke about such things so openly. It really delighted me.

When we begin to mature and see the effects of our childhood—recognizing how our parents' treatment shaped us—resentment often arises. It's common to go through periods of deep resentment when we realize our parents weren't very affectionate, that we didn't truly feel loved, and we see the lasting marks this has left on us. This resentment can become a driving force in our lives for some time.

I met someone earlier this year who was going through this intensely. She was a lovely person—sensitive, emotionally deep, very much in touch with herself in many ways, committed to peace work and social action. Really a wonderful human being. But she was consumed by resentment toward her parents. Because this resentment ran so deep, she couldn't open to love—neither to loving others nor being loved herself. The resentment reached to the very core of her being.

It's important to accept resentment when it arises. But at a certain point in our development, we must realize that whatever happened in the past, and whoever was at fault, the present moment is a different matter. In this present moment, there's only one person who can move us out of the situation we're in right now—ourselves.

When working with this kind of resentment, we eventually must let go of past blaming and begin taking responsibility for the present moment. No amount of blame or resentment will free us from this particular bind, this particular situation.

After working with these feelings enough and coming to some degree of self-acceptance, we may find ourselves able to forgive our parents for those hurts. At a certain point, we might even appreciate everything they've done for us.

As I've grown older and watched friends raise children—I haven't had children myself—I've begun to see the incredible amount of work involved in raising a child. Just keeping a child clean, clothed, and fed for sixteen years is a full-time undertaking. It's truly a complete job in itself. I've gained a real sense of how much my parents gave to me, how much all our parents have given us through that work.

When we clear ourselves of resentment, there can emerge a genuine appreciation for all those years of what was, in many ways, selfless giving. Even if love wasn't felt, even if we didn't perceive it clearly, those actions expressed tremendous caring. The love may have been present even when we couldn't feel it clearly.

In this relationship with our parents—or any relationship, for that matter—it's important to tune into the interplay between outer and inner that I mentioned earlier. There's a cycle that affects not only self-acceptance but many areas of our lives. It's helpful to become aware of this cycle: from perception to view to action.

Perception means noticing something in the outside world. View is what happens inwardly—we form opinions or conclusions about ourselves or the world. Action is our expression back into the world, emerging from our inner life.

Take the example of feeling unloved in childhood. We perceive the world a certain way—we see our parents as unloving. Whether they actually were is another question, but that's our perception. Instead of letting each perception simply come and go, we tend to form conclusions about it. The conclusion becomes: "They don't love me, therefore I'm not lovable."

We hold onto this conclusion, this view, and it becomes part of our inner world, shaping our inner life. This inner view then determines how we relate to the world. If we truly feel we're not lovable, we act and relate to the world as though this will always be true.

For instance, we enter a relationship expecting rejection because our inner view tells us we're not lovable. We form friendships expecting them to end. We meet new groups expecting no one will like us.

In all these new relationships, there's opportunity for fresh perception to arise. We might notice, "That person likes me."

But that fresh perception comes into conflict with a long-held view, which is that I'm not likable. So we've got a conflict. There's the perception that someone may like me. There's the deep-held view that nobody could like me. Which do you think we give up? The fresh truth, the living truth, or the old view?

More often we toss out the fresh perception. We invalidate that feeling of affection because we're convinced, we believe that it couldn't be true. We cling to that inner view.

So it's important to see this interplay between the perception of the world outside, the view we form inwardly as a result, and then how that view conditions our behavior, which expresses itself in our outer relation to the world. There's an ongoing interplay in every area of our life, from the outer to the inner and back again. This is why people like Krishnamurti have made the comment, there truly is no inner and no outer. He says this is all one movement. All one movement.

So we come through infancy and find ourselves in school. Now, virtually every school that I've seen, except for a few alternative schools, are characterized by a real atmosphere of competition. One person is matched up against another to see who's going to come out ahead. Whether it's in academics, or in sports, or in beauty, or in popularity. Always this sense of competition.

And what that sets up is the mind that compares. We're always comparing ourselves to others. And all you have to do is meet—if you're into this comparison game—all you have to do is meet one person who's better than you, and you feel badly. One person who's better. And it hurts.

So we can say, I am not as blank as someone else. And you can fill in the blank with any positive quality that you like. I'm not as pretty. I'm not as handsome. I'm not as intelligent. I'm not as funny. I'm not as popular. I'm not as talented. I'm not as rich. I'm not as good in sports. I'm not as well dressed. I'm not as cool.

And you just meet one person who's better than you in any of those areas and you feel badly. It's crazy. Sooner or later, we always meet someone who's better than us in any area of life. And this comparison is so unnecessary.

You know, in the middle of it, we never stop to ask the question: How pretty do you have to be to be okay? How handsome do you have to be to be acceptable? So that people don't sort of run away from you when they see you coming—"Here comes that ugly man again." We never stop to see if there's any sort of real standard, which of course there isn't.

It's as though whenever we were to go look at a flower, we'd see a red tulip that's in bloom in the springtime. It's a beautiful red tulip with its brilliant colors, throbbing with life. And we'd look at it and say, "Well, the rose is really nice. I wish you were a rose. You're not quite as good as a rose." And we'd discount it.

We all are individual. We all have different expressions. We all are different expressions of life. We have unique strengths and unique weaknesses. And we all have those strengths and weaknesses. There's nobody who doesn't.

And when we compare ourselves to another through these facets—just these fragments of ourselves—we pick on a little fragment and say, "Oh, but somebody else's fragment is better than mine, therefore I'm no good." We destroy ourselves through this activity of thought, this activity of comparing.

And it's not necessary.

This message was really brought home to me in the early seventies. I was hitchhiking in California in 1973, and the hippie ideal was still in swing. That's really where it was at—basically living out the hippie dream. I was hitchhiking on a freeway when I was picked up by a couple who were about my age or a little older, between twenty-five and thirty. They were clearly not taking up the hippie dream, and as far as I was concerned, this couple looked like they could have come from another planet.

They were driving this old Ford Falcon convertible that was about fifteen years old at the time. It was sort of falling apart—the paint was really chipped, some chrome was falling off, and the fender was dented. The couple were not of the standard conforming to the image of beauty or handsomeness. They were the sort of people in my high school who probably wouldn't have gotten dates to the senior prom. They were both quite overweight. The fellow had on a set of old overalls and a cowboy hat. Their car wouldn't go over about fifty miles an hour. We're on a California freeway and everybody's whizzing by us at seventy in these brand new Fords and Lincolns, and he was pottering along at fifty miles an hour in a car that sounded like it could die.

It suddenly struck me that these people had looked at the whole area of competition in life and they'd dropped out of it. They'd looked at what happened if they wanted to play that game of competition, and they'd said, "No thanks." They had gone beyond comparisons and were just living their lives. They had such a nice relationship. I had such a good time in the car with them because they were cheerful, they'd laugh with each other, you could tell there was a lot of affection between them. Having dropped out of the whole thing, they weren't obsessed with this madness of living up to some phony kind of standard. It was a really beautiful contact, actually, and a real lesson for me.

If we survive our infancy and childhood and school, then we come to the stage of young adulthood. This is the time in life where we have about three months to go from being a kid to being an adult. Remember that period? One minute you're being taken care of by mom and dad and everything's provided, and a few months later you're supposed to be completely on your own and a grown-up.

Within a few months, you really may have to enter the field of employment. You're supposed to go out and support yourself, get all the money you need to live. And owning a car—then you have to learn about changing the oil and testing the spark plugs and what kind of petrol to buy for it. And relationship—you may move in with someone, even get married at this time. For many people, this is when you start to have children, so you become parents. Get an apartment on your own, get your own flat, and start to learn to cook for yourself. All this goes on within a few months. You're supposed to make this transition just like that, overnight. Not so easy.

That can be a very rocky patch of life, that particular bit of growing up. A lot of us get sort of a few dents in the old self-image about that time. I remember when I was twenty-one, I got into my first serious relationship. I was leaving university, and a woman and I decided to live together. It was a disaster. First time I tried to live with anyone, it was a disaster.

Relationships are great. They can really bring out the very best sides of ourselves. When we're in love, we just see absolutely the nicest parts of our personality unfolding moment after moment for a while. And then the process of falling out of love may take place, and then we see just the worst parts of ourselves. I was amazed at what came out for me in that relationship. It took me a long time to get over it, basically.

Someone said that self-knowledge is no good news. That's the way I felt in that period. I'd seen sides of myself that I didn't know I was capable of, and it shook me quite deeply, actually. It took me about a year to kind of get over having seen those parts of myself.

So if we make it through young adulthood, we start to find some maturity in life. And it's very helpful, but it can be a source of more difficulty. We start to see that there may be a way to live without so much self-centeredness. We start to discover some of our human potential. We start to have experiences for shorter or longer periods of time where we're free of a sense of conflict, where there's a real sense of well-being, being deeply in tune with life, and we feel what it would mean to live with clarity without being so self-centered, without being angry or uptight.

And these are wonderful insights. Very important to contact these sides of ourselves. But the trouble is, we can easily, so easily, turn these into new ideals. And then we begin to compare ourselves to the new ideals and think things like, "Well, I should always be loving. I should always be open. I should always be completely generous and giving." And it's not very realistic. And this is where the should-be comes in and forms a conflict. And basically we compare ourselves between what we feel we are in this moment and what we feel should be.

And of course this can come in in our meditation as well. When we're given a goal like meditation on the breath, we can easily take up the idea, "I should be with the breath all the time." And if we have that ideal—I should be with the breath 100% of the time—none of our meditation periods are going to be satisfying. Anytime we're not with the breath, we feel we're not doing well enough.

So we have to let go of that ideal in the breathing meditation, that we're supposed to be there all the time, and just be with the reality of it. Sometimes we're with the breath, sometimes we're not. When we're with the breath, then awareness is being developed. And whatever we do in that situation is actually fine. We do as much as we can and that starts the meditation working. No need to compare it to an ideal.

So we need, all along the whole spiritual path, to balance some degree of critical awareness, some degree of judgment, with a degree of acceptance. Most of us would never even start on meditation or self-knowledge if there wasn't some degree of goal for it, if we didn't have some degree of ideal that we wanted to move toward—a degree of being more open, wiser, a more loving sort of person. So that goal propels us along the spiritual path.

At the same time, to keep moving with some degree of harmony, there has to be acceptance of the reality of this moment, acceptance of what is. So this interplay, this dynamic between the goal and the reality is sort of an ongoing seesaw in walking the spiritual path. And you have to acknowledge and work with both halves of it—both the ideal and the reality.

And so then we may think, "Well, we've got life sort of sorted out. We've come into our maturity. We're working with ideals." And then we become aware of the process of aging. And self-acceptance can move on to the physical level, concerned with the physical.

One morning about our mid-30s, we sort of wake up and look in the mirror and we realize, "Hey, I'm not young anymore." And then how does that feel? So much emphasis is placed on youth and the idea that beauty really goes with youth and not with age.

I don't know if you've really taken a look around cosmetic shops and seen how many of the things that are on sale there have to do with aging—all sorts of creams and lotions and potions to take away wrinkles and make the skin young and soft, and colors to dye the hair, to hide the streaks of gray or whatever. Even special—I know there's this chain in England called The Body Shop. It's all natural ingredients, so it's very good. It hasn't been tested on animals, so it's very good to buy there. And they have a special lotion designed for these wrinkles around the eye, which are called crow's feet in English, because they're like the feet of a bird. So there's a special lotion you can get for the wrinkles around the eyes at these shops.

And we may look in the mirror one morning and notice that, hey, the stomach's getting a little more rounded than it used to be. When did that come in? All these different signs of aging. And if it's not the stomach, it's the hair. The gray hair starts to come in, as you may have noticed.

And this really came home to me a couple of years ago. I went to a seminar at Amaravati, this Buddhist monastery up near London, and some speakers were giving talks on the theme of Buddhism and social action. And I listened to the talks, and afterwards a few of us were sitting around discussing what the speakers had said and the idea of Buddhism and social action. I was giving my comments on various speakers and their themes. And then I got up and walked off. And there was a fellow, I didn't know, who was sitting next to my wife, who was on my right.

And after I'd walked off, he turned to my wife, Sally, and said to her, "Who was that man?"

And she said, "What man?"

And he said, "That middle-aged man who was sitting on your left."

It was only a couple of years ago. I didn't realize I'd gotten there so quickly.

And if your hair's not going gray, it's probably falling out, right? The other thing we men face. I had a good friend who was almost totally bald when he was about twenty-eight. By that age he just had a little fringe left around here—a little blonde fringe. Fortunately, he kept his sense of humor about it. He said the hardest thing about being bald was when he washed his forehead in the morning, he never knew where to stop.

So there's no retirement from this self-acceptance work. It can strike at any age, any time.

How do we work with it? How do we get through this difficulty, this lack of self-acceptance?

The first and most important thing is the quality of awareness. Bringing awareness to the situation and seeing where we come up against this feeling of self-rejection, how it manifests in our life, where it came from, how it makes us feel, and so forth. When we begin to see how it influences us, when we begin to see how the mind reacts to that sense of not being worthy or not being loved, then we start to understand its mechanism. And when we start to understand it, we can get to some degree free of it. We understand our motives and our reactions to life. We begin to understand this interplay between the outer and the inner and our own responsibility in that play. We stop seeing ourselves just as victims of circumstance.

In addition, I think it's important in life to find ways to develop a sense of joy. Basically, this means finding things that bring you pleasure, finding things you like to do—but don't depend so much on other people to fill you up. Find things that you yourself like to do, possibly alone.

Many people have hobbies that they've really been into for a while, and often we let those slip away. We say, "Well, my life's too busy. I don't have time for that anymore." But in giving those things up, we really give up an important source of nourishment for ourselves. I feel it's important for us to find those activities that really bring us pleasure, whether it's painting or music or cycling or walking in nature. So many things to get involved with. And if you don't know of anything, look around, take some classes, try a few things out. Look to cultivate that sense of enjoyment in life.

Also, keep in mind your strengths and your talents. Don't forget the good sides of yourself. We all have lots of strengths, lots of good points. But when we're caught up in self-doubt, we only look at the negative side of ourselves. So easily, thought can just dwell on one tiny part of the picture, and we forget about all the rest. So don't forget about that. Keep in mind what you're good at, where your strengths are.

Something else I feel can be very helpful in working with a sense of unworthiness is service to others. Often our psychological problems can make us self-absorbed. All our energy and all our thoughts and all our activities can revolve more and more around myself, me, myself, and I. This becomes a kind of self-enclosing circle, and in many ways, the noose can just get tighter. It's important to begin to see beyond that cycle.

One way of doing it—very, very helpful—is to work in a way that helps others. It can be through your livelihood, whether you work as a nurse or counselor or therapist, physiotherapist or whatever. It can be through volunteer work. Almost everywhere that I know of, there's plenty of need for volunteers to help with old people or disabled people—many different kinds of needs in the community. Being able to give to others, finding that one actually has something to offer to others, really gives one a sense of contributing, a sense of making a difference. It can offset this sense of unworthiness, of not mattering.

And finally, keep up your practice. The practice in itself leads to a greater sense of harmony in life. We're working here to develop directly wholesome qualities of mind like attention, like oneness of mind, like equanimity, openness, loving-kindness, and so forth.

All these wholesome qualities of mind, as they come through more and more in the meditation, start to be felt and experienced in our life. There's already a growing sense of well-being, greater sense of harmony in life. And this is one of the strong features of meditation as opposed to, I would say, many kinds of therapy that provides a real boost to growth and development. The practice itself will bring more harmony, will bring healing.

As that healing starts to take place and our mind starts to come together, we don't feel so divided within ourselves, we don't feel so split. Then the mind can rest within itself. When the mind's in conflict with itself over a key issue—like whether we like ourselves or not—the mind can't really settle. Always looking for some way around this problem, around this conflict. When we start to understand and heal this division, then the mind can begin to settle in itself, naturally.

This oneness of mind, this state of samadhi, doesn't have to be striven for. We don't have to exert ourselves with great effort in the breathing meditation to bring the mind together. It comes together naturally. And as that natural coming together happens, then the doors start to open for really working, really seeing on the spiritual level of life.

You may think this is a bit of a contradiction to say something like, "I must accept myself." Especially in Buddhism, which is supposed to teach you there isn't a self. How can a self accept itself when there's no self to begin with? And somebody summed up this dilemma quite neatly when they said that you have to be somebody before you can be nobody.

Basically pointing to the fact that we have to come to an integration within the realm of the ego, on the level of self. That has to be integrated and harmonious before we can let go of it. Because without that sense of harmony, there's not the trust, there's not the faith to really let go of self. And that's what's really required in opening on the spiritual path—not a destruction of self, not an annihilation of self, but a surrender, a letting go of self. And that letting go requires a lot of faith, a lot of trust. And that trust, I feel, can only come from a mind that has healed these deep kinds of divisions.

I'd just like to close with a quote from a book called the Hsin Hsin Ming. It was written by the third patriarch of Zen, well before 1100. Hsin Hsin Ming means "treatise on the faith mind." It's a discourse on the mind that can trust. And in it, the author, the third Zen patriarch, talks about what he calls "the non-dual." The non-dual is that in life which is without a second, which cannot be compared, which is the ground of all existence, which is the unconditioned aspect in the universe. And of this he said: "The non-dual is one with the trusting mind. The non-dual is one with the trusting mind."

May all beings live with self-acceptance. May all beings live with affection. May all beings develop the trusting mind.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 2

From Ego to Expansiveness

Guy Armstrong · 47 min

> Guy Armstrong offers a profound exploration of the meditative journey from ego-bound consciousness to expansive awareness. Drawing from both Buddhist psychology and Zen teachings, he examines how our sense of 'I' manifests through constant wanting and avoiding—what he identifies as the fundamental movements of ego. Armstrong explains how these patterns create what Buddhist tradition calls saṃsāra, the wheel of cyclic existence, understood both in terms of rebirth and moment-to-moment arising of different selves.
>
> The talk traces how meditation practice gradually loosens identification with thoughts and desires, leading to what Armstrong calls a 'reducing process' where personality structures dissolve into their basic components. He emphasizes how retreat environments facilitate this breakdown by removing external hooks for our habitual patterns. Through patient awareness, practitioners discover the insubstantial nature of ego—not as something to be destroyed, but as a quality of holding that creates the illusion of solid selfhood.
>
> As self-concern diminishes, consciousness naturally expands, returning to what Freud called the 'oceanic sense of self.' Armstrong illustrates this with stories from Krishnamurti and Zen tradition, showing how expansive awareness can accommodate both stillness and movement simultaneously. The journey culminates in seeing ego's demands within the vast context of existence—like a tiny whirlpool in an infinite ocean—allowing practitioners to live with greater equanimity and freedom while remaining fully engaged with life.

Nice to see you all again. I'd like to talk tonight on the topic of from ego to expansiveness, which is a description of the unfolding of the meditation practice, the development of insight over time. The talk, in a way, is a complement to the guided meditation that we did this morning on developing an expansive awareness.

So we start off working with this question of ego. This term ego is very central to meditation practice and a very fertile ground for inquiry, looking into what constitutes the ego. And I'll say just right now what I mean by this word ego. It's really the sense of self or the sense of I that we have in life. We express it many, many times during the day. "I feel this. I want that. My body is this way. My mind is that way." So we use this I, me, my sense incessantly, without in the beginning ever stopping to think what it means, where it comes from.

So I'd like to talk about this sense of self, the sense of I, how it manifests in the practice, and how the experience of it changes over time in meditation.

First of all, I'd like to look at the nature of the ego on what I'd call a fairly gross level. On the gross level of the ego, it expresses itself by movements of mind—movements of mind generally expressing, to some extent, self-concern, self-interest. And so we find, as we come to sit in meditation, that we have sort of endless tapes of desires and wants and hopes and worries and doubts and fears and likes and dislikes. All these movements of mind have been built up over years and years of habit.

If we start looking into these movements of mind and what they're all about, they're basically expressing a very simple principle. They incline us toward pleasure and away from pain. So all the movements of our thoughts are toward achieving more of what we consider to be pleasant and away from trying to avoid or have less in our life of what we consider painful or unpleasant. You could say that the movement of self, the movement of ego on this gross level is marked by the factor of wanting, of desire, of volition, or will, or motive. All these terms are more or less synonymous and point to the I manifesting itself in some movement of mind.

What all of these movements are expressing, whether it's the positive movement of wanting or the negative movement of not wanting, is a preference. We carve out a preference for ourselves and we try to make it a reality in the world. And this is perhaps our great mistake.

There's a text, an old Chinese Zen text, written by the third Zen patriarch, a master called Seng-ts'an. He was called the third patriarch in the Chinese tradition of Zen. His book is called the Xin Xin Ming, which means discourse or treatise on the faith mind, on the mind that knows faith or trust. He begins this little treatise in this way: "The Great Way is not difficult for those who have no preferences. To set up what you like against what you dislike is the disease of the mind."

So it's this fundamental discrimination between what we like, what is pleasant, and therefore what we propel ourselves toward, versus what we dislike, what we term unpleasant, which we try to move away from. Around these two movements, our whole life is lived. If you look at the activities of ninety-nine percent of the minds in the world, they're revolving around these particular poles.

So our life is really driven by this wanting and avoiding. And it's incessant. We find the incessant nature of it when we come to sit quietly, and we find that the wanting and not wanting doesn't stop, even though we can't do anything about it. We're sitting still for forty-five minutes. We can't satisfy any of those desires. We can't move away from any of the things that are arising. And yet, the mental mechanism goes on and on and on.

There's a constant sense when we first come to meditation of spinning. It feels like the mind is always spinning, churning, going round and round and round. It's a bit like getting on a carnival ride—one of these rides with the painted horses. You climb on one and it goes around and around and around, only on this one you can't get off. You only paid for one ticket, but you can't find the way off. So you keep going round and round.

There's a term in the ancient Asian traditions for this phenomenon, for this way of living, and the term is samsara. This is the realm of samsara. Samsara is usually translated as the wheel of cyclic existence.

Old Pali term and a Sanskrit term, the wheel of cyclic existence, implying that our life is somewhat like a wheel that keeps going round and round and round.

In the East, they tend to understand this wheel in terms of reincarnation, the doctrine of rebirth—that we are born into this life having been born many, many times before in different existences. We live out this life, we die, and as long as there's still some mental motion, that gives rise to another birth, another existence in the future. This wheel of being born and dying, being born and dying, goes on and on until we understand freedom, until we discover where freedom lies. We're bound, say the Asian traditions, to continued rebirth, reincarnation.

Frankly, I don't think it matters one bit for your meditation practice whether you believe in reincarnation or not. It makes absolutely no difference to your practice. So you can take this view up and cherish it, or you can leave it at the door as you leave the retreat, and your mind will be a little bit freer.

But there's another way to understand this wheel of birth and death from a moment-to-moment perspective: every time a new desire arises, a new self is born. That self persists for as long as the desire is in force, and when it ends, that self dies. Then, a few minutes later, or a few seconds later—however strong your practice is—another self is born that goes through its own lifetime, and it dies. So we can understand this cycle of birth and death on a moment-by-moment level, that the "I" is being born again and again in different forms.

First there's the wanting "I"—the "I" that's sitting and wanting the bell to ring at the end of a sitting. Then there's the angry "I"—the "I" that is resentful that the pain in the knee has come just now when the mind was starting to get calm, and that lasts for a while. Then there's the hungry "I" that waits for the tea to be served at 5:30 when it's a minute late. All these forms of "I" are coming up again and again and again, lasting for a while and then dying.

The thing we find when we come to meditation practice is we're not able to get off this wheel either. There's no end to these repeated cycles of desire and aversion, liking and disliking. With each new one that arises, there's more sense of unrest, more sense of being pulled along by our desires and aversions. So again, we're trapped, caught on this wheel, the wheel of samsara.

Over many years of our lives, these incessant arisings of wanting and not wanting can develop into quite a tangle because they tend to get interconnected and conflict often develops. One of your desires will conflict with one of your fears—a very common experience. We want something, but at the same time we're afraid. So the tangle of emotions begins to build as these impulses and drives get interconnected.

Let me give you an example of how this can work. Let's say we have someone in their teens who doesn't feel very good about themselves. There's a certain degree of non-self-acceptance in that person. And if one doesn't accept oneself, one doesn't necessarily have the belief that others will accept one either. So, expecting that other people won't like one, having contact with others comes to be uncomfortable—somewhat threatening. We expect to be rejected or put down. Because of the pain involved in those relationships, we may tend to withdraw.

So we've already had a movement of volition. There's a belief in us that we won't be likable, therefore we tend to withdraw from relationships by our own volition, our own motive. This is a movement of ego, of the self.

But that withdrawal is painful. It leads to loneliness. Not wanting to live with the loneliness, not being willing to accept that, we tend to try to escape it. So we develop, perhaps as an escape, an interest in something else—a sport, our studies, or a musical instrument. There's another element of volition: wanting to get away from the loneliness, we take up another activity.

Then we see that some skill is possible with that activity. We develop it more fully, and we find that we become well known for it. This is very gratifying. People begin to respect us for our skill, whether it's on the football field, or playing the guitar in a rock band, or getting straight A's at school. Then, out of that sense of inferiority, we tend to build ourselves up based on that platform. We say, "Ah, I'm not no one. I'm actually good at something." And there arises pride—another movement of wanting to be recognized, wanting to feel superior.

As we become more proud, unfortunately we're stuck in a withdrawn position from our earlier habits, and we tend to become more arrogant toward people. We want to show our superiority, so we start acting in a prideful way, and then people begin to withdraw from us.

So another movement of volition expresses the need to feel superior, and it too has a reaction in the outside world. We find ourselves more and more isolated, and that can become increasingly painful. In time we may take to other escapes such as exploitative sexual relationships, drugs or alcohol, or the quest for more power and status.

Over time, what initially began as simply a certain degree of lack of self-acceptance gets built up into a whole persona, an entire personality woven around these different impulses that have accumulated. If we look into our own development, we can see that for each one of us there are probably a number of such threads—various ways that our personality has developed along similar volitional lines. We have created much of our own personality, not knowingly or intentionally, but volitionally through our will.

We come into meditation and bring along with us this whole web of what we call our personality, what we call the "me." As we begin to develop the quality of awareness, that web of personality starts to be illuminated. We begin to shine a light within on that web. The tangle that has developed over many, many years starts to unravel under the patient light of awareness—sort of a thread at a time, bit by bit.

This is one of the truly healing aspects of meditation practice: we really can come to see ourselves clearly on that psychological, emotional level. Awareness shines the light of understanding throughout our personality, and then some of this tangle starts to unravel. With that comes a greater sense of freedom.

This process can't really be rushed or forced. The knots that we've built up have to come out of their own accord. We just have to be there, patient and attentive. Over time, given that sort of attitude, the knots will untie. Our attitude basically has to be one of non-interfering—not making any more attempts with our will, with our volition, with our ego, with our motives to alter that process, but rather simply letting it take place. Just let it happen.

Then we move in meditation to a more subtle level, a more subtle manifestation of ego. We find that thoughts and impulses continue to go through consciousness, but a change starts to take place: the degree of our identification is reduced. We don't identify so strongly with each movement of mind that occurs. This is a major change.

Earlier, when we came to sit in meditation, if our mind moved to some form of wanting, we felt as though we moved with it. This is the state of being identified with our thoughts, with our desires. As awareness becomes stronger, there's a sense that we can be still and the thought can move through without affecting us so much.

As the identification is reduced, there's a sense of stillness, even though movements of mind still come, even though desire still arises, even though annoyance may still appear. There's more a sense of being still within and observing that movement. We don't feel so tied to it. This is a step back from this wheel—the first step back from being taken around and around on this wheel of samsara. It's an important change.

One of the reasons that the environment here is created the way it is, as I mentioned earlier in the retreat, is to take away some of the external stimuli that make up our daily lives. You notice one of the characteristics of the retreat environment is that there's not much going on outside ourselves that we have to relate to. We're thrown back again and again on our own experience. This is very useful for the transformative process.

Outside, the way we kept our patterns, this web of personality, the way we kept that ball together was by constantly hooking it on things in the outside world. We'd say, "Well, naturally I have desire because there are so many attractive things here. I want a new car and a new house and a new stereo and a new boyfriend. Of course that desire is natural." Or, "Well, of course I get angry. There are so many silly people around. This person did that to me and then this person did that. Well, of course I get angry."

We come into a situation like this and we don't find it so easy to hook our patterns on outside influences. We start to realize the absurdity of some of these movements of mind. Of course, it's not that those movements stop because we come in here—I'm sure you recognize that by now. Just because there's no good reason for them doesn't mean they go away. Because unfortunately, or fortunately, it's the same mind. Same mind.

So we go in for our lunch one day and we're patiently standing in the queue like a good boy or girl. And then we see the person in front of us get to the dessert and go, one, two, three, four. And we think, "How could they? How could they do that? Don't they know there are ten more people still to come? And look, that's the best dessert we've had all week." And this incredible rage can boil up. Incredible. And take us over for the rest of the afternoon every time we see that person.

We begin to see that maybe our response wasn't appropriate to the situation. Maybe it was an exaggerated response that we had to that person. And what we're seeing is the movement of mind without the hooks, without the external situation to pin it on.

What is happening in this kind of process is that the personality is undergoing a reducing process. I don't mean this like a weight loss clinic, that it's getting slimmer, but more in the sense of a chemical reduction. A reducing agent is something that breaks molecules down into their constituent parts, into their atoms. And so our personality is getting broken down into its basic components, without these threads of thought and justification to tie it all together.

Really, we come here in order to go through a breakdown. That's part of what we're about here. I'm sure you recognize it by now. And this can be a little bit disturbing. I came here to get together. I didn't come here to fall apart. And it can seem like the whole structure of our personalities is dissolving in this experience. Everything that we've taken for granted about ourselves suddenly starts coming into question. Well then, who am I really? What kind of person am I? A good person or a bad person? An angry person or a thoughtful person?

So the structure of our self is starting to actually open up. It's starting to unfold a bit. We need to have at this time, at this particular time in the practice, we need to have a good bit of faith to see this process through, because it's a little bit unnerving. Everything that we thought was solid and real and that we could take a stand on in life starts sliding out underneath our feet. And we have to have faith that that process is to be trusted. We must have faith to trust and allow that process to continue, because it's very helpful.

Really what it's a movement from is from complexity to simplicity. Our personalities have gotten built up into very complex forms by our interactions, this web that we've woven over years and years. And when we come into a situation like this, they're getting taken back to the very simple forms. Just the bare emotions are coming up. Anger. Wanting. Loneliness. Unworthiness, lack of love, guilt, joy, happiness. Just these very basic emotions start coming through without necessarily any justification, any reason for being there.

At times it feels like we're quite naked, quite raw in this process, as though all the layers of masks have been peeled aside and we've just opened our heart and can be reached right in and felt. Just a bare grief or anger, loneliness, whatever. Those very bare emotions start coming through.

And then we see that all the movements of mind that we built up around that personality don't really matter so much. That's not really important. All the justifications that we've made for these feelings, we start to recognize that those mental states are just our basic nature, that we don't have to tie them together with any threads of explanation or volition or motive. And we start to see that what we took to be ourselves isn't as solid as we thought it was. We start to see that the ego, what we think is me, isn't really a solid entity. It's just these different mental states and thoughts arising and passing, arising and passing. We start to see there's really nowhere solid in ourselves where we can take a stand. Nothing firm.

Now, you may have heard that the aim in doing meditation practice is to destroy the ego.

This is one of the common buzzwords that floats around when you talk about meditation practice: "I'm going to get in there and really destroy that ego."

There's a writer who goes under the name Wei Wu Wei who had something illuminating to say about this. Wei Wu Wei is a beautiful Chinese name composed of three characters. The first is wei, which means "do" or "act." The second is wu, which means "not." And the third is wei again, which means "do." So his name literally translates as "do, not do"—pointing to a way of acting without motive, acting without trying to act. He's indicating a way of living in the world based on pure spontaneity: wei wu wei, act without trying, act without acting.

Never mind that he's actually an English writer whose real name is Terence Gray. It's a brilliant pen name, and he publishes his books through Hong Kong University Press, so he rather gets away with it.

Here's what Wei Wu Wei had to say about destroying the ego: "Hound the ego and cook its goose—all well and good. But first you have to catch it. And that's the problem, because no such thing exists."

How can you destroy an ego when there isn't one? What he means, of course, is there isn't an ego as a solid entity. You can never destroy your ego because you'll never find one as a solid thing.

If we look more closely, we discover that what constitutes the ego is simply a quality of holding. It's only the holding in our mind that gives any sense of solidity to self. And we hold in so many different ways.

We hold to the past—to memories, to experiences. We hold to the future—to ideas of what I will do, what I want to do, what my plans are. We hold to people: our parents, lovers, friends, sons and daughters. We hold to views: "I know what life is about. I have my philosophy. I have my opinions." We hold to our self-image: "I'm this sort of person. I'm not that sort of person." We hold in many, many ways.

In all these different areas of holding—that's all that creates this sense of "I." That's all there is to it.

If you want to discover where your sense of "I" is located, if you want to find out what you're holding on to, simply look at what's in your thoughts in the middle of a sitting. Here we are, just sitting in the middle of a summer afternoon—well, sort of a summer afternoon in England—in the middle of nowhere, doing nothing. Why should there be anything going on at all? Why should there be anything there at all?

Whatever is there exists as a result of our holding. The key to seeing where our holding lies is simply looking at our own thoughts. What thoughts fill our head? Especially, what thoughts recur? What thoughts come again and again? That's what we're trying to stand on. That's where we're trying to make our stand.

As we begin to see this insubstantial quality of self, we can start to let go of some of these unnecessary movements of mind. We start to realize it really doesn't matter in the middle of a sitting whether I think about that beach I was on in Spain a year ago or not. It really doesn't matter if I think about the job I'm going to take up the month after I leave this retreat. It really doesn't matter whether those thoughts come into my mind or not.

And as we start to invest less in all that structure of past and future, we come upon a new element in our meditation practice, a new element in the experience, and that is the quality of space.

This, again, is an important discovery. We come upon the actual experience of spaciousness in the mind. In fact, the more we let go of these concerns of the self, the more we're willing to let go of our hopes and fears and worries and doubts and likes and dislikes, the more they're replaced by nothing. Nothing takes their place. And so we come to sit and we find there's nothing happening. There's nothing going on. There's nothing here.

Now this can also be a disquieting experience. You've heard probably many times that what we're really all about in developing our meditation practice is coming upon peace. The Buddha said there is no higher happiness than peace. And yet the first time that most of us begin to taste some peace in our practice, we go, "What? Not this." Because it's not comfortable at first. It's scary. Peace is supposed to—you know, little white doves are supposed to fly through and flowers rain down upon you. It's not supposed to be this vacancy, is it?

Because in that kind of space, there's nothing to support the ego. There's no support for self in that. And we've always, throughout our life, we've looked for something that gave support to I, to me. So it takes some adapting to appreciate the quality of peace, to appreciate this quality of space. It's not something that comes naturally for us. But we just have to keep going into that state again and again for it to start feeling more comfortable. For us to realize that we don't have to fill that space with I, with me, with self. And there's actually nothing threatening at all in it. How could there be? How can there be anything threatening in nothing?

So it's just really a matter of becoming comfortable with that spaciousness, with that emptiness. And then it leads into another phase of the meditation, which is the development of this quality of expansiveness.

With this quality of expansiveness, the first thing we notice is a widening of the awareness, a widening of the attention. So in the meditation particularly, you start to realize that there are other people in the room. There are sounds going on outside. We can spend hour after hour so absorbed in our own thoughts and feelings and body sensations that we forget that we're in the middle of a room with twenty-five other people, that there are still things happening outside, that there's life beyond the meditation room door.

So we start, once we come upon this quality of spaciousness, naturally the consciousness starts to widen, starts to broaden. And we realize something that Freud talked about. He mentioned that when a child is very young, as an infant, it has what he called an oceanic sense of self. The baby doesn't have any boundaries to its sense of self. Its consciousness is limitless.

We start to realize that over the years of our growing up, we've retreated, we've shrunk down that original infinite consciousness to become smaller and smaller and smaller until it's just focused on this body and this mind. And what has caused that shrinking of consciousness has been self-concern, has been the repeated movements of the ego, wanting this, not wanting that. It's this preoccupation with self that causes consciousness to shrink down until it focuses on such a small corner of its whole extent.

As we start giving up some of these forms of self-concern, consciousness starts to return to its broader, original basis. And we find then that we're able to take in more of the universe with a balanced state of mind. We can be with more things. We can be open to people. We can hear the sounds, see the background sight, can listen to a person without the mind being swayed by any of it. There's steadiness in it.

There's a nice little story about Krishnamurti that illustrates this quality. It was related to me by someone who used to teach at his school in Hampshire called Brockwood Park. A woman was getting very angry with Krishnamurti. They were standing outside near the vegetable garden of the school, and she was really letting rip at him. She was getting angry with him at the top of her voice.

For minute after minute, I don't know the content of what she was saying, but she was being very vocal and abusive with him. She kept on talking for some time, and then she started to calm down, and he replied. They had a little bit of a discussion, and then that dialogue ended.

As soon as it ended, he said, "Quick, come over here." He took her over to a bush that was growing against a wall and said, "I think there's a bird's nest in here." They looked behind the bush, and sure enough there was a little nest with three little eggs in it.

She said, "How on earth did you know that?"

He said, "Well, while you were talking to me, I noticed that there was a little gray sparrow that flew into that bush three different times. Two of the times he had little pieces of feathers in his mouth, which I thought he was probably using to pad the nest."

That's a spacious mind.

Someone said about expansive consciousness that events don't cause the same kind of disturbance in an expansive awareness. It's like the difference between putting a teaspoon of salt into a glass of water and putting the same teaspoon of salt into a lake. When you put a teaspoon of salt into a glass and stir it up, the water tastes very strongly of salt. When you put that same teaspoon into a lake, you can't even tell it's there.

Similarly, an expansive awareness that holds anger—you can hardly taste its presence. But when consciousness is very narrow, when it's tight and confined, and anger comes into it, it feels like it could explode under that influence.

This expansive awareness allows us to accommodate both the inner and outer changes of life without being so shaken by them, without being so disturbed. This lends greatly to the accommodating quality of mind. As we become more grounded in this sense of spaciousness, we're less influenced by the changes that life presents, by the different pleasures and pains that come our way. This brings a degree of steadiness and equanimity into living.

Another very valuable thing about this expansiveness is that as consciousness broadens out, what we took to be our self is relatively smaller. This mind and this body are relatively less of the whole of consciousness. This means that, in a way, the sense of self is getting weaker, getting smaller. As you develop this quality of expansiveness, at times this sense of self may slip away entirely. If it does, it's a very useful time because understanding and insight can come from such an experience of not having this burden of self.

There's one thing you can be sure of if an experience like this comes your way, and that is that in fairly short order, the self will return. Not to harbor any illusions on that score.

There's a nice story from the Zen tradition that illustrates this. There was a Chinese monk who had been practicing Zen all of his life. He'd been in the monastery for about forty years, and he was now getting old. He hadn't come upon the freedom that his teacher spoke about and obviously manifested. He hadn't come upon that discovery and he was getting discouraged.

"I've tried so hard for all my grown life. I haven't found it. It's just not going to happen for me this lifetime." So he decided to leave the monastery. He gave up, basically. He left the monastery and started to walk up by himself into the mountains behind.

At this time, a bodhisattva, one of these mythical beings in the Mahayana branch of Buddhism, became aware of his plight and decided to manifest himself to see if he could work with the old monk. This happened to be the Bodhisattva Manjushri, a bodhisattva of discriminating wisdom. He manifested himself in the form of an old man who was walking down the mountainside with a heavy load of firewood on his back. The old man was bent double under the weight of this firewood and was walking down the hillside with great difficulty, pain at each step.

This old monk was coming up the path and saw this man. He just exchanged a short glance with him and thought, "There's something different about this man. This person knows." He just saw it in his eyes.

So he stopped and said, "What is it then?"

Manjushri, in the form of the old man, shrugged off the bundle of firewood that was on his back. He stood up straight and tall like a young man, like a man in his twenties. At that moment the monk saw. He had that insight that brought him the freedom, the understanding that he was looking for. He saw what it was to live without the weight, the burden of self, which is what Manjushri was trying to teach him. He got it.

And so at that moment he said, "Oh, and then what?"

And at that point Manjushri reached down, picked up the firewood, put it back on his back, bent double under the weight and walked off slowly down the hill again, taking up again the burden of self, but no longer believing in it—no longer feeling that it's solid, that it's a solid entity. Because when we have the mind of expansiveness, we see the self in a new light.

And with this expansive awareness you may come upon a different kind of experience, a different quality than you might have thought was possible. For instance, it's possible in developing this expansive awareness to feel a great sense of calm. Because with this widening of consciousness one taps into just the underlying stillness of existence.

At the same time, the mind can keep moving. Desires can arise, fears, likes, dislikes, and so forth. So there can be at the same time a sense of great calm from the expansiveness and a sense of agitation from the fact that the emotions are still alive and working. So this is an unusual thing. I wasn't quite prepared for it when I first came upon it. I didn't know that you could be both calm and agitated at the same time. So it threw me for a minute.

Now, if this comes about, one has a choice. One can stay with the calmness in its breadth or one can focus on the agitation. And I'd say what is most helpful at these times is to stay with the calmness. Keep the focus open and wide with that underlying sense of stillness and just let the agitation exist within that.

Because what has happened in the past is that time and time again, though we may have felt a moment of peace, the self has arisen and called out. It calls out with its worries, with its fears, with its hopes, with its wants, with its dislikes. And every time it's called, we've come running. Like an attentive mother who's attending to her fragile baby, we've answered to the ego's cries with our care and attention. And what that has done is to reinforce that sense of need, of wanting, of fearing, and so forth.

Seeing the ego's call from this point of expansiveness, we can develop a new relationship to it. We can let the cries be there, but we don't have to take them so seriously. Because we start to see that it's not a matter of life and death—these wants and hopes and fears, past and future and so forth. We don't have to respond with agitation, with more self-concern to these cries.

And it's as though the ego and all of its movements, seen in this context of expansiveness, are like one tiny whirlpool on a whole ocean of life. There's the whole ocean of existence, vast and infinite. And all we've gotten concerned about, ninety-nine percent of the time, is this one tiny whirlpool in this one small corner of the ocean of wanting.

When we start to see it in this way, we can see the ego's needs and its wants with a quality of dispassion. We no longer feel passionately about them. We're no longer compelled to respond, to answer them. Nor do we have to change them. And this is the beauty of this kind of seeing. We don't have to make every form of desire or fear or anger go away. We just have to see it in perspective and to see it for what it is. And then we're no longer bound by it. We can accommodate those movements of mind while still being grounded in an overall sense of expansiveness and calm and peace.

This movement begins in meditation with being completely enwrapped in this web of personality that we've woven through our wanting—the center that we've put together through our will and our volition and our thoughts. Moving away from that exclusive emphasis on self-concern to seeing that movement in the context of the whole of existence, so that our life truly becomes grounded in a broader perspective on life. It's one of the major transformations in any real spiritual path.

May all beings see into the nature of self. May all beings come upon spaciousness. May all beings live with an expansive awareness.

CHAPTER 3

Fear

Guy Armstrong · 59 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines fear as one of the two fundamental movements of mind, alongside wanting, that shapes our entire approach to pleasure and pain. Drawing on insights from Krishnamurti's teaching that "thought breeds fear," Armstrong reveals how we create our own fears through imagination of unpleasant future scenarios, and how attachment (upādāna) to people, possessions, views, and self-image perpetuates the very insecurity we seek to escape.
>
> Armstrong offers practical guidance for working with fear in meditation practice, emphasizing the importance of directly investigating and accepting fear rather than avoiding it. He explores how fear manifests in both body and mind, sharing techniques from co-counseling and personal experiences of confronting deep-seated terror during intensive retreats. The talk includes compelling stories from the Thai forest tradition, particularly Ajahn Mun's methods of having monks practice alone in tiger-inhabited forests to confront the ultimate fear of death.
>
> Concluding with a powerful Zen story illustrating complete fearlessness, Armstrong demonstrates how understanding the mechanics of fear and developing the courage to face it directly can lead to genuine liberation and the natural arising of love and compassion.

I'd like to talk tonight about the emotion of fear and the factor of fear in our lives. I feel that it's one of the most fundamental things that we need to come to terms with, both in our life and in our practice.

I could say that there are really two fundamental movements of mind: fear, on the one hand, and wanting, on the other. They arise in relation to the two main poles of our feeling life, which are pleasure and pain. When you look at the activities of humans all around the world, over centuries and centuries, our movements, our activities, our whole thrust in life is basically ninety-nine percent of the time a move to create more pleasure and to avoid pain in life. As you see the kind of thoughts that come up in a few days of a meditation retreat, you'll find that the thoughts also tend to revolve around these two factors of pleasure and pain.

Of course the desire, the wanting force arises in relation to pleasure. We want to bring into our lives that which is pleasurable. Fear arises in regard to that which may be painful. So between these two poles, our thoughts go. And because our thoughts go that way, our motives go that way. Because our motives go that way, our intentions go that way. Because our intentions go that way, our actions go that way. Because our actions go that way, our lives go that way—around these two factors.

Fear is one of our deepest conditionings. It's present in many forms in our life, from small to big. There are the little fears that come up in life, like, "I hope they remember to put honey out with the tea today," and "I hope the car will start on a winter's morning," or "I hope that pain in the knee won't come up again during this sitting." And then there are the big fears: fear of pain, physical pain; fear of rejection, close friendship or relationship; fear of failure—many aspects of our lives. Fear of unhappiness. Fear of never finding contentment in our lives. Fear of dying. And maybe the biggest of all, really for most of us, is the fear of life—fear of all the complexity involved in this process of living.

When fear is present in the mind, it really casts a very dark shadow. It's as though we live with fear, we live under a dark cloud of anxiety, worry, apprehension. When the fear is there, even though it may be bright and sunny out, that somehow can't come into the heart. The heart can't really open to the beauty and the joy that life can bring. The fear leads to a sense of contraction, of closeness. Our whole spirit kind of shrinks under the influence of fear.

There was a science fiction book that was very popular in the late sixties called Dune. It was written by Frank Herbert, and in it he describes life on another planet and a band of warriors who train by working with their minds through mind-altering drugs—very appropriate for the late sixties. You can imagine it received a cult following in the hippie era. One of the key lessons that these warriors had to learn to work with was the factor of fear. They expressed it in this way: they said that fear is the great mind-killer. When fear is present, it keeps the mind from flowering, from opening up.

So in our lives, in our practice, it prevents each one of us from unfolding as people, from opening up the positive strengths that are within—the stability of mind and openness, affection and so forth. All of that is blocked under the influence of fear. It also leads us to a sense of isolation. We can't open to other people acting under this influence.

Some people consider that the opposite of love is hatred. But I would say rather that the true opposite of love is fear. When fear disappears in the mind, even for a brief period, when fear is absent, love is naturally there. Love comes naturally. We don't have to do anything in our practice to create love and affection. Rather, in dealing with the negative mindsets, working through them, understanding them... coming to some freedom from them, the positive qualities are automatically present. Love is there within each of us and would naturally emerge if it weren't for the cloud of fear obscuring it.

There's a fascinating book you may have encountered called A Course in Miracles, which had quite an extraordinary origin. A psychologist in America, a woman in middle age, suddenly began hearing thoughts streaming through her mind. She found this peculiar—these weren't her usual mental patterns. She was simply a clinically trained psychologist with no spiritual inclinations whatsoever.

As these thoughts persisted, she decided to write them down, thinking perhaps a page or two would clear her mind. Eleven hundred pages later, she found herself with what became A Course in Miracles. The writing flowed automatically, as though she were serving as a conduit for another voice. Whether this was actually the case, I cannot say, but this was her experience. She didn't particularly believe in such phenomena and didn't even want to transcribe the material, but the thoughts were so persistent she felt compelled to record them.

When she finished and read the complete work, she discovered it contained profound wisdom and genuine dharma teachings. Though expressed in Christian terminology, it offers what I consider a universal expression of the dharma. An American psychologist has since distilled these thirteen hundred pages into a more accessible format, creating a bestseller that captures part of the central message: Love is Letting Go of Fear. This approach to human development centers on working with our fears and learning to release them, allowing love to flower naturally. Love is always present within us.

Fear, I believe, also lies at the root of aggression. If you observe people who carry much anger or hostility, who express violence either physically or psychologically, you'll discover that beneath this behavior lies fear. The contracting quality of fear creates a sense that our very existence is threatened, as though we might be squeezed out of being entirely. Under such imploding energy, when it becomes extreme, the only apparent relief sometimes comes through explosion—through some form of violence. This explosive energy typically represents a reaction to fear's contraction, making aggression another fundamental movement of mind closely aligned with fear.

So this evening I'd like to explore how to work with fear in our practice. How can we become free from it? True freedom from fear requires understanding. Only insight, only wisdom, can effectively remove fear from our lives.

In seeking to understand fear, I find that Krishnamurti, the Indian philosopher who died last year, offered some of the most penetrating observations. He summarized his understanding of this problem in one concise phrase: "Thought breeds fear." If we want to discover fear's origins, we must examine our thoughts.

You can observe this in your own practice—the emotion of fear is typically preceded by imagining some unpleasant future circumstance. This recognition holds tremendous liberating potential. We create our own fears, generating them through our thoughts. Life itself is not inherently frightening. While life may be uncertain and insecure—while we cannot find any fixed outer security because everything changes—this doesn't mean we must approach existence with fear. Even amid uncertainty, we need not bring a fearful mind to our experience.

There's no reason to be afraid of something we don't know. How can we be afraid of the unknown? We have to begin to see the influence of our own mind in creating fear for ourselves. We need to begin to take responsibility for it.

What happens in this breeding of fear is that we are looking for security in our lives. We want our lives to be safe and secure. So in order to make that happen, we think about the worst things that could happen to us. We want to make the future really safe, so we dwell on all the things that could go wrong. And then, of course, we try to figure out strategies for working with each of them. These strategies sometimes work, but sometimes don't.

There's a little story that illustrates the effect of strategies. In the jungle, a camel was going for her morning walk, approaching the edge of this jungle. Inside the jungle was a tiger. The tiger saw the camel coming and heard her chomping. The tiger thought, "Ah, this she-camel is going to walk into this jungle. When she gets close to me, I will spring out at her and catch her, and she will be my breakfast." So the tiger's waiting there, strategy figured out for the morning, waiting to pounce on the camel.

But up above in a tree is a monkey, and the monkey sees the camel walking and sees the tiger moving into position. He thinks, "Ah, the camel is going to walk into the jungle, and then the tiger is going to jump out and eat her. But I have this coconut, which I will drop on the head of the tiger when it starts to jump, and it won't be able to get the camel." So the monkey's waiting there with his coconut, ready to drop it on the tiger's head.

But there's a little squirrel on a branch a few feet away from the monkey, who sees the camel coming into the forest. The tiger is getting ready to jump on her, but that monkey is holding the coconut to drop on the tiger so that it won't be able to get the camel. The squirrel thinks, "Just before the monkey is going to drop the coconut, I'm going to bite the monkey so that he can't drop the coconut."

The camel, meanwhile, is still walking slowly towards the jungle. There's a bird, a very large bird, flying over the jungle at this point. He sees the camel coming, sees the tiger's ploy, sees the monkey with the coconut, and sees the squirrel about to bite. And he thinks, "Ah, the camel's going to walk in. Just before the squirrel goes to bite the monkey, I will swoop down and pick up the squirrel and fly off with it so it can't bite the monkey. The monkey will drop the coconut on the tiger's head, the tiger can't get the camel, and the camel will have her walk through the forest."

Meanwhile, the camel's still walking slowly toward the start of the jungle path. She gets just to the opening of the jungle, and she thinks, "I think I've had enough of a walk today." And she turns around and walks back the other way. So much for strategy.

We think of all these complications that can arise in our life, and often they get that complicated, don't they? We think of all the things that could happen and go wrong, and we make plans for each of them, and we think we've got the future worked out. But what we ignore is what we're doing in the present. The future may be a little more secure, but what about right now? The present is becoming filled with fear. We're filling it up with anxiety.

When can we ever stop doing that? When can we get to the secure future? When can we stop worrying about the future? Can we ever? Or is there always something else that can go wrong? Don't we always need to keep planning ahead if we're going to live in this way? This particular strategy becomes self-defeating. We need to see how we create this fear for ourselves. In seeing this generation, then we can start to do something about it. When these thoughts come along, we can see where they lead and say, "No, no thanks, I won't go into that right now."

The second understanding that needs to come in working with fear is that truly the root of fear in the mind is attachment, holding, clinging. We hold, we depend on many different objects in our lives. We hold on to people. We hold on to possessions. We hold on to money. We cling to views and opinions. We hold on to a self-image.

Wherever there's holding for security, there's going to be fear. There's inevitably fear because we always know that we can lose that thing. We pick something up in the beginning because we're frightened, and holding onto that thing makes us feel safe—whether it's a relationship or an object, a view or whatever. But as long as we're holding it in order to feel safe, there's always a fear of loss. There has to be.

So holding for security doesn't eliminate fear. It makes sure that the fear goes on and on and on. It perpetuates fear. Clinging is no way out of fear. Finding security in anything outside ourselves only makes the fear go on.

When there's attachment in the mind, it creates the possibility of shakiness, mental shakiness. The Buddha often referred to this in discussions during his lifetime. Northern India at the time of the Buddha was rich with a diverse range of spiritual views. It was rich with spiritual characters, some real eccentrics. Christina mentioned last night that Jain who was standing on his leg, hoping to work through all his karma in that way.

Another approach to working with karma was carried on by other sects in northern India. People were afraid that even though they had a human life this time, the next time—they believed in reincarnation—they were worried that they might be born as an animal. This is one of the teachings of reincarnation. The idea being that if their karma, if their actions in this life weren't so pure, they would have to be born in a lower level and then suffer the consequences of that unwholesome karma.

So some people thought they would get around this by living out their dog karma in this life. There were actually people who went around behaving like dogs for the course of their lifetime, hoping they could get it out of their system and then be free of that particular karma.

The Buddha often had discussions with these people who came to question him about his views. He would often say afterwards, "I saw in that person's mind, as he discussed his view, there was wavering. Because of that wavering in his mind, I could tell there was attachment." But he said, "You, oh monk, I watched you in that discussion. I could see there was no wavering in your mind. There was no attachment to the view that you were talking about."

So wherever we find in our life this quality of wavering, of hesitancy, of uncertainty, doubt, fear, anxiety, we know that someplace there's holding, there's attachment. We really can't become free of fear until we become free of these various forms of holding. In the long run, that's the key to getting free of fear.

This whole issue of attachment and the creation of thought through fear is brought out in a discussion that Krishnamurti had with someone who was dying. This fellow was dying, he knew he was dying, and he was very concerned about what was going to happen to him after his death. He was convinced that Krishnamurti had the answer—absolutely certain that Krishnamurti knew, but just wasn't telling him.

The man's question was: "Do I continue after death, or is there nothing left when the body dies?"

Krishnamurti said, "What is this 'me' that your mind clings to and that you want to be continued? The 'me' exists only through identification with property, with a name, with a family, with failures and successes, with all the things you have been and want to be. You are that with which you have identified yourself. You are made up of all that. And without it, you are not. It is this identification with people, property, and ideas that you want to be continued even beyond death. And is it a living thing? Or is it just a mass of contradictory desires, pursuits, fulfillments, and frustrations with sorrow outweighing joy?"

Clinging is the root of the fear.

But in the meantime, while we find we have these attachments, while we find there is holding in the mind and the fear is arising, how to work with it in a more practical day-to-day way in our meditation practice? What to do with fear when it comes up?

The really important thing in working with fear in meditation is to come to know it, first of all, and secondly, to accept it. When fear comes up, we really have to investigate: what is fear? I wonder if you've ever really looked into this question. Have you ever hung out with fear long enough to find out what it really is? Or every time fear comes, do you seek to find something else to take its place, to distract yourself from the experience?

Through meditation we have this wonderful opportunity of getting directly in touch with fear. You may think that you've come to a meditation retreat to be calm and clear and peaceful, and the last thing you want is to be sitting on your cushion and be full of fear.

But actually you're very lucky if that arises for you. You're very lucky. Because it's only when an emotion comes up in the present moment that we have any chance to work with it, to understand it. We can't really understand emotions at a distance. We can't sit here with our books and papers and figure out how we're going to be free of fear. We have to work with the living reality.

And the zafu is a very good place to do it. Because basically, when fear comes up in a sitting, nothing's really going to happen to you. You're going to get up at the end of that sitting and walk out of the room. You're not going to be any poorer or worse off or in any danger. It's a pretty safe place, right? So it's a very good place to start coming to terms with fear, to start to experience it.

So fear arises and we look in and we want to find out: what is it? What is fear? It really has two components. It's an expression in the body, a certain manifestation in the body, and it has another expression in the mind. So we need to come to terms with, to come to understand both those expressions.

In the body, often we first feel fear in the pit of the stomach. There's a sort of very shaky, fluttery feeling in the stomach. The whole body may begin to feel light and kind of trembly throughout. There may be an increase in the heartbeat. Heart starts going faster. The breath may become jerky. There may be perspiration under the arms. All these are the various physical sensations that tell us fear is coming up, that we're experiencing fear.

Now, are any of these sensations intolerable? Are there any of them that we can't handle? Can you handle a fluttery stomach? Yeah, no big deal. Can you handle your heart going a little faster? That's okay. It's happening. Can you handle some sweat under your arms? Yeah. No one's too close to you. So on the physical level, there's really nothing that difficult about fear. We just have to get comfortable with these physical sensations.

On the mental level, again, there's an emotional tone in the mind. There's this sort of fleeing quality. It comes up and we kind of want to run the other way. It's a kind of restlessness, a kind of moving away. But we can get to know that too, just as you probably found in the early days—you can sit through restlessness. You can take it. You can experience it. And it's okay.

We can bring the same kind of willingness to fear if we're just willing to be there for it and experience it. And eventually, we find that we can accept it. We find that it's really okay for that fear to be there. And then we have a whole new relationship to it. We can accommodate the fear. We can have it be present and we don't have to react to it.

Because normally, what's the first thing that we do when we experience fear? What's the first emotion that we feel at the arising of fear? Isn't it generally more fear? We're afraid of fear itself. So when fear arises, we don't want to experience it, we're more afraid. And this leads to a chain reaction.

Then we're in a greater state of fear and it starts escalating into panic. Then we're really overwhelmed.

R.D. Laing, who was a Scottish psychoanalyst, had a book called "Knots"—a little short book that he wrote in the early seventies, which illustrated the various kinds of binds that we get into through the complication of our thinking, the way we tie ourselves into knots. About fear he had this to say: that we are afraid of the fear that is afraid of the fear that is afraid of the fear that is afraid. One may perhaps speak of infinite regression.

Once we're not afraid of fear, then when it arises, we don't generate any more fear in relation to it. We can have the fear be there, and yet there's an underlying sense that it's okay. So there's an underlying trust and faith with the fear. And when that gets strong, when that accommodating power gets strong, then the fear can be present and it doesn't really disturb our actions.

You know, if you're feeling afraid and you have to act, you have to relate, you have to do something in the world, often the actions that come out of fear are not very skillful. The fear generates a kind of panic quality and often the confusion comes through in the action. But as our ability grows to accommodate fear, we can have fear in the mind and still act with some clarity, still act with some wisdom.

Now, in working with fear in this way, it has to be a real acceptance. It means you really have to open your heart to the fear. You really have to be willing for it to be there. And it can't be a sort of halfway acceptance, which is really a kind of subtle resistance where you sort of catch a glimpse of fear out of the corner of your eye and go, "Right, fear, that's okay. Fear. Yeah, fear." You can't handle it that way. You really have to be open. Openness to it.

And that openness is really what starts cutting through the power that fear has over us. When we're no longer afraid of fear, when it really doesn't matter to us if it's present or if it's absent, its whole strength, its hold over us starts to go. It's exercised its magic over us. We've been enchanted by it for years and years and years because we couldn't handle it. When we find that we can accept it, it starts to lose its power.

And as it loses its power, the whole force of its conditioning starts to fall away. And we go into situations where we generally have felt fear, and we suddenly ask ourselves, "Why do I need to feel fear in this situation? There's no reason for it. It doesn't do any good. Why is it here?" And it starts to fall away, in situation after situation.

When this happens, it opens up real new possibilities in our lives. As it is, most of us are willing to live to some degree within the barriers that fear creates for us. We may think about doing something. We may hear about something that interests us. It might be meeting some new person, taking a class, or coming to a meditation retreat. And we think, "That would really be good for me to do. That would be very worthwhile. I can see the growth in it. I can see the value for myself. But it's scary." You know, I think about it. It's scary. I better not go too close to that one.

And often we make a decision, not even consciously, but we just sort of move our minds away from that area. We stop really considering it. Because it's scary. And then we block ourselves from that growth, from the potential in that experience—meeting the person or going through the experience, whatever it might be.

When we become willing to experience the fear, then we're willing to go beyond that barrier. We don't let the fear put us off. We say, "Right, I can see the value in that. I can see that if I do it, I'm going to be afraid, but I've been afraid lots of times before. I've experienced it many, many times, and I know that's okay. So I'm willing to go through that barrier of fear and work with that experience and find that value."

And then we find, as we work in this way, that our life starts to open up.

Our life feels more expansive, and we're able to take on more challenge. We grow in this way, taking in more of life. As we expand our field of living, our frontiers naturally expand as well. We come up against another barrier—something we've never even considered doing before becomes a possibility for us. Once again, the fear arises. But we have developed more and more faith to just go through that fear, not to let fear deter us from the experience.

If we continue to live in this way, continuing to work with these seeming barriers, life becomes a series of increasing challenges and increasing growth—with no end to the growth in that way. Whereas if we simply give in to the fear and let it put us off, we reinforce our belief in it. We give it more strength in that way. So it's very important, both in meditation and in living, to confront these fears and come to terms with them.

The finest tradition of this is found in Buddhist meditation practice. There was a teacher in northeast Thailand in the early part of the century named Ajahn Mun. He came from the Thai forest monastic tradition—the community of monks and nuns living in the forest, practicing in the forest. In the early part of this century, life for forest monks and nuns was quite tough. It wasn't in any way easy. The villagers were not rich, there wasn't a lot of food to go around, and medical treatment was scarce. So it was a tough life.

But Ajahn Mun was completely devoted to it. He loved the forest style of practice. Here's what he would do: Monks are pretty portable beings. All they really need to get by is their begging bowl so they can collect food in the morning, and in Thailand, this instrument called a glot. A glot is like a big umbrella—a big round umbrella with a hook on the end. If you're living in the forest, you stick this big umbrella over the limb of a tree and hang your mosquito net from it. It becomes your portable hotel room. At night when it's time to sleep, you crawl under your mosquito net draped over your glot, and you have a place to sleep.

In the morning, you take your begging bowl and walk to the nearby village. You go through the village and people put rice and curry in your bowl. You return to your forest, eat your single meal, and then the rest of the day is free for meditation. You sit and walk and sit and walk in the forest.

This is what Ajahn Mun did for many years—it was his preferred way of life. As he became well known in northeast Thailand, he gathered a number of followers and disciples, one of whom was Ajahn Chah. Ajahn Chah was the teacher of Ajahn Sumedho, who is the abbot of the Amaravati and Chithurst monasteries in this country. There's another teacher called Ajahn Maha Bua who is still teaching in northeast Thailand in this tradition.

Ajahn Mun was apparently a very inspiring guide, but he was also a tough monk—one tough-willed fellow. For instance, if his monks had malaria, they were still required to sit in meditation. If you know malaria, it's a very unpleasant disease—you're wracked with fever and chills, extremely gruesome. The monks would just have to keep sitting in meditation through that. He felt this built character.

Another of his teaching methods was to encourage all of his monks to go and live in the forest, to take their bowl and their glot and just settle into practicing in the forest. At this time in northeast Thailand, there were still quite a lot of tigers in the forest there.

So these young monks, they might be 20 years old, 25 years old, would go out into the forest to practice, and not far away they'd hear the gigantic roar of a tiger in the middle of the night. That brings fear. Real fear. So they'd be shaking, knowing that at any time this tiger could simply take a few steps over and eat them. Literally. Now that's real fear. You think you have troubles? That's real fear.

But Ajahn Chah basically forced them to stick it out and confront their fear directly. He said, if you can go through your fear in that situation—your fear of death, of really being eaten alive—then you have truly dealt with fear in your practice. So the teaching was not to avoid it.

But sometimes, to tell the truth, there are things we do need to avoid. Sometimes there are aspects of life that are too intense or too dangerous. For instance, there are parts of New York City I would not want to walk through at midnight. So you have to use some common sense. I might be right to feel uneasy in certain parts of the city at that hour.

Also, on an emotional level, I think you have to know your limits. In the mid-70s, I was living in California, and the concept of the open marriage was very much in vogue—the open relationship. There's no possession, there's no attachment, there's no such thing as jealousy. It's just a figment of your imagination. So basically, the way it operated in the group of people I was around at that time was that there was no idea of being committed to any particular sexual partner. One basically slept with whoever one felt like sleeping with on any particular day or night.

As I look back, I see this was not very skillful. We had good intentions. We wanted to become free of our jealousy, free of possessiveness, but we didn't have much wisdom. And instead of freeing us from jealousy and attachment, what I see is that it made those patterns more intense, because we weren't actually able to work with them effectively. It resulted in quite a lot of suffering for most of us in that group.

So instead of getting free of the conditioning by confronting the fear, it reinforced it because it simply wasn't a workable situation. You have to know your own limits. You need to bring wisdom into this area too.

There are a few practical ways to work with fear when it comes up in meditation. I'll suggest a couple of practical approaches right now.

One way is to decondition the energy. In this approach, it's best to pick a quiet place like your room at home, someplace you feel quite safe. When fear comes up, work with relaxation. This works best if there are certain experiences or events that can trigger the fear easily for you.

What you do is lie down and begin to work with deep breathing to bring a sense of relaxation throughout the body. Deep in-breath, deep out-breath. Just relaxing. Then when you feel quite relaxed and comfortable, bring to mind the images of things that bring fear for you. It might be flying on an airplane. It might be meeting someone new. It might be performing as an artist or something like that.

When that situation comes up in your mind, it will bring fear along with it. That's the conditioning. Even when you think of it, even though it's not actually real, the fear will arise. The thing to do then is to keep working with the breathing and the relaxation to decondition that response. So even while holding the image, keep relaxing, breathing, relaxing, breathing.

Soon you can have the image in your mind without a reaction to it. The image can be there and there's still the sense of relaxation. The next time you think about actually doing that thing, there won't be as strong a reaction of fear. In this way, you're taking some of the charge off the pattern itself.

Another approach that I found useful came out of my experience with a kind of therapy called co-counseling, which I know is starting to be popular in England now as well.

I don't know if it's spread to other parts of Europe.

In co-counseling you take a series of classes with a group of other people where you learn the techniques of this type of counseling. Then you get together once a week with someone from the class and you take turns. First one of you is the client and they work on their areas of difficulty while you're the counselor, providing support and suggestions. Then you switch roles - they become the counselor, you become the client.

Co-counseling emphasizes, in working with difficult emotions, this idea of discharge. We become free from emotion by discharging physically the feeling - sort of letting it out, expressing it. They say, for instance, if you're embarrassed, the way to discharge it is through laughing. If you're sad, the way to discharge it is through crying. And if you're afraid, they say, the way to discharge it is to shake it.

This makes sense, really. When fear comes up, we feel this kind of shaky energy throughout the body. What they suggest is to go with that - really let yourself get into that shakiness and just let it take you over. Just shake with it.

At this time I was working in California for Hewlett Packard, an electronics company. We had just brought out this really interesting new product - sort of the first handheld computer, quite a revolutionary product. What twenty years ago filled a whole room with vacuum tubes, we had brought down to something that could be held in the palm of your hand.

There was a lot of interest in the technology and I was asked to give a talk at a local college about it with some students. At that time I was not at all comfortable with public speaking. The idea of standing up in front of thirty-five people and giving a talk for forty-five minutes filled me with fear, with nervousness. I said I would do it because I felt I should, but I really was not looking forward to it.

I had about a forty-five-minute drive up the freeway to reach the college from where I worked. As I was driving along, I started to feel nervous. "Oh, God, I've got to stand up in front of all those people and talk." I started to feel that shakiness, that lightness coming into my body.

Well, what does co-counseling say about this? They say to just get right into it. Okay. So I just really did. I was driving up the freeway and I just started to shake. I was driving along at seventy miles an hour and just shaking like mad for the whole forty-five minutes. I don't know what people thought who passed me.

I started to appreciate the humor of the situation while I was in it. So I'd shake for a while and I'd laugh for a while. The talk actually went very well. But also in going over the experience enough times and just going through the emotion, it just released. It released that mental dread about it.

So I do recommend shaking, actually. If you're really feeling fearful, just shake. Whether it's here or outside on the grounds or whatever. If you want to do it in town, I'd be a bit more cautious. We might get known as some strange religious cult known as the Shakers or something. But it does help. It does help.

The last way of working I'm always a little bit reluctant to talk about because it's so different from the rest of Vipassana practice. It's an approach that I call getting tough with fear. I think actually that there is a spiritual precedent for it. Somewhere in the Chinese tradition of Buddhism, I've heard of this philosophy called the guest and the host. Basically it comes down to the question of, as you're living your life with this body and this mind, whose home is it really? Who's the host here? Who really lives here?

If there are some guests that aren't particularly welcome, who come in when they haven't been invited, and they hang around longer than they're welcome for, and they're a great inconvenience to the host, there's only one thing, finally, to do with such guests - and that is very firmly show them the door.

And you have to, before you can do that, you have to really realize whose house this is? Whose living room? And not being willing to be victimized any longer by these mindsets. Just not being willing to take it.

I came upon this quite spontaneously, actually, in my own practice during one of the month-long retreats I mentioned. I was sitting here in England about seven years ago. I'd been practicing for a couple of years at that time. In the course of this month-long retreat, some deep place of fear in me just got triggered. Something triggered off a lot of fear, and for several days during that retreat, I was just full of fear. No matter what I did or where I went, the fear just kept arising. It was quite unpleasant.

I thought about all the things that people had told me to do with it—you know, just watch it, just accept it, just experience it—and it just kept going on and on. After this had gone on for about two and a half days, I was doing standing meditation, and I realized I was really getting sick of it. I was getting absolutely fed up with it. I remember saying to myself, right at that time, I said, "Fuck it. I'd rather die than live like this." And I meant it. I was really angry at that time. I meant it.

That resolve broke the back of the fear. It just broke its back. I could literally feel it draining out of my body into the ground. The fear just sort of drained out of me. I didn't know at all that that was possible. I didn't know I had that kind of strength. But it was sort of like the fear had pushed me to a limit—to a limit of what I was willing to take. And at that limit, some deeper strength came up that could just deal with that fear totally.

So I hope you never reach that limit with fear in your own practice. But if you do, realize that we all have within us depths of strength and resolve and firmness that we don't usually touch, we don't usually tap into. Since that time, fear has come up a number of other times in my practice and in my life, but it's never had the hold on me again that that did. In that real strong resolve, in that firm resolve, something changed in my relationship with fear. Something changed between me and it. And it has never returned with that kind of strength again.

Now, the reason I say I hesitate to recommend it is because it's in sort of the entire opposite direction from Vipassana. You know what this is about. This is about gentleness, receptivity, acceptance, passivity, just observing, not interfering. This is a completely different approach where you just realize, you take the situation in hand and you exert your will. You exert your will.

But I think if we look into it, there actually are spiritual traditions that talk about this kind of approach. If you've read the books by Carlos Castaneda, where he describes his teachings from Don Juan, the Mexican Indian shaman and man of knowledge, they're often speaking about the way of the warrior. Over and over again, Don Juan will put Carlos in the situations that just call up the most incredible fears for him. You know, he'll tell him how much the ally, this strange sort of demonic being, wants to get to grips with him and wrestle him, and then he'll send him out into the desert at night alone, saying, "The ally's waiting for you out there." That brought up Carlos' fears. At the end of one book, he made him jump off a cliff. So finding, through being pushed to these limits, that warrior-like quality.

Another spiritual tradition that has it is the tradition of Rinzai Zen. Now Soto Zen, which is the school of Suzuki Roshi, which I read from today, is very much like Vipassana. Soto Zen and Vipassana are very close. But Rinzai Zen, on the other hand, is more the warrior Zen in Japan. And it has this fierceness. I did a retreat with a Rinzai Zen master a number of years ago named Kusaki Roshi.

And I must say he's one of the most impressive individuals I've ever met in my life. He still teaches, mostly in California, and he's a very impressive man. He embodies everything a Zen master is supposed to be—he's funny, he's wise, he's unflappable, and he can be extremely ruthless.

When you come in for an interview with one of us Vipassana teachers, we're just all sort of gooey sentimentality—warmth and compassion and all that easygoing stuff. But you go in for an interview with Sasaki, and he doesn't hesitate to put you in your place. Some of his comments are things like, "Hmm, stupid answers," or "Too much thinking, go away." He often says about coming for interviews in his tradition: "When you come for sanzen"—which is what they call the interview situation—"come prepared to kill or be killed."

So when you feel your practice is at that stage, go see Sasaki Roshi. He's an excellent teacher.

I want to close with one story that illustrates the other end of the spectrum entirely. We've talked quite a lot about fear, but in spiritual tradition there's always the awareness of the possibility of the other extreme altogether—this state of real fearlessness, of total fearlessness, having overcome all forms of fear and trembling. And again, a story from the Zen tradition.

In medieval Japan, there was in many ways a state of real lawlessness. Individual warlords with their bands of samurai would control neighboring territories, and often one would invade another, try to conquer it, then that warlord would regroup and try to take that territory back. So there was a lot of invading and fighting all over medieval Japan.

This one warlord had come into a certain area with his samurai, and nearby villagers heard they were coming. They knew that if these samurai came, they would all be put to death, because they were loyal to another warlord and his samurai. So they knew they would be put to death, and they all fled.

Just outside the village there was a Zen monastery. The monks also heard that the warlord was coming, and they too fled so that they wouldn't be put to death. Everyone left except the Zen master. He just stayed in the monastery and went about his daily routine. He took his morning meal, had a sitting, cleaned up his bowls—just living his life.

The warlord came into the village and heard that everyone had left except this one Zen monk. He was furious. He said, "Who is this person who would not run away from me? Who does he think he is anyway? I'm going to go out and see him."

So he went straight away to the monastery with several of his samurai and found the Zen master sitting on his zafu, just calmly practicing his meditation. The samurai warlord draws his sword, charges into the zendo and says, "You! Don't you know who I am? Don't you know that I am one who could run you through with this sword without blinking an eye?"

And the Zen master says, "Is that so? And do you know that I am one who can be run through with a sword without blinking an eye?"

At that, the samurai warlord placed his sword in front of the Zen master, bowed to him, and asked to become his student.

The power of fearlessness.

May all beings see into clinging. May all beings understand fear. May all beings live with fear.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 4

The Nature Of Awareness

Guy Armstrong · 56 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong investigates the nature of awareness from the perspective of the Thai Forest tradition. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching on the totality of life - the six sense doors and their objects - he examines how consciousness arises and passes with each object while pointing to something deeper: the deathless awareness that illuminates all experience.
>
> Armstrong distinguishes between vijñāna (consciousness) which is impermanent, sati (mindfulness) which has intelligence, and awareness as spontaneous knowing. He shares teachings from Thai Forest masters like Ajahn Chah, Ajahn Mahāboowa, and Ajahn Jumnian who point to pure awareness as our true nature - beyond the three characteristics of impermanence, suffering, and not-self.
>
> Using vivid analogies including sunlight pervading space and mirrors reflecting without attachment, Armstrong shows how this unbounded space of knowing accommodates all arising phenomena while remaining untouched. He guides practitioners to shift identity from temporary formations to this deathless dimension, finding refuge in non-grasping awareness. The talk emphasizes that this freedom is available now through letting go, not after lifetimes of practice. When we rest in this spacious cognizance, all wholesome qualities naturally unfold - compassion, wisdom, loving-kindness - appropriate to each situation.

The talk tonight is on the nature of awareness.

One of the things I appreciate about the retreat situation is how simple it is. When things are so simple like this, it brings us back in touch with the basics of our human life. I really would like to look tonight at some of the basic conditions of our existence as human beings. What is our situation? And as always in the Buddhist teachings, we want to look at it with an eye to finding where there is freedom within it.

As a way of framing this, I think a poem from Rumi is quite helpful. He said, "Where did I come from and what am I supposed to be doing here? I have no idea."

I sometimes feel like that on retreats. No idea what I'm supposed to be doing. You know, you can say, oh, I'm a yogi, I'm practicing Vipassana meditation and this technique and that technique—but it's just another role. Really, what are we here for?

One small caveat about this talk. You may know that when the Buddha was enlightened, he sat near the Bodhi tree for 49 days, enjoying what was said to be the bliss of deliverance. He thought of not teaching. Finally, a being came down from the heavenly realms and implored him to teach out of compassion for all beings, so he did. But he thought to himself, when he considered not teaching, "This Dhamma that I have discovered is profound, subtle, and hard to understand. If I were to teach it and no one understood, that would be a vexation for me."

So I can't claim that the talk tonight will be either profound or subtle, but it may be hard to understand. If that's the case, don't worry about it too much. Let it come in one ear and out the other, and not get stuck in the middle where things tend to whir around.

I'm going to talk about one particular view of freedom. This is the view from within the Thai forest tradition of Buddhist practice. Not all schools may agree with this, but it's one view. Please don't take it out and get in deep arguments with your Burmese friends over it. It's just one view.

So let's take a look. What does it mean to say that we're a conscious being, that we're a sentient being? What is it like to be conscious? I think to understand that, we might ask ourselves, well, what is it like when we're unconscious? When we're in deep sleep, or if we fainted, then the experience is there are no arisings. Nothing is happening. There's no sense stimulation taking place.

So by contrast, being a conscious being means that we are experiencing things that arise at our six senses—the five physical senses and the sense door of the mind. We take a look at our conscious experience through the retreat, and we see that we're aware of the breath, of body sensations, of sounds, of tastes, of thoughts and emotions, sights, smells, and so forth. This is, I think, what it means to be a conscious being: that we have experience of things arising at the senses.

The Buddha gave one discourse to the monks in his time. It's called the Discourse on Totality. I'd like to read a section of it:

"Monks, I will teach you the totality of life." Isn't that brave? Someone is going to teach the totality of life. No Western philosopher ever dared make a statement like that. But the Buddha said, "I will teach you the totality of life. Listen, attend carefully, and I will speak. What is the totality of life? It is just the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and objects of touch, the mind and mental phenomena. This is called the totality of life."

It's simple, isn't it? There are just 12 things on that list. But take a look in your experience. Is there anything that's outside that list? Sights and sounds and smell and taste and touch, mental phenomena—basically thoughts and emotions. Is there anything missing?

We like this list because it fits really well, mapping beautifully onto our meditation. As the instructions have unfolded over the days together, you've seen that we've basically brought mindfulness into almost every one of these areas. And so we relate directly with the sights, sounds, smells, tastes, touch, thoughts, and emotions in our experience. In this, we're really examining the whole of life. Through these simple objects, we cover the totality of life.

But there's one other piece that I want to put into the list, one that I really want to draw out, and that is this function of consciousness itself. When we talk about being conscious beings, there's a sense in there that we are conscious of all these things arising. So in the Buddha's list, consciousness is one of the mental phenomena. It's not excluded. They didn't draw it out specifically. It is a mental phenomenon. And of course what we're conscious of are all these different arisings at the sense doors.

So let's take a specific example. When you are mindful of a breath, you're paying attention to an in-breath, you're conscious of it, aren't you? There's the physical sensation of the in-breath, and you're conscious of that. If you were a corpse, the same physical movements might be happening, but the consciousness wouldn't be there. When you think about it, when we breathe, the lungs expand, the diaphragm presses down, the abdomen swells outward. You could make that same movement happen on a corpse. You could stand beside it. You could press down on the lungs. This is what happens in CPR. The diaphragm would move down. The belly would rise. But that being wouldn't experience any conscious knowledge of that breath, because you are conscious. You are conscious of that breath in a different way than a corpse is.

So we say there is consciousness with each of these objects—the breath, the body sensations, the sounds, the emotions, the thoughts, the sights, tastes, and smells. So we put that in the equation. Our ongoing experience of life is consciousness with all the arisings, all the sense doors and consciousness of all of them.

So, I want to ask a question. Are these phenomena permanent or impermanent? Sight, sound, smells, taste, touch, thoughts, emotions. Permanent or impermanent?

They're impermanent. Good. I was wondering if you'd been listening.

Now, what about this consciousness piece? The word in Pali for consciousness is viññāṇa. It's the fifth of the five aggregates. The Buddha said that consciousness is also impermanent. The understanding is that when you hear a sound, as the sound arises, you're conscious of it. When the sound passes away, the consciousness of that sound also passes away. So the understanding is with this term viññāṇa, that we translate as consciousness, it arises to meet the object, and when the object passes, the consciousness also passes away.

So in the classical teachings of the Buddha, consciousness is arising and passing with each sense object. As the object arises and passes, the knowing of it also arises and passes.

So we look back at our basic situation. All the objects are coming and going, and the consciousness of them is also coming and going. Everything's changing. Where is there any security in that? Where is there any refuge? Where is there any freedom?

The Buddha said it was really important to find a refuge in life, a refuge through practice, a true security in what he called nibbāna. These are some synonyms for nibbāna from the suttas: the unconditioned, the other shore, the everlasting, peace, the deathless, safety, freedom, the refuge, the beyond.

So with this total human experience of impermanence, where is there any refuge? Where can we look to find it?

I want to tell a little story. A couple of years ago, I was visiting in Yosemite Valley.

My wife's sisters had come over from Australia, and it's a great place to show foreign visitors because there's nothing like it anywhere else in the world. You see a lot of great wildlife—deer and coyotes. You hope to see a bear. We didn't see a bear, but every morning we'd go out to our car in the parking lot, and there would be signs of bears because a few car windows would get punched in every night where the bears were looking for food. Fortunately, our car windows were not punched in, but they crawled over the top of our car, and the paw prints were there in the morning.

In addition to the wildlife, there's very interesting human wildlife, too. The buses pull up, and the tourists all unload—Bermuda shorts, video camera, standard outfit. The backpackers coming out of the backcountry haven't shaved, haven't bathed for about a week. Fortunately, they have their own campground. And then there are the climbers, with some of the best rock climbing in the whole world in Yosemite Valley, including a 3,000-foot vertical face called El Capitan. There's always a bunch of climbers with their base camp down in the valley. That's a fun culture to watch, because it's kind of a cross between the U.S. Marines and the Grateful Dead. There's nothing else like climbers.

So a lot of stuff going on in the valley, but this one was new to me. We were at the parking lot of Yosemite Falls, looking up to the falls, and there was a group of about a dozen young people, young adults in their twenties. They were in a circle, and it looked like there was a leader. I soon figured out this was like a sensitivity training exercise or a team-building exercise. One person from the group would go into the middle of the circle, and at some suggestion from the leader, the person in the center would sort of throw up their hands and fall backwards. Then they would be caught by people on the outer edge of the circle. They would be there to hold them so that they wouldn't hit the ground. This is a standard practice in team building—you learn to trust the members of your team. At least every time I saw it, somebody caught them.

But it reminded me of our meditation practice. Not just because we end up falling down a lot, which we do, but because, interestingly enough, something catches us when we fall down. So I'd like to look tonight at what it means to fall down, or you might say let go, in our practice. And then also, what is it that catches us?

I was reflecting on all the things that you all have let go of this week. There's been a lot of letting go. In some ways, this is very close to the heart of the practice. We let go of old memories. We let go of plans. We come upon body pain, and we want to take hold of it and really work it out. But we learn to let go, or another phrase, let be. We take our hands off and we let it do its own thing. Same thing in coming into relation with difficult emotions. We run into fear, anger, wanting, loneliness. We don't get in and try to work it or manipulate it. We let be. We back off. In a way, we take our hands off the control.

A lot of what's happening in letting go of our thoughts is taking our hands off the control. Thoughts are used to think about the future and fix it to make it safe. Thoughts are used to bring up the past and edit it or rework it to make it less painful. When we let go of all that activity of thought, relation to pain, relation to emotion, it's a leap, isn't it? We're letting go of the ways we usually control the world. And when we do that, we open up in a way.

I'd like to invite you to try right now this process of opening up. You don't have to go into meditation, but just as you sit with your eyes open, just lightly go through your experience. First of all, let go of any holding in your body. If there's any sense that you're holding on somewhere in your body or holding on to something in your body, let that go. The body's just relaxed and it's not gripped in any way. Let go of anything you're thinking about. Let go of any mind state that might be problematic or you might be holding on to. Let go of your breath. You're still fully present. What's it like when you go through that letting go?

For me, I always feel a certain vulnerability when I just come into the moment. I think I don't have any protection—there's no more shielding between me and this moment, no covering anymore. There's just this bare openness to whatever's arising in the moment.

I can't control what arises. In fact, in any moment, anything could happen. Anything could happen in the next moment to any of us. And so coming into the moment, we're exposed to that uncertainty. We're wide open. We're really vulnerable.

Being willing to do that, as you've done over and over and over again this week, is a huge act of trust. Where did you find the courage to let go of all the protections and just come into this experience of life, unguarded, undefended, just open?

There's some faith, isn't there, in each of us that lets us do that—that says, when I let go completely, it's going to be okay. That the moment is basically a trustworthy experience. If we can trust in that letting go, then there's some peace in the moment.

Ajahn Chah put it this way: if you let go a little, there's a little peace. If you let go a lot, there's a lot of peace. And if you let go completely, there's complete peace.

The Buddha said something similar. He said, "The stilling of all formations, the letting go of all attachments—that is nibbana. That is the unconditioned, the deathless." So this sense of stillness, of letting go, of peacefulness—we're coming close to nibbana when we do that.

So let's look back again at our basic situation. We have this openness, and we contact again that truth that life is nothing but these arisings at all the sense doors. It was like this in the past. It's like this now. It's going to be like that forever into the future. Could it ever be any different? When you awaken, is it going to be any different? If you were a Buddha, would it be any different? There are still going to be things coming and going at all the sense doors. That never changes.

So it's kind of like no matter where we are along the path—a beginner or fully enlightened—it's like things are just popping up on a movie screen. You're sitting in front of a screen and the projector is showing you all the elements of your life from birth onward. So there's mother, there's body, there's father, there's grade school. There's graduation. There's career. There's income tax returns. There's mindfulness of breathing. There's the whole Buddhist path. There's Britney Spears. All the elements of life are just popping up in front of us.

Some things are really beautiful and attractive. Mother was very attractive in the beginning of our life, essential. So when things are beautiful and attractive, we tend to reach out and hold on so they don't pass away. And some things are frightening. Maybe the first day of grade school, certainly income tax returns. So we take hold of those things, we grasp them, and we push them away so we don't have to experience the pain of them.

If we hold on to what's attractive and beautiful, because it's impermanent, it's going to pass, but we're left holding on, so there's suffering. If we take hold of something that's frightening, we're suffering already from the fear of it. We've grasped it, it's scary, and we're suffering. So either way, if we get involved in grasping the beautiful or the unbeautiful, we get involved with suffering.

Existence is always a mix of the beautiful and the unattractive. And if we develop that habit of clinging, we will always be involved in suffering.

The second point is that as we make a habit of this kind of relationship to objects, we distort the mind. It almost feels like the very awareness gets bent toward objects because we're so used to clinging to them. It's almost as though it makes a crease in the mind—the mind gets bent over with time out of this habit. That crease sort of perpetuates the leaning forward into experience and perpetuates the grasping. It becomes ingrained.

What happens when we come into meditation is that we start to undo that crease in the mind. We start to restore a proper relationship to arising phenomena through the practice of not grasping at them anymore. This develops because we activate mindfulness. Mindfulness can see the object clearly, and then the wisdom part also learns to see the grasping. We start to learn that if we grasp at anything, we get involved with suffering.

Through the clear seeing of meditation, we start not to cling. The mind starts to find its natural balance and straightens out that fold, that habit of leaning into experience. As we restore this natural state of mind through non-grasping, we come back to awareness's fullness in itself, its self-sufficiency. We get more and more confidence that we can let go, that we don't need to lean into objects for security.

When I look at great spiritual beings, I get the sense that they've released a long way into this kind of awareness. Somebody like the Dalai Lama really strikes me like this. He was honored a few years ago at a gathering in Virginia for Nobel Peace Prize laureates. It was all heavyweights—His Holiness the Dalai Lama, Bishop Desmond Tutu from South Africa, Rigoberta Menchú who had done great peace work in Central America, and a few other living laureates. A very dignified and august assembly.

At some point in the conference, they were taken outside to have their photograph taken as a group. The Dalai Lama was on the upper tier, standing right behind Desmond Tutu. There happened to be a photographer with a quick hand on the lens who captured this particular moment: As they were posing for this very solemn picture, the Dalai Lama reached down and yanked the cap off of Desmond Tutu's head. The photographer snapped the picture just at that moment, so you get Desmond Tutu going, "What? What happened to my cap?" And the Dalai Lama behind him, holding the cap with his face just bursting with this big belly laugh.

What a kid. He's just a kid at heart. So much trust, so much confidence. He's released in something that's not ego. He's released into this awareness, this openness.

When we release into that, we can feel that awareness has an effortless quality. Rodney was talking about this this morning. We don't have to work to be aware. If we just sit here and we're not distracted, awareness does its thing. It reveals all the arisings at the six senses. We point to this when we give the instructions for sounds: Notice how, as you open to sounds, the hearing takes place without doing anything. We start to see the very nature of the mind is this awareness. We don't have to fabricate it. We don't have to call it up. As you just sit here, there's no way you cannot hear the sounds.

I'm using the word awareness at this point, and I've also talked about mindfulness and consciousness. At this point, people often are curious: what's the difference between mindfulness, awareness, and consciousness? I want to go into this vocabulary a little bit.

The word awareness has no counterpart in Pali. In the teachings of the Buddha, there's no word in the Pali language that we need to translate by awareness. There's the word sati, which we translate by mindfulness, and there's the word viññāṇa, which we translate by consciousness, but there's no third word that we need awareness for. So let's talk about mindfulness and consciousness, then we'll talk about how we use awareness.

The term sati or mindfulness means—I think we've said it a few times—knowing what our experience is. If you're breathing in, you know you're breathing in. If you're feeling tingling in the body, you know it's tingling. If you're hearing a sound, you know you're hearing. If you're experiencing a mood of happiness, you know it's happiness.

So we say that mindfulness has this intelligent quality. It's looking on at our experience and understanding what it is. This is actually the start of wisdom. Ajahn Buddhadasa, who we all spent time with in Thailand, used to talk about this in a word he created: satipanya. Sati means mindfulness, panya means wisdom. He conjoined them, hyphenated them, saying this is mindfulness-wisdom, all one word acting together. So mindfulness has this intelligent quality.

Consciousness is just the bare knowing of the sense data. You hear that snap, and just that bare registration before any word, before you're even identifying it as a sound—just the holding of that, that's consciousness. It's a mechanical thing. It doesn't have any particular intelligence with it. You could say it's stupid, if you like.

The nice thing about consciousness is it's really spontaneous. You don't have to do anything to be conscious. It just happens by itself. The nice thing about mindfulness is it has an intelligence, a wisdom aspect.

In English, we get kind of tricky around this word awareness. We use it to bridge mindfulness and consciousness. Sometimes we mean mindfulness, sometimes we mean consciousness. But really, the way I use awareness, I use it to mean someplace that blends mindfulness and consciousness. Because awareness has the spontaneous quality of consciousness, but it has wisdom in it too. When you say you're aware, you realize there's an intelligence there. So you can think of awareness as a spontaneous intelligence. It has both aspects.

In the Thai forest tradition, this quality is often called our true nature. This is from Ajahn Mahabua, the Thai forest master: "Although all phenomena without exception fall under the laws of the three characteristics—impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and not-self—the true nature of the mind doesn't fall under these laws." Isn't that interesting? "It knows and does not die." So awareness has a connection with deathlessness, which is a synonym for nibbana.

How can we connect with this in our practice? Can we discover it? Can we explore it?

For this I want to turn to one of the great philosophers of our age: Calvin and Hobbes. This strip came out around Christmas time one year. They were walking through the woods together, snow on the ground, and Calvin was saying to Hobbes,

"This whole Santa Claus thing just doesn't make sense. Why all the secrecy? Why all the mystery? If this guy exists, why doesn't he ever show himself and prove it? And if he doesn't exist, what's the meaning of all this?"

And Hobbes says, "I don't know. Isn't this some kind of religious holiday?"

And Calvin says, "Yeah, but actually I've got the same questions about God." That's good, isn't it? If there's a God, why doesn't he show himself and prove it? And if he doesn't exist, what's the meaning of all this? Good question.

When we talk about faith and trust in Buddhism, it's really helpful to ask: What is it that we have faith in? What do we trust in? You might say nature or pure nature or Dharma or God or something like that. But I wonder if it's possible to connect with it. I wonder if it's possible to feel it so that you know it directly.

I would suggest that it can't be seen through our eyes. Because if it could be seen, it would be an existing thing and it would be impermanent. And similarly, for the same reason, it can't be touched with our body. It can't be heard with our ears. Whatever is unconditioned, whatever is beyond change, it has to be invisible.

It has to be intangible. It has to be silent.

Well, awareness kind of fits that bill, doesn't it? It has those qualities.

This is from a Christian contemplative, Angelus Silesius: "God is a pure no-thing, concealed in now and here. The less you reach for it, the more it will appear."

I'm going to read that one more time. There's a lot in it. "God is a pure no-thing, concealed in now and here. The less you reach for it, the more it will appear."

Two things here. The deathless is found in the here and now. Nowhere else. Always in the here and now. The second thing is that opening to it is connected with relaxing. The less you reach for it, the more it appears. So the more we relax—not striving, not doing, again as Rodney was pointing to this morning—the more it opens up, the more we touch it easily.

So what is unchanging? Again, we look at our practice, and throughout the week we've been changing the instructions: breath, body, sounds, thoughts, emotions, tastes. But there's one common theme through all the instructions, and that is paying attention. So again, maybe the awareness is kind of the thread that links all these arisings together. Maybe the awareness is the unchanging part.

This is from Nisargadatta Maharaj: "I met my guru when I was 34, and I realized by 37. That's a good practice. Pleasure and pain lost their sway over me. I was free from desire and fear. I found myself full, needing nothing. I saw that in the ocean of pure awareness, the numberless waves of the phenomenal worlds arise and subside beginninglessly and endlessly. There is a mysterious power that looks after them. That power is awareness, life, God, whatever name you give it. It is the foundation and ultimate support of all that is."

Ajahn Jumnian is another living Thai master. I think he's about 65 now. He comes out to Spirit Rock every year in late May. So I've had a lot of contact with him over the years, and he is an amazing being. He has more energy than anybody I know 20 years younger, and he's always happy. I've never seen him not happy. He said, in fact, that he has not had any anger for 25 years. Impressive. And you feel that in his spirit. When you just tune into his energy, he's always energized and he's always happy.

He doesn't know a lot of English. He has a translator when he teaches, but this is one of his teachings in English. He's in front of a group and he wants to demonstrate the heart of the Dharma. And he goes, "Empty, empty, happy, happy." That's his transmission. Empty and happy.

Here's a quote from Ajahn Jumnian that he gave in a talk at Spirit Rock: "The best way to develop a great awareness"—and the word he used for great awareness was mahasati, literally great mindfulness—"The best way to develop a great awareness is to rest your attention within that knowing space of consciousness, in the pure space of knowing. If you understand and can rest in this pure knowing, that is the place of the deathless. From this pure awareness that's unmoved by what arises, then you see the phenomena of the world, which all have the nature to arise and pass away."

Phenomena show their dharmas of impermanence, and this other is the dharma of the deathless. Again, the equation of the deathless with this pure awareness.

Again from Ajahn Mahabua: "There's no escaping this truth. Whatever arises has to vanish. Whatever is true—that is, a natural principle in and of itself—won't vanish. In other words, the pure mind won't vanish. This vanishes, that vanishes, but that which knows they're vanishing doesn't vanish. This is what's called the pure mind. All that remains is simple awareness, utterly pure."

So we see from all these different sources the equation of awareness with the deathless, the undying, always available beyond change.

But I want to go back to something I said earlier, which was that the Buddha said that consciousness is impermanent. Consciousness arises with the object, and as the object fades, consciousness passes away. So how can we resolve these two? Awareness is the deathless, or consciousness is impermanent. This really concerned me for quite a while in my practice, and so I want to share with you the kind of resolution that I came to. It may work for you or it may not, but I'll tell you the image that came to me.

I studied physics in college, and there are a few ways to demonstrate a proof in physics. One is mathematically—if you can prove it mathematically, that stands. Another way is experimentally—if you can conduct an experiment that's reproducible, that will establish a principle. And another way is what my professor called a thought experiment, a gedanken experiment from the German. And if you could carry out an imaginary experiment and based on what you know, predict the outcome logically, that could also be a method of proof.

So I'd like us to go into a gedanken experiment tonight on behalf of the Dharma. What I'd like you to do is imagine you're in outer space. You're sort of on the edge of our solar system, and your back is to the sun. The sun's behind you. Now, let's pretend we don't have to worry about spacesuits and goggles and reflectors and all that, but you're just out there. You're looking away from the sun, and just for the purpose of the experiment, let's say you're looking into a part of the sky where there are no stars.

What do you see? Back is to the sun, looking into the sky, no stars. What's your visual experience?

Black, right? Is this the black that's light reflected off a black object? Or is this the black that's the absence of any light? It's the absence of any light, isn't it?

Is the space in front of you actually devoid of light? Your back is to the sun. No, the sun's rays are filling that space, aren't they? So it's pervaded—that space is pervaded by light—but you're not seeing any light.

Now, all of a sudden, a meteor shoots up from below you. It goes zipping across your field of vision. Do you see it? Yeah. There's like this bright flash in front of your eyes for a minute. Where's the light coming from? The sun. The sun's light illuminates the meteor, and then it creates this bright flash in your eye. And then it's gone, right? The meteor arises, flashes, and then it passes through. It's gone, and then you're back with black.

I'm going to suggest that that flashing of light from the meteor is consciousness, and that the sunlight that's continually pervading empty space is awareness, the deathless awareness. Will you buy it?

It's pervading, but you don't see it. The unconditioned, the deathless, the ever-present is there, but we don't see it.

And the only way we know that it's there is that it's reflected when a phenomenon arises. That reflection is the proof that it was there from the beginning.

Now, sometimes it may be possible in a moment of meditation to turn back, face in the other direction, and see the full radiance of the sun directly. That may be possible. But most of the time we don't. We're surrounded, we're pervaded by this unconditioned radiance, but we only know it from its reflection.

So how can we relate with this in our practice? We start to get a sense of this true nature when the demands of the I are not so strong, when we're not so caught up in liking and disliking, desire and aversion. There's a relative sense of ease. At a time like that, you're really in the present moment. At a time like that, take a look at this quality of awareness, at what it's like when you're really undistracted.

It's been compared to vast space, which is one reason that the sunlight analogy works well. It's been compared to space in that it's very wide open. In fact, do you feel any boundaries or limits in your awareness? Is there an edge to it anywhere? No. So like space, it's unbounded. It feels limitless.

Physical space accommodates all the objects that arise. Our awareness accommodates all the phenomena of the senses that arise. But there's one key difference. This inner space has a quality that the physical space doesn't, and that is the quality of sentience, of consciousness, of cognizance. This inner space of awareness illuminates its arisings. It reveals them. The sights, the sounds, the smells, the tastes, the touch—they're revealed through this awareness. Physical space doesn't have that knowing quality. It's dumb. It doesn't have a consciousness aspect.

What we are most fundamentally is this empty space of knowing, this vast spaciousness whose very nature is cognizance. As we start to let that truth sink in, the power is that it shifts our identity.

Usually we're preoccupied with identifying ourselves with particulars. I'm an angry person, or I'm a happy person, or I'm too short, or I'm too thin, or I'm feeling lonely, or I'm feeling excited. And all these things are what Carol last night talked about as personality view, sakkāya-diṭṭhi. They're all ways that we identify, and because we're identifying with things that are impermanent, we get involved in suffering when we make our personality view hook up with these impermanent characteristics.

So in this shift of identity, we unhook from the particulars. We don't grasp on to the arisings, but we let that sense of our center of gravity shift to this vast, open awareness that holds all the comings and goings, but itself is not coming and going. So we shift our identity to this deathless quality.

This quality—it's a dimension within us that's beyond change. When we make that shift, you can start to feel that in your being. It gives us a place of steadiness. It's the deathless. What else could be steadier? It's consistent. It's beyond change. What could be more consistent? And it's peaceful. It contains the arising and passing, but it itself is not arising and passing.

As we relax in that, it moves us into a place of non-grasping. We don't need to get involved with the particular arisings and passings. We simply let them take place within this vast space. We're still in touch with it. We're not denying anything. We're not out of touch. But we're not holding on to it.

And we start to see that this space of awareness is intrinsically free—free of desire, free of aversion, and free of confusion.

And this is not a freedom that we have to go a long way down the meditation track to touch. We can touch it here and now. It's available here and now because we have it already. It's not something we have to manufacture. It's our most basic nature. It is the fundamental truth of our existence as sentient beings.

So that means there's a dimension in our being that's already free right now. Not that we have to wait for many, many eons to discover freedom. There's a freedom already active within us. And the more we can realize that, the more we feel that freedom start to permeate our being. The only thing we have to do to be there is to stop grasping. We stop grasping and we're in it. It's that close to us.

So that's why we put the emphasis on elements like relaxing, trusting, ceasing from wanting, ceasing from aversion. When we move into that non-activity, we drop into the nature of mind and we're in that pure, deathless awareness.

It's sometimes compared to a mirror, because a mirror will reflect anything that's put in front of it. You put something really beautiful in front of a mirror, it reflects it perfectly. You put something really unappealing in front of a mirror, it reflects it perfectly. The mirror doesn't care. It's completely impartial. The same way with awareness. It can hold everything, and it really doesn't have a preference for the beautiful or the unbeautiful.

Anything you put in front of a mirror doesn't harm it. Anything that takes place within pure awareness never actually harms or corrupts the purity of that awareness. It can cover it over, but it can't really break it or affect it.

For me, this has been a really inspiring part of my path for the last several years, to realize that this intrinsic freedom is available in any moment when I put down grasping. It's felt here and now. And as we feel it, it furthers the path. So we don't have to wait for many, many lifetimes to touch an element of freedom.

Rumi has a poem about this state and also about how when we get identified with particulars, it leads into bondage. It's called "Tending Two Shops":

Live in the nowhere that you came from, even though you have an address here. That's why you see things in two ways. You have eyes that see from that nowhere and you have eyes that judge distances, how high, how low. You own two shops and you run back and forth. Try to close the one that's a fearful trap, getting always smaller. Checkmate this way. Checkmate that. Keep open the shop where you're not selling fish hooks anymore. You are the free-swimming fish.

Each of us really is the free-swimming fish of awareness, but we tend to put our identity again and again in the transient. When we start to put the identity into the deathless, then we move into that place of refuge. And when I say put the identity there, we don't have to make an "I" about it. It's not like we found a new location for the self. There's no reason to put the "I" around awareness because there's nothing individual about this awareness. This awareness is completely impersonal. It's a building block of the universe. It's the same in all sentient beings.

Huang Po said that human beings and all wriggling things are possessed of this great nirvanic nature. So us and the frogs and the worms—it's the same nature. So we don't have to make an "I" out of it. It's not a Guy nature or a Carol nature or a Rodney nature. It's just nature. So just awareness.

But that's where we start to find our center of gravity. When we connect again and again with this spaciousness and cognizance, spaciousness and consciousness, and recognize it as our nature, then it's said that all the wholesome qualities of the heart and mind flower from that recognition.

And so it's said that the union of emptiness and consciousness is unimpeded warmth, unimpeded caring. So this emptiness, this knowing, is not a cold place, but it's a place that unfolds all the beautiful qualities of heart and mind. And how it unfolds them depends on the situation. If we're with someone who's suffering, the unfolding is compassion.

If we're with someone who's happy, the unfolding is sympathetic joy. If we're just with ourselves and in touch with the emptiness, the unfolding may be equanimity. If we're in a big crowd, the unfolding may be loving kindness. If we have to make a decision, the unfolding may be wisdom. All the qualities come out just as they're needed from this space of emptiness and cognizance.

Once you get the intuitive sense of this, you can make this a practice. We sometimes say that this practice is that of resting in awareness. But sometimes this is misunderstood. People think that they're going to find a destination of awareness that's separate from the comings and goings. So they look to freeze some experience that's separate from phenomena. That's not it.

The awareness continues to illuminate all the arisings. So you don't look for someplace different than that. You look for the space that holds it all. And you're still in touch with the moment and with change. All of it happens within this space, but there's a sense—there's a pervasive sense of ease, openness, relaxation, and stillness.

This is again from Ajahn Buddhadasa: "This emptiness is self-existent. Nothing can touch it, concoct it, or improve it. This is the eternal state, for it knows neither birth nor death. Once the mind is rid of delusion, it discovers its primal state, the true original mind, which is satipaññā, mindfulness wisdom."

And this expression of trust in this true nature, of openness and relaxing in the true nature, becomes a practice all of its own. It is the practice of faith in each moment, opening to that vulnerability, the bareness, the nakedness, and the trusting in life to hold us. This really is tuning our being to the flavor of nibbāna.

I'll just close with a quotation from the Buddha. He was talking to a monk named Piṅgiya, and he was talking to him about the power of the practice of faith. He said, "Piṅgiya, other people have freed themselves by the power of faith. Vakkali, Bhadravudha, and Alavi have all done this. You too should let that strength release you. You too will go to the further shore beyond the draw of death."

Let's just sit for a minute together.

You too should let that strength release you. You too will go to the further shore beyond the draw of death.

CHAPTER 5

Judging Ourselves

Guy Armstrong · 57 min

> Guy Armstrong addresses one of the most pervasive forms of aversion we encounter in practice: self-judgment. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching on māna (conceit or comparing mind), he explores how our tendency to judge ourselves as superior, inferior, or equal creates suffering and undermines our spiritual development. Armstrong explains that this comparing mind, one of the ten fetters, stems from existential insecurity and the search for solid reference points in an inherently impermanent world.
>
> The talk offers practical methods for working with self-judgment in meditation, including mindfulness techniques, questioning the validity of judgmental thoughts, and developing loving-kindness toward ourselves. Armstrong emphasizes that these patterns of self-criticism are mental formations (saṅkhāras) arising from causes and conditions, not fixed aspects of our identity. He draws on teachings about anattā (not-self) to show how understanding the selfless nature of experience can free us from identification with judgmental thoughts.
>
> The discussion includes guidance on accepting our meditation practice as it is, rather than comparing ourselves to idealized standards. Armstrong concludes with a teaching from Suzuki Roshi about the four types of horses, illustrating how those who struggle most in practice may actually have the greatest potential for genuine understanding and transformation.

Last night Kamala talked about the hindrances, and in her talk about the hindrances there's one that has always fascinated me because it seems to play such a central role in my life: aversion.

One of the fascinating things about aversion is how many different forms of it there are. In retreat, one of the really common forms of aversion that arises is aversion directed toward ourselves. We find that there are ways that we don't like ourselves very much, we don't feel good about ourselves, and we judge ourselves. Especially in this context of silence and aloneness, these kinds of thoughts and the feelings that come with them often percolate right up to the top of the subconscious chatter that we don't often tune into, but in the silence we do.

So we start hearing thoughts that tell us things like: I'm not good enough, or I'm not smart enough, I'm not a good enough yogi, I'm not loving enough. Or I'm too critical, or I'm too neurotic. You may have a few more of your own.

This habit is based in a very powerful and deep-rooted tendency of mind that the Buddha called, in Pali, mana. Mana is usually translated as conceit, but an equally good translation is comparing. It's one of the ten fetters that bind us to samsara.

The Buddha said that it has three forms. This comparing mind expresses itself in three different modes. One is the mode "I'm better than someone else." This is the normal sense of conceit in English, which gives rise to feelings of pride and arrogance and superiority.

The second mode of conceit or comparing is the thought "I'm worse than" or "I'm inferior to." This is the source of a lot of suffering because basically we don't really want to be inferior to anybody. The ego wants to be the king or queen of the world. So this is a painful form of thinking or belief.

But there's a third form of comparing which says "I'm equal to." This is kind of a shock in the West to think that "I'm equal to" is also a form of conceit or comparing. Our society is so steeped in democratic ideals that we take that as a gospel truth. As the Constitution said, all humans are created equal, so I must be equal to everyone else. But in fact, this is also a projection of mind. It's an attempt to define ourselves and a projection onto reality. The sense of superior, inferior, and equal don't exist in the intrinsic nature of things. These are concepts and projections.

The source of this comparing mind seems to be something very fundamental to human existence because it's so common and so deep-rooted. I believe that it lies in an existential insecurity that we all feel. Whether we are conscious of it or not, I believe that at different points in our development, we all got the sense that the world is essentially open and unbounded and unfixed. Somewhere that came through. We talk about the unreliability of phenomena. I think we know it on a really deep level, and it's the source of our basic insecurity in life.

So in this situation of no fixed security, I think that we have tried to find security through this root of the comparing mind. It's as though we have an intuitive knowledge that I am not solid enough. That's an unsettling proposition. So I believe that we look around, and looking outside of ourselves, it looks like everybody else is much more solid. You may notice that in the meditation hall. It seems like everyone else is sitting like a Buddha, but for me. So I think we project a kind of solidity externally. Everybody else seems so together, such consistent yogis, so calm. The turmoil is in here.

Well, maybe if I reference myself to them, I'll find some solidity. This may be the source of that instinct to compare, to find a seeming security through a reference point outside of ourselves. So this comparing mind is rooted in fear and insecurity.

This particular fetter, the Buddha said, is not ended until arahantship. This tendency to form self by comparison will be with us for a long time. So it's very helpful to get familiar with the way that it works and how to work with it in practice.

This becomes a painful tendency of mind when we believe in it, when we believe that our overall value as a person can be summed up in this superior or inferior attitude. The superior side seems to offer some comfort, but the problem is because it isn't really true, it can always be undermined. So if we've clung to that view, we have to hold on and protect it. If we've fallen into the opposite view, the view of inferiority, then we are constantly feeling down on ourselves, undermining ourselves, criticizing ourselves. The view of equality is much less problematic. It doesn't really come up a lot as a cause of suffering.

So it's just to be aware when that projection is going on as well.

This is a statement from the commentaries that will give you a sense of how central this tendency of conceit is viewed in the tradition: "The world, enveloped in the darkness of the defilements, is covered by seven veils—lust, hatred, delusion, conceit, views, ignorance, and immoral conduct. Having removed these veils, the Buddha abides generating light all around."

So this factor of conceit or comparing is in quite rich company here, elevated to the same status as lust and hatred and ignorance. It's a very central part of the mind.

When we form these beliefs about ourselves, this could be a type of what's called personality view—forming a conclusion about ourselves and clinging to it as a false kind of security. It's one of the more painful kinds of views that we can form, views particularly about ourselves. It comes out of ego, it strengthens ego, and it's a painful place for ego.

When we judge ourselves, we judge ourselves on different criteria. Sometimes we get embarrassed about our mind. This happened to me when I first read about Buddhism. I was about nineteen years old, in university, and the only books I could find at the time were by Alan Watts and D.T. Suzuki. So I started reading all that I could find, mostly on Zen at that time.

The writings tended to be quite idealistic. They really centered on the nature of the enlightened mind—the Buddha's mind or the mind of the Zen masters, both ancient and modern. They presented the picture of these minds that were completely unruffled by any external circumstance, that always abided in freedom—no problems whatsoever, no untidy emotions, no reactive thoughts, no inner problems or conflict.

As I read this literature and got so inspired by it, I took it very idealistically. I thought that I should measure up to that kind of ideal myself. Never mind that I hadn't done any practice. Never mind that I wasn't anywhere close to enlightenment. I just thought I should be emotionally clear. I began to suppress the troublesome emotions that came up in me. That led to a deadening cycle for me until I encountered actual practice and some people who could put those emotions in a bigger context.

Don Juan, the teacher of Carlos Castaneda, had a teaching on this subject that I like. I don't have the exact quote, but it was something like: "You started out trying to convince yourself that you didn't want anything, but it ended up that you couldn't enjoy anything." That's the kind of deadening that can happen from this kind of idealism, where we think we should measure up to some archetypal way of being, but we're not really there yet.

So in dharma practice, it's always good to be skeptical about any ideal about how you should be feeling. There is no way that you should be feeling. The emotional life is so wide and so varied, and it's all fine. It's all just expressions of our nature. The only guidelines, the only "shoulds" within the path are around conduct. It's helpful to refrain from unskillful conduct. But leave the mind wide open to feel whatever is there.

Sometimes we're embarrassed about our minds, sometimes we're embarrassed about our bodies. I think this is especially difficult for women in this culture, although it's becoming more that way for men. I don't know if you've tuned into that, but the images of male beauty are also starting to pervade the media—the six-pack abs, the big biceps, and so forth. But women have had to deal with this for a lot longer.

There's a lot of influence through Hollywood, through television, through advertising—essentially through the media—where one's self-worth gets identified with one's physical appearance. Unless you look like Meg Ryan or Halle Berry or Lucy Liu, you're not okay, not good enough. Never mind all the work it took to get them to look the way they do in films.

Oprah Winfrey has a real interest in transformation, and I really appreciate a lot of the spirit of her work. In her magazine O, a couple of years ago, she did an exposé of the cover girl image. What she allowed to show in the pictures was the way she looked before makeup, the makeup process, and the way she looked after makeup in getting ready for a photo shoot for the magazine cover. I thought that was very brave of her, because when she's in public on her TV show and in the magazine she looks great—she doesn't look her age, she looks very elegant and well turned out. But in this spread she showed the before pictures.

It was very interesting because she looked like a pretty typical middle-aged woman. And then at each step—the makeup, the hair stylist, and the clothing—all of a sudden she looked like a Hollywood personality. So what do we compare ourselves to? Usually it's the cover girl or cover boy. It's not the before shots because we don't get to see those. So it's misleading from the very beginning, and then we compare ourselves to a false ideal.

So in working with the judging mind, it's really helpful to have some faith that this self-judgment, which can be so entangling, is just a mental creation. It is not the way things are.

The Dalai Lama's response reveals something profound about how this self-judgment operates. It's not the truth of things. As the Buddha taught: "When any practitioners, on the basis of form—the body—which is impermanent, unsatisfactory, and subject to change, regard themselves thus: 'I am superior,' or 'I am equal,' or 'I am inferior,' what is that due to apart from not seeing things as they really are?"

This whole movement of conceit based on our appearance is not seeing things as they really are. The Buddha then applies the same teaching to the other four aggregates, the mental formations. We could say the same thing about mind states. When we compare ourselves on the basis of our mental states and declare ourselves superior, equal, or inferior, the Buddha asks: what is that due to but not seeing things as they really are?

Our practice of vipassana is precisely to see things as they really are. We need to trust that when we can do that, it cuts through this web of comparing. It cuts through the web of conceit. All this tangle of judgmental thinking is completely off the mark, pervaded with delusion.

The Dalai Lama came to IMS in the late 1970s and gave a public talk here. This was before he became quite so famous, though even then he had a police escort out to the center. That was the first time the chief of police of Barre really gained some respect for us—he got to provide an armed escort for an international dignitary, which kind of put us on the map in his mind.

After the Dalai Lama's talk, he took questions from the audience. Someone asked him about self-judging: "I feel so worthless in my life and in my practice. I feel like I don't really amount to anything. What can you tell me about how to work with that?"

The Dalai Lama gave a very direct answer. He looked the young man in the eye and said simply: "You are wrong." He doesn't contradict people very often, usually trying to find the germ of truth in what they're saying, but he said clearly: "You are wrong. That is not the way it is. Everything that appears on this earth, every being that appears, has value and is precious. The birds, the creatures—how could a human being not have that preciousness?"

In the Tibetan tradition, they often teach the concept of precious human birth—how fortunate we are to be in this body, to have the chance to hear the Dharma. They teach this before they'll even talk about suffering, so that when suffering comes, there's this beautiful container to hold it in, a container that values every single living being, every single practitioner.

This wasn't the last time such a question arose for His Holiness. Years later, probably in the 1990s, there was a meeting in Dharamsala, India, at his home, between Western teachers of Buddhism and the Dalai Lama. The Western teachers raised this as a persistent issue: "Your Holiness, there are many people who come to us, who meditate, who are plagued by these feelings of worthlessness, of not valuing or appreciating themselves. How can we help them work with this?"

The Dalai Lama turned to his translator and asked, "What are they talking about?" He had to have the translator go back and forth several times with the Western teachers because he really couldn't wrap his mind around this concept that people would feel their lives were not of value. Finally, when he understood, he went around the circle to each Western teacher asking, "Is this part of your experience? Can you relate to this?" And each teacher said yes, they could relate to it as part of their experience.

I think there's a real epidemic of worthlessness in the West. Our communities have broken down, our traditions have fallen apart. In our generations, we're really struggling to find our way and put ourselves back together in a way that traditional societies haven't had to do. This is new work that humans are doing, and it's really widespread.

I ran into this early on in my own practice. As I mentioned, the solitude and silence can tend to bring it out. I was on a retreat, and during walking meditation, I started to feel this self-judging reflected in my thoughts. I wasn't very comfortable with it—I was embarrassed by the fact that I was judging myself in this way.

So I went to my next interview with my teacher. He asked how things were going, and I said, "Well, I'm having some hindrances." I thought we could quickly move past that and get on to some real dharma. But he was persistent.

He said, "Oh, what kind of hindrance?"

I said, "Well, I'm having some aversive thoughts."

I thought that would take care of it, right? I named the hindrance and we would go on and talk about some real dharma. But then he said, "Well, what are the thoughts?"

And I had to say, "Well, I'm feeling like nobody likes me. Feeling really lonely and unlikable."

And he could tell that I was really feeling it. This was not just a superficial chatty conversation. He could feel the pain of it. And so he sat up very straight and he said, "What you're seeing is not the way it is. Your problem is that you don't accept yourself."

And that was mostly the end of the interview. Your problem is that you don't accept yourself.

So that theme of accepting myself became my koan for the next few years. I really didn't know what it meant because I thought in Buddhism there was no self. How can I accept myself when there isn't one? There's not a self to accept or reject. So I had to struggle with it. I thought, am I supposed to find this little guy that's deep inside me and then embrace him? Is that what's supposed to happen? I couldn't do that. Never got a hold of the guy.

And so continuing to just hang out with that question, what I came to see is that accepting ourselves really means that we accept each moment of our experience just the way it is. And it's okay that it's that way. So we do this work of acceptance moment after moment after moment when we can be with the way things are with equanimity, with some ease.

It's one reason that you often hear us say, just open to the moment, feel it directly, accept it. Accept what's happening in the mind, accept what's happening in the body, just the way it is. Acceptance doesn't mean that we have to do something active. Sometimes that's a little misleading. Then we can get into the kind of, well, how do I actually accept?

What we really mean by accept is stop resisting. Just drop the resistance to it. Drop the aversion to it. That's all you need to do. You don't have to actually do anything positive. It means to drop the resistance to your inner experience.

It also doesn't mean that you have to accept the world outside, a world that you may have been hurt by or victimized by in many different ways. It doesn't mean that we condone the harm that's going on in the world. It's very appropriate, once you engage in life again, to take action to right the injustice, to right the harms that are happening in the world where it's possible. But in this context, the inner work of acceptance means we stop resisting the experience in our hearts, the experience in our minds, the experience in our bodies. Because as long as we resist it, we're just creating more conflict. It's to take out that element of resistance in the inner life.

Looking back on my experience with those years of working with self-acceptance, I see now that at the time I thought I was unhappy because I wasn't loved or I wasn't lovable. But now I think what was happening is that I was making myself unhappy by thinking those thoughts and believing them. So the source of the unhappiness was confused. But those thoughts created a weight, created a burden in my mind.

And this kind of self-judging can be very oppressive. It's got aspects of several of the hindrances. There's the quality of disliking, first of all. We're disliking something about our experience. There's an element of fear because we're afraid that it's true. We're afraid that the judgments are true and we're afraid that other people are going to see it and see this dark secret of ours, of our inadequacy. There's an element of self-doubt. We doubt our ability to handle what we're feeling. We doubt our ability to grow beyond it. We doubt our ability to be free of it. And there's also within it a fixed view because we believe in this fixed concept about ourselves. So we're caught in all those forms of hindrance.

Underneath the thoughts, the basic feeling is something like, "I'm not good enough, I'm inadequate, I'm not lovable, I'm not worthy of love," or that there's something wrong with me. The rest of the world looks okay, but there's something wrong with me. I can feel it.

So to offset it, we often engage in a lot of searching for validation from outside. You can see that in relationship—a kind of craving for affirmation or attention, for validation. Even in retreat this can come up.

When I was in the early years of my practice, I was very self-conscious about my walking meditation. I was very diligent with my walking. I tried to do it really well, but I was also wondering if anybody else was noticing. I sort of kept hoping that somebody would someday compliment me on my walking practice. At the end of the retreat, that somebody might come up and say something. Finally, at the end of one retreat, somebody did. They came up and said, "Boy, you did a lot of walking in this retreat, didn't you?" That was as close as I ever got to a compliment.

But the problem is that even if we do get the outside affirmation, it doesn't fill the hole. It doesn't erase the doubt because we've created the view. We really are the author of that view, and we believe in it. So we really believe it's true even if people outside tell us that it's not true. Even if people tell us that we're lovable or lovely or beautiful, we can't quite take it in.

Of course, we want everybody to love us, to provide that validation, but it doesn't happen like that. It doesn't happen like that for anybody. As the Buddha said, praise and blame always alternate. These are worldly conditions that always go back and forth. I think of the Dalai Lama as one of the most lovable beings in the world, and yet there are people who do not like him.

A friend of mine teaches English as a second language in Berkeley. Some of her students are from mainland China and have been in this country not so very long. She said that she was teaching a group of them and would bring up the Dalai Lama as an example of a great person or a lot of love or a lot of compassion to try and slip a little Dharma into her English teaching. She said that she would see that these students from mainland China would kind of bristle when she would mention the Dalai Lama. And finally, one of them raised her hand and said, "Oh, you know, teacher, he is not a very good man. He is a separatist. He's a splittist." And then she understood that they had heard the news from the Chinese government that's very, very critical of him because of his political defense of Tibet and Tibet's autonomy.

So a lot of people in the world hate the Dalai Lama. I think that's probably true. That's probably a fair thing to say. So even someone like the Dalai Lama is not loved everywhere. But my friend said that over time, she tried to talk more and more about how his image had become formed that way, and these students of hers started to warm up to him and could see that there was goodness in him.

Even the Buddha was not universally loved. That seems hard to understand, but it's true—he aroused a lot of jealousy. A lot of people were jealous of his strength, of his power, of his wisdom, of the following that he attracted. His cousin tried to kill him, essentially, out of jealousy. Some people were threatened by his popularity, the way Jesus' popularity threatened some of the vested interests of his day. And some people just didn't connect.

There's a very interesting story. Just after the Buddha got enlightened and had decided to go teach, he was walking from Bodh Gaya to Sarnath, where he was going to deliver his first sermon. He passed a man on the road, and he explained to this man that he had just become fully enlightened and that he was incomparable in all the worlds in his level of understanding. The man just kind of looked at him strangely and said, "May it be so, friend," and sort of detoured around him and just kept going. You meet a lot of sadhus on the roads in India, and not all of them are very together. That's probably what he thought.

So when there's this feeling of inadequacy, of unworthiness, it can often make us withdraw from life because of the sense of fear—the fear that it's not really safe to engage in life. Because if we really engage in life, then we're subject to criticism, we're subject to failure. The reason that criticism and failure take on so much weight with this inadequacy is that they re-stimulate this inner feeling. It's not that it's a bad thing to fail. It's not that it's such a bad thing to be criticized.

Everyone gets criticized. Praise and blame always alternate. The problem is that the criticism or the failure tends to trigger this deep feeling of inadequacy and bring it to life. And then we're right back in the thick of it, which can be a terrifying place to be. It exposes this inner void or emptiness—a carryover of that primal insecurity.

We've defended ourselves. We've found ways to defend ourselves against feeling the rawness of this insecurity. But criticism or failure tends to reignite it in its strong form, that primal form. We're afraid to feel it because we believe it might be true. We believe there might be something really missing in us or something really wrong with the way that we're put together.

As confidence grows, we find out we can feel that feeling of inadequacy and it's not so crippling. We see it's just another emotion. It arises, it persists for a while, and it passes away. It actually doesn't mean that we're inadequate. It's just a gut feeling, just a sense. As we get more confidence, we can open to it, feel it, let it arise and pass, and it's not so disturbing. There's more equanimity around it.

So how can we work with this judging mind? I want to talk really practically for a while about ways to work with it in our meditation.

The first advice always, as with any hindrance, is when it arises, note it with mindfulness. Note the presence of the judging thought. Note any emotion that comes as a result of the feeling. You might develop a label for this pattern of thinking: "judging, judging." Then tune in and see what the feeling is within. See if you can feel it in the body. See if there's any mental coloring.

In the body, you might get in touch with a sense of contraction, if it's strong. In the mind, you might notice that oppressiveness, that combination of disliking and fear that's there in judging.

Sometimes the mindfulness is enough to create a space around the judging, and it really takes the pressure off. We don't feel so caught. We don't feel so identified. It can take the suffering out just in seeing it clearly. We start to see that we don't have to get rid of all the judging thoughts—that would be more striving, more grounds for comparing. But we just need to see them clearly. Then they lose a lot of their power.

Joseph has a really nice way of deflecting the power of these judging thoughts. He said, every time you hear one, just add the phrase, "and the sky is blue." "I'm a really crummy meditator, and the sky is blue." It'll make it lighter, honest.

But sometimes this mindfulness or the simple looking at the judgment doesn't quite take away its power. Sometimes the pain of it is still really there. Then, like with any hindrance, if mindfulness alone doesn't do the trick, it's helpful to take up one of the antidotes.

Every hindrance has an antidote. For instance, with desire—let's say with sexual desire—it's considered helpful to meditate on the unbeautiful aspects of the body. With aversion, it's helpful to develop loving kindness. With doubt, it's helpful to bring in faith by reflecting on the benefits of the Dharma that you've already felt.

So I want to talk about some reflective practices that can be useful in dealing with the judging thoughts. The first is to listen really closely to what the judging thought is saying. Tune in. It may say something like, "Nobody likes me. I can't be with three breaths in a row. I'm not in the moment enough. There's something wrong with me."

With each judging thought that you've really heard clearly, ask the question: "Is that true?" Really skeptically question the thought that comes. Because what happens is that these judging thoughts may start from some rational basis, but then they can get really murky.

I work with someone who's a therapist. We were having an interview one time, and she had recently lost a client—a client had decided to leave her and go to another therapist. She reflected at the time, "Well, I just wasn't the right fit for this person. That's fine." That's easy to hear—not the right fit.

But then as she dwelt on the leaving, she thought, "Well, the problem was I didn't have enough compassion for this person. I wasn't warm enough." And then the next cycle of thinking was, "I'm really not a loving person at all." And then the final cycle was, "I've never loved anyone and no one's ever loved me." At that point, she just collapsed. That thought was too much to bear.

The first thought was very workable—oh, it's not the right fit, different personalities. But then the spiral happened and the final thought was crushing. Now what's interesting is that the final thought is really suspicious: "I've never loved anyone and no one's ever loved me." I doubt it. That's the one that's the most painful and that really weighs on us. So question that thought. It's when it gets overblown and overgeneralized that it departs from the truth, and that's where it really hurts. It's the departure from the truth.

Something else I see is that when I compare myself to other people, other practitioners, I always compare myself to somebody who's really great at a certain quality. Have you noticed that? What, you don't have the Dalai Lama's compassion? What's wrong with you? You're really undeveloped, aren't you?

Or even here, I'll compare myself: Why don't I have Joseph's clarity? Why don't I have Carol's sense of humor? Why don't I have Kamala's heart? Why don't I have Steve's precision and energy? I always pick their very best quality. I think I should match up all along the way. What a trap—instead of honoring this beautiful array of strengths, to use it to defeat myself. Not skillful.

So take a look at these thoughts and really question them. It means to doubt the self-doubt. Doubt the doubter.

A comment like "I'm not with enough breaths in a row, so I'm not a good meditator"—that's a really misleading one. I want to ask you all: what's the right number of breaths to be with if you're a good meditator? See, we set up this bar and we compare ourselves against it, but we never really make it conscious. What is the bar? Is it five? Half? Very good. Half a breath in a row is good enough.

Or another one that's really tricky is "there's something wrong with me." Really? What? Try to find a concise answer to what is wrong with you. "There's a lot of pain." Oh, really? What's the right level of pain in a human life? What's too much? We can't answer these questions.

This whole notion of something being wrong with us is really spurious. Generally—not for everybody, but generally—we felt that at some point in our life, things were okay, and then something went wrong. So somewhere we made the transition from being okay to going wrong. And what we want to do now is make the transition from it being wrong to it being okay again.

Can it be that polarized? Can it be that on and off? Is it really possible to go from being okay to being wrong? I don't believe it is. I actually don't believe that any of us are wrong in that way. Another way I could say it is, I don't really believe any of us are broken. It's another way the feeling of being wrong sometimes comes out.

If you're broken or you're wrong, then if you're in inner work, you have to want to fix it. You have to want to fix yourself. But I question whether there's anything that's ever gone wrong in that fundamental way with anyone here. Because the fundamental nature of the universe is lawful. It's lawful. It doesn't mean that it's fair. It doesn't mean that your hurts were necessarily fair. But it is lawful in the way causes and conditions unfold in life. So to say that we're wrong means the universe went wrong somewhere. And I don't believe that.

Another way to work with these judging tendencies—this gets a little psychological, but again, if you hold it in the vein of reflective practices, it can be skillful—is to work with the sense of the judge as a sub-personality and make a separate character out of the judge. It's like the judge is one corner of your mind and has a certain way of being, has a certain personality.

So give it a face, give the judge a name, dress him up in clothes if you want, make them look silly. One of the people that I work with in California calls his judge Darth Vader. That's a great image. If you hear a female voice there, Nurse Ratched from One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest might be a good image.

Once you've made that figure, that personality out of the judge, you can send metta to that person. So try sending metta to the judge and see what happens. As you start to feel into this personality, you'll notice the judge is not a very happy character and probably could use your metta. Sometimes all that's needed to quiet the judge is that they feel some metta going in their direction.

Another thing you can do if you dialogue a little with the judge is to ask the judge to restate the criticism in a truthful way. The judge says, "Nobody loves you." And you say, "Thank you very much, Darth. Could you please restate that in a way that's really true? Because what you said isn't really true."

So these are near-term ways to work. I also want to talk about some long-term ways. The practice does make huge changes in this area.

After I'd gotten ordained in Thailand, I went to visit a monastery in Chiang Mai on my way out to a forest monastery. There was a Western monk there who'd been in robes quite a while—eleven or twelve years at that point. And I hung out with him over a couple of days. I liked him a lot. He was a big man and very full of metta, full of metta, a lot of warmth. He spoke Thai because he'd been in Thailand quite a while. The Thai people also really appreciated him a lot.

In the mornings he would meditate, sit by his pond, do his own practice. In the afternoon he would see people, and Thai people would come to him all the time. Every day he was busy in the afternoon seeing people. Everybody felt his metta.

But as we chatted a little bit about practice, he said to me, "You know, I spent the first nine years that I was in robes working through my self-hatred." Nine years working through his self-hatred. But when I met him, great heart of loving kindness. Huge amount of warmth. And it was clear he had done a lot of inner work.

The classical antidote to aversion, and so to judging also, is loving kindness. In the long term, metta practice is a great contribution to greater self-acceptance, greater self-love.

In Asia, metta for self is taught first because it's considered the easiest. But in the West, it's often the most difficult. As you do the loving kindness for yourself, it's really helpful to include some positive reflections on your own good qualities, on kind deeds that you've done, so that you have a sense as you begin the metta of some inner goodness that you're connecting to.

Metta for the self can be difficult, but it's very important to do it if this self-judging is part of your struggle. It may not feel like much is happening at first, but just the repeated bringing of good wishes to yourself will start to change that.

It's also really helpful if you're doing metta for yourself and it's difficult to have somebody for whom it's easy—somebody like a benefactor or a friend where the affection comes in very easily. Sometimes it's not so easy to feel the juice toward ourselves. We still want to do it because it will change us over time, but the juice may come in more easily with somebody else. So do it for the person who's easy. Connect with that real feeling of liking, of affection, of love, and then kind of borrow that and come back and do the metta for yourself again. Go back and forth.

Sometimes it's really helpful to do the loving-kindness practice for yourself at an earlier age. Have an image of yourself when you were a child or a teenager. That can connect to that innocence, that vulnerability, and that purity of the child.

The other area that's really helpful in the long term is a deeper understanding of anatta, of the selflessness of things. Because we really do see that there is no self to judge one way or the other. That really becomes understood. There is no inner essence that could be superior or inferior. There's also no one who's chosen to be this way.

Before we understand anatta, I think we assume people are the way they are because they choose to be that way. We identify their personality with some core. As we understand anatta more, we see it's not like that at all. Things are just arising out of causes and conditions. That includes this body, and that includes the patterns of our personality. Those are the things we mostly identify with—the body and the personality patterns.

In Buddhism, the personality patterns are known as sankharas. This is the fourth of the five aggregates. A common translation for sankharas in this sense is karmic formations. It means the way we act through mind, through speech, and through bodily actions. This is what makes up personality.

We come to see that all the sankharas are also just arising and passing due to prior causes and conditions. There's nothing fixed within the whole flow or stream of personality. Personality is like a changing river. There are karmic patterns because of ways that we've invested our energy in the past. The sankharas arise due to grooves in the mind set up by past behavior. That's called old karma. But we have the ability to influence the karma in this new moment, and that changes the stream of personality. That's what the path is about. The path is about new karma, and that then starts to transform the whole karmic stream of personality.

So we see that nothing within us is fixed. It's all coming and going and it can all be transformed. It's empty of any kind of abiding substance or essence. There is no "I" who is there to be superior or inferior. There's no "I" who's controlling it, who's responsible for the emotions that we feel.

Sylvia Boorstein is a dear colleague that I teach with often in California. A lot of metta in her being. She asked a student one day in one of her classes, "How are you?" And the student's reply was, "I couldn't be better." Sylvia then uses that now as a teaching.

If I ask you right now how you are, could you truthfully answer that also? You could, couldn't you? We all couldn't be better because we can't change how things are in this moment. So that's a true statement for each one of us: I couldn't be better.

I am the way past causes and conditions have brought me right up until this moment. I like that sense of things. That's the way I am. So there is no one who is responsible for that. It's just the impersonal nature of past actions that are expressing themselves in this moment.

So we don't need to identify so strongly with the way this moment is. We can't change the past. We can't change those old actions. They've already happened. But where we can influence is the present and the new karma of this moment.

Over time, with the growth of insight into anatta, with the development of loving kindness, we feel more at ease, we feel more freedom, we feel more loving, and that gives us confidence in this inner goodness. That is really what offsets the self-judgment in the long run. We even get a sense it's okay not to be perfect.

Personalities never get perfected as far as I can see. That's not the place to look for perfection. But within our Dharma practice, with our imperfect personality, we can touch a place of perfection. There is an inherent purity in this mind-body process. There is a dimension of purity that we can discover and access and touch. And then we can see the imperfection as just a part of the greater perfection of things.

You see someone like the Dalai Lama who has this deep, deep self-confidence, who can sit up in front of 10,000 people, 100,000 people, 250,000 people in Central Park and still be as playful as a child, because of this deep trust in his own goodness. And that's possible from the path.

This judging tendency feeds on our outer life, but of course then we bring it into the practice—the same tendency of mind. We criticize ourselves for the way that we undertake our meditation. We may feel inadequate in the meditation the same way we feel inadequate in daily life.

There was a question the other day in the hall that related to this. It was a question about how can I accept the chaos in my practice when I know that I really want to be more concentrated. That's a pointer to the same thing. There are lots of ways to feel gloomy about our practice progress.

When you think about somebody like Dipa Ma, amazing practitioner. First time she came to IMS, she was shown around the place and she said, "Wow, it's so beautiful. Anyone could sit under a tree here and be enlightened in a week." That's a different perspective.

But for us, the chaos in our hearts and minds is pretty apparent when we sit. And we obviously would rather it be different. But the question really is, do we have a choice about it? Do we have a choice? And generally the answer is no. When the chaos is there, when we're in that cycle, that's the truth of the moment. That's the Dhamma. That's the old karma that's playing itself out in that moment.

If we resist it, it just adds to the chaos. The only way to peace is through non-resistance, non-conflict with that present moment. That is the Dhamma of it all.

We also see that the chaos that comes is part of the work of purification. The awareness basically goes through all the layers of holding and identification in the mind, brings them into consciousness so that they can be released. So there's greater and greater freedom as the chaos is held in mindfulness. But in practice, we all have our own pace of development. It's according to our paramis.

I want to close with a reading from Suzuki Roshi. This is a little long, so I'll ask for your patience. But I think it really speaks to the question of accepting our practice.

"In our scriptures"—and then he references a sutta that's found in the Anguttara Nikaya in Pali—"it is said that there are four kinds of horses: excellent ones, good ones, poor ones, and bad ones. The best horse will run slow and fast, right and left at the driver's will, before it sees the shadow of the whip. The second best will run as well as the first one does, just before the whip reaches its skin. The third one will run when it feels pain on its body. And the fourth one will run only after the pain penetrates to the marrow of its bones. You can imagine how difficult it is for the fourth one to learn how to run."

When we hear this story, almost all of us want to be the best horse. If it is impossible to be the best one, we want to be the second best. This is, I think, the usual understanding of this story. You may think that when you sit in meditation you will find out whether you are one of the best horses or one of the worst ones.

Here, however, there is a misunderstanding. If you think the aim of practice is to train you to become one of the best horses, you will have a big problem. This is not the right understanding. If you practice in the right way, it does not matter whether you are the best horse or the worst one.

When you consider the mercy of the Buddha, how do you think he will feel about the four kinds of horses? He will have more sympathy for the worst one than for the best one. When you are determined to practice with the great mind of the Buddha, you will find the worst horse is the most valuable one. In your very imperfections, you will find the basis for your firm, way-seeking mind.

Those who can sit perfectly physically usually take more time to obtain the true way of Zen, the actual feeling of Zen, the marrow of Zen. But those who find great difficulties in practicing will find more meaning in it. So I think that sometimes the best horse may be the worst horse, and the worst horse is the best one.

Let's just sit for a minute together.

CHAPTER 6

Fear and Fearlessness

Guy Armstrong · 1h03

> In this comprehensive dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines fear as one of the four primary afflictive emotions (along with sadness, anger, and desire) that arise from our fundamental patterns of greed, aversion, and delusion. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching that "there is wavering in one who is dependent," Armstrong explores how our attempts to control pleasant and unpleasant experiences create the very fear we seek to avoid.
>
> Armstrong maps these emotions onto a matrix of past and future: sadness and anger relating to past experiences, while desire and fear arise from future projections. He discusses various manifestations of fear—from death anxiety to fear of judgment, physical pain, and even fear of our own thoughts and emotions. The talk includes personal anecdotes from his monastic training in Burma, illustrating how fear often reveals our own areas of ethical concern.
>
> The practical guidance centers on three key areas for investigation when fear arises: bodily sensations, mental mood/coloring, and the accompanying storyline of thoughts. Armstrong emphasizes that understanding fear's impermanent nature—that "no feeling is final"—allows us to work directly with fear rather than being overwhelmed by it. He offers various skillful means including mindfulness, mettā (loving-kindness), compassion, and sometimes the need to stand firm against fear's manipulation. The talk concludes with Chögyam Trungpa's teaching that true fearlessness comes from tenderness and the willingness to let life touch our "raw and beautiful heart."

The subject of the talk tonight is fear and fearlessness.

I wanted to talk about fear this evening because, first, I think it's a really common experience in retreat. Second, it's one of our deepest kinds of conditionings. And when it's present, it has a very oppressive nature. Unlike any other emotion that I think we experience, it tends to cast this very dark cloud over everything. It gives a sense of deep inner contraction in our being and cuts us off from the joys and happiness of life.

So in the talk tonight I want to look at the phenomenon of fear and how to work with it, but I want to start by putting it in a context of the other emotions.

Taking a big picture view of our situation as human beings, we see that we are subjected to this mix—a very rapidly alternating mix—of pleasurable experiences and painful experiences. This is our lot in life and it's pretty much the lot of all the sentient beings that we know, perhaps excepting those in the God realms with unremitting bliss at their fingertips. But as we can see looking around this world, this is the human condition and the condition of creatures. Our senses are being battered constantly by this alternation of pleasure and pain. This is unavoidable for an enlightened being or an unenlightened being.

But our neurosis as humans, where we get caught, is that we've succumbed to the temptation to try to control these experiences—and not just once, but in quite a chronic way. This is how we think it's wise to manage life. So we have gotten ourselves into this habit of manipulating our experience over and over to gain more of the pleasurable and less of the painful. This is the birth of craving.

This is the basis of the activity of self, or what in Buddhism is called the ego—this constant striving to enhance the pleasurable and reduce the unpleasurable. And fundamentally, the practice of meditation, our Dharma practice, is to stop manipulating. Or we could say to stop the activity of self-centered grasping.

We begin to become very familiar with these movements of mind. The Buddha described them primarily as greed for the pleasant, aversion toward the unpleasant, and the force of delusion that accompanies both. Because the basis of greed and aversion is we don't see what we're doing. We don't see the operation of these forces of reaching toward and pushing away, and the not seeing of them and their effect—which is basically suffering—is what sustains the operation. These three—greed, aversion, and delusion—are really synonymous with craving, the second noble truth, the origin of suffering. Where there is craving, there will be clinging. And where there is clinging, there will be suffering. This is really the whole point of the Wheel of Dependent Origination, where it's explained quite clearly.

The afflictive emotions that we experience in practice and in life are really just variations on these fundamental tendencies of greed, aversion, and delusion. As I look at my own practice experience, as I talk to people who are in the middle of a retreat, it seems to me there are four emotions that come again and again that cause the most difficulty for yogis and, by assumption, for people in daily life as well. As I see them, they are sadness, anger, desire, and fear.

What's interesting is when you start to look at these four—what I would call primary afflictive emotions—is that they all map quite nicely onto a matrix of pleasant and unpleasant in relationship to past and future. Notice that the activities of greed and aversion are a lot about past and future. When we go away from the present moment with our thoughts, we move into past and future, and that becomes the basis for greed and aversion.

Let me spell out this matrix. In relationship to the past: If there has been the pleasant which no longer exists, that tends to be the condition for sadness. Sadness forms around the loss of the pleasant, which was in the past and is no longer. Anger tends to arise around a past experience of hurt or pain. If someone has done or said something that's injured us, that past hurt, when it hasn't been healed, is an arising ground, a seed for anger.

In relationship to the future then, the pleasant possibility that may exist in the future is the ground for desire. And the unpleasant possibility that may exist in the future is the ground for fear. We don't want to experience that which is going to be painful in the future. So sadness and anger, largely in relation to the past. Desire and fear, largely in relation to the future.

In Tibetan Buddhism, they often use the terms hope and fear. Hope is the replacement for desire. They'll talk about the whole strategies of ego or self as being these strategies of hope and fear. And meditators are encouraged to abandon the qualities of hope and fear. I think this sometimes is a helpful way to think of it. We can think of our basic movements of mind as being around hope and fear.

This points to how deep the conditioning of fear is—a central movement in the mind, a central basis of our neurosis. What we see as we start to look in this way is that these two forces of hope and fear ultimately lead us to more suffering than they bring us happiness.

This is the message of the Second Noble Truth. Craving is essentially an unskillful activity. It leads to more suffering than it resolves. We engage in these strategies because we are hopeful that they will lead to more pleasure and deeper happiness. But in fact, the message of the Second Noble Truth—and I think the heart of the Buddha's teachings—is that this is wrong. The constant engagement with these strategies of manipulation, summed up as hope and fear, leads us into more suffering.

Really, you could say that our development of trust in the Buddha's teachings, the expression of our faith in the Dhamma, is that we allow ourselves more and more to manifest our belief in non-manipulation. That's why it's so central in meditation practice that we give up our craving, give up our hope and fear moment after moment. In doing that, in stopping this ceaseless activity of self around pleasure and pain, we abandon ourselves to life. We surrender ourselves to the flow of life and the results of our own actions, the results of our own karma.

This kind of surrender, as I understand it, is the true openness of spiritual life—the true receptivity, trust, non-doing and non-interfering that all our practice is aiming at.

Often as we look at these two forces, hope and fear, we think it would be nice to give up fear, but we want to hang on to hope. Let's see if we can try to arrange the pleasant. Hope has something kind of positive in the experience of it, but let's get rid of this fear stuff—that's not so much fun.

But in fact, desire and fear go together. They're quite intimately linked. Because as soon as we commit to a desire for something, if you look closely, there's a fear of not getting it. Fear and desire will always show up together.

The Buddha put it this way in the Majjhima: "There is wavering in one who is dependent. There is no wavering in one who is independent." That is, where there's clinging in the mind to whatever—whether of the past or the future—that very clinging creates a dependence, and that dependence creates a wavering, a shakiness, a trembling, an insecurity, a fear in the mind. There is wavering in one who is dependent.

It's interesting to look at this question, the relationship of desire and fear. I've asked myself, which is more fundamental? So I invite you to ask yourself that in your experience. Which is the more fundamental driving force in your life? Is it desire or is it fear? Do we first feel insecure in life and then want the objects that will make us feel more secure? Is that the way it fundamentally operates? Or are we more driven by desire for the pleasurable, and then fear comes as a shadow of the desire?

When the Buddha expressed the Second Noble Truth and taught that craving is the cause of suffering, he definitely came down on the side of desire as being primary. So that's one man's opinion.

But speaking as a fear type, my primary sense is that for me, fear is more compelling. At this stage in my existence and development, fear feels like a more primary and compelling force than desire. But if you talk to a greed type, you'll get a different response. That's why I just invite each of you to look at the question for yourself.

In fact, it seems to me as a fear type, when you look at the uncertainty of the world, fear seems like quite a rational response to things. It's a mess out there. There are lots of ways to get pain. Even this body has a million ways to break down and cause physical suffering. It seems quite normal to be afraid of this situation. Sometimes it seems like the only rational response to things.

But that's why it's good to have contact with people who aren't fear types. My wife is not particularly a fear type. Her personality is more what would be described as sanguine—kind of confident, kind of easygoing. She's Australian, which might have something to do with it. She'll often wring her hands in frustration and say to me, "Why do you always have to think about all the things that could go wrong?" She's just happily trucking along and I keep popping up with all these anxieties. I say, "Well, I'm just trying to take care of us both." "I don't need you to take care of me in that way."

So it's helpful to get that reflection. There is another response possible to life. And eventually, I think, as a fear type, we have to ask ourselves: do I really want to feel this way all the time? The answer probably is no, because fear is not a very pleasant place to live from, nor is anxiety, nor is worry. So then the quest arises. You might say the dharmic quest arises: Where is the way out with fear?

The uncertainty of life is a truism—a simple fact we cannot change. This reality will not disappear for any of us. It did not disappear even for the Buddha. Throughout his life, he faced verbal and physical attacks, abuse, criticism, and blame. People attempted to kill him on multiple occasions. We can never escape life's fundamental uncertainty.

But must we respond with fear? That is truly the question.

Someone said in a recent interview something I found deeply insightful: "I can see how I'm creating fear through my own thoughts." This recognition itself opens the door to freedom—seeing that there is responsibility, an ongoing activity in the generation of fear.

Krishnamurti, the Indian philosopher and teacher, expressed this quite succinctly: "Thought breeds fear." We can sometimes feel this directly in our meditations. We may sit comfortably for a period, and then suddenly thoughts begin churning, and we feel our fear level rising. Thought becomes a breeding ground for fear.

Mark Twain acknowledged this in one of his famous observations: "I am an old man and have known a great many troubles, but most of them never happened." Most of our troubles never actually occur, yet this doesn't prevent us from imagining them and feeling their burden.

I cannot resist sharing another Twain quote I discovered while researching: "Go to heaven for the climate, but hell for the company"—perhaps applicable even for Buddhists.

In the Zen tradition, there is an image for how we create our own fear: an artist who has painted a tiger on a large canvas, working meticulously to make it lifelike. When he steps back to admire his work and sees the tiger, he jumps in terror. We become frightened of our own paintings, scared by our own imaginings. This doesn't make them real; it doesn't mean the tiger will leap from the canvas to bite us.

Through meditation, we begin discovering that perhaps we don't need to think these thoughts or conjure images of terrible possibilities. When we refrain, what becomes of our state? When we leave our condition unmanipulated—or uncontaminated—by thinking, what is that state untouched by thought? Take a look and see. Perhaps there is peace intrinsic to that state when thought isn't disturbing it.

I want to explore some specific types of fear, though in many ways the source doesn't matter. In meditation and dharma practice, we can learn to relate directly with fear in ways that don't depend on what triggered it. This understanding is crucial, but let me acknowledge various fears that arise in practice and life.

First is our fear of death. Death feels threatening to the ego, and this threat illuminates one of the primary building blocks of self—continuity. The self imagines itself continuing; without continuity over time, there is no self. I'm speaking of the fictitious self we imagine and believe in, which leads us into suffering and which we see through with insights into anatta. Death represents the ultimate insult to the ego because it presents the possibility of everything coming to an end.

Viewed differently, however, fear of death is quite irrational. What would happen if you went to sleep tonight, had pleasant dreams, and simply didn't wake up? Would that truly be such a disaster? Perhaps for the staff here, but...

It might be for the people back home. But really, what does it matter if this stream of sights and sounds and smells and tastes and touch and thoughts and emotions just comes to an end sometime? It matters only if we have a sense of ourselves as an ongoing being, an ongoing ego.

This fear of death is very natural, and I think it doesn't go away for a while. It doesn't go away easily. But curiously, they did a survey on people's greatest fears, and the fear of death came in only at number four. The number one fear that people mentioned—the highest fear on the list—was fear of speaking in public. I don't know about you, but I'd rather be speaking tonight than dying. So there's something funny about that ordering.

I have to say that I was probably first deeply inspired to practice by reading in Buddhism the possibility that one could live without the fear of death. This was just amazing to me—that in the early Buddhist readings I came upon, there were masters who had really gone beyond the fear of death and had discovered something called the deathless that they found their being to be grounded in. That was tremendously inspiring to me because the fear of death has been with me from an early age. I can remember being very young and being afraid of dying.

The Buddha said something interesting about this fear of death. He said that not everyone needs to fear death. Not everyone does fear death. He said that the fear of death is dependent on four conditions: if one has a great deal of desire for sense pleasures, one will fear death. If one has a great deal of desire for this body, one will fear death. If one has done a lot of unwholesome actions and hasn't done wholesome actions, one will fear death. And if one has not developed a faith in the Dhamma, one will fear death.

But the converse of those statements are also true—that one need not fear death if one is not so desirous of sense pleasures, not so desirous of the body, has done good actions, and has faith in the Dhamma. I mean, that's a high bar. How many of us do not desire sense pleasures? Probably not too many. How many do not have desire around this body? Probably not too many. But it shows a way. It shows a path of practice that is really open for us and the possibility of going beyond the fear of death.

In long retreats, I notice in myself a significant amount of fear of physical pain—sitting after sitting, sitting after sitting. One retreat I was sitting and just started to notice, "Oh, there's a tension in my mind. What is that tension about?" I kept looking into it and tracing it, and the only thing I could find was that there was a subtle fear of physical discomfort. That was really all it was about. Once I saw that, I could relax more. The physical pain didn't go away, but it wasn't being added to by the fear of the physical pain.

We have a fear of judgment. We are afraid of the things that people will say about us or think about us or point out to us. In a way, I think that fear of criticism triggers a deeper fear—that in some way we're not really okay. We're not sufficient or we're not adequate, that the rest of the world has got it together in a way that I don't. The criticism is really a pointing to that insufficiency in us.

One of the things that I think is beautiful about the Brahmaviharas as a practice is that as they start to come alive in us, and we look inside and feel the living quality of metta or compassion, that gives a sense of goodness. That gives a sense that there's something really trustworthy at the heart of who we are. And that goes a long way to offset this fear of not being sufficient, not being okay.

Sometimes this fear of judgment we can see really as a projection. When I was practicing recently in Burma—I think I mentioned that I ordained as a monk, which was a delight—my preceptor was a monk of about thirteen wassa, thirteen years, named Udama Saba, a Malaysian monk who was assigned to me because he speaks really good English. He's a very nice guy, a very gentle man, but he's also a good monk. He's a firm monk in terms of the discipline.

So one day I was waiting in the lunch line, standing there with my bowl waiting for the bell to be rung so we could go through and have our bowls be filled with food. My preceptor comes up to me and taps me on the shoulder and says, "Can you come to my kuti today at 5 p.m.?" I said, "Sure." And then he went off.

And then I started thinking, what does he want to talk to me about? Because normally when the preceptor calls you over for a private conversation, it's for one reason —to admonish you. So I started thinking, what have I done wrong?

All through lunch, I was in this state of paranoid reflection. Why does my preceptor want to see me? What is it I've done wrong? Have I broken the Vinaya in some really bad way? As I was dwelling on this sense of fear, three little areas kept popping up in my mind that I really didn't want to go to. When I looked into them, I saw these were the three ways in which I maybe wasn't following the rules exactly.

First, I wasn't tying my robes strictly according to the style of that monastery. I thought, hmm, is my preceptor going to criticize me for that? Second, I was eating my lunch at my kuti, and afterwards I'd have some rice and a little bit of vegetables left over, and I'd dump them out in my backyard. Way on the other end of the monastery I'd seen a sign that said, "Please do not feed the dogs. We don't really want them around." Dogs would sometimes come and eat. So I thought, is he going to criticize me for dumping out my leftover rice?

The third thing I realized I was paranoid about was that I hadn't shaved my head for the last Patimokkha, the recitation of the monks' precepts, which is the custom in this monastery. But because I knew I was going to be leaving soon, I thought it probably wasn't necessary.

When I resolved all my fears, they came down to these three things. I realized that I had a guilty conscience about each of them. That's why I went to paranoia when my preceptor wanted to talk to me. It was really interesting. The seeds of my self-judgment were in my own judgments of myself. I was just projecting onto my preceptor that he was criticizing me for things I was already criticizing myself for.

In the end, it was none of these things, and I don't think any of them were big deals. He said, "Did you receive a spare undershirt during this vassa as a gift from someone?" I said yes. He said, "Have you determined it yet as a spare requisite?" I said no. He said, "Oh, you need to do that," and he told me the formula. So we went through this little ritual where I forfeited it to him, then I went home and determined it, and then I could keep it. But it was one of the real technicalities of Vinaya that he wanted to educate me about.

I thought it was so interesting the way it called forth my own fears of self-judgment. What this led me to reflect on is the protection within sila. When we act according to the precepts—really, really fully—then our mind is free of this kind of paranoia. We don't worry that somebody is going to come to us and say, "You did this and it was wrong," because we know in looking at our own conduct that it's been virtuous, that we've been clean.

The Buddha pointed to this too. In one sutta in the Anguttara Nikaya, he mentioned that there are four kinds of happiness that lay people enjoy: the happiness of possessions, the happiness of enjoyment, the happiness of not being in debt, and the happiness of blamelessness—of not having done wrong conduct in thought, word, and speech. But he said that the other three do not measure up to one-sixteenth of the bliss of blamelessness.

I think this is a lovely phrase, "the bliss of blamelessness." When our conduct becomes more and more refined, we have that much less fear and paranoia in our lives. So a lot of the purification of fear can happen through sila.

There is a fear that we start to notice as we get quiet in meditation—a fear of our own thoughts. I don't know if you've ever experienced this in a time when there's a relative degree of calm in the mind, but we can be nervous about the arising of a thought, as though the thought shouldn't arise, or the thought is going to disturb us, or the thought is going to harm us. We're actually, at those times of quiet, afraid of our own thoughts.

There's a fear of our emotions, which is probably deeper and stronger. A lot of this talk will go into this point in more detail, so I'm not going to explore it now. I'll emphasize it around working with fear, but it really applies to all the difficult emotions.

There's a fear that's rooted in our separation from others, the separation from other humans. What's interesting when we look at this is that it brings in the sense of isolation, lack of connection, lack of community. But what we often don't see is how we create the separation through our own thoughts, through our own views.

And I think the way this works is we all tend to define ourselves by how we're special. I don't say this because we're all bad people. I think this is the way ego works. Ego separates itself by finding something special in the mind-body process. So we take special note of the fact that we're good-looking or handsome, or our parents are a certain way, or our friends are a certain way, or we're wealthy, or we're athletic, or we're artistic and creative. Or it might be the absence of these—we might define ourselves as "oh I'm not this" or "I'm not that," feeling badly about ourselves. But somehow ego tends to make up stories about how we're different.

As we believe in those stories and dwell more and more on them with thought, we separate ourselves further and further from connection with the human community. We put ourselves outside it by emphasizing our specialness or our difference. What we tend to forget in this is how much we're alike. We tend to forget that we have two eyes and a mouth and arms and legs, like everybody else. We tend to forget that we have joys and sorrows, like everybody else, that we have the whole range of human emotions, that we have vulnerability, that we have the potential for happiness and for freedom, just like everybody else.

One of the beautiful things about the practices of the Brahmaviharas is they remind us of what we share. We share a wish for safety, for happiness, for health, and for ease. We share a wish to be free from suffering, a wish to enjoy good fortune. We share that we are owners of our own karma. The Brahmaviharas unite. As you go through the different beings in all the different categories, this is what you see. This is universal. This is what we all feel alike in. As you center your life more and more in the Brahmaviharas, you start to realize we're all just part of the same family. We have the same basic concerns as do all beings.

Then in meditation especially, there's fear as an edge of what is familiar. There's fear that comes when we open to something new, even if it's something delightful and ultimately freeing and liberating. There's often fear when we touch it for the first time just because it's new, and we're not sure if we can find our home there, if we can learn to be comfortable there.

This has come up, I think, a couple of times in the morning questions as people touch new degrees of calmness and absence of thought, maybe a weakening of body sensations, so that the impact of the present moment comes to be rather faint because of the degree of quiet that has been touched. Then there's a little threat to the ego in that—where do I find myself when things are this quiet? Where's the ground in a place like this? It can be unsettling.

Insights into impermanence and anatta have some of this quality. We can feel that everything's dissolving, that there's no self there, that the self is about to be dissolved or terminated. Insights into emptiness have some of this flavor of being unsettled by taking out the foundation for ego. But these are all absolutely liberating parts of the path and essential parts of the path. Very, very important to open over time and touch these places. It's an integral part of the opening of meditation. But the difficulty is also acknowledged in the tradition. In Tibetan Buddhism, they talk about the process of learning to bear emptiness—learning to bear the truth of emptiness—indicating it's not so familiar to us right away on first contact. We have to learn to bear it.

So really what's needed is to recognize the space, first of all, of calm or seeing impermanence or seeing anatta, spaciousness. Notice if there's a reaction of fear or unease. Make that a meditation object. Don't even prefer the calm to the fear. This is the new arising. Be with that. Then more and more, we can just relax with the experience of the unease and the experience of the spaciousness. We find as we relax more and more, it's trustworthy. We've discovered that through our own experience. This is not a place of danger. It's not a place of harm. And so we relax more and more into it. It would be a shame if we didn't open to it, if we backed off thinking it was a fearsome thing.

My wife and I were staying in a place for a few weeks not long ago, just visiting, and there was this little stray kitty that was wandering around the neighborhood, kind of knocking on different neighbors' doors and looking for food.

And we're suckers for stray kitties, so it didn't have to wander very far after it found us. We would feed it in the morning and in the evening, but it wouldn't let us get close. We had to take a bowl of food and put it over near a garden where it could quickly run away if it got scared. If we got too close, it would just dash off into the bushes again. But if we left the food out and then backed away, it would come up and eat.

It was a beautiful, really beautiful little kitty—probably about five or six months old. It had blue eyes, a really creamy white coat, and little light brown stripes, kind of little tiger markings. We really grew very fond of it, but it would never let us get close.

What we wanted to do was catch it so that it could be neutered, so that it wouldn't go around creating more wild cats who basically don't have a very good life in this world. We assumed it was a female, and it would have been much better for the cat if it would let us approach it, catch it, and then take it to the vet and have it neutered. Because if it happened to be a mother, then it would have to feed not just itself but three or four or five little kitties. And then they would grow up and have the same kind of dukkha.

So we really wanted the cat to let us approach it, and it never would. In its fear, it was avoiding the one thing that could possibly save its life and lead to its greatest happiness and peace—developing contact with humans and being adopted. Fortunately, we were tricky, and we trapped it in a have-a-heart trap. It did go to the vet, and she is being adopted. So the outcome is good.

But this is what meditation teachers have to do. They have to tell you, "Go into that emptiness." And we're not tricking you. It is for your welfare and happiness.

I also wanted to mention there is one wholesome fear that the Buddha talked about—the fear of wrongdoing. The Pali word is hiri, and it's usually paired with another Pali word, ottappa, which we could translate as conscience. So the fear of doing wrong and the conscience, which is remorse about doing wrong—these two are really wholesome forces in the mind. The Buddha called these the protectors of the world, the guardians of the world. They are the underpinnings of our commitment to sila.

So how can we work with fear when it comes? As I talk about working with fear, I think you'll see the extension to working with any of the difficult emotions and be able to extend it. I'm going to go into some detail on fear, but I hope that the transference to the other difficult emotions is also clear.

First of all, it's really important to face these difficult emotions. They are in our psyches. They are operating sometimes consciously, but more often unconsciously in our daily lives. When they're operating in that subterranean way, there's no possibility of getting free of them. Until they can be brought into the light of awareness, they simply run our lives in a compulsive fashion, and there's no liberation.

One of the beauties of having these emotions arise in retreat is that we have nothing else to do but pay attention, so we can understand them and come into a new relationship with them. The arising of fear in a situation like this is a great gift. I know it doesn't feel like that—it feels like a torment. But it is the stage, the classroom, the lab in which we learn to be free. So if not here, where? Where else can we bring a comparable amount of wisdom and steadiness of attention to the experience of fear? We are so lucky to have it here.

That's why in Asia, teachers were fond of sending their students out in situations that provoked extreme fear. Ajahn Mun, who was the teacher of Ajahn Chah—great Thai forest master—used to send his students out into areas where tigers roamed at night. He would just send them out into the forest to meditate for days at a time and hope that they would stay long enough so that they'd hear a tiger roaring nearby. Here, where sometimes the greatest real fear we face is being late for tea, you can imagine the impact—as sensitive as your minds and hearts are—of hearing a tiger roaring nearby you in the forest. But this was considered an important part of their training: to meet their fear and to face it and to work with it.

Usually our first reaction when fear arises is more fear. We are afraid to experience the fear itself, and this puts us into a loop where fear arises, we feel more fear on feeling it, and that causes an escalation—an increasing escalation of the fear.

Our first impulse is that we need to get rid of this fear. It's not pleasant. I'm not liking it. I want it to go. But that's not usually possible.

So the shift in attitude we need to make is one of being willing and interested in understanding the fear. And this really is where the freedom comes from. When we understand the way emotions are put together, the mechanism by which they operate, the mystery is gone out of them. It's like watching a puppet show and then suddenly being able to see up above where the puppeteer is pulling the strings. When we start to see how the strings are being pulled in all the different facets of an emotion, the mystery goes out of it and really the worry goes out of it.

So all the different kinds of emotions that can come are all understandable. And an important aspect of our Dharma practice is seeing them closely enough and clearly enough that we start to see the mechanism in these things.

So when fear arises in your practice, please bring your attention close to it. Very helpful to ground the attention in the body. This was the area where I first started to come to terms with fear. Feel the body sensations that are triggered in your body with the experience of fear. And it can be a lot of different experiences. There might be a shakiness or a trembling all over, a kind of flutter in the stomach, rapid heartbeat, shallow breathing, perspiration under the arms, a sense of contraction in the chest or in the abdomen, overall sense of lightness.

It's helpful to name each of these. Let your attention move throughout the body where you feel the impact of the fear. Name the different sensations that are coming so you get really familiar with them and open to feel them. Now here's an important question: Can you bear them? Can you bear those physical sensations that come with fear? Look and find out if you can bear them.

Second place to look—what is the mood or the coloring in the mind? I found it much easier to approach fear first through the body. Only after that was I kind of brave enough or subtle enough to look for it directly in the mind. What is the mood of fear as a mental state? The way sadness has a certain coloring and anger has a certain coloring and desire has a certain coloring. What's the coloring in the mind of fear? Let your attention come right up against that mood and that color.

That was even harder to do. One, because the mood or coloring is kind of vague. It's like a cloud. But secondly, because for me, what I found when I looked is that the mood of fear is escape. Escape. It was a wanting to flee from. So how do you get close to something that wants to flee? It was tricky. It was tricky to feel that fear directly. But then the question came: Can we bear that? Can we bear that mood, that color, that sense of wanting to flee?

Then the third area to look is the area of thoughts. When an emotion is strong, a difficult emotion is strong, it's often accompanied by thoughts, usually accompanied by thoughts. With fear, the thoughts are somehow related to the future. And it's something like: this moment may be bearable, but something really bad is about to happen. This moment is bearable, but the next moment is not going to be. It's going to be more than I can bear.

You could say that this is kind of the storyline of fear. If you look closely, every afflictive emotion that's a problem has got a storyline associated with it. So there are the body sensations, there's the mood, and every strong emotion that we have a problem with, as far as I can tell, has a storyline also. Some view, some thought that we've believed in about the situation.

So with desire, a sample storyline is: if I get this thing, it will make me happy. With sadness, a sample storyline is: I can't be happy because I've lost this thing. With anger, the storyline might be something like: the other person is wrong and I'm right. And with fear, it's something like: something disastrous is about to happen. This moment's okay, but the next moment won't be.

As long as we believe in the storyline, we're sustaining the emotion.

The trick to coming out of these emotions is to step out of the storyline—which always concerns past and future—and come into the present moment. When we arrive here, we discover there are only body sensations, mood, and thoughts coming and going. That's it. That's all there is to fear.

When we see the mechanism this clearly, it loses some of its power. We realize that the presence of fear doesn't mean something disastrous is about to happen. It simply means my armpits are sweating, my stomach is tight, and I have this fleeing feeling. That's all it means.

When we examine the details this way, we find we're actually able to accommodate the presence of fear. We can bear it and come out the other side. We always emerge because fear is impermanent. All emotions are impermanent, and that's why it's safe to feel them. We can open to them because none will last.

Here is a poem by Rilke. To set the context, he imagines a creator God who, after creating each being, gives a little pep talk before launching them into life. This is God's pep talk just before sending a being into existence:

God speaks to each of us as he makes us, then walks with us silently out of the night. These are the words we dimly hear: You, sent out beyond your memory, go to the limits of your longing. Embody me. Flare up like flame and make big shadows I can move in. Let everything happen to you, beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final. Don't let yourself lose me. Nearby is the country they call life. You will know it by its seriousness. Now, give me your hand.

Experience everything—beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final. That's why it's safe to feel the whole range of what we experience as human beings. No feeling is final. None have to get stuck.

When we see this way—the emotion's mechanism, the lightness of its expression through the body, this fleeting and insubstantial coloring in the mind, the conditioning created by phantasmagoric thoughts and images—what we're really seeing, what wisdom opens us to, is the emptiness of the emotion. There's nothing there. There's not really anything to these emotions.

When we can see that it's just an arising and passing that doesn't really mean anything, it loses its hold over us. It may arise many more times, but it doesn't have to dominate us. It doesn't have to control us.

Even if we lose sight of that emptiness, if we've seen it clearly, that insight remains with us as a form of faith. Even when the emotion comes and we may get lost in it again, something in us knows this is not the final truth—this being lost. There is a deeper truth, a truer way of seeing.

Because fear is difficult and we may get lost in it many times, it's also helpful to have other skillful means. Mindfulness and the opening of mindfulness into wisdom are our primary means of freedom. In the longer term, successive moments of enlightenment can actually uproot the process of fear altogether. Short of that, it's helpful to have skillful means. The journey is long—pack a lunch. Pack some skillful means too.

The first skillful means, of course, is mindfulness and the understanding that comes from it. Here are others that may be helpful:

There's always refuge in awareness. You may feel that fear is engulfing, consuming, overwhelming—the only thing in your universe. But if you are knowing fear, there's another factor present: awareness and mindfulness. Take refuge there.

There is a kind of sane and sober part of yourself that's still working, that knows what's happening to you. This is not fear. This is a separate quality of mind. This is a strong and safe and secure quality of mind. Take refuge in mindfulness and awareness.

Check out the moment. I was practicing in England one time in May or June, which is a beautiful time there. I was out in the back garden practicing as night was falling, probably after the dharma talk around eight o'clock. A soft summer evening was settling in England. I was in a walled garden standing next to an apple tree. The birds were singing around. There were blossoms on the apple tree. My eyes were closed. I was doing standing meditation.

I was in this state of fear, fear, fear, feeling the body shaking, trembling. Finally, I just decided to open my eyes, and I saw that really soft evening twilight, the setting sun, listened to the birds, looked at the apple blossoms, and I thought, "Wow, it's really beautiful out here." What was I lost in? Just some huge projection, some huge papañca I'd gotten wrapped up in. Check out the moment. Open your eyes. You're in the dharma hall. You're in a dharma sanctuary.

Metta is a wonderful refuge in times of strong fear. When mindfulness and understanding and non-identification and insight don't loosen the grip and you're still caught, then it's okay to apply an antidote. And metta is the classical antidote to aversion in general and to fear in particular.

In using metta as an antidote to fear, it's really helpful to have a being in your range of beings who really lifts your heart up. It could be a benefactor, it could be a friend—somebody that when you turn to them, you feel uplifted. You feel the presence of their happiness or their wisdom or their strength or their love for you. And if you don't have anybody who exactly fits that category, let me recommend the Dalai Lama to you. He's a wonderful being to call on in times of fear.

The last of the refuges I mentioned is compassion. Sometimes when fear seems overwhelming and it's really settled in, turn to compassion for yourself. "May I hold this fear with compassion," and just try that practice for thirty or forty-five minutes and see if it shifts the feeling of the situation. I find that when I do the compassion practice for that length of time, it's like channeling Quan Yin, and some wiser, more grown-up, more parental part of myself starts to come through that can hold this difficulty like holding a child that's screaming.

Now there's one other approach to fear that I just want to mention. It's being firm with fear. Normally the experience of fear is the opposite of being firm. It's an experience of wavering, trembling, shaking, quaking, running away from, escaping—anything but firm. But sometimes the very way to meet that fear, which has pushed us around all over the place in life, made us quake in our boots and do lots of unskillful things, the way to meet it is to become firm and essentially say no.

Sometimes in practice you may find you reach a point where you're just not willing to be pushed around anymore by fear. One yogi said in an interview a few days ago, "Fear was there but I stood my ground, and it felt really good to me. I stood my ground." This is part of the sense of this firmness.

This came one time in my practice when I was also in England, in the early years. Fear was arising quite strongly for me, more strongly than it ever had before. I'd learned about the gentle approach of opening to the sensations and accepting the mood and being with it—"Yeah, come on in. Make yourself at home. I can open to this too." And it wasn't working. It had been about three days, and I was still being really pushed around by the fear.

I was doing standing meditation again—and I think there's no coincidence I was doing standing meditation. In the middle of it, I was just ready to give up. I kind of looked at this experience of fear, which had gone on for two or three days, and I just finally said, "Fuck it."

I'd rather die than live like this.

And I meant it. I was ready to die rather than live with that fear. And as I said that, I could just feel the fear start to run down my spine and into my legs and out into the ground. I just stood there and it sort of started running down my body and into the ground.

There was a lot of energy in my body for the next day. The fear would come back, and I'd get firm again. The fear would come back, and I'd get firm again, and I'd ground it, and it would pass. So I still continued to relate with it, but somehow in that experience, it lost something of its hold over me. Something in its hold over my mind got broken then.

Although I've had fear many times since then and it's been suffering, it's never dominated me in the same way again. I've reached many points in my practice where I had complete equanimity with the fear. If the fear arose or if it didn't arise, I really didn't care. It made no difference to me one way or another. I really attribute that to the firmness and the strength to stand my ground against the fear.

When we can really open to the whole experience of fear and not feel we have to run away from it, not feel we have to shrink from feeling the fear, then we start to see the possibility of fearlessness. I would like to suggest that we can consider fearlessness not as a state where fear never arises—that may be a long way off in our practice for all of us—but that we're not afraid to work with it when it comes up. We're no longer afraid of the experience of fear itself. This is possible for us. This is not that far off for any of us.

Then it just becomes another workable condition, like body pain, like hunger, like momentary frustration that comes from time to time. Trungpa Rinpoche, a really creative and inventive Tibetan teacher, said that when we become willing to work with whatever comes up on this path of practice, this path of opening, when we're willing to work with anything that comes, this is the lion's roar of fearlessness. This is our declaration of fearlessness.

I'll close with another quote from Trungpa Rinpoche: "True fearlessness is not the reduction of fear, but going beyond fear. When we relax with our fear, we find sadness, which is calm and gentle. The sadness comes because your heart is completely exposed. There is no skin or tissue covering it. It is pure, raw meat. Real fearlessness is the product of tenderness. It comes from letting the world tickle your heart, your raw and beautiful heart. You are willing to open up without any resistance or shyness and face the world. You're willing to share your heart with others."

Let's just sit for a minute.

Real fearlessness is the product of tenderness. It comes from letting the world tickle your heart, your raw and beautiful heart.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 7

Kamma & The End of Kamma

Guy Armstrong · 1h02

> In this profound dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong examines one of Buddhism's most central yet challenging teachings: kamma (action) and its cessation. Drawing from the Bhayabherava Sutta (MN 4), he recounts the Buddha's three-fold awakening under the Bodhi tree, highlighting how the second watch revealed the divine eye seeing beings reborn according to their actions.
>
> Armstrong clarifies that kamma refers primarily to cetanā (volition) - the intention behind bodily, verbal, and mental actions. Wholesome actions arise from non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion (generosity, loving-kindness, wisdom), while unwholesome actions stem from their opposites. He explores five ways we experience karmic results: in the present moment, through memory, in community relationships, as habitual mind states, and mysteriously over time.
>
> The talk addresses the relationship between kamma and anattā (not-self), using the analogy of a river to explain how personality consists of karmic patterns flowing without fixed essence. Most significantly, Armstrong discusses how the Noble Eightfold Path leads beyond both wholesome and unwholesome kamma to complete liberation - the "kamma that is neither dark nor bright" that ends all karmic conditioning through mindful non-fabrication.

The talk tonight is called Karma and the End of Karma.

The Dalai Lama was once asked, where should the emphasis be in bringing the Dharma to the West? Should it be more on the teaching of emptiness, which is the pinnacle of Buddhist philosophy, or should it be on the teaching of karma? And he said it's more important for Westerners to hear the teachings on karma than to hear about emptiness.

I want to suggest in the talk tonight that this topic of karma is actually even more central to the Buddha's teachings than we normally think that it is. In pointing to that, I want to remind us of the sequence of insights on the night that the Buddha was enlightened. This is described in Majjhima Nikaya Sutta 4. He goes through the progression of things that happened to him that night.

Do you remember that he decided to sit under the Bodhi tree? He made a resolve not to get up until he had attained full realization. He said, even if I die here, I'm not going to get up. That's determination. You know, the next time the tea bell rings and you pop up, that's a good thing to keep in mind.

He said that in the first watch of the night he had his first insight. The watches of the night are three in number. They start at 6 p.m. and they're each four hours long. So between 6 and 10 p.m., when most of the country was watching the Brady Bunch, the Buddha had his first insight, which was the recollection of his past lives. And he said, I recollected one past life, five past lives, ten past lives, a hundred, a thousand, ten thousand, a hundred thousand past lives. Here I was born of such and such a name and such and such a clan. This was my sustenance and there I passed away. Just reviewing all those many, many lives.

Then in the second watch of the night, from 10 p.m. to 2 a.m., he was still awake, and he had his second insight. This is a good motivation to stay up later in your practice. The second insight was about opening his eye with psychic power to the whole cosmos. He saw various beings being born and dying. And he said he saw that reappearance according to their past actions in this way: that those who had been well-conducted in body, speech, and mind were born in a pleasant destination and enjoyed happy conditions. And those who had been ill-conducted in body, speech, and mind were born in a painful destination and had difficult conditions.

Finally, in the third watch of the night, the time from 2 a.m. to 6 a.m., is when he became the Buddha with his insight, penetrating insight into the Four Noble Truths, the realization of nirvana and the destruction of the taints. At the end of that time, his mind was liberated and he was truly the Buddha, the Awakened One.

I think it's quite significant that in the second watch of the night, the insight was basically about karma. We're going to come back to that at the end of the talk, and I hope you'll see how that fits in.

It's very challenging for us to grapple with these teachings on karma because unlike most of the Buddha's teachings, we can't verify them in detail. I don't have a divine eye whereby I can see beings dying and reappearing according to their past actions. That takes a very special mind. I can't see for myself the truth of rebirth and how that relates to karma. And I don't know anyone teaching in the West who can, although there have been Asian teachers that I've met who said they were able to see this. So most of us can't verify these teachings experientially.

In the talk tonight, I don't want to tell you so much my understanding, because that's really limited, but I want to try to tell you what the Buddha said on this topic. This is the same person who gave us the four foundations of mindfulness and the direct path to realization. That gives him a little bit of credibility in my eyes, and I trust in yours. So please take the words in just as reflections of the Buddha's words, and I think this is a topic that sinks into our hearts and minds often over a long period of time. Don't struggle too much with whether you believe it all or don't believe it all right away, but just let it settle a bit.

There are four topics that I want to cover tonight in this exploration of karma. The first is what is karma? The second is what can be said about the results of karma. The third is the relationship between karma and not-self or anatta. The fourth is the end of karma. This is the general outline of the talk.

So first, what is karma? Karma is the word in Sanskrit, the Pali term is kamma. It was a very common word in the day of the Buddha and a very simple word. It just meant action. That's all it meant. But every philosophical school in northern India at that time had some twist about what action meant. Some of them said it mattered a lot. Some of them said it didn't matter. Some of them said it affected practice one way.

Some said another. The Buddha's original contribution was that he put an entirely new interpretation on the meaning of action. And he said that action refers primarily to the volition that accompanies it, the urge from which it springs.

This is from the Anguttara Nikaya: "Volition, O bhikkhus, is what I call action, for through volition one performs the action." When I use "action" in the talk tonight, the word that's being said by the Buddha is karma. So really, karma and action are synonymous, but karma has many more connotations or overtones than our word "action." So I will use it often to bring in the overtones, but they are synonymous.

Volition—so what does this word mean? The Pali term is cetanā. It's the word that we've used in the instructions that we translated by "intention." Noticing that before there's any movement of the body, there's an intention or an urge in the mind that causes that movement to take place. Other synonyms could be impulse, urge, motive, or will. The volition is the energy that drives the action. The actions are in three areas: body, speech, and mind. All of these are the fields of action.

Now what was so interesting about the way the Buddha described action is that some volitions are wholesome, some are unwholesome, and it's this quality—the wholesome or unwholesome aspect of the volition—that determines whether the action is wholesome or unwholesome. This was the Buddha's unique contribution to the understanding of action.

So specifically, when volition is influenced by greed, hatred, and delusion, that is an unwholesome kind of impulse or motivation. And these three qualities are called the roots of the unwholesome. When the volition is influenced by their opposites—non-greed, non-hatred, non-delusion—then the volition is wholesome.

When we look at the meaning of these words, non-greed, non-hatred, non-delusion, put more positively: non-greed is the opposite of clinging or grasping. It's the opening of the hand in letting go. So it could be called renunciation, relinquishment, letting go, or generosity. These are all aspects of non-greed. Non-hatred is essentially loving-kindness, friendliness, warmth, acceptance. And non-delusion is essentially clear seeing, or you could say wisdom.

So we could say that generosity or renunciation, loving-kindness and wisdom are the roots of the wholesome. When actions are influenced by greed, aversion, and delusion, then they are unwholesome in nature. When they are influenced by renunciation, loving-kindness, and wisdom, they are wholesome in nature. And some actions are mixed, so they have a mixture of both wholesome and unwholesome volition.

So it's not the act per se, but the volition behind it that gives its moral quality. For instance, I could ask you: if somebody cuts you open with a knife, is that a wholesome or an unwholesome action? You can't know, because if someone is trying to steal your money and they slice your stomach to make you fall to the ground, that's an unwholesome action based on greed and hatred. But if a surgeon is trying to remove your appendix because it's swollen, that's a motivation of compassion and a wholesome reason to cut you open with a knife—although it may not feel so enjoyable.

So it's not the action per se, it's the motivation behind it that determines its moral quality. And what's revolutionary about looking at action in this way is the Buddha said that there is this moral fabric woven into the universe of wholesome and unwholesome actions, because they lead to wholesome or unwholesome results. And we'll talk about that more in the section on result.

It would be difficult if we just had that teaching and no more guidance about what actions would be skillful and what would not. But the Buddha went on to provide quite a lot of detail on the actions that are to be done and the actions that are not to be done.

Tomorrow night we're going to talk on the whole area of sīla, or moral action. So I don't want to go into much detail now, but the Buddha outlined ten actions that are unwholesome in nature, driven by greed, aversion, and/or delusion, and ten actions that are wholesome in nature, not driven by those forces.

So just briefly, in this list, three of these unwholesome actions are acts of body: killing, stealing, and sexual misconduct. Four of them are actions of speech: lying, harsh speech, malicious speech, and idle speech and gossip. Three of them are actions of mind: covetousness, ill will, and wrong view. This is an interesting one. Wrong view is an unwholesome action of mind. So holding an assumption about the way the world works, the way things are, that is incorrect, is itself an unwholesome action. And the Buddha said it could lead to an unhappy destination.

Included in wrong view is not believing that actions have consequences. So let this be a word of warning.

I think it's very interesting when we start tuning in—and this is really where our meditation practice can ground itself—that actions of mind carry volition. And in that, they have karmic consequences. So take a look at the kinds of mental states and thoughts that you notice in your meditation practice.

Can you feel into the volition or urge that underlies different mental states and thoughts? With a thought of desire, what's the urge that's expressing itself? In some way, it's a wanting to possess, wanting to own, wanting to claim. What's the motivation in fear? It's something like escaping—escaping something or someone, trying to run away from—that's the urge expressed in fearful thought or mind state.

What's the urge or volition in metta? I think it's caring, caring for someone. What's the urge in compassion? I'd say it's to alleviate suffering. You can explore the different mind states that visit, those that seem to carry this quality of motivation or impulse, and feel into what that urge is about. Begin to recognize the wholesome kinds of motivations and the unwholesome kinds of motivations that arise in our minds.

The Buddha spelled out ten unwholesome actions, and then he outlined the ten wholesome actions, which were basically refraining from the unwholesome. This includes the first four precepts: refraining from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, and from lying.

As you consider returning to daily life, I think the teachings on karma become even more relevant, because as you go back into daily life, you're moving back into the realm of relationship and back into the realm of action. This is why the talk on sila is so well-timed. This is serious subject matter. We sometimes underestimate the importance of karma, the importance of clarity in conduct, but it carries significant consequences for our lives, for our practice, and for our happiness.

As you re-enter the world, this can become one of the major areas of practice. Simply practicing to observe the precepts is a very powerful way to engage with this teaching. The precepts are excellent guidelines and will carry us a long way. They form the foundation for what the Buddha called the bliss of blamelessness—that ease, comfort, and relaxation that comes into our life when our actions are aligned with the precepts and with non-harming practices.

The second aspect I want to discuss tonight is the result of action, the result of karma. Sometimes in the West, as this concept has traveled here, the two have gotten confused. The John Lennon song "Instant Karma" really ought to be retitled "Instant Vipaka," because the result of karma is actually the Pali word vipaka. It's different. Karma is the action itself, and the result is called vipaka.

The basic teaching, as I'm sure you've heard, is that wholesome actions lead to wholesome results, or happiness. Unwholesome actions lead to unwholesome results, or unhappiness. This is from the Dhammapada:

"Mind is the forerunner of all things. Mind is chief. Speak and act with an impure mind, and sorrow will follow you like the wheel of the cart follows the oxen. Mind is the forerunner of all things. Mind is chief. Speak and act with a pure mind, and happiness will follow you like your shadow, unshakable."

This concept has entered our culture. In the Bible, you'd find it expressed as "as ye sow, so shall ye reap." It's also in the modern vernacular.

A few years ago, a friend and I were teaching a class at Juvenile Hall in San Mateo, California. We'd been invited in by a meditator who was working there as a nurse. For those unfamiliar with how the justice system works here, Juvenile Hall is where people under eighteen are held while awaiting trial—essentially a jail for minors.

We were invited to give a series of classes on meditation to the maximum security wing of Juvenile Hall. These were kids who were fourteen, fifteen, sixteen, seventeen years old, in jail awaiting trial for offenses like armed robbery, assault, murder, attempted murder. It was fairly serious stuff.

Now reflect back to when you were sixteen years old and think about how much self-knowledge you had about your emotional life. Then imagine being locked up in an environment that fostered aggression and fear, being put in a cell for almost twenty-four hours a day. What do you think your mind state would be like? These kids were climbing the walls, because they didn't know what their future was going to be. In a few weeks or months, they would come before a judge, and depending on the outcome of the trial, they could be sent away to prison for years, if not their whole life.

When we went in, we wanted to teach them basically how to work with their emotions, particularly anger and fear. So we gave them the same instructions we gave you: follow the breath. I have to say, the first time I went in and told them to follow the breath, I thought, "What am I doing here?" These guys were young, they were from the street—

They were of all different ethnic groups that exist in the Bay Area. And here were these two middle-aged white guys coming in and telling them to watch their breath. I mean, they must have thought we were nuts.

But by about the second or third class, we got on to emotions. And that they could relate to. We gave them instructions specifically on how to work with fear and how to work with anger: Feel it in the body. Feel it in the mind. Don't go to the thoughts of past and future. See if you can just hang with it. See if you can just be with that experience.

They were very motivated to practice. That really impressed me. They didn't have much else to do. We were kind of entertaining on one level. And they had a lot of free time, like you all do. You know, viewed from another angle, this is quite a prison setup here if you didn't want to be here voluntarily.

So they went back to their cells. They had a lot of spare time. And a bunch of them in this group really connected with the instructions on working with fear and anger. It brought, I think, probably the first relief they'd ever had in dealing with their emotional life.

By the sixth class, the end of this series that we were giving, we'd built up some connection. We had a sense that things were working. So I said to my friend—this is James Baraz—before we went in to that last class, "I want to teach them some sīla." And he said, "Are you sure?" And I said, "Yeah, I'd like to try it."

So I talked about the Buddha as the scientist of happiness and how he discovered that the real secret of happiness is being kind and non-harming in the world. And if we act in that way, happiness will follow. I said, "This is kind of the idea behind karma. Do you have any sense for that?"

And one of the young guys raised his hand and said, "You mean like what goes around comes around?"

I said, "That's it, that's it."

So they had it right there. And then after we left, some other meditation teacher came in and started teaching them about the loving-kindness practice, directing them to send loving-kindness to their enemy. Well, on the streets, enemy has a very real meaning. It's not just somebody you're a little irritated with. It's somebody who might be trying to kill you.

So they all had come from—a lot of them had come from—gang cultures, and they started practicing loving-kindness to the rival gangs that they were meeting on the street. At first a couple of them said, "I'm not going to do this. I'm not going to have any feeling for those guys."

And one of the gang leaders said, "Oh, but you've got to remember, they've got mothers and sisters also. You should try this."

So it was really quite touching. It was quite a connecting experience in the end.

Something about this concept that what goes around comes around has broad currency. And I think most of us have some sense of how this works. But when we get to the equanimity practice and we state it so directly, then it gets a little harder to take in.

This is from the words of the Buddha. I think you'll recognize a part of this quote:

"Beings are owners of their actions, heirs of their actions. Their actions are the womb from which they are born. Their actions are their friend, their refuge. Whatever actions they perform for good or ill, of those they will be the heirs."

Our actions are the womb from which we are born. This is a very powerful statement. And when we start thinking of it in this way—that our happiness and unhappiness really does depend on our past actions—Westerners can have a hard time relating to this. Because it goes against our ideals. We were founded on the proposition that all humans are created equal. This country was founded on that proposition.

The democratic ideal is very widespread in Western culture. I think we believe that everybody should have an equal share in happiness and unhappiness. The teaching on karma doesn't seem to support that view, and so the teaching on karma can seem cruel and kind of like a punishment—as though you're saying that because somebody did something, they deserve to be suffering.

Actually, that's not what the teaching is saying. This concept of deserving the outcome is something extra. The Buddha never talked about deserving to suffer. And I believe wholeheartedly that if he had the opportunity to pluck the suffering out of the heart of any human, he would do it immediately.

You look at his compassion toward the murderer Angulimala, who tried to kill the Buddha. Instead, the Buddha taught him to meditate, ordained him as a bhikkhu, and shepherded him to full enlightenment. Then he counseled him when afterwards Angulimala, after his enlightenment, went out to beg for food in the villages where he was known as a murderer and was stoned because of his past deeds. But the Buddha said, "Bear it, bear it, Brahman, because this is a small price to pay. Otherwise, you would have suffered a lot more for the murders that you committed."

So the Buddha was very compassionate even to people who had done many unskillful deeds. It's not that anyone, including the Buddha, wants people to suffer, but as he expressed it, this is just a law of the cosmos—just like if you cut an apple from the tree, it will fall to the ground. If we go about harming others, unhappiness will come our way. It's just a law.

Sometimes it's the fruits of action that are the hardest thing to accept in the teachings of karma. But I want to suggest that many of the fruits of action you already know about. I think we experience the fruits of our actions in at least five ways, and I want to mention each of them.

The first is in the moment when we do the action. When we do something unskillful, it doesn't feel good in the very moment that we do it. Being in retreat, you may have noticed this. If you've done something that was slightly disrespectful to anyone here, you'll immediately feel how the heart clenches and contracts and regrets that action. It's painful to hurt.

On the other hand, when you've done something generous for someone here—think about how that feels when you hold the door open for someone, when you take someone else's dishes, when you do a little extra work in your yogi job so that your work partner doesn't have to do so much. It feels great. So in the very moment of doing the act, there is a result, an outcome of it.

There's another result when we think back on our past actions, when we reflect on the things that we've done. In the metta practice, we're encouraged to reflect on the wholesome acts that we've done as a way of building up self-confidence in ourselves and as a ground for the development of metta for ourselves. So when we remember acts of generosity and acts of kindness, it brings happiness back into our hearts.

On the other hand, as we talked about a little bit this morning, often as we get quiet for the first time, the mind starts to throw up all the unskillful things we've done in our life. We remember times we hurt people, times we were unkind, times we used people, times we killed living things unconsciously without thinking, and those can torment us. We can feel a lot of remorse and guilt as those memories come to mind. So in remembering our past actions, we feel the result of them in wholesome and unwholesome ways.

Our actions in the world come back to us anytime we live in community. If you live in community with people, then the way you treat and relate to those in your community will be mirrored back to you. If you're generous and thoughtful and kind and loving, then you'll get that kind of response from the people in your community. Not everyone—there's praise and blame everywhere, and connection and disconnection. But by and large, if you are well-behaved toward others, you're welcomed and you're respected and you're sought out. On the other hand, if your relationships in your community have been characterized by anger or pride or hurtfulness from you, then people are not so apt to be as welcoming or to seek you out. So the world in different ways gives us feedback when we're living in community.

There's another way that we feel the results of our actions, which is in our states of mind—especially in looking at our habitual states of mind. So I want to ask everybody a question: When your mind moves on the cushion, what does it move to? What direction does it move to? Maybe each of us has our top three or four or five. Maybe for some it moves to restlessness. For some it moves to sleepiness. For some it moves to spaciousness. For some it moves to calm. For some to wanting.

These habitual states of mind have really been cultivated by us over years of living. The Buddha would say lifetimes. We've practiced these different states, both wholesome and unwholesome, and as we come into quietude, these are the tunes that get played in our mind.

This is also from the Majjhima Nikaya: "Bhikkhus, whatever a person frequently thinks and ponders upon, that will become the inclination of his mind. If he frequently thinks and ponders upon thoughts of sense desire, ill will, or cruelty, then his mind inclines to thoughts of sense desire, ill will, or cruelty. If she frequently thinks and ponders upon thoughts of renunciation, kindness, and compassion, then her mind inclines to thoughts of renunciation, kindness, and compassion."

That is, by directing our mind along these channels, we incline it to land there more times in the future. So again, the result of these habitual actions is to strengthen that kind of conditioning.

The final of the results is that it's said in the text that karma unfolds in the future with results that seem very mysterious to us. How does our wholesome action bring happiness in the future? That's hard to see. And yet the Buddha said that it does. He also said that we can't figure out the details. The workings of karma is one of the four things that he called imponderables. And he said that one who tried to speculate about the imponderables would go mad and experience vexation. So, please don't.

The other three that it's not wise to speculate about—in addition to the detailed workings of karma—are the range of mind of a Buddha, the beginning of things, and the power of a concentrated mind. These are things we can't figure out rationally.

So this is a really important thing to remember. How many times in your life have you been around someone who is ill and heard a friend say to them, "Oh, it must be your karma"? This is not helpful. It's really not helpful for the sick person. And it's not helpful because nobody knows that kind of thing. If we have any inclination of belief in it, it's pure speculation. We can't know whether that's karma or not. Only someone with a mind like a Buddha mind could know that.

So in this whole area of wholesome actions lead to happiness, unwholesome actions lead to unhappiness, I take it in very broad terms. I sort of trust in it in very broad terms, but I don't try to get specific. If something specific happens in my life or a friend's life, I don't know whether that's karmic or random.

The Buddha never said everything that happens is the result of past action. He never said that. In fact, he was invited to say that at one point. There's this really interesting sutta in the Samyutta where a wanderer, I think it's a wanderer from another sect, comes to the Buddha and says, "These other teachers over here, these other ascetics and Brahmins, are stating that everything that happens to one, whether it be a pleasant feeling, unpleasant feeling, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant feeling, is the result of past action. Is that true?"

And the Buddha said two things. He said, "Those teachers overstep what they know for themselves," first of all. In other words, they don't know what they're talking about. He was not one to mince words, you may have noticed. The second thing he said was they overstep what is commonly agreed in the world.

And he went on to list something like seven causes and conditions by which we experience pleasant or unpleasant feelings. He said we can experience these feelings because of medical disorders. And using the medical conditions of the time, he talked about disorders of bile, disorders of phlegm, disorders of wind, or a balance of all three. So in modern medical terminology, we could have many more than four to fill in that list.

So basically medical conditions, climate, diet, carelessness, assault—being attacked by someone can give rise to painful feelings. And he mentioned past karma. So there were a number of other conditions that he said could give rise to these feelings. And he declined to say everything that happens to us is the result of our past action.

I think I take that as a very cautionary instruction. If the Buddha wouldn't say that, far be it from us to say it. So trying to pass judgment on "this happened to that person as a result of their past action"—pure speculation. We simply don't know. We just don't know.

Now, when somebody says, "I don't believe in karma,"

When somebody says, "I don't believe in karma," I think it's usually this fifth kind of result that people are talking about. Because these four earlier results—the way an action feels in the present moment, the way it feels when we reflect on a past action, what we put out into the world and how it comes back to us in relationship, and then the habits of our own mind—I think these are mostly verifiable. I think we can know these through our direct experience.

It's this fifth kind usually that we don't know through direct experience and that causes us to question the teachings of karma. But I want to suggest that saying we don't believe in karma is too blanket a statement. Maybe where the real doubt lies is that we're skeptical about this fifth kind of result, vipāka karma.

So I suggest that in relating to this fifth teaching, you try not to form a conclusion about it tonight. Maybe tomorrow morning. Sleep on it. Sometimes I think these ideas have to settle into our hearts and abide there and get examined over years of practice before we get a sense of this teaching resonating with us or not.

If this doesn't resonate for you, if you don't really believe it, I suggest holding it with an open mind, but also not taking the stance of "I believe it's not true," because this closes us off from some potential wisdom.

Because what if it is true? How would you live your life if this is true? Well, you'd probably want to be really careful with your conduct. You'd probably want to really try and base your actions around non-harming, generosity, kindness, compassion, and live a life that is really in harmony and mutual respect with those around you. If this teaching is true.

Well, what if this teaching isn't true? That would still be a pretty good life, wouldn't it? Wouldn't that still be a life well lived and worth doing? Just from the point of view of being a trustworthy, non-harming individual on this planet, that would still be a great contribution.

This is really what the Buddha suggested in one of the suttas in the Majjhima, Sutta number 60. Either way, it just makes sense to live as though the teachings on karma were true. It benefits us and it benefits others. If they're true, it will benefit us big time. If it's not true, it will benefit us medium time. It's still worth doing.

The next area I wanted to touch on is karma and anattā. I want to lead into it with the teachings on rebirth because I think these connect.

So the Buddha clearly said that the actions of this life influence our next rebirth. In one of the key suttas on karma in the Majjhima, he spells out what kinds of actions lead to what kind of rebirth. I'm just going to hit the highlights so that you'll have heard it:

One who is pleasant with their speech will be born with pleasant appearance. One who is angry with their speech will be born with an unpleasant appearance. One who is generous in this life will be born with abundance in the next. One who is non-giving in this life will be born with a lack of abundance in the next. One who practices non-killing in this life will be born with long life in the next. One who practices killing living beings in this life will be born short-lived. One who practices non-injuring of living beings will be healthy in the next life. One who injures living beings will not be healthy. One who inquires from wise teachers will be born with wisdom in the next life. One who does not inquire will be born with a lack of understanding.

These are obviously very broad generalizations and it would be hard to make any specific conclusions from them because most of us have a mixture of these motives, a mixture of these kinds of karmic acts. But it's interesting that the actions that support the characteristic are the ones that lead to it. I'll just leave you to reflect on that a little bit.

Here's another comment of the Buddha's in regard to rebirth. When he said that karma is the womb from which we are born, he then made it even more explicit in this quote from the Saṃyutta Nikāya:

"Grain, possessions, money, all the things you love, servants, workers, and dependents, none of them can you take with you when you die. You must cast them all aside. But whatever karma is made by you, whether by body, speech, or mind, that is your real possession, and you must fare according to that karma. That karma will follow you just as the shadow follows its owner. Therefore, do good actions, gather benefit for the future. Goodness is the mainstay of beings in the hereafter."

It was one of the reasons that he said that those people do not need to fear death who have done a lot of good acts.

Now the question that comes up when we contemplate karma and its connection to rebirth is: who is it that's reborn if there is no self? Another way to ask that question is, if there's no self, then who inherits the actions?

I want to talk about this topic of karma and anattā a little bit. In another sutta in the Majjhima, the Buddha actually reads the mind of a bhikkhu in the audience who is thinking the thought, "What self then will actions performed by the not-self affect?"

So this is essentially that same question: What self inherits actions performed by the not-self? The Buddha basically said to that bhikkhu, "You haven't been listening to me."

But it does sound contradictory, doesn't it? If there's no self, then what's this continuity of karma? How does it continue?

To understand this, I think we need to look into the meaning of not-self. The first thing to say is that the concept of not-self doesn't deny our individuality. As we look around this room, there are a hundred different beings here. That difference, those individuals—there is not a denying or negating of that truth.

For instance, in the front row, there is Laura, there is Venerable Piedamo. They are not the same being. It would be very chaotic if one were to assume they were—especially chaotic if they were to assume they were! Very difficult indeed.

This understanding of our individuality is necessary for keeping the world on track. The Buddha never questioned this sense of individuality, never questioned it.

I think in looking at what makes up an individual, this is where we see the teaching on not-self. I'd like you to think about a river. If you drive forty-five minutes west of here toward Northampton, you have to cross a big river on a bridge—the Connecticut River.

If you go down to the banks of the Connecticut River and stand there, ask yourself: What is a river? The Connecticut River sounds like a big thing, a solid thing. It flows from here down into the ocean by Long Island Sound. If you look on a map, you can see it very clearly drawn. It's quite long and broad—a big geographical feature. So the Connecticut River is really something.

But if you go down and take a look at it and ask, "What is it?"—it's a little hard to figure out. I take it that the river is the body of water. It's not the banks. It's not the bed. It's not the stones in the bed. The river, I understand, is the body of water.

So what is the Connecticut River? If you look at it, is there anything constant in it? No. If what's in front of you is the Connecticut River, one minute it's there and the next minute it's gone, but something else has taken its place. There is no constancy to the Connecticut River when you actually experience it, even though it's a big geographical feature.

The individual is just like that too. There is no constancy in the individual, but everything is flowing through, flowing by the present moment.

In Tibetan Buddhism, they have this really useful concept called the mind stream. It's considered that every sentient being essentially is, in their most basic nature, a mind stream. I like this because the analogy to the river is really clear.

Our mind stream is the flow of our sense impressions, known through consciousness, and our volitional actions of thought and emotion. They're streaming by all the time. As you look closely, standing there at this moment of the now, there is nothing fixed in it. And yet there is the being. There is Laura. There is Venerable Piedamo. Each of them has their own being.

There is a continuity, just as there is a continuity to the Connecticut River, but there is nothing fixed in either of them.

So then the question arises, as we come to know them both: Where does their personality originate? But before we ask that, let's ask what we mean by personality. Personality is a very distinguishing characteristic of beings, of human beings. What is personality? Is it anything other than our habits—the way we think, the way we feel, the way we speak, and the way we act? Isn't that essentially what personality is?

You talk about somebody having a vivacious personality or a reserved personality, an outgoing personality or a very giving personality, a cool personality, a warm personality. Isn't it really just the way we think, the way we feel, the way we speak, and the way we act?

I hope this rings a bell, because these are essentially actions of mind, actions of speech, and actions of body. So I want to suggest that our personality is nothing more than our karmic patterns. Nothing more than our karmic patterns.

When you get to know somebody and discover they have a really charming personality, it starts to feel like there's something solid there. And that's the illusion. There isn't anything solid behind personality. It's just a streaming flow of these karmic actions which arise in patterns, recur in patterns, because we've practiced them, worn a groove in the mind, and our mind inclines in that direction.

So I'd say that personality is nothing more than our individual karmic patterns—built up over years of habit. Nothing else. Nothing solid there. Just the stream of habit, of karmic pattern.

It's curious. In our meditation, sometimes we touch these places of great openness, and we can feel there's really no personality in that space. Have you felt that? It's so open. It's like, where did I go? I'm not here anymore. It's just space. It's just empty space. Everything in the universe has room to live and breathe, arise and pass away. And where am I with my familiar mood and habits? Gone. Gone. Gone beyond. Not there.

But then something happens—a loud sound or a memory comes—and it's like the whole personality coagulates again. And we're back again. When we come back, one person's mind kind of forms around perhaps wanting. Somebody else's mind might form around aversion. The Dalai Lama's mind coalesces again around compassion, for example. Why? Because he's planted that seed so many times. He's practiced that over and over and over.

What we see in this way of looking is that our personality, which seems to be a self, is nothing more than a stream—a changing stream of karmic impulses. But it gives us our unique flavor, our unique expression in the world, because everybody's stream of karmic patterns is different from everybody else's. We're all unique in that. So that's what makes our individuality. But there's no solidity in it.

Yet we also know it's not that easy to change our personality. As the Buddha said: "Action makes the world go round. Action makes this generation turn. Living beings are bound by action like the chariot wheel by the pin."

Living beings are bound by action, bound by karma. We are bound to our personality by the force of the karma that we've invested in it, the volitional urges that we've put into our actions of body, speech, and mind. That's what makes us, quote, "who we are" in terms of personality.

But the beautiful thing is, nothing is fixed in that personality. Nothing is fixed because our actions can change. This is the real principle behind Dharma practice. If we didn't have the situation both of anatta and of the changeability of karma, we couldn't walk the path of practice. But because of this inherent fluidity in our makeup, we can walk the path of practice and we can transform who we are. We can transform our being.

Another way to say this is that the path itself is a karmic unfolding. The path of Dharma practice only works because of karma.

We've got this river flowing down a certain channel based on our past habits, largely influenced by greed, aversion, and delusion—let's be honest about that. Then we encounter the Buddha's teachings and begin to add a different volition. We introduce the intention of mindfulness, the intention of metta, of sila, of renunciation, of generosity, of determination, of patience, of energy. Each moment in which we add one of these wholesome intentions starts to steer the river in a different direction. We are influencing our whole karmic makeup one moment at a time by introducing the wholesome intentions of Dharma practice.

Over time, you can see the current of this river by looking at someone like His Holiness the Dalai Lama. You can see the possibility of transformation into a heart of compassion and wisdom—one moment at a time. The Dalai Lama didn't get that way by accident. He got that way through practice. According to him, seventeen lifetimes of practice. We have a few to go to catch up, but there's that possibility. One moment at a time, changing the karmic patterning. And it can eventually liberate us. Why? Because our ignorance is not fixed either. Therefore, ignorance can come to an end, along with greed, aversion, and delusion—that cousin of ignorance. This all relies on the unity of karma and anatta.

We reach a point described in the suttas as the end of karma. The Buddha said that for the arhat, the fully enlightened one, there is no more karma—that is, the arhat is no longer generating new karma. He never explains exactly why, but as I feel into this, my sense is that for the fully liberated one, there's no more personal self-interest to go in any particular direction, wholesome or unwholesome. Because the mind stream is free of greed, aversion, and delusion, actions spontaneously spring forth from wisdom and loving kindness. But there's no individual volition in that happening. It just comes forth more or less spontaneously.

So how did this happen to the arhat? This is where I want to return to the night of the Buddha's awakening. The first watch of the night was the recollection of past lives. Why then would the second watch be what it was? I think the Bodhisattva started wondering: how is it that beings appear and reappear? What is the cause and condition for that happening? He turned his divine eye and saw that beings dying and being reborn are due to their past actions. This is where the understanding of karma came from.

One can only read between the lines, but it may not be too far off to ask: what led to the Buddha's liberating insight in the third watch of the night? I want to suggest that the Buddha looked at the situation where wholesome actions lead to pleasant birth and unwholesome actions lead to painful birth—but he didn't want either. The Buddha was interested in ending birth altogether. Perhaps his reflection, his investigation was something like: what if I abandoned wholesome actions—the volition of wholesome actions—and what if I abandoned the volition of unwholesome actions? What then would happen in my meditation? I believe that was his path to full awakening, and it's the path that we also follow.

This is from the Anguttara Nikaya: "What karma is neither dark nor bright with neither dark nor bright result, which leads to the destruction of karma? It is the volition to abandon the dark karma with dark results"—that means the unwholesome—"and to abandon the bright karma with bright results"—that means the wholesome—"and to abandon the dark and bright karma with dark and bright results"—that means the mixed karma. "This is called the karma that is neither dark nor bright, with neither dark nor bright results, which leads to the end of karma."

What is karma that is neither dark nor bright that leads to the end of karma? It is this Noble Eightfold Path that is the way leading to the cessation of karma. The Eightfold Path leads to the ending of karma—the volition to abandon both wholesome and unwholesome actions.

Notice how this feels in your practice. When you're really mindful, strongly mindful of an act of grasping, what happens to that act? It stops, doesn't it? Or an act of aversion—when you're really mindful of it, it stops. Mindfulness is our direct pathway to the ending of action, the ending of volition. In this, it brings us as far as technique can bring us to a state of non-doing, a state of stopping, a state of non-fabrication—in Pali, atammayata. It leads us into a deep stillness in our being where we are no longer directing our volition in any direction.

And then out of that deep stillness, perhaps the opening to something other can come—the insight into the unconditioned and the Four Noble Truths.

Let's just sit for a minute together.

[The talk concludes with a period of silent meditation]

Through this exploration of mindfulness and the cessation of volition, we discover that our practice naturally leads us toward non-fabrication, toward that profound stillness where all directing of will comes to rest. In this space of non-doing, we find ourselves at the very threshold of wisdom, poised for the deeper insights that reveal the unconditioned nature of reality and illuminate the timeless truth of the Buddha's teaching.

This is the gift of mindfulness—not merely awareness, but the direct pathway to liberation itself, guiding us step by step from the entanglements of reactive volition into the vast freedom of awakened understanding.

CHAPTER 8

Right Attitude

Guy Armstrong · 31 min

> In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong addresses the crucial quality of right attitude in meditation practice, suggesting it may be more important than any particular technique. He explores samma-saṅkappa (right intention), the second factor of the Noble Eightfold Path, as defined in the suttas: the intention of renunciation, non-ill will, and non-cruelty.
>
> Armstrong discusses the challenge of balancing dhammachanda (fervor for the Dharma) with patience and trust, warning against both excessive striving that leads to tightness in practice and excessive looseness that lacks engagement. He presents a practical threefold approach: relax, observe, and accept, emphasizing that relaxation is the starting point, not the goal.
>
> The talk offers a simple diagnostic tool for checking one's mental attitude through three questions: Am I wanting something to happen? (greed), Am I resisting something? (aversion), Am I not knowing what's happening? (delusion). Armstrong connects this to the Buddha's teaching on the three wholesome roots: non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion, noting how Sāriputta defined nibbāna as the destruction of these same three unwholesome roots. This creates an inspiring understanding where the path and goal converge - right attitude in the present moment offers a taste of the ultimate freedom.

In many ways, discovering this quality of right attitude as you approach your meditation practice is more important than the particular meditation technique you work with or range of techniques you employ.

I want to talk this evening about this quality of right attitude—how to investigate it and learn about it in a really simple and practical way.

One of the traits of Buddhist meditation lineages is that they can lend themselves to a strong quality of striving. Throughout all the Buddhist traditions, there is this magnificent concept of enlightenment. Sometimes when people come into the actual practice, they become focused on this outcome in a rather exclusive way. This tends to dominate why we're here, why we're doing what we're doing, and influences every moment along the path. It's as though one had come in carrying a banner that says, "Enlightenment or Bust." And sometimes busting happens before enlightenment happens.

Without a certain amount of fire, the path doesn't unfold so well. So a certain amount of this quality, which we might call dhammachanda, or a fervor for the Dharma and for discovery, really needs to be there. Yet if it's not balanced with a sense of patience and trust in the unfolding, it can make us really tight in practice. And then that doesn't help the flowering so much.

I've been subject to some of this myself. Living in California, one is obligated to try other approaches from time to time. About ten years ago, I went to this psychic in San Francisco who'd gotten rave reviews from my friends. If you're in meditation circles in California, you're also in all these other circles. I went to see this guy in San Francisco named Manfred. As soon as I walked through the door—actually Sally and I went together; it was very experimental, so we felt we needed support—as soon as I walked through the door, he said, "Whoa. You're trying way too hard. Don't you know that God more likely shows himself to people who don't want him too much?"

For me, that was a very apt comment. I've had to work over the years of practice with this sense of striving or focus on the outcome, not to become fixated on the end result of practice.

On the other hand, if one lets go of that dhammachanda, that real fervor for the Dharma, then a meditation retreat can become a little too loose of a place. Here you're very much on your own a lot of the day, and someone might come into a retreat and say, "Oh, three good meals a day and a room of my own. I think I'll sleep for a week, and then if I have a single pain in my knee, I think I'll get up and leave the hall." Of course, it takes a little more determination than that to work with all the ups and downs of an intensive retreat.

Somewhere in the middle is a place where we can practice where we're really engaged and really motivated, but we're not putting extra pressure on ourselves. That kind of approach to meditation is what we're looking for in the quality of right attitude.

One Vipassana teacher summed up his approach to right attitude in three words. He said the key is to relax, observe, and accept. This is a very good reminder if you want to remember over and over the pointing of right attitude.

We begin with relaxation. Relaxation is not something that we come to after years and years of striving as a goal, but we start with relaxation. I will encourage you all—and you'll probably hear it in the instructions many times—as you begin a period of sitting or walking, see if you can find in your body and in your mind that quality of relaxation. It's not always easy, and you may not always be able to find it, but at least you can incline your practice in that direction.

One of Suzuki Roshi's early comments when he was teaching at San Francisco Zen Center was that we Westerners know how to relax our bodies, but we don't know how to relax our minds. That was one of the things his meditation was to learn about.

When we relax our body at the beginning of a sitting, it sends a strong message to our brain, to our subconscious, saying that I can relax here and now. Maybe it's through taking a few deep breaths. Maybe it's just through the sense of letting the mind fall into the body. We send the message to our whole nervous system that everything is okay, that it's safe to be calm, that nothing has to change, that things are all right just the way they are.

This is really the ground we want to have in our meditation—the sense that everything is okay the way it is. The moment is fine the way it is. This is really the basis for the quality of trust or faith. In Pali, the word is saddhā. It's the first of the five spiritual faculties.

We begin with that sense that things are okay the way they are. We remember that they may not be perfect. They may not be exalted. But they may be good enough. In fact, maybe this moment is good enough the way it is. And that means good enough is a basis for us to start meditating.

The second element of meditation in this threefold description is observe. Once we're established in relaxation, we simply want to notice what's happening. If we can notice what's happening, we're meditating.

This is the activity of waking up. In this moment, we want to be awake. This means we're not particularly trying to figure out what's happening to us. We're not thinking about the past or the future. We're not analyzing how it came about that our stomach feels a certain way this morning. We're just observing. We're simply noticing what the expression of life is in this moment.

This is the activity of mindfulness. Whether we're observing our breath, our body, emotions, sounds, passing thoughts, or visual sights is not so important. What's important is that awake quality of knowing this present moment.

The beauty of observing is that it starts to open the door to understanding. Another way to say this is that mindfulness is the entry point for wisdom. As we start to see the way things come and go, the way things arise and pass in our body, in our mind, in the external environment, and we look closely, we start to learn the laws of nature. We start to learn the laws of the Dharma. The only way to become free is to understand the way our own mind works. This quality of close observation is the first step to understanding.

In Buddhism generally, understanding is the highest value. It's only understanding that can lead to freedom and the end of suffering. This observation, the quality of mindfulness, is the direct route to understanding.

Then the third part is acceptance. This links back into relaxation and says: whatever's happening in my mind and body and in the environment right now, I accept it. I don't struggle with it. I don't fight. I'm not in conflict. I can find inner peace right here and right now through this quality of acceptance.

As you know, that's not easy to do. There are so many times that we don't want what's happening to be happening. We want something else to be happening. So we go back and forth, accepting and opening, and then it's not quite right. This is where we can watch the attitude, the play of attitude. The attitude of acceptance brings us into peace. The attitude of non-acceptance, or wanting something else, brings us into conflict, and suffering is born.

Sally and Sharda and I flew here yesterday and got in last night. Sally and I brought our cat with us. Our cat is sixteen years old and had brain surgery last year, so we didn't feel we wanted to leave her with a house sitter who didn't know her. We brought the cat, and IMS graciously offered to put her up along with us here.

I don't know if you've taken a pet on an airplane, but it's not a pleasant ordeal for the animal. We had her in a carrier, and she was squawking the whole time—going through check-in, going through security, lining up for boarding. When we got on the plane, we put her under the seat in front of us, and she just kept squawking. Once we got in the air, we took her out of the carrier, held her on our laps, and she calmed right down. She went to sleep and was very mellow for most of the journey.

Then partway across the country, probably around Chicago, a flight attendant came down the aisle and said, "I'm sorry, but FAA regulations do not allow pets to be outside of their carrier. You're going to have to put her back in her carrier right now."

I saw my mind start to go back and forth between acceptance and fighting. Acceptance and fighting. We had a few words of discussion, and then Sharda kindly picked the discussion up and took it further with her. At one point I remember Sharda saying, "So now you've told us the FAA regulation. It's up to us to make our choice."

The flight attendant said, "It is definitely not up to you to make your choice. You have to comply with the FAA regulation."

Here I'm going: Wait a minute, this doesn't make sense. She's on our lap. She's not disturbing anybody. She's really happy. She's not crying. She's going to sleep.

If we put her back in her carrier, she's going to start squawking and everybody else is going to get upset. But you know how there are some people whose mind is all about regulation, and the specific situation really doesn't matter? This was one of those people.

So in the end, I could either feel angry and upset with her, which I did, or I could feel understanding that this is the way her mind relates to regulation. And I can't argue because it's also a matter of law that you have to obey the flight attendants. So if I resist, I could be arrested in Boston, and I wouldn't be here with you tonight. I thought it's probably better if I'm with you tonight.

So we put her back in the carrier, and she squawked for the whole rest of the journey. She cried, and everybody around could hear her. In fact, a woman a few aisles back said, "Yeah, I heard your cat crying toward the end of the trip."

But for me, the interesting thing was—apart from caring about her experience—watching my mind go back and forth between resistance and judgment and understanding and compassion. Resistance and understanding. I wanted to argue, and then the other side would come up, and I just couldn't take it any further.

So often this will happen in relation to body pain or knee pain or an unpleasant emotion. We can open to it for a moment and really accept it and feel it and understand it, and then it persists and we're back in resistance. It's a very interesting place to observe: where is there suffering and where is there peace or ease? You can take a look at this on an ongoing basis.

So we start to see that we have in all our human minds a very, very deeply conditioned habit of making things right—in fact, of making things perfect in the moment because we don't want anything to be painful. This human tendency to constantly keep adjusting ourselves and the environment to make it just right is described by the Tibetans as the essence of samsara. They say the very essence of the mental movement that keeps us on the wheel—being born and dying, arising into suffering over and over and over—is the act of correcting. This is a very profound statement pointing to this movement of acceptance.

You could say that the whole of our practice is noticing this quality moment after moment after moment. So how do we correct? There are two fundamental ways, of course, which you know. One is we try to make things pleasant, and the second is we try to make the unpleasant disappear. So one expresses itself through the activity of greed or wanting things a certain way, and the flip side of that coin is wanting to push away the things that don't conform to that. The fundamental movements of liking and disliking.

If we look for the phrase "right attitude" in the teachings of the Buddha, the place it seems most closely linked to me is in the second factor of the Eightfold Path, samma sankappa. This is often translated as right thought or right intention, but I think right attitude is also a valid aspect of samma sankappa.

This is how right intention is defined in the suttas: Right intention is the intention of renunciation, of non-ill will, of non-cruelty. So take a look at this, the act of renunciation. A synonym that's often used by the Buddha is relinquishment. So renunciation and relinquishment are pointing to the same thing. It's basically, in our modern vernacular, letting go—letting go of something that we would want to hold on to. Generosity is another expression of this same movement. Generosity is a form of relinquishment or letting go also.

So the first intention is letting go of what is pleasant, appealing, lovely, desirable. The second and third aspects—non-ill will and non-cruelty—are basically the opposites of... Let me say one other thing. They're both expressions of the mind state of aversion. Non-ill will is the expression of metta. Non-cruelty is the expression of compassion. So these are basically saying metta and compassion. These sum up the intention not to react with aversion.

So the heart of right intention is not being greedy and not being aversive. Now, if you want to refine it a little more, when the Buddha talks about action and karma, he talks about the roots of what's wholesome and the roots of what's unwholesome. And he says, "What is the root of the wholesome? Non-greed is a root of the wholesome. Non-hate is a root of the wholesome. Non-delusion is a root of the wholesome."

So when you put these together, it basically restates non-greed and non-aversion and adds in non-delusion. So these three together can become the core of how we look at right attitude. And I want to suggest that there's a really simple way to apply this teaching in any moment in your meditation practice.

If you're sitting, walking, in the dining room, wherever you are, you can check your mental attitude by asking three questions: Am I wanting something to happen? Am I resisting something that's happening? Am I knowing what's happening?

The first question—am I wanting something to happen?—if the answer is yes, you've identified greed. If you're resisting something that's happening, that's aversion. If you're not knowing what's happening, that's delusion.

When any of these three are present, our mind is not in the optimal attitude for meditation. It becomes fascinating to explore these qualities of greed, aversion, and delusion in an ongoing way. Keep it simple: Do I want something to happen? Am I resisting something? Am I not knowing what's happening?

Transition times in retreats offer particularly rich opportunities to observe these formations. As you enter the dining room tonight, those of you continuing might notice thoughts like: "It's really getting crowded in here," or "Why are these new people so noisy?" Perhaps: "Why didn't they serve tonight what they served last night?" or "The room's too hot or too cold." These are subtle—or not so subtle—movements of liking and disliking.

For those just arriving, many thoughts typically activate when entering a new retreat situation: Where's my room? Is it in a quiet part of the building, or am I right next to the stairs or showers? What's the schedule? Is there enough time after the work period for a shower before morning sitting? Is there anybody interesting on this retreat? What's my yogi job—do I like it or not?

All these questions revolve around: Is this new place going to be okay for me? Am I going to be safe here? Will I find my way? There's plenty of opportunity for liking and disliking. When we don't notice these movements, we're missing what's happening—and delusion is present.

If we're not knowing what's happening, we can return to the present moment quickly. Simply notice something occurring—a breath, sound, sensation, emotion, thought, or visual sight. Just notice what's happening, and you're back in touch with the present moment.

If you notice greed, see if it can be released and move into acceptance. If you notice aversion, see if it can be released and move into acceptance. Sometimes it can, sometimes it can't. But be aware that when the mind is caught in reactive formations, meditation won't be as clear as it could be—the mind is clouded by that reactivity.

For experienced practitioners, desires and aversions become more subtle, often relating to meditation itself. There's longing to repeat a particularly still and present sitting, yearning for states of concentration or the absence of thought. You can feel this in your body—it can't settle in a relaxed way to the present moment because there's straining for something else.

You may not even know what it is, but you can feel the body lifting up, moving toward something else—often a memory of some beautiful meditation state, peace, love, or rapture we want to experience again. We learn to tune into the movement of greed even as it relates to these refined states we touch.

It's worth remembering what one teacher said: we're not practicing to try to stop thinking. First, because it's impossible.

We can't do it, so that will be frustrating. But we're practicing so that we know our thoughts when they're there. Oftentimes, part of the striving in meditation is we want to stop thoughts from coming because we love peace. But now we're clinging. We're attached. We're trying to recreate something. So we need to accept just the way things are. If they're thoughts, what are they? Observe the thoughts just as easily as you would observe the breath.

But suppose I look and I'm not wanting something particular to happen. I'm not resisting what's happening, and I'm in touch with what's happening in the present moment. This is the expression of non-greed, non-hatred, non-delusion. This is the expression of a very wholesome state of mind, and it's from this wholesome, clear, unbiased view that we can best see things the way they are, the way things really happen in our experience.

One teacher described this kind of right attitude as an unentangled knowing. This is really what we're trying to set the conditions to unfold. And this is where the persistent looking at right attitude will lead you. As you examine the movements of wanting, of not wanting, of delusion, you'll find that they will be refined. They will diminish and sometimes fall away by that very examination.

And so start to notice when you're in this place where the three are not present, and there truly is non-greed, non-hatred, non-delusion. This experience is a kind of balance, a kind of contentment, and a clarity—an unentangled knowing. And then this can become more the reference point that the mind will guide itself back to again and again, a very fertile ground for insight.

Sariputta, one of the Buddha's chief disciples, was once asked, "What is nibbana?" He answered that it is the destruction of greed, the destruction of hatred, and the destruction of delusion. This is called nibbana.

So I hope you notice that this is very close to the description of right attitude. The absence of greed, although not yet completely destroyed, the absence of hatred, and the absence of delusion, even though they're temporary, comes very close to the description of nibbana. So what this says to me is that this right attitude, as we start to find it in our meditation experience, and it's never so far away, it's never that remote, starts to resemble very closely the very goal of the path that we're walking.

So we don't have to wait for 100,000 lifetimes down the road to get a sense of non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion. We can find it now in this quality of right attitude, and it gives us a little bit of a taste of the very end of the path. For me, this becomes a really inspiring way to look at practice because the path and the goal start to merge. What I am heading for is not so different than the way I'm walking. The goal comes closer, the path rises to meet it, and we can abide in this kind of contentment and fulfillment, at least temporarily.

So this is really what I wanted to say this evening on the subject of right attitude. You'll hear us talk a lot more about it as we go through the retreat. For now, I would encourage you to take up this investigation as something you direct the mind to regularly. I encourage you to look regularly at the presence of greed, aversion, or delusion, or the presence of non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion. And this will itself be the way to refine and develop the quality of right attitude.

So we'll touch base with you in the first couple of days. This means everyone needs to check the interview schedule tomorrow morning. During tomorrow's sitting, we'll describe where the interview rooms are located so you'll know where to find us.

For this evening, we have a walking period now, followed by our final sitting at 9:15. Since people are continuing their practice, we'll maintain that sitting this evening with chanting—the sharing of the blessings. Andrea will lead that sitting and the chanting of the sharing of the blessings.

If you've just arrived and your body is tired, you have full permission to skip that sitting tonight. Begin fresh tomorrow morning with the 5 o'clock wake-up and 5:30 sitting. We look forward to seeing you at the first sitting after breakfast.

Please rest well. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 9

First Noble Truth: Dukkha

Guy Armstrong · 55 min

> In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong offers a deep exploration of the First Noble Truth based on the Buddha's foundational teaching in the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta (SN 56.11). Armstrong examines the Pali term dukkha—often translated as suffering but encompassing a broader range from intense pain to subtle unsatisfactoriness—and its universal, impersonal nature that connects us to all beings.
>
> The talk explores the three types of dukkha: dukkha-dukkha (direct pain), viparinama-dukkha (suffering of change), and sankhara-dukkha (unsatisfactoriness of conditioned phenomena). Armstrong emphasizes how understanding suffering as a noble truth is ennobling rather than depressing, fostering compassion and wisdom rather than despair. He discusses the Buddha's injunction that this truth "is to be fully understood" and offers practical guidance on relating to suffering without being overwhelmed by it.
>
> Through personal anecdotes, poetry, and classical references, Armstrong shows how suffering can become a training ground for the paramis (perfections) when met with equanimity and investigative interest. The talk concludes with the promise that wisdom—not force of will—reveals the path to suffering's end.

The talk tonight is on suffering and the cause of suffering. You may recognize this is an abridgment of the Four Noble Truths, focusing only on the unhappy parts. So prepare yourselves. But even once when I was about to give a Four Noble Truths talk here, someone in the staff room said to me, "Do you really want to talk about that? We've really heard quite a lot about dukkha already in this retreat." But hey, that's what being in a Theravadan center is all about. So I hope you'll feel right at home.

The Buddha said at one point that the realization of the Four Noble Truths is accompanied only by happiness and joy. So I hope that will be your experience tonight.

I'm sure you all have heard the story of the Buddha's awakening under the Bodhi tree near the town of Gaya. How he thought of not teaching, but was urged to do so by a Brahma who descended and said there are beings who will understand. How he then traveled across a couple of hundred miles of northern India to find five friends he had practiced with before in his ascetic period—called the group of five bhikkhus in the discourses—and located them in the deer park in Sarnath near Benares, then approached them and delivered his first Dharma discourse to them. And in that discourse he laid out the basic teaching on the Four Noble Truths.

So the talk tonight is primarily based on his first discourse called the Dhamma-cakkappavattana Sutta, which translates as "Setting in Motion the Wheel of the Dhamma." This wheel that he established almost 2,600 years ago is still transforming beings' lives even today. The rest of his 45 years of teachings until he was 80 were really just an amplification of this first talk, sort of like footnotes to this talk.

You may also remember that famous sutta of the handful of leaves, where the Buddha said, "Which is greater, O monks, the handful of leaves that I've collected in my hand or the leaves in the trees in the forest around us?" And the monks, being no simpletons, said, "Well, of course, the handful of leaves is not nearly as big as the leaves in all the forest." But what you may not know is that he went on to say in that discourse, "Just so is what I have shared with you. It is very small compared to all the things I know by direct knowledge, but what I have shared with you is enough for you to gain complete liberation, and what I have shared with you—what you are to understand—are the Four Noble Truths." So he again reiterated that as the essence of the handful of leaves that his teaching had disclosed.

I'll just mention the Four Noble Truths briefly as a way of review. The first is the truth of suffering. The second is the truth that the origin of suffering is craving. The third is the truth that the end of suffering is in the end of craving. And the fourth is that the way to the end of suffering is through the Noble Eightfold Path.

So I want to talk tonight about these first two noble truths.

What distinguishes the Buddha from simply a philosopher is that in addition to the insights of the Four Noble Truths as just outlined, he added to each one an injunction, a direction, a command, so that it was not sufficient just to hear the teachings. With each of the Four Noble Truths, there was a suggestion or a prescription that those listening needed to carry out. So from the very first days of his sasana, of his teaching, the Buddha was not simply philosophizing. He was directing people how to walk the path to liberation. So I'll talk about the injunctions or prescriptions as well as we go through these Four Noble Truths.

The way he expressed the first truth is like this: "This is the noble truth of suffering. Birth is suffering, aging is suffering, illness is suffering, death is suffering. Sorrow, lamenting, pain, grief, and despair are suffering. Association with what is displeasing is suffering. Separation from what is pleasing is suffering. Not getting what one wants is suffering. In brief, the five aggregates affected by clinging are suffering."

This truth is sometimes represented, especially in the non-Buddhist world, as "Oh, the Buddha taught that life is suffering" or that "everything is suffering." And it casts a kind of gloomy pall around the notion of Buddhism. But this is not what the Buddha is saying and it's not implicit in this statement. It's not what he meant either, I don't believe.

The word, of course, that he was using throughout the Four Noble Truths, which we translate usually by "suffering," is the Pali word dukkha. But no English word is adequate to translate the range of meanings that are implicit within the Pali word dukkha. I'm going to use "suffering" as the primary translation as we go through the talk, but please be aware that it's not a very good translation, but it's such a common translation that it is the one I'll use.

Dukkha has a whole range of meanings from the most intense kind of pain imaginable, which usually carries a strong experience of suffering, down to very subtle levels of unsatisfactoriness or unreliability. And the basic sense is that this world, as available through our six senses, is not capable of providing a lasting satisfaction. So you could say that maybe the best general translation for dukkha is "incapable of satisfying." But that's kind of cumbersome. So we shorten it down to this term, "suffering." But it ranges from intense experiences of unhappiness to very subtle experiences of lack of fulfillment.

Some of the other translations that have been used that you'll read in different texts translated into English are unsatisfactoriness, unhappiness, unreliability, stress, anguish. All of these convey facets of the meaning of dukkha. But when you come to any specific passage, it's helpful to try to understand which aspect or which nuance of the meaning the passage is particularly pointing to. Because some passages will point to direct experiences of pain, others will point to the more subtle manifestations of unreliability.

Overall, you can take this teaching on the First Noble Truth...

as pointing to a kind of lack, or you could say a lack of fulfillment, that is universal in the way that as humans we live our life until we undergo the training that leads to freedom.

There is a universal sense of insufficiency, of feeling that something is missing. There is not a general and constant pervasive sense of contentment throughout the human world, as you may have noticed. Even if we have everything externally—which so often these days we have in this Western paradise that technology has helped to give us—it seems that the basic level of unhappiness is perhaps even increasing in our world.

But it also doesn't mean that everything is miserable. There are people whose lives are basically happy, who have, I would say, a great deal of happiness and even contentment in their lives, ordinary people, untrained. But even for such people, where there's a baseline of happiness and contentment, there are good days and bad days. There are pleasurable experiences and unpleasurable experiences. There are times of frustration as well as times of contentment. But this pointing to an essential lack of fulfillment, I think, is a good way to remember the essence of this truth.

One of the things I appreciate a lot in the way the Buddha phrased his teaching on the First Noble Truth is how universal it is. You know, if he had come along and said, "basically, life really sucks," a lot of people would have just turned off and gone to hear somebody else, probably in California, who was painting a much rosier view of the human condition. But everything that he says, it's hard to disagree with. Birth, aging, illness, death, sorrow, and pain are all suffering. We can all relate to that. The association with what we don't like and the separation from what we like and not getting what we want—these are things that everyone can relate to as happening regularly in our lives.

The other thing that I appreciate is that in its universality, it's also very impersonal. It doesn't say, "I am suffering" or "you are suffering" or "you should realize how much you're suffering, guys." It doesn't say it that way. And when you think about it, if we take it that way, that has a really different feeling.

How often in our minds do we kind of take it that way? "Oh, I really have a lot of suffering in my life. I have a problem in this part of my life. I've had this very painful pattern of emotion in my psychology for years and years. I don't know what I'm going to do about it. I don't know when I will get rid of it." These are the kind of thoughts that tend to spin out when we phrase this as "I am suffering."

It's a very different feeling when we step back and we take a look at the universality of suffering as a noble truth. When we go on in the vein of "I am suffering," does it feel very noble to you? It generally doesn't to me. When my mind runs in those directions, it feels lowering. I feel weighted down by the burden of those kinds of thoughts. It's not uplifting. It doesn't elevate me and it doesn't give me dignity.

But when we see it as this universal psychological condition that all human beings are subject to, that to me is more what our friend Stephen Batchelor calls ennobling. That becomes an ennobling truth.

Why? For a few reasons. Number one, if we don't take our own difficulties so personally, then we might be able to accept them more easily. When we realize that what we're struggling with is part of the universal human condition, well, maybe it's not so much our fault. Maybe it doesn't invalidate us as a person.

Secondly, it can help connect us to everyone else that we meet. In this culture, we tend to put kind of a premium on being upbeat and happy and putting on a smiling face in public. And sometimes we are taken in or forget to look under the surface of the cultural appearance to recognize that everybody is dealing with these same issues of birth and aging and illness and death and being separated from what is pleasing.

When we start to go a little deeper for this universal human condition of unsatisfactoriness, then we can start to connect also with everyone we meet, knowing that somehow we're in the same boat with them. And then this kind of connectedness is the doorway to awakening compassion.

I think this is one of the great benefits of the brahmavihara practices. As we go through the phrases in either metta or compassion, we realize we all share the same deep wishes and we all have the same deep struggles in achieving them. And the brahmaviharas serve then as a way of uniting us in the human family, of allowing our compassion, our goodwill to flow out.

Sometimes the sense that "I am suffering" and the claiming it is ours has just the opposite effect. It can feel quite isolating, as though we have to be ashamed of the pain that we feel. We can't expose it and we can't share it with anyone else.

There's a lovely poem by Naomi Shihab Nye that expresses this connection. It's called "Kindness." "Before you know what kindness really is, you must lose things."

Feel the future dissolve in a moment like salt in a weakened broth. What you held in your hand, what you counted and carefully saved—all this must go, so you know how desolate the landscape can be between the regions of kindness.

Before you learn the tender gravity of kindness, you must travel where the Indian in a white poncho lies dead by the side of the road. You must see how this could be you—how he too was someone who journeyed through the night with plans, and the simple breath that kept him alive.

Before you know kindness as the deepest thing inside, you must know sorrow as the other deepest thing. You must wake up with sorrow. You must speak to it till your voice catches the thread of all sorrows, and you see the size of the cloth.

Then it is only kindness that makes sense anymore. Only kindness that ties your shoes and sends you out into the day to mail letters and purchase bread. Only kindness that raises its head from the crowd of the world to say, "It is I you have been looking for," and then goes with you everywhere like a shadow or a friend.

The line I most appreciate in this poem is where she says, "You must speak to sorrow till your voice catches the thread of all sorrows and you see the size of the cloth." The size of the cloth is vast—universal. It includes all sentient beings, all subject to the first noble truth of dukkha.

As we start to explore the kinds of suffering we encounter—and meditation practice is the only way I know of to plumb the depths of this kind of seeing—we come upon three types that the Buddha described. The first is dukkha-dukkha. Can you guess what that is? It's like a double hit—the immediate pain of existence.

The second is viparinama-dukkha, the pain of alternation. We may have pleasurable circumstances for a while, but when they change, we feel the loss and separation, the pain of change.

The third is called sankhara-dukkha—the unsatisfactoriness of conditioned phenomena.

Dukkha-dukkha is helpful to reflect upon from time to time, recognizing it as an integral part of our world. The experiences of illness and death are clearly, for most of us, going to feel like dukkha-dukkha. When we look around the world and think of the wars and conflicts going on—the genocide and torture in places like Iraq, Afghanistan, Darfur, Tibet—we see big eruptions of this kind of intense suffering.

Even in our own society, where there is not a time of war, if you really start to listen to the stories of the people you meet, you'll find instances not so far from our own lives—murder, rape, racism, and abuse of children happening in our own communities, all around us.

Living in our fairly privileged lives, as I think most of us do, we are still subject to various kinds of dukkha-dukkha. Sally and I were leading a class a few years ago of senior students who had been practicing for some time and were materially reasonably comfortable. We had been working together for months, if not years. One evening, I asked the group to talk about the pain in their own individual lives.

They spoke of a sense of isolation and lack of connection with others. They talked about still dealing with their afflictive emotions—depression, sadness, anger, anxiety. They shared about feeling pressures in their work life, the struggle to make ends meet, and fears of inadequacy or not performing well enough. Because this was a group partly of our generation, they were already feeling the effects of aging. Everyone knew the impact of illness.

Again, probably because of our age, there was much discussion of aging parents losing their capacities and declining physically and mentally—which, as you know, is a very sad thing to witness in people you're close to. These were common experiences for people even in this fairly select circle of practitioners.

Viparinama-dukkha, the pain of alternation or change, is something we're all subject to. We enjoy pleasurable conditions or experiences, and when they change, we tend to feel their loss. If there's been even the slightest inclination of grasping—even the slightest—then there will be at least some pain or friction when change happens.

Ajahn Chah compared this alternation of pain and pleasure to a poisonous snake. He said, "If you grab the head of a poisonous snake, it will bite you right away—that's dukkha-dukkha. But if you grab hold of the tail, which is the non-painful end, and you hold on, eventually the head will swing around and bite you too—that's viparinama-dukkha." So the lesson is: don't grab. It's not easy to do.

The third type of dukkha the Buddha discussed is sankhara-dukkha, the unsatisfactoriness of conditioned phenomena. Conditioned phenomena are unsatisfactory because they are unstable—all unstable. Every state that is put together from prior causes and conditions is falling apart.

It's not like viparinama dukkha where we see that something will fall apart at some time in the future. With the insight of sankara dukkha, we bring concentrated attention to our moment-to-moment experience and see that every mind state and every physical sensation and every external sense impression is arising and passing over and over again, moment after moment after moment. When we come into that level of seeing, we truly see the unreliability of conditioned phenomena.

We had the opportunity a few years ago in California to hear the Dalai Lama. Sally and I were there. I think Sharda was there too. He was outdoors in the Shoreline Amphitheater in Mountain View—a place that Led Zeppelin might have played twenty years ago. It's a huge stage. If Led Zeppelin had been there, it would have been full of their speakers. But on this day, the backdrop to the stage was a huge painting. It was like the whole stage was a painting of the Potala Palace, where the Dalai Lama used to live in Lhasa, painted in the colors of sunset. Purple and orange colors streaked the sky and reflected off the windows of the painted Potala Palace.

The Dalai Lama sat on a big throne, projected over large screen televisions so that everybody—there were several thousand people in the seats and on the grass amphitheater—could see him. It was a very wonderful feeling. It was kind of like being at a Dharma Woodstock. That's what it felt like—a festival atmosphere. Being with the Dalai Lama for three days, he was teaching on the subject of emptiness from the Heart Sutra.

What he said about these three kinds of dukkha is that each takes an increasing subtlety of attention to see and understand. Everyone can be aware of dukkha dukkha, the suffering of pain. With a little bit of thought and reflection and examination of experience, one comes to understand that even pleasurable experiences come to an end, but that takes some investigation and reflection. And then it's only with the very subtle attention of a concentrated mind that can see the moment-to-moment arising and passing that we really deeply understand the unreliability of all conditioned things. This is how the Dalai Lama explained it also. He said that if you really want to help people in this world completely become free of their suffering, you need to understand these three levels completely yourself. Only then will you be able to help others release their bondage from these forms of dukkha.

This is a quote from the Pali Canon. It's put in the mouth of a Brahma who is one of the higher gods, but it expresses a dharmic teaching: "Having seen form's flaw, its chronic trembling, the wise do not cling to form." Sankara dukkha is a pointer to this trembling within form—that moment by moment things are not stable, even for one moment, but they're constantly being created and dissolving, being created and dissolving. Thus the wise do not cling to form.

Our problem, of course, is that we don't really see dukkha in this way. We're blinded by very deep conditioned tendencies. We have very strongly built-in biases that seek the possibility of happiness in the world, the possibility of permanence, and a self, when in fact, as you all know, the things of the world aren't capable of satisfying. They are impermanent, and they do not constitute a self. But our conditioned nature is such that we keep looking for lasting happiness, permanence, and self. It's a form of ignorance that is clouding our understanding.

So we approach spiritual practice with the same attitude that we've approached our worldly life by and large. We are all intelligent enough to have understood that lasting happiness doesn't come from external things. But when we come into the spiritual world, we tend to think that true happiness may be found in lasting spiritual things. This is certainly true for me, and I see it still in my tendency when I'm not looking closely.

I keep thinking that if I just get my attention right and my posture right and my concentration right and my intention right, I'm going to be able to sort everything out. I'm going to find this nice plateau of peace and concentration and openness and metta, and then I'm just going to be able to hang there—for six weeks at least, hopefully the rest of my life, but six weeks would be a good start. Then every time it doesn't happen that way, I feel like I've blown it. I've got to go back and set those conditions better.

So I find in myself this tendency to look to land somewhere in some meditative state that's going to be ongoing. And meditative states are also part of compounded phenomena. Until you realize the unconditioned, meditative states before that are all put together by prior conditions. Just as they were put together, they will also fall apart.

We not only keep wanting things out in the world, but we bring this same attitude into our meditation practice, continually wanting things to unfold in a certain way.

Now, it is definitely true that there are skillful attitudes to cultivate, skillful states of mind to develop in dharma practice. And it does happen that these skillful attitudes and states of mind tend to feel better than the unskillful ones. So do you see the dilemma here?

We do want to cultivate the factors of the Eightfold Path, the seven factors of enlightenment. The factors of the Eightfold Path and the seven factors of enlightenment do feel better than their opposites. So the question becomes: are you cultivating them out of desire for pleasant experience, or are you cultivating them out of wisdom, knowing that they lead toward liberation?

This is an interesting exploration I'll return to later. But it's worth keeping an eye on this tendency.

Life throughout—both worldly and spiritual—doesn't offer cozy plateaus. It is changeable, raw, vivid, and often intense. This tends to be our experience here in practice as well as outside.

But this changeable quality, while initially disappointing, works to our benefit in the long run. I came upon a passage in the Samyutta Nikaya that caused me to ponder for some time. The Buddha says, essentially—I'm paraphrasing—if there were one speck of permanent form as big as my fingernail, then the holy life lived for the purpose of liberation would not be possible.

In other words, if there were even this small amount of permanence in the universe, it would gum up the works. We would not be able to transform our minds from their current state, clouded by ignorance, into a state of full enlightenment. It is only due to the impermanent and essentially empty nature of our own being that we are able to make this transformation.

Suffering is not stuck either.

What was the injunction that goes with the first noble truth? The Buddha said: "This noble truth of suffering is to be fully understood." This is the prescription for the first noble truth—it is to be fully understood.

Part of the implication is that we don't understand it now. Even after listening to this discourse, you probably do not fully understand the first noble truth. And I have to admit, I don't either.

What does it mean that we don't fully understand it now? As a practice direction, this is a wonderful instruction. To fully understand this truth, we need to keep applying it over and over in our experience until we understand its depth. We can use it as a frame to bring in again and again, looking at the way our experience unfolds.

Ajahn Sumedho said that in his own practice, he used the Four Noble Truths as his primary practice orientation throughout all the years of his development. He would bring them in and apply them, checking them out in each situation he found himself in. He calls this "a lifetime's practice"—the understanding and application of the first noble truth.

Let's talk about some of the ways we don't see it. When we're experiencing difficulty, how often do we recognize it as the first noble truth revealing itself? Is this the first thought that comes to mind? How often do we think instead, "Oh, I've screwed up again. It's my suffering coming to the fore"?

So often we see it as: there's something wrong with me, there's something wrong with somebody else, or there's something wrong with the world. The world includes this retreat center, the facility, the food, the weather, and so forth.

Notice that because we don't like to see the truth of dukkha, we have many ways of missing the point. We might deny to ourselves that it's happening: "Oh no, this isn't pain. This isn't as bad as yesterday anyway." Or we could judge ourselves: "Oh, you just did something wrong. It's your fault that there's pain now."

Because the noble truths encourage us to take responsibility for suffering and the end of suffering, one can get the impression from the Buddha's teachings that we are at fault if we're suffering. This is quite interesting. There's also a sutta where a questioner asks the Buddha, "Am I the cause of my own suffering?" I was very surprised to read that the Buddha said no. I found this very liberating.

Then the questioner continued: "Was another the cause of my suffering?"

And the Buddha said no.

And he said, well, how is it then? And the Buddha went through the chain of dependent origination: When ignorance is present as a condition, karmic formations arise. With karmic formations as a condition, consciousness arises, and so on—a sequence of twelve steps that ends in suffering. We'll probably talk about it more later.

The interesting thing to me that has made me reflect a lot is that the first step in that chain leading to suffering is ignorance. So I want to ask each of you: Did you put your ignorance there? Did you ever remember knowingly creating it? Was there an enlightened mind to start with, but you slid ignorance into the picture to cover it? No.

In fact, the Buddha said that a beginning for ignorance cannot be discerned—that we have been traveling this round since beginningless time. So if we're not responsible for ignorance, and ignorance is the primary source of our suffering, how can we ultimately say it's our fault?

This may sound abstract, but the more I came to see ignorance as the fundamental problem in my relationship to life, the less I had to say, "Oh, I made that happen." I saw that all the mistakes and blunders I'd made in life, all the suffering I'd caused, was based on that ignorance—stemmed from that ignorance. So the judgment of ourselves is off the mark of the noble truths. Many, many causes and conditions have led to the situation we find ourselves in.

Similarly, if we try to escape from the experience of pain by blaming others, we're also missing the point of the First Noble Truth. You can blame other people all day long for your suffering—does it ever alleviate it? It hasn't for me. It can keep us stuck in a resentful or blaming attitude, but it doesn't seem to lift the suffering.

So can we, when we're in difficulty, if we see a tendency to blame ourselves or blame others or blame the world, just stop for a moment and say, "Oh, this is a form of dukkha. This is the First Noble Truth." And then we might inquire a little more into it: "What is the real source of this dukkha?" But being able to name it as dukkha in its universal quality, being able to see it as one more instance of the First Noble Truth, is the beginning of this kind of insight where the noble truth of dukkha comes to be fully understood moment by moment.

Now, there's another point I want to make in relation to dukkha that is kind of delicate about opening to the First Noble Truth. As I've said, it's not an easy truth to be with. We have a built-in bias not to see it. It's part of the Buddha's teaching that goes against the stream.

If we don't stay in touch with this noble truth, then what are called vipalasa—our illusory way of perceiving the world—will lead us to believe that there is permanence, lasting happiness, and a self. We will project into the future this safe and cozy plateau, whether it be through external things or through internal meditative states, and we will aim our lives into the future to land there. So we put our happiness into the future based on an illusory wish. Clearly, this is misleading and involves us in more delusion.

But the other thing is that if we start to dwell on the concept of dukkha a lot, we can start to see the whole world in terms of dukkha. Then we really start to feel that gloom that's sometimes attributed to Buddhism, and we think, "Oh my God, everything is dukkha. Life is dukkha. My life is dukkha. My friend's life is dukkha. Everybody's life is dukkha."

But the problem with this is we have taken an insight and converted it into a belief. We are not seeing the true nature of things moment by moment. We've taken one experience, held onto that as a generalized view of the world, and then stapled it everywhere: "It's like that, it's like that, it's like that, it's like that." Basically what we're doing is clinging to a view. But when an insight is turned into a view, it's no longer true. An insight needs to be of how things are here and now.

If we form a view about the world as being dukkha, then that covers over the living reality. Because there are many, many moments in the day when there is not—I'll say it—when there is not dukkha. Generally, these moments slip by us, and we don't notice those either. But I'll talk about this when we get to the Third Noble Truth at another time.

So the intention of the First Noble Truth is not so that you'll get gloomy and develop an aversion about life.

That's not the point, and it's a misapplication—it's converting a truth into a view.

The Buddha expressed this beautifully: "A practitioner is not overwhelmed by suffering and does not overwhelm himself with suffering. She does not give up the pleasure that accords with Dhamma, yet she is not infatuated with that pleasure." Many of the suttas that speak of developing the factors of enlightenment and cultivating the higher qualities of the path describe aspects of happiness, joy, and rapture as integral to the path's evolution.

To understand suffering, it doesn't work to be overwhelmed by it. We have to be able to—Ajahn Sumedho likes this phrase—stand under it. That means we must support it on our own shoulders while standing upright. We have to hold it, or as he says, embrace it, accept it. In order to understand suffering, we must allow it to be in our lives just as it is while remaining upright, dignified, and ennobled.

So how can we do that? Let me ask you: has suffering ever been useful in your practice? Have you ever learned anything? Has it ever opened qualities of heart or mind? What have you found through connecting with suffering?

"Compassion," someone responds. Yes, suffering is said to be the proximate cause of compassion. What else?

"Empathy—being able to feel another's suffering from feeling and opening to our own." Indeed. "Impermanence—investigation of suffering leads to seeing impermanence, so wisdom is cultivated."

"Appreciation." How so? "Experiencing the suffering can really make us experience the times that are free from that suffering." Exactly—appreciation, patience, strength, confidence. I can bear this. I can understand it. I can work with it.

In many ways, suffering becomes a training ground for the paramis. We grow, develop, and open through a wise relationship to suffering. But it depends on us not being overwhelmed by it. We must find that inner strength that lets us maintain our balance while relating to it, understanding it, feeling it, coming into contact with it. This is truly the power of equanimity—when present, it gives us the strength to learn from suffering.

I always enjoy seeing Morgan Freeman in movies. I recently read about his life story. He was born in 1937, so he turned seventy this year, and he grew up in Mississippi. Being an African-American young man in Mississippi through the thirties, forties, and fifties would not have been a primarily happy experience. And yet when you look at his character today, I feel an incredible amount of dignity and self-respect in his bearing. He was chosen in two different movies to play the character of God—quite a testament to his character.

Sally and I were in New York last fall and went to a Broadway show—Spamalot, which was not particularly dignified but a lot of fun. When we came out of the theater around eleven o'clock, there was Morgan Freeman walking down the sidewalk toward us with a woman, dressed in a black wool overcoat. He looked just like a character from his movies—tall and dignified—and you could see the crowd of people parting in advance of his wake. He has a wonderful bearing and character, and I believe much of that was learned through dealing with the adverse circumstances of growing up as a black man in a racist culture.

There are many things we can learn from suffering when we can bear it, when we are not overwhelmed by it—but we need to see it clearly, moment after moment.

One of the ways we know we haven't fully understood dukkha is that we keep chasing things. If we really understood dukkha and the true meaning of impermanence—the thoroughgoing nature of impermanence—we wouldn't chase material things, we wouldn't chase people, and we wouldn't chase meditation experiences.

So to the extent that we still chase these things, those are signs that we have a way to go in the full understanding of dukkha.

Along these lines of the ennobling quality of dukkha, Ajahn Chah offered this reflection, which you've probably heard before: "There is suffering that leads to more suffering, and there is suffering that leads to the end of suffering."

What makes the difference between these two? We see so much suffering in the world that seems to lead only to more suffering—this spiral of violence and unhappiness and endless pursuit of materialism. So what kind of suffering leads to the end of suffering? Or better, what quality of mind can transform suffering toward its end?

One aspect is this base of equanimity—we must be strong enough to bear it. The other is interest. If we cultivate an interest to learn from suffering, this brings in a profoundly wholesome factor of mind. This investigative quality is the second of the enlightenment factors. The first is mindfulness, which gets us there and puts us in touch with what's happening. The second is that we want to investigate how that suffering is arising, how it's being sustained, and how it can be ended.

If we get interested in suffering, this becomes the turning point that starts to lead us toward using it for the end of suffering. We have abundant opportunities during this retreat to see this, as I'm sure you've noticed.

That simple practice of turning attention to the attitude of mind—seeing if there's wanting, seeing if there's not wanting, seeing if there's delusion—these are pointers to conflict, to struggle, to having an agenda. They point to some way we may be in conflict with our situation and therefore experiencing some degree of suffering, either gross or subtle.

If we can take that opportunity to learn what leads to suffering—how it gets created, how it can be released, and how it can be ended—that's the investigation we're here for.

I heard a teacher giving a dharma talk recently who said, "Changing the conditions that lead to suffering is what our practice is about. There is no other practice than this."

It's only through our own wisdom that we can change those conditions—not through force of will. Wisdom alone can change those conditions. We have to look, investigate, attend, be interested, be curious, until the wisdom itself reveals to us suffering, its cause, and its end. If we are patient and stay with that experience, knowing it as the First Noble Truth, the wisdom will reveal this to us. The wisdom will unfold the way out.

I didn't get to the cause of suffering tonight—we're halfway there. We'll explore that another evening. But I want to end with the Buddha's formulation of the Third Noble Truth from this same discourse, just to point toward the direction of the teaching.

This is what the Buddha said about the Third Noble Truth: "This is the noble truth of the end of suffering: it is the remainderless fading away and cessation of craving, the giving up and relinquishment of it, freedom from it, non-reliance on it. That is the end of suffering."

Let's just sit for a minute together.

CHAPTER 10

Working With Difficult Emotions

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

> In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong explores the third foundation of mindfulness from the Satipatthāna Sutta (MN 10) - contemplation of citta (mind-heart). He addresses how meditation practice involves understanding the full range of mental states, both difficult and beautiful, rather than trying to eliminate painful emotions. Armstrong discusses four primary difficult emotions - sadness (connected to pleasant past experiences), anger (linked to unpleasant past), desire (wanting pleasant future), and fear (anticipating unpleasant future) - and their relationship to time. Drawing on personal retreat experiences and wisdom from teachers like Pema Chödrön and the Dalai Lama, he offers practical guidance for working with emotions through three steps: recognizing what we're feeling, feeling it in the body, and understanding the storylines that sustain emotional states. The talk emphasizes that transformation comes not from getting rid of difficult states, but from developing equanimity and wisdom in relationship to them, allowing us to 'wake up in the middle of difficulties' rather than after they're gone.

You've probably tuned into the fact by now that meditation is basically all about the mind. The body is important. The five senses are important. They're a good basis for mindfulness, and it's important to understand how we suffer in relation to hanging on to them. But really what we're here to do is learn about the mind, because it's in the mind that we suffer through difficult states—states like fear and anger, embarrassment and humiliation, loneliness and despair. And it's through the mind that we also find the beautiful states, the skillful states of mind, which is how we become liberated: states like mindfulness and wisdom, compassion, joy, contentment, and love.

So fundamentally, what we're here for is to understand this whole range of what goes through our minds, both on the affective level—the level of emotionality or feelings—and also on the cognitive level, the level of understanding. Both these levels are critical to the development of the practice.

I want to talk specifically about working with the range of difficult emotions that come into the mind. You'll see that as we go through the retreat, although we begin talking more about the difficult, as you get settled in, that's what the experience tends to be. And then after you're settled in for a while, we start to talk more about the beautiful states because that's what begins to arise more frequently. So we're still in the early stages, and the talks tend to be loaded on the difficult, but that will start to change.

When I came into meditation practice, it was because of suffering, which I think is more common than not. I was surprised to find that some people come in out of mere curiosity, because I didn't see why anybody would put up with this just out of some intellectual questioning, but apparently there are people who do. I came in because of suffering, and having read the publicity, I thought enlightenment would get rid of that. Specifically, I thought that if I could get enlightened, I'd get rid of those difficult and painful emotions that I was grappling with in my life.

It took me quite a few years to realize—I think I was a slow learner—that in fact, I had to learn to be comfortable with those states before I had any chance of becoming enlightened. So the order of things got quite reversed in my understanding. Once we're comfortable with all the different places that our mind can go, all the different states that it can move into, then we've found a huge amount of ease and comfort in living this life within this body. It's not the same as liberation, but it brings a lot of freedom.

In a kind of flippant way, you might say that this is like becoming enlightened before we're enlightened—to develop this sort of ease with the whole range of mental states that can come to us.

This is from Pema Chödrön: "In all kinds of situations, we can find out what is true simply by studying ourselves in every nook and cranny, in every black hole and bright spot, whether it's murky, creepy, grisly, splendid, spooky, frightening, joyful, inspiring, peaceful, or wrathful. We can just look at the whole thing."

There's a lot of encouragement to do this, and meditation gives us the method. The beautiful thing is that meditation not only gives us the method, but we find out we have the capability to do this—to investigate all the corners of the mind and to come to a degree of understanding and acceptance in relation to them. This is a big part of the joy of discovery of the path of meditation.

I don't know about you, but when I began this path, I wasn't very familiar with this inner landscape. I don't think our culture is very good at training us in this inner landscape. And I'm not talking just about how the culture didn't tell me how to develop one-pointed states of mind and achieve the third jhāna. It didn't tell me how to know when I was feeling hurt, when I was feeling angry, when I was feeling embarrassed or loving or happy, or what any of that meant.

So for me, it was not until I came into dharma practice that I was pointed to looking and inquiring into that inner landscape using the map that the Buddha provided, and coming to greatly appreciate the range that is contained within this human mind—within every human mind. A range that includes very difficult and painful areas, but that also, as you start to open it up and become comfortable, unveils a lot of treasures: understanding of loving-kindness, of compassion and joy, and so forth.

But until we begin this exploration, there are generally, for us as adults, places where we get stuck in difficult corners of the mind. Or it could be we're stuck from clinging to beautiful corners of the mind. Both of those experiences happened to me as I was growing up, and I didn't know how to navigate my way out of them.

Children don't seem to have much of a stuckness in the range of their mind. Unless they've been abused in some way or their trust has been deeply betrayed, then children seem to definitely get stuck. But if children are treated respectfully, then they seem to have this fearlessness in relation to their emotional life.

You watch a couple of kids playing, and they'll be joyful and enthusiastic and excited one moment, and they'll be fighting the next and screaming at each other and kicking and pulling hair. And then two minutes later, they'll be playing happily together again. They just flow through all those different states without holding back. Their emotional range doesn't scare them.

But as adults, we seem to have hit some dark corners, and because of that, we've shrunk back from our emotional range. We've become afraid of some corners of our mind, and once we start to close down on one corner of the mind, it exerts a dampening effect on the whole range. So we may start by closing off some of the difficult emotions, but we find as we do that, we close the heart overall and the beautiful emotions are no longer quite so available.

So the journey of meditation is a way of reclaiming some of that terrain, that wide terrain that the heart contains that we've lost touch with given the bumps of growing up. As we start to explore the range, the first impulse, I think, for most of us is that we think spiritual practice is going to help us get rid of the difficult. We hope that through the cultivation of bliss and peace and loving-kindness, we can just kind of glide over the top and end up on some really nice spiritual plane where we don't have to deal with that other stuff anymore.

As you know, this is not the path of insight meditation. So congratulations for still being here once you found this out.

This is again from Pema Chödrön: "The basic obstacle is that we don't like the way reality is now and therefore wish it would go away fast. But what we find as practitioners is that nothing ever goes away until it has taught us what we need to know. If we run a hundred miles an hour to the other end of the continent in order to get away from the obstacle, we find the very same problem waiting for us when we arrive. Nothing ever goes away until it has taught us what we need to know."

This is our encouragement to look at all the areas of the mind and find out what we can learn from them. Tonight I'd like to explore these difficult areas through the context of the Third Foundation of Mindfulness.

In the Satipatthana Sutta, the Buddha outlined four areas in which we establish mindfulness: body, feeling tone or vedana, the third foundation of citta, and the fourth foundation of dhammas, or the principles of nature. The third foundation of citta relates directly to our exploration this evening.

Citta is a wonderful word in Pali that can be translated as mind, though it's sometimes rendered as heart. The reason for this flexibility lies in citta's encompassing both cognitive and affective workings of the mind. When the Buddha taught, he didn't perceive such a polarity between what we sometimes call heart and mind—the mental and the affective were united in his understanding. One translator suggested that the best way to render citta is as "psyche," a word that encompasses both sides of our mind's nature.

Here is the beginning of the description of the third foundation from the Satipatthana: "And how, bhikkhus, does a bhikkhu abide contemplating mind as mind? Here, a bhikkhu understands mind affected by lust as mind affected by lust, and mind unaffected by lust as mind unaffected by lust. She understands mind affected by hatred as mind affected by hatred, and mind unaffected by hatred as mind unaffected by hatred. He understands mind affected by delusion as mind affected by delusion, and mind unaffected by delusion as mind unaffected by delusion."

Here are our familiar companions: desire, hatred, and delusion, along with their opposites—the absence of desire, hatred, and delusion. These three states, which the Buddha referred to as the roots of the wholesome and the roots of the unwholesome, combine to create all the different kinds of mind states that occur. You can examine any mind state that arises and discover within it some combination of these three qualities in their wholesome or unwholesome manifestations. Citta encompasses this entire range of mental experiences.

Let me clarify the language I use around this subject. I often speak of emotions, by which I mean strong experiences like joy, happiness, love, fear, grief, and depression. Then I use the word "mood" to describe emotional qualities that are less intense—perhaps waking one day with a subtle melancholy or feeling a pervasive tenderness coloring the mind throughout the day.

There's also a third term common in our tradition: mind states, mental states, or states of mind. This category includes not only emotions and moods but also the refined mental qualities we understand and develop through meditation—mindfulness, concentration, equanimity, calm, compassion, renunciation. These may not be strong enough to be called emotions, sometimes being quite subtle, but they belong to this broader category. In Buddhist language, you'll also hear these referred to as mental factors.

We'll have much more to say about wholesome states of mind later. For now, I want to mention two things. First, don't cling to them, as I think you know. Second, please be sure to appreciate them. They are wonderful visitors when they come. Don't take them for granted. Sometimes I would think, "Oh, that's contentment. Well, of course that's contentment—that's what I came for," and then I'd space out. Really take the time to connect mindfully to the beautiful states of mind as well as the difficult ones.

With difficult states of mind, we need two things primarily through meditation. First is an attitude shift that moves from wanting to get rid of them toward accepting or even welcoming them. These are the areas where we are bound. If we can develop curiosity and genuine interest in them, we can actually welcome the opportunity to see them clearly. We'd rather see the places we're caught, creating the possibility of release, than have them operate subconsciously where we're simply bound by them.

The second movement is developing greater understanding of their nature. We must cultivate wisdom, and ultimately it's this wisdom that brings the sense of freedom in relationship to difficult states.

So the first step in working with difficult mind states is to know what it is that we're feeling. This is part of that exploration that meditation leads us into.

We can become very refined in our discrimination, our ability to tell the difference between related, closely allied states of mind. Fear was my big exploration for many years in practice, and so I got familiar with the varieties—nervousness, anxiety, fear, panic, terror. There's quite a range that that word points to. Or we come to understand the subtle differences between happiness and contentment, for example. The difference between calm and equanimity.

Our inner mindfulness has a wonderfully nuanced appreciation of the whole range of qualities that come, and we just have to start exercising it to get to know what's in us. So the first step is knowing what our state of mind is as it's happening. But this is not so easy. It sounds easy, but it's not so easy.

I'll give you an example from my practice. I was practicing in this hall. It was on a three-month course some years ago. I'd come for part two, and I'd been settled in for about two weeks at that point. And so I had gotten into the rhythm of the schedule, doing my sittings and my walking. I like to walk outside, so every walking period I would go down and walk on a path that's on the grassy area at the south end of the property. So every day for two weeks during the walking periods, I'd been walking there.

The sitting ended—I think it was the 8:15 sit. I left the hall. I was walking very mindfully at that point. I was two weeks settled in: lifting, moving, placing. Walked out the back door: lifting, moving, placing. I looked down to my walking path, and there was somebody there.

And I couldn't believe it. I thought, "What is this person doing in my walking path? I've been walking there every period for two weeks. Haven't they been observing?" I go lifting, moving, placing, lifting, moving, placing. I felt very present. And I kept thinking, "They didn't notice. They're not very developed, are they?" Lifting, moving, placing, lifting, moving, placing. And then I wondered, "Are they playing mind games with me? Did I cut in front of them in the breakfast line or something today? And this is their revenge?" Lifting, moving, placing.

And what was happening is, of course, I was annoyed. I was very judgmental, and I was angry. Lifting, moving, placing. I walked down. I picked another walking path. Guess what? It worked just as well. Did my walking period near the person, and it was thirty minutes into the walking before I realized I'm angry.

And until I realized that, I was so bound up with my reactive irritation, I couldn't dislodge it. It was stuck. There was an identification. That's what was happening. That was the truth. And there was no way of moving or shifting it.

So even though I thought I was very mindful in being with my feet, I missed the biggest thing that was going on, which was I was pissed off. So this seems to be partly how we miss what's going on. These hindering qualities slip in under the radar. We have our mindfulness antennae up, but these slip in underneath, they take us over, they put a filter over our eyes and our whole view of the world, and we don't see that it's happening.

The first movement has to be to recognize that that filter is in place, that that mind state is there. As soon as I said, "Oh, anger," then it became workable. I knew how to work with anger. I knew how to feel it in my body, how to feel it in my mind, and then I could start to release it.

In fact, take note that any time you name an emotion, the simple act of naming it, there's a shift that starts to happen in your relationship to it because now it is not totally dominating the interior landscape.

There is the emotion and there is mindfulness. In the middle of that difficulty, you've brought in a very wholesome quality of mind. It is the awareness that you can trust to provide the door to wisdom, the door to spaciousness around the emotion. Even naming it makes a difference.

A few people have mentioned how mindfulness is becoming more mainstream in society, moving into stress reduction and cognitive therapy. One researcher took a group of people who had anger management issues and gave them only one instruction: every time anger came up, simply name it. They watched the subjects over several weeks and evaluated their experience, finding that their outbursts of uncontrollable anger dropped sharply just from this prescription of naming what was happening to them. This is a powerful first step—knowing what the mind state is puts us into the quality of mindfulness.

The second step is to feel it. Feel it in your body, first of all. If the emotion has any strength, it will express itself through the body. If you ground your attention in the body where you're feeling it, you can stay in touch with the sensations and also the emotion. What I'd recommend is going back and forth—feeling the sensation, which with anger might be contraction or pressure, and then touching the mood itself, the emotion itself, which is a quality of the mind.

It's one integrated experience. Body and mind are so closely related that we can't pull them apart. When a strong emotion comes, the impact is felt as one unitive experience, but it has two aspects: one physical, one mental or emotional. As you investigate the emotion, go back and forth between tuning into the physical—contraction, pressure, tightness—and then the way it feels in the mind. Get to know that mental quality of anger. For me, it was something like a burning going on in the mind. As you ground the attention in the body, it will help you stay in touch. Several people have said trying to stay with an emotion is difficult because they're cloud-like, but if it's felt in the body, that provides a good grounding point.

There's one other area you want to tune into to get the complete picture of the emotion: thoughts. Notice when you're angry what kinds of thoughts you tend to think. This starts to make up what I would call the storyline. Any difficult emotion has a storyline underneath it. In my walking path scenario, the storyline was that it was my walking path. They were wrong and I was right. Once I could see that belief, I saw that's what held the anger in, what locked it in. Once I could let go of the belief—that walking path did not have my name on it, in fact; it had not been leased to me; it was still open ground—once I saw the belief and could let that go, the anger couldn't sustain itself.

The Buddha talked about the five hindrances that can obstruct our meditation unfolding. Sharda talked about those last week in a very helpful way. These are essential to know how they manifest in your practice. On the level of difficult emotions, I work with a different list—slightly different, some overlap—of the main five strong emotions that I've worked with myself and that I see meditators working with frequently. That list is sadness, desire, anger, fear, and self-judgment. Sally talked a lot about self-judgment, so I won't spend much time on that tonight, but I do want to touch on the other four.

As I started to investigate, especially desire, fear, sadness, and anger, I found there was a very interesting relationship to past and future. Something to note about the afflictive emotions is that they are connected with time. Afflictive emotions depend on past and future in some way to sustain them. Beautiful emotions do not. A beautiful emotion can be a sense of appreciation for the present moment that expresses itself in joy, in mudita. But to sustain an afflictive emotion, there has to be a link to past or future.

I want you all to reflect on this. The other factor is whether the object is pleasant or unpleasant—pleasurable or painful. Let me ask you to reflect on a pleasurable experience that's located in the past. These are the two axes: pleasant-unpleasant, past-future. A pleasant experience that occurred in the past—and by that we assume it's no longer in the present.

What's the emotion that evokes? Let yourself feel into it. Let me put it a different way. What painful emotion could be evoked?

"Sadness."

This is the quality of loss, isn't it? There was something that was pleasant in the past. We don't have it any longer. There's a sense of loss, and that's the condition for sadness to arise. It doesn't have to, but that's the condition on which sadness builds.

What if there was an unpleasant experience in the past? What might the mind respond to in that case?

"Anger." "Judgment."

Yes, anger or judgment, which are both different forms of aversion. So anger is a link to the past, to something that was experienced as unpleasant.

Now we go into the future. What's the relationship to what's pleasurable in the future?

"Desire."

It's wanting, isn't it? And if something is unpleasant in the future, how does the mind often relate?

"Fear."

So I think that's why these are four such primal emotions. They map past and future, pleasant and unpleasant. I didn't realize that when I came up with the list, but having observed my practice and seeing lots of people's practice, it just made sense in this matrix.

So let's talk first about the quality of desire. We've talked around it. Sarda talked about it the other night. It is one of the hindrances—basically, the movement of mind that wants a pleasant experience and wants it now. This can be a very frequent visitor on a retreat. We start off and perhaps it's pleasant experiences that we left at home and we'd like to have them again. We miss people, we miss places, we miss certain food or drink or whatever.

As the retreat progresses, we find ourselves wanting the experiences of the retreat. We have a yearning, a strong wish for a pleasant sitting, comfortable body experience, a mental state of calm or peace, some particular insight that might have come along, an opening to compassion or love. So it could be external, could be internal, but let's look at the way that desire functions.

A few years ago, Carol and Sally and I went to Italy and taught a ten-day retreat there. It was a great experience. I'd never taught in Italy before. I really appreciated the yogis there because, you know all the stereotypes you have about Italians? They all seemed true on the retreat. Noble silence didn't exactly apply in the same way as it does here. People had cell phones and talked in between. One gentleman from Sicily had brought his seventy-year-old mother on the retreat. And so, of course, she was Catholic, and they had to stay in touch.

There was an espresso machine right outside the dining hall, so always after the meals, the lira were going in, the espresso was being drunk. In fact, the staff, which was from a convent—we rented a convent for the retreat—had a little different understanding of retreat than we do here. When we showed up for dinner the first night, there were carafes of wine out at all the tables. So rather reluctantly we had to tell them to put those away.

But what I really enjoyed about teaching in Italy was the emotional openness that the yogis had. We had to work through a translator because we didn't speak Italian and many people didn't speak English. So it was a little awkward. There was always a third person in the room. But I found people were very willing, in general, to open up about the difficult things that were going on in their life and also that they had a lot of fluency around their emotions. They were much more willing to dive in and be with the emotional range than I had experienced in my practice.

So there was one young guy there, probably about thirty, who came in for his first interview, and I said, "How's it going?" And he said, "Oh, having a hard time."

I said, well, why are you here?

He said, "This is our holiday time. This is August. Some friends of mine were going to the Caribbean for a vacation and they invited me to go with them. So I had to choose to go to the Caribbean or to come on this meditation retreat."

"Why did you choose to come here?" I asked.

"All the tickets to the Caribbean were sold out."

So he definitely got the consolation prize—sitting and walking for ten days. He said, "You know, I think about my friends. They're out on the beach there. The water's so warm. It's beautiful. There are many beautiful girls in the Caribbean, and I'm here."

Well, it was no wonder he couldn't settle.

So we talked about how the force of desire works. When desire is present, is it satisfying? I think this is a very interesting question to investigate. You'll find many opportunities to investigate this.

When we're on retreat and deprived of pleasant things, one of the things that the mind does is go into fantasy or daydream or recollection about things that have brought us pleasure. And in that, there is a measure of comfort. There's a measure of gratification. This is real. We bring the memory of something pleasurable into the mind, projecting it into the future, wanting to have it.

But along with this gratifying aspect, there's also at the same time always a feeling of unfulfillment because it's not here now. And because of that inherent frustration, there's something inherently unsatisfying in wanting. When we're in wanting, we can't get settled into the present moment.

This is what I talked about with the yogi on that retreat. He went away, practiced. The next time I saw him for an interview, he had seen that. He'd let go of the Caribbean. He was in the retreat, and he was enjoying it.

So desire is largely about a willingness to see the frustrating nature, to realize the only possibility for contentment is in the direct contact with the present moment, and so in letting go of the wanting. The storyline in desire is something like, "If I had that, I would be happy." So it creates the projection of a future happiness.

One of the things that we don't often inquire into is, oh, how long will that happiness last? Somehow there's this bloom in the mind from desire that makes it seem like it's really going to be a permanent happiness. And we forget about impermanence—that either the thing changes, like an ice cream cone or like sex, or our attitude changes, like a new house or a new relationship. Eventually the bloom goes off the rose in one way or another, from without or from within.

When desire is present on retreat, I often find it first in myself—if it's toward meditation objects—by this kind of leaning forward movement in my body, a kind of tension that's like reaching out to grab some concentration or grab some peace. Sometimes it's very hard for me to notice through thoughts or images what I'm striving for in practice. But if I find the body's in some tension, then that's often a clue I'm looking for some kind of meditation experience. And if I can then tune into that, it gives a possibility of releasing.

We talked a little about anger already. Anger is one particular form of aversion. I think there will probably be another talk on aversion later in the retreat. Sharda talked about it with the hindrances. It's the basic attitude of disliking or negativity, but it has so many different forms: ill will, hatred, impatience, frustration, irritation, fear, judgment, blame, resentment, despair, resistance. So many different forms.

Sometimes the mind gets kind of stuck in a long-term habit of aversion. Nothing is ever good enough. And this can come out of a chronic sense of fear, that there's a kind of projection that the world is threatening. It can come out of a sense of cynicism, where the attitude toward things has become negative. It can come out of a habit of anger, a long-term habit of anger.

When aversion has settled in in a chronic way in the heart, the experience becomes kind of contracted and we're really shut off from an opening to joy and happiness and contentment. For myself, coming into practice, fear was a strong tendency in my mind, and my heart had become shrunken due to that.

One of the things that's especially recommended when the mind is governed by aversion is the practice of loving-kindness. In the suttas, loving-kindness is the classical antidote for aversion.

So whether it's coming out of hatred or out of fear, metta is a very useful practice for the aversive temperament.

When anger arises, take a look and see how it feels in the body. There will be contraction, tightness, constriction, tension, often felt in the shoulders, neck, chest. Take a look at the quality in the mind. See what the coloring or the mood of anger is. As I said, for myself, it was felt as some kind of burning. And then see how the thoughts go. Typically with anger, the thoughts go to blaming. The storyline, you might say, is something like "they're wrong." And by making them wrong, we get to be right.

But notice how every blaming thought adds more fuel to the fire. As we're angry and we keep thinking the same blaming thoughts over and over again, notice how the flames keep getting fed and keep flaming up. If we cut the thoughts or the storyline, then there's no more fuel being added to the fire and it'll have to die down. So either you can simply stop thinking blaming thoughts, or at an even more fundamental level, you can let go of that story, that belief that the other person is wrong.

You know, it's a judgment call. Sometimes the other person may be wrong. Awful things happen in the world. On a global level, there are murders and war and racism and oppression. Even in our personal lives, living in a fairly protected part of the world, people might steal from us or really hurt us through speech or mistreat us in some way that is really thoughtless and unkind. So sometimes people definitely are unskillful. But as long as we're hanging on to that view, who's hurting? Of course, it's us.

There's this lovely story from the Dalai Lama. He is in the habit of receiving the refugees who make their way out of Tibet and come into India. Once he was visited by a monk who had been in prison for twenty years under the Chinese in Tibet. The Dalai Lama had actually known this monk before he had fled Tibet—he'd known him back when the Dalai Lama lived there. And he thought he was a fairly ordinary monk at the time.

So this monk shows up having escaped from prison and made it over the Himalayas. The Dalai Lama asked him how he was. And the monk said, "I'm okay now, but I worried because I was in danger." The Dalai Lama said, "Well, of course, you must have been in danger of being tortured." And the monk said, "Yes, I was tortured, but that's not what I meant. I meant that I was in danger of becoming angry. But I didn't, because I had my practice of compassion. I didn't become angry." The Dalai Lama said he had to revise his opinion of that monk considerably after that.

So I find it useful to reflect on things like this when somebody cuts me off on the freeway—that people who have suffered much worse are able to keep their hearts and minds clear, even in the face of aggression and mistreatment.

Once anger came up strongly for me while I was doing a metta retreat here. It was very interesting. "May everybody be happy. May everybody be peaceful. There's my difficult person. Arrgh!" And I would spin out for like thirty minutes in being angry at my difficult person who happened to be on the retreat.

It was really a wonderful opportunity to observe it because I saw that I was the one burning with the anger. I also saw that part of the anger, a component of it, was ill will. And ill will, if you look into it, means the will to have the other person feel ill—that is, to have the other person hurt. I couldn't accept the idea that I wanted to hurt somebody else, that I would enjoy somebody else's suffering. That's one of the things that motivated me to let go of the anger.

But also equally important was that I was the one suffering with it. They didn't know I was upset. They're just going merrily about their practice. So I came to see that I had this ill will with which I wanted to hurt someone else, and I understood these two analogies from the texts. One is that anger is like a lump of hot coal that we pick up to throw at somebody. But before it hits them, we burn our own hands with it. The second is that being angry at somebody is like drinking poison and hoping the other person gets sick.

It usually doesn't work.

So can we just open to feel the feeling of anger in the body, feel that mood in the mind, look closely at the thoughts, see how the thoughts just keep adding to the fire? Through the knowing of that unpleasantness, the pain of that fire, we can let go. Let go of the thoughts, let go of the story about it.

Sally talked a lot about self-judgment, so I won't go into that - another form of aversion. Very helpful to inquire into, also through the three areas we mentioned: body, mind, and thoughts.

The next of the difficult emotions is sadness. Sadness can be an intimidating force to open into because often there's a belief that if we open to the amount of sadness that's in our life, we'll be overwhelmed by it. We'll drown in it. We won't be able to come out of it.

Everybody's had disappointments in life. Everybody can tune in to some degree of sadness if they look. But sometimes the losses are big, and it leaves this undigested mass of sadness. So as we come into meditation and begin to touch that, sometimes it's frightening. The size of it can feel frightening.

But this sense - "Oh, if I open to it, I'll never come out of it again" - is just a belief. It's just another story, and it's not true. Because all emotions, if we give them space, will exhibit impermanence. It's their nature. It's the nature of all dhammas.

So we just have to trust a little bit at a time, open to it a bit, experience it a bit, let it lighten a bit, take the mind somewhere else. A little bit at a time we open up to the quality of sadness or disappointment. Again, feel it in the body, get to know it in the mind. Take a look at the storyline.

Under sadness, it's something like: "I can't be happy now because I've lost this." That's the meaning of the story of loss. "I can't be happy now because of this particular loss."

It's so interesting that all kinds of grief - and you can read this in all the literature about death and dying - all kinds of grief have a certain timeline. They go through their own cycles, and the intense heaviness of grief, if we allow it, will in time pass. There may still be some lingering sadness, but it becomes much more bearable if we allow ourselves to open to the intensity of grief in a way that is not holding back.

The last of the major states I wanted to touch on is the quality of fear, because this was kind of my specialty for a lot of years in practice. It's one I have a special affection for.

When I first started to encounter fear in meditation, it was totally overwhelming to me. The first reaction I had when it came was more fear. I didn't know how to relate to it, and I was scared of the experience itself. So for me, it was very helpful and instructive to hear the direction: feel it in the body.

I started to open to the experience of fear in the body, and I found that there was a contraction in the belly. There was a flutteriness all through the torso, and there was a kind of shaking or light quality that didn't feel grounded and didn't feel secure. So I would investigate each of those areas, and the question I had in mind was: "Can I bear this? Can I bear this sensation?"

The storyline in fear is something like: "This moment is bearable, but the next one's not going to be. Watch out." So coming back just into the present moment diffuses that past-future stuff. That's why it's so helpful - the mindfulness just of the present moment.

So with fear, it was: don't worry about the next moment. Come into this moment. Is it bearable? And as I looked at each of the body sensations, I found: yeah, I can bear that. I don't like it. It's not pleasant, but I can bear it.

Then after getting comfortable with the body sensations, I kind of worked up the nerve to look into the mind. And that was even harder. What's the tone or the quality of the mind that is fear? It is a hard thing to describe, but for me it was a sort of panicky wanting to get away from. You could call this the flight response. The mind wanted to move away from that experience. It was hard to touch that directly because it wanted to move away from that feeling too.

But through the stability of mind that comes through meditation, I was able to bring the attention, bring the mindfulness directly into contact with that fleeing impulse and feel it. And I thought, can I bear this? Yeah, I can bear this too. And then, strangely enough, the next moment was not unbearable. The storyline was a lie. The next moment was actually easier once I started to open up.

So I kept investigating fear. It was a companion for a number of years in practice, quite a frequent visitor. And at some point, I'd made a lot of headway in becoming more comfortable, but at some point—maybe it was a talk of Joseph's, I'm not sure—the question came into my mind: am I really accepting this?

Then the reflection that came into my mind was: if I really accepted it, it would be okay with me if it lasted the rest of my life. That would be real acceptance. And I said, am I okay if this lasts the rest of my life? I said, hell no. No way. And then I had to look at that. Okay, why not?

So I looked: why would I not be okay? I can bear this feeling. And the thoughts that came to me were: if I was in fear like this, then I couldn't really enjoy music the way I used to be able to enjoy it. I couldn't really enjoy a sunset the way I used to be able to enjoy it. I couldn't really be in love the way I used to be in love. And then what I noticed was: oh, these are all the ways I used to get high.

So why was I resisting the fear? Because I wanted still to get high in that old way. I thought, is that worth it? No. No. It was more important to me to open fully to fear than to hold out some future promise of getting high. Because if I could open to the fear, I would have a mind that was unafraid of fear. I would have a mind that was rich in equanimity. And that became more interesting to me and more valuable than the highs that my mind was throwing up.

So at that point I said, yeah, it's okay if this lasts the rest of my life. And then I continued to practice quite a while like that. And so fear would occasionally come, and I developed a complete equanimity over whether it was present or whether it was absent. It really didn't matter to me either way. And when that happened, fear lost its grip on me in some way.

It's not that it doesn't return. And every time it returns, I need to refine that relationship with it. But it cannot terrorize me. And it cannot oppress me the way that it used to, as far as I know. I haven't lived a full life yet, so I'll give you a status report as we go. But I feel that something shifted so deeply in my relationship to it that I know how to relate with it. I know how to work with it when it's there.

So fundamentally, what transforms us in our relationship with these states is coming to understand how they're put together. We see the component that is physical. We see the component that is the mood or coloring in the mind. We see how thoughts build them and sustain them, and then also how the absence of the thought causes them to crumble.

Once we see how these states are put together, they don't mystify us as much and they don't enchant us as much. They arise, and we start to see them just as part of nature. Just as we observe physical nature and see it's always changing—body sensations pulsing on and off, vibrating—we see that mental nature, which we all share, also comes and goes. All these states are transitory. That's why it's safe to open.

You don't have to hold back because anyone that comes, you don't have to make it go away. It will go away on its own. It's the repression that locks them in. So as long as we open, they'll come, they'll manifest, and they'll go. They are just part of our human nature.

We all have this whole package. Everybody knows what fear is. Everybody knows what contentment is. Everybody knows what sadness is. It's not yours or mine. It's part of our human, biological, mental, emotional heritage. So we don't have to take it personally. We just allow nature to come, present itself. We understand it through our interest, through our investigation, through our curiosity, through our openness. The mind loses its conflict, loses its struggle with these states.

It takes some time because the mind is very wide and rich. So it takes time to investigate each one. This is not a transformation that happens overnight. But through the consistency of our meditation practice, through openness to the range of experiences, little by little, corner by corner, nook by cranny, we start to understand the whole terrain.

In the beginning, I thought that awakening would come after all these states had been disposed of. When I get rid of them, then I can wake up. I have to be comfortable before I can wake up. But I realized it's quite the other way around. We wake up in the middle of these states.

Every time one of these states arises, you might notice your habitual reaction is, "I don't want it. I'm going to push it away. I'm going to strive for something beautiful." Aversion and greed. We start to see this doesn't work. And then we find we have the capacity to turn on this light of mindfulness—of interest, of investigation, of acceptance, of courage, of patience, of tolerance. All these are the beautiful states of mind that we generate from this contact with what's difficult and what's painful. So as we're generating them, we are waking up in the middle of our difficulties.

In a way, these difficult states of mind are the training ground for us to unpack the box of treasures of mind—the beautiful states that support us, strengthen us, and ultimately lift the mind to liberation. So you could say that it is through knowing our delusion and the difficult emotions that we really grow the seeds of the beautiful qualities of heart and mind.

I want to close with a quotation from the Tibetan tradition. This is called The Four Blessings of Gampopa. Gampopa was a disciple of Milarepa, an eleventh-century practitioner revered as one of the greatest saints in the Tibetan tradition. This quality of blessings you can interpret as you like—it could be directed toward a higher power, it could be directed toward an individual like the Dalai Lama, it could be directed toward your own inner strength and wisdom. You can make of it what you like.

These are the four blessings of Gampopa:

Grant your blessings so that my mind follows the Dharma.
Grant your blessings so that my Dharma practice becomes the path.
Grant your blessings so that the path clarifies confusion.
Grant your blessings so that confusion dawns as wisdom.

Let's just sit for a moment, please.

Grant your blessings so that confusion dawns as wisdom.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 11

Second Noble Truth: Craving

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

In this dharma talk from the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta (SN 56.11), Guy Armstrong examines the Second Noble Truth—that craving (taṇhā) is the origin of suffering. He explores the Buddha's teaching on the three types of craving: for sense pleasures, existence (bhava-taṇhā), and non-existence (vibhava-taṇhā). Armstrong discusses how craving manifests as self-centeredness and the inability to sustain contentment, drawing connections between ancient wisdom and modern culture's pursuit of gratification. He addresses the challenge lay practitioners face in balancing sense pleasures with spiritual development, avoiding both extreme indulgence and rigid rejection. The talk emphasizes understanding craving through mindfulness rather than judgment, showing how this investigation leads naturally to the Third Noble Truth. Armstrong concludes with practical guidance on observing craving's impermanent nature and the qualitative shift that occurs when greed, aversion, and delusion are abandoned, revealing the clear awareness that underlies our experience.

Earlier in the retreat, I explored the first noble truth from the Buddha's first discourse—the truth of dukkha with its wide range of meanings from direct suffering to unreliability. I discussed how each noble truth comes with a line of advice, a prescription for what to do with it. With the first noble truth, the prescription was that the truth of suffering, of dukkha, is to be fully understood.

Tonight I want to talk about the second noble truth. I'll begin by reading what the Buddha said in that sutta, Setting in Motion the Wheel of the Dhamma:

"Now what is the noble truth of the origin of suffering? It is this craving which leads to renewed existence, accompanied by delight and lust, seeking delight now here and now there—that is, craving for sense pleasures, craving for existence, craving for non-existence."

When I first started to hear the Buddha's teachings, this was a very meaningful teaching for me. I came into practice because of unhappiness and confusion in my life. The experience at that time was that I was suffering in this kind of dark cloud of unknowing. I had no idea which way to turn, if there was a way out, the direction of the way out, or anything.

When I heard this teaching, it was a revelation because it said there is a cause for unhappiness, and the cause is craving. So I knew that somebody had figured this puzzle out, and that gave me tremendous faith and inspiration. I wasn't just lost in this massive cloud any longer—somebody had found what was putting it together. And anytime something has a cause, that cause can be undone. This was really my doorway to freedom, hearing the second noble truth. It was very, very meaningful for me.

The Buddha's pointing to craving as the cause of suffering doesn't deny other people's analyses of causes of suffering. In the Western world, there are many other analyses of what causes suffering. Marx analyzed it and brought it down to political and economic factors—those are still valid. Freud analyzed it in terms of childhood development—those may still be valid. Franz Fanon analyzed it in terms of cultural oppression based on race—that is still valid.

So there are solutions on other levels—economic, political, cultural, racial, psychological—that are valid in their own domains. But the Buddha's analysis is so valuable because the domain that it applies in is the domain of liberation. I don't know of any other system that provides an analysis that allows for our own liberation. This is the context of the second noble truth.

The word that is almost universally translated as craving is the Pali term tanha. Its original meaning is simply thirst. This is not a complicated psychological term in Pali—it just means thirst. You'll see that the Buddha did this often with his terminology. He'll take a familiar word from the culture and reframe it to suit his teachings. Nirvana actually has a history within India prior to the Buddha's adopting it as well.

I like this metaphor of thirst because it points to the deeply embedded nature of tanha, and also its recurring feature. If we are thirsty and we take a drink, we're satisfied, we're quenched for a while. But as time passes, the mouth gets dry again, and we're thirsty again. Tanha is like this—it recurs again and again. The satisfaction is only temporary, and then the thirst comes back.

It's this recurrent nature of craving, the incessant quality of it, that I think explains the phrase Sally used a couple of talks ago where she talked about our human inability to sustain contentment. We are unable to sustain contentment because, if we have not examined the mind, this force comes in again and again and tells us we need something else—and we need it now.

So an initial contentment may be there. You'll find moments of deep peace and contentment in your practice. But watch—at some point, the following message will come: "It's not enough. Now you need this thing." Finding delight now here and now there.

The word desire has gotten a bad rap in Buddhism. You'd get a bad rap too if you were the cause of suffering. But we have talked about the fact that there are different kinds of desire.

There are desires that lead to suffering, and there are desires that lead in the direction of freedom.

Among the desires that lead toward suffering are tanha or craving, lobha or greed, raga or lust, and kamachanda or sensual desire. Those that lead toward wholesome states of mind include chanda—when connected with our practice, often translated as zeal—which serves as a foundation for spiritual success. There's dhammachanda, a love for the Dhamma, the truth. There's sammasankappa, or right attitude, right intention, including the aspiration or wish for freedom. And in all the metta and compassion phrases we use, the wish for others' well-being and our own well-being—these are wholesome desires.

Craving is not. Let us be clear about this: craving is always viewed as a disturbing factor in the mind and a cause of suffering, either subtle or gross. Although it's described in terms of a desire force, it's important to understand that craving doesn't simply mean the greed force, but encompasses the whole notion that things should be different than they are. So it encompasses greed, aversion, and delusion.

You can see that greed and aversion are simply two sides of the same coin. When we have an idea of how we want things to be, then we resist anything different from that. Greed and aversion depend on one another. Delusion is that we don't see how we're doing this. We don't see that we're trying to manipulate the present moment out of greed or aversion to shape it differently.

So the fundamental meaning of craving is wanting things to be different than the way they are. One of the qualities you find in craving that you don't find in wholesome desires is that it lacks wisdom because it's accompanied by delusion, and it lacks patience. Craving has an urgency that says, "I need it now." There's this immediate yearning and dissatisfaction with craving.

We can have an aspiration for freedom, but accompanied by wisdom, we understand that the path to freedom requires some duration. We have the accompanying quality of patience that lets us settle in contentment and peace, even though we haven't reached the goal. Craving doesn't have this quality of patience.

Just to highlight this mixture of the kilesas, the Buddha said that one should make an end to suffering without making an end to greed, aversion, and delusion. That is impossible. These three are bound up intrinsically in craving.

I like this word "craving" because it seems to apply so much to what we see in the world today. The world has changed dramatically since I was a child, and much of it, it seems to me, is not for the better. One of the things I observe—and I guess my generation has to take some responsibility—is a world where in Western society today, and in America particularly, all kinds of restraints and prohibitions have been thrown out the window. You see people involved in the naked pursuit of pleasure through many means.

Unrestrained sexuality is held up as a reasonable form of pursuit. Violence is condoned or even glamorized in our culture. Dress has moved far from the style of modesty I grew up with. The use of drugs has become so prevalent that it hardly gets noticed until somebody gets arrested, which doesn't happen all that often. There's this culture that anything goes today.

Young actresses and stars go out on the town and behave in outrageously bad ways, and it only serves to heighten their celebrity because gossip sells. They get bigger contracts than they had before. I have to say, I don't consider myself a prude by any means—I lived through the sixties and participated wholeheartedly—but I was rather shocked when the queen knighted Mick Jagger. If I can think of anyone who represents the excesses of behavior initiated by the sixties, it would probably be Mick Jagger. For him to be recognized and elevated to that status as a revered cultural icon—that was a little much. What message does that send to our children?

I started feeling a bit like a temperance preacher in the 1890s. But you have to ask the question: is this lack of restraint leading to real happiness? Or was there something in those old-fashioned standards that were called morality? I don't think they were necessarily informed by much wisdom, but maybe as they evolved over millennia, concepts like refraining from sexual misconduct, refraining from the use of drugs and intoxicants that cause heedlessness—maybe there's something to those quaint old ideas.

One of the things I find interesting to observe in modern culture is the difference between the gratification of craving on the one hand and what leads to happiness on the other. As we explore the qualities of restraint through our precepts, we find what more genuinely leads to happiness.

Sometimes I reflect that you can see the outcome of someone's life in their face after a certain age. Someone said that by age fifty, human beings get the face they deserve. I don't know about that. But one photo that's very revealing to me is that of Keith Richards, the lead guitarist for the Stones.

Keith Richards was born in 1943, so he was 64 this year. His face bears the deep lines of extensive aging. Then you look at the face of the Dalai Lama, who was born eight years earlier than Richards and is now 72. You see the clarity of his skin and complexion, and you have to ask yourself: which is the wiser path to follow?

On a scale even bigger than the Rolling Stones, when we look through the whole world with a broad historical view—and I think you've probably seen this many times—the world itself is driven by the forces of greed, hatred, and delusion. As the Buddha commented in the third discourse he gave, he said, "All is burning. Burning with what? Burning with the fire of lust, burning with the fire of hatred, burning with the fire of delusion."

The world looks like this today, and I think it has probably always looked like this. I doubt there has ever been a time in human history when there was no war. War is the most visible eruption of the forces of greed, hatred, and confusion, but it's not the only one. Throughout the world, we see the effects of corporate greed in the destruction of the environment and levels of pollution. We see personal greed in the frauds that have occurred on Wall Street. We see the effects of racism, domestic violence, the abuse of children. The list goes on and on.

Look at any one of these phenomena and you can see the driving forces of greed, hatred, and delusion in the minds of individuals carrying out these actions. The Buddha said, "Clouded by ignorance and driven by craving, sentient beings wander through samsara." This really is the story of the world today, and I think it always has been the story of the world.

By purifying our hearts, we help to break this pattern. By reducing the force of greed, hatred, and delusion in our own individual being and taking that transformation back into the world, we help to change it just a little bit at a time.

One other comment about craving appears in this statement of the Second Noble Truth. The Buddha said, "It is this craving which leads to renewed existence." What he's pointing to here is the quality of rebirth—that it's the force of craving in our mind that leads to our being born again.

Something interesting happened on my very first three-month course. I sat here in 1977, during the second three-month course at IMS. One of my friends on that retreat came up to Joseph, who was teaching back then. You know how yogis can get very wide-eyed and innocent? The psychological term for it is "regressed," but I rather like wide-eyed and innocent people.

My friend was in this very wide-eyed and open place when she approached Joseph. I think she just found him in the lobby one time and said, "Joseph, why are we here?"

Joseph replied, "Do you mean here on this retreat, or do you mean here in this universe?"

She said, "Here in this universe."

And Joseph said, "Because you wanted to see and smell and taste and hear and touch. That's why you're here."

It is this craving that leads to renewed existence. We're all here because we wanted, once again, to see and smell and hear and taste and touch. That's rather mind-boggling, isn't it? That's the volition that brings us back to experience pleasant sensations again. It's quite wild.

Retreat is, of course, the perfect place to look at this force of craving. It happens again and again, even though you know you're not going to get very much out of it. The retreat situation is rather bare of sense pleasures, but this doesn't stop the force of craving from arising. We simply get to see its conditioned and recurring nature over and over again.

We're here not to gratify this force, but to learn about it. We turn our intention from satisfaction to understanding. Then every arising becomes a new possibility for understanding. What's important is to trust that we can learn from it without having to run after it.

If craving comes up in terms of desire, we can watch it. If it comes up in terms of aversion, we need not blame the outer situation, but again try to understand our own response. Craving arises now here and now there. It picks different objects again and again, and this is the key to its entrancement, its ability to enchant us. It keeps directing our attention to new places, so we may get bored with one object, but craving will find another. "Ah, that's really the one." It keeps the target moving.

But each new thing seems to offer the promise of some kind of lasting satisfaction. Part of the delusion within craving is that we forget about impermanence. We don't look beyond the achievement of that particular satisfaction, and we get some sense—some subconscious sense—that it's going to be more lasting than it is.

This tendency has been verified by psychological research lately. There's a researcher from Harvard named Daniel Gilbert who's published a whole book on our inability to predict what will make us happy and what will make us unhappy. The conclusion is that in both cases we forget about impermanence. We forget how quickly happy things will fade, but we also forget that unhappy things—even things like breaking a leg—will also fade in time, and we are more afraid of them than we really need to be. There's a kind of homeostasis in our happiness level that we will return to, independent of these changing circumstances. But we don't understand that very well.

This pursuit is tiring. As you probably know, when you feel the mind in a state of agitation, it's not restful. And if it's like that all day, you probably want to go to bed about an hour before you do, compared to a time when the mind is more balanced.

There was an interesting story in Newsweek about Disneyland. Disneyland, you know, is a place where the motto is "the place where happiness never ends." The reporter was investigating that claim, and they happened to go into the staff dining room. Inside the staff dining room, the characters were still dressed in their costumes because they didn't really have time to change on their lunch break. So Mickey Mouse was sitting down at a table talking to Donald Duck. And what Mickey Mouse said was, "I've got to get some overtime. I don't have enough money to pay my therapist." So even in Disneyland...

The beautiful thing about our practice is that as this force of recurrent craving comes again and again, and we just remain willing to observe it, the mindfulness starts to slow it down. In a way, the mindfulness acts as a brake on this force which has a huge amount of momentum—what you could call mental habit of mind. When we have this wheel, this rolling wheel of desire that's turning again and again and again, mindfulness is like a brake pad applied to that wheel that just starts to wear it away, wear it away, as we keep from reactivating or reconditioning it. And that's why the quality of peace begins to come in—because the craving stops leading us by the nose quite so often.

Another way to say craving is self-centeredness. The Dalai Lama often talks in these terms—that the root problem in the world is self-centeredness. And this is really a synonym for craving. Do you notice how we don't get as upset about other people's problems? But the craving comes in around our problems.

This is one of the reasons the Dalai Lama is so lovable. I find this amazing. Somebody asked him—I think people often ask him—"Why do people like you so much? Why do people love you?" And he says, "I'm not really sure. But I think it's because I try to consider every other person as more important than myself." That's a bodhisattva of compassion. Wouldn't that be an amazing way to approach the world? Imagine just a simple thing as going into lunch and feeling that everybody else's lunch was more important than our own. That would create such a different flavor and way to approach the table.

This is also the reason that the quality of bodhicitta, which Carol talked about the other night, is so powerful in meditation practice. Because bodhicitta puts the emphasis in our practice on the well-being of others, so that even our dharma practice comes to be an expression of our caring and moves our very motivation just a little bit away from self-centeredness. Of course we care about ourselves also, but we begin to bring other beings into the very core of our dharma practice.

Of course, this self-centeredness is a tricky thing. There was a family retreat here at IMS. These are retreats where we try to introduce whole families into dharma practice. And I think what's interesting is these retreats are creating a little bit of a Buddhist family culture in the West. So there are children of all ages from three and four on up into the early teens. And then for later teens, they have their own retreat here. And parents come with the children, so it's a whole family kind of bonding experience.

During the family retreat, one of the teachers asked a five-year-old boy, "What do you think will happen if you spend your whole life going around just trying to get what you want?" And the boy said, "Trouble."

The truth of craving. He knew it better than some of us.

So the Buddha in the Second Noble Truth said that there are three kinds of craving.

So there are three types of craving that the Buddha identified: craving for sense pleasures, craving for existence, and craving for non-existence.

The craving for sense pleasures is the desire to have pleasant experiences through the five senses—pleasant sight, sound, smell, taste, and touch. Interestingly, as I understand it, the mind door is not included in this category of craving for sense pleasures.

At one point, the Buddha was talking about the pleasure that came through his practice of strong concentration in the jhana states. As he reflected on developing these states, he said, "I don't see anything to be afraid of in this kind of pleasure." What I take this to mean is that as we develop pleasant meditative states, if we have a desire for them—which we will and we do—that leads us to become more skillful in learning how to access them again and again. We discover that it is through relaxation, contentment, and acceptance that those states begin to open.

So the desire for wholesome states of mind leads us to greater skill in meditation and is not considered an unwholesome wish. However, I want to point out that any wholesome desire—whether it's the wish for liberation, concentration, or any wholesome state—can turn into craving. The difference lies in whether we demand that it happen now. If we can hold our desires with understanding that these qualities develop from proper causes and conditions, then we aren't ruffled when they're not present. But if we start demanding that they happen immediately, then that becomes craving as well.

Look around the scope of the world and you can see how much time and money are spent satisfying these five sense desires. Take taste, for example, which isn't even the most compelling force in my life. The restaurant industry in the United States had annual revenues of $476 billion in 2005, and that was less than half of the overall food industry. Food alone represents about a trillion dollars. Restaurants are particularly focused on satisfying certain kinds of tastes, and that's half a trillion dollars just in this country.

Consider smell, which also doesn't seem like a major factor in sense desire for me. Perfumes had annual sales of $15 billion—a $15 billion industry devoted to smell.

There's a wonderful video on YouTube that I encourage you to watch when you get home. It was produced by Sakyong Mipham Rinpoche, the son of Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche, who was a Tibetan teacher who founded a large sangha in Boulder. His son is a teacher in his own right and a very creative individual. A student or fan created a music video from one of his poems, and it's an excellent dharma teaching titled "What About Me?"

Let me read some of the lines: "What about me—that's my first thought every morning. What happened to me is my last thought every night. I say this mantra all day long: what about me. When I take a shower I think what about me. I hope this shower makes me feel happy. I hope this lunch makes me feel happy. I hope these clothes make me feel happy."

This captures the spirit of the quest for sense pleasures. We're looking for that hit of happiness again and again and again. As I mentioned, there's some indication that we want this happiness to last, which it doesn't. But there's also truth in recognizing that sense pleasures do bring a kind of happiness, and we shouldn't overlook that either.

When we think about our lives, imagine that you had no sense pleasures and also no support of meditative states. That would be like being on retreat but unable to meditate often. That would be tough, wouldn't it? It could feel pretty bleak.

So sense pleasures in daily life do bring a kind of happiness. It's limited and temporary, but there is genuine happiness there. The Buddha called this "carnal happiness" as opposed to "spiritual happiness," but he acknowledged the pleasure in it.

In another sutta—the analogy of the two darts that someone mentioned earlier—the Buddha explains how we get pierced by a painful feeling, which is the first dart. Then, as our mind obsesses and worries about that pain, we inflict a second dart of mental agitation if we're not careful practitioners. But further along in that same sutta, he makes a really interesting comment: he says that sense pleasure is the only way that an untaught, ordinary person knows to escape from painful feeling.

The only way that most people in the world know to escape from painful feeling is by going off and finding a sense pleasure to supplant it, to overcome it. This is really the base for addiction. When we are in the world and there is unpleasant experience either bodily or mental, we develop a habitual pleasure that we go to again and again, that then tends to mask or cover over or numb the painful feeling. And because it works once, when the painful feeling comes again, we're inclined to seek that same pleasure again. So it could be addiction to drugs, food, sex, social contact, television, alcohol. All these forces are very big in our world.

Now the essence of monastic life is that practitioners basically make a vow not to use sense pleasures as a routine outlet. So even in taking ten precepts, I know many of you here are practicing with eight, the tenth precept adds not using money. So that takes away your online shopping as well. We've given up sexuality, drinking drugs, eating after the midday meal, entertainment, movies, music, adornments to beautify the body.

It's very interesting as you practice in an extended way with the eight or the ten precepts - you really find that all the normal ways that we go for comfort get shut off or closed off to us. And what that does is throw us on our own inner resources, our own qualities of heart and mind, and that's what develops the deeper kinds of satisfaction and what channels our aspiration into the path.

But most of us are not monastics. In fact, I'd say about 98% of us here are not monastics. So as laypeople, we do not take those vows in daily life. That means that sense pleasures are an integral part of our life as laypeople. On retreat, it's different. On retreat, your lifestyles are much more like monastic life. Even if you've only taken five precepts, you've renounced an incredible amount of worldly activity to come here, so your life is much more like a monastic life.

In fact, just speaking from my own personal experience, spending three months in a retreat like this would be more difficult for me, more arduous, perhaps more appealing, but more arduous than spending three months in a monastic environment as an ordained monk, but not in a retreat setting. The requirement of not talking, of solitude, and the relentless practice of mindfulness that you undertake here is in itself a very, very rigorous challenge. So there are 227 vows in being an ordained monk in our tradition. I've done that a couple of times in my life. And I find that an easier practice, just speaking personally, for a limited period of time than what you are engaged in. Now, people who take long-term monastic vows reach another whole level of challenge, so I don't want to make that comparison in any way. But for short temporary ordinations, which happen a lot in Thailand and Burma, I think what you are doing is more challenging.

Now, I want to read a quotation from the Buddha, but I want to preface it with a little story. This is from a sutta that's in the Samyutta Nikaya, but it's also in the Jataka tales. I'll flesh the Jataka tale out toward the end. The Buddha tells this story of a hawk and a quail.

The quail is flying through the air. The hawk comes down from above, swoops down and catches the quail in his claws and is preparing to take the quail off to eat it. And the quail starts moaning and saying, "Oh, I should never have left my home. I should never have left my home ground. Now I'm going to be killed and eaten. I should never have left my home."

And the hawk says, "Well, what do you mean? What's your home?"

And the quail says that the earth, where there are these clumps of dirt, that's my home. And if I were there, I would be safe.

And the hawk, in a rather proud way, says, "I could catch you there, too." So he says, "I will return you to your home and I will show you that I can catch you there too." So he lets the quail go.

The quail goes back on the ground, runs around until she's right beside a clump of soil, then hops up onto the top of this clump of soil and says to the hawk, "Okay, now I'm home."

So the hawk begins a dive from the sky, accelerating very quickly, coming really fast toward the quail and is about to pounce. But just then the quail slips underneath this clump of soil. The hawk cannot break his plunge, and it shatters his breast on that clump of soil.

In the Jataka tale, it's said that this was one of the lifetimes of the Buddha. The Buddha was, guess what? The quail. Wisdom, modesty. The hawk was said to be Devadatta, who was his cousin who at a later point in his career tried to kill him. In this story, the Buddha survives.

After he told this story, the Buddha said, "This is a lesson not to leave your own resort, your own home, what is meant for you and where you are comfortable."

So he said, "Practitioners, do not stray outside your own resort into the domain of others. Mara will gain access to those who do so." Mara is the personification of the unwholesome forces of mind. Mara will get a hold on them.

"And what is not a practitioner's resort? The five chords of sense pleasure. And what is a practitioner's resort? It is the four foundations of mindfulness."

Here the practitioner is to be understood in the monastic or retreat setting. He's basically saying, for people like you, for people who are living a monastic life, your home ground is not the pursuit of sense pleasures. Your home ground is the four foundations of mindfulness. But he said there are others whose home ground is the pursuit of sense pleasures—those people are laypeople.

So this sutta made me reflect that you and we lead lives with feet in two worlds. When we come on a retreat like this, we are living in a lot of ways as monastics and spiritual contemplatives have lived over the centuries. When we go home, most of us who are not ordained, then we are living as laypeople, and all the pursuits of sense pleasures are open and available to us. So how should we relate as laypeople, both here on retreat and at home? I think this is a very interesting exploration and a big question.

This is a passage from the Udana, a small book of the Buddha's sayings, from a sutta called "The Courtesan." It came about because some laypeople in a town nearby were actually quarreling over a courtesan, competing over who would be able to win her. The Buddha was talking about two approaches to sense pleasure, and this is what he said:

"Those for whom precepts and practices are the essence of the teaching, for whom celibacy is the essence of practice—this is one extreme. Those who say there's no harm in sensual desire—this is the second extreme. Both of the extremes cause the growth of cemeteries."

Isn't that great? "Cause the growth of cemeteries." He's saying both lead to renewed existence. Both are not the way to liberation.

So one extreme holds to precepts, practices, and celibacy as the essence of spiritual life—not a useful and supportive container, but the essence. This is too rigid a view. This does not give proper place to wisdom and samadhi.

But the other extreme are those who say, "There's no harm in sensual desires." That's also an extreme view.

This is an ancient teaching, but I really see these two divergent attitudes in our community today. And perhaps you've experienced both of them in yourself, because I felt both these attitudes ripple through my own mind.

One is the attitude that says, "Any sense desire is wrong. The Buddha said sense desire was not conducive. So if I want something, that's bad. I shouldn't want anything. And even if I do want it, I shouldn't go for it because it's not nice."

Don Juan was talking to Carlos Castaneda at one point in their relationship and said to Carlos, "You began by not wanting to get attached to anything, but it ended up that you couldn't enjoy anything."

If we have this judgmental attitude that desire is wrong, the heart will shrivel up. It becomes very barren. So this is one extreme. And I see this—I've seen it in myself, I've seen it in others.

But the other extreme is to say, "There's no problem with following sense desires. Sense desires are beautiful. It's so lovely. That's not a problem."

This also is a problem, because let me just talk a little bit about what I've seen as some of the problems with the blind pursuit of sense desires.

Number one: obviously, if we can't get what we want right then and the desire is strong, we suffer.

We suffer.

Number two, how many times have you wanted something so much that you've pursued it and caused harm to other people or to yourself? Basically, causing harm to others ends up causing harm to ourselves.

The third point is that the pursuit of sense desire as relief from suffering creates grooves in the mind, which then conditions the mind to look for that same thing again. Many of the sense desires we experience on retreat are those old channels of the mind playing out repeatedly. When I'm not feeling well, I need or want social contact, a drink, certain food, sex—these are the grooves we've worn through our own activity of looking to sense desire.

Another aspect to consider with sense desire in outside life is how much time is spent in the cultivation, refinement of taste, and pursuit of those pleasures. As I look around—and this isn't a measured opinion, I haven't done a survey—but as I observe, it's what most of the world does with what we call free time. When we don't have obligations to work or family, what we generally do in free time is find something that pleasures us through the five senses. So much of the world's time and energy, as indicated by restaurant and perfume industries, goes in this direction.

Having a judgmental attitude doesn't work. Not questioning and blindly pursuing isn't in accord with the Buddha's teachings. So what are we to do as laypeople?

Here's where I say each of us needs to make this investigation for ourselves and really look into the question with our own freedom as the most important criterion. What is going to help the development of our own liberation in the most skillful way possible? Find out for yourself.

So the question arises: A sense desire is present. It points me toward an object. Should I follow it? Should I not? What's the right thing to do? I don't want to do anything wrong. What would the Buddha tell me to do? What would Joseph tell me to do? I don't want to make a mistake.

That's not the attitude we should have with our practice. We have to be free to investigate and explore and find for ourselves. The only way I can do that is to try. So let me try, but with my eyes really open. Let's see what happens if I follow. How does that lead? How does it feel? Maybe it will be fine. Maybe no one else will be harmed. Maybe I won't be harmed. But we go into it eyes open.

If we decide, "This time, I'm not going to follow. I've followed it so many times in the past. This time, I'm curious. What will happen if I don't follow?"—that's the practice of renunciation. In a way, you could say that the practice of renunciation is the practice of the second noble truth: carrying out through our actions this abandoning of craving.

What we find when we renounce is that the desire eventually passes. It seems so strong and compelling for a while, but if we stay with it, eventually it passes. So we learn we have the capacity to just sit through its lifespan, not having to act on it.

Joseph had a very nice line about this. He said, "Restraint of sense desire enables us to verify its empty nature." So we see it's just a cloud that arises, moves us, and then passes. It's through practicing restraint or renunciation that we can verify that transitory nature.

The second kind of craving the Buddha talked about is craving for existence. The Pali term here is bhava-tanha. Bhava is a word that means existence, sometimes translated as being, sometimes as becoming. It's a very interesting term.

The basic meaning of craving for existence is that we want to be here in this body, alive in this realm, because it is this existence that allows access to the contact of the five realms of sense objects. It's because of this deep-seated longing for existence that we have a fear of dying. The fear of dying, I think, is way out of proportion to the reality of dying. That's what lets us know there's this irrational longing at the base. Because, I mean, think about dying.

Suppose you went to bed tonight and you simply did not wake up in the morning. I mean, would that really be a problem for you? And yet, if we knew that was going to happen, we'd be terrified because of this craving for existence. So, you know, the actual end—if it came to the end of this body and the end of this mind stream and the end of this flow of sense experience—what's the big deal? And yet we have a deep, deep dread of that, the greatest disaster imaginable in our life. So that's the craving for existence.

The other aspect of bhava is a craving to become something. The psychological level of bhava is becoming something. In my early years of retreat, when I was younger, I'd spend a lot of time thinking about where I wanted to live and what work I wanted to do and what kind of community I wanted to connect to, and what kind of partner I might want to connect with. And I came to see that all of that was searching for some kind of identity that would give me a security that I didn't have. I was in the middle of meditation. I was seeing the groundless nature of everything that was arising and passing. And I was thinking that becoming somebody would give me a different kind of security, a solidity, a safe identity.

So take a look. A lot of the fantasies that we go through, future fantasies that we go through on retreat, are really driven by this bhava tanha, desire for becoming something. But, of course, we need to keep in mind the advice of Lily Tomlin, who commented in one of her plays, "I always knew I wanted to be someone, but I guess I should have been more specific."

The third of the aspects of craving is called the craving for non-existence. The Pali is vibhava tanha. And the basic meaning is that although we have this deep desire to exist, which got us here in the first place, we also have at times a desire not to exist at all. Basically a desire to turn off the impingement of sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thoughts, moods, emotions, and so on. We have a desire to get away from it all.

Sometimes the mere fact of living and phenomenal existence is experienced as a huge and oppressive burden, full of pain and darkness. And it's, of course, out of this mood of vibhava tanha that people commit suicide, imagining that that is really going to solve the problem. So there's a kind of aversion to life that's this manifestation of not wanting to exist, wanting not to exist.

It also means wanting to get rid of what is unpleasant. When you find a painful sensation in the knee and you find yourself thinking, "I wish I could get rid of this," that's also a manifestation of wanting it not to exist. So this is the aversion aspect of the tendency of mind.

So that's a description of the second noble truth. Then, as you know, each noble truth comes with a prescription, an advice for action. The Buddha said with the second noble truth, "This noble truth of the origin of suffering is to be abandoned." So the instruction is craving is to be abandoned. This means both momentarily—each time it arises, it needs to be abandoned—and finally, that as we walk the path to its very end, we are meant to abandon it once and for all.

I think most of us know that this is a good idea, but actually doing it is not that easy. So how many times have you found yourself recognizing that there's some form of greed, aversion, or delusion going on and not being able to release it? Ajahn Chah said that 70 to 80% of spiritual life is knowing that we're clinging and not being able to let go. So if that's 70 to 80% of your experience, you're at an Ajahn Chah level.

We've talked about a lot of tools for how to let go: noting the presence of greed, aversion, or delusion, noting the feeling tone on which they're based, many ways of working with the various forms of hindrances. I'm not going to talk about that more. But what I would like to encourage you to do is, once you notice a movement of greed or aversion, to stay with it and watch its changing nature. None of them are permanent. And it's very interesting to be committed to follow one all the way through.

This is from the start of the Xin Xin Ming, Verses on the Faith Mind, which I'm sure you've heard before:

"The great way is not difficult for those who have no preferences.
When love and hate are both absent, everything becomes clear and undisguised.
Make the smallest distinction, however, and heaven and earth are set infinitely apart."

That means even a slight bit of greed or aversion separates heaven from us.

Notice this. There's a big difference in feeling when aversion is strong and when aversion is weak. There's a big difference in that. Qualitatively, it's the same thing, but there's a big quantitative gap. But then watch what happens when aversion goes out of the picture altogether. That's not just a quantitative shift. That's a qualitative shift.

When greed, aversion, and delusion are all absent, there are no preferences. Heaven and earth are no longer separated. See what that feels like.

Be willing to track the diminishment of greed or aversion until it goes completely away, and see what that is like for it to pass altogether. It's really in the abandoning of these forces that we are led directly into the third noble truth. It is in the understanding of unsatisfactoriness and the abandoning of craving that we shift our whole relationship to pain and suffering in our life.

As one teacher said, our practice is to change the conditions that lead to suffering. There is no other practice.

I want to close with two quotes from the Buddha—one showing the magnitude of the situation that we're in, the other pointing the way forward. The Buddha said:

"This samsara is without a discernible beginning. A first point is not evident of beings roaming and wandering on, clouded by ignorance and driven by craving."

That is our situation. This has been our condition, the Buddha is saying here, since beginningless time. And the only way out is this third noble truth:

"This is the noble truth of the end of suffering. It is the remainderless fading away and cessation of that same craving, the giving up and relinquishment of it, freedom from it, non-reliance on it."

We'll talk about that in a later discussion.

So let's just sit together for a minute, please.

This samsara is without a discernible beginning. A first point is not discerned of beings roaming and wandering on, clouded by ignorance and driven by craving.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 12

Third Noble Truth & Nibbāna

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the Third Noble Truth—the cessation of suffering—and its relationship to nibbāna. He begins with the Buddha's own motivation for practice from the Ariyapariyesanā Sutta (MN 26), where the Buddha sought what is beyond birth, aging, and death. Armstrong explores various definitions of nibbāna, from Sāriputta's simple formulation as the destruction of greed, hatred, and delusion, to the deeper understanding of nibbāna as both a psychological state and an unconditioned element already present within us.
>
> The talk covers the four stages of enlightenment, from stream entry to arahantship, illustrated through the story of Ānanda's awakening and teachings from Ajahn Mahāboowa. Armstrong makes these lofty concepts accessible by offering practical approaches: observing the arising and passing of clinging, using awareness and space as approximations of the unconditioned, and recognizing what Ajahn Buddhadāsa called 'nibbāna for everyone'—moments when greed, hatred, and delusion are naturally absent. He emphasizes that peace is our natural state when we stop agitating the mind through craving, making the Third Noble Truth relevant for daily meditation practice and spiritual development.

The subject of the talk tonight is the Third Noble Truth. I thought I would start by talking about the Buddha's description of his motivation for his own practice. This is from a sutta in the Majjhima:

"Bhikkhus, before my enlightenment, while I was still only an unenlightened bodhisatta, I too, being myself subject to birth, sought what was also subject to birth. Being myself subject to aging, illness, death, and sorrow, I sought what was also subject to aging, illness, death, and sorrow. Then I considered thus: Why, being myself subject to birth, do I seek what is also subject to birth? Why, being myself subject to aging, illness, death, and sorrow, do I seek what is also subject to aging, illness, death, and sorrow? Suppose that, being myself subject to birth, having understood the danger in what is subject to birth, I seek the unborn supreme security from bondage, nibbāna. Suppose that, being myself subject to aging, illness, death, and sorrow, having understood the danger in what is subject to aging, illness, death, and sorrow, I seek the unaging, unailing, deathless, and sorrowless supreme security from bondage, nibbāna."

So this becomes the frame for the Buddha's journey. Understanding the limitations of what is subject to birth and death, he started his quest looking for that which is beyond birth and death, which he called nibbāna. This was the search that culminated in his understanding in that night under the Bodhi tree, where he became fully liberated.

It's said that immediately after his realization, a poem came to him:

"Through many a birth I wandered in samsāra, seeking but not finding the builder of this house. Painful is birth again and again. O house builder, now you are seen. You shall build no house again. All your rafters are broken. Your ridgepole is shattered too. My mind has attained the unconditioned and reached the very end of cravings."

The house that he's talking about is the house of this body, subject to birth, illness, aging, and death. The house builder is craving, which we talked about last week as the source of suffering in the Second Noble Truth. The rafters of the house are considered to be the passions of greed, aversion, and delusion. The ridgepole is ignorance, that which props the whole thing up. And then the very last statement: my mind has attained the unconditioned. Unconditioned is another synonym for nibbāna, that which was the subject of his whole quest, and reached the very end of craving.

This poetic utterance sets the stage for the discourse that he gave to his five old friends when he found them in Sarnath, after he had already explained to them the truth of suffering and the truth of the origin of suffering. Tonight I want to talk about the Third Noble Truth, or the cessation of suffering.

This is how he explained it in that first discourse: "Now this, bhikkhus, is the noble truth of the cessation of suffering. It is the remainderless fading away and cessation of that same craving, the giving up and relinquishing of it, freedom from it, non-reliance on it."

So he equates the end of suffering with the end of craving, as the Second Noble Truth equated the origin of suffering with the origin of craving, and describes it as the remainderless fading away and cessation of that same craving which was the origin of suffering.

The poem I mentioned earlier about the house builder also ties in the concept of the unconditioned. The statement of his quest equates that with nibbāna. So in the Third Noble Truth, we really get this conjoining of the end of suffering, the end of craving, and this factor of nibbāna.

So what is this quality referred to as nibbāna? I don't think there's anything in all the Buddha's teachings that's as confusing and perplexing. Even the teaching on not-self starts to seem sort of understandable when we put it next to the teaching on nibbāna. So as we talk about this quality tonight, I want to encourage you: please don't worry about it. It's not something that anyone can figure out rationally, so don't spend too many cycles trying to do that. The Buddha used it as kind of a pointer for the end of the path, and it's really enough to understand it in those terms, although I'll be trying to flesh it out a little bit more this evening.

As he himself said in the same sutta where he described his quest: "This Dhamma that I have attained is profound, hard to see, and hard to understand, subtle to be experienced by the wise." So the talk tonight may not be particularly subtle or profound, but it may be hard to understand. That's why you should take it all with a grain of skepticism.

One of the clearest definitions in the canon comes from Sāriputta, the Buddha's chief disciple who was said to be highly developed in wisdom. He defined nibbāna like this: "The destruction of greed, the destruction of aversion, the destruction of delusion. This is called nibbāna."

Given that greed, aversion, and delusion are pretty much synonymous with taṇhā, or craving, then we have the end of craving—end of greed, aversion, delusion—equated with nibbāna. This is a good working understanding in a simple way. So you can see that when greed, aversion, and delusion are gone from the mind, there's a state of freedom. You've been reporting this in your interviews and experiencing it at many different points during the retreat. So the Third Noble Truth is pointing to a real place of freedom.

The literal meaning of this term nibbāna in the Pali—and there was a word at the Buddha's time, he didn't make it up—is extinguishing.

It refers to extinguishing like the going out of a fire.

Moreover, at the time of the Buddha, fire was considered to exist or come into being in dependence on what was called its sustenance or its nourishment. The word that was used for sustenance or nourishment was upadana, which is the term that we use for clinging, the term the Buddha used for clinging or grasping.

So the idea was that a fire could be born of leaves or sticks or twigs or logs or grass. And then that was said—those materials, leaves or twigs or sticks or logs or grass, were said to be the material or the sustenance for the fire. They were said to be the upadana on which the fire depended.

So when the fire goes out, it was thought of at the time as being released from its nutriments, from its sustenance, from its upadana.

The Buddha took both these terms and brought them together in this sense of nibbana as something going out. And what goes out is the fire of clinging, upadana. This is what gets extinguished. So again, using the common terms and concepts that were of his day and taking them and making a new kind of spiritual truth from them.

When clinging—the nutriment, you could say, for suffering—is released, then there's a sense of extinction. The fire of craving, the fire of greed, hatred, and delusion goes out. And that's the state of nibbana, the going out of greed, hatred, and delusion.

So nibbana can be understood as a state of freedom in the mind that is released from greed, hatred, and delusion, but it's also come to be understood as an element in its own right. I hope you can get this distinction.

It could just be a psychological condition, right? When there is no greed, aversion, or delusion in the mind, then there is this state of freedom called nibbana. That's one possible interpretation.

Or this quality of nibbana could be something that is already within us, that when we touch is that place of freedom from greed, aversion, and delusion.

There's one particular sutta that seems to indicate the second reading. That is from the Udana, when the Buddha says: "There is, bhikkhus, an unborn, unbecome, unmade, uncompounded. If there were not this unborn, unbecome, unmade, uncompounded, then there would be no deliverance here visible. But since there is this unborn, unbecome, unmade, uncompounded, therefore a deliverance is visible from that which is born, become, made, compounded."

So the general interpretation is that in addition to nibbana describing a state of mind, it also refers to an element that is already within us—that there is this unchanging, you might say, dimension within ourselves. Somewhere within this mind-body process or underlying this mind-body process is this element which is often referred to as a transcendent element because it transcends the limitations of birth, aging, illness, and death, the discovery of which opens us to the Third Noble Truth, opens us fully to the Third Noble Truth.

Some of the implications of this understanding are this quality is ever-present within us. Because it's not conditioned, it's not subject to arising and passing. Therefore, it doesn't get created. Therefore, it can't arise in a moment, so it must already be here.

I don't know if this interests you, but this has always really intrigued me. This element called nibbana is already here and now. This unborn, unmade, unbecome is already here and now. And it is what makes it possible for us to be released or liberated from what is born, become, or made. And of course, as we've seen many times, it's our tendency to hang on to changing elements of experience that causes our suffering.

So here's something that isn't changing. That is in a way stable. That is free from the cycle of birth and death. That's free from the cycle of samsara. And it's already here.

Now when I hear that, something in me stops and opens up. So I think this is the first practical pointer that I'd like to mention about hearing about this quality of nibbana—that it can make us stop and listen deeply within ourselves to see what could that be. Where could it be? How could it be sensed or intuited? Where is perhaps a trail, the scent that leads to that realization? And we'll talk more about that.

So if it's ever present, why is it so hard to see? It's said that it's because the movements of mind are so coarse in comparison to its nature—that its nature is very subtle. And the movements of greed, aversion, and confusion are so heavy that they overwhelm our perception of that. So the understanding is that it needs a very fine balance of mind in order for it to be perceivable.

This balance of mind is what's pointed to in lists like the seven factors of enlightenment that Sally talked about. The balance of mind is illustrated in this lovely story of the enlightenment of Ananda. We've talked quite a bit about Ananda, who was a beautiful being who was the Buddha's attendant for the last twenty-five years of his life.

After the Buddha's death, Ananda had been so busy serving he hadn't had much time for practice. So there were many, many fully enlightened beings around, but Ananda was only a stream enterer.

They were having a meeting of, it said, 499 Arahants to collect all the teachings of the Buddha since he had died in order to preserve them. People wanted Ananda there because he had heard a lot of the suttas and he had this fabulous memory. He said that he could remember everything that he'd heard, but he wasn't an Arahant, so he couldn't really be trusted. This was really a boys' club, I'll tell you.

So Ananda wanted to be at the council, but he knew he had to be an Arahant to join, to get the invitation. He said, "I'm going to practice really hard." And the night before the council, he stayed up all night practicing, sitting and walking and cultivating the factors of enlightenment. He thought that he was in the territory, and the evening was wearing on, and still nothing was happening. He sat and walked and put in more effort and tried to get his mind in just the right balance, and nothing was happening.

Finally, just before dawn, he thought, "I guess it's not going to happen. I'm not going to be able to join the council, but at least I can take some rest. I gave it my best effort. I'll take some rest." So he went to his bed to lie down, relaxed his body, relaxed his mind, and just before his head hit the pillow came that moment of full realization.

And then Ananda had a little nap and joined the first council where he contributed all those suttas that begin, "Thus have I heard." Those are all from the mouth of Ananda.

It's very interesting. Effort can do a certain amount on this path in terms of the unfolding, the opening to the realization of nibbana, but effort can't do the whole thing. It's beautiful because it illustrates the potency of effort. We can collect and gather the factors of enlightenment through our continuous mindfulness. They do grow, and they gain a momentum that's onward leading. But we cannot control that possible moment of opening to what is beyond conditions. That is beyond effort, beyond our effort.

All we can do is lay the ground as best we can and then be patient. In fact, the very desire or striving for that particular breakthrough will in fact block it. So I think this is a nice reminder that all along the way, to open ourselves to the deepest truth, it needs an element of surrender and realizing that there's a mystery that's beyond our control and an opening beyond our ability to cause.

So, nibbana is one word for it. Some other common synonyms from some suttas in the Samyutta Nikaya: the unconditioned, the truth, the other shore, the everlasting, peace, the deathless, safety, freedom, the refuge, the beyond.

This condition or this realization, this way of being, is considered by the Buddha the highest kind of happiness. And therefore, it's the culmination of the path. Many different kinds of happiness come along the way: the happiness of sense pleasures, which we've talked about; the happiness of very refined meditative states looked at through the seven factors of enlightenment or transcendent dependent arising, as Sally discussed. But all of these are still considered in the conditioned world. And it's said that this realization, this way of being, brings a greater kind of happiness than anything else.

The reason, of course, that it is so completely happy is because it marks the end of suffering. When you think about what we as humans most deeply want, it really isn't particular experiences. It really is to be beyond the touch of pain and sorrow. And so the Buddha said that when we realize that, that is the most satisfying. That is the greatest kind of happiness.

The reason it's so fulfilling is that in that state or in that realization, there is no possibility for the mind's agitation. Because it is a place where craving cannot arise. It is a place of complete safety and complete freedom from even the potential of harm that we cause ourselves.

So just a little bit of an overview reminder again about how we approach it. When you think about the talk on transcendent dependent arising, you remember the first part—you could sort of think of that sequence in two halves. The first half starts with suffering, moves through faith and gladness and rapture and tranquility and happiness or contentment. And the second half starts from there and goes into deeper states of calm and then insight.

So I like to think of it as that half of our journey is from suffering to contentment, and the second half of the journey is starting from contentment and going to liberation.

Now, when you came into the retreat, if I asked you, "Are you here because you'd like to realize nibbana?" I don't know that very many of you would have checked that box. When I started practicing, I was definitely practicing just with the idea of contentment. If I could have found that in practice early on, that would have satisfied me. But as time went on, my motivation started to change as I started to see greater possibilities.

So just to be aware that our aspiration is a factor of the path that also evolves as we deepen in practice.

Whether you conceive of your journey as moving toward contentment or toward full liberation, both are heading in the same direction. The Buddha said that one who walks the Eightfold Path "slants, slopes, and inclines to Nibbana." Isn't that a beautiful image? All of you are on this downhill roll, heading in that same direction. We simply need to keep rolling. Whether you know you're going there or not, whether you conceive of that as your destination, doesn't matter. The practice naturally unfolds in that direction.

Let me draw in another aspect of the nibbanic experience—our relationship with time. You'll notice that even the concept of path has time built into it. We begin from suffering, practice mindfulness, develop concentration and wisdom, and over time, at some point in the future, we arrive at the goal. This understanding often carries within it the sense that we are moving through time toward something else, implying that fulfillment is not here and now. The feeling that accompanies this is often a subtle dissatisfaction with the present moment, because the future is meant to be the real thing. Even in states that are fairly calm, harmonious, and peaceful, there's often this undercurrent of time. Take a look and see if you notice this in your practice.

But when we arrive at the goal—the realization of nibbana—that sense of time dissolves. Integral to this realization is a quality of timelessness. When that timelessness is touched, the sense of time becomes much more relaxed and expansive. Time opens up in a broad way, and we begin to reflect that there is never anything but this present moment. Instead of using the present moment as a vehicle to get somewhere else, we come fully into this present moment and discover there is nothing else. This is what gives that sense of relaxation and expansiveness.

If you observe children's relationship to time, they are much less caught in the sense of time's rapid movement. They inhabit a much more open and relaxed sense of time. The Tibetans say that generally speaking, we are caught in the three times—past, present, and future. But when we touch freedom, we enter the fourth time, which is timelessness. I think this is an interesting reflection to bring into your practice. Anytime there's a sense of being caught in time, there's movement toward a goal. But when there's the fullness of arrival, there's no sense of time.

The Third Noble Truth, like all the others, has an imperative—a prescription that the Buddha gave us of what is to be done. He described it this way: "This noble truth of the cessation of suffering is to be realized." This realization is the whole point of our path, the reason the Buddha taught, and the reason we practice.

The Buddha encouraged us all to come to the realization of nibbana—to directly know it from our own personal experience. You may not feel this is a compelling motivation at this point, and that's fine. But I also want to explore the ways we are already touching this quality in relative form. Whether in the relative sense or the direct sense of realization, this quality of freedom from clinging, freedom from craving, is met all along the path.

The direct realization and fullness of seeing nibbana is what's called enlightenment. In our tradition, enlightenment is understood as the meditator's direct apprehension of this unconditioned element. The Buddha said this direct realization can influence people on four different levels. Sometimes the word enlightenment is used only to describe those who have become completely liberated, but in our tradition, there are four levels of enlightenment or realization.

The first, which is how most people experience it, is called stream entry. This refers to the first moment of direct knowledge of the unconditioned element. This first moment of realization removes three fetters from the mind: the fetter of personality view, which Sharda discussed last night; the fetter of attachment to precepts and rituals; and the fetter of doubt—doubt that there is an end of suffering, doubt that this path leads to that end. Because one knows from direct experience the state where there is no suffering and no possibility of suffering. The middle fetter is somewhat perplexing.

How many of you feel attached to rituals and precepts? I don't think many do. I think this was a teaching that the Buddha used to address the Brahmanical practices of his day, where there was an understanding that purification through rituals alone could lead to liberation. He was saying it's not enough in itself—don't be attached to that as the way.

If a stream enterer progresses further, or for some people this first moment of contact will lead to the next level of enlightenment, called a once-returner. The idea is that such a person is born once again in the world. At this level, it's said that sense desire and aversion are weakened—not eliminated, but weakened.

As one progresses further, or for some individuals the first contact will lead to the next level, called a non-returner. A non-returner is not born again into this world, but will be born in another realm before full liberation. At non-returning, both sense desire and aversion are completely eliminated.

This third stage of enlightenment is a very high achievement. I've known a few people in my life who were considered to be at this level. I don't know if they were or not, but from my observation of them, they could well have been. This is the first stage of enlightenment where there's a strong change in affect, in emotional experience, because sense desire and aversion are no longer present in the mind. This is a very high attainment.

Going on from there, as one continues to practice, or for some people on the first moment of realization, it's said that five more fetters are uprooted from the mind. Two are attachment to higher levels of concentration or absorption. The last three are restlessness, conceit, and ignorance. This is why we often say the comparing mind doesn't go away until full liberation, and why it's such a hard thing to be really free of. Ignorance is the ridgepole that was pointed to in the Buddha's poem—the underpinning of all our constructs of self and searching for lasting happiness.

This can seem a little remote. It certainly does in my practice. But I do want to tell you one story, because there are people alive who have reached this fourth and highest level of enlightenment, it seems. Again, I can't verify, but someone who is said to be an arahant in Thailand is a teacher named Ajahn Mahabua, who is a disciple of Ajahn Chah. He's quite old now, but still teaching in the north of Thailand.

In one of his books, he described his journey to liberation. It's a very interesting story. He said he'd been in robes for about ten years when he decided to make a strong resolution. The resolution he took up for one three-month retreat, the rains retreat, was to sit up all night every night. As you can imagine, that's a strong resolution—not an easy one to do. He said that after he did that, he lost his fear of death, because nothing could possibly be more painful than sitting up every night for three months.

After that period, he said his concentration became very, very strong. His mind became immovable—just like a rock. But he kind of liked that state. When we talk about attachment to the qualities of concentration, that's what Ajahn Mahabua was experiencing. He didn't really move, he said, for about five years from that rock-like concentration.

At some point he realized that wasn't enough, so he got motivated to investigate again. He began investigating basically the noble truths—he started looking at suffering and desire and then non-suffering and ease. Those were the qualities he investigated. But he saw that they were all coming and going. So he said, "What would it be that doesn't come and go?"

Then he turned his attention to the qualities he called mindfulness and wisdom, directing them to the quality of knowing itself. He let go of everything else. Then he said those two qualities became impartial and impassive, and the mind was not tending to move to anything at all.

This is a description from his book: "At that moment, the cosmos in the mind over which ignorance held sway trembled and quaked."

Ignorance was thrown down from its throne on the heart. In its place, the pure mind appeared—at the same moment that ignorance was toppled and eradicated through the power of mindfulness and wisdom.

The key here is his statement that ignorance was eradicated. The eradication of ignorance is the same as saying that one has reached arahantship. So he did that by turning his attention to the qualities of mindfulness and wisdom, which did not change at that point.

This still seems pretty remote. Most of us aren't ready to stay up all night for the rest of the retreat, let alone the whole three months. So how can we make sense of this teaching on the Third Noble Truth? How can we bring it into our actual experience and make it relevant for us?

The first question is: Does the Third Noble Truth point to a permanent end of suffering, or can it be understood as a temporary end of suffering? I would say that for us, it's helpful to understand it as a temporary end of suffering. Because if it's a permanent end, that's way in the future. But if it's a temporary end, we can start to work with it here and now.

One of the ways you can approach this is to look at times when the Second Noble Truth is your experience—when there's craving and some discomfort or unease. It means that the mind is clinging in some shape or form. Be willing to stay with that clinging until it goes. Observe it closely, feel it, feel its impact in the body where there will probably be some form of tension. Feel its effect in the mind where there will be some kind of rubbing or discomfort or unease, and be willing to observe that until that form of clinging or craving goes away.

That moment of its going away has the flavor of the Third Noble Truth. It has the flavor of this temporary end of the suffering that's coming from the clinging. It may not be the fullness of the direct realization of nibbāna, but it is a taste of the same kind of release. So become familiar with what that feels like.

As you get familiar with this sense of observing the clinging and observing the release, these two experiences can become the whole of your practice. In approaching it this way, you might relax the body, bring your attention into the heart center, have a sense that you're going to rest it there, and know moment after moment whether you're in a state of clinging or freedom. These can be your only two notes: Clinging, clinging. Freedom, freedom.

This becomes a really interesting exploration when the mind is quiet enough to see in that way. As we observe this and practice with it, we become more skilled at knowing the forms of clinging and releasing them.

There are three avenues to this non-clinging. The first is we just wait for things to pass. I'm sure you've experienced this in your practice. If you wait long enough, the clinging will exhaust itself. This is reassuring, but sometimes you have to be really patient.

The second is that you develop a greater skill at releasing voluntarily. It can't always happen. Remember that Ajahn Chah said that seventy to eighty percent of spiritual life is knowing you're clinging and not being able to let go. So don't put pressure on yourself. But sometimes we can release.

Then there's a third avenue, which is that as you get to know the feeling of this state of release, we develop more skill at just being able to put the mind there. You become familiar with what release feels like and you find a way to encourage the mind just to go there.

There are a couple of tools that help with that movement. It helps if in our direct experience we can find something on the relative level that's a little bit like the unconditioned—a substitute or an approximation for nibbāna that's within our direct moment-to-moment experience.

So I want to ask you to investigate. What could that be? What could it be in our experience that's always here? What could it be that, like nibbāna, can accommodate everything that isn't moved by a painful or pleasant feeling? What could it be that's not caught up in birth and death? What could it be that's not caught in a sense of time?

I want to suggest two possible answers for you to think about. What about the quality of space? You can think about the space in this room. You can think about the space extending more widely out beyond. Does space come and go? Is it born and dying? Is it ever-present? Does it accommodate the beautiful and the unbeautiful?

Does it depend on time?

So space might be one kind of approximation of this unconditioned.

Here's another. What about the quality of awareness? In every waking moment, is there some awareness? Yes. Does awareness care if it's knowing pain or knowing pleasure? Is it subject to birth and death? Is it subject to time? Or is it kind of like space in that it reaches everywhere and is always there? Some kind of knowing.

So I want to suggest as a shorthand or an approximation, a way to tune into this quality of the unconditioned, that you might think about marrying space with awareness. Have a sense that your own awareness can expand to fill this room, but even beyond, outside as we listen to the sound of the wind, or as you walk out tonight and look up at the sky and the clouds or the stars. All those things are in physical space, but they're also in the space of your awareness.

I want you to investigate just for a moment: what is it like, or what would it feel like, to release any holding around the particulars of your experience in this moment? Maybe you're holding on to some sensation in the body, pleasant or unpleasant. Maybe there's some mood or thought in the mind. Maybe there's a sense of limitation, of confining the attention to your body posture. What if you let go of all those limiting particulars and let the non-clinging extend as far as your awareness extends, as far as space extends? What would that feel like? Does it have a little bit of this quality of release?

Notice also that because space and awareness, as we're talking about them now—just approximation—are not changeable, not subject to arising and passing, they're always accessible. They're accessible in any moment. So when the mind isn't stirred up or isn't clinging, could you think of this as the natural state of being? That if you simply relax your awareness from the particulars, you can know its fullness and its expansiveness, its reach, its accommodating qualities, its non-preference. It still illuminates the beautiful and the unbeautiful, the pleasant and the painful. But is it limited by them? It doesn't need to be.

So in this way, perhaps this sense of the vastness of awareness becomes a direct avenue to—let's call it an intimation of nibbāna—the flavor of release. If you get familiar with this, you can start to feel the shift that happens. It's as though in a moment of clinging—a synonym we sometimes use is fixation—the attention gets narrowed down and constricted by some kind of holding. As we move into this wider view of things, it's like the center of gravity shifts from the particulars to a very, very big space.

So at the least, this big space gives kind of more room to breathe. It gives room for the body to relax, for the mind to expand, and for everything just to happen on its own. The second thing it can do is to shift our sense of identity. This big space includes the body, includes the thoughts, includes emotions, but it's not limited by them. So maybe we don't have to be defined by our particulars. Maybe what we're more like is this big space in which everything comes and goes. Maybe that's more our nature.

This is from Ajahn Mahabua: "Although all phenomena without exception fall under the laws of the three characteristics—impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and not-self—the true nature of the mind doesn't fall under these laws. The natural power of the mind itself is that it knows and does not die. This deathlessness is something that lies beyond disintegration." In the Thai forest tradition, this quality of mind is considered more or less equal with nibbāna.

What you can feel is that as you let your attention go in this broad, expansive way, your center of gravity shifts from individual holding to an open and undying space. You can play with this.

Now, these intimations of nibbāna are not the same as the direct realization of the deathless element, of what is truly unconditioned. But they give us a way in, to feel our way in, to what that feels like.

Ajahn Buddhadāsa was a great Thai monk of the past century. Carol and I both had the chance to spend some time at his monastery in Thailand. He was quite a revolutionary in his own way. He brought the Dharma out of the monastic confines and started sharing it with lay people, applying it to lay people's experiences. He re-read the Pali Canon, the words of the Buddha, and brought fresh interpretation and meaning for people. One of the things that he said was kind of revolutionary, was a teaching in a little pamphlet called "Nibbāna for Everyone." He said that nibbāna shouldn't be understood just as the province of some arahants, but that we all have little tastes of it.

He prefaced this teaching by saying, "When you hear a phrase like 'Nibbana for everyone,' you may shake your head in disbelief and understand that someone has tried to dye a cat for sale." I love this image. If you want to sell a cat that's not very beautiful, you dye it first. You color it and then you put it on the market so that somebody will buy it.

Nibbana is a natural condition. It is the cool state of mind without any defilements. So he's basically saying that when you check your attitude and you don't see greed, you don't see aversion, you don't see delusion, that is this flavor of nibbana—temporary though it is.

He went on to say, "Anyone can see that if defilements are with us all day and night, every second without ceasing, who could ever stand them? Under such conditions, living things must either die or become insane and finally die away. Let us consider well the fact that one survives because there are periods that the fires of defilement are not burning. Periodical nibbana keeps all of us alive and well, without making any exceptions, even animals at a certain level. We survive because of the nourishment from this kind of nibbana."

So he's pointing to the fact that these moments where greed, aversion, and delusion are absent or much reduced are coming all the time. We just need to start to notice them as the cool state of mind. Moreover, this cool state of mind as we start to observe it is the natural state of mind when we aren't stirring things up with cravings.

It's not that you have to force yourself into this state. It's not some accidental thing that happens as a result of a lot of effort and construction and contrivance, but rather in any moment when the mind has let go of clinging, this is the state that results. So all we have to do to touch it, to access it, is to not do, to not fabricate, to not make up, to not construct formations, to not cling. Then the natural state of our being is this everyday nibbana.

When the mind settles in this way and we're not stirring it up, there is a great sense of peace. This is from the Buddha. The Buddha talked about the four foundations—not of mindfulness, but of growth in the Dhamma. He called them wisdom, truth, renunciation, and peace. And he explained it this way: "The tides of conceiving do not sweep over one who stands upon these foundations. And when the tides of conceiving no longer sweep over him, he is called a sage at peace. The sage at peace is not born, does not age, does not die. He is not shaken, and he is not agitated. For there is nothing present in her by which she might be born."

This is truly our natural state of mind when we are not agitating it. So at any moment, really, we start to see the choice is ours. Do we want to be agitated or do we want peace? The Buddha said peace is the highest happiness. Sometimes he expressed it as nirvana is the highest happiness. Sometimes he expressed it as peace is the highest happiness. Do we believe that? If we do, peace is available in any moment in which we simply let go of clinging. It is always accessible.

This is from Rumi. It's a poem called "Tending Two Shops":

"Live in the nowhere that you came from, even though you have an address here. That's why you see things in two ways. You have eyes that see from that nowhere, and eyes that judge distances, how high and how low. You own two shops, and you run back and forth. Try to close the one that's a fearful trap, getting always smaller and smaller. Checkmate this way, checkmate that. Keep open the shop where you're not selling fish hooks anymore. You are the free-swimming fish."

Now, the extent to which the fish can swim freely is, I think, almost inconceivable for us. This was brought home to me one time when I was in Kathmandu. I was visiting one of my Tibetan teachers who has a monastery there, and I was just about to go home. But my Tibetan teacher was hosting a very well-known and revered Tibetan Lama named Nyoshul Kempo Rinpoche.

Sharon Salzberg had asked me if I would offer some dana to this Rinpoche on her behalf because he was one of her teachers. I had never met him before. So I told my teacher that I'd like to make an offering of some dana from a friend. And my teacher said, "Would you like to present it yourself to Kempo?"—it was a name for Nyoshul Ken. "Would you like to present the dana?" And I said, "No, I don't need to."

And I was thinking, you know, you've seen one lama, you've seen them all. But then, just as I was about to leave—it was my last visit to the monastery on this trip—I thought, why not? Why not meet this Rinpoche whom I've heard so much about?

So I told my teacher that actually, I would like to present the dana. I collected the money, put it in an envelope, and was brought into the room where he was staying. There was a little chit-chat among the group of us—my teacher, the Rinpoche's wife, an attendant, a couple of other people. Then it came time for me to present the dana.

I got a bit nervous because this Rinpoche was well-known and very highly respected. I approached him, made my three bows, and offered the envelope on my open palm. As I did this, I looked into his eyes. He received the dana, and I was still feeling nervous. Then he did something in his mind that became evident through his gaze—he went into this meditative space that was a marked shift.

As I watched him, his eyes moved slightly apart, as if he were looking in a very unfocused way, and became extraordinarily still. Because I was looking directly into his eyes in that moment, I received a transmission of some flavor of the state he had entered. This experience of incredible stillness came over me.

Reflecting on it later, I realized I couldn't even say that his mind was still in that moment—it was beyond that. There was no mind there to be either still or moving. I felt I was looking right into the unconditioned, that he was manifesting it in that moment. If I could have kept looking into his eyes long enough, something profound might have happened. But I was nervous and shy, and couldn't quite get there. The moment passed and the transmission ended.

Yet I felt I had witnessed a human possibility I'd never even imagined before. It gave me a deeper sense of what looking into the eyes of the Buddha must have been like, and how so many people awakened in his presence.

I'd like to close with another quotation from the Buddha about this transcendent place of nibbana, from the Udana Sutra:

"One who is dependent has wavering. One who is independent has no wavering. There being no wavering, there is calm. There being calm, there is no desire. There being no desire, there is no coming or going. There being no coming or going, there is no passing away or arising. There being no passing away or arising, there is neither a here, nor a there, nor an in-between. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

Let's sit for a moment, please.

"There being no desire, there is no coming or going. There being no coming or going, there is no passing away or arising. There being no passing away or arising, there is neither a here, nor a there, nor an in-between. Just this is the end of suffering."

Thank you.

CHAPTER 13

Loving-Kindness and Gratitude

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong explores the brahmaviharās (divine abiding places), focusing particularly on mettā (loving-kindness) and muditā (appreciative joy). Drawing from the Karaṇīyamettā Sutta and traditional commentaries, he explains how mettā serves as the foundation for all four brahmaviharās, naturally transforming into karuṇā (compassion) when encountering suffering and muditā when witnessing happiness, all held in balance by upekkhā (equanimity).
>
> Armstrong addresses common challenges in mettā practice, especially the difficulty of extending loving-kindness to oneself and working with the inner critic or 'judge.' He shares inspiring stories, including his encounter with a generous Thai monk who spent nine years working through self-hatred, and Caroline Kornfield's compassionate act of helping ducks cross traffic. The talk explores how muditā, particularly when directed toward oneself, manifests as gratitude—a quality that naturally cuts through both greed and aversion.
>
> The discussion includes practical guidance on progressing through the traditional categories of mettā practice: self, benefactor, neutral person, and difficult person. Armstrong emphasizes how the brahmaviharās are 'boundless' practices, both in their scope (extending to all beings) and in their capacity to make the mind immeasurable. He concludes by connecting these heart practices to the ultimate wisdom of emptiness, citing the Dalai Lama's teaching that 'compassion is the best source of happiness.'

One of the qualities we discover on a long retreat is what sensitive creatures we are. Being in the present moment, we find that we're subjected to this constantly varying stream of pleasant experience and painful experience. That alternation never seems to end. And it's said that because of this, the human realm is considered to be the best realm to wake up from because things are difficult enough that we have a motivation to look and become free, but they're pleasurable enough that we have enough hope and confidence that we can become free. So I hope you are counting your blessings at having this mix of pleasure and pain. It may not be the best for enjoyment, but it's the best for enlightenment.

We recognize as we're practicing that really anything can happen at any moment in life. And that's part of what makes it uncertain and out of the uncertainty somewhat intense. Just a story to illustrate this: a friend of ours a few years ago was practicing Qigong on a beach in southern India. The date happened to be December 26, 2004. And as he was just out on the beach taking in the morning sun, this big wave started to roll in and knocked him over, flattened him. There he was, knocked on the sand. And he said he stood up and looked back at the ocean to see what was going on. And he saw this very strange characteristic of an emptiness where the wave had been and where the ocean should be, and it was the emptiness that freaked him out so he ran and got his partner. The two of them came outside and climbed up on top of this concrete wall, and he held on very tight to a palm tree that was right beside the wall.

And just then, the second wave came. And that's the wave that, as you probably remember, was the tsunami of 2004 that took many people out in its wake. But because he'd had the foresight to climb on the concrete wall, which is about three feet tall, and hang on to a palm tree, they were able to stay upright during the impact of that second big wave. Anything can happen. This was a case where the practice of non-clinging was not advisable! He was fortunate enough to realize that.

So given this alternation in our practice, in our immediate experience, as well as in our outside life, how do we respond to all the changes that life brings? How do we respond to this changing mix of joy and sorrow that really is the situation for all humans that are alive?

If we look at the state of the world today, it's quite easy to get depressed. Because if you read the news pages, it's mostly bad news. You notice they never report on, you know, a monk in Thailand getting enlightened today. That never makes the front page. But mostly what makes the front page is not good news. And it's also easy to get kind of depressed about the state of our mind as we follow it moment by moment here. Sometimes the enlightenment story doesn't show up here so clearly either.

But fortunately we have these tools that give us other ways to relate. And among the tools that show us another possibility are the Brahmaviharas. So tonight I want to talk about the Brahmaviharas, particularly the two that we haven't talked about a lot in this six-week period, which are loving-kindness and appreciative joy, metta and mudita.

Just to back up a minute and look at the structure of these four qualities of mind that are called the divine abidings—the place where we can find a heavenly state of mind within ourselves. In our tradition, we consider that metta is the foundation for all the Brahmaviharas. And in the practice of metta, which you all did in the first six weeks if you were here, we consistently turn our mind to the well-being of individuals, of ourselves and other individuals, with the wish that may you be well and happy and peaceful and healthy and so on.

And this consistent turning of the mind to welfare, eventually of all beings, starts to train the heart to be open, or you could say tender, around the subject of people's happiness or unhappiness. That's one of the great movements that happens in the practice of loving-kindness. We start as a matter of habit or practice to tune in: Every time we meet a being, how are you doing? How is your health? How is your state of mind? Are you feeling safe? And these issues start to matter to us, for ourselves and for others. And this is how the heart starts to open.

Then this open heart becomes the platform for the next two—really, you could say the next three. When that open heart looks on someone who's having a difficult time, the natural flavor that comes out is compassion. So it's not that compassion is such a radically different state than loving-kindness. It's just a transmutation of it when loving-kindness looks on suffering. Or on the other hand, when that open heart of loving-kindness looks on somebody who's going through happiness and uplift in their life, then the flavor that that evokes is mudita or appreciative joy. We resonate in sympathy with people's suffering or happiness.

So there's this beautiful symmetry. Loving-kindness is the foundation. Compassion is the natural response to difficulty. And appreciative joy is a natural response to well-being or happiness.

Then the fourth factor, equanimity, balances and holds all three, ensuring they don't fall into their near and far enemies. Equanimity is the quality of mind that provides the strength so that we can stay in the divine abidings rather than their opposites or their near enemies. They all work together to support one another. They're all needed to complete the picture.

We have this beautiful gift from the tradition from nearly 2,500 years ago. It's not recorded in the suttas that the Buddha taught these practices exactly the way that we do them, but they're taught in a commentary that came into existence maybe 200 years after the Buddha. So these practices in the way we do them go back about 2,300 years for sure. They have been tested once or twice. They have been found to work.

The beautiful thing is that as we develop them, they really do have the power to evoke these qualities of our being, and in doing that, they sweeten our lives. They bring our emotional life up into a realm that is very worthwhile, very beneficial for ourselves and others. They strengthen the emotional life, bringing it into greater realization in this very wholesome way.

Some people don't particularly feel drawn to practice the Brahma Viharas, and that's fine. If you have tried the Brahma Viharas and don't connect, you can stay with Vipassana, and over time, all these qualities will also unfold from Vipassana. I tend to think that they unfold more strongly with the support of the Brahma Viharas, but they will also unfold from Vipassana.

This is from Rumi: "Someone who does not run toward the allure of love walks a road where nothing lives." But you don't have to practice loving kindness. It's your choice.

We begin with the foundation of loving kindness, and we start practicing metta usually for ourselves because it's said to be the easiest—when in fact it often turns out for many of us to be one of the most difficult. But we start with metta for self, and it's actually designed to evoke the areas where it's difficult. As we aim our orientation toward appreciation and well-wishing, we find all the attitudes of mind that collide with that, that don't support that.

For many of us, turning the attitude toward well-wishing brings up its opposite, which are ways that we don't feel so great about ourselves. As we turn toward metta, we often find that we encounter a lot of self-judgment, a lot of criticism, a lot of ill will that's directed toward ourselves. We have the opportunity then to get really familiar with this judging mind, which we've talked about a lot on this retreat.

It's very helpful to get well acquainted because the judge is kind of a difficult customer, as I know you've seen. The judge tends to be a very tough, stern, critical, demanding taskmaster within us. Elements of perhaps the least attractive parts of our parents' personalities often seem to get directly channeled into that figure.

So how can we meet the judge in a way that's helpful? The best way to meet that hardness is with softness. If we can soften when that hard voice is coming in, then we don't have to be so caught in its hard nature. The turning of the mind to either metta or compassion is the way to evoke an attitude of softness to meet this hard-edged quality that's coming from the judge.

When we can stay with some kind of softness for a while, then it starts to touch other things. When we're feeling soft inside, or merciful, you might say, it's not extended just to ourselves—it's extended outward as well. And that's what brings some kind of change.

This is from Trungpa Rinpoche, a Tibetan teacher: "It is as if we had a pimple on our body that was very sore, so sore that we do not want to rub it or scratch it. During our shower, we do not want to rub too much soap over it because it hurts. The sore spot on our body is an analogy for tenderness. Why? Because even in the midst of aggression, insensitivity, or laziness in our life, we always have a soft spot, some point we can cultivate. A more vivid analogy might be of an open wound, which is always there. That open wound is usually very inconvenient and problematic. We would like to be tough. We would like to come on strong. But there will always be a sore spot. At least we are accessible somewhere. So we are not completely covered with a suit of armor all the time. What a relief."

This soft spot, even though it exposes our vulnerability, is a way that turns out to be the avenue to opening ourselves and allowing that open quality to touch us, to change us, and eventually to touch the world. As we start to trust in that softness, that tenderness, that very movement starts to weaken the influence of the judge. It can't maintain that hard-edged attack in the face of our softness.

But we have to be patient with this process. It can take time to transform the judge's attitude. The judge has a lot of momentum, a lot of habit patterns.

When I was ordained as a monk in Thailand quite a while ago in the 80s, my preceptor was a really wonderful monk who had a monastery outside of Thailand. He just died a couple of months ago this year. He was in his 90s when he died.

His name was Ajahn Panyananda. There's a wonderful book that recounts part of his life as a young monk called Sons of the Buddha. At any rate, he was very kind and helpful to me, ordained me, and then allowed me to go to another monastery in the forest to practice. But he said, "While you're on your way to this other monastery, which was up north near Chiang Mai, stop in at one of my branch monasteries." It was actually a place where he had gotten quite established as a young monk—a monastery in the town of Chiang Mai.

I said, "That sounds great. I can break my journey up and it will be interesting to stay there."

So I got to this wat in Chiang Mai and there was another Western monk there who took me around, showed me the ropes, took me on alms round, and we had some really lovely conversations. The first day I was there, we went on alms round together. He went in front because he was a senior monk—he'd been in robes for fifteen years at that point. I'd been in robes for about two weeks, so I was definitely a junior. Oddly enough, behind me there were two novice monks, which doesn't usually happen. Novice monks don't usually go out on alms round. So I wasn't sure what was up, but I just followed him.

He walked down this street in Chiang Mai, and there were all these people lined up waiting to give him alms because they had known him for a long time. They knew his route, they knew what time he came, and they were waiting. So they put lots of food in his bowl. I followed behind, and they put lots of food in my bowl. He and I both filled our bowls. My bowl was ordinary looking, but his bowl was the biggest bowl I've ever seen. It was appropriate because he had a girth to match the size of his bowl—he was obviously well-fed, which not all monks in Asia are, but he was well taken care of.

I came to understand that this was because of his generous spirit. He really exhibited a lot of loving-kindness. His practice was that he would sit at his kuti in the morning at a nice little place by a pond. He would meditate there in the morning, and in the afternoon he would receive visitors. He spoke fluent Thai at this point, so many local people would come and talk to him about their meditation practice. They would ask his advice about their family and raising their children, and he would just give selflessly of his time to these people. That was why his alms round was so well supported. That's the exchange that is meant to happen between the monks and nuns and the lay people in Buddhist countries.

So we had both filled up our bowls, and for some reason then—I didn't know why—we ducked into an alley. He led, and I followed. The novices followed us in. Then they opened up their robes, and each one had hanging off their left shoulder a big plastic bag. We took all the food offerings, which were in little plastic bags, out of our bowls and put them in the novices' plastic bags. The novices closed up their robes. We put the lids on our bowls, went out on the street again, and filled up again. I think we did this once more.

When we got back to the monastery, the novices' bags were jammed with food offerings. Our bowls were still full. We had more than enough for ourselves. We shared with other people who hadn't gone out on alms round, we shared with all the lay people who were staying at the monastery, and then we shared with the dogs. There was enough to feed everyone based on this monk's generosity and loving-kindness. That's why we were so well supported on that walk.

I was very touched and inspired by his being. He had this really lovely, outgoing nature. So I got to talking to him about his practice. As we chatted over the next couple of days, I was really surprised when he told me that it wasn't always like that for him. He said, "I spent the first nine years that I was in robes working through my self-hatred." Nine years. But the transformation in him was so full, so complete, so apparent. He had developed, through a combination of mindfulness and loving-kindness, this great open heart of metta.

So we begin with ourselves, then move on to a benefactor or friend. This is a really important person in our metta family because this tends to be the person who can kind of pick our heart up. If in retreat we're feeling a little down, if our spirits are low, it's wonderful to have a benefactor or friend.

whom we connect with with deep affection because that can elevate our mood, inspire us, and keep us going. Then we can bring that kind of uplifted mind back into doing the metta practice for ourselves. So having the alternation between self and benefactor or friend is extremely useful in metta.

Then we come to the neutral person, who is conceptually perhaps the most interesting person in the metta practice, from the point of view of dharma theory. This is such a fascinating point, because we find that we can care a lot about someone that we don't really know. This really opens the doors of possibility much wider than we would normally think from our upbringing.

The neutral person is like a representative of all the other people on the planet that we don't know. There are six billion people out there that we haven't met yet. Therefore, we don't have a reason to dislike them yet. And the neutral person is the representative of those people. When we find we can open to them, the possibility is there to open to anyone else that we meet.

This is where the concept of the Brahmaviharas being boundless practices comes in. They are boundless in the range of beings to whom they can be extended. It's said that loving-kindness is like a gentle rain that falls everywhere without distinction because of this boundless quality. They're also boundless in another way, which is that the mind that can open to loving-kindness for all beings itself becomes immeasurable. It becomes limitless. So both the range of beings to whom we can extend it and the breadth or expansiveness of the mind of loving-kindness are both boundless or immeasurable.

The Buddha pointed to this universal quality of loving-kindness in a quote that kind of blows my mind if it's true. The Buddha said that given all the rounds of birth and death and rebirth that all of us have gone through, it is not easy to find a single being in this world who has not at some time or other been your mother or your father or your sister or your brother or your daughter or your son.

What if that was true? I'll invite you as your eyes are open and you're looking around the room to imagine if that was true for us, if we had all had that intimate a connection at some time in the past—how would that feel? We may all be a lot more closely connected than we sometimes think we are. This kind of reflection really can open our hearts to the wideness of life.

The Buddha said this also in the Karaniya Metta Sutta: "Just as a mother protects with her life her child, her only child, so with a boundless heart should one cherish all living beings."

I heard a really beautiful story about this over the summer. It is easy to look around the world, focus on all the things that are going wrong, and lose track of the fact there are a lot of things going right. For me, one of the most heartening things in our world today is the young people. I meet people in their teens and twenties who are so remarkable—they are so mature and poised and self-confident in a way that I never was at that age. I think it comes from having had some good parenting along the way, as well as innate good qualities.

Young people coming into the dharma world with that kind of background really have the opportunity to do a great deal of good service in this world. A lot of the younger generation are very committed to environmental concerns, very committed to positive change in the world, and with a kind of spiritual bent, doing it all. So I feel very happy about the state of the young generation right now.

One of the people who has made me appreciate this is Caroline, the daughter of Jack Kornfield, another Vipassana teacher in our circle who lives in California. She's just graduated from UC Berkeley, and she's applying now to law schools thinking that she wants to do human rights activism work.

Caroline was driving back from Berkeley into Marin with a friend of hers, a girlfriend who was about her age. They were driving down this six-lane road that leads by the ferry in Larkspur on their way out to Woodacre, where Spirit Rock is. They noticed that traffic was slowing down—there's usually not a jam there at that time of day.

They inched along, got up to the place where the traffic was stopped, and then they saw what the problem was. There was a mother duck who was trying to cross the three lanes of their road to get to the bay on the other side. Behind this mother duck were about eight little ducklings.

The mother had gotten across the lanes of traffic and hopped up on the median, but the little ducks were having a hard time, first getting across because the traffic kept holding them up, and second hopping up onto the median because it was tall for their little bodies.

When Caroline and her friend got there, she stopped the car in the middle of three lanes of traffic. Her friend got out and held the other lanes back so that the ducks could cross. The ones who couldn't get up on the median, Caroline and her friend went and helped them up. They got all the ducks—the mother and the eight little ones—onto the median, and then the mother hopped down on the other side because the bay was in that direction. So they had to go over to the other side and stop those cars there.

So the mother and the ducklings could cross and then help the ducklings up on the curb on the other side. Meanwhile, the traffic is backing up because it's now come to a complete standstill. People in the back are honking—why are you stopped? Get going, get going. Obviously some aversion going on. But the people who drive up and see what they're doing got out of their cars and started applauding and cheering for them.

So they got all the ducks over to the other side, started off again, and everybody left happily. This is how with a boundless heart we cherish all living beings. That was a nice story.

As we start to open with the eyes of loving kindness to other beings, we become really aware that the same phrases work for everybody. When you hit upon a set of phrases about safety and happiness and health and ease, what beings don't want those qualities? We really see how much alike we are. We see how connected we are. In some ways, we all have the same heart. We have different permutations of patterns, different combinations of emotions, but basically we all have the same range of feelings and we all have the same deep wish, the same deep aspirations to be safe and happy and healthy and to live with ease.

The Brahma Viharas are a really direct way to connect ourselves with all of life. In this way, they provide a path that moves us out of a place of isolation or loneliness that a very individualistic culture tends to engender in us. This also forms the basis for our practice of sila, as Sally talked about—this practice of conduct that seeks not to harm others.

I sometimes wonder how far this practice of non-harming can be extended. I was very interested to read this interview that the Dalai Lama had with Oprah Winfrey. It was published in her magazine a couple of years ago. I really appreciate that Oprah has this rare talent of bringing teachings about well-being and health and spirituality to such a wide audience. It's hard to introduce wide audiences to this material, but she's somebody who has that talent and capability.

This is a report from somebody who was at the interview she held with the Dalai Lama. The first question that Oprah asked was, "Have you ever had to forgive yourself for anything?"

The Dalai Lama replied, "Small incidents, like accidentally killing an insect."

"Killing an insect?" Oprah said. "An insect? Hmm, okay."

The Dalai Lama continued, "My attitude toward mosquitoes is not very favorable. Not very peaceful. Bedbugs also."

"And that's it?" Oprah couldn't quite believe what she was hearing. "In your lifetime, that's what you have to forgive yourself for?"

"Small mistakes every day, maybe," the Dalai Lama said evenly, "but major mistakes, it seems, no."

"No major mistakes," Oprah repeated, mulling over the idea. She fell silent and looked out the window. There was awe in her voice when she finally continued. "You have nothing in life that you have regrets about. That's a good life. That's a great life, to have no regrets."

"Regarding service to Tibet," the Dalai Lama said, "service to Buddhism, service to humanity, I have done as much as I can. Regarding my own spiritual practice, when I share my experiences with more advanced meditators, even those who have spent years in the mountains practicing single-pointedness of mind, I don't lag too far behind."

I think that that kind of blameless life really helps to support that kind of meditative depth. Just seeing the degree of refinement that is possible for us, I find really inspiring.

This quality of care for other beings that is really touched through the practice of the Brahma Viharas, particularly through metta and compassion, can come back into our practice as a motivation for why we're doing what we're doing. This is the quality that we've talked about a number of times called bodhicitta—this aspiration that may we develop our practice to the fullest extent possible, so that we can help others to come to the end of suffering as the way to benefit them. This quality is sometimes translated as the awakening mind.

The Dalai Lama said that he used to be very impressed by the concept of emptiness. I'll read you the quotation: "Twenty years ago, I used to contemplate emptiness. I was very impressed by the theory of emptiness, and it really inspired me to seek the cessation of suffering."

So notice the connection here between emptiness and the Third Noble Truth. They have a very close relationship. The Dalai Lama continues: "Now I realize it is the compassion and tolerance that come with the awakening mind. The union of compassion and emptiness is something quite unique, but you can bring about an inner experience of it if you make the effort."

Here he's pointing to the concept that the root of bodhicitta, sometimes called absolute bodhicitta, is the direct experience of this union of compassion and emptiness. Once we see it in ourselves, we can see that nature in everyone.

This is again from Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche: "There is also an inner wound called Tathagatagarbha or Buddha nature. This is like a heart that has been sliced and bruised with wisdom and compassion. When the external wound and the internal wound begin to meet and communicate, then we begin to realize that our whole being is made out of one complete sore spot altogether. This is called Bodhisattva fever. That vulnerability is compassion. We really have no way to defend ourselves anymore."

So this is the kind of opening that comes from the neutral person and the way that the neutral person connects us to all sentient beings, to all of life.

Then the next person in the progression is the difficult person. The difficult person often brings for us strong reactions, often of fear or of anger. This is very common.

I was doing a six-week period of metta retreat here at IMS one year, and my difficult person happened to be on the retreat also. So I would be saying my phrases—may all beings be safe, may they be happy—feeling the stirrings of metta, and then my difficult person would walk by. And I'd start running over all the events of the past year that had caused the difficulties between us. And then I'd start spinning out: How could they have done that? Why didn't they do this? And my anger level would just start rising and rising.

And I couldn't gather it in. I was spinning out for half an hour. I had been fairly concentrated up to that point. Then eventually it would sort of wear itself out, and I'd come back, and I'd get back with the metta phrases. And then a few hours later, they'd walk by again, and the whole thing would happen again.

So I thought, I need to do something different here. And I'd heard about this concept of doing metta for the difficult person, but frankly, I thought it was a little hokey. I thought, I don't want to have to pretend I like this person. It seemed like it was going against the grain. But I was really running out of options. So in my desperation, I thought, I guess I'll try it.

So I tried it, and I found something really interesting. The quality that we often translate as anger—dosa from Pali or Sanskrit—is usually better translated by the words ill-will. And what this means, of course, is the opposite of goodwill. In metta, we're sending out goodwill, which is a wish: may you be happy. With ill-will, when we look at it, our wish is: may you be unhappy. That's what ill-will means.

So I looked at this quality of ill-will and I saw that within my anger was this wish that the other person suffer. Now, ill-will is the far enemy of loving-kindness. The far enemy of compassion is cruelty. The difference between ill-will and cruelty is: with ill-will, we would like the other person to suffer. And with cruelty, we enjoy it when the other person is suffering.

Now, I could sort of hang with the idea of being an angry person, but I could not hang with the idea of being a cruel person. When I thought of myself potentially being cruel and enjoying someone else's suffering, something brought me up, and I couldn't live with that. And I saw how close ill-will was to that. And that's really what gave me the inspiration to see if I could generate some goodwill for my difficult person.

And so I just made a really sincere effort, and I found I could bring a wish that that person be happy. And I found when I could wish my difficult person happiness, it ended the ill-will. Goodwill and ill-will can't coexist. And in ending the ill-will, the anger went away.

So it was interesting. I didn't have to like that person. I didn't have to want to spend time with them.

I didn't have to condone the things they'd done. All I had to do was shift my ill will to goodwill, and it took the anger out. So it was very interesting learning for me.

The second of the Brahmaviharas is compassion. We talked quite a lot about this through the guided meditations. Sharda did a whole talk on it, so I'm not going to go further into compassion tonight.

I'll skip to the third Brahmavihara of appreciative joy, or mudita. While metta has tremendous potential for happiness—for bringing happiness into our own hearts and then sharing it—mudita, I feel, has even more potential for happiness. It is a practice that is founded on the quality of happiness, so it's very upbeat.

The meaning is that we respond with joy to someone else's joy. As a simple example, I got a phone call a while ago from a friend I hadn't heard from for a while. I picked up the phone, said hello—I was happy to hear from this person—and I asked her, "How are you?" Very enthusiastically came this response: "I'm wonderful." Just hearing her say that without any hesitation, so directly, touched something in me, and without even thinking, I said, "I am too." Her energy just brought out that same kind of energy from me.

That's the immediate response of mudita—this double hit of happiness. There's the other person's joy and then there's yours, like a double latte. It's just twice as good.

As Sally talked about in her discussion on transcendent dependent arising, this quality of joy is really an integral part of the path. Not only does the Buddha say this, but I found a very intriguing comment from a Theravadan monk who lives in Sri Lanka and is becoming a very skilled translator and commentator on the Buddha's teachings. His name is Venerable Analayo. He's written a very impressive commentary, a book-length work on the Satipatthana Sutta called Satipatthana—highly recommended.

In that book, Venerable Analayo says, "The entire scheme of the gradual training can be envisaged as a progressive refinement of joy." This is really what Sharda was pointing to last night in the development of sukha—the ripening of sukha, whether it begins from dukkha or from sukha itself, always ripening in that direction of inner pleasure and happiness.

The term mudita is sometimes translated as "sympathetic joy." I want to point this out because there's a bit of a split in our tradition on the appropriate translation. Sympathetic joy means that in order for me to feel it, I have to resonate with you. In some texts, the message is that we can only feel this quality of mudita for other people—we can't feel it for ourselves because there has to be joy "out there" that I resonate with in sympathy. That lineage within our tradition tends to call it sympathetic joy, and it's said that you can't practice mudita for yourself, I think because they consider it too self-centered.

But the Buddha never said that we should exclude ourselves from the immeasurable quality of mudita. He never said it was for all beings but you. He said it was for all beings, just like the other Brahmaviharas. I interpret it in that way, and I feel it's very helpful to include oneself in the practice of mudita. So I like to translate it as "appreciative joy"—we appreciate the joy that we find in others, and we appreciate the joy that we find in ourselves.

As we practice the quality of mudita toward ourselves, the flavor that it evokes, for me, is that of gratitude. When we appreciate our own blessings, that flavor is gratitude.

I want to talk a little bit about this state of mind. It's really a beautiful state because when we appreciate what we have, it cuts through greed for more. We don't feel we need more because we appreciate where we are. It also cuts through aversion, because we're looking at what's wholesome in our life—we're not so aware of what's lacking or what's difficult. So when gratitude is present, greed and aversion are both prevented from arising.

A number of scientific studies recently have focused on this quality. I think in Western terms, it's one of the Brahmavihara faculties that Westerners can relate to. While there could be great studies on metta, on compassion, on other forms of appreciative joy, gratitude is a little more embedded in our culture, so I think it's been a natural one to study.

These studies have shown that gratitude, when practiced regularly, leads to feelings of greater joy, optimism, happiness, and a sense of well-being that includes the body as well as the mind. People report fewer physical complaints when they've been practicing gratitude.

But even gratitude, though it's recognized in our culture once a year on Thanksgiving, doesn't come that easily.

It's not that deeply embedded for us as a practice, as a heart practice.

So if we want to understand our culture's attitude on this, we turn to the Simpsons. For those of you who have the good fortune to be from Europe or New Zealand or Australia, The Simpsons is this rather cynical cartoon show that has taken the country by storm, reflecting something of the malaise of modern life. There's an episode where Bart Simpson, the mischievous young kid, was asked to say grace at his dinner table one night, and this was his grace: "Dear God, we paid for all this stuff ourselves, so thanks for nothing."

This reflects something of the attitude of gratitude in this culture.

Sometimes it's helpful to step outside our culture and see how gratitude is practiced in other places. Many people have talked about being touched by the gratitude they've witnessed in Asia. I experienced this when I went to Burma a couple of years ago. One of my students loves to practice generosity and is very keen on supporting serious practitioners. She gave me a few hundred dollars to take to offer to the monastery where I was going to be living for six weeks.

When I got to the monastery, I thought I would sponsor some lunches for all the people living there. The place had 750 people at that time—450 monks, about 150 nuns, and other lay people living and practicing. It was an intensive practice monastery.

When I arrived, I went to the steward, the layperson who controls the money for the monastery, and said, "Someone gave me a gift I'd like to make to the monastery. I'd like to sponsor some lunches, if possible." I told him I had a few hundred dollars.

He said, "Oh, I'm very sorry, but all the lunches are spoken for for the next three months."

Feeding 750 people was already spoken for for the next ninety days. Burma is one of the poorest countries in Asia—it used to be one of the wealthiest, but unfortunately today it's one of the poorest. And people there, almost entirely local people, had already sponsored lunches for the next ninety days.

Every day at lunch, there would be a white board with the name of the donor and a message. It was that kind of practice that inspired our dana here and the beautiful messages of support that we read every day. There, this process of giving is so integral a part of the culture. People bring a lot of joy to it, and it's just a natural ongoing part of their lives.

When we turn our minds to gratitude, all of us here have so many things to be grateful for. Largely, it's just a matter of remembering that this is the case.

A friend of ours had been a monk in Thailand for a number of years, and when he came out of the robes into lay life, he didn't feel in any hurry to leave the country. So he found a job in a refugee camp on the border with Cambodia, running part of a training program that would prepare Cambodian refugees for being relocated to the West. These were people who had been persecuted under the Khmer Rouge and found safe haven in Thailand.

Many of the people there were from the hill tribes of Cambodia and had lived very simple lives. They were being prepared to be moved to places like Fresno, California, where they had to learn to use things like toasters and washing machines, read bus timetables, and handle coins—none of which had been part of their lives.

As part of the training, my friend asked his class, "What are the most important things in a human life?" This is a great reflection. I love to ask myself that question from time to time.

One teenage girl from a hill tribe replied, "The most important things in a human life are fire, rice, and water."

When you think about this answer, those would be the most important things in our life too if we didn't have them and take them for granted. We're inside on this really cold and windy evening, and we're warm. We're dry. We've been well-fed. Those are some of the advantages we enjoy that not all beings in this world enjoy, not all human beings enjoy.

Even just thinking outside these four walls—what are the birds doing tonight? And the chipmunks? And the deer, who may be quite aware that it's hunting season? What are they doing tonight? We're really quite lucky in so many ways.

Moreover, we have another really great and unique advantage that Tibetans call a precious human birth. In addition to having the requisites of life—which in the Buddhist system are considered to be food, clothing, shelter, and medicine—we all have reasonable access to health care, and we all have an opportunity to make this life truly meaningful.

We have been born as human beings with our mind and body working reasonably well. We are alive at a time when a Buddha has appeared in our historical era. We're living in a place and time where the Dharma is flourishing to a certain extent, where there are practitioners following the teachings, where we ourselves have the time and interest to pursue the teachings, where we've heard and understood the Dharma, and we have the requisites of life to pursue them.

How many people on this earth have all those combinations of qualities in their life right now? Not so many.

The ability to have recognized an authentic path to liberation and to have the opportunity to walk it—this really is a tremendous blessing. One of the things I'm most grateful for when I reflect on gratitude is the existence of the path itself. I reflect back to my life before I knew there was such a thing as a path, and I think about the level of what I can only describe as darkness and confusion in my mind. Happiness seemed random. Suffering seemed random. I didn't know any way to stabilize my mind in peace or contentment.

How would we face death without this practice? How would we face aging? Just to know that you are not the body is amazing. How few people in the world have a sense of that? How scary it must be to meet death when we don't have a sense of anything else.

On one retreat, in order to practice gratitude, I made a list of all the things in my life I felt grateful for. At the start of every day, I would read that list. I found it just set my mind in a really positive direction. Whatever happened in the rest of the day, I had made that beginning with a truly optimistic attitude.

The last of the Brahmaviharas is this quality of equanimity, which Sarda also talked about. I don't want to say a lot about it—just want to make one little pointing.

I've often wondered how the Buddha stayed equanimous in the face of all the suffering that he saw. Conditions were very brutal in India in his day. There was a lot of war between neighboring kingdoms, and as you probably know, combat at that time was hand-to-hand, pretty direct and pretty bloody. There are accounts of monks walking across battlefields strewn with dead and bloodied bodies. The Buddha would have been exposed to all of that and seen all of that. How did he manage to stay equanimous in the middle of that kind of brutality?

Or how does the Dalai Lama stay balanced when he's responsible for Tibetan culture, when he may be all that stands between the present moment and the genocide—the termination of Tibetan culture?

I think it's because enlightened beings know a secret that we haven't fully integrated, if we've realized it at all. They know that within this mind and body process, there is no abiding center to whom all of this is happening. When we see clearly, there are only sights, sounds, smells, tastes, touches, thoughts, and emotions. There is nothing else. There's no core that's experiencing the impact of all this.

In the Visuddhimagga, there's a beautiful line that expresses this: "There is suffering, but there is no one who suffers. Empty phenomena roll on. This view alone is right and true."

Summed up another way: Jack Kornfield was visiting Sri Lanka when he was a monk. There was a very well-practiced patriarch in the country whom he went to visit. He asked the patriarch the reason for his happiness—this very jolly, smiling and laughing man. The patriarch replied, "No self, no problem."

It's the same pointing. This really is the union of wisdom and loving-kindness—the union of emptiness and caring. This is essentially what solves the problem of existence for us as we get grounded in that way of looking.

I'll close with the end of Oprah's interview with the Dalai Lama. Oprah said to him, "In my magazine, I do a column called 'What I Know For Sure.' What do you know for sure? The one thing about which you have no doubt?"

The Dalai Lama did not hesitate: "Compassion is the best source of happiness. For a happy life and a happy world, there is no doubt."

Let's just sit for a moment together.

This is the formulation of the Brahmaviharas in the Tibetan tradition—four wishes that are called the four immeasurables:

May all beings have happiness and the cause of happiness, which is virtue.

May all beings be free from sorrow and the cause of sorrow, which is non-virtue.

May all beings remain unseparated from the sacred happiness, which is free from sorrow.

May all beings come to rest in the great equanimity beyond attachment to those near and far.

Thank you.

Thank you for listening.

To learn how you can support the teachers and Dharma Seed, please visit dharmaseed.org/donate.

CHAPTER 14

An Attitude of Mindfulness

Guy Armstrong · 54 min

> In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong addresses two key aspects of meditation practice: the technical mechanics of observation and the spirit or attitude we bring to our practice. Drawing on the Satipatthāna Sutta (MN 10), he emphasizes finding balance between wholehearted commitment and relaxed ease, avoiding both excessive striving and insufficient energy.
>
> Armstrong introduces a practical teaching from Burmese teacher Ute Jāniya: regularly checking whether greed (wanting something different), aversion (resistance to what's present), or delusion (spacing out) are coloring our meditation attitude. He explains the framework of "relax, observe, allow" and discusses the Buddha's teaching on the totality of existence—the six sense doors and their objects from the Samyutta Nikāya.
>
> The talk explores two levels of knowing: basic consciousness (viññāṇa) that automatically receives sense impressions, and mindfulness (sati) which brings intelligent awareness to experience. Armstrong emphasizes that right attitude—characterized by the absence of greed, aversion, and delusion—creates what teacher Upasika Kee called "unentangled knowing," a foretaste of the unconditioned peace of nibbāna. This approach transforms meditation from mechanical attention into the opening of wisdom, where the path and goal converge in each mindful moment.

The talk tonight is called An Attitude of Mindfulness.

I want to discuss two different topics this evening. One is some technical aspects of how we do the practice and why we do the practice. The first day of a retreat, especially for those who are arriving, it can be helpful to reflect on some of the basics. The second thing I want to talk about is the spirit with which we approach our practice here.

Suzuki Roshi, who was the founder of San Francisco Zen Center, said it very nicely when he said, "In our practice we need to be serious, but we can't be too serious or we'll lose our way." So finding that balance between diligence and commitment to moment-to-moment noticing, and on the other hand, a sense of relaxation or ease or playfulness as we go through the day.

As Carol alluded to last night, some people begin a retreat, especially a long retreat, with very strong determination: "Enlightenment or bust! I've got to get some result. If I don't get enlightenment, at least I should get some jhanas, so I have a card stamp to take home and show people."

When I went home from my first long retreat here, one of my friends back in California said to me, "Did you have any out-of-body experiences?" And I said, "No." She said, "Did you ever levitate?" I said, "No." So it didn't stamp my card for her, but it was not what I was looking for.

So finding this kind of balance of mind that's wholehearted, but that is not putting pressure on ourselves. When I was younger in my practice, I had a lot of zeal. I worked really hard. Every retreat that I came on—long retreat, short retreat—I worked very hard, which I'm very grateful for today. I don't regret that in the least. But at times, in order to find balance, you usually have to go to each end of an extreme. So I was often at the trying-too-hard end of an extreme, and it manifested in my attitude.

When Sally and I moved to California, which was about twenty years ago—we met in England—but shortly after moving to California, we went to see a psychic. Because that's what you do in California. It's like you get your driver's license and you go to see a psychic. And where would we go but San Francisco, of course.

So we went to see a psychic and we walked in together. When I walked through the door, the psychic who was seated in a chair made this gesture of being thrown backwards by my energy. He said something like, "Wow, you're in such a hurry to get there. Don't you know that God comes more often to those who don't want him so much?"

So this was the phase of my strong zeal, or as it's sometimes called in Dharma circles, dhamma chanda—a wish for the dhamma, a longing for the truth. If that gets stretched a little too taut, it can bring us a lot of tension.

But on the other hand, if we don't have any of that zeal, then we come to a retreat like this, and first days are often long and hard, and the body's adjusting, and we're adjusting to the environment, and getting to know our job, and the people, and the teachers, and when can we take a shower. Sometimes it all seems like too much, and maybe I'll just spend the first days in bed. I'll get caught up on my sleep, and then I'll start to practice. So that could be a little bit insufficient on the energy and the motivation.

But somewhere between the two is a very useful attitude that we want to discover. We want to find it out through our own trial and error where that middle point is for us in effort.

Again, as Carol mentioned last night, one teacher expressed this really nicely in the short phrase: relax, observe, allow. This can be an instruction that you turn to again and again in our weeks together. I don't think there's ever an occasion where it's not a useful reminder: relax, observe, allow. It really sums up a lot about our practice.

So the first piece—relax—is a very important starting point. Joseph emphasized it in the instructions again this morning. We all will keep saying it over and over, and it refers to that inner place of being soft in the body and somewhat soft in the mind. When we can relax in meditation, it sends a strong signal to the brain and to the whole nervous system. The signal it sends is something like: "Things are okay. Things don't have to be different than they are. Things are okay right now." And that means we don't have to change anything from how it is. We don't have to fix anything.

You could say that this is evoking a factor that's really highly valued in the Buddha's teachings, which is a sense of trust—also called confidence, sometimes called faith. It's the first of the five spiritual faculties, and it's considered to be the thing that allows the whole path to be set in motion because we have a certain degree of trust that we can settle into and the path can unfold for us. This quality of trust is a very helpful place to start from. So we'll often stress this in the instructions: to relax the body and relax the mind as a beginning approach.

Why can we trust? Why is that a sensible thing to do? We talk a lot about how uncertain life is, how impermanent all the arisen conditions are. What are the grounds for this kind of trust and relaxation? Basically, it's the refuges that we talked about last night.

And particularly we can trust because the mind has an essential purity. This is what we spoke of last night—that seed of awakening, the nature we share with the Bodhisattva as he began his journey to Buddhahood. When we can start to feel that potential in ourselves, then we know: oh, that's what I can trust in. That's why I can let go a little bit, because that nature holds me.

There's a phrase that Joseph has used for years that I find really helpful: "settling back into the moment." I think he used it in the first retreat I ever sat, back in 1976, and he still uses it today. It expresses that ability of the mind to settle in itself out of a sense of trust or confidence.

As you practice with this, you'll discover that things don't have to be perfect for us to relax. Things just have to be okay. Things just have to be good enough. And then there is the ground for that ease to come in. So don't think that everything has to be just right before you can let go. Things can be just okay.

Then, once you're in that somewhat relaxed place, the next step is to observe. This is really the active part of meditation. We could also call it paying attention, looking, watching, experiencing, being present. If we're interested, then the observing happens pretty naturally. So from that relaxed place, can we become interested in what's happening now? Then we activate that awake quality that is the very meaning of the word Buddha. We wake up and notice what's going on in the body, what's going on in the mind, what's going on around us.

This quality of interest starts to cut through the fog of dullness that we often bring into retreat, or the distracted mind that is so common both in retreat and out of retreat. There was a New Yorker cartoon not long ago that epitomized this daily life mind that most of us carry in the world. It was a cartoon in three panels. The first panel showed a guy at work, sitting at his computer, thinking about playing golf. Obviously, his mind was involved in the golf game where he'd rather be than being at work. In the next panel, he was on the golf course about to hit the ball, and he was thinking about his girlfriend—rather than being present to golf, he'd rather be with his girlfriend. In the third panel, he was making love to his girlfriend, and the image that came into his mind was of his computer at work, just to close the loop.

With that kind of mind, wherever we are, whatever activity we're engaged in, it isn't quite enough to hold us. This distracted mind is always looking for something else. Here, of course, we're really training to be present here and now without needing to find anything else. And that's a kind of radical step.

As we find ourselves more and more in the present, we discover the lightness and relief that comes from that ending of distractedness. In the time of the Buddha, there was a visitor to the community. The Buddha was living as he often did in a community of practitioners—monks and nuns. The visitor was struck by how well all the practitioners looked. He said, "Your community is so happy, they're actually radiant. They're smiling, they're healthy, they're glowing. Why is that?"

The Buddha replied that they are radiant because they've learned to abide in the present. Their minds aren't distracted by the pull of hopes for the future or regrets about the past. They're just fully here and now.

We'll talk in much more detail about how to carry out this observing. But once we relax and we're here, then we watch with interest what's happening—body, mind, environment.

The third piece is to allow. This means that whatever we're observing, whatever we find happening, we let it be just the way it is. We don't try to fix these experiences of mind and body, because we start to recognize that everything that comes arises because of certain causes and conditions. Nothing arises purely randomly. Nothing arises uncaused. Everything arises because some other condition has been present to bring it into being. In that way, the moment as we encounter it could only have arisen in this one way.

We often teach with a friend and colleague in California, Sylvia Boorstein, who really has a way with phrases. This particular phrase came from one of her students, who shared it with Sylvia, and Sylvia's been sharing it ever since—so I'll share it with you. It was a California transmission. When someone asked Sylvia's student how she was, the student found the best response was: "I couldn't be better."

Whatever her condition was, that response was true. I couldn't be better. If I could be better, I would.

This moment has arisen from past causes and conditions—it couldn't be any different. And yet, the habit of our untrained mind, our unawakened mind, is to want it to be better and to try to make it better.

One of the things we observe again and again when we slow down and come into meditation is how many moments we spend trying to make the conditions better—trying to fix some ache in the body, some restlessness in the mind, some emotion arising from the heart. We don't want it that way; we want it this way. And we put our energy into trying to make it the way we'd like it to be.

In meditation, we start to see this is not just an infrequent occurrence, not just an occasional visitor, but a deeply conditioned habit of mind in each of us. This wanting to fix, wanting to improve, wanting to make things just right.

Through meditation we gain a very tiny amount of skill in being able to alter the way things are and make it a little better. Through our facility with awakening wholesome states of mind, the proper application of right effort, we find a way to alter that a little bit. But until we look at this innate habit, we remain caught in a significant pattern.

It doesn't seem like so much when you first become aware of it—oh, just a little tweak here, a little tweak there. I just want to improve it a little bit and then I'll be okay and then I'll rest in peace. But this little habit has quite significant implications.

You're probably all familiar with the term samsara. It refers to the cycle of birth, death, and rebirth that the Buddha described many times in his discourses, which he said has been going on for us since beginningless time, meaning that the number of existences each of us has had is uncountable, innumerable, too many to tally.

In the Tibetan tradition, they say that the source of our continued round of birth, death, and rebirth is the tendency to correct. The tendency to correct is the very heart of samsara.

So what's the heart of liberation? What's the heart for ending this wheel of continued arising and passing? It is not correcting—it is accepting, allowing with equanimity things to be just exactly the way they are, moment after moment after moment.

This inclination, this direction to allow, has deep consequences and deep meaning. It's where we discover the quality of peace. Eventually, we discover the quality of an unshakable peace through that allowing.

So this process of examining the attitude we bring to our practice and finding one that's not too striving and not too loose is very, very important and quite central. Maybe more important than what we choose to pay attention to is the question: How am I paying that attention? What's the attitude I'm bringing to this moment as I meditate in sitting and walking and throughout the day?

One of the teachers all of us have spent time with and really appreciated is a young Burmese Sayadaw named U Tejaniya, who has a center on the outskirts of Rangoon and came to the Forest Refuge about a year ago. One of the teachings I've most appreciated that's central to his message is a specific teaching on right attitude and how to discover what that is. I like it because he expresses it very simply. Many of you have probably heard this by now.

He said to check in any moment and to check frequently through your meditation: What is the attitude right now that I'm approaching the meditation with? Is there greed? Is there aversion? Is there delusion in the way I'm approaching the moment? Or is there non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion?

This sounds a little heady, but fortunately, Sayadaw gave some very simple ways to investigate these three tendencies.

In answering the question "Is there greed?" he says, take a look and see: Do you want something to be happening in your meditation that isn't happening? Are you looking to make something happen? Do you want more peace? Do you want more metta? Do you want more samadhi, more concentration? Do you want an insight right now? Are you looking for something to happen, in which case there's some wanting at work? It's unnecessary because we don't need to disturb the conditions the way they are, and because it's unnecessary, we call it greed. It goes further than it needs to. So is there wanting at work? Take a look.

Is there aversion at work? You can check that by asking: Is there something that's happening that I don't want to happen? The flip side of wanting is not liking. So is there something in my experience that I wish would go away, that I wish would stop? A physical sensation, a mind state, a noise, the presence of some person or a smell, some food.

Is there something that I want to stop happening? That's the reaction of aversion.

Or is delusion present? Delusion is the most subtle of the three, and it has many layers. So Sayadaw recommends just taking a look at the top layer of delusion. Am I aware of what's happening? Am I in touch with what's happening? If I'm not, then delusion is present. I'm spacing out into something else.

So this is a very helpful thing to bring in. You could bring it in a number of times in a sitting, a number of times in walking, at different times throughout your day as you're moving around. How am I relating to my experience of this moment? We can check this frequently, whatever our meditation focus happens to be—whether we're with breath or sounds or body or emotions or our food or our work meditation. We can be asking this question: What's my attitude right now? Is there greed? Is there aversion? Is there delusion?

Simply by asking the question, take a look and see what happens in your experience. I don't want to spell it out because I'd like you to do it. But I find that for me, there's a shift that comes inwardly just from asking the question. So try it. Try it a few times. And as you ask it, see also if there's an inner shift that happens just in the asking of the question.

Just to give some simple examples of missing the right attitude: the other day in my meditation, I noticed I was feeling some tension in the body. I wanted to have the experience that I'd had a few days earlier, which was of no tension in the body and a sense of relaxation and ease throughout the body. When that experience was there, it was kind of like my body sensations lined up in a certain way. There was this nice kind of pillar of free-flowing energy that ran up my spine and kept me erect, and everything felt very comfortable. I felt alert. I wanted that experience again. And in some subtle way, I was trying to make it happen. I was trying to bring it back.

When I realized that that's what I was doing, then I could say, "Oh, wrong attitude. That's desire. That's greed." But I was still wanting it back. So just noticing it doesn't always make it lift. Be aware of that. We may notice greed or aversion. It doesn't mean that they go away.

So I was noticing it: "Okay, there's wanting. There's wanting." And then the realization came. It was an insight I've had many times before, but I had it again: I can't control the body. I can't control my body sensations. I can't control my experience of the body. And then when I saw that, the real letting go happened. And as soon as I let go of the trying, the body relaxed into a comfortable pattern of sensations. So I can't control, but sometimes insight can help us relax and that opening takes place.

On a day like today, there can be a lot of opportunity for aversion. If you're a continuing yogi, there are a lot of new people to get used to, new teachers to get used to, maybe a new rhythm, new people around you in the hall, new neighbors in your residences. There can be a lot of speediness at this time in the retreat compared to the people who left a few days ago. The place is a little fuller now, so the dining room's a little more crowded at lunch.

For new people who've just arrived, settling in—as I mentioned earlier—brings a lot of bodily adjustment, a lot of mental adjustment. So aversion can easily come up today. Many opportunities for noticing resistance on a day like today. Of course these things will pass, and we can just kind of be stoic and gut them out.

But if we do, we're missing the opportunity to be mindful of our attitude. So when resistance is present, please notice it. And then see how the noticing affects your meditation. See what happens.

We're not asking this question so that we can become judgmental about ourselves. If we notice that greed or aversion or delusion is present, we want to notice that without adding any more greed or aversion or delusion. So we just notice, oh, that's wanting. No judgment, no further ripples of it. Wanting's present. We simply commit ourselves to noticing.

This is the pure property of mindfulness at work—just noticing. And then, at times when we find greed and aversion and delusion aren't present, we meditate, and with another one of Sylvia's lovely little phrases, our meditation becomes without agenda and without struggle. See if you can remind yourself from time to time throughout the day what it's like to be present without any agenda and without any struggle. That's the same pointing to right attitudes.

Now I want to talk a little bit more about the mechanics of observing. This is introducing some vocabulary that we'll be using throughout the retreat, so it's good if we can all get agreed on the terms we're using. To introduce it, I'd like to open up a kind of big picture view and ask each of us to take a look at our basic situation as human beings.

Regardless of being on retreat or in daily life, regardless of being in a female form or a male form, regardless of being young or old or white or black or any particular culture or race, what is our basic situation as humans? Maybe to frame it, I'll read something from Rumi, the Persian poet, when he said, "Where did I come from? And what am I supposed to be doing here? I have no idea."

That says something about our basic situation, doesn't it? How did we end up in this body, on this planet, alive on this earth? I have no idea. And yet, here we are.

So what does it mean to be a sentient being? We talk a lot in Buddhism about sentient beings and the possibility for all sentient beings to be free. What does it mean to be a sentient being? It really means that we're conscious beings, doesn't it? I want to talk a little bit about this factor of being conscious and what that involves.

What does it mean to be conscious, sentient? Maybe to approach it, we might ask by contrast, what is it when you're unconscious? Say you're in deep sleep, no dreaming, or you've fainted and there's nothing going on. By distinction, being conscious means things are going on, right? Isn't that the essence of being a conscious being? Things are happening for us.

This quality of happeningness is central to the Buddhist worldview. In fact, you might say it's the domain of Buddhism. Like moving objects are kind of the domain of physics, and interactions between atoms and molecules are the domain of chemistry, and the behavior of the mind is the domain of psychology. In Buddhism, the domain is the happenings in conscious experience.

So what's happening in conscious experience? What are the things that happen in your experience as an awake or conscious human being? This is from a discourse of the Buddha from the Samyutta Nikaya called the Discourse on Totality:

"Bhikkhus, listen, and I will teach you the totality of existence."

This is kind of bold, isn't it? How many people do you know who would start a discourse like that? I don't think Einstein ever said that. I don't think Freud ever said that. I don't think Marx ever said that. So here's the Buddha: "I will teach you the totality of existence. Listen, attend carefully, and I will speak. What is the totality of existence? It is just the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and objects of touch, the mind and mental phenomena. This is called the totality of existence."

And here he means sentient existence. Simple, isn't it?

These are just these six kinds of things happening: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and mental phenomena, and the organs through which they come. This is the domain of Buddhist investigation. These are the things that we look at again and again and again. Is there anything omitted here? Anything left out? Maybe something will come to you later, so you can drop me a note. But let's just take this as the basic situation for us as sentient beings. This is what we want to examine in our meditation.

We want to understand how these things come, how they pass away, and what our relationship to them is. Because being sentient means we're in relationship to all these things moment after moment.

So there's one other aspect that we want to tease out. You have sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and mental phenomena. Because you're conscious, you're experiencing all these things. They are registering as events, we could say, in your mind, in your consciousness. So each time there's the receiving or the registering of one of these events, that which receives it in Buddhism is called consciousness.

The Buddha's term in Pali is vijnana, and in English we translate it as consciousness. Whereas in the West we tend to use consciousness in a kind of broad, almost cosmological sense, most of the time in the Buddha's teachings, vijnana is used to mean just this receiving of a sense impression—sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, mental phenomenon.

This is the first word that I wanted to talk about so that we're on the same page with it. And we often, instead of consciousness, we'll say "knowing." So right now, if your ears are working, you're conscious of that sound, or we could say in shorthand, you're knowing that sound.

There's just the bare sense data of sound that's happening, and it registers automatically in each of us. It's different from a corpse's experience, isn't it? If the bell was rung and there was a corpse, chances are that sound would not be arising, probably because the ear had ceased to function, the mind had ceased to function. So the sound is a physical thing, but the knowing of it is a mental event called a moment of sound consciousness, a moment of hearing consciousness. Or we would often just say what's happening in us all at that moment is a knowing of that sound.

To fill out the picture that the Buddha just described, we need to explain that word "mind"—the mind organ that he mentioned. He said the mind and mental phenomena. Mind in this passage refers to this capacity for consciousness or knowing. So you could say it's the organ that knows, arising at all the six sense doors.

That's our life. We are experiencing the six sense objects and knowing them moment after moment. And they're always changing, so a new consciousness is arising, knowing each new moment of things that are happening.

This kind of knowing we're describing is not an intellectual knowing. It's not a conceptual knowing. It's pre-verbal. Any sentient being here would know this sound, but a dog or a baby would know this sound, even though they might not have the word "bell" or the word "sound." Still, that would register in their consciousness. So this is not a particularly intelligent kind of knowing. It's just a bare sense knowing.

It's happening all the time, as long as we're awake. There's always some object at the six sense doors, at some of the six sense doors, happening for us. And we can't turn it off. When the bell sounds, can you choose not to hear it? Maybe if you plug your ears, but otherwise, we don't have any choice. It happens automatically.

So this consciousness faculty is almost mechanical. I mean, we need to be living sentient beings. But once we are, it happens beyond our will. We can't turn it off. If the sound is there, we will know it. Albert Einstein had this kind of sense consciousness. A dog has this kind of sense consciousness. A baby has it. An ant has it. So all sentient beings are characterized by this. Buddhas have it. Bodhisattvas have it.

We all have it. This is one level of knowing that we'll talk often about.

There's another level of knowing that Joseph alluded to today in the guided meditation, which is better described by the term mindfulness. So mindfulness in Pali—you probably know the word is sati. Sati originally was another of those words the Buddha took from common Indian usage and gave a deep spiritual significance. In common Indian usage, the word simply meant remembering, but it's used as mindfulness for our knowing what our experience is.

This early sense of remembering is quite a nice thing to reflect on because it has the sense of "remember you're here," or recollecting—recollecting that you're awake, recollecting your attention in the present moment. If you've ever read the book Island by Aldous Huxley, it was his last novel, presenting a very optimistic counterpart to Brave New World. By that time he had gotten into LSD. Island was a kind of utopian paradise set on a tropical island somewhere in the Pacific.

One of the features of this very enlightened society was that the people had trained the mina birds to speak. What they were trained to do was say very loudly, "Here and now, here and now," so that wherever you were on the island, you'd keep getting this reminder to remember here and now. That's the sense of remembering—remembering what it is that you're about, remembering what it is that's happening.

In the Satipatthana Sutta, the Buddha uses again and again this encouragement—as Joseph mentioned this morning—when one breathes in long, one knows that one breathes in long. When one breathes in short, one knows that one breathes in short. This kind of knowing has a quality of intelligence, of an awake, paying attention, comprehending quality that hearing the sound does not.

So vijnana, or consciousness, is basically unintelligent in its barest form. Sati, or mindfulness, has intelligence—requires intelligence to function. This is pointed to in the sutta by the choice of the word that the Buddha uses, which was translated this morning as "knowing." The word in Pali is pajanati. It can also be translated as understand, discern, distinguish. The later commentaries used it as a synonym for panya, which is the common word for wisdom in Pali.

That points to the fact that this quality of mindfulness is an intelligent response to the events that are revealed by consciousness. You could say that consciousness reveals the phenomenon, mindfulness understands it or knows it for what it is. It knows that it's a present moment arising, may know which of the sense doors it's arising in. As you connect with your breath, you know it's long or short. As you connect with the sound, you may know that it's pleasant or unpleasant, that the pitch is high or low. This active quality of intelligence is brought to bear on the bare phenomena that are revealed by vijnana or consciousness.

So you might say there are these two levels of knowing. One is quite automatic and unintelligent—we could just call that simply knowing. The other is of a higher level, has intelligence—we might call it understanding. We'll also call it knowing, so I will leave it to you by context to understand which level we're talking about. But I just wanted to make it clear there are these two different levels of knowing that we may discuss.

Because mindfulness introduces this element of intelligence, it becomes the opening to wisdom. As you probably know, in the Eightfold Path, wisdom is the first part of the path—right view, right intention—that comprises the wisdom component, and it's considered that it's only wisdom that can liberate us. So the open door of wisdom is activated through this quality of mindful intelligence.

This is drawn out by some of the Thai, particularly the Thai forest teachers, who have this habit—this lovely habit—of combining the terms for mindfulness and wisdom and using them as one word. So Ajahn Buddhadasa, a great master in the Thai tradition, would often talk about satipanya, mindfulness-wisdom as a pair, with a clear implication that where mindfulness goes, wisdom will follow.

So in our practice of paying attention moment by moment, we're not just being mechanical. We're not just being vanguards of samadhi by bringing mindfulness to collect the mind, but we're also opening the wisdom door to insight.

What happens in a very practical way, as we start to bring the mindful attention into the details of our experience, is that we encounter a breath, we know that it's breathing in, we notice that it's long, and we start to notice that it has a beginning and it also has an end. We start to tune into sounds, and any sound that arises we can trace the beginning—it extends for a while and then it fades, and we notice that it has an end.

As we start to get close to the individual characteristics of these detailed phenomena of our experience, revealed by consciousness, we also start to understand their universal characteristics. We start to see the impermanence of every arisen phenomenon. We start to see that if we try to hold on, it's futile. If we try to change the way things are, we suffer. So we see the unsatisfactoriness of conditioned arisings.

And because everything arises and passes at these six senses, then we know that nothing is stable or ongoing in the field of the senses. So we realize there can't be an ongoing I, an ongoing core to this phenomenon. The close attention of mindfulness leads us directly into insight.

You probably know that the kind of meditation we're practicing is called Vipassana in Pali. It means seeing clearly, often translated as insight meditation. And this is how the insight connection gets established. All we can do to encourage insight is to pay close attention, interested attention, with this right attitude. As we see more and more the details of our experience at the six sense doors, the truth of their universal nature—what are called the three characteristics of impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and not-self—come through clearer and clearer.

I was talking with a staff member at Spirit Rock recently, someone who had a very strong longing to be on a long retreat, someone with a lot of Dhammachanda, a lot of zeal right now. He asked me, "I haven't been able to do a long retreat yet. Tell me one of the benefits that I might expect from doing a long retreat." I could have talked about things like the fantastic altered states that arise from time to time, or the strange concentration phenomena that come for some people, or how beautiful nature looks when you go out to watch the sunset. But what I told him, what came to me, is that the three characteristics become really unmistakable after a while—really unmistakable. I heard it from a number of you in interviews this morning: this absence of ongoing self becomes so apparent at times, and the impermanence becomes just a simple fact of life that we almost don't even comment on because it's so taken for granted.

So this is the awakening of intelligence, the awakening of insight, the awakening of wisdom through this close attention.

As we give meditation instructions, we can point to phenomena at all the six sense doors. There are so many different meditation techniques—they're mostly about what you pay attention to that's arising in your field of experience. We started today with the breath because the Buddha started there. It's a wonderful beginning and can be the whole of your practice career. But we'll introduce many other objects because different ones work well for different people. So we'll give you a lot of choices.

As we introduce the different objects, please remember that the most important thing is not your object, but the quality of mindfulness and attitude that you're bringing to it. There's nothing sacred about the breath, even though we started there. Any object of the six senses can work just fine. So we'll give you a lot of choices. Find the ones that work best for you.

One of the other factors that is so helpful in letting wisdom grow out of mindfulness is the quality of interest. And of course, this also supports the right attitude. We have this great capacity for self-understanding, and it's strongly buttressed, strongly supported by the element of interest. If you can develop an interest in what you're looking at—whether it's the breath or a sound or your body sensations, the thoughts and emotions, even this play of consciousness—sometimes that becomes the most fascinating aspect of sentient life. Anything that you experience, you can pay attention to. And so anything that you become interested in of these six kinds of objects can become the basis for your mindfulness.

The quality of interest brings a wholeheartedness and a natural ability to stay in the moment. What's it like when you see a chipmunk on one of the stone walls? What's it like when one of the chickadees lands in the palm of your hand when you're out there with sunflower seeds? Isn't there a natural, wholehearted interest in that moment?

Sally and I were driving back to our apartment after lunch. We were on the backside of the loop, and she spotted a coyote standing in a field in the noonday sun—a green field and this big, bushy-haired, dog-like thing. So we just stopped the car and we were just riveted on the appearance of this coyote because I've often heard them at night but I haven't seen them. And here in broad daylight was this creature in the middle of one of the fields. So we just stood and watched it. But then it sort of tuned in that we were there. I think the sound of the car engine running—it noticed. So it loped off. And again, watching a coyote lope is fascinating. It's almost like a deer because it had a bounce in its step that most dogs don't have. So it was just a short experience, but we were so present because we loved seeing that creature.

Imagine if you loved seeing your breath in that same way, if you loved seeing your body sensations, if you loved meeting a thought or a mind state in that same way. Then that natural interest and curiosity will hold your attention without any effort. And the function of mindfulness can just happen very naturally.

So this practice of checking attitude can be very helpful. Is there wanting? Is there aversion? Is there delusion? But what happens when we ask those questions and we look and we check and there's not? Am I wanting something different? No. Am I resisting something that's happening? No. Am I in touch with what's happening?

Yeah.

So in that moment, as far as we can see, there's not greed, there's not aversion, and there's not delusion. What does that feel like? I don't want to describe it because honestly, every time it arises, it can be different depending on what other factors of mind are present also. But let's say that's a wholesome state—the absence of greed, the absence of aversion, the absence of delusion.

When you start to feel what that state is like and the potential of it, you're starting to find the sweet spot in meditation. Sayadaw U Tejaniya says that this is when meditation proceeds well—when we find no greed, no aversion, no delusion.

There's a very wonderful Thai laywoman teacher who taught in the second half of the last century named Upasika Kee, a very enlightened laywoman, I think, from her writing. She pointed her students again and again to this place of the absence of greed, the absence of aversion, the absence of delusion and the presence of awake attention. What she called this was unentangled knowing.

And that's kind of the feeling of it. We're present, all the phenomena of the six senses are happening, but we're not entangled with any of them either in a reactive formation of holding on or reactive formation of pushing away. So there's this sense of freedom and awakeness at those times.

Sariputta was once asked—one of the chief disciples of the Buddha was once asked—what is nibbana? What is the unconditioned element? And he said, "It is the destruction of greed, the destruction of aversion, the destruction of delusion. This is called nibbana."

Do you notice a similarity? Non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion—very close to the unconditioned nibbana, the description of the final freedom, the unconditioned peace.

So you could say that as you start to find this sweet spot in meditation, this quality of unentangled knowing, you are approaching the quality of the unconditioned. It's not full, not necessarily complete in that moment, but you're getting a taste of it, a foretaste of it, which is the culmination of this path.

So this right attitude that we're looking for is, let's say, as close an approximation as we can find today to this quality of nibbana, this unconditioned element that is the release pointed to by the Third Noble Truth.

When we start to understand this, we start to feel that the path—which is this unentangled knowing—and the goal—which is this absence of greed, aversion, and delusion—start to come together. And we can have a sense that we're touching the goal even as we're activating the path. So in a way, we arrive at our destination moment after moment. And each of those moments of arrival furthers the path, draws us even closer to the fullness, to the completeness of nibbana, the unconditioned element.

I'll just close with this quotation from the Satipatthana Sutta, where the Buddha concludes by saying that this—that is, the foundations of mindfulness—"this is the direct path for the purification of beings, for the overcoming of sorrow, for the disappearance of pain and grief, for the attainment of the true way"—that is, the establishment of mindfulness.

At the end of a Dharma talk here, we'd like to just sit for a minute or so in silence together, just to let the words settle before we move. So we'll just have a moment of silence together.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 15

Working With Difficult Emotions

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong addresses the inevitable arising of difficult emotions in meditation practice and daily life. Drawing from the Satipatthana Sutta (MN 10), he explores the third foundation of mindfulness - contemplating citta (mind-heart) - and how to work with afflictive mental states rather than trying to eliminate them. Armstrong identifies four primary difficult emotions that arise from our relationship to time and pleasant/unpleasant experiences: sadness (pleasant past), desire (pleasant future), anger (unpleasant past), and fear (unpleasant future). He emphasizes that these emotions are sustained by our thoughts and storylines, and can only be transformed through direct investigation with mindfulness. The talk offers practical guidance on observing emotions in three areas: bodily sensations, mental qualities, and thought patterns. Armstrong stresses that wisdom develops not by avoiding difficult states, but by learning to meet them with courage and understanding, allowing them to become 'the very food that wisdom grows on.'

The Buddha's entire forty-five years of teaching, as you probably know, was all about the theme of suffering and the ending of suffering—always these complementary pairs. Sometimes Buddhism has gotten a reputation for being a gloomy religion because of its emphasis on the dukkha aspect. But when you listen to the discourses of the Buddha, he almost always pairs dukkha with the end of dukkha, and points as often to the liberated qualities of mind as to the struggling qualities of mind. So in our practice also, we want to keep both these halves in mind.

However, the fact is that near the start of a long retreat—this six-week period for those who have arrived—the predominant experience tends to be on the dukkha side. And it may not stay that way for those of you who have been here for seven weeks now. You may be moving into the positive and blissful and liberated experiences from time to time. But dukkha has probably still not gone completely out of your vision. As we go on in the second half, we'll talk more and more about the beautiful qualities of mind through qualities like the spiritual faculties, the factors of enlightenment, the brahmaviharas, and so on. But tonight, I'm going to focus on the dukkha aspect of things.

When I contemplate life in the world and think about the magnitude of suffering and distress that's happening, it seems very complex. We can look on a global level at the international conflicts and wars that are going on. We can look at a national level and the number of people living in poverty and unemployment. We look on the community level and know friends who've lost their homes or lost their jobs. We look on the family level and see conflict and stress.

And yet when we come into retreat, it all begins to seem very simple. Our own personal suffering becomes pretty straightforward. I've been struck by this a number of times. It seems to me that once I start to look at my own situation—and Buddhism always encourages us to do that, you might say to take responsibility for the state of our own minds and the possibility of freedom of our own minds—when I look from that point of view, when I ask what can I do to solve the problem of my own suffering, it starts to seem simple.

Because it seems to me that in retreat there are basically three things I suffer from. And this may be true for you as well. You can check and see.

One is body pain. It's a frequent visitor because we're sitting long periods, long hours without moving, and often that accumulates some degree of holding and tension that becomes uncomfortable. You sit long enough and any sitting will become uncomfortable. So that's the first thing that I always find myself dealing with.

The second thing is mental pain. Whenever I sit, I go through a whole range of emotions, some of them pleasant and some of them not so pleasant. So I encounter in my practice, as in my daily life, the forces of wanting and loneliness and fear and sadness and regret and anxiety, self-judging, judging of others, anger, irritation, and so forth—part of our whole human experience, in addition to the beautiful states. But these difficult states still come.

And then the third form of suffering I experience on retreat is unique to meditators, I think. So isn't it nice to know we have our own special brand of suffering? And it's the suffering that comes from wanting the meditation to go well. You know, when you were an untaught worldling, as the Buddha said, did you worry if your mind wandered? Did you worry if you couldn't keep it on a chosen object for ten minutes at a time or one minute at a time? No, that wasn't a problem. But here, quite often during the days on retreat, I find myself thinking, "Why can't the mind stay a little more settled? I want more stability. I want more experience of concentration." So I suffer from wandering mind, restlessness, lack of stability, lack of concentration—a unique occupational hazard for us.

But these are the only three things that I notice. That's it. And when I'm in the retreat mode and I start to sort it out that way, then I realize, oh, to make my peace with life, I have to make my peace with these three areas. And that's really it. That solves my problem of suffering while I'm in retreat.

If we can solve our problem of suffering while we're in retreat, we'll find that when we go back into the world, we know much better how to solve the problems of suffering that we find ourselves in, whether the suffering is from us or from others. Because when we understand the roots, we're able to liberate them more easily in our own mind, and we're able to deal more skillfully with the suffering of others.

So tonight I want to focus specifically on this second type of retreat suffering, which is the suffering of difficult mental states. I want to talk about how to work with the difficult emotions that arise for us, which arise in retreat as well as in our daily life. When you look across the world as a whole, you can see how much havoc these states play in the world. You can look across the West today and see virtually an epidemic of depression, it seems to me.

We can see this epidemic reflected in the growing numbers of people reporting these conditions to their doctors and receiving treatment. It reveals something profound about our culture and our modern world.

We suffer from anxiety and stress brought on by the relentless pace of life, feeling its daily impact in our bodies, hearts, and minds. We experience loneliness and isolation as we become disconnected from genuine community, watching the breakdown of relationships that once sustained us. Being part of this culture, we ourselves are subject to all of these afflictions.

When we don't understand these states, when we don't know how to release them, we often feel victimized. We become hostages of our own minds, which inflict pain upon us. But precisely because these conditions are such a source of suffering—both individually and globally—they also point us toward some of the greatest openings in dharma practice.

I personally believe that vipassana practice, with its direct application of mindfulness to our experience, holds immense potential for healing in the world. When we begin to shine the light of mindfulness on these difficult emotions, they start to open up, revealing possibilities for liberation. Perhaps not final liberation or complete freedom, but pathways that can bring significantly more freedom into our lives, both in retreat and at home.

One of the most immediate benefits of vipassana practice is developing greater facility in working with difficult emotions. This encourages us—indeed, invites us—to open up and explore the full range of what occurs in our minds.

So often in life, we can see how people close down, how we've all restricted our emotional range because some territories have become frightening. We haven't been able to handle the intensity of certain emotions that arose for us, often during adolescence when we opened to experiences we couldn't fully integrate at that stage of life. By failing to integrate them, we moved into adulthood with limitations—areas of closure, holding, and unresolved issues.

Through meditation, we can begin to explore this complete range and bring greater understanding to it all.

Pema Chödrön, the wonderful nun who is abbess of Gampo Abbey in Nova Scotia, expresses this beautifully: "In all kinds of situations, we can find out what is simply by studying ourselves in every nook and cranny, in every dark and bright spot, whether it's murky, creepy, grisly, splendid, spooky, frightening, joyful, inspiring, peaceful, or wrathful. We can just learn about the whole thing."

There is tremendous encouragement to do this, and meditation provides us the method. This is the key. The tool of mindfulness gives us the means to examine every area of our mind, every corner, whether beautiful or frightening and dark. If we leave those areas unexplored out of hesitation, reservation, or fear of what we might discover there, we will always live in tension with ourselves—somewhat divided. But meditation offers us the possibility to enter the whole of the psyche, make peace with what we find there, and in doing so, integrate our being to a degree we haven't been able to achieve before. This is an essential part of our journey.

I find it refreshing to watch children deal with their emotions because they're not afraid of them. Children will dive right into the normal emotions of daily life. They'll be playing happily together, full of laughter, joy, and giggling. When something comes up—some anger or conflict—they'll go right into that too, yelling at each other, ready to bump heads. Then five minutes later, having worked it out, they'll be playing happily again, peaceful and calm. They don't hold back, and the emotions don't get stuck.

This happens as long as children are raised with a basic degree of respect. When children are severely neglected, mistreated, or abused, emotions can become overwhelming—too much for them to understand or handle, and then closure happens. But when they're brought up with consistent respect and trauma doesn't enter the picture, there's a natural openness and lack of fear that is quite inspiring. We can learn this approach as well.

Watching children shows us that to have that sense of openness and freedom, we don't need to eliminate these difficult states. That doesn't become the immediate aim of our practice. In the long term, it is said that this does happen for practitioners at advanced stages of development—sense desire and aversion are eliminated from the mind at a certain stage of awakening, and all other mental impurities are eliminated at full awakening, the final stage.

But at our current stage—since we're probably not going to reach the third stage of awakening on this retreat—we can discover tremendous freedom by opening to what we actually have.

When I first came to meditation, I really hoped it would allow me to get rid of these states. I thought enlightenment would accomplish that, and I couldn't wait to become enlightened so I could be free of this kind of pain. Now I see it the other way around. I don't believe enlightenment is possible until we make peace with these states, until we achieve some degree of wisdom in relationship to them.

Again from Pema Chödrön: "The basic obstacle is that we don't like what is now and therefore wish it would go away fast. But what we find as practitioners is that nothing ever goes away until it has taught us what we need to know. If we run 100 miles an hour to the other end of the continent in order to get away from the obstacle, we find the very same problem waiting for us when we arrive."

This is the invitation: whatever form of emotional difficulty is yours—and it varies greatly from person to person. For some, the dominant difficulty is craving; for others, it's anger; for others, fear; still others struggle with confusion or self-judgment. Whatever is most present for you becomes the place to inquire into, explore, and learn about. There is no other way than diving in and discovering its nature. This is meditation's invitation.

Just to set this within the classical foundation, what we're talking about is included in the third foundation of mindfulness, as described in the Satipatthana Sutta. This is the foundation that focuses on what's called citta. The first foundation is body, which includes breath. The second foundation is feeling tone, which I think was introduced in the instructions this morning by Carol. The third foundation is called citta—it can be translated either as mind or heart. The fourth foundation is called dhammas, and I think of this as the principles of nature, learning about the principles that govern us. So the talk tonight is focusing on the third foundation.

This foundation is described by the term citta, which is often translated as mind, but could just as well be translated as heart. If you ask a Western person, "Where is your mind?" we're likely to point here, to our heads. If you ask someone in Thailand, "Where is your citta?" they will point here, to the center of the chest. Because it's considered in Buddhist teachings that the base of mind is in the center of the chest. It includes emotional as well as cognitive activity.

In the teachings of the Buddha, there is not this kind of clear distinction in using the word mind that we often might make in the West when we talk about the mind in relation to—or as opposed to, or compared to—the heart. So this word citta encompasses both. It encompasses our thinking faculties and our emotional faculties as well.

This was brought home in India through a meeting with the Dalai Lama. You probably know that over the last fifteen years or so, a group of scientists have been meeting annually with His Holiness the Dalai Lama to explore the overlap between Buddhism and Western science, sharing perspectives between these two worlds. The Dalai Lama is very interested in this dialogue.

What's emerged from these meetings is a series of research studies that are starting to validate in Western empirical terms the benefits that come from Buddhist meditation—both physical benefits, mental benefits, emotional benefits, and so forth. So these studies may become the way that the rest of the West starts to believe what we've been trying to tell them for a long time. But you see, they're not so interested in listening to meditators, because if we believe in a religion, we're already biased. We're not trustworthy, you see. So the scientists who are impartial and objective, reporting on it, will convince a lot of people that we could never reach. So I'm very appreciative of their efforts.

One of the foremost researchers is at the University of Wisconsin in Madison. His name's Richie Davidson. He's a longtime vipassana practitioner, but don't tell anybody. He has been working with the Dalai Lama for a number of years now through this organization called Mind and Life. At one point, the Dalai Lama asked him to bring over some of his equipment to India, because His Holiness wanted to show the rest of his monks what this research was about.

Well, a lot of Richie's experiments were done in MRI machines, and that's a little too much equipment to transport to Dharamsala. So what he did was take over electrode caps that they have created out of strips of leather lined with electrodes. The electrodes come in contact with the scalp, and there are quite a number of them—maybe fifty electrodes running down, implanted in these leather strips in the cap that the subject puts on. They're connected by wires to a computer that reads the output from each electrode. So they can measure where brain activity is happening in a reasonably precise way. It's not as good as an MRI, but it's reasonably precise when subjects are looking at different pictures or engaging in different meditative exercises, such as generating compassion.

So Richie carried over a few of these electrode leather caps and put one on to demonstrate to the monks how the experiment was being carried out. He explained the purpose of the research: to measure brain activity so that scientists could understand what was happening in the mind of meditators and then share that with the world. His Holiness was up on the platform with Richie, and there were about five hundred monks in this large auditorium.

Richie said that when he finished the presentation, all the monks just broke up laughing. Just five hundred of them cracked up at the same time. He assumed that it was because he looked so silly with the electrode cap on. But that wasn't the reason.

One of the monks, in explaining it, spoke up and said, "This is so funny. You're trying to investigate the mind by measuring the brain when everybody knows that the mind is here." And he pointed to the center of his chest.

Richie told us this story on a retreat some months ago, and we had a discussion with him: How can we measure what's happening here in the heart center? Because there's not quite the same kind of electrical activity as is going on in the brain. So that will be the frontier of neuroscience—to measure what is happening around the heart center. That would be fascinating.

So this third foundation of mindfulness is looking into the whole area of heart and mind, and I'd like to read you the way this is introduced in the Satipatthana Sutta. The Buddha, in giving these instructions of the third foundation, puts it this way:

"And how, bhikkhus, does a bhikkhu abide contemplating mind as mind—that is, citta as citta? Here, a bhikkhu understands mind affected by lust as mind affected by lust, and mind unaffected by lust as mind unaffected by lust. She understands mind affected by hatred as mind affected by hatred, and mind unaffected by hatred as mind unaffected by hatred. He understands mind affected by delusion as mind affected by delusion, and mind unaffected by delusion as mind unaffected by delusion. This is how a bhikkhu abides, contemplating mind as mind."

A couple of things to notice in this description. First, the term "understands." This is our old friend, pajanati, which we also encountered in relationship to the breath—understanding a long breath or a short breath. Or we could just use the word "knowing." So again, this concept of knowing or understanding comes through here.

The second thing to mention is that in the instructions, the Buddha is focusing on these qualities we've been talking about—greed, hatred, and delusion, or the absence of greed, hatred, and delusion. So we see again that these three are the critical roots of unwholesome states. The absence of them are the roots of all the wholesome states.

It's quite interesting to look in this way because you can take any suffering state of mind and analyze: what's the component in it of greed? What's the component of aversion? What's the component of confusion? Because every unwholesome state is a mix in some way of those three. Then you can look at wholesome states of mind, beautiful states, and see what's the mixture of non-greed, non-hatred, non-delusion.

So this is the exploration of the realm of citta, and we'll be looking particularly tonight at the difficult or suffering aspects of this.

I want to talk a little bit about the vocabulary that I'll be using, not just tonight, but throughout the retreat. A lot of us share this vocabulary, so I want to introduce it early. We often talk about citta as encompassing moods, emotions, and states of mind. I'll use these three terms at different points tonight, so I want to distinguish what I mean by them. Other people may use them a little differently.

For me, emotion is something that's a strong feeling—a very obvious and clear strong feeling: happiness, sadness, joy, fear, loneliness, anxiety, and so forth.

Mood is something that has an emotional quality. It has a heart tinge to it, but it's often more subtle, not quite as pronounced, not as strong. More like a kind of cloud in the background that pervades everything that you might miss if you weren't just tuning into it. You might say, "Oh, I woke up this morning and I had a kind of mood of melancholy"—just feeling kind of melancholy. It's not a big deal, but it's kind of there in the background in a pervasive way. Or you might go for a walk and the sun is out and you've just been sitting in quiet, and you just feel a mood of tenderness. You look around and everything just seems very open and vulnerable, and there's a tender relationship to it. It's not going to knock you over the head, but it's a coloring that's in the mind at that time.

Then there's this more generic term that I'll use often called states of mind. This is the broadest term. For me, states of mind include moods and emotions, but it also includes the more subtle qualities of mind that develop through meditation—qualities like mindfulness, calm, equanimity, peace, wise attention. These are factors of mind that we can notice, that we can appreciate, that are very wholesome, but they don't have a particularly emotional quality to them. Their affect is quite neutral, but they are very wholesome at the same time.

So states of mind is the broadest of these. It will include moods, emotions, as well as refined meditative states. The technical term that came out of the Abhidhamma, the Buddhist psychology, that you'll often hear is "mental factors." The Abhidhamma, which is compiled in the few hundred years after the Buddha's death, identified fifty-two different factors of mind that could arise. And it said, "That's all there could be. There are no more." And every other one is a combination of these fifty-two factors. Well, life has gotten more complicated since then, so there are probably at least a hundred fifty-two now. But at any rate, there's a lot. There's a wide range.

So in working with difficult emotions, there are two things that need to happen. One is, compared to when we begin practice, for most of us there needs to be an attitude shift, and it is toward greater acceptance. This is the kind of first move that we need to make in relation to these states. We need to have more willingness to let them be just the way they are.

The second thing that needs to happen is we need to bring greater understanding of the states in. And we do that just by observing them. That's the beauty of mindfulness—to simply watch these states arise, persist. We learn how they're given to arise, how they're sustained, and how they pass away. That understanding is ultimately what frees us from their grip.

Because we start to see their mechanical nature. It's like a button is pressed and one of these reactive formations comes up. Once it's activated, it has its own particular dance. We learn its steps. We learn how they impact us. The mystery starts getting taken out of it. When the mystery gets taken out, they can't enchant us in the same way. They can't delude us or confuse us or mislead us.

The wisdom aspect that comes simply from observation is the most important piece. But in order to activate it, we have to open with acceptance first. These are the two steps: accepting attitude and greater understanding.

Let's talk about this in more practical detail—how to work when one of these states comes up. The first step is to know what it is that we're feeling. To name it is very helpful—to name the emotion you're feeling if you can. As Annie said the other morning in response to a question, if you don't know the name, don't worry about it. You can name it as "something" or just "this." If you happen to recognize what it is, then you can name it, and that will be helpful. But just to know that something is present and you're feeling it—that's the first step.

This is harder than it sounds, even when we're pretty mindful. I'll give you an example. I was practicing here for a six-week period some years ago. About two weeks into the retreat, I'd settled in and was pretty present. After the 8:15 sit, I got up from the hall and walked out to go to my walking place, which was down in the grassy area below the meditation hall. I walked out the back door, very present with my steps, aware of lifting, moving, and placing with each step.

Partway down the hill, I looked out to my walking path—there was someone there. This should not have happened, because I had been walking there every walking period for those two weeks. I thought, "Don't they know that's my walking path?" I was still very mindful—lifting, moving, placing—and as I started to walk down the hill, I was trying to figure out what had happened. Did I cut in front of them in the breakfast line this morning? Is this their revenge? Are they trying to play mind games with me? I was lifting, moving, placing. I was really with my steps.

But inwardly, I was fuming because it seemed, at the most charitable, very undeveloped of them. Nonetheless, I walked down to my walking area, found another patch of grass, which much to my surprise worked just as well, and did my walking meditation. I was about thirty minutes into it when I noticed—I'm angry.

I had continued to go through all the blaming thoughts and the figuring-it-out thoughts, but I had never made the notice: "Oh, anger." As long as I couldn't recognize that that's what I was feeling, I was just caught in it. I was caught in the story. I believed what I was thinking. I had no doubt that they were wrong and I was right, and that angry tone colored my whole world. The identification with the experience was so strong, there was no space to liberate it.

Once I could recognize, "Oh, I'm under the sway of anger," then I could work with it because I know how to work with anger. I knew by then I needed to feel it in my body, recognize it in my mind, and look at the kinds of thoughts that arose and how they impacted the anger. Within a few minutes, it was gone. I was able to release it.

Until I could recognize it, there was no possibility of releasing it because I was just glued to it. This process of noticing what we're feeling is a very powerful step toward freedom.

One research study is particularly interesting. Scientists—I think these were psychologists—were working with subjects who had problems with anger management. They'd tried many techniques to get people to inhibit their responses when anger becomes activated in them, because many people will just lash out verbally or physically, lose their temper, and get themselves into a lot of trouble.

They tried many techniques to inhibit anger responses, with varying degrees of success. In this particular experiment, researchers used only one simple instruction with their subjects: when anger arose, they were to say "this is anger." That was the entirety of the intervention—nothing else. No additional instructions or advice were given.

The subjects practiced this for two weeks, and the results were remarkable. Those who had practiced this simple recognition showed significantly greater success in managing their anger compared to many other methods previously tested. This strikingly successful approach was nothing more than basic mindfulness—the simple act of knowing what we're feeling.

Even when we cannot find precise words for an emotion, just recognizing "this is what I'm feeling right now" creates space around the experience. We no longer need to blindly act out our emotions. This space emerges through the intelligence that mindfulness brings to each moment.

When we add this new piece of information—"Oh, there's anger present"—we introduce a wisdom element into our experience. We discover that our emotional state has shifted from just anger to anger plus mindfulness. This wholesome quality of recognition gives us the space to make wise choices about how to respond to the emotion rather than being swept away by it.

Three Aspects of Emotional Awareness

In working with emotions through mindfulness, we need to examine three interconnected areas: how emotions manifest in the body, how they feel in the mind, and how they express themselves through our thoughts. Bringing all three aspects under the umbrella of mindfulness creates a comprehensive understanding of our emotional experience.

The Body

Every strong emotion creates some kind of impact in the physical body. With anger, we typically find contraction, an upsurge of energy, and tension gathering around the neck and shoulders. Learning to recognize these bodily signatures helps us identify emotions as they arise, often before they fully develop.

The Mind

This aspect can be more challenging to understand because emotions feel so embodied that we might think the bodily sensation is the emotion itself—that anger is simply that contraction in the neck. However, as meditators, we need to distinguish between the physical and mental components of our experience.

While the contraction and tension belong to the body's domain, every emotion also brings a distinct mental coloring or flavor to consciousness. The taste of joy differs completely from the taste of fear or the flavor of anger. By becoming familiar with these mental qualities, we can identify emotions simply through their characteristic mood-tone, even when physical sensations are subtle.

Though we experience emotions as unified phenomena—mind and body seamlessly coupled—we can learn to recognize their different components. It's like drinking coffee with milk: we taste one unified flavor, but understanding the individual tastes of black coffee and plain milk helps us comprehend how that combined flavor emerges.

Sometimes in meditation, bodily sensations may be so light and moods so subtle that we don't register much physical impact. In these moments, we can still recognize emotions through their mental flavoring alone—that particular coloring they bring to consciousness.

The Thoughts

The third component involves observing our thinking patterns. When we examine anger's mental quality, we often discover a fiery or burning characteristic. Then we can observe the accompanying thoughts. In my walking meditation example, the thoughts centered around righteousness: "They're wrong and I'm right. They shouldn't be there because this is really my walking path."

As long as I continued entertaining these thoughts, I kept reinforcing the anger. When I stopped feeding these mental patterns, the anger naturally began to fade. This reveals the powerful relationship between our thinking and our emotional states—how our thoughts can either sustain or dissolve our emotional reactions.

So this is something else we want to really understand about emotions. All the afflictive emotions are sustained by thinking. Let go of the thoughts, and the afflictive emotion fades.

Basically, left alone, any emotion will pass. That's why it's safe to open to them. Emotions don't have the ability to sustain themselves forever. They only get that power through our resistance. When we try to suppress an emotion out of fear, we prolong it. If we open to it and allow it, it will arise, persist, and pass away. That's the nature of emotion.

Another way to think about this factor of thoughts is that we create a storyline around the emotion. The storyline with my anger was that I was right and they were wrong. If you look at anger in general, that's generally what it's founded on—a storyline of "I'm right and they're wrong." As long as we keep going over those thoughts and believing them, we sustain the anger. Cut through the storyline, let go of your belief in the storyline, and the emotion will fade.

Let me share something I've observed in my practice and in many meditators' practices. There are four big emotions that everybody needs to learn to relate to. They're like the primary colors of our emotional palette. The Buddha made a list of the five hindrances, which is very helpful for understanding different obstacles in meditation. But I want to talk specifically about these difficult emotions and make another important point.

For an afflictive emotion to be sustained, it has to rely on a sense of time. Afflictive emotions cannot endure with a completely present moment orientation. They can only endure if we generate around them a sense of time. This isn't true of beautiful states of mind. Mindfulness can exist purely in the present moment. Love, compassion, happiness, joy—purely in the present moment. One of my teachers likes to use this wonderful phrase: "happiness for no reason." Not because we're counting our chickens or storing up goods or hoarding anything—happiness for no reason. We let it all go, and happiness is just there. It doesn't need time. Afflictive emotions do.

I want to suggest that afflictive emotions are born out of past and future—that'll be one axis. The other axis is pleasant and unpleasant. Since you talked with Carol this morning about feeling tone, you know that the feeling tone of pleasant and unpleasant is the root of much grasping and preoccupation.

So past and future will be one axis, pleasant and unpleasant another. Let's explore what emotions emerge from these four quadrants.

We'll start with pleasant and past. Say there was an experience in the past that was very pleasant. The implication is, because it was in the past, it's not here today. What's a primal emotion that comes up around that? Loss and sadness. This is one of our primary responses to life. We had something beautiful, something lovely. We lost it. We're stricken by grief, sadness, loss. That's the first of the big ones we need to relate to.

What about something very pleasant in the future? Desire. Something very pleasant that's going to happen only in the future creates a wanting of it. The second primal emotion.

What about something unpleasant that happened in the past?

And I'm going to modify this a little because I'm going to lead you. Connected with another person: anger. Somebody did something unpleasant to us, and we hold that with anger. The third primal emotion.

Something unpleasant that we think is going to happen in the future: fear.

So I want to suggest that these are the big four that we need to learn to relate to—sadness, desire, anger, and fear. As a subset of these four, a subset of anger, we sometimes direct that anger toward ourselves as self-judgment. And so that would become, I would say, a fifth major one that we need to relate to. I think we're going to have talks on a number of these emotions, so because of time, I'm not going to go into them in a lot of detail. But let's look at each of them just briefly.

Let's take desire for an example. Come into retreat. There are many things that have been pleasant in your life that you don't have here: contact with friends, the food of your choice, going out to a movie, intimacy with your partner, the comfortable chair you sit in at home. There's often a sense of wanting for those things. Very, very common that that arises.

Let's look at the quality, sort of the psychology of desire. There's a payoff for us in bringing up those images. Here we are in this very kind of stark, austere, we might say ascetic setting, and we recollect something really comfortable or juicy or sweet about our home life. What's the impact in the mind of that? Kind of pleasurable, isn't it? It gives you a sweet hit for a moment.

But take a look at the other quality that comes with it. There's a comfort in the image, but at the same time, there's this realization: it's not here now. It isn't real. It's only a memory that's not the same as the real thing. So along with the sweetness or the comfort comes this yearning. And that's the essence of desire. We're unsatisfied because we don't have it now.

So desire is always this bittersweet experience, and it cannot be satisfying. If you look closely and feel it in your body and your mind, you'll feel the dissatisfaction of it. This is the kind of quality of thirst that's in the craving that the Buddha pointed to. It's always unsatisfying because we never want something we already have. You ever wanted a hand at the end of your arm? A nose in the middle of your face? No, that would be way too easy. We always want what we don't have.

So take a look. When desire is present in the body, what's the feeling of it? I notice it often in relationship to meditative states here. The wanting for me on retreat is often about states of meditation, and I notice it as a kind of leaning forward, trying to make calm happen, trying to produce concentration. So I start to tune into that tension in the body, and that alerts me. Then I might notice, oh, my thoughts had been about a particular sitting that I wanted to recreate. So then that yearning quality of the mind—

The storyline in desire is something like, "If I had that, I would be happy." So it's a basis of happiness if I had it. If that concentration came back, then I'd be happy. Of course, what we don't look at is that object is impermanent. Either the object will fade or our delight in it will fade, one or the other.

We talked quite a lot about anger. I just want to mention a couple of things that the tradition says about anger. We feel this self-righteous indignation that we are in the right and the other person is in the wrong, and so we blame them. There is in the quality of anger usually an aspect of what we'd call ill will.

That is, because we're suffering on account of their action, we would like them to suffer. This is the opposite of metta. Metta is goodwill—we'd like them to feel good. But with anger, the quality intrinsic in it usually is ill will.

Now think about that. Can you take responsibility for that? Could you say out loud to yourself, "Yeah, I'd really like that person to suffer. I can't wait to see them hurting. I would really enjoy that." That state of mind is bordering on what we call in Buddhism cruelty. Cruelty is the actual enjoyment of someone suffering, and it's the opposite of compassion.

We may feel it's okay to be angry with somebody. It's okay to feel a little bit of ill will, but then you realize it's right next door to cruelty. Can you feel good about being a cruel meditator? That's a hard one for me. So looking at that was a strong encouragement for me to let go of anger.

The other strong encouragement is feeling in the body, feeling in the mind that burning quality with anger and realizing the pain it causes us. In the tradition, it's said that anger is like picking up a hot coal and wanting to throw it at someone. But before we can throw it, we have to pick it up, and then we get burned. In a situation like this, where we're restraining our speech, we're restraining our bodily action, generally we're the only one who suffers with anger. So that became for me the strongest encouragement to let go. I simply didn't want to suffer with it. The other analogy that's used is that anger is like drinking poison and expecting the other person to fall sick. Doesn't work.

So: desire, anger, sadness. In sadness, we have had something beautiful and lovely in the past. It's not with us, and there's a sense of loss. Feeling it in the body, there's a kind of heaviness, a weightiness, often a heaviness in the heart area. And the mood is just a kind of glum, dark, hopeless quality. The thoughts dwell on the fact that the thing that we loved is not with us anymore. And the storyline I see in sadness is something like, "I can't be happy because I've lost it or because I don't have it." So all our well-being really depended on that thing, that person, that experience, whatever it was.

Sadness can feel so pervasive that we're often afraid to open to it—as though if I open to the degree of sadness that's with me, I'll drown. It will be too much. And so we hold ourselves back from really feeling it directly. But this worry about drowning is just another belief, just another thought that we have told ourselves. We need to open to it little by little, because it's the opening that lets it come up, and in the coming up, present itself and pass. So we're not going to clear sadness out with one or two looks, but touching it a little bit, moving away, touching into it a little bit, moving away, generating all the wholesome qualities that come through meditation—loving-kindness and mindfulness and wisdom. Those will start to lift the sadness up and out.

And the last of the four main emotions is the quality of fear. Fear has a special place in my heart because it was my biggest hindrance for years in practice. I've worked with it a lot. I became very familiar with it and I so appreciate all the lessons that it taught me.

You read things like "these defilements are the very food that wisdom grows on." The defilements as we work with them are said to be the manure for bodhi, the nourishment for enlightenment, as we learn how to relate to them in our life. And in the beginning, I thought that was all hokum. I thought that was teachers just trying to cheer me up. But as I look back at my own experience of working with fear, I appreciate how much I've grown from that and what it taught me.

If you learn one of these emotions thoroughly, you'll understand how all the others work too, because all their mechanisms are similar. So for myself, with fear, I came into my retreat, I started to feel fear, and I really didn't want it to happen. I was very resistant to that experience. I thought something had gone way off track if I was feeling fear. I was supposed to be feeling more happiness, and here I was feeling more afraid. But I took the encouragement of my teachers to investigate it, and I started to explore it in the body.

It was so helpful to find that I could ground my attention in the body at a time when I was feeling afraid, because otherwise I was disconnected. I didn't know where to go. I didn't know what to turn to. So my teachers told me to ground the attention in the body. There I found shakiness and trembling and lightness that gave me no sense of groundedness or security. I had to ask myself: can I be with this? Can I open to it?

I looked a little at the storyline of fear. The storyline in fear seems to be something like: this moment may be bearable, but the next moment isn't going to be. Watch out. So I just came back into this present moment. Can I bear this bodily feeling? Can I bear it? And I could. I could bear that shakiness. I could bear that trembling.

Then I had to look in the mind. What's the mood or tone or color of fear in the mind? What does that feel like? I turned the attention toward the mind, and it was really hard to get to, because fear itself is a wanting to flee. As I got close to that thing, it was like: get away. I get closer again, and it was: get away. I had a very hard time actually connecting with the mind's nature of fear. But because of the wonderful support of samadhi and the stability that it gave, I was able to touch it, touch it, touch it. And I asked: can I bear that? And I could. I could learn to bear the mental tone. Then I would look at the thoughts that projected into the future and let go of those.

I came more and more just to bear the momentary experience of fear. And I found out it was a paper tiger. There was nothing but that experience of shakiness and wanting to flee. Shakiness and wanting to flee. I just became more and more comfortable with it over time. When I did, it lost a lot of its power over me. The more I could open to it, the less it tended to have me in its grip.

The invitation is there whenever these difficult states are present to open to them with acceptance. It takes a lot of courage, but this is where we find courage in our practice. I found levels of bravery I had no idea existed in me. And I know all of you are finding the same thing day after day. As you commit with perseverance and diligence to meeting every experience that arises, your courage is developing moment after moment.

I found that I had the capacity to understand. In the middle of the most difficult experiences, some of the most difficult experiences in my life, I could bring out qualities of wisdom. And the wisdom could understand the problem. Through understanding the problem thoroughly enough, it ceased to be a problem because I could see how it was put together. It was just another mechanism. Once I could let it be, it would come and it would go.

That's what we finally understand about these difficult emotions. They aren't problems in themselves. They are not a problem. They come, they dance, and they go. What just happened? What was that dance? Oh, it's just the weather system. We really come to trust that awareness, mindfulness, and wisdom have the capacity to receive them, to hold them, to understand them with perspective, and not to be shaken by them.

This becomes our practice. It's not that we awaken after we've gotten rid of these things. We awaken in the middle of them. The most powerful qualities of mind can be brought out directly in relationship to these states.

This is transformative. We start to gain a confidence in our mind, a confidence in our understanding, a confidence in our practice that we can handle whatever the heart and mind throw up at us. Wisdom cannot be overthrown when it's strong enough.

I'd like to close with a quotation from the Tibetan tradition—The Four Blessings of Gampopa. This is considered a supplication. To whom the supplication is made is for your own decision. It could be considered to the Dharma, to the Buddha, to a special being like the Dalai Lama, to your own wisdom mind—however you'd like to interpret it.

Grant your blessings so that my mind follows the Dharma.
Grant your blessings so that my Dharma practice becomes the path.
Grant your blessings so that the path clarifies confusion.
Grant your blessings so that confusion dawns as wisdom.

Let's sit for a moment together in silence.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 16

The Five Aggregates Are Not Self

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the Buddha's teaching on the five aggregates (pañca-khandha) as a direct path to understanding anattā (not-self). Drawing from the Anattalakkhana Sutta, Armstrong demonstrates how our sense of 'I' is actually composed of five constantly changing processes: form (rūpa), feeling tone (vedanā), perception (saññā), mental formations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa).
>
> Using accessible analogies like a disassembled pen and the classic chariot example, Armstrong shows how what we take to be a solid, permanent self is actually just an assemblage of impermanent parts with no fixed essence. He guides practitioners through the Buddha's method of inquiry: examining each aggregate's impermanent, unsatisfactory nature and asking whether such changing phenomena can truly be called 'mine,' 'I am,' or 'myself.'
>
> This teaching offers both intellectual understanding and experiential investigation into the liberating truth that underlies all Buddhist practice. As Armstrong notes, seeing through the illusion of self doesn't lead to coldness but to greater lightness, freedom, and capacity for love—embodying the teaching that 'no self, no problem.'

The subject of the talk tonight is the five aggregates are not self. In the talk this evening, I want to suggest that fundamentally you don't exist—at least not in the way that you might think that you do. So all of those who are desperate about holding on to existence, you might want to go now because this concept is going to be somewhat challenged this evening.

You probably know that in Buddhism this unexamined sense of I or self is considered one of the biggest misunderstandings that we have in life. It's a core component of the quality of ignorance that's the start of the chain of dependent origination that leads to suffering. The way things actually are is so much lighter than the way things feel when we're burdened by this sense of self.

So seeing into this false sense of I and being able to let it go is the doorway to a lot of personal freedom for us that each of us as meditators has access to. This is not something that waits until you're just on the edge of full awakening. This is a lightening that you can feel year by year in your practice.

In my own personal experience of looking into this question of self, it's taken some years of looking, reflecting, examining my experience to get clearer and clearer on it. So I hope you won't have an expectation that it should all be clear from one talk tonight. And I say that for two reasons. One is I don't want you to think too hard about this as we're going. Just don't think, "I've got to figure it all out tonight or I'm going to miss it entirely." Just kind of take the words and concepts in and see where they resonate for you and open to just a slight shift in your way of seeing. And secondly, so that you don't get too concerned if it doesn't make a lot of sense. Some of this stuff is hard to comprehend on our conceptual level and matching it against our experience. So take it really slowly if some of these concepts are new for you and realize this is a topic for ongoing investigation.

For most of us, I is the center of our universe. It's what everything revolves around. Like in the old days, it was considered the earth was the center of the universe and the sun and all the planets revolved around it. For us, the I is the center of that universe. Our thoughts revolve around it. Our actions, our speech, our values, our emotions, our direction in life—all comes out of this sense.

This I is completely taken for granted by most of humanity. And even for us as meditators, it seems very obvious. It seems very self-evident, doesn't it? I mean, what could be more natural than I? We use it all the time. We think about it. We adopt it. Here we are, this sense of I. William James put it this way: "When I search for myself, all I can find is a tickle at the back of my throat."

In your examination over these weeks on retreat where you've been looking closely at sights and sounds, smell, taste, touch, thinking, and emotions, have you come upon this I yet? Something that seems so obvious, the center of everything—have you found it? Probably not. It's very elusive when we start to look.

The Dalai Lama said, "It's a sure sign of delusion when you think something is really apparent, but you go to find it and you can't." Then we know that something's confused in our minds.

The classical analogy in the tradition is we look at a piece of rope that's lying on the ground, a multicolored twined piece of rope, and we think it's a snake. And when we see it as a snake, we get really afraid. "Oh, it could jump up, it could bite me, it could crawl on me." We draw back. But that's just a misperception. When we see clearly that it's just a piece of rope, all the worry goes out.

In the same way, it's said when we hold this concept of self, we tie ourselves up in a burden that agitates us. And when we see things the way they are, then we're calm. The truth frees us.

It's easy to draw out some of the confusion around this concept of I. So let's just look at language. I want to ask you a couple of questions. The first is, how tall are you? It is not a trick question. So if I ask you, "How tall are you?" that's pretty easy to answer, right? So I would say I'm five feet, ten inches tall. Very straightforward.

We could hear it every day: "I'm five foot ten." But really what we're saying is the body is five foot ten, right? My thoughts aren't five foot ten. My emotions aren't five foot ten. My mindfulness isn't five foot ten. My body is five foot ten. So here we're saying I am the body, which is five foot ten. There's an identification: I am the body, and that's five foot ten.

Or I could ask you a second question: what color are your eyes? And that's easy, right? You don't have to think too long about that. So I would say my eyes are brown. Here, all of a sudden, I'm not the body—I'm the owner of the eyes. They're my eyes and they're brown.

So which are you truly? Are you the body or are you the owner of the body who's somehow separate from it? Which is right? Could you be both?

If you're the body and your hair is cut and falls on the ground, is that you lying on the ground? Do you feel it as you? Do you feel attached to it?

We could do the same thing with the mind. Sometimes we would say, "I'm happy" or "I'm sad," and then we're equating I with the emotions. So we say, I am the state of mind. Other times we might talk about "my joys and my sorrows," and now we're the owner of the emotion. So which are you, the emotion or the owner?

At other times we feel ourselves really as the observer. We really think most deeply, perhaps, that we're located somewhere just behind the eyes, in the middle of the head, maybe inside that mass of brain tissue. And we look out through these eyes onto the world and experience everything that comes in. So this eye that's at the center of everything is like the observer that experiences sights and sounds and smells and tastes and so forth. And this eye—this observing kind of eye—is also considered to be the one who does the thinking or the one who does the feeling. So here there's the sense I am the observer.

These are five distinct ways we use the word I: the body, the owner of the body, the emotions, the owner of the emotions, or a central observer that everything's happening to. Could they all be true? Yet we use the words like this every day and we never stop to question what the underlying reality is.

In fact, they're all rubbish. Every one of those positions is rubbish.

The Buddha put it this way: "In whatever way they conceive of self, the fact is ever other than that." Or another of my teachers put it a little more directly when he said, "Everything you think is wrong."

A yogi a couple of years ago told me something that he'd heard on the radio, which I thought was a good reminder for all of us. We need to stay humble in this practice. You know, when we hear things like "everything you think is wrong," that's a humbling kind of statement. Well, this is something he'd heard on the radio. A commentator said, "The mind—often wrong, seldom in doubt."

This is really true in our relation to self. So this sense of I is basically a concept that's been created by our thoughts. And it's a fiction. Things aren't like that. But it's a fiction that we've believed in a lot and we've placed at the center of everything. So this is a form of delusion, and we've become entranced by this delusion of I.

It's created in us a deep self-centeredness. As we return to it again and again, we strengthen that sense when we don't see the true reality of things. We invest in it and strengthen the sense of self-centeredness and self-cherishing that grows out of that. So we create a world where obviously I am more important than you, and the whole world behaves that way: I am more important than you. So we see how the whole world is under the spell of this same delusion.

And then we dance to the tune of this false sense of self. And what's the tune? There are three main chords: greed, aversion, confusion. This is the song of the self.

Just one slight hint of the suffering that's involved—as long as we believe in this "I" and are invested in it, we'll be afraid of death. But by seeing the limited nature of this false concept, we can, to a certain extent, free ourselves from that concern. So undoing this level of delusion is one of the main pieces of work that meditation leads us to.

An interesting question is: how was it that the Buddha saw? When he saw the nature of things in a liberated way, in an enlightened way, what did he see that was different?

Just looking around the room tonight, when we look at this assembly, we probably see people. I would suspect that most of you, as you look around, see person, person, person, person. In the Visuddhimagga, it's said that that alone is a sign of insufficient reflection. They said that one who has reflected deeply does not see "person."

It would be like a skilled butcher who has been working at carving up animals for many years, putting a cow on the carving table, and as he's cutting, saying "cow, cow, cow." A skilled butcher doesn't cut in that way. The butcher goes: rump, tenderloin, sirloin, ribs—because he knows the details of this creature so well. He doesn't just lump it under the term "cow." He sees the component parts.

So one who looks at a human being who has reflected deeply doesn't just see the lump "person," but sees in more detail than that.

So how did the Buddha see in more detail? When the Buddha looked at our human experience, he tended to see in one of two ways. The first is something that I think I mentioned in the first talk during this retreat: the six sense bases. This is from the Sutta on Totality. I think I read that night: "Monks, what is the totality of existence? Listen, attend carefully, and I will teach you. It is simply the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and touches, the mind and mind objects."

We've talked about this a lot—the six senses—and they fit very nicely in with our meditation practice because this is the way the instructions unfold. We direct the attention to sounds, to body sensations, to sights, to mind objects like thoughts and emotions, or to smells and tastes. The Buddha used this description primarily to teach people how to cut through craving, because craving tends to arise for pleasant objects at the six sense doors, and it's helpful to look how we get entangled with different objects at different sense doors—sometimes sight, sometimes touch, sometimes taste, and so forth.

But there was another description that he used, I would say equally often in the suttas, and that is the description that's called the five aggregates. This is another way to see a human being, and this is the outline that I want to talk about tonight. This device he used to cut through wrong view.

We have the sense that the "I" is somehow to be found in this mass of changing phenomena. In order to establish us in the right view—the fictitious nature of that "I"—the Buddha most often used the five aggregates. As we tune into this way of seeing, we start to see human beings without the overlay of the false sense of "I," or what you might call the ego. The ego and false sense of "I" are more or less synonymous.

So as we start to look at the world through this map, we see things the way the Buddha saw. And that is a very interesting exploration. This is going to sound technical as I get into the description. It may sound a little too intellectual, but I want to assure you it's not. It becomes very experiential as you live with these categories.

The time in my life that this opened up for me—actually it was about fifteen years ago now—my older sister died quite unexpectedly at a fairly young age. She was fifty-two at the time. She had had some health problems, but she was not close to death. And then unexpectedly, she went into a coma and never awoke. It was quite a shock for her family and for me.

I was quite close to this sister, and one of the most startling things about her dying was that she had seemed so real and vibrant and alive just a week before. I'd been talking to her on the phone. I'd gotten a photograph of her around that time. She seemed so alive and real and present, and my mind was just stunned at how she could go from that lively manifestation to no longer existing. I just couldn't put it together how that could be.

So I became very interested in investigating this question of what makes up a human being. And in this investigation, it helped me understand how we go from vitality to non-existence, possibly in a short period of time.

So it was very helpful for me to understand what's involved in dying. And then it also gave me a lot more freedom in my own life through that understanding. Again, it's an exploration that takes some time. Tonight, I just want to lay out the map and encourage you to simply reflect and play with it a little bit.

The term aggregate is a translation of the Pali word khanda. In Sanskrit, the term is skandha, so you might hear from a Tibetan group the five skandhas. It's the same teaching. And again, it's a fairly simple word in Pali—it just means heap or bundle.

So aggregate sounds kind of technical to me, like it should be a formula that people use in mixing up road paving material, you know, a little of stone and a little of gravel and a little asphalt and a little cement. But the word that I really like to translate khanda as is kind of stuff. Really what it's saying is we are made of five kinds of stuff. So that's what I'm going to be talking about tonight, the five kinds of stuff that make us up. If aggregate feels too technical, just think of it as a kind of stuff.

These five aggregates are material form, feeling tone, perception, mental formations, and consciousness. I want to go through them one by one and talk about what they mean. Generally, they're all present—all five are present in every moment of experience. It's the same domain that's covered by the six sense bases, but just sliced up a little differently. For example, in the six sense bases, there may be a moment where there's no particular smell or taste or sound, so some of the sense bases may be absent. In the aggregates, all five of these are present in every moment of conscious experience. It's just divided up a little differently.

The first aggregate is material form, or often we'll just call it form. The Pali word is rupa. Rupa is sometimes taken to mean body, and this is in many ways the most interesting kind of material form that we have to look at or work with. It's sometimes used as body. A statue like this one behind me in Asia is often referred to as a Buddha rupa, the form of the Buddha or the body of the Buddha as a statue.

But this is the way the Buddha defined it: Any kind of material form whatsoever, whether past, future, or present, internal or external, gross or subtle, inferior or superior, far or near—this is the material form aggregate.

One of the things it includes is the body. This is one type of material form. It includes all the other matter that makes up the physical universe. This is all included in the material form aggregate. But it also includes the interactions among matter. If this bit of matter contacts this bit of matter, we get a sound, and that sound is also in the realm of rupa. All the interactions among the sense doors, like tastes and smells, touches—those are all in the area of rupa. So the five physical senses and their objects and all the physical created universe is all under this heading of rupa or form. It's sometimes also translated as materiality.

An interesting question is the body is so taken for granted. It's like the base of life. But how do we know the body? How do we know it's here? Well, mostly it's by the fact that we see it. We see our own body and we experience sensations through it. Now the fact is the body also has smells and tastes and sounds, but some of those are not always so pleasant, so we don't tend to dwell on those too much. The primary way we contact the body is through seeing it and touching it. So the body is also just known through these senses. This sound is in the aggregate of rupa, or form. It's part of material form. That's the first aggregate.

All the other four aggregates are on the side of mind, or mentality. The first of these is feeling tone. The Pali word is vedana, and this was introduced in the meditation instructions about a week ago. It's a quality that every moment of sense experience has of being pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

The reason vedana is important is because it forms the basis for grasping and clinging. When things are pleasant, we tend to hold onto them with greed, or the pleasantness becomes the basis for the reactive formation of desire. When things are unpleasant, that becomes the basis for the reactive formation of aversion.

And when things are neither pleasant nor unpleasant, we tend to overlook them. They don't please us or displease us. They're considered irrelevant to our gratification. And so this becomes the basis for delusion, for being disconnected or out of touch, for ignoring.

So if we have this sound as our sense experience, generally that's a pleasant sound. I think most people who heard that would say that's pleasant. Because of its meaning, the sitting's over, it's really pleasant. There are eight pleasant times it happens during a day, and we really like it.

But it's curious, too, that this quality of vedana is put in the mind category rather than the category of the sound itself. And that's because the feeling tone of being pleasant or unpleasant or neither is not actually inherent in the item, in the phenomenon at the sense door, like the sound, but it's received in the mind. One of our teachers said that the mind is actually feeling as a verb—to give that phenomenon its feeling tone, that we interact with it and taste it and give it a feeling. It's not done consciously. Often it's almost immediate that we know the feeling tone. But he's suggesting there's an active participation.

I'll give you a little example of how this works. When I grew up, my mother really liked the music of Mantovani. If you remember, he was a popular conductor of music from movies, from soundtracks, and they'd be sort of sentimental melodies, and they'd be scored with a lot of strings and very lush, swelling instrumentation, and it'd be a little bit sentimental. So I listened to a lot of Mantovani when I was growing up. And it was okay. I didn't mind it too much.

Down in Southern California, there was a 7-Eleven that was having a problem with drug dealers coming and doing their business in the parking lot. And they'd call the police, and the police would come and chase the dealers away. But the police would drive off, and the dealers would come back. And they'd ask them politely to leave, and they wouldn't. So the store owner got an idea, which was to play through the speakers of the outside music system, Mantovani. So he put on Mantovani and turned up the volume and flooded the parking lot. And that drove the drug dealers away. Because while my mother experienced that as very pleasant, the dealers experienced that as very unpleasant. So they left.

Well, it's curious. This feeling tone is somehow interpreted differently in each of our minds, depending on our conditioning.

The third of the aggregates, the second mental aggregate, is this quality of perception called saññā. Sally talked about it a lot in her last talk. Carol talked about it some more in her talk following that. And it is basically this factor of recognition that when a sense phenomenon appears to us we tend to recognize it and put it into a category that we already know based on memory. This happens so quickly and so automatically for us as grown-ups that we don't see it taking place, but it's happening all the time.

For instance, if your eyes are open and you're looking around the room right now, you are probably seeing what's here as women and men and zabutons and floor and ceiling and statue and flowers and bell and so forth. This is all a level of conceptualization that's happening above the bare sense experience. Actually all that's happening in the visual field are patches of form and color, form and color. You get more of a sense of this if you close one eye and you lose some of the depth perception. And then you see the way painters need to see when they're learning to see anew—throw out the old habits and see things in a fresh way.

When we grow up, we learn to perceive these categories of concepts as our parents and teachers tell us to. So we learn how to recognize women and men and chairs and floor and things like that. But those are not inherent to the visual field. We forget that this is really happening, but Oliver Sacks, the neurologist, tells a story that makes it really clear.

He was able to work with a patient who had lost his sight when he was quite young, a few years old. But with the technology of surgery that was available as he grew up, his sight was able to be corrected. So as a middle-aged man, he had his sight restored. And Sacks was there in the hospital with the patient when the bandages were taken off after the operation. And the man's family was there, and the surgeon was there, and Sacks was there, and everybody was just expecting this, wow, it's so fabulous to see again, I can't thank you enough.

So they took off the bandages and there was no real expression from the patient. And he later explained that all he saw was a blur of shapes and colors that had no meaning for him. And that the first thing that started to make sense was this flesh-colored blob that started moving toward his face that seemed to emanate a sound saying, can you see me? And he just deduced that that was probably the face of his surgeon because he recognized the voice. But this blur of form and color made no sense to him. He did a lot of exercise and a lot of practice, and he got much better at functioning in the world, but his perception never became automatic the way it is for us.

He always had to struggle to make sense of the shapes and colors that he saw.

So then we realize this is a learned faculty, but it's necessary for our functioning in the world. We don't need to get rid of it. We don't need to change it. But we need to appreciate it, and sometimes we need to question it. I think Sally and Carol both talked about how sometimes it leads us astray. We perceive things inaccurately. We see a snake where there's a rope. Or, as the Buddha said, we tend to see permanence where there's impermanence. We tend to see lasting happiness where there's dukkha. And we tend to see a self where there isn't one. So these are the kinds of perceptions that we need to straighten out.

When we put a label on something and perceive it, such as a pain in the body, sometimes the label can block us from a fresh experience of that. So sometimes we need to look beyond our first perception and find out what's the reality of that.

Zen is full of stories about this, because in Zen, they're trying to train practitioners to see things fresh. So you'll read stories where the Zen master holds this up and says, "What is this? If you call it a stick, I will hit you. But if you say it's not a stick, I will also hit you." What I deduced from that is that if I went into Zen, I was going to get hit a lot. So I chose Vipassana.

But really what they're trying to get the practitioner to do is to see this thing before concept, before made-up terms. Like take this thing. You look at it probably ten times a day. I look at it and I think "bell." But couldn't it equally be a flower pot? Or how about a monk's bowl? This would be a very nice alms bowl—just enough food for me for lunch. Or if it was put on a statue, couldn't this be a fancy chapeau? Wouldn't this make a nice hat for someone? So just calling it "bell," we kind of miss all the potential that's in there.

There was a funny story about this. In the early seventies, two great masters from different traditions were both in Cambridge at the same time. Some of their students knew each other and thought, "Wow, wouldn't it be fun to bring together these two enlightened masters and just watch their minds kind of meld in this recognition of each other's emptiness?"

So the two masters were Kalu Rinpoche from the Tibetan tradition and Sansanim, who was a Korean Zen master. They met at a house of one of our friends, sat down and had tea together, and Sansanim decided to challenge Kalu Rinpoche. He took an orange off a plate where they'd been served for tea, and he held it up to Rinpoche and said, "What is this?" in that very straightforward Zen style, because in Sansanim's lineage, this is the way one trained. One trained to answer questions like "What is this?" And that became a measure of one's dharma understanding.

That was not the case in Kalu Rinpoche's lineage. And so he just sat there doing his mala beads and looking at Sansanim, completely unperturbed, but also kind of not quite getting it. And so Sansanim held the orange up again and again said, "What is this?" And Kalu just quietly turned to his translator and said, "Don't they have oranges in Korea?"

So this is another case of perception, different in different cultures. In our case, we hear this, we recognize it as a sound, and we recognize it generally as the bell. And that has a particular meaning for us. It means the sitting's over, we can get up and move. So that recognition is very important. It's very functional in our days here.

The third of the aggregates—the mental aggregates, the fourth aggregate in total—is called volitional formations or mental formations. The Pali word is saṅkhāra. They're also sometimes called urges or impulses. This is a very broad category, and it basically includes all the kinds of states of mind that we've been talking about: the qualities of moods, emotions, the refined meditative states of mind, such as mindfulness and concentration, equanimity.

These are all included in sankhara. Sankhara also refers to actions that stem from the mind—that's why they're sometimes called volitional. So actions of thought, of speech, and of body are included in this category of sankharas.

Because of the link to action, this is also the field of karma. Remember that when Joseph introduced the factor of intention, he talked a little about how that becomes the seed of karma. So sometimes these things are called karmic formations, and that's why they also have the sense of impulses. The movements of greed and aversion are impulses that come from this field of sankharas. Similarly, the movements of loving-kindness or compassion or generosity—wholesome qualities that come from this field of sankharas or impulses.

So when we hear the bell at the end of a sitting, notice what happens in the sankharas. Often there's this real sense of ease that comes in: "Oh, I'm so comfortable now. I could sit forever." This sense of ease that comes in response to the sound and the thought "I could sit forever"—these are sankharas that happen with that moment of hearing.

The last of the aggregates is the quality of consciousness. In Pali, the word is vijñana. This is that most bare kind of knowing that we've been talking about a few times—just the bare receptivity to sense phenomena before they're interpreted, before they're perceived, before we're mindful of them. So the knowing of the sound as a sound—that simple level is what's called consciousness.

It's understood that the sound and the knowing come together. This is an important point that we'll probably come back to in other talks. When that sound arises in your experience, you can't really separate your knowing of it from the sound appearing, can you? The sound appearing to you is your knowing of it. They're right together. If a tree fell in a forest and there was no one to hear it, there might be sound vibrations, but there wouldn't be that human experience of hearing a sound arise. So it takes that consciousness plus the phenomenon, and then they come together in our experience.

I like to think of it as receiving this—it's a unitary experience, but it's got two facets. One is the sound, which is rupa, a physical phenomenon in our language. But it's received by this quality of mind called consciousness. They are together, but we can look either at the mind side of it or the rupa side of it. They're both there. It's just one experience.

So we say all five aggregates are present in every moment of experience. In our little example, the sound is rupa. The feeling tone of pleasantness is vedana. The recognition of it as the meditation bell is perception or samjna. The mood of ease that comes when we hear that is a sankhara. And consciousness knows all those other four. Consciousness holds the rupa. Consciousness holds the feeling tone. Consciousness holds the perception. And consciousness holds the sankhara that comes. They're all there in that moment.

These are the five categories that make up the kinds of stuff that form our human experience. I invite you to consider: Is there anything in your human experience that is outside of these five categories? Anything in your direct experience that wouldn't be able to be included somewhere in these five? In other words, is this an exhaustive description of our human experience?

[Student asks about karma]

Karma is only known, in the Buddha's description of it, through action. So when a thought arises that is motivated by generosity, that could be said to be a karmic act, because it has the volition of generosity. The karma is implicit in the sankhara.

Now, one of the questions that philosophers have debated for centuries—and this may be what you're pointing to—is where do those karmic seeds reside? Because one person's personality may be conditioned toward generosity, and others may be conditioned toward stinginess. So it became a very interesting philosophical question.

Where do those patterns live when they're not being activated? Do you get the question? It's a very interesting question. Different schools answered that question differently, but the Buddha chose not to even pose the question or answer it because he was really just concerned with what do I experience. And we experience karma when it expresses itself through an impulse—generosity, stinginess, greed, aversion, and so forth.

So I'll leave you to reflect further, but let's say for the time being that this constitutes an exhaustive description of the categories of our experience. You can reflect later and see if that's true or not. Everything that makes up our human experience can be put in one of these categories.

Why is that important? Because there's one interesting thing that's missing, and that is the I, capital I. It's not included in any of these. In this map, there is form, there is feeling tone, there is perception, there are mental impulses, and there is the knowing of all of those. There is no category for a self, for an I.

So once we start to explore this particular map, once we decide that it's an exhaustive map, then we can start to believe maybe there's not a need for an I in our understanding of human experience. Maybe there isn't an I except as a thought. There can be the thought of an I or the sense of an I—maybe that's all there is. And what really makes us up is form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness.

The traditional analogy that was used to explain why this was important was the chariot. I'm sure a lot of you have heard this. You take a look at a chariot that's put together and you're asked, well, what is the chariot? Is it the axle? Is it the wheels? Is it the cart? Is it the steering handle? You can't say that it's any of those. It's kind of the way all of them have been put together. A simpler example—the modern equivalent, by the way, is car. So if you want, you could analyze a car and all of its components and ask, where's the car?

But a simpler example, because we're just here together—everybody, I hope, can see this, and you don't have any trouble identifying it as a very common object of daily use, called a pen. Right? Everybody agree this is a pen? But we can start to take this pen apart. That was the cap. This is the tip. This is the ink cartridge. This is the barrel. And this is the end. There are five different parts. And if I could, I'd squeeze the ink out of here and you'd see there's something else in here too.

Now where's the pen? Does it exist? Does it really exist as an object? Or is it only a conventional designation that we give to this assemblage of parts when they're assembled in a certain way and function as kind of a unity? That is, there's the appearance of an object, but we know that the object is nothing more than an assembly of these different parts. There's no pen there apart from the parts. There's no essence to this. There's no little piece somewhere in the center—oh, this is the real pen. This is the magic essence of pen. There are only these parts that are put together.

Now, five might be a little too complicated for the human experience. Let me suggest, just look at three parts. The body, very fundamental piece of us. That's one part. Second piece, also very fundamental, is consciousness. There's an aliveness and awareness within each of us. That's why we're sentient beings. And the third piece are the things that go through our minds—the emotions, moods, states of mind. And we'll just toss feeling and perception into there for the time being.

So think about yourself as a body united with a consciousness that has things going through the mind.

that it's like a river. When you look at a river from a distance, it appears to be a stable, unchanging thing. But when you look closely, you see that it's actually a continuous flow of water. No drop of water remains the same from moment to moment, yet we still call it "the river."

The body is similar. The cells are constantly dying and being replaced. The breath is continuously coming and going. The blood is flowing, the heart is beating, the neural activity is firing and changing. Nothing about the physical form remains static, even for an instant. Yet because the changes happen gradually and in patterns, we have the illusion of a solid, permanent body.

The same is true for consciousness. We tend to think of consciousness as this stable, continuous awareness that's been with us our whole lives. But when we examine it closely, we see that consciousness is actually arising and passing away moment by moment. It's different when we're asleep, different when we're awake, different when we're happy, different when we're sad. It's constantly shifting and changing based on what object it's cognizing.

And then there are all the mental formations - our thoughts, emotions, moods, perceptions. These are obviously coming and going. One moment we're thinking about dinner, the next moment we're remembering something from childhood, then we're planning tomorrow, then we're feeling frustrated about traffic. It's a constant parade of mental activity, none of it lasting.

When the Buddha pointed this out to those five practitioners, something clicked for them. They saw that what they had been taking to be a solid, permanent self was actually just a collection of processes - all of them impermanent, all of them constantly changing, none of them substantial enough to constitute a real, lasting self.

This doesn't mean we don't exist at all. Obviously something is here reading these words, something is breathing, something is aware. But what we are is much more like a dynamic process than a thing. We're more like a verb than a noun. We're a flowing, ever-changing pattern of physical and mental activities rather than a solid entity.

Understanding this can be tremendously liberating. So much of our suffering comes from trying to protect and defend this sense of solid self. We worry about what others think of us, we get attached to our opinions and preferences, we're afraid of losing what we have or not getting what we want. But when we see that this self we're trying to protect isn't actually there in the way we thought, much of that anxiety and grasping can begin to relax.

is to realize its connection to nature. We often think, "Oh, this is me, this is who I am." But did you have anything to do with how this body came out of the womb? Did you have anything to do with the basic color of your hair, color of your eyes, physique, whether your hair was curly or straight, whether it was blonde or brown?

And yet, we take so much pride or embarrassment about the way the body turns out, as if we had something to do with it. Of course, if we reflect, we realize it was just our father's sperm meeting our mother's egg, combining, multiplying in cells, nourishment from the womb, being born, growing from food and air, aging over years—getting bigger and stronger, and then getting weaker, less capable. We had nothing to do with the aging process. It just happened in this body, completely out of our control. We make minor choices that affect its appearance, but it's basically out of our control. And that's because the body is really just part of physical nature.

One of our teachers in Thailand, Ajahn Buddhadasa, put it this way: "This body came out of nature. It's part of nature. It's never departed from nature and it belongs to nature. So give it back to nature and that'll be a big relief for you."

You can think about emotions in the same way. This package that we all have of joy and delight and fear and apprehension and sadness—this is just mental nature. It's not ours because we all have it. It's just part of being human. So in the same way, we can't claim those. When they express, it's mental nature expressing itself.

Sometimes seeing this, we retreat and want to find our true identity in consciousness. "Oh, I'm not any of that changing stuff. I'm not really the changing emotions and changing thoughts and the changing body that's going to decay. I'm really the awareness that holds all of that. That's what I really am."

But when you start to think in this way, there's another piece that's missing from this identification with consciousness, which is that consciousness is in no way unique. There's nothing in consciousness that makes it particularly like me or like you. And there's nothing individual in it. Because of that, everybody's consciousness in that way of just knowing is pretty much the same part of nature. So there's nowhere to find a Sally or a Carol or an Annie in consciousness. There's nothing unique. So there's no individuality there. We realize consciousness is just another part of mental nature, not at all individual, something in fact that unites us all, that we share.

As you examine all these different components of the aggregates, you might ask: Where was I expecting to find a self in all that? Where was I expecting to find an "I" and what did I think it might look like? We have some thought that maybe it's discoverable, that it still feels like it should be there and yet it's completely elusive.

So the Buddha described how things should be seen, also in the discourse on not-self: "Therefore, all form should be seen as it really is with correct wisdom thus: This is not mine. This I am not. This is not myself." And in the same way with feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. Why? He continued, "Seeing thus the instructed noble disciple becomes disenchanted with form, with feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. Being disenchanted, one becomes dispassionate. Through dispassion, one's mind is liberated. When it is liberated, one understands: birth is destroyed. The holy life has been lived. What had to be done has been done. There is no more renewal of being."

When we don't fixate on these individual arisings as "I" or "mine," then we can just let them come and go as they will. We don't feel that we need to hang on to them or claim them or identify with them. In that way, we see their unsatisfactory nature and the mind inclines to dispassion toward them, not being moved with greed and aversion. And it's dispassion that starts to release the mind from its grip.

Sometimes we might think that this pointing toward dispassion is a cold kind of turning, that we're going to become uncaring, unemotional, unfeeling by this kind of equanimity.

But it's not like that. It doesn't feel like that. When the burden of I starts to be lifted from our existence, there's a lot more lightness. And that sense of lightness and lack of burden starts to open the heart naturally to stronger feelings of love and compassion. So the quality of life warms up when this burden of self starts to lift.

Jack Kornfield was visiting an old monk in Sri Lanka—a very happy person. This old monk asked him, "Well, you're a Buddhist. What do you understand the main teaching to be?" And Jack said, "Well, I understand the main teaching to be that within this whole complex of changing phenomena of body and mind, there's no abiding self. There's no constant I."

And the monk just said, "That's right. No self, no problem." And he just sat on his bed and rocked with his big smile. No self, no problem.

I'll close with this quote from Nisargadatta Maharaj about this interplay between the two, who said: "Love tells me I'm everything. Wisdom tells me I'm nothing. Between these two poles, my life flows."

Let's just sit for a minute together.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 17

From Ignorance Come Impulses

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong examines the opening links of paṭiccasamuppāda (dependent origination): "avijjā paccayā saṅkhārā" - from ignorance come impulses. Drawing on the Majjhima Nikāya teachings, he explores how avijjā (ignorance of the Four Noble Truths and three characteristics) gives rise to reactive saṅkhāra (volitional formations) rooted in greed and aversion.

Armstrong describes three levels of obscuration that bind us in suffering: the fundamental delusion of self and other, the arising of afflictive emotions, and unskillful karmic actions. He explains how the gradual path of sīla, samādhi, and paññā works from the outside in to purify conduct, mind, and view. The talk includes practical guidance on cultivating bodhicitta to transform self-centered practice, and concludes with teachings on nibbāna as the cessation of all saṅkhāra - the unconditioned peace that ends suffering.

This evening's subject is "from ignorance come impulses"—the first two links of dependent origination, which Sally explored last week. The traditional translation renders this as "ignorance gives rise to volitional formations" or "ignorance gives rise to mental formations." I prefer the term "impulses" because it captures the inner feeling of how these phenomena arise in the mind. The formations that emerge from ignorance possess an impulsive quality—they're not considered or deliberated, not held with wisdom, but simply arise in this impulsive, sometimes compulsive way.

The Pali formulation has a beautiful ring to it: Avijja paccaya sankhara. Pali is wonderfully succinct.

Avijja is ignorance—essentially not knowing the way things really are. In Sally's talk and the handout you received, this appears as the blind man at twelve o'clock in the wheel of existence. This is where everything begins.

I noticed someone wrote to Sally saying they'd posted the image of Mr. Yama on their mirror and were looking at it daily. The blind man sits at twelve o'clock, at the very center, the starting point of everything.

As a digression, I first encountered this painting when I was a monk in Thailand. It was quite remarkable because the image comes from the Tibetan tradition, yet I was practicing with a wonderfully eclectic Theravadan monk named Ajahn Buddhadasa. He had established a monastery called Wat Suan Mok in southern Thailand—"The Garden of Liberation"—a beautiful place to practice.

Ajahn Buddhadasa was one of the most open-minded Theravadan monks I've ever met. As a young monk, he learned Pali and read through the Buddha's suttas himself. He said this completely overturned the conventional interpretations he'd been taught in monk school. Because of his iconoclasm, he had difficulty getting along with some mainstream Thai monks until he became older and well-respected. But when I practiced there, he was established and respected, and remarkably open. He had built a special hall called the Spiritual Theater, where he displayed reproductions from all three traditions: Zen paintings, Tibetan thankas, and original Theravadan art. I deeply appreciated his spirit, and it's in that same spirit that we share this painting of the bhavachakra, the wheel of existence.

Avijja stands at the beginning, considered the root, the first link in the chain from which suffering arises. It's essentially synonymous with delusion when we speak of the three root poisons of greed, aversion, and delusion. Because it is a root in this chain, ignorance is considered one of the mind's deepest tendencies—one that doesn't leave the mind until full awakening. As long as ignorance remains, suffering will eventually result.

The second word, paccaya, establishes the connection between consecutive links throughout dependent origination. Paccaya means "conditions"—the first link serves as a conditional factor for the arising of the second. As Sally mentioned, it's not quite accurate to say it "causes" the next link—that's too strong a correlation. Rather, it provides the necessary condition for the next link's arising.

The third term is sankhara—the same word used for the fourth aggregate in the list of five aggregates. Mental formations, volitional formations, urges, or impulses. In the wheel of dependent origination, this is symbolized by a potter fashioning pots from clay. These pots, shaped from clay, represent the fabricated or constructed nature of sankharas—they're assembled through will, through effort.

The meaning of these two links—avijja paccaya sankhara—is that when ignorance is present in the mind, the mind gives rise to impulses that generally contribute to the perpetuation of suffering. These impulses themselves carry the quality of ignorance. The most common ones, as you can imagine, are the forces of greed and aversion—desire and hatred are the typical impulses that embody this movement from ignorance.

Sankharas, if you'll remember from the aggregates, refers to actions in three spheres: body, speech, and mind. We look at bodily actions, we look at actions of speech, and we look at thoughts and emotions. These are all included in the range of sankharas.

So when ignorance is present in the mind, you can expect that impulses based on greed and aversion will arise. Or another way to say it is that craving will arise. Ajahn Sumedho put it succinctly when he said, "Ignorance complicates everything." And this is the flavor of these two links.

Here's a simple example of ignorance complicating things. This is a true story. A robber went into a bank and approached a teller, handing them a note that said, "Give me all your money, I have a gun." The teller complied. The robber took the money, drove away, and went home. When he arrived, the police were waiting at his front door. How did they catch him so quickly? The note was written on one of his bank deposit slips, which listed his address. Ignorance complicates everything.

When we act out of greed and aversion and hurt others, we might say we leave a karmic deposit slip with them, because in some way we end up hurting ourselves from that action. But as my friend Sylvia Boorstein says, "When we see clearly, we act impeccably." When wisdom is in the mind, when ignorance is weak, then our actions are clear. These impulses don't just run away with us.

On a personal level, we can understand these impulses and their impact. On a global level, we see that they are responsible for so much pain and suffering in the world—really all the pain and suffering in the world.

Two simple examples from our time. I'm sure you all remember the financial crisis that was underway when we started this retreat, whether you joined in September or November. The financial crisis was ongoing and came out of bad mortgage loans. I just read an example where a gardener in California making $14,000 a year was allowed to borrow money with no down payment to purchase a house worth $700,000. This is such an amazing example of greed. Why would a banker do that? Because they make money off the loan, then they repackage it, bundle it with other mortgages, and sell it to some financial institution who bundles it with other kinds of investments and sells it to investors. So the bank has lost its exposure in that transaction and passed the risk on to somebody else. It's just unfettered greed at work that brought this crisis into being.

And aversion or hatred—one news flash that I'm sure won't surprise you is that the terror attacks have not stopped in Iraq. Almost daily we read accounts of bombings, suicide bombings, and people being killed. It's just the naked force of hatred, unchecked by compassion or reason, acting out unhindered on that big stage.

So in small ways, through our own machinations of greed and aversion, and on a global level, through the massive destructions that happen in the world, ignorance is giving rise to impulses unchecked by wisdom. This is the dynamic, as Sally explained, in dependent origination that keeps us on the wheel of suffering. We'll go into it in a little more detail further on.

Let's talk a little bit more about this quality of ignorance and how it works. As I think you know from Sally's talk, ignorance is not about the lack of facts. It's not that you don't know who the president of Zimbabwe is or you don't know how to conjugate verbs in Latin. That's not the kind of unknowing we're talking about. It's not knowing, as the Buddha said, the Four Noble Truths. It's not understanding really what leads to suffering and what leads to happiness.

Just to remember these Four Noble Truths: the first says that we need to fully understand the truth of dukkha—fully understand the truth of dukkha. That means to see all of the manifestations in our lives of this quality of unsatisfactoriness. Because we are not liberated beings, we have not fully understood the truth of dukkha. Even though conceptually we may know the first noble truth, we haven't integrated that understanding, so we haven't fully understood it.

As a result, we haven't relinquished—this is the injunction of the second noble truth—we have not relinquished the cause of suffering, which is craving. We can look in our own minds and see: Yes, I can check that out. It's true. I haven't completely relinquished craving yet. If we had, we would also be fully enlightened.

So that means we haven't yet satisfied the third noble truth, which is to realize directly for ourselves the end of suffering and the end of craving. We haven't fully arrived there, and so we haven't yet completely practiced the way to the end of suffering of the Eightfold Path.

Even though we can conceptually understand the Four Noble Truths, we haven't yet embodied the fullness of all their implications. This is a core meaning of ignorance.

We haven't come to realize the Four Noble Truths fully. Another way ignorance is understood in the tradition is as not comprehending the three characteristics. We haven't fully appreciated the implications of impermanence. As with the Four Noble Truths, we haven't completely integrated the implications of unsatisfactoriness, and we haven't fully absorbed the teaching of not-self. These continue to cloud our perceptions—the fact that we don't clearly see these three characteristics.

As a shorthand for ignorance, the understanding I return to again and again when contemplating this topic is that we haven't fully grokked the teaching of not-self. That's what I hold for myself personally as the core of ignorance: we haven't fully grokked not-self. We still believe in "I." We invest in "I." We put energy into it. We care for it.

When we see through this "I," our motivations fundamentally change. One thing you've likely noticed from observing your thoughts for four or ten weeks is that most of them concern "I"—and mostly they're about how we can make things better for this "I." That's what most of our thoughts are about. They're mostly expressions of self-centeredness and craving, and the motivations in our lives tend to reflect this. They center around how "I" can make things better for "I."

When our understanding changes, our motivation changes. As a simple example in practice terms, the quality of bodhicitta—sometimes translated as the awakening heart—is a wonderful thing to bring into dharma practice because it begins to make even our practice not completely self-centered.

Notice that we can take that same self-centered craving and apply it to practice, becoming focused on my suffering, my happiness, my progress on the path, my delusion, my release, my wisdom. We can approach practice with the same gaining mind we have in daily life.

This beautiful quality of bodhicitta offers a way to begin undoing that self-centeredness in our very approach to meditation practice. We bring in the reflection that we practice to liberate our own minds as a way to help liberate the minds of other beings. It's the aspiration to reach our own awakening in order to serve others—to help pull them out of suffering into their own awakening.

If we can make this even a small part of our motivation in practice, even just a tiny flicker, it shows how we can transform self-centeredness in our very approach to dharma practice.

I discovered this in an interesting way during a retreat where we made this wish part of every sitting. At the start of each session, we would say to ourselves or chant together, "May I awaken for the benefit of all sentient beings"—some formulation like that. Practicing this way, day after day as the retreat deepened, that aspiration sank into me.

Simultaneously, we were looking directly at the factor of ignorance and wisdom in the mind. I began to see, as I examined ignorance and wisdom back and forth, how this quality of wisdom is shared among all humans, among all sentient beings. This wisdom, which is part of our essential nature, has the ability to free us and lead us to the deepest happiness.

As I reflected on this alongside bodhicitta, something in my entire outlook shifted. Up to then, my practice had only been about wanting to remove the obscurations that veiled wisdom in this mind. But as I tuned into the fact that this same wisdom was available in every human mind—just covered over by layers of ignorance—I saw the whole endeavor could be held very differently.

The practice became: what I'd really like to do is remove the obscurations to wisdom wherever they're being obscured. Seeing through the separation of individual bodies and recognizing the commonality of this universal wisdom we all possess, the scope became much larger.

I offer this reflection for you to perhaps bring into your own practice: setting the intention regularly that we practice in order to bring all beings out of suffering and into awakening, accomplishing that first step through our own awakening.

This quality of ignorance—where we're fixated on the idea of self and act on it repeatedly—strengthens our self-centeredness and binds us to suffering. To investigate this, examine your experience when suffering is present. Look at times when you're struggling and ask: what's the mind like in that state?

Whenever there's suffering, there's some misunderstanding. If the Four Noble Truths had been penetrated with complete understanding, that suffering wouldn't be there. So whenever there's suffering, there's some level of delusion, confusion, not seeing clearly—some obscuration of wisdom.

What is it like when the mind is in that state? Is it peaceful? Is the mind quiet? Is everything settled? Typically not. The state of suffering is usually one of struggle where thoughts tend to swirl. There's often an upheaval of thoughts and emotions—trying to figure out what to do, how to escape this predicament, how to solve it, whether it will continue forever, how bad it is, judgments about ourselves.

As this whirlwind of thoughts and feelings moves through us, the tendency is to keep grasping onto different ones: "Let's try this..."

Maybe this is the way out. I'll investigate this solution. Maybe this will work. Because we don't know anything else. So that in itself is a good example of the combination of ignorance and the swirl of formations. When we're in a state of delusion, that swirl of formations is all we kind of have to go with. Until we learn meditation practice and we understand how to be with that swirl with mindfulness, then there's another option. But for the untrained mind, being landed in that kind of confusion and suffering just tends to generate more thinking and more emotions.

The Buddha said that typically, for most people, suffering results in bewilderment or search. Bewilderment or search. And the search can be wise or unwise. It can be a search for happiness through sense pleasures, or it can be a wise search for happiness through an authentic spiritual path. But this quality of bewilderment is something that most of us can relate to experiencing. When these hard times come along, one of the qualities tends to be this factor of confusion, of a sense of being lost, of being separated from home, of not being able to find peace or a resting place.

This bewilderment is another synonym for confusion or delusion. The Pali word is moha, and the literal meaning—this is the third of the kilesas: greed, aversion, and delusion—moha literally means stupefied. So you might just reflect on that as you're in this state of confusion. It feels kind of stupefying. We really don't know where to go next. And then all the activities of greed and aversion are kind of supported by this confusion.

You probably know that in Buddhist thinking, there are three personality types defined by greed, aversion, or delusion. Obviously, we all have all three, but as individuals, one or the other may predominate in our minds. So if greed is predominant, one could be called a greedy type, a desire type. If hatred or aversion is predominant, one could be described as an aversive type. If delusion is predominant of the three, one can be described as a deluded type. And then you can just look at how those personalities relate to the world to understand the mental effects of that particular kilesa.

What I find interesting is that all three of these are basically just different strategies for relating to suffering—the unsatisfactoriness of conditioned phenomena. The greedy type relates by trying to bring more and more pleasure in. If something has a pleasant appearance, let's keep it close so that our moment-to-moment experience is filled up with pleasant things. That's the first strategy.

The aversive type looks at the world and sees what's threatening and tries to keep that at bay. So the aversive type perceives the unpleasant, threatening phenomena and tries to push those away or create separation from the unpleasant. That's the second strategy.

The third type, the delusion type, tries to create a fog around themselves so that nothing very much is felt. The pleasant is not felt so directly, and the unpleasant is not felt directly. Rather, everything's happening at a distance, so it doesn't touch very deeply.

If you get delusion types talking about their life experiences, it can be quite funny at times. Sally runs a program in California called the Dedicated Practitioners Program. It's a combination of study, meditation, and experiential exercises, and as part of the study, she gets groups of people to come up on stage and talk about what it's like to be a greedy type, an aversive type, or a deluded type. And the comments are funniest with the deluded types.

One of the teachers at the retreat—I'm not going to name names—was self-confessed as a classic deluded type and gave an example where his wife asked him to pick up a shopping bag and take it back to the store because he was going by, to exchange it or return it because it wasn't what she had wanted. In order to jog his memory, because she was very familiar with his deluded type nature, she put the bag in front of the front door so that he couldn't get out the door without tripping over it. So he wakes up in the morning in a little bit of a hurry to get going, walks to the front door, gently picks up the bag, puts it to the side of the door, opens the door, and walks out. That's a deluded type. They just don't get the message.

Sharon Salzberg has told in many talks about her delusive temperament. One story that I love—I'll mention briefly in a very condensed form—she was teaching a three-month course one year and had driven to her home the night before and left her car in the driveway. She got up the next morning to come over to sit and do interviews. As she walked over, she didn't see her car and thought, "That's funny. Didn't I park my car here last night?" So that's the first sign of delusion: not being able to quite remember if you parked your car there or not. She came over and walked in the building and saw someone who might know where her car was and said to them, "I can't find my car this morning. It's not where I left it last night."

And his first question to her, knowing that she was a deluded type, was, "Are you sure?" And she said, "Well, the car is pretty big. I think I would have seen it if it was there." But his very raising the question caused her to doubt whether the car was actually there or not. And that's another movement of the deluded mind. It turned out that somebody else had borrowed her car without telling her. So everything was okay.

In delusion, we don't really stay in touch with our own experience, so we don't stay in touch with others' experience. And that's why delusion becomes a support for actions of greed and aversion. There's an element of denial at work. We don't see the impact of the wanting and disliking in our own mind, so we don't see the impact of our actions on others that are affected by it.

How to Come Out of Delusion

The simple practice of mindfulness is the direct path out of delusion. It's said that the proximate cause of non-delusion is wise attention. So every moment of connecting clearly to something that's real in the present moment is undoing the delusive tendency of mind. So that's one of the powers of this mindfulness practice.

But I want to look a little more deeply into the interaction between ignorance and sankaras. And I want to do it through looking at what we could call three levels of obscuration in our experience. How did we get to where we are? How did we get in this situation?

Developmentally, it could be described as something like this. At some point in the past, who knows when, we lost touch with the mind's essential nature, which you could call emptiness or you could call nirvana—that which is beyond change. We lost touch with that. And instead, we substituted for the direct seeing of emptiness; we substituted the sense of self as the core of what we take to be our identity.

When we create a sense of self in a world that is manifold, we also create a sense of other. So this is the fundamental, or you could say the first level of obscuration. We lose touch with our essential nature of emptiness, and we create a fictitious duality between self and other. And in that, we establish the I.

Once we've established the I, then we have to defend it against the other. Or we use the other to feed it, nourish it. On the one hand, it sets up protection from what is unpleasant or threatening. On the other hand, it sets up a wanting to feed or nourish with what's pleasant.

Of course, the problem with that is that this activity is unending. Once we've established the I, it can never be fully protected once and for all, and it can never be fully fed once and for all. So we have to keep recreating, sustaining this sense of I. This basic ignorance and the fictitious creation of self and other embroils us in an unending activity of protecting and feeding. So this is the first level of obscuration: the false sense of self and thereby also other.

The second layer of obscuration that comes up is as we engage in this ongoing activity, this endless activity, we're developing it through these twin forces of greed and aversion. So on top of the basic ignorance come the feeding and protecting activities of the mind.

Once we get involved in this approach to the world, which seeks to feed and protect through liking and disliking, that becomes the basis for all the other emotions. All the afflictive emotions—pride and fear and jealousy and loneliness and grief and anger—all come out of different combinations of greed, aversion, and this basic ignorance.

As we involve ourselves, we commit to this feeding and sustaining project, we start to generate all the afflictive emotions. In one Buddhist tradition, they say there are 84,000 of these. But that was a long time ago. Now there are at least 168,000, I'm sure.

All of this is built up on having constructed an identity as self. And you take a look at the way that normal life is experienced by most human beings across the globe, and you see that the content of their minds is filled with this kind of activity. It's filled with this unending flow of self-referencing thoughts and afflictive emotions over and over and over again. And this is the state that we find ourselves in when we sit down in meditation and start to take a look. That's why one teacher said, "Self-knowledge is not good news."

So this is the second level of obscuration. This swirl of emotions and grasping and clinging creates a sense of confusion in the mind, and we can no longer see clearly. As you know, when greed and aversion are active, we don't see things the way they are.

But then this leads to the third level of veil or obscuration. As we're tormented by these afflictive emotions generated in response to the world, the other, we start to act in ways that are unskillful. When we act out of greed without considering it, we harm others. When we act out of aversion or hatred without considering it, we harm others. These forms of harm create another layer of obscuration, which we could call the obscuration of actions or karmic obscurations. When we've been involved in unskillful actions for some time, they create an additional clouding in the mind.

In the first place, we're generally not very happy to admit what we've done. We're not willing to see the effect on ourselves and see the effect on others. So there comes another layer of denial or delusion about the truth of our own actions and their impact on other people.

This is the fuller picture of where most of us are when we enter meditation. We have the initial veil of losing our essential nature and the misunderstanding of self and other. Built on that, we have these formations of greed and aversion and the manifestation of the afflictive emotions and the confusion they bring. And on top of that, we have the layer of unskillful actions that we may have committed in our life when we didn't really understand.

Because in hurting others, of course we end up hurting ourselves. Deep down in the unconscious, there's some part of ourselves that knows that duality has never been true. There's some part of the mind that knows that self and other is a false distinction. And so we know on some level that hurting others is hurting ourself. And it's certainly true karmically.

I want to read from a sutta in the Majjhima Nikaya. This is Majjhima 46, where the Buddha draws out the effects of these unskillful actions. And if you look closely, unskillful actions will come either from aversion or from greed. These are the two motivating forces that lead to unskillfulness.

Some obvious examples coming from aversion are killing beings who have annoyed us—a simple example of just squashing an insect, a bigger example of the violence of murder and killing of human beings that is in the world coming out of hatred. On a more mundane level in our daily lives, angry speech comes out of this motivation of aversion and is one of the most hurtful things that goes on in our daily lives.

The Buddha talked about these kinds of actions as painful now and ripening in the future as pain, and they're supported by the ignorance that doesn't understand how this works—the false sense of duality, the distancing ourselves, the disconnection of delusion that doesn't feel what's going on in our own mind and doesn't feel the impact on others.

"Now bhikkhus, one who is ignorant, not knowing this way of undertaking things that is painful now and ripens in the future as pain, does not understand as it actually is: 'This way of undertaking things is painful now and ripens in the future as pain.' Not knowing it, not understanding it as it actually is, the ignorant one cultivates it and does not avoid it. Because they do so, unwished-for, undesired, disagreeable things increase for them and wished-for, desired, agreeable things diminish. Why is that? That is what happens to one who does not see."

So then he continues with a simile of pain now ripening in pain later: "Bhikkhus, suppose there were a bitter gourd mixed with poison, and a man came who wanted to live, not to die, who wanted pleasure and recoiled from pain, and they told him: 'Good man, this bitter gourd is mixed with poison. Drink from it if you want. As you drink from it, its color, smell, and taste will not agree with you, and after drinking from it, you will come to death or deadly suffering.' Then he drank from it without reflecting and did not relinquish it. As he drank from it, its color, smell, and taste did not agree with him, and after drinking from it, he came to death or deadly suffering. Similar to that, I say, is the way of undertaking things that is painful now and ripens in the future as pain."

This is one way that we do unskillful actions based in hatred or aversion. There's another way that we do unskillful actions which is based in greed. Some simple or obvious examples of that are overindulgence in drugs or alcohol and violating the precept on sexual misconduct drawn out of sexual desire.

So the Buddha talked about this as actions that are pleasant now but ripen later in pain. And here's the reading from the same sutta on this quality:

"Now bhikkhus, one who is ignorant, not knowing this way of undertaking things that is pleasant now and ripens in the future as pain, does not understand as it actually is: 'This way of undertaking things is pleasant now and ripens in the future as pain.' Not knowing it, not understanding it as it actually is, the ignorant one cultivates it and does not avoid it. Because they do so, unwished-for things increase for them and wished-for things diminish. Why is that? That is what happens to one who does not see."

And he offers a simile for this way of undertaking also: "Suppose there were a bronze cup of beverage possessing a good color, smell, and taste, but it was mixed with poison. And a man came who wanted to live, not to die, who wanted pleasure and recoiled from pain. And they told him: 'Good man, this bronze cup of beverage possesses a good color, smell, and taste, but it is mixed with poison. Drink from it if you want. As you drink from it, its color, smell, and taste will agree with you. But after drinking from it, you will come to death or deadly suffering.' Then he drank from it without reflecting and did not relinquish it. As he drank from it, its color, smell, and taste agreed with him. But after drinking from it, he came to death or deadly suffering. Similar to that, I say, is the way of undertaking things that is pleasant now and ripens in the future as pain."

This is the way that ignorance compounds with greed and hatred and leads us into greater suffering, greater delusion, greater confusion.

This is sort of summed up in a quotation which I've seen attributed to the Buddha, but I can't find in the suttas anywhere. But whether the Buddha said it or not, it has a lot of wisdom: "Thoughts give rise to intentions, which express through actions, which are repeated in habits, which harden into character. Therefore, watch closely the thought and let it spring from love for all beings."

So what we see is in these three levels of obscuration, there's the core layer of self, there are the afflictive emotions built on top of that, and then expressing through unskillful actions on top of that. And this is what creates the bondage that untrained human beings find themselves in.

I hope you'll get from this accounting the kind of sense of the restless swirl of energy that comes out of ignorance. It swirls internally, and through this greed and aversion in relation to the world, we mix it up with all the elements of the world and swirl it with our actions as well.

This is another quote from the Buddha: "This samsara, the round of death and rebirth, this samsara is without discernible beginning. A first point is not discerned of beings roaming and wandering on, clouded by ignorance and driven by craving." So these two go together—the not seeing and then the craving, the wanting—that keep us on this wheel, that keep us bound.

So how does the path work? I think this is really fascinating. The path works from the outside in. It starts at the outer layer of unskillful actions and then moves to the layer of afflictive emotions and then moves to the false creation of self down to the essential nature of emptiness. And this is reflected in the way the gradual path is commonly described as the practices of sila, samadhi, and paññña—ethical conduct, meditation, and wisdom.

As we enter the path, the first thing we do is learn the five precepts. Annie's going to talk about this in more detail, I think, tomorrow night. The beautiful thing is that the Buddha has laid out a very clear directive for us to clear away this outer layer of karmic obscurations, the obscurations brought on by unskillful conduct. As those begin to thin, that is a level of development that's referred to as purification of conduct, and that's the area of sila. I won't go into more detail on that tonight, but just understand that it works on the formations of body and speech. That's the area of the precepts, the practice that starts to undo those knots of karmic obscuration.

But then we come through that and we still find internally the mind is stirred up with the afflictive emotions and the reactive impulses of greed and aversion. So the tool to work with that is samadhi. Through moment-to-moment attention to something that's actually happening, we undo the delusive nature of mind by connecting with reality as it is, and we collect the attention in the present moment, stepping outside of these forces that are looking to feed and sustain with pleasure and protection.

Stepping outside those, collecting the mind, the mind attains a stability in the present moment and a level of peacefulness. We come out of that swirl of the afflictive emotions and the reactive formations of greed and aversion. We discover that peace is available in the present moment. And it's the development of this moment-to-moment mindfulness resulting in a collected mind that starts to deliver us from the veil of the second layer of emotional affliction.

Then as that weakens—as the Buddha said, "tranquility is for the abandoning of desire"—as the force of desire weakens and we come into the present moment, then we're able to see more clearly. The mind is not all swirled up. We've worked against the grain of delusion to see things the way they are. And that starts to open the door for wisdom.

So the third factor of the path, paññā, or wisdom, starts to undo this fundamental ignorance grounded in the belief in self. We start to see with our wisdom eye all things are coming and going, not just within the body, which we take to be me or mine, but outside as well. We see that events inside and events outside are all held within the same kind of consciousness—consciousness of external, consciousness of internal, are all happening in just the same field.

So this sense of a belief in the absolute division between inner and outer, between self and other, starts to get chipped away at. We start to see all phenomena coming and going on their own, none of them to be taken as I or mine. And this was pointed to in that beautiful teaching to Bahiya where the Buddha said, when you see in this way and you don't establish yourself in inner or outer, you will be neither here nor there nor in between.

So the mind starts to become clear of this fundamental delusion of self and other, starts to emerge from the basic level of obscuration or ignorance. This level is called the purification of view. I think I forgot to mention the second stage is called the purification of mind. So, sila deals with purification of conduct, samadhi deals with purification of mind, and paññā deals with purification of view.

Now we understand things arise and pass on their own. There is no one at the center to whom they're all happening. And as we understand that, a great letting go takes place. We see that the world is essentially uncontrollable. The strategies that we had for just collecting to ourselves continuous pleasure, pushing away from ourselves anything that is unpleasant, is basically futile. In the end, that kind of control doesn't work.

And we see that the aftereffect of being so stirred up in this ceaseless self-referencing activity is basically more trouble than it's worth. We feel the burden of it, the pain, the exhaustion of constantly trying to feed and defend this poor self, this poor isolated self.

But we find in ourselves the capacity for trust, for relaxation, for surrender, with a full presence of what's true, not denying any of the arisings or any of the passings. And this is why the Buddha said that vipassana is for the abandoning of ignorance. We see the delusion of self and other. But this is not the final step.

Wisdom has to take one more step before it's complete. And that is the penetration to the third noble truth.

The Buddha taught dependent origination to show the creation of suffering with ignorance as its root, but he taught it even more importantly to show the end of suffering. As he said, with the end of ignorance comes the end of formations. With the end of formations, the other links also cease, and with that, so does the final link of suffering.

So not only does ignorance cease formations, but the cessation of ignorance leads to the cessation of impulses, especially these untrained impulses of greed and aversion.

You can take a look at this in your meditation experience. What is it like when the mind is filled with wisdom? When you're truly in a state of understanding, seeing the impermanent nature of things, seeing the selfless nature, seeing the unsatisfactory nature—what are the qualities of mind at that point?

People describe it in different ways. There's some sense of peace. There's some sense of spaciousness. There's a sense of non-clinging, a sense of release or freedom, a degree of courage, a willingness to open, acceptance, loving-kindness, joy, interest. All these are qualities of the wisdom mind, or you might say the awakened mind.

But for the awakening to really take place, there has to be the penetration to the third noble truth. The third noble truth says that there is an end to suffering reached through the end of craving, and this is equated to nibbana.

This is from Sariputta, one of the Buddha's chief disciples: "The destruction of lust, the destruction of hatred, the destruction of delusion—this is nibbana."

Or as the Buddha put it: "This is the peaceful, this is the sublime—that is the stilling of all formations." That is, in Pali, sabba sankhara samatha. All sankharas go to tranquility. "The stilling of all formations, the relinquishing of all attachments, the destruction of craving, dispassion, cessation, nibbana."

The Buddha's teaching on the third noble truth was: this third noble truth is to be realized. That means his instructions to us as practitioners is: your directive is to realize in your own practice the truth of the end of suffering, the end of craving, that is nibbana.

In our tradition, this direct realization of the element of nibbana is what's considered an enlightenment moment. And when such a moment takes place, it's said that one has entered the stream. And then with further practice, further realization, full awakening is possible. In fact, it's said to be inevitable at a later time.

So the key of this transformation is the direct realization of this unconditioned element, or nibbana. Sally and I were listening to teachings from the Dalai Lama this summer, and in the Tibetan path, he formulated it in a very similar way. He called it the direct realization of the ultimate nature of reality. Because nibbana is the one element that is unchanging in our makeup, that is what's viewed in the tradition as the ultimate nature of things. So it is the direct realization of that that constitutes this awakening.

Now the Buddha, when he described this quality of stream entry in the suttas, tended to put it in this language. He'd say of one for whom that event had just taken place: "The spotless, immaculate vision of the Dhamma arose. All that is subject to arising is subject to cessation."

So in our tradition, this realization of nibbana has become associated with this term cessation. And most accounts of enlightenment report that some kind of cessation happens with stream entry. At that moment, some kind of cessation happens.

So what ceases? At the very least, sankharas cease forming. There is the stilling of all formations. Sabba sankhara samatha. All sankharas go to tranquility.

In most accounts, there is the sense that the sankharas have ceased so completely that there is no possibility of disturbance in the enlightenment moment, no possibility of the mind being disturbed because the sankharas are so completely absent. And that's why this kind of experience is often described with a sense of unshakable peace, unshakable peace.

This peace is generally reported by those who have discovered it as the highest happiness, because the mind is beyond any need of feeding or protection, because it is dwelling in this peace that is beyond comprehension, beyond possibility of disturbance.

Some beings have realized this peace. Some beings have found it. And some beings can transmit it.

Some years ago, I went over to Nepal to spend some time practicing with one of my Tibetan teachers, a young Rinpoche there named Soktse Rinpoche. And while I was practicing there, he had a visitor who was one of the most esteemed masters in his lineage. His name was Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche.

Rinpoche had taken up residence there but was not teaching. But my teacher said if I'd like to meet him, he would make it possible. And I said, "No, I don't need to meet him."

I was sort of thinking, you've seen one Rinpoche, you've seen them all. Then I reconsidered. And I said, you know, if it would be okay, I would like to meet Nyoshul Ken Rinpoche. And my teacher said, okay, I'll arrange it.

So I was brought into his presence. He was sitting up ready to receive me. He was with his wife and a couple of attendants, and my teacher was there. We just had some chat through my teacher who translated. I was actually offering him a dana on behalf of a friend who knew him.

The moment came for me to offer the dana. So I went up and made three bows to him. I held the envelope out with my hands and reached up for him to take it. And as I reached up, I looked him in the eye.

As I looked him in the eye, something shifted. He seemed to go into his meditative state, and what I felt was his eyes moved slightly apart, and then everything stopped. He became completely still inside.

Looking into his eyes at that moment, I felt it wasn't accurate to say his mind had gone still. Rather, there was no mind there to go still or active. And as I was looking into that stillness, I just felt drawn further and further in, and I felt actually like I was falling into the unconditioned. I was falling into the stillness of the unconditioned.

And then something came back in me, which was a sense of self. I got nervous. I felt too exposed somehow. He was completely unguarded, undefended, looking right into the center. And I felt exposed in his eyes. And it broke the spell for me. I must have drawn back, and then he went back into a more normal look, and the moment was over. I felt if I could have just gone on looking a little longer.

I'll just close with this quotation from the Buddha on Nibbana:

"One who is dependent has wavering. One who is independent has no wavering. There being no wavering, there is calm. There being calm, there is no desire. There being no desire, there is no coming or going. There being no coming or going, there is no passing away or arising. There being no passing away or arising, there is neither a here nor a there nor an in-between. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

Let's just sit for a minute, please.

There being no wavering, there is calm. There being calm, there is no desire. With the cessation of ignorance comes the cessation of formations.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 18

Kamma and the End of Kamma

Guy Armstrong · 59 min

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines one of Buddhism's most fundamental yet misunderstood teachings: kamma (Pali) or karma (Sanskrit). Drawing from the Aṅguttara Nikāya and Dhammapada, he clarifies that kamma means 'action with volition' (cetanā) - not mere physical action, but intentional acts of body, speech, and mind rooted in either wholesome states (generosity, loving-kindness, wisdom) or unwholesome roots (greed, aversion, delusion).

Armstrong addresses common Western misconceptions about karma, emphasizing that it's not about 'deserving' suffering or avoiding compassionate action. He explores six ways karmic results manifest: before, during, and after actions; in how others respond to us; in creating mental habits; and in mysterious future ways beyond our perception. The talk integrates karma with the teaching of anattā (not-self), explaining how our ever-changing mind-stream carries karmic patterns while remaining fundamentally empty of fixed essence.

The discussion culminates in exploring how the Noble Eightfold Path itself represents a karmic process that leads to the complete end of kamma - the state of the arahant who no longer generates new volitional actions while potentially still experiencing results of past karma. This profound teaching reveals karma not as cosmic punishment, but as the moral fabric woven into existence itself, offering both the means of liberation and the path beyond all conditioning.

The talk tonight is on karma and the end of karma.

The Dalai Lama was once asked by someone, if you were teaching Westerners, would it be more important to teach them about emptiness or about karma? He said that as important as emptiness is in the Buddhist teachings, it would be more important to teach Westerners about karma. So I thought we shouldn't have a three month course go by without some discussion of this topic, which is very central to the Buddha's teachings.

The word has entered our Western vocabulary, but it's not very well understood. Most Westerners have a difficult relationship with karma when they first encounter it. In the talk this evening, I'd like to suggest that karma is something you can really cozy up to. In fact, it may become one of your best friends on the path. We don't really need to hold it at arm's length as we understand it properly.

I have to say as a preface that I cannot verify from my direct experience the range of the Buddha's teachings on this topic, and most people I know are in the same position. So tonight, I'm not going to tell you what I know personally about karma, as much as what the Buddha said about it, because he said that he could see these things from his direct experience. I just want to share with you his teachings on karma. I am also not trying to get you to believe, although I think it would be greatly to your benefit. But I just want you to know what the Buddha said and let you find your own relationship to these teachings.

This evening, I'm going to touch on four main points in relation to karma: the meaning of the word, the way results are generated, the relationship between karma and not-self, and the end of karma.

What is Karma?*

This is the Sanskrit expression of the word. In Pali, it's known as kamma. I might use either of those. It's another example of a simple Indian word that the Buddha took and gave a special meaning to.

In these Indian languages, karma or kamma simply means action, nothing more. In the time of the Buddha, all the different philosophical schools around northern India had something important to say about action. Either it mattered or it didn't matter. There would be consequences or there wouldn't be consequences. It's predetermined or it's freely chosen. There were all these different views.

The Buddha contributed a unique and original perspective on the term. The way he defined it, he said that it means action with volition, or you could say intention. This is the term cetanā that we introduced as a meditation subject toward the end of the instructions a few weeks ago.

This is a quote from the Anguttara Nikaya: "Volition, O bhikkhus, is what I call action. For through volition one performs the action."

We could talk about different synonyms for this word volition: intention, motivation, urge, will, impulse. You get the feeling that it's the kind of energy from the mind that drives the action of thought or speech or body. This is really the key.

In the Buddha's explanation, what makes an action wholesome or unwholesome is the wholesome or unwholesome quality of the volition from which it comes. Actions that are rooted in greed, aversion, and confusion—which are called the roots of the unwholesome—express themselves in unwholesome actions. Actions that are rooted in their opposites—generosity, loving kindness, and wisdom, which are called the roots of the wholesome—express themselves through wholesome actions.

It's not the action per se that is to be judged wholesome or unwholesome. It's the volition from which it comes. For example, if a baby moves in their sleep and knocks over a candle and the candle burns the house down, the baby has no unwholesome volition in that. So there's no karmic consequence, even though you wouldn't really like to have your house burned down. The baby did nothing wrong.

You could take an action like cutting somebody with a knife and ask, is that wholesome or unwholesome? If it's done by a surgeon as an act of compassion, it can be very wholesome. If it's done by a robber out of hatred, then it's very unwholesome. It's not the act per se, but the intention behind it that causes it to be seen as wholesome or unwholesome.

An interesting point in this very definition of action with volition—which is most of the action that we do—is that there's a moral weight to the action that's intrinsic to its volition. This is an important point that we'll come back to later, and a departure from the other schools in India at the time.

Action can take place in three spheres: body, speech, and mind. In this understanding, thoughts and emotions also can have volitional impulses as their basis.

Fortunately, the Buddha was very clear about what kinds of actions have wholesome qualities and what kinds have unwholesome. This aligns very much with the talk that Annie gave last week on sīla. To put it in a slightly different context, he identified ten actions as unwholesome.

Three actions of body are considered unwholesome: killing, taking what is not given, and sexual misconduct. Four actions of speech are considered unwholesome: lying, harsh speech, malicious speech about another person, and idle chatter or gossip. And three actions of mind are considered unwholesome: covetousness, ill will, and wrong view.

This is very interesting. The Buddha said that misunderstanding the nature of reality gives us an unwholesome basis from which to relate to life. So misunderstanding or wrong view is a mental unwholesome action.

The ten wholesome actions are simply to refrain from the ten unwholesome. This gives us very clear guidelines for our conduct in daily life, just as Annie described in her talk. And I think especially because in another week we'll be heading back into daily life, this is a very important time to turn our reflections to action in the world and what will conduce to our welfare and what will not conduce to our welfare.

The Buddha described one who takes great care with their actions as enjoying what he called the bliss of blamelessness. That is, when one reviews one's conduct in the world, if it has been aligned with the precepts and with the ten wholesome actions, one enjoys a certain kind of freedom from regret and freedom from remorse that he called the bliss of blamelessness. And I've always been interested to what degree this quality, this impeccability of conduct, can be developed.

I was very interested to read the account of an interview with the Dalai Lama that took place a few years ago. The person conducting the interview was Oprah Winfrey. I really appreciate Oprah for bringing wholesome teachings about well-being and healing and spirituality to a very wide audience. I don't know anybody in the world who hits such a wide audience with such good teachings as she does. So I very much bow in her general direction.

This is an account of the interview that she held with the Dalai Lama. Oprah started by asking the Dalai Lama, "Have you ever had to forgive yourself for anything?"

The Dalai Lama replied, "Small incidents, like accidentally killing an insect."

"Killing an insect?" Oprah said. "An insect? Hmm, okay."

The Dalai Lama continued, "My attitude toward mosquitoes is not very favorable. Not very peaceful. Bedbugs also."

"And that's it?" Oprah couldn't quite believe what she was hearing. "In your lifetime, that's what you have to forgive yourself for?"

"Small mistakes every day, maybe," the Dalai Lama said evenly. "But major mistakes, it seems, no."

"No major mistakes," Oprah repeated, mulling over the idea. She fell silent and looked out the window. There was awe in her voice when she finally continued. "You have nothing in life that you have regrets about. That's a good life. That's a great life, to have no regrets."

The Dalai Lama continued, "Regarding service to Tibet, service to Buddhism, service to humanity, I have done as much as I can. Regarding my own spiritual practice, when I share my experiences with more advanced meditators, even those who have spent years in the mountains practicing single-pointedness of mind, I don't lag too far behind."

All that stands between us and the Dalai Lama is sixteen lifetimes of practice. So we're getting started.

This is the potential in the bliss of blamelessness—not to have any regrets in one's life.

So this is the basic meaning of karma: looking closely at our actions and seeing the intentions that they spring from. Then the other part of the teaching is that the kinds of actions we do lead to certain results in our life. And the basic understanding is that when we act from a wholesome intention, that brings wholesome results back into our life. When we act from an unwholesome intention, that brings unwholesome results back into our life or unhappiness.

This is from the Dhammapada, a famous quotation near the beginning: "Mind is the forerunner of all things. Mind is chief. Speak and act with an impure mind and sorrow will follow you like the wheel of the cart follows the oxen. Mind is the forerunner of all things. Mind is chief."

Speak and act with a pure mind and happiness will follow you like your shadow, unshakable. This is the general statement of the teaching on karma: speak with a pure mind and happiness results, or act with an impure mind and unhappiness results. This truth holds whether our aim is simple human happiness—cultivated by qualities like generosity, loving-kindness, and compassion—or the highest happiness, developed through the factors of the Eightfold Path. In either case, these are our karmic directions.

This basic understanding is gaining ground in our wider culture. A few years ago, I was teaching a class at Juvenile Hall in San Mateo, California, to a group of teenagers—young people under eighteen who were in jail awaiting trial on charges like assault, grand theft, and murder. As part of the class, I felt it important to teach them about karma because of its crucial bearing on our welfare. I began presenting the topic as the study of how we can find happiness.

"Do you all have some feel for this teaching on karma?" I asked.

One young man replied, "Oh, you mean what goes around comes around?"

"Yes, that's it," I said. He had it. He already grasped that concept. There wasn't much more I needed to say, and there wasn't much resistance to the basic idea.

In the Tibetan system, the phrases for the Brahmaviharas are expressed partially in terms of karma. The four immeasurables in the Tibetan tradition include these lines for metta and compassion: "May all beings have happiness and the cause of happiness, which is virtue." That's the metta phrase. The compassion phrase: "May all beings be free from sorrow and the cause of sorrow, which is non-virtue." Here the metta and compassion wishes have been joined with the teaching on karma to illuminate how they arise.

What fascinates me about this teaching is that it doesn't matter if you believe in it or not. It doesn't matter if you know the teaching or not. It doesn't matter if your religion believes in it or not, and it doesn't matter if your culture believes in it or not. These teachings describe a universal law that operates whether we wish it to happen or know if it's happening—it happens anyway. Much of the growth in the path comes through developing confidence in this teaching, learning to trust somewhat in this law. Do we trust that impeccable conduct really leads to happiness?

There's a beautiful story that illustrates this trust. It concerns one of the most remarkable monks in our tradition I've had the chance to meet—a Cambodian monk named Maha Gosananda. Maha Gosananda became the patriarch of Cambodian Buddhism after the time of the Khmer Rouge. Perhaps the only reason he survived the Khmer Rouge was that he was practicing outside Cambodia while they were in power. Sixteen of his immediate family members were killed in Cambodia during the Khmer Rouge regime, but he was practicing in Thailand at the time and escaped that period of mass killings of the monks.

Around 1980, the Khmer Rouge were starting to be displaced from power, but many refugees remained on the Thai border. Maha Gosananda began living in the refugee camps as a way to help heal the country and create a path for people to return home. While there, he taught, becoming well-loved and well-respected. From a simple hut in the refugee camp, he would teach on Sunday mornings, and hundreds of people—sometimes thousands—would gather outside his hut for the teaching.

One of his main teaching devices was to have people chant in Pali another verse from early in the Dhammapada: "Hatred never ceases through hatred. Hatred only ceases through love. This is the ancient and eternal law."

Can you imagine having the courage to teach this to people whose families had been killed, whose fellow citizens had been murdered mercilessly by the government in power? Many supporters of that government were still alive and in positions of local influence in Cambodian villages and towns. Yet Maha Gosananda wanted to unify the country. How could he heal? His message was that we can only heal through love. That's trust in karma—trust in the impeccability of conduct and speech.

A footnote to this story: there were Khmer Rouge affiliates still in the refugee camp who didn't appreciate the reconciliation work Maha Gosananda was trying to carry out. They threatened his life. When word reached some of the Westerners in the camp, they approached Maha Gosananda and said, "It's not safe for you here anymore. We're going to give you money to take a plane to Paris where you can live in exile and your life will be safe."

Maha Gosananda had been teaching this prayer from the Dhammapada—about reconciliation through love—through pamphlets. He had printed many, many pamphlets containing the Pali phrases that the Cambodians would chant along with him during the Sunday morning teachings. Essentially, they were asking him to give all of that up.

So Mahagosananda said, "OK, you give me the money, I'll go to Bangkok and do as you say." So they gave him the money—several hundred dollars to fly to Paris to safety. He went to Bangkok, printed up thousands more of the pamphlets, came back to the refugee camp and handed them out to even more people and continued his teaching: "Hatred never ceases through hatred. Hatred only ceases through love." That was his trust in the Dhamma.

So our equanimity practice, which we introduced this week, is built on this understanding that our happiness or unhappiness comes from our past actions, their wholesome or unwholesome qualities. The traditional phrase goes like this: "All beings are the heirs to their karma. Their happiness and unhappiness depend on their past actions more than on my wishes for them."

The Buddha actually stated this even more strongly in the text. This is from the Majjhima Nikaya: "Beings are owners of their actions, heirs of their actions." Here you understand that the word he was using is karma. "Beings are owners of their karma, heirs of their karma. Their actions are the womb from which they are born. Their actions are their friend, their refuge. Whatever acts they perform, for good or bad, of that they will be the heirs."

I've found that Westerners often have a strong resistance to this idea, so I want to explain a little about the sense of it and why sometimes I think there's a misunderstanding. First, for Americans at least, it conflicts with some notion we have about democracy. Those of you outside of America may not know that the beginning of our Declaration of Independence says—and I'm paraphrasing slightly—"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all persons are created equal." So there's something about this notion of fundamental equality that seems to people to conflict with the teaching of karma, as though out of this fundamental equality, everyone should be equally happy. And so from this point of view, the teaching on karma can seem cold, uncaring, or even cruel.

But I think one of the misunderstandings is this: The teaching on karma doesn't mean that we think beings deserve to suffer. That's not part of it. There's no deserving anywhere. And I'm very convinced that if the Buddha could have reached into everybody's heart and plucked out the seed of suffering, he would have done that instantly. I don't think there's any wish on the Buddha's part or on any serious practitioner's part that people deserve to suffer.

Think about the story of Angulimala. He had killed 999 people and strung their fingers in a bracelet around his neck. He was in the forest and tried to kill the Buddha as his thousandth victim. Did the Buddha think that he deserved to suffer? No. He taught Angulimala the Dharma. He helped him to practice and understand. Angulimala soon became enlightened and his suffering was ended. This is the work of compassion.

But the fact is that the teaching of karma is just a law in the Buddha's view. Expecting to do an unwholesome action and not have a result of suffering would be like expecting the law of gravity to be suspended. It would be like expecting an apple to be plucked from a tree and not fall to the ground. There's just no way to arrest the law of gravity. There's no way to arrest the law of karma. But that doesn't mean there's a deserving in it. There's not a punishing attitude in the law of karma.

Sometimes we also may think that this is an excuse for not caring. You know, we look at someone who's suffering and we go through this rationale: "Oh, they're suffering. That must be their karma. Therefore, it's their fault. So it's not my problem." And we could think it could be used as an excuse for not taking action or not caring. Again, that's not the way it's meant. This is called indifference and it's the near enemy of equanimity.

The Dharma is about unfolding compassion. So when we see somebody suffering, it doesn't matter what the cause is. It doesn't matter whether the cause is an external cause, a physical cause, a mental cause, a karmic cause. Compassion wants to alleviate suffering. Of course, to alleviate effectively, we have to understand the cause, but it does not come with a judgment that says you should be suffering, therefore I'm not going to intervene or help.

If in doing the equanimity meditation you find this tendency coming to mind—oh, that person's suffering is from their own karma, therefore it's not my problem, I don't care—then that equanimity needs to be suffused more with metta and compassion. It's an unripe equanimity, an incomplete equanimity that's slid to its near enemy. So in this way, the Brahmaviharas help to balance one another out. Compassion has to go along with equanimity.

The fruits of action, or the results of action, you might say, can be seen in at least six different ways. So I want to run through some of those.

First way is before we do an action, we get a feeling for its tone. So if we're thinking of doing something lovely, beautiful, coming out of metta or generosity, before we do it, as we're considering doing it, we feel good. So even before we do the act, it brings an uplift to us. Similarly, if we're thinking about doing something unskillful, take a look inside. As we get more sensitive, something feels kind of creepy about it. If you tune into it, there's a quality.

Not long ago—I work on a lot of committees and a board at Spirit Rock, teacher groups and so forth, and we have lots of discussions and debates about how to run the center—we were having a discussion on something and I'd put out some viewpoint or other. And somebody was taking the opposite viewpoint and replied in an email to me that I found not only disagreeing with me, but disrespectful. I don't mind if people disagree with me, but when it's disrespectful, then I kind of get stirred up about it.

And I noticed my first impulse—very first impulse—was sort of happily, I'll forward this email to the other members of the committee. So I won't say anything against the person, but I'll show them, you know, the unskillful attitude from this other person who disagrees with my view. And I saw that, and I was sitting with that for a minute. I didn't hit send, and I saw that was the motivation, and I couldn't send it. So I just didn't send it. I can't even remember if I replied to the original email or not, but I very consciously made the decision not to send that because it just didn't feel right. So before we act, we can feel the influence.

During the act, we feel the result. When you're being generous with somebody, tune into how it feels. When you're expressing love to somebody, tune into how that feels. It feels great to give. So in the very moment of doing a wholesome act, you feel the wholesome effect of it. Similarly, when we're doing something that is going to hurt somebody else, inside there's some degree of pain that's going along with it. Maybe it's coming out of pain in the first place. And we can feel the pain even as we do it. Something that doesn't feel right, doesn't feel good.

Our friend Sylvia Borstein has this nice line that's helpful to remember: Anyone causing great pain is himself in great pain. And that's helpful to remember as a source of compassion.

In the future, after we've done an action and we remember our past actions, we can feel good about that. And that's why in the metta practice, we very often encourage us all to reflect on our good actions as we enter metta for ourselves. Because when we tune into our own goodness, it makes it easier for the metta for ourselves to arise. Or if we've harmed people in the past, often in retreat those memories will come up clearly and we'll feel that sense of remorse or guilt about those past actions. So that's the third way.

A fourth way is that the way that we act toward others kind of comes back to us in the way they relate to us. If we relate to other people out of friendship and warmth and affection and generosity, then people like to see us coming. And they kind of open their hearts and their minds to us, and they want to receive us. So our actions have created an atmosphere that forms the relationship that we're held in. But if we act to people out of anger, frustration, irritation, impatience, and judgment, then people aren't so keen to see us coming. And we may find as we approach people, they turn away or close off to us. So again, the results of our actions in relationship get mirrored back in others' responses.

The fifth way that our actions influence us in the future is in creating habitual states of mind. When we generate wholesome states of mind again and again and again, that becomes the way the mind inclines. If we generate unwholesome states of mind again and again and again, that becomes the way our mind inclines.

So take a look at this as you sit on your cushion. One question that always interests me when I'm sitting or when I come to physical stillness is, why does my mind move at all? Does it need to? Most of the time there's not a real need, but it does. Why is it moving?

And then where does it go? Where does the mind commonly go when it moves? What does it dwell on? Often we'll see it's drawn to those places where we've invested in the past—where we've invested in people or outcomes or situations or money or pleasures or pains. It will go where we've put our volitional energy.

This is from the Buddha: "Bhikkhus, whatever a person frequently thinks and ponders upon, that will become the inclination of their mind. If they frequently think and ponder upon thoughts of sense desire, ill will, or cruelty, then their mind will incline to thoughts of sense desire, ill will, and cruelty. If they frequently think and ponder upon thoughts of renunciation, kindness, and compassion, then their mind will incline to thoughts of renunciation, kindness, and compassion."

So as we act, we are wearing a groove in the mind that the mind will settle into in the future. This is the fifth kind of outcome from present actions.

The sixth is the one that people question. It seems from what the Buddha said that our actions have results in the future in mysterious ways that we really cannot see or understand. These are the ways that we can't verify from our individual insight or experience—some of the complicated and intricate workings of karma. How is it that a life of virtue brings happiness? I don't know all the details of it. We can see some of the ways in those first five. But how does that work completely? I don't know. But the Buddha said that they do come back in ways that we normally can't foresee or tell, in complicated and mysterious ways.

It's kind of interesting when you tune into this level of the teaching of karma—you understand that what the Buddha was painting is a picture of the universe in which morality is woven into the very fabric of the nature of beings. That wholesome actions bring wholesome results is essentially a moral statement. Immoral conduct brings unhappy results—that's a moral statement. This was something that really amazed me when I started to tune into it and reflect on it. Morality is an essential part of the universe of sentient beings. It's inescapable.

To me, this became the heartful view. I wouldn't want to live in a universe that was amoral. Finding that I live in a universe of which morality is an integral part is, to me, a much more heartful way to approach life. It makes me care more about my conduct and the underlying intention. For me, this understanding warms up the universe. It's not a cold or immoral or heartless view at all. It brings a great sense of heart to the very fabric of this world that we live in.

But the Buddha said in many ways we can't figure out the details of how karma unfolds in these subtle ways. In fact, he described it as one of the four imponderables. The Buddha said there are four things that if you speculate about them, you will go mad and experience vexation. I'm not sure which comes first—the going mad or experiencing vexation—but nonetheless, it's not a good outcome.

One of the four is the workings of karma, meaning the details of how karmic results happen that we can't see. The other three, in case you're curious, are the range of mind of a Buddha—what a Buddha could know or not—the beginning of things, the beginning of the universe, and the power of a concentrated mind. These are the other things that you just can't figure out, so you don't need to think about them.

But think about the way that karma is sometimes held in our culture and probably in others. Have you ever heard this? I have heard this. Someone gets sick, and a friend, questionably, will say to them, "Oh, you're sick? It must be your karma." How do you think that makes the sick person feel? Usually pretty awful.

To me, the really interesting thing is there is no way that friend can know whether that's true or not. That's only a belief—a belief with no real evidence and no foundation in these teachings. Only somebody like a Buddha could see that kind of connection. You and I cannot see that. So for us to speculate on the causes of a friend's illness is really inappropriate. It's way off base.

The Buddha was asked one time if everything that happened to one on the level of pleasant or unpleasant feeling came from past karma. And he did not say yes. This is an important thing to remember. He was invited to make this statement, and he did not agree with it.

And he named other causes that he said all the world recognizes as being influential factors. He mentioned illness, diet, climate, and assault as other factors that lead to pleasant or unpleasant feelings for people.

So just remember, karma is one kind of cause that works in this world that we live in. It is not the only cause. There are physical causes. There are chemical causes. There are biological causes, including genetics. There are dietary and meteorological causes. There are many other things responsible for pleasant or unpleasant feeling.

So we can go in one direction. We can say if there's a wholesome act now, it will bring wholesome results. If there's an unwholesome act now, it will bring unwholesome results. We can go from the present and say there will be some future consequence. But there is no way that any of us can go from the present and say this was the past cause of that.

This outcome that someone is living—whether it's their illness, their general health, their sense of mental well-being, their living situation—anything, any accident that befalls them, any assault that befalls them, there is no way that we can say that was the result of karma. This is not in the Buddha's teachings whatsoever. So this is something I think often catches Westerners, and I just wanted to be very clear that this is not in the teachings. Not everything that happens is a result of karma.

But when somebody says in the West, "I don't believe in karma," it usually means this sixth kind—this mysterious way that it unfolds in the future. Because we can understand the other five ways that present actions lead to wholesome or unwholesome results. They're quite verifiable.

In terms of this sixth way, this mysterious way that karma can unfold in the future, it took me quite a few years of hanging out with the concept and observing my life and the lives of people I knew to get some confidence in this teaching. So don't expect that you have to believe in it overnight or you should believe in it overnight. I'd say just maintain an open attitude to the possibility it may be true and then see. See over the years how it feels to you, how your intuition relates to it.

But also I'd ask you not to believe in its opposite—that there is no way that a wholesome act results in wholesome circumstances in the future. Clearly, you and I cannot know that either. And so to discount this teaching would also be an act of blindness. So I just ask you to hold the possibility, recognizing that none of us knows from direct experience, and then investigate and see.

This also influences the next topic I want to mention briefly, which is rebirth. For karma to be understood fully, we need to understand it in the light of rebirth, because the actions from this life, according to the Buddha's teachings, will influence our next birth after death.

Again, the concept of rebirth was alien to me when I started to practice Vipassana. When I heard the teachings on karma and rebirth, I was skeptical at first. So I didn't toss them out. I just kept an open and questioning mind and then let them settle and reflect over years. So again, there's no rush to have to decide on this question, but just ask you to keep an open mind.

In some of the suttas, the Buddha says very clearly how some of the actions of this life play out in future lives. He said, for example, that one who is generous in this life will experience either in this life or a future life abundance in material things. One who is stingy in this life will experience in this life or some future life a lack of abundance in material things.

He said that one who abstains from killing living beings in this life or a future life will enjoy long life. One who abstains from injuring living beings in this life or a future life will enjoy good health.

So again, there's the possibility of present actions leading to future results, but trying to interpret it backwards, we can't do. We can't say that someone who has a short life—it's because of some action in the past. We don't know enough to see it that way.

Then another question that comes is: what do we take with us at the time of death? What is important that we carry forward? And this is what the Buddha said:

"Grain—" this is an agricultural society; grain was a form of wealth back then —"grain, possessions, money, all the things you love, servants, workers, dependents, none of them can you take with you. You must cast them all aside when you die. But whatever kamma is made by you, whether by body, speech, or mind, that is your real possession, and you must fare according to that kamma. That kamma will follow you, just as the shadow follows its owner. Therefore, do good actions, gather benefit for the future. Goodness is the mainstay of beings in the hereafter."

So again, it's not necessary that you believe this, but I think it's important that you know that the Buddha said this. And then you can think about it. Suppose you decide to believe this and want to lead a good life.

Then there's the great possibility, according to the teachings, that you will experience benefits in a future life. But even if you don't believe in a future life, yet you live in this way, you'll experience great benefits in this life. So whether you believe in rebirth or not, it doesn't matter—the benefits are there for you.

Now, another question that arises is: if there's no self, what gets reborn? This also intersects with the teaching on kamma. There's a similar question you can pose about kamma: if there's no self, what is it that inherits the results of kamma? This was posed by a bhikkhu in the Buddha's lifetime. The bhikkhu said, "What self then will actions performed by the not-self affect?" Basically the same question. The Buddha said, "You haven't been listening to me."

So I want to explain a little bit about how this can be understood. First of all, in terms of the self going from one life to another, it's in just the same way as our patterns go from one moment of practice to another. You can say that nothing is the same as you look closely from one moment of experience to another. Everything is changing—physical sensations, thoughts, emotions, sounds—and yet there is some continuity in our being. In the same way, there is some continuity from one birth to the next.

The factor that continues, or that makes the link—that's a better way to say it—is consciousness. It's spoken of as the relinking of consciousness from a death to the next birth. But there is no essence that is carried in that. So Ajahn Amaro put it this way:

"The process of going from one life to the next is in fact not very different from the process of going from one moment to the next. In either case, nothing substantial is ongoing, but there is a pattern that continues."

How do kamma and not-self fit together? At first they seem contradictory, but in fact they completely need each other to make sense. We talked before about this analogy of the river. A river is flowing along, there's nothing fixed in it, and yet we can give a name to that river that makes sense. The Connecticut River is a useful designation that's different from the Mississippi River.

Similarly, each of us has a mind stream that is constantly changing, but is an individual kind of phenomenon. Each of our mind streams is in constant flux, but has its own way of being. So everything is changing within each mind stream, and yet to know that Joseph's mind stream is different from Carol's mind stream, is different from your mind stream, is a helpful thing. There's an element of truth in that.

Within the mind stream, what constitutes personality? I would suggest that it is the flow of thoughts and emotions formed in certain patterns according to how the mind has been inclined, what we frequently think and ponder upon, and how we've shaped ourselves by our actions of speech and body. So the way we've acted in terms of thoughts, emotions, speech, and bodily actions comes to make up what we call personality.

There's nothing fixed in it, only a changing stream as we move through our different emotions of love, sadness, compassion, fear, joy, and so on. There's no solid essence within, and yet each of us has a kind of ongoing personality. This pattern of our actions, you could say, are karmic actions. That's all that personality is. There's nothing fixed or essential in the middle of it. But our minds are conditioned to run in those certain grooves that we know so well. And as you've seen during this retreat, it's not so easy to change those grooves. Those grooves have a certain disposition. The mind tends to run along those tracks.

Here's another quote from the Buddha about kamma: "Action makes the world go round. Action makes this generation turn. Living beings are bound by action like the chariot wheel by the pin." So we are bound to our kamma in the way that it generates our mental habits as well as some other ways.

But the freedom in that is that because nothing is fixed in this flow of our mind stream, everything can be changed. Our habits of thought and feeling and speaking and acting can all change. And Dharma practice is all about changing this.

So we start to understand that the Dharma uses the principles of kamma to transform our lives. Or another way to say it is that the path itself is a karmic unfolding. As we practice wholesome mind states, that becomes the new grooves of the mind. Our intentional cultivation of qualities like mindfulness and loving-kindness and calm and investigation and energy and equanimity—the cultivation of those factors predisposes the mind to find them again. So in that retraining, we are karmically influencing the direction of our whole mind stream.

Imagine this mind stream as a great river flowing along, carrying all of our conditioned habits with tremendous momentum. This mighty river is our mind, our personality—all those karmic formations upon which we ride. When we enter Dharma practice, it becomes like a small tributary joining from one side. At first, its power seems weak—a little bit of mindfulness, a little bit of metta. The great river doesn't shift much at all.

But as we continue our Dharma practice, that tiny stream gradually becomes a larger and larger river, and it begins to shift the entire current of the main flow. Our minds start to transform. The whole mind stream begins to take on this new karmic flavor of beautiful mental qualities.

This transformation is only possible because there is nothing fixed within our mind stream. If there were something essential and unchanging, how could we alter it? How could we transform it? If ignorance were permanently fixed, how could it be undone? If greed were immutable, how could it be overcome? But they are not fixed. There is nothing permanent in this great flowing river—that is the truth of anatta. And Dharma practice can enter with its beautiful karmic qualities and transform the entire direction of that stream, from suffering to happiness, and finally to liberation—the highest happiness.

When you contemplate our human situation, we are like beings floating in a vast sea of causes and conditions. There are external conditions—the world with all its uncertainty. There are internal conditions—our karmic predispositions. As human beings, as sentient beings, we simply float on this immense ocean of causes and conditions from the physical world, the chemical world, the biological world, and all our own conditioning. Here we are, this awareness, simply tuning into this vast unfolding on karmic levels, physical levels, biological levels, and so forth.

But how can we steer? What is our rudder amidst all the uncertainty and sometimes seeming chaos of this world? Where can we find a reliable rudder for our lives?

The teaching on karma is the pointer. The only reliable rudder is intention. Our own volitions turned toward generosity, renunciation, kindness to others, and compassion—this is how we steer our lives, and this is how we find safe harbor. This is the path to human happiness.

Let me say this again: if you want to be happy in a human sense, it is about renunciation, generosity, kindness, and compassion.

But as Dharma practitioners—serious Dharma practitioners—most of us have a further goal, which is the highest happiness: awakening, liberation, enlightenment. The Buddha said that for the Arahant, the fully awakened one, there is the complete end of karma. For some of us, this becomes the most compelling destination—the ending of karma itself. The Arahant may still experience results of past karma, but generates no new karma.

How does this come about? Again, it is volition that shapes us.

This insight comes beautifully from Nisargadatta Maharaj, an Advaita Vedanta teacher who died in the early 1990s—a deeply awakened being who worked primarily through dialogue. One questioner came to him, and Maharaj told this person, "Your own will has been the backbone of your destiny." Do you see that same pointing as karma shaping the river?

The questioner replied, "Well, surely karma interfered." And then Maharaj said something profound: "Karma shapes the circumstances of your life. The attitudes are your own. Ultimately, your character shapes your life, and you alone can shape your character."

Your character shapes your life, and you alone can shape your character. So shape your character toward human happiness—generosity, loving-kindness, compassion.

Shaping your character toward enlightenment, I'll read this statement from the Buddha:

"What karma is neither dark nor bright, with neither dark nor bright result, which leads to the end of karma? The karma that leads to the end of karma is this noble eightfold path: right view, right intention, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, right concentration."

If we focus just on the outwardly wholesome actions—generosity, loving kindness, and compassion—we're still involved in doing. We're still involved in activity with an end in sight of some greater happiness. But as we follow the Eightfold Path, we are pursuing factors that lead to this element of nibbana, the unconditioned, which is the stilling of all formations.

And so we approach the stilling of all formations more and more by this quality of non-doing with presence. The stilling where we abandon any self-centered activity. We don't hope for future happy results of abundance or long life or better conditions. We want to come to the end of suffering.

So resting in this stilling, the refraining from the unwholesome, the development of awareness, the stilling of concentration—this allows the mind to open to that which is beyond conditions, to that which is beyond good and bad in the conventional sense. That is the quality of the unconditioned, which is our nibbana.

It is the Eightfold Path that is the way leading to the end of kamma, the end of volitional action.

So let's just sit for a minute together.

CHAPTER 19

Working With Difficult Emotions

Guy Armstrong · 57 min

> In this dharma talk from a November 2005 retreat at IMS Forest Refuge, Guy Armstrong addresses one of the most practical aspects of Buddhist meditation: working with difficult emotions. Drawing on the Buddha's teachings on the five hindrances and the mechanisms of the deluded mind, Armstrong explores five common challenging states that Western practitioners encounter: desire, anger, sadness, fear, and self-judgment.
>
> Armstrong explains how each difficult emotion contains both a bodily sensation, an emotional mood, and a supporting "storyline" - the conceptual beliefs that sustain our suffering. He demonstrates how desire projects happiness into an imagined future ("I would be happy if I had this"), while anger maintains the narrative of "I'm right and you're wrong." The key insight is learning to withdraw attention from these compelling storylines and place mindfulness directly on the emotional experience itself.
>
> Rather than trying to eliminate difficult emotions, Armstrong suggests the more realistic goal of developing equanimity and spaciousness around them. He emphasizes that these states are temporary visitors, not our fundamental nature, and will naturally pass away when we stop feeding them with reactive thoughts. The talk includes practical guidance on using loving-kindness practice as an antidote to aversion, and developing confidence in our basic goodness to counter self-judgment. Armstrong concludes with Rilke's powerful reminder: "Let everything happen to you, beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final."

I just looked out at the trees and the sky and the white clouds that were there and the sunshine, and all of a sudden my mind opened and dropped all those little concerns that I'd been tight around. I opened to the sense of well-being and connection to nature and the vastness that brings. I hung out there for a little bit and then went back to email and got plugged in again. But nonetheless, this shift was a very pleasant one.

It reminded me of something that Dogen Zenji said, a great Zen master in Japan, who said that to study Buddhism is to study the self. To study the self is to forget the self. And to forget the self is to be enlightened by the 10,000 things of this world. This is the shift that I went through, dropping the self and being awakened by the 10,000 things back into this easy and relaxed way of being.

I mention this because it's a shift that we need to make in meditation over and over again. It is, in a way, the essence of right effort to step out of the small, constricted, self-conscious world of "I" and "my" and to open up into the vastness of life and the beauty of life and the impersonality of life. In this way, the mind really moves from bondage into freedom. We need to find out how to do that over and over.

This is a quote from Nyoshul Ken Rinpoche, who was one of the great Dzogchen masters of the last half century: "The purpose of Dharma practice is to know the nature of the non-deluded mind and to understand the workings of the deluded mind." This really encapsulates the scope of our practice.

To know the nature of the non-deluded mind means to recognize this state of freedom—at least relative freedom, ease, relaxation, openness, clarity, mindfulness, steadiness of attention. All the factors that are cultivated, commonly called the seven factors of enlightenment, which I think Kamala will be talking about later in the retreat.

And to understand the workings of the deluded mind: How do we get caught? How does this essential freedom, which is in some ways our deepest nature, get obscured, covered over? What are the mechanisms by which we lose touch with that?

In tonight's talk, I want to spend more time on particularly the workings of the deluded mind, how we get caught and how to work with that situation when we do become caught. I want to talk about working with difficult states of mind. This really picks up from the talk Steve gave a few nights ago on the hindrances and expands on it, getting a little more specific and adding a few practical pointers.

When we come into meditation practice, we start to look at the contents of our mind, maybe for the first time, and we find that the mind has this huge range of experience. I think one of the awesome things about retreat is that it tends to unpack and open up that wide range of experience that is part of our birthright that we may not have touched for a long time.

So we get exposed to some of the very most refined, sublime, even mystical states of being through our Dharma practice—states of great joy and happiness and bliss and calm. And on the other end of the spectrum, we often open up to those darkest corners of the mind, the most difficult things for us to experience: intense feelings of loneliness or terror or despair, hopelessness.

If we have the model that the point of our Dharma practice, the point of full enlightenment, is to be rid of a lot of the range of these difficult states, we may come in expecting them to go away rather quickly. And what we find is that they don't. For most of us, they don't.

I was asked to participate over the last weekend in a panel discussion for Buddha Dharma magazine on this topic of working with difficult states of mind. There was a Tibetan Rinpoche, a Zen teacher, and I was the token Theravadan, shall we say, on the call. We were talking about what are the problems that people get into when they think that we should be quickly free of these difficult states of mind. It can lead to a lot of striving and a lot of tension.

I suggested that maybe we should reposition our aim not to be rid of these states, but to come to equanimity with them, to come into a feeling of acceptance of them. Because when you think about it, we all have these qualities within us. This is just part of the human package. Every one of us knows this range of states of mind and states of heart. They're not foreign to any of us.

And although I deeply believe that part of our human possibility is that they can be ended through the process of awakening, as the Buddha exemplified and many others have found, I also believe that for most of us that's a long journey. What I've observed in people who are far down that path is that well before these difficult states of mind are actually uprooted or removed from the mind, beings' minds are so spacious and so full of other qualities that we develop, like love and compassion, that even when they arise, they don't have so much the power to disturb us.

I believe that this happens before the full uprooting. I think this is a much more realistic goal for us in the relatively near term. If you look over the course of this retreat, the next several years of your Dharma practice, this is possible. It is possible to find the spaciousness and the acceptance, the qualities of loving kindness, of heart, to be able to accommodate these difficult states and not be so disturbed by them. The uprooting may be a more distant goal. So for the time being, I wouldn't worry so much about that. In the near term, can we find a way not to be bothered so much by these states? And I think that is really possible.

Suzuki Roshi, the Zen master who founded San Francisco Zen Center, once began a Dharma talk like this. He said, "The difficulties you're experiencing now..." He just paused. And he had a long pause.

You can imagine—this is probably in the middle of a session, an intensive period of retreat, somewhat like this—that people were probably on the edge of their seats. Yes, how am I going to get rid of that?

He continued: "The difficulties you're experiencing now will be with you for a long time."

When I first heard this, I thought it was a little discouraging. Where's the sense of progress? Where's the hopefulness in this practice? But as I sat with it more, I came to feel it's actually very liberating. It's liberating because what it says is you can attain a high degree of inner freedom and happiness while these states of mind remain active in us. This is possible.

So it tells me that the goal of a high degree of freedom is not so remote. We can find it with all the range of states of mind that we know today. They don't have to be plucked out. Rather, we can change our relationship to them. And it's primarily through understanding them that we change that relationship.

We come to see that strong emotions—even difficult ones—aren't necessarily a problem if we don't make them a problem. If we grasp onto them and become very concerned about them, if we hold the idea that we shouldn't be feeling them, if we dwell on the concept that they've been a problem for a long time or that they're a deep pattern of ours that really needs to be changed somehow, we can make a problem of them.

But if we simply let them arise, express their nature, and pass away—which they all will—they don't have to be problematic.

As I mentioned the other morning, you can watch children enter these emotional states without fear. Children will rush headlong into joy and happiness and delight, and in a moment they can transform to anger and sadness and frustration, and then they can drop out of that back into happiness. The states just blow through them like clouds through an empty sky. That's part of our potential also. That's what's truly freeing.

We don't have to be afraid of these states. We can let them come and go. In this greater opening to them, the heart becomes purified because we're not obstructing them. We're not getting caught on them. As they come and go, they move more easily.

This notion of purification in the Buddhist tradition has a very specific meaning. It means that the forces of greed, aversion, and delusion are weakening. This is what we mean by purifying. We come to understand that happiness isn't about having more things or attaining outside things. Happiness comes from the heart which is purified. That is, as the forces of greed, aversion, and delusion are weakened in our hearts, more happiness comes in their place. This is the route to happiness.

So the first step in relating to these difficult states is knowing what we're feeling. And this is harder than it sounds. It sounds easy: "Oh yeah, just know what you're feeling. Oh, that's mindfulness. I got it. That's the third foundation. Easy. The Buddha described it in a paragraph about this long. No problem."

But it's trickier than that.

I remember some years ago I was sitting a six-week retreat here. I think the instruction period had finished, and I was just leaving through the back door of the hall and going out to my walking path. The retreat had been going about two weeks, and I had found one place down beyond the tennis courts where I liked to walk.

So I walked out the back door. I felt I was very mindful at that point—two weeks into the retreat. I was really with the lifting and moving and placing, lifting, moving, and placing. Then I looked down to my walking path and there was somebody in it.

The thoughts began: "What are they doing in my walking path? They've been here for two weeks. They know I walk there." And then I was just lifting, moving, placing, lifting, moving, placing.

I thought some more: "Are they trying to mess with my mind or something? Did I cut in front of them in the breakfast line this morning?"

Once I could recognize the anger and see how petty it was, it simply evaporated. But this illustrates how these difficult states typically operate—they seduce us by spinning stories about the way things are, taking us over through the narrative. I was completely caught in the story: they're in my path, that's wrong, and I'm right. As long as I remained trapped in that storyline, I was blind to what I was actually feeling.

All these challenging mind states we encounter have an underlying story that we unconsciously accept, and this belief system props them up. I'll call this their storyline. The storyline consists of beliefs or views about the situation, and when we buy into these views, they sustain the emotional state. If you can see through and release the storyline, the emotion will collapse because it no longer has that conceptual foundation supporting it.

I find this particularly fascinating because it reveals that our entanglement—our bondage and suffering—isn't merely emotional activity. It's emotional activity supported by views and opinions. This is precisely why the Buddhist path combines opening the heart, which addresses the emotional dimension, with awakening wisdom to see through our false views. The path beautifully integrates right understanding, which belongs to the mind, with right intention, which belongs to the heart. In our emotional life, these two aspects must work together.

This not-seeing of what we're feeling represents a form of ignorance. In terms of the kilesas or mental defilements—greed, aversion, and delusion—this exemplifies the operation of delusion. When you're experiencing something intensely without recognizing that you're feeling it, as I was during my walking meditation, you're caught in delusion. This is the deluded mind, completely unaware of what's actually happening.

Mindfulness serves as the primary tool that cuts through this type of delusion, connecting us with our actual experience. This is why I often say that mindfulness carries the tip of wisdom directly into our experience.

The key to working with all these states involves redirecting mindfulness—our attention—away from the storyline and placing it directly on the emotion itself. Once I could step away from my view that "they're wrong" and focus simply on the irritation or anger, the state became completely workable. As long as I remained entangled in the story, it remained unworkable.

When Steve spoke the other evening, he discussed the classical five hindrances that the Buddha described as obstacles to deepening meditation. Tonight I want to explore a slightly different list—one that, in my experience, represents the most common mind states that we as Western practitioners encounter in our practice, forming the most challenging aspects of our minds to work with skillfully.

The five states I'll discuss tonight are desire, anger, sadness, fear, and self-judgment. These are the ones I encounter most frequently, both in my own practice and when working with students.

I've noticed something intriguing about the first four—they seem to organize themselves into a particular structure that relates to pleasure and pain on one axis, and past and future on the other.

Consider this: if something pleasurable is anticipated in the future, what emotion most commonly arises? Desire. When something painful awaits us in the future, we typically experience fear. Another way to understand this is through hope and fear—these two states govern the mind's relationship to the future when we're not settled in present-moment awareness.

Now let's examine the past. When something pleasurable has occurred in the past but is no longer present with us, what emotion typically dominates?

Sadness, yes. Grief is about the loss of that which was pleasurable that we no longer have. So sadness or grief. Loneliness could be a variation. Despair could be a variation.

Now this last one may be a little tricky, and there may be other answers, but think about if something painful happened in the past, what's the dominant emotion when you look back on it? Let's say someone else caused that pain.

Judgment or anger. Yes, judgment or anger.

So I think that's why these four are so strong for us. They have to do with these fundamental poles of pleasure and pain painted against the backdrop of past and future. And these are the emotions that often come up. Then I bring in self-judgment because it seems to be our Western hell realm to deal with. So we'll talk about that a little bit also.

Each of these states has a mood, it has expressions in the body, and it has this storyline that's bound up with conceptual thought. So I'll talk about all of those.

Desire is this movement of mind that leans forward to something pleasurable that it wants to happen in the future. This force comes very, very often on a retreat, and sometimes it can be quite heart-wrenching. The force of missing people, missing places, missing where you feel comfortable, missing certain kinds of activities that have meant a lot to you—even missing certain kinds of food or clothing can come up quite poignantly for people on retreat.

As you look into the experience of desire, you'll start to see that there's a kind of comfort there by bringing up these familiar places, people, objects—that is a pleasure. So in a way, it's a way of bringing a pleasure into the moment. But at the same time, as you investigate the quality of desire, you realize there's also something that's always unsatisfying in desire. There's something that's unfulfilled. The very missing of the pleasant leaves a kind of hole in the heart. And it leaves this yearning, a feeling of not being fulfilled, not being complete.

So intrinsic within desire is this sense of dissatisfaction, of unsatisfactoriness. Desire always carries in its wake a trail of dukkha, a feeling of dukkha, because one of the curious things is we never seem to want what we already have. You notice that? When was the last time you wanted a hand at the end of your arm? It never occurs to us to want that unless it was gone. If our hand was taken away, we would want it a lot. But while it's here, it's not an object of desire. We always want what we don't have, and that's the dukkha of desire.

I was teaching in Italy a few years ago, which was a joy, I have to say. All the things you imagine about Italian yogis are probably true. First of all, it was very hard for them to stop talking. The silence was not quite as well-founded as the silence is here. The culture of the retreat center was a little different. They wanted to put out red wine at lunch and dinner, so we had to ask them to take that away. But nonetheless, there was an espresso machine just outside the dining hall. So after lunch, the coins were going in and the cups were coming out. Not as much sloth and torpor at the 2:15 sit, though. That was good.

I found that a lot of the Italian yogis had this really beautiful fluency with their emotions. They're very comfortable talking about what they were feeling and more in touch than I had tended to be before I began practice in knowing what I was feeling. And they weren't shy about talking about it. They felt like they were very at ease in their emotional life.

So on about the third day of the retreat, I had an interview—we had translators for all the interviews—with a very nice young Italian guy who came in and said he was having a hard time settling into the retreat. And I said, "Why is that?"

He said, "Well, this is August. This is our vacation time in Italy. And I had two choices. I could come on this retreat, or my friends asked me to go to the Caribbean with them for a ten-day vacation."

And I said, "Oh, why did you come on the retreat?"

And he said, "Because the tickets to the Caribbean were all sold out."

So if you kind of compare in your mind—let's see, Caribbean vacation, warm sun, golden sands, blue water, or sitting and walking for eighteen hours a day—he was having a little trouble settling.

So we talked about how the force of desire, wanting to be with his friends, the images of the vacation spot, could be affecting his ability to be present in the moment a little bit. And what if he didn't have those thoughts about the Caribbean? Then how would it be to be here?

So he went off and meditated, and when he came back in for his next interview, which was with another teacher, the problem had gone away. He saw that what was disturbing him was the wanting.

It wasn't that there was anything wrong with the retreat or that he couldn't settle. It was that he kept taking himself out. When he let go of the desire, he landed in the retreat, and then everything opened fine. This is what desire does. It takes us out of the present and creates a conflict. It creates a sense of insufficiency where there may not be any.

One of my friends is a greed type—a personality type that's dominated by the force of wanting. He says there's a line that he uses when desire is present in him. He asks, "Is there anything truly lacking in this moment?" So when desire is strong, that's a good question to ask. Is there anything truly lacking in this moment? Or is it basically okay the way it is, and it's just the wanting that is stirring us up?

In the meditative environment, sometimes the things we want come to be the special things that happen on retreat. We may want a particular meal. We may want a particular meditation experience. Sometimes the deepest, deepest longings are to re-experience some form of sitting that we'd had earlier. Start to notice if this comes in, because this will create tension. And as long as you're looking for some particular experience, you're not open to the moment as it is. All the unfolding of the Dharma comes from aligning with the moment the way it is. This is the golden doorway in practice.

So I start to notice that in myself if I'm having thoughts about the way a sitting was a day ago or two days ago or a week ago. Are you dwelling on a past experience of sitting or walking or being in nature? Are those thoughts and images in your mind? If they are, check and see if there's a wanting at work. And if there is, that's where to be. Otherwise, the wanting will block you from being in the present.

You don't have to make the wanting go away. You can establish mindfulness right then and there by being with the wanting. That's what's true. Relate with that. And as you open to that, you come back into the present moment.

The storyline that underlies the wanting—you can look into this for yourself. This might vary from person to person, from incident to incident. The basic storyline in wanting is something like, "I would be happy if I had this thing. I would be happy."

That's why desire becomes such a big deal, because there's implicit within it—and it's usually subconscious—this belief: it would make me happy. It's the key to my happiness.

Of course, what we don't do when we pick up a storyline or a view like that is we don't look at impermanence. We don't realize that if we get the thing we want, sooner or later, either it will go away or it will fail to satisfy us. Because we've had many, many opportunities to get the things we want, and we haven't found a lasting happiness from them. But we ignore that in the moment of desire. We don't look at that truth of impermanence.

The second of the states that I wanted to talk about is anger, which is one form of aversion. Steve talked the other night about aversion as a hindrance. And aversion has a lot of different flavors. Just a partial list: anger, ill will, hatred, impatience, irritation, fear, sadness, grief, judgment, blame, resentment, depression, despair, resistance. Are you overwhelmed yet? And that's just partial. I'm sure you could think of more. So aversion has a lot of different flavors. Anger is a strong one.

The general tone of aversion is not liking, negativity, seeing things in a critical frame of mind. When we're feeling negative, everything tends to rub us the wrong way. Everything appears imperfect, flawed, not quite right.

The Buddha told this story to a group of monks who were standing around in the clearing in a forest. Actually, it wasn't a story.

It was happening right on the spot. As they were standing around in the forest, a jackal ran out and stopped in the clearing, standing there for a moment. But it obviously wasn't peaceful—it immediately ran into the hollow of a tree and lay down, but only momentarily. Then it jumped up and ran into a cave, stood there briefly, and ran back into the forest.

The Buddha said, "Monks, did you see that jackal? It wasn't comfortable in the forest. It wasn't comfortable in the clearing. It wasn't comfortable in the tree hollow, and it wasn't comfortable in the cave. It wasn't comfortable standing or lying down or running. It blamed its suffering on the forest, on the clearing, on the tree hollow, on the cave. It blamed its suffering on standing, on lying, on running."

The Buddha said the problem was with none of these. "Monks, that jackal had mange. The mange was its suffering. It couldn't be comfortable because it had mange."

Aversion is like mange. When the mind is in a state of aversion, nothing feels good. Nothing feels right. We tend to blame our problem on all the other conditions, but the problem is the aversion in the mind. Everything rubs it the wrong way.

When aversion has been there for a long time—when there's a chronic sense of aversion—it's probably masking some long-standing pain that we aren't able to open to. The aversion gets implanted or conditioned by the presence of pain in the heart or mind or body that's been there for a long time.

When there's a long-standing pattern of aversion, the classical antidote—a really effective antidote—is loving-kindness practice. This is mentioned in the suttas over and over. The Buddha talks about metta as the antidote to aversion because metta has a way of softening the mind, opening the heart, and letting us then open to and include that pain.

Anger is a particular form of aversion. Here the storyline, as it was when I was caught in my walking experience, is basically: "I'm right and you're wrong. You shouldn't have done what you did and it hurt me." That's the basic storyline. If we listen to the thoughts of that storyline again and again, we sustain the anger.

Sometimes this is a little tricky because the thoughts could be true. In the case of my walking meditation, it really wasn't—there was no plaque on that walking path that said "Guy Armstrong," much as I would have liked to put one there. That walking space was open to anybody. It was my delusion to think that it was mine.

But it's different at other times. People do take things from us that belong to us, that we have a right to expect will be there when we go back. In that case, it's not proper for people to take those things. This is the point of the second precept: not taking that which isn't freely given. So we may be right.

Really awful things do happen in the world—things that really shouldn't happen. There's war, there's murder, there's racism, there's violence and cruelty in the world. It really shouldn't happen, but it does. So it may appear that getting angry is an appropriate response to those things. It can be a useful motivator for social justice. Many people have drawn on the power of outrage to try to correct things in the world that are wrong, and in that sense it can be a useful motivator.

But as meditators we have to take a look: What's the most effective way to change the world? Whether that involves anger or love is something for each of us to wrestle with. We also need to look at our own experience. Here on retreat, this is probably the most important place to look. In terms of our own experience: What leads to suffering and what leads to happiness?

In the classical texts, they say that getting angry at someone has within it an element of wanting to hurt that person.

This is an interesting place to look. When we talk about anger in Western psychology, we often condone it or approve it or say it's justified. But from the point of view of the Dharma, we really want to look and see what's going on in the mechanism of anger. And I found in looking at my own anger, often there is integral to it a wish to hurt the other person.

Now in Buddhism, the enjoyment of hurting somebody else is called cruelty. It's the far enemy of compassion. Compassion is that heartfulness that wishes to relieve the suffering of others. Cruelty is that frame of mind that enjoys someone else's suffering. Wanting to hurt someone has within it basically the beginning of cruelty. When I saw that, I had to question anger in a really deep way because I couldn't live with the sense of myself being a cruel person. I couldn't live with that truth about myself and feel good about it.

Now it so happens that it is a truth. Sometimes I do get angry. Within that anger I see that I want to hurt, but I can't feel good about it. So it's made me more resolved to look really closely and deeply into this phenomenon of anger.

What the texts say is that wanting to get angry at somebody is like picking up a hot coal and getting ready to throw it at them so that they'll be burned by the hot coal. The problem is that we pick it up first and we burn ourselves before we ever throw it. So start to take a look at this side of anger—that before we can ever express it, we are hurting ourselves in the holding of it, in the maintaining of it.

It was the seeing of the suffering that I felt as a result of my own anger that was most effective in getting me to let go. And letting go means basically to stop the thoughts that blame the other person and justify myself. These are the thoughts that feed the fires of anger. As we think more of those thoughts, we're just throwing more logs on the fire of anger. So it's a big renunciation. But if you practice with it, you'll see it's the way through anger. It's the way not to suffer from our own anger. And that's the letting go of the blame.

When we let go of that blame, the mind starts to cool. Because like all states, anger will just manifest its impermanence. It's the blame that sustains it, that feeds it. When we let go of it, it starts to pass. So in Buddhist circles, this work with anger is considered a really important part of the path.

The Dalai Lama tells a story about a monk that he had known in Tibet before 1959. 1959 is when he left Tibet for India, ten years after the Chinese invasion. And he thought that this monk was just a rather ordinary practitioner. Then some years later he met the monk again in India and the monk told him his story. He said that he had been in a Chinese prison for twenty years and finally he had been released and then he had escaped from Tibet and made his way to India. The Dalai Lama hears many, many stories like this. I can't even imagine the bigness of his compassion to be able to hold all these stories that he hears.

So he asked the monk about his time in prison. And the monk said, well, he often felt in danger. And the Dalai Lama said, were you tortured? Were you in fear for your life? And the monk said, yes, I was tortured, and I was in fear for my life, but that's not the danger that I meant. I mean that I was in danger of being angry with my captors.

The Dalai Lama said that his opinion of this monk was greatly enhanced by that comment, that he had the devotion to practice in that way, to work with non-anger, even under those extreme conditions.

Sometimes the sense of anger or criticalness gets directed toward ourselves and manifests as self-judgment. This comes up often in retreat. And I think part of it is that we lose our social connection. We don't have the kind of social strokes that we do in daily life. People are interacting with us and we're getting signs of love and affection. And when those signs of love and affection are taken away and we're just on our own resources, then this more critical part of the mind often comes out and we find ourselves lacking in many ways.

This is actually a sign of what's referred to in the tradition as mana or conceit. Conceit is the tendency to compare ourselves to others, and if we compare ourselves as being better than, equal to, or worse than, it's considered a sign of mana, and it's considered an impurity of the mind. The Buddha basically said there's no need to ever compare oneself to another in terms of one's stature. Certainly one can compare in skill levels and certain qualities or attributes, but to say that one person is better than another, there's no need to say that. So the mind doesn't make that comparison.

But this quality of comparing mind or mana or conceit is only uprooted at arahantship. So only the fully enlightened person no longer compares.

That means the judging mind is going to be around for a while. So again, it's good to get to know how to work with it.

The storyline with the judging mind is some form of "I'm not good enough, I'm not loving enough," or "I'm not lovable enough" - something like that, some form of "I'm insufficient as a person."

Sometimes these thoughts, these opinions of ourselves, start from a kind of rational observation. I'll share what one person I work with in California reported. She's a therapist, and one of her clients left her. That happens all the time, of course, but it caused her a lot of self-doubt. The first thing she thought was, "Oh, I'm just not the right therapist for that person." And that actually made complete sense - my personality is not a match for their personality. That was fine.

But then it went to, "I don't have enough compassion or warmth to be able to help them." And then it went to, "I'm really not a very loving person." And then it went to, "Actually, I've never loved anyone and no one's ever loved me." At that point, she was just crushed by the weight of her own judgments of herself.

I share this because I hope you can see this is not an isolated problem - we all make these exaggerations of ourselves. In fact, any judging thought that really burdens you is probably not true. It's probably not true. The thoughts that really burden us are the ones that go too far: "I can never love. I have never loved. No one has ever loved me. I don't have any friends. No one cares about me." These really huge generalizations generally overstep the bounds of truth.

So one way of working with those judging thoughts is to turn and ask the judge - have you met the judge yet, by the way? Anybody met the judge? The judge is just a thought, but if you want to get playful with the judge, you can give them a personality. You can give them a face, give them a name, draw them like a cartoon. What does your judge look like? What do they sound like? You can have fun and just kind of make something up here.

One person I work with - their judge is named Darth Vader. So they're often saying, "Welcome, Darth. Nice to have you back. Thank you, Darth, for that opinion."

You can turn to your judge and say, "What you just said about me isn't true. Please restate it as a true statement." If you can get the judge to restate it as a true statement, you'll find it's usually not that bad. It's something like, "I wasn't the right therapist for that person." No big deal. So you can neutralize the judgments by making them truthful for a change.

One of the other ways to work with judgment - Joseph may have talked about this in part one, it's one of his favorites - every time you hear a judging thought, you append the phrase "and the sky is blue." That just makes it light. You're walking through the lunch line and you see somebody took a lot of dessert. You say, "That person took too much dessert, and the sky is blue." You can try that also.

This sense of not being good enough is really widespread in the West today. I really think it's a comment on our culture that it's so widespread. I don't know quite why it's happened, but it seems to be a big problem. Sometimes it grows stronger and becomes self-hatred.

I was recently ordained as a monk in Thailand - I mean, this was a long time ago, but in the story I had just ordained.

My preceptor asked me to stop at a branch monastery in Chiang Mai while traveling to a forest monastery for retreat. I spent several pleasant days there, enjoying the good food and the beautiful town.

I particularly enjoyed meeting another Western monk who had been in robes for thirteen or fourteen years. He was very large-hearted, loved people, and enjoyed conversation. The Thai people really appreciated him. He would give interviews to them in the afternoon—he spoke good Thai—and meditate in the morning. Very warm, he drew many Thai people to meet with him.

On my first morning there, we went out on alms round together. He went first as the senior monk, I followed behind, and then there were two novices behind us—young boys whose presence puzzled me since novices usually don't go on alms round.

As we walked down the road at his usual hour, people started coming out when they saw him. Very soon our bowls were filled up. He was well-known, well-liked, and well-supported—which showed in his bowl, quite big, bigger than this bell, matching his girth because he was obviously well-fed.

After we both filled our bowls, he motioned to duck down an alley. There's no food in an alley—why were we going there? In the alley, the novices opened their robes, revealing big plastic bags hanging over their shoulders. We transferred all the food from our bowls into these bags, covered them up, put the lids on our bowls, and went down the street again to fill our bowls once more.

Returning to the monastery with this huge amount of food, we all ate well—the novices, other monks, nuns, and lay people. All of this abundance flowed from the metta, the love that the Thai people had for this monk and his spirit of warmth and loving-kindness.

I was very impressed, thinking he was just a natural meditator. But as we talked, he revealed that it wasn't always like this—that he had spent the first nine years in robes working through his self-hatred. Nine years. Yet he had completely transformed through practice, developing this warm nature beloved by the community.

What really offsets self-judgment is confidence in our own goodness, our basic goodness. As we come more and more to trust that the non-deluded mind is our basic nature—awake, alive, and growing in us—this offsets any sense of insufficiency or lack. Each of you has everything you need. It's simply a matter of clearing away the obscurations so that your true nature shines through more and more. As we touch this truth and gain confidence, we know that our heart is genuinely good.

I'd like to save fear for another time—I may want to discuss it at length on another evening. For sadness, I'll simply say that the storyline usually goes: "I can't be happy because I've lost this thing." That's the root of sadness or grief—believing we were happy before when we had something, and because we've lost it, we can no longer be happy. This view often becomes so deeply rooted that it's very hard to open to the feeling of sadness itself. We come to believe that the loss has blocked our happiness.

So there's often the fear with sadness, and you might say this is a sub-storyline—the fear that if we open to the sadness, we're going to get drowned or lost in that deep pool of unhappiness and sorrow. So we may hold ourselves back from feeling it, from opening to it, out of that fear.

But that is just a story. It's just a view or a belief. It's not true. Grief of any sort has the ability to come up, be experienced, and then eventually released. But we just have to have the willingness and the trust to go into it. It won't happen all at once. But to experience it and back off, to experience it and back off—little by little we find that it starts to unfold itself and becomes more, as somebody used the other day, permeable. We start to see little holes or little dents in the sadness, and it's a sign that it's starting to weaken and can fall away.

So in all these cases, the sense of freedom doesn't come from getting rid of the state. These states will come to visit for a long time, but it comes by understanding their nature and how they're put together—this mechanism that involves the sensations in the body, the mood in the mind, and this underlying belief or storyline about them.

As we start to understand the mechanisms that put these states together, they don't fool us anymore. We start to see, "Oh, that's just wanting. This is how it makes one feel. This is just anger. These are the causes and conditions. This is the remedy." When the causes and conditions are no longer there, the state passes away. All these states will exhibit their own impermanence if they're not clung to.

And this is where our basic faith comes—that we can open to them. None of them will be here forever. If we open and let them express themselves, all of them will also pass. They get stuck when we don't have that trust and we close down to the feeling.

So what we're really seeing as we start to get more familiar with their real nature is they're just like passing clouds, like aspects of the weather. They arise, they express, they pass away. And in this, we're really seeing their emptiness. They don't have any essence, and they're not lodged in us. They are not our deepest nature. As Steve said the other night, they're just visitors. We're really seeing the empty nature of these phenomena.

I'd like to just close with this poem from Rilke. It's from a book called The Book of Hours, translated by Joanna Macy and Anita Barrows. It's kind of nice to have a Buddhist take on Rilke's poetry. And in this particular poem, just to set the stage, Rilke is imagining that God creates human beings, but before launching them into life, gives them a little pep talk. So this is the pep talk:

God speaks to each of us as he makes us, then walks with us silently out in the night. These are the words we dimly hear: You, sent out beyond your memory, go to the limits of your longing. Embody me. Flare up like flame and make big shadows I can move in. Let everything happen to you: beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final. Don't let yourself lose me. Nearby is the country they call life. You will know it by its seriousness. Give me your hand.

Let's just sit for a moment together.

Let everything happen to you: beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final.

CHAPTER 20

Mudita, Joy and Gratitude

Guy Armstrong · 55 min

In this Thanksgiving Day dharma talk, Guy Armstrong offers a comprehensive exploration of mudita, appreciative joy, as the third of the Brahmavihāras (divine abodes). Drawing from his extensive retreat experience in Asia, Armstrong illustrates how mudita differs from ordinary happiness through its quality of shared joy—delighting in others' happiness without self-interest. He explains how the four Brahmavihāras work together as a complete system: mettā (loving-kindness) as the foundation, karuṇā (compassion) as the response to suffering, mudita as the response to happiness, and upekkhā (equanimity) providing the balance to hold it all.

Armstrong traces joy's essential role in the Buddhist path through what he calls "Transcendent Dependent Arising," showing how gladness leads through rapture (pīti) to tranquility, happiness (sukha), concentration (samādhi), and ultimately insight and liberation. He emphasizes that gratitude naturally arises from mudita practice, freeing us from both greed and aversion by appreciating what we have. Through personal anecdotes from monastic training in Thailand and Burma, he demonstrates how recognition of our "precious human birth with great endowments"—including access to the Dharma—cultivates profound appreciation.

The talk addresses mudita's near enemy (attachment/exuberance) and far enemy (envy), offering practical guidance for recognizing simple moments of joy in retreat life and daily experience. Armstrong concludes by showing how the entire Buddhist path can be understood as "a progressive refinement of joy," leading not to mere wholesome states but to the "unshakable deliverance of mind" that is complete liberation.

The subject of the talk tonight is practicing mudita, joy and gratitude. I was struck many times throughout the day today by how lucky we are. This seemed to me like almost a perfect day for practice. It started off and you knew you were going to have a great lunch, so you kind of wake up happy. Then there was that amazing quiet snow, the first real snow of the winter coming on Thanksgiving Day—beautiful timing. The lunch lived up totally to its expectations, including the beautiful way the staff decorated the tables. Didn't that just pick your spirits up when you walked in? So much love and care for you. It wasn't for anybody else. Then in the afternoon, the way that the sun came out of those heavy clouds and the light in the western sky as it was setting—it's just a gorgeous day to be here. And it's a gorgeous day to be warm and dry and inside at this time of night also. We're lucky that way too.

A Zen master was once asked, "What's the purpose of a lifetime of practice?" This is an interesting question to reflect on, something each of us might want to take some time to think about. What's the purpose of a lifetime of practice? I wonder how each of us would answer that. The Zen master's answer was really simple. He said, "An appropriate response."

Is that a little anticlimactic? Doesn't it seem like the Zen master should say the purpose of a lifetime of practice is so I can be run through with a sword and not blink an eye—something really death-defying? The purpose of a lifetime of practice is an appropriate response. I love the humility of that. We're not aiming for anything otherworldly. We're aiming to be fully human and let our humanness come out in each moment that it is asked for.

When life presents us with a situation that challenges our understanding and our equanimity, what does our practice lead us to in our response? That's how we check our practice. How do we respond to these situations of life?

In our tradition, I think the Brahma Viharas are one really beautiful roadmap of the appropriate response of our hearts. They show us the possibility of a way that a wise heart, or you could say an awakened heart, meets life. Life is characterized by changing conditions—constantly cycling among what the Buddha called the eight worldly conditions: pleasure and pain, gain and loss, praise and blame, fame and disrepute. The Brahma Viharas show us how we can meet these changes in a balanced and wise way.

First, we set the foundation with loving-kindness. Loving-kindness is that development of heart that can look at another being and look into their heart and say, "I know there is in there a world of feelings, a world of joys and sorrows, and I care about that. I care about how your heart is receiving the joys and sorrows of your life." Turning to ourselves, we care about how our own heart is receiving the joys and sorrows of our life. So the practice of loving-kindness tenderizes us to the human condition, to everybody's situation of enjoyment of this existence and our vulnerability to the suffering in it.

Then with that as our foundation, when this open heart turns toward suffering, what naturally gets evoked is compassion. Compassion is the natural response of the open heart when it sees suffering. And then exactly complementary to the compassion is appreciative joy or mudita. When this open heart looks upon someone who's experiencing happiness, the natural response is our own happiness. We are happy that someone else is experiencing happiness in this life. So these are the two poles. How do we relate to the changing conditions of life? If we're awake, compassion when we touch suffering, appreciative joy when we touch happiness, outside in others or inside in ourselves.

This is so different from the usual responses. The near enemy of compassion is grief—feeling burdened, overwhelmed, miserable because of the amount of suffering that we encounter. The most common enemy of appreciative joy is envy—feeling that we can't enjoy somebody else's happiness because their happiness threatens ours in some way.

But the heart can move to these wise responses of compassion and joy when the mind is supported by the fourth Brahma Vihara, which is equanimity. Equanimity is the balance of mind that lets us hold all the suffering in life and all the joys of life in a balance where we're not disturbed, where we're not thrown off our own inner sense of well-being. So these four Brahma Viharas are all necessary. They all work together.

But together they provide this roadmap to the heart's response to life—our own and others' experience of life.

This evening I want to talk particularly about the third of the Brahmavihāras, the practice of muditā or appreciative joy. As we explored last night in the guided meditation, this can be a really happy practice. It's very upbeat because, first of all, we're looking for happiness outside ourselves and within ourselves. Our radar is up for the happy experiences of life. And then we cultivate this ability to feel our own happiness when we touch them. So it's really this double expression of happiness.

I had a phone call a while ago from a friend I hadn't talked to for some time. I picked up the phone and said hello, and she told me who it was. I said, "How are you doing?" And her immediate response was, "I'm wonderful." Just hearing that from her, with her spirit, it picked my spirits up, and immediately I said back without thinking, "I am too." That was just the spontaneous expression of muditā—her happiness and then our shared happiness, that double happiness of the situation.

The Dalai Lama says that if you can be happy with other people's happiness, then your odds of happiness go up by six billion to one. That puts the odds in our favor. Those are good odds.

This is a very helpful quality of mind to cultivate as part of our path of practice, as one aspect of our path of practice. Joy is an integral and I would say a necessary part of the path to liberation. Later in the talk I want to discuss how it fits into the conventional view, the classical view of insight practice.

But this quality, as we foster it, as we recognize it, as we develop it, keeps the mind inclining to what's wholesome. When your mind is in a place of joy or happiness, you're not going to have much interest in gravitating to unwholesome states. So this keeps the mind on that side of right effort which supports the wholesome, the positive.

James Baraz, who's a teaching colleague of Sally's and mine at Spirit Rock, has been offering a series of classes over the last couple of years on the development of joy. These are some of the best attended classes I've seen in the Bay Area. People take them, then they tell their friends about them, and then all their friends start going. People have really gotten a lot out of it and enjoyed it too.

One of the things we say when we teach about joy is we're not trying to force anything to happen in our hearts or in our minds. It's not possible—at least doing it skillfully, it's not possible. As you know from doing the mettā practice or compassion, we intend the mind in that direction, we incline it, and then we take what we get.

The Buddha said that what one frequently thinks and ponders upon, that becomes the inclination of the mind. As we practice loving-kindness, compassion, and joy, these qualities more and more become the inclination of our mind. That means we find ourselves there more and more often, quite spontaneously. The mind just starts liking to go in that direction, tending in that direction.

So all we really have to do in doing the vipassanā practice is notice the presence of this joy when it arises. Of course, in doing the practice of the Brahmavihāra, appreciative joy, we're doing a little more. We're saying phrases, we're looking for happiness, we're recognizing it when it comes. But in vipassanā practice, all we need to do is recognize the joy when it's there.

But this can be a new step for a lot of us as meditators. The Four Noble Truths are not heavily slanted toward this recognition. And yet I'd like to suggest that they could be reframed a little bit and that this is implicit in them.

I think if the Buddha had grown up in California... You know, in California, we're relentlessly upbeat, right? It's the sunshine and the surf and the orange groves and all that. So the first noble truth would probably have been: there are many opportunities for growth in life. And the third noble truth would definitely have been restated. Instead of the end of suffering, it would be the attainment of happiness.

But this is not actually that heretical. The Dalai Lama had a bestselling book that was on the charts for quite a while, I think on the New York Times bestseller list, called The Art of Happiness. And it was his expression of the Third Noble Truth.

Because when you think about it, if you let the significance of the Third Noble Truth sink in, what would it feel like if suffering really went out of your life altogether? What would it feel like if any one of us came really to the end of suffering, of the torments of mind, of greed and fear and hatred and confusion? That is the highest kind of happiness possible.

So the whole path can be seen as the development in a wise way of our potential for happiness. That's really the point of it.

In this setting, we can start to tune into the very simple moments of happiness that come during a day, things we just may not have been looking for previously. Start to tune into them and see how the recognition of them affects your quality of mind and heart.

For instance, waking up, getting out of bed, and having a hot shower. There's something really delightful about that. When you're still a little bit sleepy and that hot water hits—

Or you come in from a cold afternoon walk after lunch and you can have a hot cup of tea from the tea urn. You warm your hands around the cup, and it warms your belly as the tea goes down. A day like today after the dark clouds and snow—then seeing the sun break through those rays of light in the late afternoon. And then the meditator's perhaps greatest pleasure: lying down on one's bed at the end of a day. Such a delicious moment. It lasts so briefly because it seems the next thing I know, the wake-up bells are ringing.

These simple joys are all present, and when we're on retreat, because of the simplicity of our life, they're actually heightened. The Buddha said that robes, alms food, a hut, and a straw seat will seem rich and luxurious to one who is renounced. Don't you feel that way sometimes here? How rich and luxurious it feels to have all this time, this food provided for you, and good company on the path. It's wonderful.

There's the joy of nature, which supports us so well here. It reminds me of a particular period of practice when I was in Thailand, just after I ordained as a bhikkhu. My preceptor let me go to a forest monastery in the north outside of Chiang Mai. It was a very small monastery with about ten huts for nuns and ten huts for monks, separated by a river—so there wouldn't be any complications.

The Thai people were very generous and gave me the most remote monk's hut, the furthest upstream. From my hut, I couldn't see another person. It was a wonderful experience of solitude, right by this running stream set down in the base of a deep gorge. It felt quite wild and mountainous, like those old Chinese hermit monks you see in paintings.

I was there for three months, doing retreat just before the rains. The teacher didn't speak English. He was a lovely man, well-practiced in our style of meditation that he had learned from a student of Mahasi Sayadaw. But with no translator available, for those three months I didn't have an interview and didn't hear a dharma talk. There wasn't another Westerner to talk to, so it was quite solitary.

The teacher and I would communicate somewhat. He would occasionally bring visitors up to my hut, and usually I'd be meditating because there wasn't really anything else to do. They'd look in through the window, and seeing me meditating, he'd say, "Dee, dee"—"good, good." So that was one of my interactions with the teacher.

The other was when he'd come up while I was doing walking meditation. For some reason, I was wearing my rubber sandals while walking. He'd point to my shoes and gesture—no, no—telling me to take them off. That was the extent of my instruction for three months.

It was quite isolated. I felt very lonely at times, and yet what really pulled me through was the beauty of that nature. I felt so nourished and enriched and delighted in its presence.

One other facet struck me: there was a big old mango tree I had to walk under to get to my hut. It happened to be mango season, so the tree was dropping its fruit all over the path. These explosions of orange and that brilliant mango aroma would rise up as I walked by.

The little catch was, as a monk, I couldn't eat the fruit. You're not allowed to eat anything that hasn't been placed directly in your hands before noon of that day. So I'd come back from breakfast—this was a one-meal-a-day place, we'd eat around eight in the morning—and I'd walk back by all those falling mangoes, unable to touch them. It was bittersweet, but the fragrance was beautiful nonetheless.

The joy of nature is a great support and very available here. Even if you're outside briefly in a day, just notice the impression on your senses and that touch of happiness and joy from contact with beauty.

In meditating, there are also deep levels of joy that we touch. One of the great discoveries early in my practice was the possibility of peace. I'd never really known this was achievable in normal daily life. To come into meditation and find that the mind could quiet, that my whole being could be restful and stilled, was a great delight.

In some ways, I think it was that lure that kept me coming back to retreats again and again. Each time I came, it seemed I'd touch a deeper level of peace that I hadn't known was possible.

And that was a revelation for me.

There's also a great joy in being with the truth of things, even when the truth is not so easy. Something in us knows that we need to make our relationship with what's difficult in us. When we leave difficulties unresolved, they govern our lives in unconscious ways, leading us into confusion and fear and unskillful conduct that's harmful to ourselves and others, accompanied by the torments of mind that follow. We know that touching those places of difficulty is the way to freedom, and so there's often a great delight in this process.

One yogi said in an interview recently that one of the most joyful things about being on retreat was being able to be with pain and open to it. This is an acquired taste, but take a look and see if there isn't truth to it - that when you touch that pain and make your peace with it, there is a real delight in that.

As we practice mudita for others, we naturally come into contact with the joys in their lives. I'll share one example, a recent one from a friend of ours in the Bay Area. They're meditators who have practiced for a long time, and their son, in his late teens, went on a meditation retreat for the first time recently. This was kind of a dream come true for them because, as you know with parenting, you can't force anything on your children, especially once they become teenagers. But he had overcome his distrust of the older generation's habits enough to be interested in meditation retreat.

At the end of it, he wrote this beautiful summary of what he'd learned, describing how he'd come to a new understanding of life and the importance of non-harming - conducting oneself in such a way as not to harm other beings in any way - and then enjoying what he called "the bliss of blamelessness" from that. This became a key for him in a new view of life as he went off to university. We've heard that since entering his freshman year this fall, he started a little meditation class for other students. That was just a beautiful source of happiness for his parents.

As we open to mudita for all beings, we touch on something I believe to be true in my experience: that all beings have some experiences of joy and happiness in their lives. However difficult their lives are, there are moments that shine through, as far as I know, for everyone.

There was a woman on retreat last summer who had come to California from Manchester, England. If any of you know Manchester, it's not one of the most radiant places on the globe. It's one of those northern British cities where night falls very early in the winter, and as an old industrial area, it's not extremely beautiful in its architecture. Her job there was a difficult one - helping women refugees get established in their new lives in England. These are women who had fled their home countries, mostly in the developing world, because of persecution of some form, religious or political, and for whom it was not safe to live in their homeland.

Can you imagine having to flee your homeland because of persecution where probably your life was in danger, maybe your family's life was in danger, and landing in some strange, cold, northern city where you may not know people? That would be a really difficult adjustment.

Since this was a metta retreat, I asked her: can you see moments of joy, openness to joy, in the lives of the women that you counsel? And she said, absolutely. She said one of the most inspiring things about the job is the resiliency of their spirits. That in the midst of that really difficult life situation, they still have a lot of enthusiasm and obviously experiences of joy and happiness.

When we focus on the practice of mudita, we look for things that will make others happy, and they don't have to be the things that make us happy. A few years ago, Sally, who likes to ride horses, when we moved onto the Spirit Rock land, kind of inherited the care of this old quarter horse who had been on the land for many years rounding up cattle, since it was formerly used for cattle grazing.

This old horse named Bob had a deep sway back and had been running up and down those hills for probably twenty years herding cattle and bringing them down to the pastures. At this point there were no more cattle on the Spirit Rock land, but we were left with Bob. That was part of the deal, and Sally, having knowledge of horses, was the one who took on his care.

So in winter and summer, she would be down there at 8:30 in the morning making sure Bob had food and water in his corral. On winter mornings, ice would be thick in the trough, and she'd have to break through it to make sure he could get to the water. Sometimes in winter, his hoofs would get abscesses, and she'd have to fill a bucket of hot water with Epsom salts, take it down, pick his leg up, and stick it in the bucket so he could soak that foot and the abscess would heal, all while tramping around in the mud because it rains a lot in Woodacre in the winter.

Yet I never heard her complain about doing that. There was something in her care for that old horse - who was cantankerous to boot - that I could tell was a pleasure for her, at least mostly. It doesn't have to be what makes us happy.

Around that same time in winter, some local skunks found their way underneath our house. The place they ended up liking best was underneath our bedroom. Some mornings at about two o'clock, we'd be awakened by this pungent, oily aroma wafting up from below. It was hard to get back to sleep because it was quite strong, and we could smell it in the closets the next morning. As you may know, it's not so easy to get skunks out from underneath your house, so it took a while to figure out what to do.

And in the meantime, they discovered that the other thing they liked to do was to bounce on the top of our furnace, which was a metal gas-burning furnace. They used it kind of like a trampoline, and they liked to do this also about two or three in the morning. So there I'd be: boing, boing—the skunks are at it again!

This was naturally a source of some frustration, as you can imagine, and my thoughts were not always kindly directed toward them. But at the same time, I did appreciate that they were probably really enjoying being dry and warm in the basement of our house. So I had some mudita for them, though it didn't stop me from trapping them with a Havahart trap and releasing them in a state park a few miles down the road. I was happy to relocate them to their natural setting.

With mudita, the near enemy is exhilaration or exuberance—or you could say attachment. This is something that might arise because there's some personal benefit involved. Perhaps you have a friend who inherited a cabin in the mountains where you want to go skiing, and you think, "Oh good, I can go skiing at their cabin. I'm happy about that." But that's not appreciating just your friend's happiness.

This kind of exuberance is a feeling that arises when one attaches to happiness and starts thinking—as Sally mentioned this morning—of projecting it into the future: "Oh, now that I'm happy, I can do X, Y, and Z. My life will be so great now that I'm happy." That's a clinging and a kind of corruption of the happiness by thought.

The far enemy is envy, and this is an interesting state to explore because it's really irrational. It's our inability to enjoy someone else's happiness, and it feels as though their happiness takes away some of ours—as though there's only a finite quantity of happiness in the world, and if they have that much of it, I can't have enough for myself. So take a look when you hear good news from a friend and see if the response has a little bit of a tinge of this quality of envy.

About a year after I graduated from college, I went off to the Peace Corps. I taught for two years in Malaysia. I was really interested to experience another culture and to have some contact with Asia because I was already interested in Buddhism at that time. I had broken up with my girlfriend a few months before I went away. Then, after I'd been in Malaysia for a few months, I got a letter from my best friend telling me that he was now in relationship with my ex-girlfriend.

Mudita was not the first emotion that came to my mind.

So what is underneath envy? What is the reaction that forms the ground for envy? I wonder if it isn't caught up with the comparing mind—as though if someone else is doing really well, that means they're a better person than we are. If we don't feel we're doing as well, their success or good fortune reflects on us in a negative way, which of course doesn't make sense, but we might feel that.

This is similar to a near enemy of compassion that is sometimes called pity. When somebody's having a hard time, we sometimes imagine that makes us better than them. So we may feel sorry for them, but with a condescension or looking down. That's not true compassion, but more the quality of pity. In true compassion, there's a sense of equality between us.

As we tune into mudita as it expresses through our own situation—the appreciation of our own blessings—part of the flavor that comes through is gratitude. When we appreciate the blessings that we have, gratitude is a really beautiful state of mind because when we appreciate what we have, it cuts through greed. We don't necessarily want more. But it also cuts through aversion because we're not dissatisfied with what we have. So gratitude frees us from both greed and aversion.

I'll tell a little story about Kamala, which she's given me permission to tell. She has a few granddaughters now and was talking to one of them on the phone a few years ago. I think her granddaughter at that time was five years old. Kamala asked the granddaughter, "Well, when you get lots of presents on Christmas, do you feel thankful for what you have, or does it make you want more?"

And the little girl said, "Oh, Nana, I'd like some more."

Kamala just quietly said, "Oh, that's too bad."

This kind of stopped her granddaughter, and she said, "Why? What do you mean by that?"

Kamala said, "Well, haven't you noticed that when you're thankful for what you have, you feel good? And when you're wanting more, it doesn't feel so good."

The little girl said, "Oh, Nana, you're right."

This is the magic of gratitude. And all of us here have so many things to be thankful for—being warm and sheltered and clothed and so well-fed as we are, having access to medicine for the most part. We have fulfilled what the Buddha called the four requisites of human life: food, clothing, shelter, and medicine. We have those in reasonably good supply, most of us. Many people don't.

You look at any one of those factors, and many people do not have adequate food, clothing, shelter, or medicine in this world.

The Tibetans, moreover, call the situation that we all share "the precious human birth with great endowments." You may have heard this statement in the Buddhist view of life—of beings taking birth over and over—that it's very rare to be born as a human being. The human realm is very conducive for practice and liberation because it has a good mixture of pleasure and pain. If there's too much pleasure, it's easy to become lazy and not want to work. If there's too much pain, we feel overwhelmed and discouraged and cannot work for our freedom. The human realm has a mixture that's conducive from both sides.

We have the opportunity to take real advantage of this through our situation here in our connection with the Dharma. First of all, we've all been born with reasonably well-functioning minds and bodies. Our senses are working; our minds are in good shape. We've taken birth at a time when a Buddha has appeared in the world. We've been born in a place and time when the Dharma is flourishing and available. We've been born at a time and place where practitioners are actively engaging in the teachings. We've also heard and understood the teachings, and we have the interest and some degree of leisure time to pursue them.

When you put all those things together, that's a very rare combination of circumstances. The Tibetans say that it's because of great merit—wholesome karma that we've accumulated in the past—that all these conditions have come together for us in this way. And they encourage us to take advantage of our time and these conditions to make our best effort for freedom, for liberation.

Many of you have mentioned this sense of gratitude over the last days. I think it's a very beautiful feeling that comes often at this time in retreat—an expression of gratitude mainly for the Dharma. That you've been able to have your life touched by the Dharma, transformed by the Dharma. That it has illuminated so many things that were unclear for you. And it is a great blessing.

So being in a practice situation, there's often a lot of gratitude already. But those of you who've practiced in Asia probably know that the sense of gratitude can be very, very strong at centers there. I went last year to practice in Burma for six weeks, and I had the opportunity—so I took advantage of it—to ordain as a monk with Paok Sayadaw, the great meditation master in the southeast of Burma, one of the most reliable authorities on the jhanas that I think is alive and teaching in the world today.

Because they knew I was going to Burma, one of my students gave me some money to take to offer as dana to the monastery. As you know, Burma is a very poor country, and the monasteries are always in need of support. So I told her that I would try to sponsor at least one lunch, if not a few lunches, with her donation.

As soon as I got to the monastery while I was still a layperson, I went to the office and said to the steward—the layperson who handles the money for the monastery—"I have some money from a supporter in America, and she would like to offer some lunches during this retreat."

Well, I'd gotten there at the start of the rains retreat, which is a three-month period of practice. There were 750 people practicing in the monastery for most of the rains retreat: about 400 monks, about 150 nuns, and many laymen and laywomen. So I said, "I'd like to purchase at least one lunch."

And he said, "Oh, I'm sorry, all the lunches have been provided for the next three months, and they're all on dana." The monastery doesn't have this great store of money that they can provide lunches out of. People had already come forward—most of them Burmese—and made the donations to provide the meals, the lunches for the next three months to feed 750 people.

So what I was able to do with her donation was to offer a few breakfasts. We had three special breakfasts during the rains retreat, which were actually quite delicious—fried bread and a curry soup.

Every day we would go down to lunch, and there was a whiteboard, similar to the one here, on which would be written the menu for the day and who had donated the lunch for that day. That was the form, which is used in other monasteries in Burma as well, that inspired our practice here of the meal dana and the whiteboard with the acknowledgments.

So every day as I went down, I would read—they'd have the name in Burmese and in English—the family, mostly, who had made the offering for that day. And on many days, the people who had donated the lunch would come and sit by the food line and watch the monks and nuns go through serving themselves from the food that they had offered. You could tell what a delight it was for them: first, to have made the offering, and second, to see 750 people be fed from the donations they had made.

It was just a beautiful exchange of generosity and then gratitude from our side that we were reminded every day: this is made possible through the donations, through the generosity of many people who so value and support what you're doing that they give of their money in this country that doesn't have a lot, so that you can do what you're doing. And then obviously, as a meditator, one feels that one really needs to use that support well and not waste one's time, but really practice as well as one can to honor that generosity of spirit, that donation.

The Buddha said that three persons are rare in this world. One, he said, was a Buddha. Another, he said, was a person who is grateful and thankful. This is a really, really beautiful quality.

Often as we're sitting, we may feel a lot of gratitude for the existence of the path at all. I don't know if you've ever taken time to reflect on what your life was like before you knew about a path.

But I'll invite you to just consider it for the moment. What was life like before you knew there was a path? Before you knew there was a possibility of ending suffering? Before you knew that suffering had a cause? Because it had a cause, it could have an end.

I know what mine was like. I had a lot of pain and I had no idea what to do about it. I had no idea that there was a way to clarify it and understand it and be free from it. How would we face death without our practice? How would we face aging and illness if it weren't for the practice? Just to know that we are not the body is a huge gift. Most people in the world don't know this. Even if they've heard it, they don't have an experiential sense of it or a real faith in it. We know we are not the body. There is more to us than this.

And did you ever think about how you got connected to the path? How did you wind up here? How did you get started? Isn't it mysterious? You read a book. Where did the book come from? How did you get your hands on that book? Or somebody talks to you, a friend just mentions it and you think, "I'll check it out." How did you have a friend like that? You know, there's this great mystery about what brings each of us onto this path. And in some ways it's mysterious, but at other times do you kind of get a sense that there's a destiny about it for you? That something in you was going to move you this way no matter what?

There's a quotation from the Chippewa tribe of the Native Americans: "Sometimes I go around pitying myself while all the time I'm being carried across the vast sky by great winds." We're all being carried by great winds. The great winds of our past actions have brought us here and provided the foundation for our wisdom and loving-kindness.

One year I was starting a six-week retreat as a yogi here, and the weather was really bad. I was starting in November, and it was very cold and gray and rainy. And I was starting to feel the bleakness of the weather sort of seep into my mind state. And I thought, "I don't really want to go into that kind of aversion. It's not good to get habituated to aversion early on in a retreat." So I thought, "I'll do something to offset it."

And what I did was I made a list of things I was grateful for. I just thought of all the things in my life that I appreciated at that time. I didn't spend a lot of time at it, but I filled one sheet of paper. And then every morning on that retreat, I would read over that sheet of paper when I woke up so that I could turn my mind in a direction of appreciation and joy. And that was a very helpful practice for me. In fact, I got that list out the other day and took a look at it, and it's still most of the things I'm grateful for. I can read it today and feel the same uplift that I felt then.

Sally and I were teaching about gratitude in a senior students class that we do in the Bay Area. And one guy in the class got the idea, "I'd like to practice gratitude." So he made the resolve, he connected with a friend, and they made the agreement: every night before they went to bed, they would email each other one thing that they were grateful for in that day. And so every night before they went to bed, they had a gratitude thought from their life and a gratitude thought from their friends. And he said it was a really beautiful practice. So since we've told other people about that, other people have taken it up, and I don't recommend you start it now, but after you get home, it's a nice way to keep it alive in your mind.

I want to just finish by talking briefly about the role of joy in insight practice. And I believe that joy is really essential in the path of liberation. There are so many words in Pali that point to this quality. There's mudita, which we've been talking about. There is sukha, which is usually translated as happiness. Steve calls it happy comfort of body and mind. Ananda, which means bliss. This appears in a lot of Buddhist names. The Buddha's cousin was Ananda. My preceptor in Thailand was Ajahn Panyananda, which is the bliss of wisdom.

There's the word piti, for rapture or delight. There's pamoja, which can be translated as gladness, and somanasa, also for gladness of mind. This factor gets pointed to again and again in the Buddha's teachings.

There's one sutta in particular where it stands out very strongly—a list sometimes called Transcendent Dependent Arising. I hope you won't get intimidated by the list, but it's a series of twelve links similar to conventional dependent origination. However, these links trace the movement of the path to liberation in very positive terms, showing the wholesome qualities of mind that develop and lead one to the other to deliver us to the doorway of liberation.

Because of this, one commentator—Analayo, a German bhikkhu in Sri Lanka who has written a fantastic book called Satipatthana, a book-length commentary on the Satipatthana Sutta—writes that the entire scheme of the gradual training, that is the path of Dharma, can be envisaged as a progressive refinement of joy. The entire scheme of the gradual training can be envisaged as a progressive refinement of joy.

In this list called Transcendent Dependent Arising, the Buddha talks about suffering as the starting point leading to faith, and faith leading to gladness. Really, it's our faith in the Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha that brings this sense of gladness in our practice—this sense of gratitude. And then the gladness, as it becomes developed and recognized, starts to grow.

This is from Thomas Merton: "There is in all things an inexhaustible sweetness and purity, a silence that is a fountain of action and of joy. It rises up in wordless gentleness and flows out to me from the unseen roots of all created beings."

We touch this quality of gladness over and over, and that, the Buddha said, gives rise to rapture. Rapture is finding this gladness around the meditation object, finding the brightness of mind that loves to connect with our chosen object. As the mind collects and becomes unified through that delight, then it leads to tranquility in the body and mind.

As the body and mind become tranquil, that leads to the factor of happiness or sukha. I like this word sukha because it sounds a little bit like sugar, and sukha is a pointer to a sweetness of mind. That is the meaning of this link—such a satisfying sense of being that the whole body and mind start to settle. The mind starts to settle in itself. The body relaxes and calms. And that is the entryway to concentration.

Concentration, then, is the basis for insight. And insight is the basis for liberation. So the function of gladness and joy is to bring contentment into the heart and mind, to allow for that complete settling where we don't need to look outside ourselves because everything we need, all our deep satisfaction, is found just in the here and now.

This sense of sukha is a very deep and more stable flowering. But I think it's so interesting that the practice the Buddha taught doesn't stop at happiness or sukha. It continues from there through concentration to insight and then liberation.

This is from the Buddha: "Two things I never lost track of: not to be lax in my efforts and not to settle merely for wholesome states of mind." Not to settle merely for wholesome states of mind. So many times I would have gladly settled for merely wholesome states of mind, but that's not the end of the path.

In a sutta called The Simile of the Heartwood, the Buddha said, "It is the unshakable deliverance of mind that is the goal of this holy life, its heartwood and its end." It is this complete liberation, the total end of suffering, that is the final outcome of this path.

But this is the same destination as mudita, gratitude, joy, and all the brahmaviharas. These are all supportive forces that lift the mind up and take it to the doorstep of peace and then liberation.

I'll close with a quotation from the Tibetan tradition of the Brahmaviharas in what are called the Four Immeasurables. Each line expresses one of the four: metta, compassion, joy, and equanimity.

May all beings have happiness and the cause of happiness, which is virtue.

May all beings be free from sorrow and the cause of sorrow, which is non-virtue.

May all beings remain unseparated from the sacred happiness which is free from sorrow.

May all beings come to rest in the great equanimity beyond attachment to those near and far.

Let's just sit for a minute together.

May all beings have happiness and the cause of happiness, which is virtue. May all beings be free from sorrow and the cause of sorrow, which is non-virtue. May all beings remain unseparated from the sacred happiness, which is free from sorrow. May all beings come to rest in the great equanimity beyond attachment to those near and far.

Thank you for listening. To learn how you can support the teachers and Dharma Seed, please visit dharmaseed.org/donate.

CHAPTER 21

Closing Talk - Mind and Life Retreat

Guy Armstrong · 17 min

> In this closing talk from a Mind and Life retreat, Guy Armstrong addresses the crucial transition from the supportive retreat environment back to daily life. He explores the fundamental tension between mainstream cultural values focused on acquisition and the Buddhist practice of letting go, offering practical guidance for maintaining mindfulness in relationships and daily interactions.
>
> Armstrong emphasizes the transformative power of developing space around thoughts and emotions, leading to more skillful responses rather than reactive patterns. He provides detailed instruction on Right Speech from the Buddha's teachings, including the five qualities one should cultivate before offering criticism to others: speaking at the right time, in truth, gently, with kindly intention, and for the other's benefit.
>
> The talk includes inspiring examples from the Dalai Lama's approach to forgiveness and the importance of formal meditation practice in daily life. Armstrong encourages continuing retreat practice and building sangha connections to support alternative values in mainstream society. Drawing from the five precepts and the brahmavihāras (loving-kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity), he offers a framework for living with greater peace, happiness, and kindness.

I want to say I really appreciate the work that you all did on this retreat. We commented many times as the days were unfolding that one thing this group knew very well how to do was to work hard. And it was attested to by your presence at the sittings and the walkings and your discipline, diving right in to the regimen.

We also recognize this retreat was something of a risk for a lot of you. You'd never been in an environment like this before. You didn't know what you were getting into. And so especially we appreciated your willingness to take on this form and the rigor of it.

At the same time, I hope you appreciate it was something of a risk for us too, because not only are you a highly intelligent and possibly critical audience, but if this had been a total flop, it would have been quite a visible embarrassment for IMS. So we all feel very good about the way things have turned out, and I hope you will also.

We're at the position now where we're about to make the transition from this sheltered, very supportive, very simple environment back into the hustle and bustle of our daily life where, as you know as well as anyone, the values of that world are not entirely consistent with the values that we've been trying to foster here.

In a very broad way of looking, we might say that the mainstream values of our culture are primarily in the direction of acquisition. It's about having more, whether that's money personally or professionally, whether it's things, whether it's recognition and credits and awards. It's mostly about accumulation. In the practice of mindfulness, as you've seen again and again, the key is in letting go—not in having more, but in having less. And that's what allows us to come into this clear relationship with the present moment.

So many people have been wondering how we can best take what has been precious and meaningful from this experience and translate it back into our daily life. I think the first thing I want to say is that daily life is much more about relationship than retreat is. And so the core of our practice in daily life will probably move into the arena of relationship.

Mindfulness is an incredibly supportive tool in that relationship because we can understand much better our own part, our own participation in the world of human culture and society and individual relationships. As I was reflecting on some of the things that I've seen in myself and lots of people who've gone through this practice over the years, some of the great benefits that I see are that we learn how to have a little more space around our thoughts. We learn to see a thought as a thought and to be aware when it arrives.

Because of that, then, we start to have a little more awareness of the emotions that thoughts engender, and particularly when those emotions are difficult in the nature of anger or fear or great desire or sadness. That awareness gives us the opportunity to have a little more choice in our next action so that hopefully we can relate from a place of wisdom and not a compulsive place of surrendering to the reactive emotion.

I think these are some of the greatest immediate benefits of this practice. These result in our life in having more peace, more happiness, and more kindness. So I think this last point, especially the kindness, is something I want to talk about for just a minute. Again, who's better to think about than the Dalai Lama in this regard?

A few years ago, the Dalai Lama was being interviewed by Oprah Winfrey, and it's recounted in a book called The Wisdom of Forgiveness, if you're interested in reading more detail. So Oprah began by asking the Dalai Lama, "Have you ever had to forgive yourself for anything?" "Small incidents, like accidentally killing an insect," the Dalai Lama replied. "Killing an insect?" Oprah said. "An insect, hmm, okay." The Dalai Lama continued, "My attitude toward mosquitoes is not very favorable. Not very peaceful. Bedbugs also." And that's it.

Oprah couldn't quite believe what she was hearing. "In your lifetime, that's what you have to forgive yourself for?" "Small mistakes every day maybe," the Dalai Lama said, "but major mistakes, it seems, no." "No major mistakes," Oprah repeated. She fell silent. "You have nothing in life that you have regrets about. That's a great life to have no regrets."

This ability to live in the world without having regrets is a big challenge. Most of us find that we make small slips all the time and we make major slips regularly. One Zen master said that Dharma practice was basically repeating mistake after mistake. So we might notice that in our own lives also.

In learning to relate to the world consistently from this place of kindness, the best framework that I know of are the five precepts that Sharon mentioned on the opening night. These are guidelines for our lives as lay practitioners. They're very commonsensical and really very simple: not killing, not stealing, not harming others through our sexuality, not lying, and not engaging in drugs and intoxicants to the point of heedlessness.

I want to pay specific attention to the notion of speech because most of us are usually fairly good about not killing at least other humans, not stealing. We're getting better at refining our sexual energy, I think. But it's in the area of speech, I think, that we most often get hurt in daily life and most often hurt other people.

So in addition to the guidelines on not lying, the other guidelines that the Buddha encouraged with speech were not undermining one another, not speaking in a divisive way that creates separation, not taking what one has heard here and repeating it over there to others in a negative sense. So having an engendering of respect for one another in our personal life, in our professional life.

He also encouraged us to speak gently, to avoid speaking harshly. When we're in the throes of anger, it's very easy to vent that anger on someone else. It's very hurtful to be the recipient of that kind of angry energy. So we must really take care with our speech to be gentle in our expression, even when we need to communicate that we're angry with someone else, which often happens.

The third guideline he offered was not to spend too much time in idle chatter—the kind of conversations that go on around the water cooler that are simply about what one co-worker said to another and that are merely for titillation or gossip. We can take a pass on those and spend our time talking about things that are meaningful to us, that touch our heart, that come from our heart.

In particular, on the topic of speech, he said that if we are about to criticize another—this is a rule that was instigated for the community of monks and nuns that he led for the forty-five years of his life—one who is about to criticize another should realize five qualities within themselves before they offer that criticism.

The first is: I will speak at the right time, because sometimes saying it publicly or in front of certain people or when someone else is vulnerable is not going to be skillful.

I'll speak in truth. That means if I have a complaint, I'll just say truthfully what it's about and not try to exaggerate or overstate what the offense has been.

I will speak gently, not harshly, which I mentioned earlier.

I will speak with kindly intention. Isn't this interesting? That one can deliver criticism to another with a kindly intention. And how can that be? It's the fifth point: I will speak to their benefit and not to their detriment. So we offer criticism in hopes that somebody else's understanding of themselves can be improved and it can be a pathway to greater happiness in their life.

Sometimes he advised, if one can't put one's mind into these five qualities, to withhold the criticism until one is able to do that. That's a high bar, but I think it's a very useful reflection if we're about to engage in admonishing another.

So on the level of informal practice, the precepts are very good guides, held within the context of those sublime abidings that Sharon talked about last night—the brahmaviharas: loving-kindness, compassion, joy, and equanimity.

There's also a really critical piece in daily life for formal practice. If you found these tools and this experience to be a benefit, we really encourage you to carry that back into your daily life.

The conversation with Oprah continued in this line also. Oprah continued the interview with the Dalai Lama by saying, "Would you encourage the rest of the world to meditate?" she asked.

"Stupid question," the Dalai Lama's response was as immediate as it was unexpected. Oprah's face froze. There was a stunned silence in the hotel room. One thought crossed everyone's mind: this was probably the first time someone had ever said this to Oprah's face.

The Dalai Lama grew thoughtful. "Should people meditate? I think so," he said after a pause. Maybe it had been a stupid question, but he had still wanted to reply with care. "It is worthwhile, for the world has to look more inward. We are not doing enough here. I'm not saying that people should be religious-minded. What I'm saying is we should focus on our inner potential more."

"Oh, I believe that," Oprah said, visibly relaxing. "That's why I asked the stupid question."

So this question of formal practice comes in often at the end of retreat. People say, "Should I sit in my daily life?" Now you know the answer. "How much should I sit?" is usually the next question.

When I was beginning meditation, my teachers—who are here with you now, Joseph and Sharon were my first teachers—said very clearly and unambiguously at the end of a retreat in a talk like this: "Sit two hours a day." At that time, I was in my twenties and fairly uninvolved, and I could do that. In fact, I did that for years, and some years it was more. When I was on staff here, we were expected to sit three hours a day.

So I just say whatever time you can find in your daily life is the right time for you. I like to sit when I first get up in the morning because my mind hasn't yet gotten plugged into the events of the day. Other people like to sit right before they go to bed because it clears their mind for sleep. Other people like to sit right after they come home from work because there's an emptying of all the events of the day. Whatever time you can find in your life, you'll test it and find the value that it has for you. I just encourage you to make the effort and see what will work for you.

Please continue to come back to retreat if you found this experience useful. I find that a combination of a consistent daily practice and one retreat a year is really good for keeping one's dharma practice alive and deepening. So if you can manage to do that, that would be a great start.

Of course, sometimes people get more motivated. I want to let you know we do have longer opportunities for retreat for those of you who feel the call. There's a three-month retreat here every fall, which also has the option of doing a six-week piece in either half of it. And there are often retreats of two to three weeks throughout the year on our calendar.

I'm going to be flying back this afternoon to California. I live near Spirit Rock meditation center, a sister center in Marin County, and we also have a two-month retreat every winter in February and March that is also available in one-month pieces. So please, if this has touched you, especially if it's touched you deeply, think about giving more time. You'll have a lot more time after the settling process. Remember those painful first three days? Then after that, it goes on and on. Hard to imagine, but it's terrific.

The last thing I wanted to mention is because it's hard to keep alternative values alive as an individual in a broader society, it's very helpful if you can make Sangha connections wherever you live. There are a lot of meditation groups and instruction opportunities available around the country. A good place to look is in a journal called The Inquiring Mind, of which I think there are copies out on the tables during this retreat. So look to see if there's anybody in your area who's interested in practicing together, and that support will be invaluable.

I wanted to close with a mention of another scientist whom I've appreciated a lot. There was an article about him last weekend in the New York Times, and that is Albert Hoffman. Albert Hoffman was the chemist who first synthesized LSD in 1938, was the first subject for LSD and kind of transformed a generation with his work. He's still alive and actually celebrated his 100th birthday on Wednesday. So that's why the Times was doing the interview.

His bright eyes flash with a recollection of a mystical experience he had on a forest path more than 90 years ago in the hills above Baden, Switzerland. Notice that this was before the invention of the drug. The experience left him longing for a similar glimpse of what he calls a miraculous, powerful, unfathomable reality. "I was completely astonished by the beauty of nature," he said, laying a slightly gnarled finger alongside his nose, his longish white hair swept back from his temples and the crown of his head. He said any natural scientist who was not a mystic was not a real natural scientist.

"Outside is pure energy and colorless substance. All of the rest happens through the mechanisms of our senses. Our eyes see just a small fraction of the light in this world. It is a trick to make a colored world, which does not exist outside of human beings."

When asked if the drug had deepened his understanding of death, he appeared mildly startled and said, "No, I go back to where I came from, to where I was before I was born. That's all."

So it's been a pleasure to share this week with you. May your practice continue to deepen in both secular and spiritual ways. And may you come to great happiness and great kindness in your life. Thank you for all your work.

CHAPTER 22

Mindfulness of Breathing (Ānāpānasati)

Guy Armstrong · 52 min

In this opening talk of a vipassanā intensive retreat, Guy Armstrong offers a comprehensive exploration of ānāpānasati (mindfulness of breathing) as taught by the Buddha. Drawing primarily from the Ānāpānasati Sutta (MN 118) and Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), Armstrong explains how breath meditation serves as a complete path leading to both samatha (calm) and vipassanā (insight). He defines mindfulness as 'understanding what our present experience is' - not mere bare attention, but an intelligent awareness that opens the door to paññā (wisdom).

Armstrong systematically presents the Buddha's 16-stage progression of breath practice, from initially noticing long and short breaths to the advanced stages of contemplating impermanence, cessation (nirodha), and relinquishment. He emphasizes the importance of balanced effort - neither too tight nor too loose - using the analogy of picking up a baked potato with a fork. The talk addresses common challenges like striving mind and offers practical guidance on connecting with and sustaining attention on the breath.

Throughout, Armstrong weaves in stories of accomplished teachers like Dipa Ma and Pauk Sayadaw to illustrate the fruits of deep practice, while maintaining that technique is ultimately subjective and breath meditation, though widely used, is not the only valid approach. The discourse concludes with the Buddha's own words about the four satipaṭṭhānas as the direct path to purification and the realization of nibbāna.

The first thing I'd like to do tonight is express my appreciation for the new hall. How many of you practiced in this place before this year? Anybody miss the red carpet? A little bit—a little sentimental value to an old red carpet that used to cover the platform. But on the whole, isn't this a happier place to be? A place a little on the dark side. So I'm really appreciating the bright colors and light tones of brightness here.

I want to talk tonight about mindfulness of breathing. In some ways this is a rather fundamental talk, really just intended to remind us all of what we're doing at this stage in the retreat. First day of a retreat is always difficult if you just arrived yesterday. It's a little bit like going back to the gym after Christmas and New Year's holidays and finding out that you put on too much weight and you didn't keep the muscle tone up. So rediscovering the muscles is always a little bit achy and tiring.

For those of you who have been here for two weeks or four weeks, you've been going through the transition of all of us coming in from the outside with all our manic, worldly energy, and I appreciate your patience with us all. You may have found it interesting to start over with the instructions this morning. I don't know if you are or not, but it wouldn't be a bad idea because going through the instructions again will give you a sense of how you've changed or what you've learned or how you might be relating to them differently than you did two weeks ago or four weeks ago. So I encourage you to try it if you have an inclination. Start with the whole sequence again, if that feels appropriate, and see how it feels this time around.

We started the instructions today with paying attention to breathing. In some ways, this is kind of an arbitrary choice. I hope you all know that. We could really have started anywhere or nowhere. Technique is a very subjective preference in the whole field of meditation.

Some very well-established meditation traditions put very little emphasis on technique. I remember a Zen session that I went to sit in—I think it was 1978, the first year I was on staff. Actually, Carol and Steve and I all went together to New York to sit with a well-known Zen teacher named Sasaki Roshi. Sasaki Roshi is a very strong spirit in any world. He's Leonard Cohen's teacher. If you happen to see the new film about Leonard Cohen, there's a little scene of Cohen in the film with Sasaki, who I think was used as the model for Yoda in the Star Wars films—that timeless kind of face.

Sasaki Roshi is in the tradition of Rinzai Zen, which is the tradition that tends to hit you if you move in the meditation hall. One of the reasons I didn't stay too long in that tradition. It's also a tradition that puts very little emphasis on meditation technique. So as we started the retreat, we were all given a koan—a baby koan suitable for Westerners, but a Zen riddle that we were supposed to present our answer to four times a day to the teacher, to the roshi, in individual meetings. If you didn't have a good answer, he'd say things like, "stupid answer, ring the bell," and that meant you were dismissed. So he wasn't one of these warm and fuzzy, cuddly types like we tend to be. It was a little bit intimidating for some of us.

At one point, we'd been given very basic instructions about feeling the breath in the abdomen, and then we'd been given our koan. That was about the extent of the instruction. So in one question period, somebody raised their hand and said, "What should we do while we sit? Should we follow our breath, or should we reflect on our koan?" And Roshi's answer was very Zen. He said, "You can do whatever you want." That was the end of the answer. You can do whatever you want.

That's really true here, too. You can do whatever you want, and I know many of you will, regardless of what we want you to do or ask you to do. We realize that's out of our control. You will do what you want. But we do feel that there is a value in technique, and we want to share with you some aspects that we found helpful in working with techniques in meditation. Hopefully over the time you're here, whether it's nine weeks, seven weeks, or five weeks, you'll have a chance to play with them enough to get a feeling for what works for you.

That's the point of technique—to find what tools, what choices, what directions to aim the attention in best harmonize with your body and mind. Because the body and mind are always changing, different ones will work better at different times. That's why it's good if you have a few; then you'll know which one fits each condition.

When the mind is agitated, it might call for one choice. When the mind is calm, it might be another. When the body is tight, it might require one approach. When the body is easy, it might invite another. So we'd like to offer a range of practices, and we begin with the breath, I think because it's where the Buddha really began. His meditation instructions tend to start with the breath.

Looking over the whole field of Buddhist meditation practice—2,500 years and all the different traditions it has spread to—the breath is probably the most used single technique. But there's nothing sacred about it. I hope you really appreciate that. It is not the sacred object of meditation. It is not the only appropriate place to put your attention. It's a skillful place for many people, and for some people it's a really unskillful place.

If you find it difficult to relate with the breath, please talk with your teacher in the interview and see if you can work together to find an alternate focus that better harmonizes with where you're at. So there's no obligation for anybody to be with the breath. And please don't think that this is in some way the best technique. It's just one technique, and it's the one that we tend to start with.

But really more important than the object of the breath is the quality of mindfulness. Mindfulness can be applied to any part of your experience. So it can be applied to any of the sensations at the five physical sense doors, any experience of sight, sound, smell, taste, and touch. Those are bases for mindfulness. It can be applied to any phenomenon that you recognize at the mind door—to thoughts, to emotions, to intentions, to perceptions, to feeling tones, volition. Any of those are excellent grounds for mindfulness.

We tend to start with the breath, but mindfulness is the primary thing. So as Steve mentioned today, if in being with the breath you find the attention drawn somewhere else and you notice that, mindfulness is still happening, and that's really the key.

I find it interesting that after about thirty years of coming into this country, the practice of mindfulness is starting to become recognized outside the kind of fringe group that you and I represent. We're kind of an oddball assortment of people who would come into a place like this and be in silence for five weeks or nine weeks. Mainstream America isn't going to do this anytime soon.

Nonetheless, mindfulness is starting to be really recognized and appreciated in the mainstream. Jon Kabat-Zinn's mindfulness-based stress reduction has made a big impact. And that has brought it to the attention of the scientific community who are now starting to do research and experiments involving mindfulness that are showing some pretty amazing results. But I don't really want to go into those because I think you know from your own experience the benefits of mindfulness.

One group that I know of in Los Angeles is part of a $25 million funding effort. And there's a group within that dedicated to the study of mindfulness in a research-oriented way. So I think this is great. I think this will validate the beneficial effects of what we do and take it further into the mainstream as yoga has gone into the mainstream after years of being considered sort of a fringe and cult pursuit.

So as mindfulness becomes more mainstream, I wonder—I want to ask you a question. Have you ever tried to define it for yourself? If a friend came and asked you, "Okay, you do this practice called mindfulness, I'm reading about this. What do you mean by mindfulness?" Would you have a clear response for them?

Sometimes it's described as bare attention, just the sense that we connect with our experience. And around mindfulness, there's something to do with the present moment, right? It's important that mindfulness have to do with an experience in this moment. And bare attention represents that connecting of our attention to something that's happening, and we don't add anything to it. That's what the bare part means.

So we don't analyze it. We don't judge it. We don't compare it. We don't evaluate it. We don't wish it were something else. I mean, we may, but that's not mindfulness. Mindfulness doesn't add to the experience, and that's why it's called bare.

But I don't think that completely sums up what mindfulness is, for me anyway, because as far as I can tell, dogs have bare attention. Most of the time, when I look at a dog, they're just with what is. When they sleep, they dream, and then you see their paws going. But when they're alert, they're very happily, usually, with what is. Are they being mindful?

Is a dog mindful? A dog is in the present moment. They're connecting to some sense experience. Are they being mindful? Is a baby mindful? A baby is also very connected to the present moment. Is a baby mindful?

For you to consider this question, I want to read some sections from the Satipatthana Sutta. This is in a way the Bible in our tradition for how to practice mindfulness. It is the discourse on the foundations, or the establishment, you might say, of mindfulness. It's found in the Majjhima Nikaya, one of the primary texts that came down to us in the language of Pali, a language from ancient India, and has been translated into many languages around the world. There's now a very good translation in English, and that's the one that I'll quote some sections from.

The Satipatthana Sutta is directed to a practitioner. In the way that the Buddha delivered it, he used the term bhikkhu because mostly he was speaking to male monastics in his day. But the term bhikkhu, according to the commentaries in this context, means anybody who's committed to the practice. So you don't have to be a monastic, you don't have to be a male. It means all of us who are seriously engaged in mindfulness practice. So this is how we are instructed by the Buddha to practice. These are just a few examples. There's a lot more in the whole sutta, but these are a few representative examples.

"Breathing in, the practitioner understands I am breathing in. Breathing out, she understands I am breathing out. Or, feeling a painful feeling, he understands I am feeling a painful feeling. Or, feeling a pleasant feeling, she understands I am feeling a pleasant feeling. She understands the mind affected by lust as the mind affected by lust, and the mind unaffected by lust as the mind unaffected by lust. Or, there being aversion in him, he understands there is aversion in me. Or, there being no aversion, he understands there is no aversion in me."

So these are the Buddha's own descriptions of how to practice mindfulness. What common word stands out to you from that selection? "Understands" is actually the way that Bhikkhu Bodhi translated the term from Pali. Understands.

So I would say that a good working definition of mindfulness is understanding what our present experience is. It doesn't have to be our total present experience. It just means understanding that experience where our attention is directed—understanding what's happening in the present moment where our attention is landing. That's mindfulness.

I like this word "understands" because there's some quality in there that I think is important to notice, and that is an intelligence. Understanding is the part, I would say, that's missing from the dog's experience. It's the part that's missing from the baby's experience. They don't quite have that—you could almost call it a reflective ability in consciousness to take note of what the present experience is. There's almost this sense of stepping back a little bit from the immediate engagement, and also understanding what's happening to us.

This quality of intelligence is a really important piece of mindfulness because it is the opening of wisdom. It's through our mindful relationship to our experience that the wisdom door opens up to us. Wisdom is the word we usually use to translate the Pali term paññā, an important component of the Eightfold Path. And they are so related, these two qualities of mindfulness and wisdom, that one of my teachers from Thailand, Ajahn Buddhadasa, seldom spoke about them separately. He would use the combined term sati-paññā, mindfulness-wisdom, and he would talk about this as the natural functioning of our beings. When we are present and we pay attention, our mind naturally engages with our experience from this quality of mindfulness and understanding. It comes forth naturally if we let it.

This is really what we're training in, this quality of mindfulness with understanding or wisdom. So then let's back up one more step. This is what mindfulness is. Why do we do it? Why on earth would you put yourself in this situation for nine weeks? I'm sure you've asked yourself this more than once.

This is an arduous practice. I really appreciate working with people in long retreat because I know each one of you has a tremendous amount of commitment, tremendous faith in order to undertake this kind of activity. It's a challenge every day, sometimes many times every hour. This is a challenge. Why do we do it? What is it about mindfulness?

There's something about a wisdom of staying in the present moment that I think is an important part of it. There was a cartoon in the New Yorker a few months ago that really illustrated our human condition and said something about the nature of desires.

The cartoon was in three panels. The first panel was of a man at work, sitting in front of his computer, working away on the keyboard. But over his head there was this little thought balloon which had an image of him out on the golf course playing golf.

Next panel: same guy out on the golf course striking a ball off the driving range, but over his head was an image of himself at home making love to his partner. Third panel—can you guess? Same guy at home making love to his partner, thinking about his PC at work.

This is the nature of samsaric mind. Wherever we are, we can't be entirely present because the mind is running on to somewhere else. Desire is taking our thoughts somewhere else. That kind of life doesn't really have the possibility of deep satisfaction—the life where we're always somewhere else. As the Dalai Lama expressed it, the present moment is the only place that we can feel love. So the present moment is an important piece of the puzzle.

But there's another aspect to it also, which is that this property of mindfulness as the channel for wisdom begins to interact with our experience in a way that wakes us up. As we start to connect with the facets of our human experience—all the experiences of the body and of the mind, the outside world and the inside world—mindfulness looking on those things with the eye of understanding starts to make some sense of life. This is really the unfolding of wisdom. I want to talk more about it later, exactly how that comes about and how it develops. But just to say that the wisdom piece of mindfulness is the one that ultimately gives the greatest satisfaction through the development of freedom.

So I want to talk a little bit technically for a few minutes about meditation practice. I'll talk about this in relation to the breath, but I hope you'll see the connection with any other focus that you may experience. I want to talk about two words that are really helpful in understanding how meditation practice functions. These two words are connecting and sustaining. They're the English translation of two Pali words: vitaka and vichara. They're, you might say, the beginnings of concentration. We'll talk more about concentration later, but concentration is the settled quality of mind that lets us start to feel some stability, some calm, some steadiness with our attention.

As we practice meditation with the breath, notice that what you do when you're being properly mindful is that you connect your attention to the breath and then you sustain the attention there for a short period of time. That's the meaning of these Pali words. First, we choose to connect the attention to the sensations of the breath, and then we let the attention rest there for a little bit of time.

This little bit of time is important because if you have the sense that you should last the whole hour, you'll get really tight. So don't try to sustain for very long. The recommended time is half a breath. Don't try to sustain that connection for more than half a breath. So we connect with the breath as we feel the in-breath coming. We let the attention stay there for half a breath, and then we kind of let go. When the out-breath begins, we connect again, and we sustain for just that length of time.

I think this is realistic for us. If you have in mind "I should sustain for ten breaths even," you can get really tight and frustrated and discouraged. If you have in mind "I only have to sustain for half a breath," I think you can do it. I think I can do it. I think this is a helpful way to gauge our effort.

Even so, we might get tight because we miss a breath, or two, or three, or five minutes, or ten minutes. I mean, if you're here starting a retreat, I would suspect that most of you have been gone for ten minutes at a time, maybe twenty minutes at a time today, without connecting to the present. That happens on early days of retreat. Don't be discouraged.

Because we feel a little judgment about that, sometimes we get tight. "Oh, I can't miss this breath." But does the tightness actually help us stay connected? Not so well.

Other times we might be so relaxed, we'll say, "Whatever happens, happens." This is the hippie approach to meditation. "I'll just sit back, man, and whatever happens, I'm cool with that."

And that's not so satisfying either because the whole period can go by and we haven't really connected with anything.

So we want to find that quality of effort that's somewhere in between. This is really what's meant by the balance of effort—a mind that's firm enough to make a good connection with our focus, let's say the breath, but not so tight that it squeezes the life out of it.

An analogy that one of our teachers used was trying to pick up a baked potato with a fork. Let's say you have half of a baked potato, a small potato, and you'd like to pick it up and put it in your mouth. Notice the quality of effort with which the fork hits the potato. If you hit the potato too hard, what happens? It breaks up, and you can't pick anything up. But if you hit it too soft, the fork doesn't go in and you also can't pick it up. So you have to press the fork in with just the right amount of force. Then it picks up the potato and you can eat it.

Similarly, when connecting to any meditation subject like the breath, find where that appropriate balance is for you of effort. It can change moment by moment, but keep trying until you find it.

This is really a key to something I think Steve or Carol mentioned last night about right attitude. You want an attitude of mind in your practice that's not too aggressive, not too gaining or striving, because that leads to being too tight. But you also want an attitude that's not too laid back or too passive, because that will lead to you being out of touch. So you want to find the place that's firm but not too hard and connect with the breath in that way.

Remember that the point of the meditation is to be present, to be mindful in as many moments as you can. But in a lot of ways, that's not up to our control. So be really patient with yourself in those periods when mindfulness just doesn't happen. It's not always up to us. A lot of times, it's not our choice that we're away in thought for a long time. It's just what happens—not under our control, so not right for us to blame ourselves or judge ourselves for that.

Remember that you can always just start over. When you've come to the end of one of those long periods, attempting to blame ourselves doesn't help so much. Remember, you can just begin again. Every moment is a new opportunity. You don't have to go back and figure out what you thought about. You don't have to resolve the train of thinking. You can just let it go. You don't have to excuse yourself or even forgive yourself. You say, "Oh, here again," and we start anew. You can be grateful for that.

Now the development of mindfulness leads in two directions, which I'm sure you've heard often. The Pali terms are samatha and vipassana. You could say these are the two big streams of the benefits of our practice. In English, these are translated as calm and insight.

So samatha basically means calm. Vipassana we usually translate as insight. The literal meaning is more like seeing clearly, seeing things the way they are.

Over the 2,500 years that these teachings have been around, there has been a lot of comment on these two streams of the practice. Different people have said, "Oh, if you want to develop samatha or calm, these are the practices you should do. And if you want to develop vipassana or insight, these are the practices you should do." So over time, there's been this division of certain practices that are considered right for developing calm or samatha and others that are right for developing insight or vipassana.

Some teachers will tell you, "Oh no, you're doing a samatha practice now, don't go looking for insight." Or "You're doing an insight practice now, don't worry about samatha."

As I read the Buddha's teachings, he never talked in this kind of separated way. Rather, as I read the teachings, he said when you practice mindfulness, you will develop in both samatha and vipassana. They both really support one another. It is true that you can take an approach that emphasizes one or the other, but here in this course, most of us will be developing both. So we'll make our instructions on the assumption that you're interested in both calm and insight.

But it is very interesting to meet people who've developed a lot of calm because it's hard to tell them from fully enlightened beings. It's an interesting point about the development of calm.

One of the teachers I got to spend time with was Dipa Ma, and I'm sure many of you have heard of her. There's a wonderful book about her written by Amy Schmidt, who was a resident teacher here for many years. I'd say of all the dharma books in the last ten years, this is one of the most immediately happy-making dharma books, and especially for women. Women who read the Dipa Ma book tend to really connect with her as a kind of living teaching figure, even though she died a number of years ago. So I highly recommend, especially for the women, that you check out the book called Dipa Ma.

Dipa Ma was a very accomplished yogi who had experienced deep insight and profound stillness—deep samatha. Just to give you an idea of what her concentration was like: she went to her first meditation retreat and had been practicing for about a day when she was supposed to go for an interview with her teacher. As she was walking toward her teacher, she found she couldn't lift her left foot off the ground. Something just stopped her, and she wasn't sure what had happened. So she just stood there for a few minutes—"Oh, can't move. Guess I'm supposed to be here." She didn't fight it. After a few minutes of still not being able to move, she looked down and discovered that a dog had bitten her ankle, closed his teeth around her ankle—that's why she couldn't move. She didn't even really feel it, except as a kind of weight. That's how steady her mind was at that point.

So spending time with Dipa Ma was always amazing because her mind never seemed to move. And I couldn't tell if that was because she was so highly enlightened or because she had developed calm to such a high degree.

Another person who reminds me of this is a teacher from Thailand named Ajahn Jomnian. Ajahn Jomnian has a monastery in the south of Thailand near the town of Krabi. He's in his late sixties now and has been a monk since he was very young. He has done a lot of metta practice, so he has a very joyful disposition and strong concentration. He also has psychic powers that arose out of the concentration. One of the things he said a few years ago is that he hasn't had any anger in twenty-five years. And it's not because he's isolated, living in a cave—he runs a large monastery with many people coming and going, and I'm sure many headaches. He said he hasn't had any anger. Now, is that because he's so realized, or is that because of the steadiness of his mind from concentration? I don't know.

Another teacher who really impresses me was here at the Forest Refuge this summer. His name is Pauk Sayadaw. He's a Burmese teacher who teaches a very complete and complex system of meditation, the first part of which is seriously oriented toward developing samatha. He wants you to develop what are called the four jhanas or absorption states—very high levels of concentration. He himself is clearly a master of those concentrated states. Then he instructs you how to use that concentrated mind to turn to insight, to see the nature of reality very clearly.

In himself, he is a very impressive being. I find him remarkable. I've met a fairly wide range of teachers in Buddhist circles, and of all the ones I've met, Pauk Sayadaw reminds me of the stories of the Buddha more than anybody else I've encountered. His mind seems always unflappable. I've never seen him in anything but a state of equanimity. He always has a very warm and loving presence, very nonjudgmental, very accepting. And he's totally focused on dharma. Nothing else interests him. I try to make conversation with him, and it just falls flat after about a sentence, because he'll go there to be polite for about one sentence, and then it's clear he's not interested anymore.

He was at the Forest Refuge, and the Burmese donors would come up from New York or Boston to visit with him. He'd have lunch with them and exchange a couple of pleasantries, and then he'd retire to his room. Because if the conversation wasn't about dharma, it didn't interest him. So he manifests this complete dedication. He's been in robes since he was ten years old and has complete dedication to his own liberation and the liberation of anyone else who wishes to follow his teaching.

So these are some of the powers of a concentrated mind, a still mind, a steady mind in conjunction with insight. This is the direction that mindfulness of breathing leads—both the deepening of stillness and the deepening of insight.

In terms of meditation technique, there is no other that the Buddha described in as much detail. There's this wonderful sutta in the Majjhima called the Anapanasati Sutta —a discourse on mindfulness of in-and-out breathing—where the Buddha describes in detail how this practice unfolds for us as we follow it all the way through. He said that this practice is sufficient to follow all the way through to realization, and in doing so, it covers the other foundations of mindfulness as well.

Mindfulness of breathing is about the body primarily, but as we explore it with some depth and some consistency, it also opens up the other foundations of mindfulness—feeling tone (pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral), mind states or citta, and the fourth foundation called dhammas or dharmic principles.

The Buddha described the unfolding of this practice in sixteen separate stages in the sutta, normally organized into four groups of four. In each stage, the meditator is experiencing these developments both through breathing in and through breathing out.

The first group of four: One notices whether the breath is long. One notices if the breath is short. One breathes in experiencing the whole body. And one tranquilizes the bodily formation.

So fairly early on, the meditator is using the breath to bring calm into the body. This is one of the first beautiful benefits of breath as a meditation—it starts to calm the body. The breath is particularly good for this because of its rhythmic nature. I'm sure you've felt this, for short periods or for long periods, how that very steady in-and-out activity has a soothing quality to it. The rhythm can eventually convey that soothing quality to the body, and the body starts to calm down.

Whenever I enter a retreat from the outside world, from a busy period in life, one of the first things I notice is how busy my body is—that it's stored up tensions and energies and hasn't fully relaxed. Then as the retreat goes on, I feel the body relaxing and letting go. So the breath begins to bring a calming energy to the body.

The next four descriptions: breathing in and out, experiencing rapture, experiencing pleasure. The commentaries liken this to the second foundation on feeling tone, the pleasant aspect of experience. You might try this in a sitting—see if in breathing in you can have a sense of that energy picking up throughout the body and of a pleasant quality to that energy.

Third in this step: experiencing the mental formations. So early on, only seven steps in, the meditation on the breath is leading to looking at the mind. When we talk about the breath, don't think that you have to hold it separate from knowing what's happening in the mind. They're really meant to be integrated. We can look at the quality of mind that is with the breath. The relationship we create with the breath—is it an aggressive one where we're taking hold too hard? Is it too distant or laid back where we're not connecting enough? Are we finding the right relationship with the breath?

Next step: tranquilizing the mental formation. As the breath calms the body, so also in time it starts to calm the mind. These two steps of calming the body and calming the mind are important developments through the mindfulness of breath.

The third tetrad has four more components: breathing in, experiencing the mind—so knowing clearly what's in the mind—gladdening the mind, concentrating the mind, and liberating the mind. That's delightful. Liberating the mind, and we're only at step twelve.

This has a special meaning in the text: the mind that's free from hindrances. You might notice this in your practice—there are moments when the hindrances of desire, aversion, sleepiness, restlessness, and doubt aren't active. In those moments, feel that quality of freedom. It may be there a number of times in one sitting. In that moment, the mind is free. It is liberated. Breath leads in that direction.

Because of the beautiful qualities that grow out of mindfulness of breath, there can easily come a striving around these states. Just think what we've covered so far: tranquility, rapture, pleasure, gladdening, concentrating, liberating. Who wouldn't want that? So notice if there starts to come a striving element in relationship to mindfulness of breathing: "I'm being mindful so that I can get concentrated. I'm being mindful so that I can get glad. I'm being mindful so that I can feel free."

Of course, if we do it from that kind of ulterior motive, it doesn't work. We have to really be with the breath in an innocent kind of way, and we have to see these benefits all as byproducts. That innocent attention leads to all this beautiful result, but we can't force it.

So we learn that right effort is just about forming that relationship in the moment with the breath—not pushing it, not trying to get over it to get into a different next moment. All the beautiful qualities of meditation come out of a moment where we accept it the way it is. Never out of aversion or grasping. This is always the first step: accepting the moment the way it is. Then the beautiful qualities come from that.

When I sat with Palak Sayadaw the first time, I went over to Burma and spent six weeks with him.

And a friend of mine was already there and knew I was coming, so he told Sayadaw about my arrival. I'm afraid he gave me quite a buildup, saying, "Oh, this teacher from California is coming. It would be good if we could give him a nice kuti."

So they did. I received a beautiful kuti when I arrived, and Sayadaw went out of his way to welcome me. I was able to see him every day for interviews, which was wonderfully positive. At the same time, I felt like I had a reputation to live up to. After practicing for about thirty years, I thought I should be somewhere significant along this path.

But Sayadaw's level of concentration is extraordinarily high. I charged in and practiced as intensely as I could. I made some progress and was advancing on his system, but then I completely plateaued. I never got close to where he would have liked me to reach.

Did I get caught up in striving? Absolutely. I had to deal with it as it arose—this desire to be somewhere other than fully present, motivated by something beyond just being here now. It was an ego thing. I had to examine that and let go as completely as possible.

When I sat with him again at Forest Refuge, I encountered a friend who sometimes joined the daily sits. He saw me recently and asked, "How did you work with the striving in relation to Sayadaw?" I replied, "I'd already fallen on my face in Burma—I didn't have to worry about doing it again here." So it was actually much easier the second time.

We do learn to recognize and work with this striving quality of mind, this gaining mind that craves some special experience from our practice. But the practice truly unfolds only when we can accept the moment exactly as it is and find ease with that. That's freedom—the freedom to discover peace of mind with things precisely as they are.

What leads in this direction is the fourth group of stages in relating to the breath. As we breathe in and out, we contemplate impermanence. You'll notice that these final four stages are entirely about insight or vipassana. Some of the first twelve were clearly about concentration—tranquilizing the mind, gladdening the mind, concentrating the mind—clearly on the side of samatha. These last four are unmistakably on the side of vipassana.

Contemplating fading away—the Pali word is viraga, literally meaning "not passion" or dispassion. It's a synonym for the unconditioned, for nibbana. Contemplating nibbana as I breathe in, contemplating nibbana as I breathe out. Not the concept, but the direct experience.

Contemplating cessation or nirodha—this means the cessation of suffering. This is truly the third noble truth. The end of suffering is the end of craving. So we contemplate in our direct experience of breathing in and out what it feels like when craving ends, even if only temporarily. With the end of craving comes the end of suffering.

Finally, contemplating relinquishment or letting go. What the commentaries say this refers to is releasing any of the defilements of mind, the torments of mind that Carol mentioned last night—letting go of greed, aversion, and delusion, hopefully at some point for good, so that these qualities of mind never again visit. This is the final freedom, the direction toward which the entire path leads.

This great stability of mind where the mind is no longer troubled by self-centered thoughts or confusion in any direction whatsoever. This is truly the kind of peace from which love and compassion flow naturally. Love and compassion are already present when the mind isn't preoccupied with self-centered striving.

As the mind settles and becomes free from these torments, love and compassion emerge naturally, expressing themselves in countless forms of connection, helping, sharing, and generosity. This is what the Buddha was teaching the Satipatthana for. This is why the Buddha taught the practice of mindfulness.

Through understanding the way things truly are, as mindfulness comes into contact with objects like the breath, body, sounds, thoughts, and moods, we begin to see their specific characteristics—an in-breath, an out-breath, a sound, the quality of fear, generosity, anxiety, or compassion. We see how all these phenomena have their individual nature, but they're also subject to the universal characteristics of impermanence, unreliability, and selflessness.

As mindfulness and wisdom together begin to uncover all these characteristics, we find ourselves releasing more and more of any kind of clinging. It's the letting go of clinging that allows the mind to be liberated, released finally into a direct realization of the unconditioned. It's that direct realization that accomplishes the work of relinquishing the defilements.

So as the Buddha said toward the end of the Satipatthana Sutta: "Friends, this is the direct path for the purification of beings, for the overcoming of sorrow, for the disappearance of pain and grief, and for the attainment of the true way and the realization of nibbana—namely the four foundations of mindfulness."

In the mindfulness of the breath, we find a complete path in itself that opens up to all the other foundations, beginning with the development of calm and opening into the development of liberating wisdom.

Let's just sit for a minute in silence, please.

[Silent sitting]

"This is the direct path for the purification of beings, for the overcoming of sorrow, for the disappearance of pain and grief, for the attainment of the true way, for the realization of nibbana—namely, the four foundations of mindfulness."

Thank you for your attention. It was a pleasure to be with you at the start of this retreat and also in the new hall. It's the first time I've taught in the new hall, so it's been a great pleasure.

Just one brief announcement about interviews: Interviews for the whole group will begin tomorrow. Due to the somewhat idiosyncratic nature of this computer system, there was no way to separate out the people who had interviews today from the whole group. The result is that some people who had interviews today—the continuing retreatants—may also be on the list for tomorrow. In addition, about half of the new group will be scheduled for tomorrow and about half the day after.

So please, everybody check the board because your number could be up tomorrow. Please do check, and we look forward to seeing you then.

CHAPTER 23

Working With Difficult Emotions

Guy Armstrong · 57 min

> In this comprehensive dharma talk, Guy Armstrong draws from the Satipatthāna Sutta (MN 10) to explore cittānupassanā, the third foundation of mindfulness focused on observing mind-states. He addresses the reality of dukkha as described in the First Noble Truth, using both contemporary research and classical Buddhist teachings to frame our understanding of human suffering.
>
> Armstrong identifies five core difficult emotions that create the most bondage: wanting, sadness, anger, self-judgment, and fear. He explains how these states arise through our relationship to pleasant and unpleasant experiences across past and future, and provides practical tools for working with them. The talk introduces a three-part analysis of emotions: the mental coloring or mood, bodily sensations, and the underlying storylines or beliefs that perpetuate suffering.
>
> A key teaching is the RAIN technique - Recognition, Acceptance, Interest, and Non-identification - offering meditators a systematic approach to transform their relationship with difficult mind-states. Armstrong emphasizes finding the middle way between suppression and expression, allowing full feeling without reactive behavior. The talk concludes with Rilke's profound poem about embracing all experiences, reminding us that 'no feeling is final' and encouraging practitioners to remain open to the full spectrum of human emotional experience while cultivating freedom through mindful awareness.

A couple of nights ago, Steve talked about the Four Noble Truths with particular emphasis on the First Noble Truth, the truth of suffering. When we look around the world, it's quite easy to see, isn't it? Even if you shared this truth with many people, they might not acknowledge it. Yet if we look with an eye that is more open, it's easy to see.

This reminded me of an article that appeared in the New Yorker not so long ago. According to a study just released by scientists at Duke University, life is too hard. Authors of the 1200-page study were hesitant to single out any particular factors responsible for making life tough. Surprisingly, they say, they found so many. Before the study was undertaken, researchers had assumed, by positive logic, that life could not be that bad. As the data accumulated, however, they provided incontrovertible proof that human endurance equals just a tiny fraction of what it should be given everything it must put up with.

Nine out of ten of the respondents in the survey stated that they would give up completely if they only knew how. The remainder also didn't see the point of going on any longer, but still clung to a slight hope for something in the mail. In a personal note in the afterword, researchers stated that statistically speaking, life is, quote, "just too much," unquote. As yet, they have no plausible theory how anyone gets through it at all.

This may remind you of our situation here, except that you've probably given up hope of anything in the mail.

When I come on retreat, the question of suffering seems to get really simple after I've been in retreat for a little while. There are basically, you may have noticed, two kinds of suffering: body and mind. When you look closely, body suffering is basically about physical pain or discomfort.

This was really clear to me a couple of retreats ago. I went over to Burma and sat with the concentration master that I mentioned the other evening, whose name is Palok Sayadaw. When I arrived at the monastery in Burma, I was given an outline of the daily schedule. There were six sittings a day. The shortest sitting was an hour and a half, and the longest sitting was two hours. As soon as I arrived, I was expected to start practicing according to that schedule.

In practicing by that schedule, I encountered quite a bit of physical pain because I wasn't used to sitting for an hour and a half, much less two hours. I'm sure in your transition here, you've also encountered physical discomfort here and there while sitting for an hour or 45 minutes. This is one common occurrence and common theme of retreat—something that stretches us.

On the mental side, when I'm sitting, I divide it into two pieces. One piece has to do with meditative skill: How am I with the fact that I'm not with the present moment all the time? How am I with the fact that the mind gets restless and wanders or goes to sleep and gets caught up in thought? That's an area of some need for attention, lest we fall into suffering with frustration, disappointment, judgment, discouragement—all the feelings that come around a sort of loss of control. This is one area that I know all of you are working with in this retreat.

But the second area is really more challenging and has to do with directly painful states of mind. This is what I want to talk about tonight: How do we work with the difficult states of mind that come? They come not only in retreat, but of course they come in daily life also. How do these states lead to suffering for us, and how can we release the suffering and find freedom in relation to them?

As we enter this area of states of mind, we're getting into what's called the third foundation of mindfulness. In the Satipatthana Sutta, it starts off talking about the third foundation like this: "And how, bhikkhus, does a bhikkhu abide contemplating mind as mind? Here, a bhikkhu understands mind affected by lust as mind affected by lust, and mind unaffected by lust as mind unaffected by lust. She understands mind affected by hatred as mind affected by hatred, and mind unaffected by hatred as mind unaffected by hatred. He understands mind affected by delusion as mind affected by delusion, and mind unaffected by delusion as mind unaffected by delusion."

So here are our three old friends—essentially greed, hatred, and confusion—that become the object for our mindfulness, either their presence or their absence. Their presence being unwholesome or suffering states, their absence being a wholesome state, a state of well-being.

This is the area of practice that I want to talk about tonight, and it's a very central area in our life, in our meditation, and in coming to greater freedom. So much of our core sufferings are from these states of mind—the difficult states of mind—and knowing how to relate with them.

Just a short word about terminology. I may talk about emotions. I may talk about moods. I may use the term mind states. Let me clarify that a bit. The word that is translated in the third foundation as "mind" is the Pali word citta. It could equally well be translated as "heart," because the word citta encompasses both qualities that we would call mental and qualities that we would call of the heart or emotional. Probably the best translation for the word citta, as it's used in the suttas, is the word "psyche." Everything that makes up our psyche is part of citta.

We may talk about emotions. These are generally considered heart qualities, and they're states of mind like love or happiness or joy or sadness or fear or embarrassment that have a resonance in our heart.

There is a tone of being pleasant or unpleasant that is usually rather strong. So for emotions, we're talking about these rather strong heart qualities.

When I use the word mood, it's more or less synonymous with emotion, but it may have a little gentler intensity, and it may encompass a slightly wider range of feelings.

Then the word mind state or state of mind is the most encompassing, and it's really what's pointed to in the third foundation. It includes not only the range of moods and emotions, but also all the subtle states of mind that we become familiar with in meditation, like calm or mindfulness or concentration or equanimity or rapture. These more subtle states don't really leap out at us, but as we investigate the more refined qualities of mind, we start to really understand how these feel, how they present themselves, how they affect us. So the term states of mind encompasses this range of subtle meditative states as well as the more dramatic emotional states that come. It's the most broad and all-encompassing.

The Abhidhamma, which is a very analytic look at the teachings of the Buddha, says that there are 52 distinct mental factors or qualities of mind—the entire list of factors of mind that can arise. Although they join in so many different combinations that they give rise to a very, very complex set of experiences, it says there are only 52 building blocks in mind that give rise to these. Some of these building blocks are considered beautiful, or you could say wholesome. Some are considered unwholesome. Some are neither beautiful nor unwholesome, like the quality of intention that I think Steve talked about in the instructions. It's rather neutral.

But I want to focus tonight on talking a little about these states that have quite pleasant or quite unpleasant qualities. As a frame to the discussion, I'd just like to invite you to reflect on what are the most sublime states of mind that you've experienced in your life? It may be that you go back to childhood. It may be that you remember particularly deep meditation experiences. The most sublime states that you can recall. That may give you a sense of the range of the beautiful that's available within the human heart and mind.

And now I'd like to ask you to reflect on the experiences in your life, the mental qualities that have been most painful. Not particularly incidents—they may be connected with incidents. I don't want to focus on the outer incident, but focus on the inner experience. What was the most painful experience or what were the most painful emotions you can recall feeling?

And then think about all the states in between, states that are somewhat difficult, states that are somewhat pleasurable, and then the extremes. So I hope this gives you a sense of the range of the human heart and mind as it's played out through your experience. It's vast.

In meditation retreats, we often have the experience of touching these extremes. It's one reason that meditation is very challenging, but it's also why life is so challenging. If life was all just one way, it might be simpler to navigate, but it's this peculiar mix of the intensely sublime and the very, very difficult and problematic that course through us at perhaps a moment's notice, completely out of our control, that creates some of our imbalance in our relationship to living.

So there are many things to say about the beautiful states, the wholesome states of mind. We'll talk about them a lot as the retreat goes by. For tonight, I just want to say briefly how not to be involved with suffering around the beautiful. And this is easier than how not to be involved with suffering around the difficult.

So essentially, I'm sure you know the first instruction: don't cling. Whatever the beautiful experience that comes to you or that you remember from the past, don't hold on. Let it go so that the mind comes freshly into this moment and is ready for whatever happens now. Clinging to even the most beautiful only creates an obstacle to being present with what is, as I'm sure you know.

The second recommendation, and this takes a little bit of practice, is a skill that should come with practice: Appreciate these states when they arrive. When a wholesome state or a beautiful state comes to you, please be very, very mindful that it's appeared. Naming it is helpful, feeling it in the body, feeling it in the mind, and knowing that, oh, this is the arrival of something beautiful or something wholesome.

So this could be a state like calm or peace or equanimity, loving kindness or compassion, contentment, joy, happiness, wonder, awe, friendliness, warmth. Sometimes they're subtle, but as soon as you become aware, please recognize that something very good has arrived.

Sometimes I found, especially in the early years of my practice, I took these states completely for granted. And there would be a respite from the storm of the hindrances and whatever. There'd be some peace, some good feelings, some openness to nature and appreciation, gratitude. And I'd sort of think, oh, this is the way it ought to be. That was the killer: "This is the way it ought to be." And I wouldn't recognize how special what had just arrived was.

I think this is a little bit of our Western problem, that we're raised in a culture that's pretty idealistic.

Our culture is remarkably adept at defining and describing how things ought to be. So we carry many opinions about how things should unfold. We are idealistic as cultures go. But the problem with this orientation is that reality isn't based on ideals. And when reality doesn't match the ideal, we struggle.

It could be the ideal about how a meditation center should work. It could be the ideal about how our fellow yogis should be behaving. It could be the ideal about how my meditation experience should be unfolding in this retreat. And when the reality doesn't match the ideal, we fight with reality. When you fight with reality, who wins? It's almost never the ideal, and there's usually tremendous suffering along the way to aligning with reality.

So our idealism doesn't serve us very well when it comes to meditation. It's wonderful to have an aspiration and to work toward ideals like social justice and equality and non-discrimination on the basis of gender, race, sexual orientation, and so forth. Those are beautiful, inspiring ideals within our culture that we move to actualize through law and through our own human hearts. But when we see that the reality is not in alignment with the ideal, can we keep from suffering around that?

It doesn't mean we stop trying to make a better world and move toward the realization of our deep aspirations for justice, equality, and so on. But can we not come into conflict? Can we not suffer when the ideal doesn't measure up? Especially when it comes to our own hearts and minds and experience.

What's interesting is that the Buddha's mind doesn't have a bias toward expecting that things should be wholesome. This is my interpretation anyway. There's no bias in the awakened mind. The awakened mind, we might say, starts at emptiness. It starts with not expecting anything particular, or starts at zero, if you like.

Then, if something beautiful shows up, we go, "Oh, how wonderful, something beautiful." We recognize it, acknowledge it without clinging. If something difficult shows up, we say, "Oh, something difficult has shown up," and we recognize that. But we don't have a sense that one or the other ought to be happening. We align our awareness just with the way things are. We let reality teach us.

In relating then with the beautiful emotions: don't cling and appreciate them when they come. You'll find this very helpful. The more we appreciate the beautiful emotions, the more likely they are to return. The more familiar we become with them, the more likely they are to come again.

So let's talk now about the difficult emotions—sometimes called painful emotions, defilements, hindrances, torments of mind, afflictive emotions. All of these describe this terrain. Emotions like fear or terror, humiliation, sense of low self-worth, embarrassment, depression, despair, anger, hatred, sadness.

How can we relate when these come to bring greater freedom in our lives? Two things are really needed here. One is an attitude shift, and that is in the direction of greater acceptance. And the other is more wisdom about these emotions. We just need to understand how these emotions are put together better. And we do that just by paying attention. This is the laboratory where we understand how the emotions work.

So it's actually a great opportunity when a difficult emotion comes in the middle of meditation. You don't have anything else to do but to learn about it. And from my point of view, learning about the difficult emotions is one of the key things that happens in a long retreat like this.

You know, mindfulness practice is becoming widespread in our culture—still in a small way, but much more widespread than it had been ten years ago. One of the most immediate benefits that people can receive is understanding how to work with difficult emotions through mindfulness. And it's one of the most immediate ways that people can get benefit.

So I hope this will be a source of interest for you on this retreat and a source of tremendous learning and freedom. Because as we open up around these core areas where we typically get caught, where we suffer, where we're in bondage, some of the greatest opportunities for freedom lie in this understanding, in this learning.

The first step really is to know what we're feeling when we feel it. This is easier said than done. Our culture has not really given many of us the tools to understand our emotional landscape. I grew up in a family of Anglo-Saxon descent. We didn't talk much about our feelings around the dinner table or in warm heart-to-heart conversations between parent and child. So I grew up without much fluency around my emotions, not really knowing what they were, the range that was normal in people, how to work with them, what was okay to express and let out, what I needed to moderate in my speech and actions. I had to learn much of this on the cushion, in meditation circles, within the sangha. It's been a slow education process for me.

Often knowing what we're feeling is really harder than it sounds. Let me tell you a little story. I was practicing here on one three-month retreat, sitting in the hall during the 8:15 sit. I'd been sitting for a couple of weeks at that point and felt pretty present and mindful. I was leaving the hall to do my walking meditation. For the last two weeks I'd been walking in the same spot, down on the grass in Yogi Park. So I went out the back door of the meditation hall, very mindful—lifting, moving, placing, lifting, moving, placing—very much with my walking. I went down the steps, feeling really present.

I looked out toward my walking spot and saw somebody was already walking there. This was not supposed to happen because that was my walking place. I had practically ground my initials into the dirt by that point in the retreat. Everyone had watched me walk there for two weeks, so they should all have known that spot had my name on it.

So I was walking down to my path, still thinking I was being very mindful—lifting, moving, placing—but all these thoughts kept coming up: What are they doing there? Don't they know that's my walking path? Lifting, moving, placing, lifting, moving, placing. More thoughts came: Did I cut in front of them at breakfast this morning? Is this some kind of yogi payback? Lifting, moving, placing, lifting, moving, placing.

I kept walking and got to another walking place nearby. I started doing my back-and-forth walking, and it was a half hour into my walking period before I realized I was irritated. I thought I was so in touch—lifting, moving, placing—and I hadn't even noticed I was getting angry. That's how these states work. They come in underneath our radar. When they come in under the radar and we don't know what's happening, we're completely at their mercy.

Once I recognized I was irritated, then I could start to work with the irritation. I could name it. I could look into the thoughts that were going on around it. I could feel it in my body. I could let go of it. But until I understood that it was in operation, I was just completely caught in it.

So the first step, if we want to achieve some freedom in relation to these states, is to know what we're feeling when we're feeling it. Then essentially what we do is turn the attention away from the story of the hindrance onto the experience itself—onto the experience of the anger or the desire or whatever it might be.

In looking at an emotion like anger, start to notice that there are three parts you can tune into with any strong emotion. One is the kind of mood that comes in and colors the mind. I'd call it irritation. It could be annoyance. It could be anger. It's a particular flavor that comes out of the mind. That flavor is not a bodily thing, but the taste of it is something that comes out of the mind. That's why we call it a mental state. Notice that the flavor of anger is really different from the flavor of joy or the flavor of wanting. It has its own taste in the mind, and that's what I'd call its mood or coloring. That's one key piece, perhaps the central piece.

The second thing is that if the mood is strong, it's going to have an impact in the body. You're going to be able to feel where that emotion is expressing itself in the body.

If anger is strong, you're likely to feel a burning sensation and a sense of contraction. The contraction may be felt around the shoulders and chest, around the back. The burning and the sense of heat may be all through the trunk. So the second thing is, if it's strong at all, look in the body and feel what the physical sensation is.

Notice that these two are different components. Sometimes you'll go—let's say you're feeling anger in the chest, a contraction and a burning. You put the attention in the chest, you feel that contraction, and also there you feel strongly this coloring or the mood of anger. It's as though the sensations at that point in the chest are permeated with the flavor of anger. But notice that these are two different components. You might have the same contraction in the chest, but the emotion could be of sadness or fear. So there'd be a different coloring, a different flavor associated with the same physical sensations. Even though it feels like they're really merged—which at times they are—they have two different pieces.

It's a little bit like preparing coffee with cream. If you like cream in your coffee and you pour the cream in and drink it, you really know that's one flavor. But if you understand what the coffee tastes like separately and what the cream tastes like separately, then you understand how they're combined. Similarly, with the mood and the physical sensation, you get to know each on its own terms and you understand how they get merged in that direct experience. But they're two different pieces.

The third piece is thought. Thought plays a really central role in any difficult emotion that we are caught in. Anytime there's suffering around an emotional state, it's because thought is also playing a role. When I was walking and I saw somebody in my walking path, the thought that tripped me up was "they shouldn't be there." Or another way to say it is "they're wrong and I'm right."

These thoughts form themselves into a view or an opinion that we believe in. It's the belief, the conviction, the certainty that we're right about that which locks in the emotion. As long as I keep telling myself they're wrong to be there and I'm right, what happens with the anger? It just keeps getting built up and up, reinforced again and again. It's as though a fire is burning and every time I think that thought, I toss another log onto the fire. Let's crank the flames of anger up a little more. How do we do that? We think that thought.

If we stop thinking the thought or if we stop believing it, what happens to the emotion? It will just start to fade away. This belief or view that we have, I would call a storyline. Every strong emotion that we're gripped by, that we're caught in, that we're suffering from, is accompanied by a storyline—an unconscious belief that we've bought into that we usually haven't recognized.

In freeing ourselves from the emotion, we can work both on freedom in relation to the mood and the sensations, and freedom here means basically acceptance. Don't fight the fact that you're angry. Don't fight the fact that your body's contracted. That's just done itself. You didn't choose it, and right away it's not easy to un-choose it. Just notice that that's there and work with greater acceptance. That starts to allow things to relax. And also look at what thought you're believing that is fixing the emotion in place.

If you look at these three things—the coloring in the mind or the mood, the physical sensation, and the kind of thought that's at work—you'll pretty much have the whole view of the emotion. So pay attention in all three of those ways.

I'll talk about this a little bit in relationship to a couple of different mind states. Kamala talked very beautifully the other night about the hindrances, which is the classical list that the Buddha offered for us to look at for difficult mind states. As I look at my own experience and the experience of many yogis, I come up with a list of five emotions that I see as the most common ones that we get caught in. I'll just name what they seem to be to me: wanting, sadness, anger, self-judgment, and fear. These seem to be the ones that grip us the most tightly and form kind of the core bondages for many of us.

I thought it was interesting as I was reflecting about these—emotions are very much dependent on feeling tones. First foundation of mindfulness is the body. Second foundation of mindfulness is feeling tone or vedana, the quality of being pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. Emotions, as the third foundation, are in a way built on the second foundation, which is feeling tone. Emotions have to do usually with past and future. That's how they kind of take us out of the present and spin us into past and future. So I thought about past and future and pleasant and unpleasant.

And try this. When something pleasant has been in the past and no longer is... What's the emotional response to that situation? What does that feel like? Anybody?

Sadness. I heard someone say that. Isn't that really common? When we have lost something that was pleasant, the emotional response is sadness.

Now let's look at painful experiences in the past. What's a really common response to something that's been painful that happened in the past? Anger, isn't it? If somebody has offended us and there's a hurt underneath it, the common response is that we get angry.

What about the future? Something pleasant that's out there in the future—what's the emotional leaning? Wanting. Something unpleasant that's out there in the future—what's the emotional reaction? Fear.

So we see what I would call the big four: sadness, anger, desire, and fear. They're all built around relation to pleasant and unpleasant in the past and in the future. That's an interesting reflection on these core emotions. Self-judgment, in a way, is a particular form of anger that's directed against ourselves—so it's actually a subset.

Let me talk about a couple of these. Let's take desire as an example. Desire comes up frequently on retreat. It may be for people, places, things. Steve talked about this in The Four Noble Truths, Kamala in her talk on the hindrances.

Carol and Sally and I were in Italy a few years ago, leading a retreat. First of all, it was a lot of fun to be in Italy on the dharma side because Italians are different in dharma practice than Americans are. One of the things we noticed was there was an espresso machine right outside the dining hall. So often after lunch, after breakfast, hits of espresso going down. We were staying at a facility that was a Christian convent, and their normal retreat fare was to put out wine with lunch and dinner. So we had to ask them, please, not to do that.

Italian yogis are just different. It was hard to hold the silence as well as we hold it here, and we just kind of let that happen. The other thing I felt is that the Italians I met were quite fluent with their emotions. They often knew what they were feeling and talked about it quite easily, even when it was quite difficult.

I had an interview early on with this young guy, and he said, "I'm having trouble getting into the retreat. I've done another retreat, and it was okay, but I'm having trouble getting into this one."

I said, "Well, what's going on?"

He said, "Well, we were there in August. This is our vacation time in Italy, and I had a choice of where to go. My friends were going on a vacation in the Caribbean and invited me to go along, or I could come on this meditation retreat."

I said, "Well, why did you come here?"

He said, "All the tickets to the Caribbean were sold out." And he said, "But as I come on this retreat, I'm just thinking about my friends and all the fun that they're having there—the warm sunlight and the sandy beaches, the beautiful women of the Caribbean. And here I am just being with my breath."

I said, "Could you say that this is a case of desire?"

He said, "Yes, yes."

I said, "Well, when you're feeling desire for something, is it ever easy to be with something else?"

He said, "No, it's not."

I said, "Does the desire necessarily mean that the thing that's going on is bad?"

He said, "No, no, not necessarily."

I said, "So do you think it might be possible to let go of this desire?"

He said, "I'll try."

So a couple of days later, he came back in another interview. He had let go of the desire, and he was just here. He was settled in, he was with his breath, and then the retreat just unfolded.

But desire has this quality. When we're caught in it, we can't see what's in front of us. We can't see what's here and now. And it's not satisfying. Because one of the things you notice is, do you ever desire for what you already have? Do you ever sit there and think, "I'd really like a nose in between my eyes"? I've never had that desire reported to me. We always want what we don't have, and there's always that gap. So in desire, there's inherently this dissatisfaction.

Sometimes it's pleasant to encounter a beautiful object, but there's always in that encounter a bittersweet quality because of this gap. We can't have it right now. So it may be the desire for things outside, maybe the desire for things in retreat—particular kind of food, a particular temperature, particular weather, certain quiet in the meditation hall or in the residences, a certain kind of experience in sitting. All these things act in the same way and keep us from being at ease with the way things are. It's one of the functions of desire.

So what's the storyline of desire? I would put it something like this. You can look and see different forms of desire might have a little bit different stories, but it's something like, "I can't be happy because I don't have this." Something like that. That there's a belief that if we had that, we would be happy, and without it, we can't be.

In coming into feeling desire in the body, I think you can find that even if desire is subtle—it may be a desire for a concentrated state of mind, it's not a very big or blatant wanting—there's a kind of leaning or tension that we can feel in the body. This started to be a clue to me when I was looking at what's making the sense of friction. If the body was kind of leaning forward or I felt some tension, that would sort of clue me in that a desire was present, and then I'd try to look and see what is the desire for. And once I saw it, then I was better able to release that desire.

I talked a little about anger earlier, opening to the feeling of anger, really letting it be there and be fully expressed in the body and in the mind without acting on it. So we find with emotions that there is the possibility of finding a middle way between suppression and expression. Often from a Western psychological point of view, we may be told, "Well, if you don't suppress the emotion, then you really need to express it." But in meditation, we can find a middle path.

We're not suppressing because we let ourselves feel it completely, but we also don't have to express. We don't have to go out and get mad at anybody. We don't have to behave in such a way that we are aggressive or offensive. We can feel the emotion very strongly. There's no suppression, but we don't have to act on it.

And then take a look. Anger is almost always accompanied by some thoughts of blame—what someone else did that was wrong. Now, the interesting thing is those thoughts of blame may be accurate. Somebody may have done something that was wrong. There's a lot of wrong going on in the world. You know, all over the place, terrible things happen. Wars and murder and racism, oppression and exploitation, abuse on a personal level. These things are not right. They're not appropriate. And if they've been done to us, we are justified in saying that wasn't right. It was not a right action.

The thing to look at if we want to release suffering is: does holding on to that conviction free our own heart or not? Is there a way that we can know that something wasn't right, but not hold on to the sense of blame about it? It's almost like there's a quiet conviction. The action was wrong. It was hurtful. It hurt us. It doesn't feel good. Somehow the person doesn't understand. Maybe they haven't apologized. But how can we release that burning that's in our own heart of the resentment?

What happens if we just stop thinking the blaming thoughts? Instead of adding more fuel to the fire, we simply don't add any more fuel and then see if the fire dies by its own accord.

So it's not to excuse what the other person has done. It's not to condone it. It's not to say it was right. It's not to overlook our own hurt. And often in daily life, in societal conditions, it may be very important to express the sense of injustice or harm that was done on an individual level, on a group level. But at the same time, can we do it in a way that our own heart is not burning with resentment and blame? So that we're inwardly free, even as we recognize the other person's unskillful actions. See if that's possible.

The Dalai Lama tells a story of a monk that he knew when he lived in Tibet in 1959, before he fled to India as a result of the Chinese invasion. The Dalai Lama remembered him as rather an ordinary monk. Many years later, he met up with him again after this monk had been in prison—in a Chinese prison during the years of occupation. He had spent more than twenty years in prison and finally escaped to India, where he was able to meet with the Dalai Lama.

The Dalai Lama, of course, was concerned about his welfare, so he asked him how his time had been in prison. The monk said, "Well, I felt that I was in danger." The Dalai Lama jumped to the assumption that perhaps he had been tortured, so he said to the monk, "Do you mean that you were tortured?" The monk answered, "Yes, I was tortured, but that's not what I meant. I meant that I was in danger of getting angry at my captors."

This illustrates the kind of potential of the practice—to be in prison, to be tortured, and to be able to so hold one's own balance of mind that one doesn't slide into anger. Why? Because of the suffering—the suffering for ourselves and the suffering for others. This is a possibility.

When anger is directed against ourselves, it comes across as self-judgment. This is one of the very, very strong and unnecessary sufferings that we have in the West. So many of us grow up with this sense of not being good enough and think thoughts about ourselves that deprecate us. We believe in these thoughts, are more harshly critical of ourselves than we would ever be of anyone else, or than we would let anyone else be of us. Often when it gets quiet in a retreat, the voice that kind of percolates to the surface is this self-judging voice.

One of our students in California—Sally and I worked with a number of older students and had a group with them for a few years—was discussing this tendency to judgment. She said, "You know, it started off very realistically. Somebody called me up and said they didn't want to see me as their therapist anymore." She was this person's therapist and they ended the relationship. "My first thought was, 'Well, it just wasn't the right fit between me and this person.' And then I thought, 'Why wasn't it the right fit?' And I thought, 'Oh, I didn't have enough compassion for them.' And 'Why didn't I have enough compassion?' 'Oh, I'm really not a compassionate person.' 'Oh, why am I not a compassionate person?' 'Well, my heart is really closed and tight and I'm really not a good person at all.'"

This is kind of the way self-judgments go. They spiral from one incident that is understandable and rational, but then we overgeneralize until we're making these blanket kinds of generalizations about ourselves that no longer hold truth. It wasn't true that she wasn't a good person. It wasn't true she wasn't compassionate. She'd been a therapist for many years. She was compassionate and caring. But she convinced herself in that moment that she wasn't.

How to work with judging? The first thing is just to see the judgment when it comes and feel the pain of it. Sometimes a few thoughts in a row will come and it's like we're putting arrows into our heart. Let yourself feel the pain of that judging. I think until we feel the pain we're causing ourselves, we're not motivated enough to let go. But when we feel the pain, maybe then we can bring in some mercy and just realize we shouldn't suffer like this. It's not needed, and it's not justified.

So tuning into the pain, and if possible, feeling that compassion, that sense of mercy for yourself. We don't need to do it to ourselves. Notice the judging thoughts—you might just make a note: "judging." Joseph Goldstein has this little tip that lightens it for him.

He adds a phrase, "and the sky is blue." Oh, I'm a crummy meditator and the sky is blue. And it just puts a little bit of smile into the sentence. So you can try that.

The other thing I find very helpful is to question those thoughts. Is that true that you're a crummy meditator? I mean, who can really say that that's true? When I think about what makes a good meditator, I think about how sincere is the person. Are they sincerely trying to learn? Are they sincerely trying to look at their own areas of bondage and come to greater freedom? And anyone who would undergo a schedule like this is very sincere, in my opinion.

So I think you all are great meditators. All of you that I have met with are great meditators, from that point of view of heart sincerity, devotion, faith, commitment, strength, perseverance—many beautiful qualities. So question these judgments. The ones that hurt aren't true.

One way to work is to make them tell you the truth. It's like there's a judge there who's putting these oppressive thoughts on you. Turn around and tell the judge, "Say it in a way that's true. I'm not going to leave until you tell me the truth." And by the time you express it in a way that's true—oh, I was not with the breath for a ten-minute stretch. Oh, okay, big deal. Doesn't mean I'm a crummy meditator.

The bottom line of the storyline with self-judging is usually something like, "I'm not good enough," or "I'm not lovable," or "No one can love me." And when we believe that, when we buy into it, it's a very oppressive burden that we carry largely unconsciously. We may not even know it's there. And only when it starts to lift can we feel what a weight that's been on our shoulders.

Practice of metta and compassion for oneself are very helpful with self-judging. We'll talk more about working with other states as we go.

I wanted to leave you with one technique that has proved very helpful for me and many people we've shared this with. It's a technique called RAIN, and it was formulated by another Vipassana teacher. It's an acronym, R-A-I-N, that reminds us what steps to take when a difficult emotion is coming and we feel we're struggling with it.

The steps are recognition, acceptance, interest, and non-identification.

Briefly: recognize the emotion that's being felt—fear, sadness, desire, whatever it is. Accept the experience. There's not something positive you have to do to accept. It just means stop resisting it. Stop thinking it's wrong. Stop trying to make it go away. Stop trying to deny it. But open and let yourself feel it with a really allowing and accepting frame of mind. Just let it be there.

Third step: become interested. Can you have a child's curiosity about this emotion, like you're feeling it for the first time? Notice how children can be playing happily away, laughing and joking, and then all of a sudden they'll say something that is in conflict with another child, and they'll turn to anger in a moment and have a big fight. Then a few minutes later that's all gone and they're laughing and joking again.

Kids have this amazing fluidity with their emotions. They're not afraid of moving through that range. So what would it be like to be a child feeling anger or feeling fear? And you go, "Wow, what is this?" Like it's never been felt before. And you just want to open up and say, "What does this feel like? How does this feel in the body? How does it feel in the mind? What kind of thoughts come when I'm like this? How do I regard the world? How do I feel about myself and other people?" Just exploring it.

That interest is such a wholesome factor that it can totally shift your resistance and aversion toward the emotion.

The last point is non-identification—not claiming these states as me or mine. All these emotional experiences are not uniquely yours. They're part of the whole human package. Everybody knows these qualities: fear and loss and despair, agitation, insecurity, anger and resentment. Because they're part of the whole human package, it doesn't mean that you've done anything wrong by feeling them. We all have these things. It's just part of our makeup.

So can there be just seeing this as another arising? An emotion arises, persists for a while, and passes away. No need to claim it or identify with it. When we can see it that way without the label of "I," it's much lighter—just one of many mental states described in the Abhidhamma, experienced previously by the Buddha and by every human that's lived. It's arising and living now in us, but the beautiful thing is it also will pass.

This is why it's safe to open, because each of these states that arises will also pass away. This is why we can open and accept, because ultimately they won't harm us. If we don't struggle with them, they can't harm us.

I'll close with this poem by Rainer Maria Rilke. A little background: it was written when he was in his early twenties, during a very spiritual phase—an overtly Christian phase. He imagines that before each of us is fashioned by God the Creator, God has a short conversation with us before sending us into existence.

"God speaks to each of us as he makes us, then walks with us silently into the night. These are the words we dimly hear: You, sent out beyond your memory, go to the limits of your longing. Embody me. Flare up like flame and make big shadows I can move in. Let everything happen to you, beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final. Don't let yourself lose me. Nearby is the country they call life. You will know it by its seriousness. Now, give me your hand."

Let's just sit for a moment, please.

Let everything happen to you, beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 24

Money as Dhamma Practice

Guy Armstrong · 16 min

> In this thought-provoking dharma talk, senior teacher Guy Armstrong examines the Buddha's nuanced teachings on wealth and money, drawing distinctions between guidance for monastics and laypeople. Armstrong addresses common patterns he observes among meditators - from anxiety about scarcity to overspending without awareness - and offers the middle way as a path to financial sanity.
>
> The discussion explores how lay practitioners, who the Buddha described as 'enjoyers of sense pleasures,' can use wealth skillfully for genuine well-being rather than mere gratification. Armstrong emphasizes the Buddha's teaching that laypeople should use their resources to make themselves and their families happy while also supporting others and spiritual practice. He distinguishes between spending that contributes to development, health, and connection versus acquisitions that only feed desire.
>
> Particularly relevant during economic uncertainty, this talk offers practical wisdom on finding contentment regardless of financial circumstances, remembering the Buddha's teaching that 'contentment is the greatest wealth.' Armstrong concludes by highlighting dāna (generosity) as a key practice for those with financial resources, while noting that giving can also take the form of time and service for those with limited means.

Hello, Sangha News listeners.

This is Baba Goliath, IMS's Executive Director, and I'm happy to have with me today Guy Armstrong, one of our senior and guiding teachers here at IMS.

Hello, Guy. Welcome.

Thank you. Nice to be here.

Guy began his practice of insight meditation over thirty years ago, and at one point in his life, he trained as a Buddhist monk in Thailand with Ajahn Buddhadasa. In 1984, he began teaching and he leads retreats worldwide and is also a governing teacher at our sister center in California, Spirit Rock. Each fall, he is part of the teaching team for IMS's annual three-month retreat, as well as leading other courses here from time to time.

While Guy was here at IMS for this year's three-month course, he gave a presentation to our staff on the Buddha's teachings in regard to money and wealth. Many of us found it thought-provoking, even challenging, I might add. And we thought that members of our wider community might find his reflections on this topic interesting as well.

So again, Guy, thank you for being here and taking on this topic with us. Let me start by asking—you've led lots of retreats and you've certainly had relationships with many, many people who are meditators. What do you find the attitudes about money and financial matters among meditators about this broad topic?

Very much as you would find in the world as a whole, I'd say with one exception—and that is that I don't see in many meditators this kind of obsessive greed for more and more money that you sometimes see in the outer society. I'm thinking of banking executives who object strongly if even a small fraction of their hundred million dollar bonus is threatened.

Most meditators don't subscribe to the idea that money alone can buy happiness. We've seen through some of the false allure of consumerism. But in some cases, then, meditators in moving away from money may have overshot in the other direction and have not quite made a clear relationship to what constitutes enough money, or clearly how to relate to money.

So more commonly with meditators, I find a degree of fear and anxiety over not having enough, and sometimes a certain amount of denial or delusion, not coming to terms in making a clear relationship with money.

Guy, when you say that meditators might be deluded a bit about their relationship with money, can you expand upon that? What do you mean by that?

Yeah, it's kind of an attitude of not really coming to terms with the reality of money in their lives. And I see it a little bit differently with someone who's more of a greedy temperament and someone who's a little more of an aversive temperament.

So greedy types, in relation to money, tend to like to spend. They like to be surrounded by beautiful things, so they enjoy money in order to spend to surround themselves with beauty and happiness and pleasures. When delusion comes in to the kind of greedy temperament often what happens is they spend but they don't look at the impact on their bank balance or their credit card bill or their loans. And so they may tend to overspend and then they find they've got an unsustainable living style and credit card bills that are going to take a long time to repay and that's really burdensome and really worrisome.

Then with aversive types who don't want to deal with money, the mind state that tends to predominate is fear and anxiety. There's sort of always a worry about, "I won't have enough, I won't have enough," and then that can lead to stinginess—not a sense of liberality or ease or generosity, but being kind of tight around the whole area of money.

But when we can get clear about how much we need and we take care to provide that amount and then to spend it thoughtfully, that's kind of the middle way of what I would call sanity in relation to wealth. I think that's the wisdom factor coming into our relation. It's helpful to know whether we tend to greed or tend to aversion and then to find the middle way.

Guy, as you know, economic times, especially for the last couple of years, have been quite unusual and difficult for many, many people. There are many people who don't have work. And you were talking here about relationship to money and so on. And there are people who right now, of course, are really struggling and don't have enough money. Can you say a little bit about how practice and understanding of money that practice might lead to might apply in that situation?

Sure. It's a good question, and a lot of people are in that situation now because of this economy. Two things come to mind.

One is that in any situation someone is in, from a Dharma perspective, the most important thing to look at is what is our relationship to money and our attitudes to money. So if there's a sense of real insufficiency, how are we relating to that? Usually it's gonna trigger fear and anxiety, worry about not having enough, and that may be a reality for people. The more that someone can be comfortable with the emotions that that provokes through the practice of mindfulness, acceptance, allowing of the emotion, understanding with wisdom—emotions come and go, sometimes present, not always present—the more that will help them be more comfortable, more settled in their relationship to money itself. This is true of kind of any aspect of life.

The second thing I think about is that meditators, those who've come to IMS have had the experience of being on retreat and living a very simple, you might even say Spartan or somewhat ascetic lifestyle and finding in that really simple lifestyle, great deal of contentment and richness.

For me, that provides a really good bottom line that if I end up being poor, I've got practice to support me. The Buddha said that contentment is the greatest wealth. And sometimes it's helpful to reflect that even if we lose most of our material prosperity, if we have the requisites of food, clothing, and shelter, and we have our practice, we can find contentment.

How are the Buddha's comments on the relationship to money, coming to terms with money, if you will, different for laypeople and for monastics?

It's interesting because you get two very different sets of advice from the Buddha. For monastics who are unable to handle money at all, the message is very clear. It's not a contributor to their path. In fact, monks and nuns can't handle money, but they can have possessions. If you go into a monastery, you'll see that monks have robes, bowls.

They may have a nice cottage and a number of books. These days, they can own computers and work on computers.

Just as an example of this kind of wealth with monastics, my wife Sally and I took a pilgrimage last fall to the Buddhist holy sites in India. While we were in Bodh Gaya, there was a group of monks, I think they were from Thailand, chanting under the Bodhi tree. This happens all the time—there's always a group of monks or nuns chanting there. As they were chanting, we noticed a monk with a laptop propped up on a wall, who had turned his webcam to the group of monks chanting, was logged into Skype and was broadcasting a live video of the event via his cellular modem plugged into a USB port, presumably to some friends or monastery back in Thailand. So here was an amazing example of monks using modern technology for dharma purposes.

So the question of wealth in the monastic community the Buddha addressed by saying that gain or possessions, honor and fame are dreadful, bitter and vile for monastics because they can be obstructions to liberation.

But the Buddha had a very different set of messages directed to the lay practitioners of his time. In this quote from one of the suttas, you get a sense that having wealth as a lay person can be a very good thing. He says that the wise one gathers wealth just as the bee gathers honey, and it grows like an ant hill higher yet. With wealth so gained, the lay person can devote it to his people's good. So for lay people, the idea is that one can have money and do good things with it.

When the Buddha talks about how lay people should use their wealth, he singles out a few key points. He says that lay people should use their wealth to make themselves and their families happy and pleased. I think this is a really beautiful thing for us as lay people to know—that we are free under the Buddha's direction to use our wealth to make ourselves happy and our loved ones happy. That takes away the idea of having to be really tight or stingy around money. And the other thing he said is that we can use our money to do good for others. So for those in need, to support spiritual life, of course, to support dharma centers, is a very good way to use wealth.

Given what you just said about the obstruction to liberation for monks, why wouldn't that very same thing apply to lay people who are also practicing with the intention of full realization or liberation?

Well, that's a great question and I think it hits on an important point. In our community today, many of us are really somewhere between monks and ordinary lay people as described by the Buddha. A lot of the lay people in the time of the Buddha weren't dedicated practitioners. They practiced generosity, ethics, loving kindness. Maybe they were more interested in creating merit for a better rebirth than for attaining liberation.

But in our situation today, a lot of our practitioners are very intent on developing the Eightfold Path, which leads to liberation. So the question then is, if you are such a practitioner, how do you interpret the monastic guidelines of the Buddha and the lay guidelines of the Buddha in relation to wealth? I think the answer is you need to find yourself somewhere in the middle and create your own Middle Way based on drawing some values from one and some values from the other.

In this regard, the Buddha said something I find really valuable about lay practitioners. He said, this is for someone who's actually on the path, on the Eightfold Path, that such a lay practitioner should use their wealth without being tied to it or infatuated with it, not blindly absorbed with it, seeing the danger in it and understanding the escape. So such a meditator will use wealth where it serves them and serves the path, but doesn't have an obsessive relationship to it. They understand the danger of obsession. They understand that the escape is in not being attached to the wealth that they have, and they use it in wise ways.

Well, of course, one of the other ways that we use wealth is for sense pleasures. And in one sutta, the Pali word for householders or lay people literally means enjoyers of sense pleasures. So how can we better gauge the difference between using our financial resources for wholesome happiness and pleasure—an action which the Buddha said is praiseworthy—and self-indulgence, which is giving into the impulse to get more and more?

I think the line there is something that each of us needs to find for ourselves. But one of the criteria that I've been reflecting on is that when money is used to further one's well-being, one's development, certainly one's sustenance, that's money well used. So money spent on our health, on our inner growth and development, and for those around us—such as going on retreats, seeing doctors, taking care of healing, education and learning. Those are really good uses of money, and hopefully they'll give us pleasure and well-being also.

Enjoying a good meal with friends where the object is really the sense of camaraderie and connection is a wonderful thing to share. And then we see other spending options—like adding the seventy-fifth pair of shoes to our closet that we realize is just kind of gratifying some desire, but it doesn't really make a contribution to well-being. And those we could see in the Buddha's guidelines as being unnecessary. So I think the crux is, does it contribute to well-being, or is it only about gratification?

One other thing is that I know generosity is fundamental to the Buddhist teachings, but how does this particular quality connect with our relationship to money and other forms of wealth? And how does it impact our practice and our lives?

I think one of the great advantages of having some money is that one is in a position to be generous. And I know often at the end of retreats, yogis love the sense of being able to give to the teachers or to the center, to the scholarship fund, to support other people being able to enjoy the retreat experience. And this is one of the key ways that the Buddha encouraged us to use wealth as lay people.

Similarly, if one doesn't have money, sometimes one wishes that one had more in order to share. Although I'd like to say that, in my understanding, the idea of giving can also be in terms of one's time and energy. So even meditators who don't have a lot of money can offer their services as volunteers.

set aside resources for others and helping to run centers or other enterprises.

I think it's really important to consider giving as we look at our annual budget. What do we want to give away? In the old Christian tradition, there was often the practice of tithing—giving ten percent. While we haven't thought in those specific terms or put out any given percentage, I always consider it an important part of my annual spending to have a certain amount go to supporting the things I care about.

The practice of generosity transforms our relationship with money from one of grasping to one of flowing. When we give, we practice letting go. We remind ourselves that these resources are not truly "ours" in any permanent sense, and we experience the joy that comes from supporting what we value most deeply. This practice of dana becomes a form of meditation in action, cultivating the very qualities of non-attachment and loving-kindness that we develop on the cushion.

Whether through financial gifts, volunteer service, or simply the generous offering of our presence and attention to others, we can use our relationship with resources as a path of awakening. In this way, our money and possessions become not obstacles to spiritual development, but opportunities to express our deepest values and to practice the art of letting go.

CHAPTER 25

An Attitude of Mindfulness

Guy Armstrong · 52 min

In this opening retreat talk, Guy Armstrong emphasizes that the attitude we bring to meditation practice is even more important than technical details. Drawing from the Burmese teacher Sayadaw U Tejaniya's approach, he presents a simple framework: "relax, observe, allow." Armstrong explains how to check our attitude by asking whether greed, aversion, or delusion (the three kilesas) are present in the mind through three practical questions: Am I wanting something to happen that's not happening? Am I resisting something that's happening? Am I not knowing what's happening?

The talk provides clear definitions of consciousness (viññāṇa) versus mindfulness (sati), explaining how mindfulness is the intelligent knowing of present-moment experience that distinguishes human practice from mere animal consciousness. Armstrong emphasizes that any of the six sense doors can serve as valid objects for mindfulness—the breath is not privileged over body sensations, sounds, or thoughts. He concludes by connecting this practice attitude to Sāriputta's definition of nibbāna as "the destruction of greed, hatred, and delusion," showing how right attitude in meditation offers a foretaste of ultimate freedom.

This is quite a baptism you're getting today with the rainstorm. But I think there's something about the elements whipping it up for us that speaks to the purification, the degree of purification that you'll be receiving from the retreat. So I think it's actually a favorable omen once you get dry.

Tonight I want to talk about two different things. I want to discuss the technical aspects of what we're doing here and why we're doing what we're doing, because I find on the first day of a long retreat, I always forget if I'm sitting and give myself about twenty other different things that are much more important that I should be doing instead. So I wanted to remind us of what we're about here.

But before I do that and get into some of the more technical aspects of the practice, I wanted to talk about the spirit that we bring to undertaking meditation. You could say the attitude that we approach our practice with. This attitude that we approach with is probably even more important than the technical details of how we carry on the practice. So I think it's really helpful to try and reflect on our attitude at the beginning, because if we set that straight, then the other things tend to fall into place a lot more easily.

So on the spirit of Dharma practice, Suzuki Roshi, the founder of San Francisco Zen Center, had a wonderful reminder. He said, we want to be serious, but we don't want to be too serious. Because if we get too serious, we lose the joy of discovery that the practice is all about. But if we're not serious enough, we don't quite apply ourselves well. And we'll see this kind of balance running throughout Dharma instructions, and I'll touch on it a couple more times in the talk.

At the beginning of a long retreat, it tends to draw dedicated people, dedicated meditators, who often have a lot of zeal. And so at the beginning of a long retreat, some people may approach this kind of experience with an eye toward achieving something —something great, enlightenment, or seventh jhana, or some experience of bliss or deep peace that we remembered from an earlier retreat. We're very fired up, and we're going to make our way straight there. We know it's just around the corner if we just push a little harder. We're going to get there.

But that kind of pressure that we put ourselves under eventually ends up making us feel tight, tense, and it wears us out. I brought a lot of this attitude to my early years of practice. And I remember some years ago going to see a psychic. I'd been in California for a while, and that's what Californians do. Every once in a while, you should do it, like renewing your driver's license—check in with a psychic.

So I went to see this psychic in San Francisco that a number of my friends had recommended. And I went in to see him. And almost the first thing that he did and said, he sort of drew back in his chair, sort of recoiling from my energy. And he said, "Wow, you are in such a hurry to get there. Don't you know that God comes more often to those who don't want him so badly?"

And that was a comment that I really took in and reflected on because I've always had a lot of zeal for practice and the journey and the exploration that sometimes gets a little too goal-oriented. That's what he was picking up on and reflecting back to me.

So this kind of attitude where we definitely want some specific experience, we want some form of outcome, some special state to happen, will eventually tie us up in knots and tire us out. But if we're too loose also, then the path just doesn't unfold. There's a temptation on a day like today to say, "Wow, it was such hard work to get here. Now I've gotten here. I think I'll go to bed till the rain's over. And wake me in a few days. And when the sun comes back out, I'll check the hall out again. But this is too much today."

So that kind of attitude doesn't really bring the energy that will let the path open up for us. Somewhere in between, we have to find the proper attitude, this balanced attitude of interest and engagement, but at the same time, moment by moment, feeling a sense of peace or ease.

So one teacher expressed this right attitude in a very short phrase, which I like a lot. He said the practice is "relax, observe, allow." That's it. Relax, observe, allow. And this is a really nice summation of what we're about here.

So the first part, relax—you've heard us mention this quite a few times already. It really is key to the unfolding of mindfulness. When we relax, we're sending a strong message to our whole system. And the message is: things are okay already. When we can relax and be comfortable with the present moment, we don't feel under any kind of pressure. We don't feel we have to change anything or make anything happen. That very inclination of mind that says relax, I believe, sends a strong signal to the whole nervous system that says, "Okay, calm down, no fuss, no worries, just be here."

Things don't have to be perfect for us to relax. We can relax if things are just kind of good enough.

This has become a new mantra for me in practice: "Maybe this is good enough." And if I can relax in it as it is, it's good enough to start meditating.

The second piece then is observe. Once we find ourselves in a somewhat relaxed place—it doesn't need to be perfectly relaxed, just incline the mind in that direction—then we start to get interested or curious. Okay, what's going on? What's happening now? What's happening in the body? What's happening in the mind? What's happening in the environment? We bring that kind of awake attention to our experience.

This interest of observation is what starts to burn through the fog of the mind's wanderings. We realize that once we get interested in observing, we cut through the tendency to drift away into analyzing or planning or past or future or fantasy. And we develop an interest in how things are right now. It's that interest that keeps connecting us to the present moment.

So we observe our body and how we're relating to it, our mind and emotions and how we're relating to them, the environment and how we're relating to them. I want to talk in much more detail about this activity of observing, but just for now, as I'm sure you already know, this is the central thing that we're doing.

Then the third part of the string—relax, observe—is allow. This means that whatever our experience is in that moment, we let it be just the way it is. In the observation, we don't try to make it turn out a certain way. That would be like Edison doing his experiments on the light bulb and trying to read the data in an unbalanced way, or Einstein looking for confirmation of the general theory of relativity and interpreting the data in a distorted way that came in from the experimental physicists who followed up his predictions. We don't want to put a thumb on the balance pan. We want to see it just the way it is. So we want to allow things to be the way they are.

We learn fairly soon in meditation we can't control very much anyway. Everything arises from past causes and conditions, and in this moment they couldn't be any other way than the way they are. When we try to change them, which we do continually, this is not a random or occasional activity. It is more or less our constant activity that we start to see as we observe. We're always trying to make things turn out a certain way. We want the body to feel a certain way. We want the mind to behave in a certain way. We don't want thoughts to arise. We want the attention to stay steady, and so on.

Over time through meditation, we may get a little bit of skill in this area of control. But it's very limited. And ultimately, we realize we don't have the ability to influence things in a very big way. We find that our tendency to exert control so continually carries a high price. And the price is our freedom. We give away our peace of mind by always trying to structure the outcome.

This is not a small thing. You probably know the term samsara, which refers to the round of continual birth and death that human beings and all other sentient beings are engaged in, a round that eventually brings us into intense forms of unhappiness. The Tibetans say that this round is sustained by our tendency to correct. So this ongoing attempt to adjust things to be exactly right is the essence of samsara. It's the essence of this round.

So what's the essence of peace? Allowing. This is the way out. This is the way into release—allowing things to be the way they are.

We want to find an attitude that can align with this understanding. And the fortunate thing is that there's a very nice and simple way to check our attitude. In sharing this, I want to acknowledge a debt to the Burmese teacher Sayadaw Utejaniya, whom a number of us have practiced with over the last year and longer in some cases. So I'm going to share a little bit now of what we've learned from Sayadaw Utejaniya.

He said the question we need to be asking in order to find this right attitude is: In this moment, is there greed, aversion, or delusion in my mind? These qualities—greed, aversion, and delusion—are what are called in Pali kilesas, sometimes translated as poisons. The Buddha called them the roots of what is unskillful, the roots of what leads to suffering.

The troubles of our own life and the troubles of the world are all due to the presence in human minds of these three factors. So is there greed, is there aversion, is there delusion in our mind in any given moment?

Fortunately, Sayadaw Utejaniya also gave us an easy way to answer this question. He said, am I wanting something to happen that's not happening? If so, there's greed in the mind. Am I resisting something that's happening? If so, there's aversion in the mind. Am I not knowing what's happening? And if so, there's delusion in the mind.

Now, delusion has many layers. This is not the entirety of the meaning of delusion, but it's a way in for us and a way to check. So notice: Do you want something to happen that isn't happening? Are you resisting something that's happening? Are you not knowing what's happening—meaning, is the attention lost in some string of thought?

The recommendation is that as you're paying attention to any object within the field of your experience, very frequently during your sitting, during your walking, in the informal times of practice throughout the day, you turn your attention back and check on your attitude. So throughout the day, the phenomena of your experience are anchoring your attention in the present moment. But your investigation is always partly directed to this question of: Where am I coming from? How am I approaching this moment? How am I relating?

Because truly, what is happening in our experience is not as deeply important as the way that we're relating to it. And this is the way that we learn about how we're relating, moment after moment.

Just some really simple examples. Am I wanting something to happen? I was sitting the other day in meditation and I noticed that I was looking for my body sensations to line up in a certain pattern that I associated with ease and comfort. I was trying all sorts of little shifts of attention and focus and energy to make that happen. And I realized this isn't helpful. This is just acting out greed. It's not practicing mindfulness so much as it's practicing greed.

That insight spelled itself out in my thought as "I can't control the body." When that insight spelled itself out—I can't control the body—all of a sudden I stopped trying. At that moment, the mind relaxed and then the body relaxed. It didn't line itself up in the pattern I was looking for, which was interesting. But it found its own configuration, its natural way of being, which was even more suitable. Because, of course, the body knows how to take care of itself if we just let it.

Or, am I resisting something that's happening? First days of retreat are usually really great opportunities to look at the mind that resists because there are the old companions of physical discomfort as we sit hour after hour, restlessness of mind that doesn't want to stay in the present moment, sleepiness which dulls our body and dulls our observation and makes us want to just curl up in bed—not to mention dealing with adjustment to the new facility, wondering what work meditation is going to turn out to be like, when we're going to get to take a shower during the day, whether we're going to get to sleep at night with all these new people around us, and all of that going on.

So you can just begin to notice when the resistance is present that it's there. It's not that it's wrong or that we need to judge ourselves for its being there. Simply the act of noticing will start to interact with these forces of greed, aversion, and delusion. And eventually it's the noticing, the clear paying attention, that starts to purify them from the heart and mind.

So we aim to have our meditation practice be one that our good friend Sylvia Boorstein calls "meditation without agenda and without struggle." We don't come into meditation with an agenda of something specific happening that we want to see happen, and we don't struggle with things the way they're turning out. We find that way of allowing things to reveal themselves just the way they are.

I'd like to talk now in a little more detail about this middle step of observation, which is really the heart of our meditation practice. In order to talk about it in some detail, I want to explain some of the terms that we use and how we use them.

When you reflect on your basic situation as a human being or as a sentient being from a Buddhist point of view, I wonder what occurs to you or how you would see it. What's our fundamental human situation that applies to all of us—all human beings that live, Buddhas, bodhisattvas, as well as unawakened beings? What's true for all of us? What makes up a sentient being?

One way that the Buddha described it is that we are continually experiencing phenomena of six types corresponding to the six sense doors. As long as we are awake—and I just mean that in a physical sense, we're not physically asleep or unconscious—we're going to be seeing, hearing, tasting, smelling, touching through the five physical senses, and through the mind door, we're going to be thinking and feeling. Thoughts and emotions are primarily what make up the activities in the mind, which is considered the sixth sense in the Buddhist teachings.

This is true for all of us. Do you have a choice about this? Could you decide to just throw an inner switch and turn off hearing or turn off feeling body sensations?

Not really. These things just happen. Sometimes they're pleasurable, sometimes they're unpleasant. And that revolving door of pleasant and unpleasant is essentially what creates all the turmoil in our hearts and minds, because we don't want that constant change. We want some security.

Nonetheless, all sentient beings are subject to a continual exposure to experience at all the six senses—sometimes pleasant, sometimes not. Being sentient means that we're registering them. We are very sensitive, sentient beings. So the appearances at the six sense doors impact us in their pleasant and unpleasant aspects. They impinge on us, and there's no way to stop that.

Sometimes this is experienced as quite a frustrating situation, a desperate situation—that we are vulnerable in that way to the impingement of all these experiences and, as the Buddha pointed out many times, always at the mercy of aging, illness, and death. So this is our basic experience as human beings.

All these things are happening, and because we're sentient, we're experiencing them, or you could say we're knowing them. Knowing not in any verbal or conceptual sense, but knowing in the sense of receiving, feeling, sensing, experiencing, directly having the impact of them.

This bare kind of knowing, which just receives sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and mental events, is what in Buddhism is called consciousness. The Pali term is vijñāna. And this is the basic ground of our experience. This is the field that our meditation is based in—the field of the six types of knowing and their sense objects.

Just two things to notice about this: It happens all the time involuntarily, and it doesn't take any particular intelligence to be receiving this. We receive it. Small children and babies receive it. Presumably dogs and cats and all the creatures in the animal realm receive some form of these six sense objects. So it doesn't take any intelligence. Consciousness is a mental faculty of knowing experience that's quite automatic.

The next level up in terms of mental cognizance—a step up from consciousness—is the quality that we call mindfulness. Mindfulness, as you well know, is what our meditation practice is all about. So what is mindfulness? It's more than consciousness, because the understanding is that we have the capacity to be mindful, but it's not always there. So unlike consciousness, which is always present as long as we're awake, mindfulness is not. It's sometimes there and it's sometimes not there. If we want it to be there more, which is considered generally a good idea in Buddhism, we have to make a little bit of effort. Consciousness doesn't require any effort.

So what is mindfulness? Let's call it the quality of mind that knows what our experience is in the present moment. Let's take that as at least a working definition for mindfulness as we'll be exploring it together during this month: knowing what our experience is in the present moment.

For instance, if you're breathing in and you know that you're breathing in, you're being mindful. If you breathe in but you don't know you're breathing in or anything else, you're not being mindful. If you have a strong pain, let's say in the knee, and you recognize it as a painful body sensation, you're being mindful. If you have a strong pain but your attention is somewhere else, you're not being mindful, at least of that.

The word that we're translating as mindfulness in the Pali language that the teachings came down in is sati. The original meaning before the Buddha started teaching was simply remembering. Now this is kind of curious—how does this connect with mindfulness? A nice word that kind of connects the two is the practice of recollection. When we come back into the present moment, we're kind of recollecting what's going on. We're recollecting why we're here. We're recollecting that we're a human being engaged in understanding our experience. So the sense of remembering is remembering to come back, remembering to come into the present moment.

This kind of knowing that happens in mindfulness is a step up from consciousness in both the effort required and the intelligence required. We have to be a little bit smart to know, oh, that's an in-breath. That's a body sensation. That's a sound. That's a mood of sadness. So there's some intelligence going on in mindfulness that is not found in consciousness.

We could say that consciousness reveals the experience, while mindfulness understands what it is, or understands what's going on. It's considered, for example, that dogs don't have the capacity for mindfulness. They certainly have the capacity for consciousness and activity, but they lack this capacity for mindfulness. I would suggest, although I don't know, that small babies or infants also don't have the capacity for mindfulness. They're very present moment oriented, but they lack this capacity to understand what they're experiencing because they're just completely involved with the experience.

Joseph Goldstein has this nice analogy that he calls "black lab consciousness" to illustrate the difference between consciousness and mindfulness. You ever watch a black lab go about its business? Labs are pretty impulsive creatures. So there's a smell. Do you imagine that the lab goes, "Hmm, I'm receiving a smell through the nose door of consciousness. That's a pleasant smell. The image of meat is arising in the mind, and the image of my food bowl is arising in the mind. Those have a pleasant feeling tone, and I'm starting to feel a desire. Therefore, would it be skillful to walk over to my food bowl and see if someone has deposited some meat in it?"

That doesn't seem to be the way that black labs function. It's more like: smell, smell, smell, desire, desire, desire, go, go, go, go, go. The black lab is kind of running on autopilot, lacking this capacity for self-knowledge, understanding, and reflection.

Truth to tell, it's not just the black lab that is operating in this way. When we look at the chaos in the world and we see the vast reach of greed and hatred, we realize that a lot of the world is running on autopilot in this same way, too—to not very wholesome outcomes. The difference for us is that we have the capacity to know smells and pleasantness and images and feelings, whether it's desire or aversion or whatever, and then to make choices about action based on what's going to be skillful. This is a higher level of intelligence than simple consciousness. This is the role that mindfulness plays.

Another way mindfulness is sometimes described is by comparison to a movie. When you go to a movie and you're sitting there, you may be very engaged in the playing out of the movie—in the images, the characters, the story, the plot line. And in that engagement, you may not be thinking at all of past or future or life outside. So in a way, you're quite present moment oriented. But how often do you remember that you're sitting and that you're in a movie? Sometimes it doesn't happen very often because the movie is so compelling.

So that moment of recognizing, "Oh, I'm in a movie"—that's a moment of mindfulness. The rest of it is engaged consciousness. It may be involving, but it doesn't have that capacity of reflective awareness that's mirroring what our activity is.

Also, what happens when a moment of mindfulness comes into you during a movie? What happens to your level of engagement with the plot and the characters and the story when you recognize, "Oh, this is just a movie. I'm actually just sitting here and it's a movie"? For me, what happens is I lose a little bit of the grip of the drama that's being played out on the screen because I realize it's just a story.

A similar thing happens when we start to apply this factor of mindfulness in relating to our own lives. We lose a little bit of the grip because we start to see how the story, how the drama is being created. So for those who are very attached to the drama of their lives, I don't really recommend mindfulness. It tends to interrupt that kind of fixation.

So mindfulness is this quality of stepping back a little bit and taking a big picture view and knowing what our experience is in each new moment. This is the practice that we want to come back to again and again and again.

Now, what do we practice that on? As we just talked about, consciousness unfolds this whole range of sense appearances at all the six sense doors. Any of those appearances can be excellent grounds for mindfulness. Any of them. So body sensations, sounds, sights, smells, tastes, thoughts, emotions. That's the primary range that we direct our mindfulness to.

Sometimes in Vipassana retreats, the idea of meditation gets really closely connected with the breath. And I've had people say to me on Vipassana retreats, "Well, I was with the breath for a while, but then I got distracted by some sensations in my body. I lost the breath, so I guess I stopped meditating." So please understand that Vipassana meditation is in no way synonymous with the breath.

Fundamentally, the object that we pay attention to doesn't matter. It doesn't matter at all. What matters is the factor of mindfulness. This is what we're trying to preserve.

So it actually doesn't even matter if the experience that you're having is pleasant. Sometimes people think, "Oh, in order to have a good sit, my body has to be really fully relaxed. No tension anywhere, no holding, no what are sometimes called energy blockages, no obvious experiences of contraction. Only then can I really meditate." Not true.

A good sit is not equal to "body was comfortable, mind was not moving." Sometimes those things can happen and we're almost asleep. So that's not what constitutes a good sit from our point of view. What constitutes a good sit is the frequency that clear seeing of mindfulness is arising at. How many moments are coming where you really know clearly what's happening in the present moment? That's the continuity that we're looking for.

Experience will sometimes be pleasant and will sometimes be unpleasant. Don't think you have to wait for a pleasant experience for the mindfulness to develop. Sometimes some of the greatest learnings can come from times of difficulty, whether emotional pain or physical pain. Mindfulness can grow very strong from those experiences. So the object is not so important. The factor of mindfulness is the important thing.

Also, don't imagine that it has to be very detailed or that it always has to be getting to just the minutia, the exact minutia of how many different sensations are unfolding in the rippling effect of one in-breath in the abdomen. "I have to see 17 different sensations in the abdomen." Not so.

Joseph Goldstein's first teacher was an Indian man named Munindra-ji. And one of Munindra-ji's favorite instructions to new meditators was this: If you sit and you know that you're sitting, the whole of the Dharma will unfold for you. This is enough mindfulness. If you sit and you know that you're sitting. I mean, just tune in right now to how difficult is that—to sit and know that you're sitting? It's a pretty easy thing to become aware of.

So, all the different objects of our conscious experience are good grounds for mindfulness to develop from. How do we choose?

This brings in the next term that I want to mention, which is the term of attention. When we talk about attention, what we mean is the focus we bring that lands on a certain part of our experience and leaves the rest what we might call in the background. So generally, in every moment, there's one aspect of the experience at these six sense doors that's kind of being highlighted, and you might say brought into the foreground. This is the quality of attention. It's doing that highlighting and picking out, selecting from amongst the myriad things that are going on in any given moment.

Attention can be directed by choice. So for instance, I could ask you just in this moment to bring your attention to the sensations in your sitting bones as they contact your chair or cushion. And generally that's a fairly easy thing to connect to. I could ask you to bring your attention to the sound of my voice as it's registering in a musical pitch, high or low kind of frequency, just paying attention to the pitch of my voice. I could ask you to bring your attention to the object of sight, which is the statue of the Buddha behind me on the altar.

So we can choose to direct the attention to any of the experiences that are presenting themselves. Most of what meditation techniques are about in our tradition is what do we choose to pay attention to? That's really all that it is. I've probably been taught twenty different ways of relating to the breath based on how I pay attention. Do I pay attention at the belly, at the chest, at the nostril, just below the nostril? Do I count? Do I notice "in, out," along with that paying of attention? Do I experience it through the whole nose down to the belly? Do I experience it through the whole body? What do I pay attention to with a single breath? There are many, many ways to do that. And then we open up the field more widely to body sensations and emotions. Thoughts and the techniques ripple out.

From our point of view, all the techniques that we know about and that we may share are fine. Again, the important thing is not where the attention is directed, but is there mindfulness? As the attention lands somewhere, is there a knowing that in that moment that's what your experience is?

So sometimes it's very helpful to choose to bring the attention, say, to the breath for a period of time. Especially in the early days of the retreat, you may have found it helpful in the past. You might like to do it now. Stabilize the attention where the breath is clear. It might be in the belly. It could be in the chest. It could be at the nose. It could be the whole breath. If you like to practice that way, that's fine. Or you can let the attention sort of float with the whole breath as it comes in and as it goes out. The way that Howie instructed this morning is a way of grounding the attention in the whole body and feeling the breath's impact throughout the body.

What's interesting is that where we place the attention starts to affect the factors of mind and body. If we place the attention in a very narrow way, it tends to strengthen the factor of concentration. But that can bring a little bit too much tightness because it takes effort to keep the attention fixated. If we let the attention go out very broadly, for instance to sounds, it tends to bring in a sense of ease and relaxation through that kind of spaciousness. We'll talk more about these different ways, but just know that where we put the attention starts to shape our experience in certain ways, but none of them are the heart of the practice. The mindfulness can come from any of these.

The last thing to say about attention is this: when it is somewhere—and it always is somewhere—take the time to connect to that experience. That means the attention has landed. Give your interest to that so that it really comes alive for you with mindfulness, so that you really know your experience there.

For instance, when you're feeling the breath, try to feel it really wholly, wherever you're feeling it. Really make that experience fill the frame so that you're not feeling divided—half with the breath, half with the sound, half with the thought. But be wholehearted in your attention wherever it is. And it's this kind of giving of yourself wholeheartedly that makes the meditation start to become vital.

The other name for this factor of connecting is aiming. It's a translation of the Pali word vitaka, which is a factor of concentration. You call it aiming or connecting—establishing a firm relationship. That means bring your awareness close to the place that it's landed so that you really feel it directly.

Sometimes we use the word observe or watch, but it's a little misleading because you can think that, oh, it should be at a distance. I want to sort of stay back here and the object's over there and I always want to maintain this distance. That's a little misleading. Feel is sometimes a better way of saying it. You want to kind of feel where the attention has landed. Let all of your attention go into that so you know the characteristics of what's being felt.

The characteristics of an in-breath, for instance. Let yourself feel it directly, say in the abdomen. Let the awareness mingle with those sensations so that you know it very directly. Then two things start to happen.

The first is you know the individual characteristics. You'll know whether that breath is fast or slow, long or short, rough or smooth. You'll know that without any special effort because you're so close to it. Just like you know if a good friend has brown hair or gray hair, has wrinkles or not. You know that just from being close to them.

As you pay attention to the individual characteristics of these objects that you meet, what also starts to slip in almost unbidden is your understanding of the universal characteristics of those objects. So you start to notice: Oh, every in-breath that I'm with has a beginning, a middle, and an end. Every out-breath has a beginning, a middle, and an end. Every emotion that I feel started sometime, lasts for a while, and then goes away.

All my experiences that I've seen since I've been in this retreat are temporary. Even the great, blissful, pleasant, peaceful sittings that I have—they go. So maybe all these experiences, all the arisings at the six sense doors, maybe they all pass. Let me keep looking and see.

And if they do, none of them is capable of a lasting satisfaction. But I keep trying to hold on. Why do I do that? Holding on makes me tense.

What if I let go?

And then we find that letting go is the sure path to peace, not holding on. And we get more trust in that. That's all from observing the individual and then the universal characteristics as awareness meets the features of our experience. This is where wisdom starts to build.

This is the last term I want to mention tonight. Really, what we're practicing for is the development of wisdom. Stillness and peace and pleasant body sensations and times without thought or disturbing emotions are wonderful, but they don't in themselves liberate. What liberates is understanding.

As we understand the changing nature of experience, we tend not to hold on. And it's the letting go that opens us up to seeing clearly and to liberating insight. It's the understanding of how a painful emotion is put together that lets us just see it as an impersonal mechanism triggered by a memory or an association or an event, stirred up by obsessive thinking, blaming thoughts, fearful thoughts, felt through the body and reacted to with negativity or aversion to the unpleasant body sensations, and then eventually passing away in its own time.

We start to see the impersonal unfolding of all these events. And in seeing that, we can't hold on so strongly anymore. We start to see how they play out just out of their own nature and causes and conditions. Wisdom is the aspect of mind that frees us. So all of the peace and calm and pleasantness that we develop here is really in the service of supporting insight or understanding.

One of the most helpful supportive conditions for wisdom, apart from mindfulness itself, is this factor of interest. If we become really curious about our experience, that keeps our attention there quite effortlessly.

It's fun to watch after the rain goes through—which it will eventually, trust me—the deer will start to come out. There are deer all over this town and these lands, and I've seen so many yogis, and I've done it so many times myself, just stand by the side of the road for a while to watch these groups of deer. You see the mother deer and the younger deer, and you can just watch for a long time how that community hangs out together, how the younger ones follow the mother, but the mother is always keeping a sense of where the younger ones are. And if they're not following along, she'll give them some kind of signal to get them to come.

You get to see how relatively unscared these deer are who've grown up on this property because there's no aggression and no hunting here, and how they don't get very ruffled when people come relatively close to them—much closer than Sally and I can get on our home lot, which is only a few miles from here.

When you have that interest in the deer and you have that kind of love for them, for their beauty, your attention is held there without any kind of effort at all. This love for seeing nature, when you bring it into meditation and you fall in love with the breath, you fall in love with the sensations of the body, there's a quality called rapture, or in Pali, pīti. And when that's there, that joy, that enthusiasm for the practice, everything picks up and goes on a great momentum. This love for what we're seeing and what we're doing.

And then we look in the mind and we say, is there greed? Is there aversion? Is there delusion? No. There's none of those. There's non-greed, there's non-aversion, there's non-delusion. Then check out how that feels. We're seeing clearly and we're open to things just the way they're unfolding. How does that feel? This is the path.

It's said that a moment of pure mindfulness is a moment free from greed, aversion, and delusion. So this is the path of mindfulness. It is the practice.

Yet I'd also like to read you a quote from Sariputta. Sariputta was one of the two chief disciples of the Buddha and said to be the foremost disciple in wisdom. He was asked by another monk of his time, "What is nibbana?" Nibbana, you know, is the ultimate goal of the Buddhist path, the place of unconditioned freedom and unshakable peace.

Sariputta's reply was: "The destruction of greed, the destruction of hatred, the destruction of delusion—this is called nibbana."

Sound familiar? Non-greed, non-hatred, non-delusion. These are the qualities that we discover as we apply mindfulness again and again and again. This is the purification of heart and mind.

So you might say that as we tune to the right attitude—the attitude that is free of wanting to shape our experience but is directly in touch with it—we experience, you might say, the foretaste of enlightenment. We experience the essence of freedom. Right attitude is a factor of the path, but in this way, you see, it's also the goal.

So when we find that place where we can look with interest and curiosity and love without trying to shape things in a certain way, it is the path, but also we start to feel, oh, I've arrived.

This is also the goal. We've reached that point of real rest and peace.

Then as the path and the goal come closer together and our whole experience starts to be in tune with right attitude, it's in tune with the unconditioned. It's in tune with nibbana. We let that unfold until the mind just falls into that dimension.

At the end of our talks, we'd like to just sit for a minute in silence just to let the words settle. So let's just take a minute of silence sitting together, please.

[Silence]

"The destruction of greed, the destruction of hatred, the destruction of delusion—this is called nibbana."

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 26

Mettā, Tenderness And Connection

Guy Armstrong · 59 min

> In this dharma talk from a month-long retreat, Guy Armstrong examines how our fundamental human sensitivity—what Chögyam Trungpa called our 'soft spot'—becomes the foundation for cultivating mettā (loving-kindness). Drawing on the Karaṇīya Mettā Sutta and teachings on the brahmavihāras, he explores how our natural tenderness and vulnerability, rather than being weaknesses to overcome, are actually the doorways through which we can feel both our own joys and sorrows and those of all beings.
>
> Armstrong weaves together stories ranging from tsunami survivors to whale rescues, illustrating how mettā reveals our deep interconnection despite the ego's illusion of separation. He discusses how this practice transforms our underlying mental conditioning, offering protection from fear and creating the spaciousness where anger cannot take hold. The talk culminates in exploring bodhicitta—the awakening heart that uses our own difficulties in service of compassion for all beings, pointing toward the radical possibility of maintaining loving-kindness even in the face of adversity, as exemplified in the Buddha's teaching in the Kakacūpama Sutta (Simile of the Saw).

The talk tonight is called Metta, Tenderness and Connection.

We've talked before about how our basic human condition is one of great openness to a range of pleasant and unpleasant experiences of both mind and body. It's said that the human realm is actually the best realm for awakening, the optimum realm for awakening because of this mix. You see, if it was too pleasant, we'd just get complacent and we'd never be interested in liberation. And that's what it's said to be like in the heaven realms. So, God forbid you should be reborn in one of those places. Spirit Rock sometimes feels like it's tending a little too much to the heaven realm. Maybe we need a little more grit here. Nonetheless, we find enough.

If we have too much pain, then our spirit gets completely overwhelmed and oppressed, and we can't really imagine the possibility. We can't get inspired to the possibility of happiness. And you can see this in many lives that go on parts of this earth, that the conditions are so hellish that there's not really the ability to look up and imagine the possibility of freedom. But in our realm, we have a mixture that's said to be very good for showing us the possibility of freedom, but also spurring us to develop in that way.

Sometimes we might wish we weren't quite so sensitive. This openness is both a blessing and a bit of a burden at times. Sometimes we might wish that our hides were a little thicker. These horses down in the meadow have very thick hides. I don't know if you know that about horses, but Sally is a horsewoman, and she tells me you have to hit a horse quite hard, actually, to get its attention, because the hide is fairly thick, and they can live outdoors, even in cold winter weather, and that cold doesn't penetrate to their bones quite as much as you would think. We might like to be like that sometimes, but we're not.

This is from Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche: "It is as if we had a pimple on our body that was very sore, so sore that we do not want to rub it or scratch it. During our shower, we do not want to rub too much soap over it because it hurts. That sore spot on our body is an analogy for tenderness. Why? Because even in the midst of aggression, insensitivity, or laziness in our life, we always have a soft spot, some point we can cultivate. A more vivid analogy might be of an open wound, which is always there. That open wound is usually very inconvenient and problematic. We would like to be tough. We would like to come on strong. But there will always be a sore spot. At least we are accessible somewhere. So we are not completely covered with a suit of armor all the time. Such a relief."

This sore spot is the point that we cultivate in the practice of the Brahmaviharas. It's this openness of heart or tenderness of heart through which we feel not only our joys and sorrows, but the joys and sorrows of the whole world. And it is this that we can develop in a very beautiful way.

I think one reason that we feel so sensitive is our vulnerability. Due to impermanence, the conditions can change at any time. And pleasure can come or pain can come. Essentially, anything can happen in any given moment because life is so unpredictable. Anything can happen.

So this was brought home to us a few winters ago. A good friend of ours was in India for spiritual practice and holiday both. He got up in the morning and went outside of his hotel room to do some qigong on the beach where he was staying in southern India. But the date happened to be December 26, 2004. And he was out on the beach, pleasantly enjoying the warm temperature, tropical temperature, and all of a sudden a very big wave came and knocked him over, flattened him, and then swept back out to the sea.

As he stood up, he looked at the wave as it was going out, and he thought, this isn't like any other wave I've ever seen, because it left a huge hollow. You probably saw the video. A huge hollow as it retreated. This was the first wave of the tsunami. And he thought, this doesn't look right. And he went and got his friend, his partner, and said, come on, you better get ready. And they climbed on top of this concrete wall and held arms, locked arms. And our friend latched onto a palm tree that was growing up beside the concrete wall, which was about four feet off the ground.

And then, as you probably know, the second wave hit. And that was the wave that did the major part of the damage. It swept a lot of people out to sea, and a lot of lives were lost all over the southern rim of India and Sri Lanka and Thailand. But our friend, because he had a good grip on the tree and his partner had a good grip on him, they were buffeted around, but they were okay.

They were basically saved by his foresight there. So this was one time when the practice of non-clinging was not recommended. It was through clinging that their lives were saved.

So life is like that. At any time, anything can happen. As you start to open to the stories of people's lives, and even in this room, you know, so many stories of ups and downs. One of the ones that touches me, I mean there's so many, but one that touches me is the story of this famous Tibetan teacher named Yeshe Ken Rinpoche. He was one of the great Dzogchen masters of the last fifty years.

He was born in Tibet in 1932. He practiced intensively, was trained in the old system, received many years of training under the great masters of his time, and developed as a very great lama and practitioner. And then when the invasion came in 1949, he stayed on for a few more years but fled Tibet like the Dalai Lama in 1959 and found his home in India.

So here he is, one of the great masters of old Tibet, now kind of adrift in India. And sometimes he would center around members of the Tibetan community. And he said, "At those times, I gave empowerments to great assemblies of people, including dozens of tulkus, reincarnate lamas, and thousands of monks. At other times, I was utterly poor, living hand to mouth on the streets in Calcutta, wandering around with my hand out, begging for pennies. So many unexpected ups and downs. Who can describe them?"

How do we prepare ourselves for those kinds of changes in life? How do we strengthen our heart so that we can retain the tenderness and still meet life and its changes with some equilibrium?

Just another short story. About a year and a half ago, there was a really quite lovely young man in his early twenties who came to practice at the three-month course at IMS. He got very into his practice, very inspired by the dharma, and wanted to ordain as a monk, either in the US or in England or perhaps in Asia, and was at home making plans to do that when all of a sudden he was hit by some intestinal bug. He had been spending time in India before he had been at IMS and had probably brought something back, but essentially his digestion broke down. Although he's consulted many doctors and tropical disease specialists in Toronto, they haven't been able to diagnose his condition, much less remedy it. So here he is a year and a half later, very strong desire for dharma practice, but incapacitated by some mysterious illness that has come. How should he practice? What does one tell him to do? I've stayed in touch with him and it's not easy to know what to say.

This is from Bob Dylan, his memoir called Chronicles. "My grandma was filled with nobility and goodness. Told me once that happiness isn't on the road to anywhere. That happiness is the road. Had also instructed me to be kind because everyone you'll ever meet is fighting a hard battle."

So I think one of the beauties of our brahmaviharas practice is that we use that tenderness as an avenue, as a doorway to feel out the world, to feel the hard battles that other people are fighting, to feel the battles that we ourselves are fighting, to open to our joys and sorrows and also open to the pain of the world. And it's this tenderness that really provides the doorway to connection. And it's amazing when that kind of connection happens.

There's a story that happened in the Bay Area just a couple of winters ago. You may have heard it. It was in the newspaper at the time. You probably know that humpback whales migrate down the California coast. In the winter, they're going south to Baja California, where they give birth to their young in warmer waters. So in December, this female whale was going off the coast of San Francisco near the Farallon Islands. They're about twenty miles out from the bay.

Unfortunately, she was traveling in an area that was planted with crab traps. And what the crab fishermen do is they string these ropes in the water that are weighted with crab traps in which hopefully the crabs wander and can't get out. And then they go and collect the crabs later. They're long ropes with the traps dangling off. And this female whale who weighed about, they estimated about fifty tons, she's about forty-five feet long, about fifteen meters long, got tangled up in these crab pot lines.

And a fisherman happened to notice her one Sunday morning. Some of the lines had wrapped around her body four times. And they were around her back, around her flippers, and there were ropes over around her head and through her mouth. The problem was that the crab pots were still on the ropes, and the ropes were digging into her flesh. And the fishermen said that they could see visible cuts where the ropes were digging in.

Because the crab pots were heavy, she was burdened by about a thousand pounds of extra weight. And she was having trouble staying afloat and swimming back up to the surface in order to breathe before she went down. So she was losing energy and starting to lose the fight against the weight of these things.

So this fisherman noticed her and then called the Marine Mammal Center to alert them. And they sent a team of divers out to look at the situation. This was about two-thirty in the afternoon.

The divers reached the scene and found themselves facing an extraordinary dilemma. As one diver later explained, getting into the water with a humpback whale is an incredibly risky maneuver. One flip of the tail can kill a human being. Yet there she was, trapped and struggling in this dire situation. What else could they do?

Four divers donned their suits and plunged into the bay carrying special knives. They positioned themselves strategically around the whale and began the delicate work of cutting through the ropes. One diver who worked near the whale's face later shared his remarkable experience: "The whale just floated passively in the water the whole time, giving off a strange kind of vibration. When I was cutting the line through her mouth, her eye was there winking at me, watching me. It was an epic moment of my life."

After some time, the divers succeeded in cutting through all the ropes. When the whale realized she was free, she began swimming in circles in apparent joy. Then something truly extraordinary happened—she swam up to each diver individually, nuzzling each one in turn.

"It felt to me like she was thanking me," one diver recounted, "knowing that she was free and that we had helped her. She stopped about a foot away from me, pushed me around a little bit, and had some fun. She seemed kind of affectionate, like a dog that's happy to see you. I never felt threatened. It was an amazing, unbelievable experience."

I feel touched when I read this story again, as I did when I first heard it. It reminds us of this heart connection to the rest of life that we don't often feel, but exists within us as a possibility. We have this deep, deep connection to life. We're touched by her tenderness and vulnerability, and that touches the open spot in our hearts.

The reason an encounter like this can be so powerful is that we forget this experience of deep connection. We live with one of the real sadnesses of the false sense of self or the ego—it makes us feel isolated. We feel we are unique in all ways. Each of us is unique in some ways, but we're also very alike in other ways. The ego makes us forget our alikeness, which is our connection, and focus instead on uniqueness and difference. This gives us a profound sense of isolation.

When I was teaching the retreat for scientists at IMS about a month ago, one participant reported a finding—I don't know if it's even been published yet—that one of the deepest sources of unhappiness among people is this sense of isolation. You can feel it in our culture today with the breakdown of family and community. The sense of separation is growing stronger.

The Brahmaviharas and loving-kindness give us a way to see beyond this false sense of isolation, which is so limiting. Isolation is not the same as seclusion. Seclusion is voluntary, a protection, a freedom, whereas isolation is this underlying feeling that we can't connect, that we aren't connected, or that we don't belong because somehow we're not acceptable. Metta shows us a different view. All the Brahmaviharas show us a different view.

There's a poem by Palestinian-American poet Naomi Shehab Nye called "Kindness" that speaks to this:

Before you know what kindness really is, you must lose things. Feel the future dissolve in a moment, like salt in a weakened broth. What you held in your hand, what you counted and carefully saved, all this must go. So you know how desolate the landscape can be between the regions of kindness.

Before you learn the tender gravity of kindness, you must travel where the Indian in a white poncho lies dead by the side of the road. You must see how this could be you. How he too was someone who journeyed through the night with plans and the simple breath that kept him alive.

Before you know kindness is the deepest thing inside, you must know sorrow as the other deepest thing. You must wake up with sorrow. You must speak to it till your voice catches the thread of all sorrows and you see the size of the cloth.

Then it is only kindness that makes sense anymore. Only kindness that ties your shoes and sends you out into the day to mail letters and purchase bread. Only kindness that raises its head from the crowd of the world to say, it is I you have been looking for, and then goes with you everywhere like a shadow or a friend.

The part I love most is where she says, "You must speak to sorrow till your voice catches the thread of all sorrows and you see the size of the cloth." The size of the cloth is the size of humanity—and in fact, of all beings. All beings experience difficulty as well as joy. That's the size of our cloth.

The Brahmaviharas open us to this truth. We look around at every being we bring into our hearts and minds. We see the scope of all beings in the world and recognize that range of sorrow and joy, the wish for safety, happiness, health, and ease—just like our own wish.

So that's why it's beautiful that we've reached this point in the retreat where we've opened up the metta to all beings. Then we begin to touch on this boundless quality of metta. And that's how the Buddha often spoke about the Brahmaviharas—he called them immeasurable deliverances of mind.

It's said that metta is like a gentle rain that falls everywhere without distinction. It falls on, as you've been reading, the short and the tall, the mighty and the weak, omitting none—like a rain falling everywhere, touching everyone. This is the boundless quality of it.

Sometimes it's hard to remember why that metta should be extended in a boundless way. But the Buddha offered this reflection: Given the vast span of lives that we have lived in this circle of birth, death, rebirth, we've all been born countless times. He says from beginningless time, truly countless. We have crossed paths with each other before. So he says that it's hard in this world to meet a being who has not at some point in this past been your mother or your father, your sister or your brother, your daughter or your son.

Now you may or may not believe in this whole rebirth thing, but what if that was true? What if all of us here went back with that kind of connection and intimacy? How would you feel if that was true? It might depend how you feel about your family of origin. But nonetheless, I think we'd all feel a lot more connected than we tend to while rushing about our busy daily lives. So this is one way to open up to that boundless quality—that we may all have been in this dance for a long time together.

And so then the Buddha uses the analogy as you've been chanting in the evenings of a mother's care for her child: "Even as a mother protects with her life her child, her only child, so with a boundless heart should one cherish all living beings, radiating kindness over the entire world, spreading upwards to the skies and downwards to the depths." This is a possibility of our metta practice.

And we can activate it on so many occasions in daily life. Jack Kornfield, many of you know, one of the main teachers here at Spirit Rock, lives in Woodacre, is married, and has a daughter who is now, I think, twenty-two or so. She graduated from college this past year and wants to be a human rights activist, is applying to law schools at the moment, and took some time off to travel in South America.

So she was back home for a spell after her graduation and was driving back with a friend from Berkeley. They were going along Sir Francis Drake along Larkspur Landing. Many of you know that's where the ferries come in from San Francisco. So the bay is right on one side of the highway, and there are six lanes of traffic and then office buildings and a shopping center on the other side of the highway.

So they were driving back from Berkeley, heading west on Sir Francis Drake, and they noticed that the cars were really slow at a time of day when they shouldn't have been. They were curious what was going on, why there was a snarl in the traffic. So they got up to where the traffic was virtually stopped. Cars were just going by very slowly.

And what they saw is that a mother duck was trying to cross the highway with six little ducklings. They had plopped off one curb on one side of the road, and they were out in the middle of the three lanes of traffic—westbound traffic, heading for the bay. The cars were trying to drive around them, and people were getting annoyed.

So Caroline stopped her car in the middle lane. Her friend got out and waved all the other cars to a stop. The friend held the cars at bay while Caroline sort of shepherded the mother duck and the ducklings over to the median of the highway. The mother duck hopped up, but the little ducks couldn't quite make it—the curb was too high, so she helped each of the little ducks up.

And then she said, "Oh good, mother's safe." No—still heading for the water. She hops down the other side. And then cars are coming in the other direction, and then they start stopping and trying to go around. So Caroline and her friend stop that line of traffic, wait for the mother duck to cross, and they're helping the other little ducks, too, across and up to the next curb.

Meanwhile, traffic is backing up behind their parked car. Some drivers also don't see what's happening, so they're leaning on their horns and hanging out the window and shouting, "What's this about? Get moving. Keep the traffic going." But the drivers who get close enough to see what's happening start standing outside their cars and applauding and cheering, until the mother duck and all the little babies are on the other side of the road and headed toward the bay.

Even as a mother protects her child, her only child, so we can cherish all living beings.

The Brahma Viharas open us up to this sense of caring. That is what our practice is: we practice caring over and over and over again.

People have asked, "Should I focus on the outcome? If I'm wishing somebody happiness or health or safety and it's not happening, does that mean the metta isn't working?" Not at all. Because what we're practicing is caring. Every time there's a sincere moment of goodwill toward another person—which means we really do care that they find safety and happiness and the rest—that metta is waking up in our heart. And by waking it up moment after moment after moment, we're strengthening that quality of mind. We're opening up that tenderness, bringing it into contact with life and making it what actually becomes a refuge for ourselves as well. I'll say more about that later.

Then eventually this sense of caring can come back around to become a motivation in our practice. And this is the quality that we call bodhicitta. If we really want to save beings from suffering, we start to realize the only way we can fully do that is to be able to help them come out of their own suffering. And in order to do that, we have to come out of ours. So we take on the motivation as a core of our practice: I want to come out of my suffering and understand it as the best way—or a really effective way—to help others come out of theirs. And this is the motivation called bodhicitta, also sometimes called the awakening heart or awakening mind.

The Dalai Lama, who as you probably know is considered to be the bodhisattva of compassion, said that when he was young in his practice as a young monk, he was very impressed by the concept of emptiness and cessation. He said, "Twenty years ago, I used to contemplate emptiness. I was very impressed by the theory and it really inspired me to seek the cessation of suffering. I thought that working for the welfare of other sentient beings—an infinite number of sentient beings—was very idealistic. Later I studied Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life by Shantideva, and that changed my outlook. I still admire the idea of cessation, but these days I have a stronger admiration and aspiration for the compassion and tolerance that come with the awakening heart. The union of compassion and emptiness is something quite unique, but you can bring about an inner experience of it if you make the effort."

So we'd like to just touch on this concept of bodhicitta. It's a hard thing to really actualize in a strong way. So don't be disappointed if it's not a really, really big flame in your practice. Bring it in as a little candle and nourish it.

The Dalai Lama says, "I cannot pretend that I am really able to practice bodhicitta, but it does give me tremendous inspiration. Deep inside me, I realize how valuable and beneficial it is. That is all."

So we take this care for others as one of the central motivations in our own aspiration to wake up and to become free.

And then we start to see that this care for others also expresses itself in our care with our conduct. As we start to tune into how sensitive we are and how sensitive others are, we start to want to move through the world without harming, even in the slightest kind of way. There are not many people who can do that really, really thoroughly, so we have to give a lot of space for our own learning. But this is the area of sila, compassionate conduct, as we took especially the first five precepts this morning.

We just remember the importance of creating that sense of safety for others. Really, it's our conduct and our care with it that creates a safe atmosphere for others. This practice of sila is called giving the gift of fearlessness—so that when people are in our presence, they can trust they're not going to be harmed by us. We take care with not harming life, with not taking what isn't given, with our sexual energy, take care with our speech, which is the way that most harm comes for people in our walk of life, I think. And we take care with our use of drugs and intoxicants.

So how well can sila be developed? How refined can it be?

Oprah Winfrey had the opportunity to interview the Dalai Lama, which I think is fantastic. I love what she does on television and in her magazine, O, because she brings into a very mainstream audience these teachings that ordinarily don't get such a wide distribution. The people who've been in O include Joseph Goldstein, Sharon Salzberg, Jack Kornfield, James Baraz—one of our usual February teachers—and this month is Richie Davidson, the neuroscientist I think I mentioned the other night. A lot, a lot of people read her magazine and watch the TV show. So I really appreciate the spirit that she's bringing to this.

A few years ago, she got to interview the Dalai Lama. She started off by asking him, "Have you ever had to forgive yourself for anything?" The Dalai Lama replied, "Small incidents like accidentally killing an insect." "Killing an insect?" Oprah said.

An insect. Okay.

The Dalai Lama continued, "My attitude toward mosquitoes is not very favorable. Not very peaceful. Bedbugs also."

"And that's it?" Oprah couldn't quite believe what she was hearing. "In your lifetime, that's what you have to forgive yourself for?"

"Small incidents every day, maybe," the Dalai Lama said evenly. "But major mistakes, it seems, no."

"No major mistakes," Oprah repeated, mulling over the idea. She fell silent and looked out the window. There was awe in her voice when she continued, "You have nothing in life that you have regrets about. That's a good life. That's a great life, to have no regrets."

"Regarding service to Tibet," the Dalai Lama said, "service to Buddhism, service to humanity, I have done as much as I can. Regarding my own spiritual practice, when I share my experiences with more advanced meditators, even those who have spent years in the mountains practicing single-pointedness of mind, I don't lag too far behind."

Some of that could be the fruit of that practice of sila. Such a calm mind to have no regrets about our conduct.

The Dalai Lama was expressing that as he has matured, he has appreciated more and more this quality of the awakening heart. Alice Walker said something similar: "As I get older, I realize the thing that I value the most is good-heartedness."

Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche continued on that theme of the soft spot. He's talking about like a sore spot on the outer part of our body: "There is also an inner wound called Tathagata Garbha, or Buddha nature. This is like a heart that has been sliced and bruised with wisdom and compassion. When the external wound and the internal wound begin to meet and communicate, then we begin to realize that our whole being is made out of one complete sore spot altogether. This is called bodhisattva fever. That vulnerability is compassion. We really have no way to defend ourselves anymore."

The bodhisattva fever is what the brahmaviharas wake up. We start to feel the emptiness, the tenderness in ourselves, the tenderness in the world, and it all comes together. We see that whereas we originally thought the game was just to clear it up here, the game becomes much bigger. It's to clear it up everywhere that nature is getting caught, everywhere that constriction and suffering are happening.

Ryokan, the Japanese Zen monk and poet, expressed this in a lovely sentence: "Oh, that my monk's robes were wide enough to gather up all the people in this floating world." All the people in this floating world. Could we gather them together and take care of them all?

As we bring this kind of generosity of spirit into our dharma practice, we start feeling this connection to the life of all beings. I was on retreat some years ago at IMS, doing a long retreat in the winter. It was November into December—cold, icy, snowy, freezing rain. You probably know Massachusetts in the winter. Every day I would go out walking by this stone wall, and even into the winter months, one of those really cute chipmunks that Sally mentioned the other night would pop up out of the cracks in the stone wall where they were probably storing acorns, right alongside my walking path. I'd get to watch them for a little bit before they got frightened and ran away. I had this really warm feeling toward the chipmunk because it was about the only sentient being I was meeting out there in that weather.

A friend happened to visit the center. A few of us were practicing and he dropped off little cakes for each one of us and a little note with his words of friendship. I especially appreciated his encouragement because it was cold and gray and dark. I could use some encouragement. The little note that he put in with the cake said, "All beings are cheering you on. Good luck with your practice."

All beings are cheering you on. And they're cheering you on too. The devas who are fluttering up in the trees are looking down and sending their blessings.

And I had the image that that little chipmunk was standing there, standing up and yelling, "Go guy, go! Do your walking, do your sitting."

So we come with this innate capacity for connection, and I think children tend to have it if they haven't been abused in some way. But then for the rest of us too, our heart tends to get hardened by the experiences of life—just the normal knocks that life offers—and we don't yet have the wisdom to know how to stay open through the challenges that life throws at us.

So often through our teen years or maybe our early twenties, the heart starts to get covered over, and we start to contract. There are a lot of names for this process. We could say we close down or we shut off, that we start to repress our feelings, we build more defenses, we become armored in many ways. And that sensitivity of feeling that we had when we were younger isn't so accessible. We lose track of the connection, especially as we get so involved in career, livelihood, relationship, family, children, and so forth.

Freud said something really interesting. He said that the very root of neurosis, the reason that mental ill health occurs, is because of our refusal to suffer. So life gives us more suffering than we can open to, and out of our inability to stay open in the face of it, we become neurotic in many different ways. So basically the movement to shut down as a way of dealing with the pain of life doesn't work. It just goes underground and becomes a lot more complicated.

And of course then we meet those habits of denial and avoidance and the complications when we come to practice meditation. In some ways, I don't think we need to worry too much about how the pain got there. Eckhart Tolle, who is a kind of self-taught discoverer, said something really interesting in his book The Power of Now. He said, "All negative emotions are modifications of one primordial, undifferentiated emotion that has its origin in the loss of awareness of who you are beyond name and form."

So in other words, that basic separation from the immediate knowledge of our true nature is really what caused the loss of awareness, the cloudiness, the confusion, and the complications. That's an interesting thing to reflect on. That's a deep and possibly ancient separation.

The metta practice brings us back into the life of the heart. By looking at our own well-being and others' well-being, we touch sometimes many of these old hurts. One of the ways that we get hurt growing up is by the criticism of others. If we've been embarrassed or shamed or punished unfairly, we can take that in and really close around it.

I was very interested to see how the Dalai Lama handled criticism. He was here at Spirit Rock. In fact, he was sitting in a chair that was about three feet in front of me several years ago. He was addressing—we held a conference here of about two hundred Buddhist teachers, Asian and Western both. The format of the day—we had about a day and a half with His Holiness—the format was that individual teachers would present on a theme that was of interest to them and hopefully to the group. Then the Dalai Lama would respond.

And generally what happened is, because so many people wanted to engage him in dialogue, about three people would present, and then he would respond to three presentations along a similar theme. So three people had presented and came to the Dalai Lama's time to speak, and the first presenter said, "Your Holiness, what do you think?"

And he said, "I don't know. All gone out of my head. When you were speaking, I had some ideas, but then these other people spoke. All lost." And he just laughed. Next presentation.

But then one of the presenters said something I thought was a little bit bold. He said, "You know, Your Holiness, Buddhism is becoming quite popularized today in our culture at large. There are movies like The Little Buddha and Kundun. There are perfumes selling by the name of Samsara. There are travel agencies advertising Nirvana as the best destination. And in that, Buddhism could get lost or trivialized or degraded. And you, Your Holiness, are the biggest popularizer of them all. What do you think about this?"

Dalai Lama was just quiet for a moment. And then he said, "Some people, you see, they call me living Buddha. Other people, they call me the God King. But I am not. I am just a simple Buddhist monk. And then other people, they call me a counter-revolutionary. Or they call me a wolf in monk's clothing. But you see, when somebody says something to me like that, I look back at my own intention. If my intention is sincere, then that is what is important."

What others perceive is up to them. I don't care." And he said that really forcefully—"I don't care." For me, that was a magnificent teaching. When we're criticized, can we have that kind of strength to look at our own intention and know if it's sincere? And then, if it is, not to care what anyone else says about us.

He carries the weight of the whole Tibetan nation on his shoulders. In the face of the cultural genocide that Tibetan people are undergoing, it's only the Dalai Lama at this point who has the international stature to make any difference in that trend. I don't know if even he can do it. He doesn't know if he can do it. But he's the one, if anyone can. So all that rests on his shoulders.

And yet he can still say, "I don't remember what you said. Ha ha ha, all gone." And be so light. He's amazing.

Our very difficulties, as we open to them, can be used in the service of love and compassion. As we open to our own pain, we're better able to understand the pain of others. We're even better able to understand those actions that come out of that pain. We can see the deep roots of the pain, even if those doing the action can't.

Aung San Suu Kyi, as you probably know, has been under house arrest for many years since the elections that should have put her into power—maybe it was seventeen years ago. She's been under house arrest for most of that time. While she's been under house arrest, she's continued to receive teachings from noted Buddhist teachers, noted sayadaws, some of whom we have known, who have gone in and given her teachings even while she's been under house arrest.

One of her practices while she's been in this enforced arrest has been the practice of loving-kindness. It's a central part of what she does. This is something that she said not so long ago: "When I compared notes with my colleagues in the democracy movement in Burma who have suffered long terms of imprisonment, we found that an enhanced appreciation of metta was a common experience. We had known and felt both the effects of loving-kindness and the unwholesomeness of natures lacking in loving-kindness."

So even through our difficulties, we can come to appreciate the beauty and the power of this quality of loving-kindness.

I mentioned a few nights ago that one of my big hindrances in meditation practice was the arising of fear, sometimes quite strongly. Mostly I worked with it with vipassana practice. That was my main avenue. But as I started doing intensive metta, that brought a quality to my relationship to fear that the vipassana hadn't brought. It was very interesting.

I think somebody may have mentioned—I think Heather mentioned in an earlier talk, Heather Martin—that metta was originally taught as a protection practice. Some monks were sent into the forest to meditate. They were disturbed by beings nearby and came running back to the Buddha in a great state of nervousness and fear. He taught them metta as the practice to take back. He said, "It's all the protection you'll need."

Metta is a wonderful protection practice. As it strengthens in the heart, what you'll find is that it keeps fear at a distance. Basically, fear can't arise when the heart is firmly in the scope of metta.

We were doing the February retreat a few years ago, and one woman who was here for the month had to leave the retreat to fly back to the East Coast to attend a funeral. A family member unexpectedly died while she was in retreat. She said, "I'm quite nervous about going out. I feel pretty sensitive. I'm going into a difficult family situation, but mostly I feel nervous about going through the airports." She wasn't getting integration time and was just being thrown into all that hustle and bustle. "What should I do? Should I practice mindfulness?"

I said, "No, why don't you practice metta? Whenever you're in the airport, you're in line, or you're sitting in the lobby waiting to board the plane, do metta for all the people around you. Then come back and tell me what happened."

So she came back and said that it was amazing. She sat and started to get nervous, and she turned her mind to metta for all the people around her, and the space turned from a space of fear to a space of loving-kindness. She said it completely transformed her experience in the airport.

It's said that metta makes the heart so spacious that anger and aggression can't land in the heart. It's like when you throw—the analogy is—when you throw paint through space, it can't stick to the space.

Metta makes the heart so spacious that anger cannot stick within it. And so there is no need for fear—one feels protected.

For myself, the shift that happened through practicing with fear was profound. Through mindfulness practice, the fear kept getting smaller and smaller, but it remained the habit of mind—that was the conditioning. In some ways, Vipassana doesn't try to shift that underlying conditioning. It just creates great space around it. So that's what it had done—created this vast space around the fear.

After I had done quite a bit of metta practice, I saw that my mind tended to move not as much in the direction of fear and more in the direction of metta. The metta changed the underlying conditioning, which the Vipassana had basically shown the emptiness of. That was quite a beautiful shift. I have to say, I appreciated that transformation.

As these difficulties come up—whether it's the deep sense of separation, the loss of our true nature, past hurts or fears or anger—as they arise in the practice of the Brahmaviharas or in metta, we simply want to hold them there in the space of that particular Brahmavihara, in the space of metta. Then that difficulty starts to get touched again by the feeling of friendliness and warmth. The metta sort of reaches out to include it, and those parts which we may have rejected—fear or anger or hurt—all of a sudden start to be included in this field of loving kindness.

This is a poem from Michael Leunig, an Australian cartoonist:

When the heart is cut or cracked or broken, do not clutch it. Let the wound lie open. Let the wind from the good old sea blow in to bathe the wound with salt and let it sting. Let a stray dog lick it. Let a bird lean in the hole and sing a simple song like a tiny bell and let it ring.

The encouragement with the practice of loving kindness is never to leave that mind of metta, never to leave that feeling of goodwill. As metta becomes more and more stabilized in our being, we start to feel this as a human possibility. It seems very remote at first, because at first metta is only occasionally available. But as it becomes more reliable and more the way the mind naturally tends, we start to see the possibility—maybe it could be there all the time as a human possibility. And that's really radical.

Normally we think it should be there if people are nice to us. And if people aren't nice to us, then we'll get angry at them. The Buddha gave a teaching in a sutta called the Simile of the Saw in the Majjhima Nikaya, where he said, "Look, even if somebody speaks rudely to you, don't get angry at them. Keep your mind in a space of loving kindness toward this person."

But I think he thought the monks weren't quite paying attention, so he upped the ante a little bit. He said, "Look, it's like this. Even if bandits were to meet you on the road and cut off your four limbs with a two-handled saw, one who gave rise to a mind of hatred toward them would not be carrying out my teachings."

Got it? In other words, he's saying no matter what happens, if a mind of hatred arises in response to an action, it's not carrying out his teachings.

"Monks, you should train yourselves thus: Our minds will remain unaffected and we shall utter no evil words. We shall abide compassionate for their welfare with a mind of loving kindness without inner hate."

Wow, that's a challenge. Even if people speak rudely to us, that's a challenge. So, not to think that we should be there tomorrow—I'm certainly not there. I don't think I know anyone well who is. But to think of it as a human possibility—for me, that's very inspiring.

What it reminds me of from Western culture is the image of Jesus as he's being nailed onto the cross, saying, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." That is the human possibility. So it's beautiful, this idea that we could stabilize within the field of metta and carry it through any interaction. Wow. Amazing.

Loving-kindness takes us to this deep level of connection. We see that all beings have the same body. All human beings have roughly the same body that we do—two eyes, a nose, two ears, arms, legs. All beings have roughly the same emotions that we do. Everyone wishes to be safe and happy and healthy and at ease.

We're all vulnerable to fear and hurt and anger and criticism. So we start to see how much alike we all are, as though really we're one organism that's just been poured into these different shapes, one being poured into these different containers.

This is from Rumi's teacher named Shams: "I, you, he, she, we. In the garden of mystic lovers, these are not true distinctions."

Metta reveals this. The differences that we hold on to so strongly, that we differentiate ourselves about so compulsively—these are not true distinctions. Metta leads us to see this.

Poonjaji was an Indian teacher who was a disciple of Ramana Maharshi. Carol and Sally and Howie all spent time with him in India when he was still alive. He was once asked about bringing peace into the world. His reply was: "As long as there are two, there will be war." As long as we think that we're separate, there will be war. The Brahmaviharas show us the possibility of seeing beyond that, seeing the illusion of that separation. And when we really feel how we're in the same boat, that awakens a lot of metta, a lot of compassion.

So I'll just close with the end of Oprah's interview with the Dalai Lama. She said, "In my magazine, I do a column called What I Know for Sure. What do you know for sure? The one thing on which you have no doubt." The Dalai Lama did not hesitate: "Compassion is the best source of happiness for happy life and happy world. There is no doubt."

And you could say the same thing about metta. Best source of happiness, happy life and happy world.

So let's just sit for a minute, please.

From Shantideva: "Whatever joy there is in this world, all comes from wanting others to be happy. And whatever suffering there is in this world, all comes from wanting only myself to be happy."

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 27

Consciousness, Awareness And Nibbāna

Guy Armstrong · 1h03

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong delves into the deepest teachings of the Buddha on consciousness, awareness, and nibbāna. Drawing from the Udāna and various suttas, he explores the Buddha's description of the 'unborn, unbecome, unmade, uncompounded' - the unconditioned element that exists beyond the realm of arising and passing away. Armstrong discusses the four stages of enlightenment from stream entry to arahantship, sharing inspiring accounts from contemporary masters like Ajahn Mahāboowa and Ajahn Sumedho.
>
> The talk offers practical guidance for touching this unconditioned dimension in daily practice. Armstrong suggests two approaches: first, recognizing moments when greed, hatred, and delusion temporarily cease, offering a taste of nibbāna's peace; second, investigating the relationship between consciousness and awareness through the metaphor of space-like knowing. He distinguishes between mindfulness (sati), consciousness (viññāṇa), and awareness, exploring whether our capacity for knowing points to something unchanging within our experience.
>
> This teaching bridges the ultimate goal of the path with immediate practical application, showing how the same spacious, equanimous awareness cultivated in meditation reflects the awakened mind itself. Armstrong's clear exposition makes these profound teachings accessible while maintaining their transformative depth.

The talk tonight is on consciousness, awareness, and nibbāna. So put your seatbelts on.

We've talked a number of times in this retreat about our basic situation as human beings—the fact that we are sensitive and conscious, and our experience is of different appearances coming and going all the time. Some of them are pleasant and enticing; some of them are painful and repelling. When we are not trained in how to relate wisely to the changing appearances, our conditioned habit of mind is to hold on tightly to what is pleasant and to push away what is unpleasant, while remaining unaware of that very activity—not recognizing what we're doing.

If we look more deeply, we see that this comes from a very deep-rooted instinct, or you could say longing, for some kind of security—looking to stabilize our life experience in something reliable and pleasing. But of course, as we start to investigate, we see that all the temporary things we try to hang on to or control just slip through our hands.

The Buddha pointed to this in one of his suttas from the Saṃyutta Nikāya. He used an analogy: it's like a person caught in the current of a river. The river is carrying them downstream against their will—they don't wish to go where the river is carrying them. So they reach up to the banks of the river trying to hold on, to stop their flow. But what they reach for and cling to are just bunches of grass. The current is so strong that it pulls out the bunches of grass and continues to sweep them downstream. This is our experience in trying to cling to changing objects.

When the Buddha was reflecting on his own journey, he said that when he started, he realized his habit was, being himself subject to death, to look for his satisfaction in that which was also subject to death—that is, in changing objects. As he reflected on that, he developed the aspiration to look for something that was beyond the quality of change. He said, "Seeing that I was subject to birth, aging, illness, death, and sorrow, I sought the unborn, unaging, unailing, deathless, and sorrowless security from bondage—nibbāna." He called this the supreme security from bondage.

This is the state that he realized the night he sat under the Bodhi tree near the town of Gayā and came to his awakening. This is the poem said to have sprung into his mind immediately after his awakening:

Through many a birth I wandered in saṃsāra, seeking but not finding the builder of this house. Painful is birth again and again. O house builder, now you are seen. You shall build no house again. All your rafters are broken. Your ridge pole is shattered too. My mind has attained the unconditioned and reached the very end of craving.

The unconditioned is one of his favorite synonyms for nibbāna—the deathless element. In attaining the unconditioned, it brought his mind to the very end of craving. In this analogy, the house that was being built was this body being born again and again. The house builder is craving. The rafters of the house are the kilesas, and the ridge pole is ignorance. All of these were shattered on the night of his awakening. The unconditioned was attained and his mind was liberated.

This is the pointing of the Third Noble Truth in the teaching of the Four Noble Truths: dukkha, the origin of dukkha, and the Third Noble Truth—the end of dukkha, which equates to the end of craving and here also to the quality of nibbāna.

The Buddha also said this about his attainment: "This Dhamma that I have attained is profound, subtle, hard to see and hard to understand, to be experienced by the wise." He's basically saying that this quality of nibbāna is indescribable. So in talking about it tonight, I am attempting something that's essentially impossible. You know how the Tao Te Ching says that those who know do not speak and those who speak do not know? Well, since I'm speaking, you already know what category I'm in. That's okay. We have nothing but words to point to these things.

I can't claim that this talk will be either profound or subtle, but it may be hard to understand. So as you listen, please don't worry too much about trying to figure it out. As Heather indicated in her talk last night, figuring out doesn't take us terribly far on the road of insight. Rather, maintain a receptive attitude and let the words come in. Try to feel into the sense of them. You don't need to engage the thinking apparatus too much. If something doesn't resonate, let it go by. Don't worry about it.

In explaining nibbāna, Sāriputta was once asked what it is. The way he described it: "The destruction of greed, the destruction of hatred, and the destruction of delusion—this is called nibbāna." The literal meaning is extinguishing. It's as though craving is being compared to a flame that burns us. We feel the burning fire of craving throughout our experience. When nibbāna is understood or even glimpsed, touched, that flame goes out. The extinction is what brings the peace. So you could call it the extinction of craving or the extinction of greed, hatred, and delusion.

Those are synonymous.

Nirvana can be understood as a psychological state of complete freedom. That's one way in which it's true, and there are some schools in Buddhism that understand it as nothing more than that. For them, nirvana is only a state of mind—the highest state of mind, the ideal state of mind, but only a state of mind.

Most schools in Buddhism, however, understand it also as something that has a kind of existence. You could say philosophically an ontological reality—that it is more than just a state of mind, but nirvana itself is an element or a dhamma that is available to be experienced. I believe that the words of the Buddha support this second view more.

Here's a passage from the Udana:

"There is the unborn, unbecome, unmade, uncompounded. If there were not this unborn, unbecome, unmade, uncompounded, then there would be no deliverance here visible from that which is born, become, made, compounded. But since there is this unborn, unbecome, unmade, uncompounded, therefore a deliverance is visible from that which is born, become, made, compounded."

I hope you get the flavor of this. It's as though we look out at the whole of human experience and we see that it's just made up of things that are coming and going, being born and dying, made, compounded, created in existence, formed from other conditions, and then passing away as part of their nature of change. And the Buddha is saying if that's all there was in our whole being, there would be no deliverance possible. But there is this dimension within us that is not born, not become, not made, not compounded. This is the element of nirvana.

So what are its characteristics? The Buddha said that the unconditioned has three marks: it is not subject to arising, it is not subject to passing, and it is not subject to change. So it is not in this sphere of that which is born and dies. It is sometimes called the unborn, sometimes called the deathless, sometimes called the unchanging. This is a dimension within our own being.

Because its nature is beyond change and it's not subject to arising, it has to be here and now. That which is not subject to arising or passing must be in every moment of experience. So it's here now. And that's why the suttas are full of these stories of people who penetrated to that realization in an unexpected moment. They didn't know that opening was going to come to them. They didn't know that realization was going to happen. But because of nirvana's ever-present nature, that is possible in any moment—in a moment of sitting, in a moment of walking, in a moment of lunch, in a moment of looking at a deer. That opening is possible for us.

So why don't we see it? If it's always here, why don't we see it? The reason, as I understand it, is that the kilesas are too gross. In being as gross as they are, these movements of mind—the agitation of craving, of desire and aversion, and the fog of delusion—they cloud our vision and we cannot see that which is the most subtle. Our minds are captivated by bigger movements, and so we don't yet have the refinement of attention to see that which is very subtle.

That's why the act of stilling the mind through the development of mindfulness and the growth of concentration is so critical to the deepening of insight. It is only when the state of mind becomes more refined, more quiet, that it's likely that breakthrough can take place.

The Buddha suggested some synonyms for nirvana. There's one passage in the Samyutta Nikaya where he gives thirty-three different synonyms, ways of talking about nirvana, and I find it inspiring and rather moving to read some of them. Some of the synonyms are: the unconditioned, the truth, the other shore, the everlasting, peace, the deathless, safety, freedom, the shelter, the harbor, the refuge, and the beyond. All of these point to that sense of the transcendent nature of nirvana—a transcendent refuge beyond change, beyond the conditioned.

The realization of nirvana is considered the highest kind of happiness available, above sense pleasures and above just the pleasure of concentration and a still mind. Why is that? I think this teaching—that nirvana is the highest happiness—is a profound pointing to an aspect of our nature that is not immediately obvious.

Normally, the untrained mind thinks that the highest happiness is the glitziest thing or the most bubbly kind of high or the most extreme form of ecstasy. But the trouble is that all those things always pass. And if that's really what happiness is, then happiness is only temporary. Moreover, when something that special passes, it leaves a big hole and it leaves us wanting more of it.

So the beauty of nirvana being the highest kind of happiness is that it is experienced as a complete peace—a complete peace that is incapable of being disturbed. Because of the total absence of craving, there is no movement in mind to disturb that peace. And that turns out to be the greatest relief. The experience of the mind which is not even subject to agitation turns out to be the most satisfying domain of happiness.

Moreover, when the degree of enlightenment that the Buddha attained—the full liberation of mind—takes place, one realizes then an experience that I haven't personally had and can't speak about: one is completely beyond the possibility of suffering. The possibility of suffering has vanished from human existence. I can't even imagine the kind of relief and happiness and bliss that such understanding would bring.

So it's an interesting reflection that what we are really looking for most deeply is peace. The Buddha expressed this two different ways in the Dhammapada. He said nibbana is the highest happiness, and he said peace is the highest happiness. I find that very inspiring to contemplate.

How do we get there? This question may have crossed your mind, and I discovered with great pleasure that the whole path leads only in that direction. The Buddha said that this path of mindfulness, the Eightfold Path, is a path that goes in one direction only, and that is to nibbana. He also put it this way: "Just as the river Ganges slants, slopes, and inclines toward the ocean, so too a practitioner who develops and cultivates the noble eightfold path slants, slopes, and inclines toward nibbana."

So we are all, through our practice, heading in that direction. When we will reach it remains a mystery, because all our efforts, even the best efforts, cannot open that door. What effort can do is take the mind into the territory from which the opening to the un-conditioned can arise. The best way of preparing the mind is to develop the seven factors of enlightenment. That creates the kind of balanced, alert, still mind from which this opening is most likely to come. But no effort can make that opening happen.

This was shown beautifully in a story from the Vinaya. After the death of the Buddha, a council was called of all the fully enlightened beings of the time in order to preserve the teachings. The teacher was gone. There would be no fresh discourses given, and they realized it would be very important to remember what the Buddha had said during his life.

So they convened the council. It was considered the council of 500 arahants, fully awakened ones. There was just one problem. First, it's a very exclusive gathering—only arahants are admitted. But the person who had spent the greatest amount of time around the Buddha and who probably had the best memory was his attendant, Ananda, whom Carol mentioned a few nights ago. Unfortunately, Ananda was not an arahant, so he couldn't gain entrance.

Ananda thought, "I have much to share. I'd really like to be able to join this group of arahants. I'm going to practice with great dedication." So the night before the council was to begin, Ananda was in his hut, sitting and walking all night long, paying close attention, generating tremendous aspiration. His effort was very high. Sitting and walking, his mind seemed balanced, but daybreak came and there had been no opening. There had been no liberation. Ananda was not going to be able to join the council.

With great disappointment, he said, "That's just the way it's going to be. I have to accept this. I might as well take some rest—I'm tired from practicing all night long." So he went to his bed to lie down, and with that relaxation and peace of completing his effort, just as his head was about to touch the pillow, the full awakening came, and Ananda became an arahant. He joined the council the next day and provided us with all those beautiful discourses that begin "Thus have I heard," which comprise the majority of the suttas.

Sometimes relaxation or letting go is the doorway when all the factors have been brought together.

So what do we mean by this term enlightenment? In our tradition, in the Theravadan tradition, what constitutes enlightenment? The way that I understand it—and you'll find differing opinions among different Buddhist schools on this topic—in our tradition, it is the moment of realization of nibbana in one's direct experience.

The mind of the practitioner opens in some way to this unconditioned element that we call nirvana. The veils of the defilements have fallen completely away, so it's a moment of complete purity of consciousness without a flicker of craving. There is the direct touching and knowing for oneself the quality of the unconditioned, with its complete unshakability and its tone of complete deliverance and freedom.

But that penetrating insight, in the teachings of the Buddha, can give rise to four different depths of realization. The first is called stream entry. There's a formula that appears in the suttas again and again to describe someone who has attained the quality of stream entry. It says something like—I don't have the quote right in front of me—"the stainless, immaculate vision of the Dhamma arose in him or her: all that is subject to arising is subject to cessation." That's a description of that immediate touching of the deathless. All that is subject to arising is subject to cessation. And it may be why the term cessation is sometimes applied to this moment of direct realization.

So one who has touched this level of realization of stream entry finds that some of the fetters binding the mind are permanently uprooted. These are said to be, in the case of a stream enterer, personality view, attachment to rites and rituals, and doubt—that means doubt about the path and its destination and its ability to reach that destination. But quite a number of other fetters or kinds of bondage still remain. So a stream enterer, even one who has had this direct realization, is not completely liberated. There are still other bondages in place. So the stream enterer continues to practice in order to purify the rest of the fetters.

Now just on a practical and realistic note, the attainment of stream entry is something that happens for Western practitioners today. It happens at centers like Spirit Rock. It happens at centers like IMS on the East Coast. So this is not an impossible attainment for modern Western practitioners of the Dharma.

Ajahn Sumedho is one of the few monastics who has alluded to his own experience of stream entry. He said he was practicing as a monk in Thailand under the guidance of Ajahn Chah, who was a great master, and had an experience where he felt he had touched the deathless, touched the unconditioned. But he wasn't quite certain. Because, I mean, how do you know?

Generally the reports of stream entry from first-hand experience are of quite an altered state of consciousness. And because nirvana is indescribable anyway, words can never map easily onto these descriptions. So you'll even find two people in the same tradition who both feel they've experienced stream entry and the realization of nibbana, but when they talk about their experiences to each other, they sound so different that one will say, "No, I think my experience is valid, but I don't think yours is." And the other will say, "Well, that's funny, I had the same take about your description." So even practitioners in a similar lineage may not agree on the descriptions of what constitutes the realization of the unconditioned.

So Ajahn Sumedho had some doubt. Was this the real thing or not? So he went to talk to his teacher. He described the experience to Ajahn Chah and was sort of saying, "Was this it?" And Ajahn Chah said, "I wasn't there. How do you expect me to know?" I think this is a wonderful lesson. It's very hard for anybody but the Buddha to know somebody else's level of attainment. So it helps to be humble in these areas.

So the stream enterer continues to practice, and the second level of awakening or enlightenment is said to be a once-returner. At this stage, another glimpse of the unconditioned takes place, and the fetters of sense-desire and aversion are greatly weakened, but still other fetters remain.

Then continuing to practice, at the third stage, it's said that sense-desire and aversion are completely uprooted. Imagine a mind that had that degree of freedom, where there was no longer any sense desire and no longer any flicker of aversion. This is said to be the stage that Dipa Ma had attained. I think her teacher let the secret out on that one. I don't know if it's true or not, but she was somebody with an incredible peace and freedom.

Then continuing still further, the fourth stage of enlightenment is Arahantship. And at this, all the remaining fetters are uprooted, including restlessness, conceit, and ignorance. Isn't it interesting that restlessness continues longer than sense desire? The next time you're complaining about having to get through forty-five minutes, just remember, even a near-Arahant could be in the same position.

So it's said that at this fourth stage of awakening, the mind becomes completely unshakable. This level of enlightenment, this fourth stage called Arahantship, is called the unshakable deliverance of mind. The practitioner knows that they have passed completely beyond the possibility of suffering.

If you'd like to read a contemporary account of someone describing his Arahant attainment, there's a very impressive recounting in a book called Straight from the Heart by a Thai forest master named Ajahn Mahabua. Ajahn Mahabua is still alive and still teaching in the northeast of Thailand. He was a disciple of Ajahn Mun, as was Ajahn Chah. So Ajahn Chah and he were Dharma brothers.

He recounted that when he was a monk with about nine or ten vassa—that means nine or ten years in the monkhood—he decided to challenge himself in his practice and decided to sit up all night every night and decided not to move. That's determination. So he did that for a three-month period in practice. He sat up every night, all night, and he didn't move. And he said that the pain was unbelievable. He said he lost his fear of death because he knew that no pain of dying could be worse than the pain that he experienced in sitting up all night, every night.

And then he said at the end of that period of practice, his mind became like a rock. Through the power of concentration and determination that he developed, his mind was completely unmovable, couldn't be swayed by anything.

Then he said, "I got stuck on that concentration for five years." Like why go beyond, right? There is a harbor, but it's a constructed harbor. It's not the harbor of the unconditioned. It's the harbor of really, really good concentration, but it's not the end of the story.

So, I don't know if it was through interaction with a teacher or his own reflection, he realized that he had to investigate further. And he began investigating the presence of craving and the absence of craving. And he would see them come and go in his practice. He was looking at where was craving arising, where was it not arising. And then with that, he also started to notice suffering and the absence of suffering. So that became his meditation.

But after a while, he became dissatisfied with that because he said, "All that is is impermanent. That's not taking me to the deathless. All I'm seeing is more impermanence."

So then he turned his attention to the two things that he felt were not really changing for him, and those were mindfulness and wisdom. He said, "Oh, those are shining all the time." And you'll find this language in the Thai forest tradition. The combination of mindfulness and wisdom is referred to in that tradition as *sati-paññ*a.

So he turned his attention then to *sati-paññ*a, and he said that these two factors of mindfulness and wisdom became impartial and impassive. And the mind was not tending to anything. It wasn't interested any longer in changing conditions because it had settled back into the knowing of mindfulness and wisdom.

He said then at a certain moment, "The cosmos in the mind over which ignorance held sway trembled and quaked. Ignorance was thrown down from its throne on the heart. In its place, the pure mind appeared. At the same moment that ignorance was toppled and eradicated through the power of mindfulness and wisdom."

So the eradication of ignorance is essentially a statement of Arahantship—one of the last fetters to go, and when it is completely removed from the mind, that is equivalent to a claim of Arahantship. So it's a very inspiring passage to read in his books. It really shows us the human possibility and that there are people alive today who have touched, it seems, who have touched that possibility.

Well, this Arahant stuff is all very well and good for people with twenty years in the robes living in the forest in Thailand, but that may seem a little remote for the rest of us. So how can we bring this interest in the unconditioned, this understanding of the unconditioned, how can we bring it alive in our practice today, right now, right where we are?

I want to suggest that there are two basic ways to approach this. The first is to kind of pick up on this description of Sariputra's that nibbana is the destruction of greed, of hatred, and of delusion. That suggests that perhaps we don't have to go so far as destruction, but perhaps the reduction in greed, hatred, and delusion. Now, this is not watering down the Dharma because we know the destruction is where the path is leading. But as a way to get a feel for it, a flavor for it, maybe we could look at this possibility.

So here's one way to relate with it in your practice. When we talk about the end of suffering or when we read that in the suttas, I believe the Buddha is talking about the complete end, the final end of suffering that does never recur again. But it can also be understood as a temporary end of suffering.

So here's one way to look at it. Anytime you're involved in some kind of struggle, of resistance or wanting or friction or conflict, unease in your practice, follow this practice that we've mentioned a number of times in the retreat. Take a look and see if there is in the mind greed, aversion, or delusion. Take a look and see if one or more of those is active. If it is, then understand that the conflict and suffering is as a result of those forces in the mind. And then simply pay attention to the sense of struggle and the presence of greed, aversion, or delusion until it goes out, which it will at some point, either through understanding or through impermanence. It will go out.

So notice what it feels like when you've been involved—struggle, struggle, struggle—greed, aversion, delusion, and you watch it as you get to that point where there is this temporary end. The sense of struggle ends. The sense of ease returns. Feel into that flavor of ease. Look in the mind and notice the end of greed, aversion, and delusion, if temporary. That is a partial flavor of nibbana. It's not the complete nibbana, it's not the direct knowing of the unconditioned, but it does have that same flavor of release and freedom.

This is from Ajahn Buddhadasa, who is a great Thai master of the last fifty years, a little pamphlet that he wrote called "Nibbana for Everyone." Very encouraging title. "When you hear a phrase like 'nibbana for everyone,' you may shake your head in disbelief and believe that someone has tried to dye a cat for sale." I think this might be a Thai saying, but the basic idea is you have this scruffy, multicolored cat, and it would be worth more if it was all black. So you dye the cat all black, and then you can charge more money for it. "You may believe that someone has tried to dye a cat for sale. That means to hoodwink you, to deceive you. But nibbana is a natural condition. It is the cool state of mind without any defilements."

Anyone can see that if defilements are with us all day and night, every second without ceasing, who could ever stand them? Under such conditions, living beings must either die or become insane and finally die anyway. Let us consider well the fact that one survives because there are periods when the fires of defilement are not burning. As a matter of fact, we can say that these periods last longer than when the fires are burning. Periodical nibbana keeps all of us alive and well without making any exceptions, even animals at a certain level. We survive because of the nourishment from this kind of nibbana.

So this is from a great Thai master. You can take this to heart and tune into the fact that when your mind is free of greed, aversion, and delusion, you are experiencing this taste—a foretaste of nibbana—and feel the flavor of release that's present then. So that's the first way to make this teaching practical in our own meditation day by day.

The second way is going to be a more extended reflection on the theme of consciousness and awareness. I want to ask: what in our experience is kind of like nibbana? What is like it in the sense of being ever present, able to accommodate all arisings and passings without itself arising and passing? What can accommodate pleasure and pain impartially? What doesn't have an agenda, that is free from craving or struggle? What is unchanging, or you could say beyond time?

First I want to ask on a purely physical level: can you think of anything in the physical world out there that has this kind of quality or even partially has this kind of quality?

I want to suggest that the element of space has something like this—the element of physical space. The space in this room doesn't really change, does it? The air changes, but that's not space. Air is matter. Space is that which matter moves in. So the space in this room is unchanging. It can accommodate all the comings and goings. In fact, it's because of the space that each of us can be in this room. It's not partial. It doesn't care if a Buddha walks in or if a killer walks in. The space is equally accepting of both. And it doesn't change. So in a way, it's timeless—it has that timeless quality.

Now we know if we think cosmologically, maybe this space was created at the Big Bang. Maybe it's not really permanent. But for our purposes, it's permanent enough. So as an approximation of the unconditioned, physical space has some of those qualities. Ajahn Sumedho has a nice teaching in one of his books where he says, "Contemplate space." And he says this to disillusion us a little bit—that the unconditioned is about as exciting as space. It removes a little bit of craving, perhaps.

Now, there's one other thing that in our experience might approximate this quality of the unconditioned. It's not the unconditioned, but you can use it as an approximation. When we've had the big mind meditation on this retreat, you probably remember that the first instruction is to feel your awareness as being like a big clear sky or like empty space. Do you remember that instruction?

So then we feel this vastness of awareness in which all the appearances arise and pass away. Does that awareness seem to be coming and going? There's a way in which it feels kind of stable, doesn't it? And it's as though in this big mind meditation, what we're seeing is that the space within our awareness is just pervaded by the quality of knowing. So it's kind of like this big mind meditation reveals this property in us that's like the marriage of space and awareness. The space brings this sense of emptiness—there's nothing there from the beginning, therefore anything can come in. Body can come in, thoughts can come in, the appearance of other people, sounds. Anything can come in this space of awareness. So it has that same empty quality as physical space. But this space of awareness is always knowing. You could say it's pervaded by knowing. So we sometimes call this just the quality of empty knowing.

We sometimes call it the cognizing power of emptiness. And we sometimes call it the nature of mind.

In some ways, this is most fundamentally what our human experience consists of—this empty space of knowing in which things are always coming and going and being known. The things come and go, but this empty space seems to always be there, doesn't it? Every time you turn and look, isn't that empty space there revealing things?

I want to suggest that this awareness is also an approximation of the unconditioned when joined with this sense of space. This union of space and awareness is an approximation of the unconditioned. But is it really unconditioned? Is it really unchanging?

The word we've been using for knowing recently and throughout the retreat is consciousness. We talked about consciousness as one of the five aggregates—the quality of mind that has the ability of holding or receiving, feeling, sensing, knowing any object at any of the sense doors. And you remember that the five aggregates are all characterized by impermanence. We talked about how consciousness arises with the object and then passes away when the object passes.

So is awareness the same as consciousness or different? Are they impermanent or permanent?

I don't know if you care about this question, but I care passionately about it. This became a very big deal for me at some point in my practice and was something I really deeply needed to understand. If this is the deepest aspect of ourselves, I wanted to know to what extent it was permanent, reliable, a refuge like nirvana, and to what extent it was just coming and going like everything else—and therefore unstable and unreliable.

I went into quite an investigation of this, and I want to share with you the reflections that came to me.

We need to distinguish between three terms: mindfulness, consciousness, and awareness.

We've talked about mindfulness as this aspect of intelligence in our mind which can know what we are experiencing. If you remember, we said at the beginning of the retreat that a black Labrador has experience, but he can't tell you what he's experiencing—and I don't think he can tell himself. He's just caught up in eating and smelling and chasing and running and feeling pleasure and feeling pain, but he can't go, "Oh, this is craving. Oh, this is satisfaction. Oh, this is hunger."

Mindfulness is the quality that we humans have that can know that. "This is an in-breath. This is a sound. This is a sensation. This is the hindrance of sense desire. This is a thought of ill will." We can know that, and that's mindfulness. It's the opening of wisdom because there's intelligence in that understanding. That's why the term sati is often combined with paññā—mindfulness-wisdom—together in Thai forest tradition.

Consciousness is this quality that just knows the bare experience of objects arising. It just knows, on a very pre-verbal level—the most simple pre-verbal level—a sight, a sound, a smell, a taste, a touch, a mood. Animals have this. Humans have it. You can't turn it off. It's automatic as long as you're awake. It doesn't require any intelligence and it doesn't have any wisdom. So mindfulness has wisdom, knows what's happening. Consciousness is automatic, pre-verbal.

So what's awareness? Well, the curious thing is there's no word in the Pali canon that needs to be translated by awareness. There's not even a word that's asking to be translated by awareness. So awareness is like this free word that we have in English that doesn't have a reference to the language of the Buddha—therefore we can make it mean whatever we want. It's a little bit like the joker in a deck of cards. This term awareness is kind of a joker in dharma language, at least in our tradition. Some of the Tibetan traditions define it much more clearly, but in our tradition it's a wild card.

You'll notice that different teachers will use it differently. Sometimes it's used to describe this intelligent quality of mindfulness: "Are you aware of your experience in this moment?" Meaning, do you know what is happening? "Yeah, I'm experiencing joy, or I'm experiencing metta."

At other times, awareness is used like consciousness, where there's this empty space of knowing that is stable and functioning all the time. "Oh yeah, awareness—it's just that field of knowing that's with me always." Notice that it's a slippery customer, and it can slide between meaning mindfulness or meaning consciousness, depending on who's using it.

So let's return to the original question: Consciousness and awareness—permanent or impermanent? I ask you to conduct a thought experiment with me. I majored in physics in college, and we were taught that we could prove things in one of three ways: we could carry out a physical experiment, we could carry out a mathematical proof to establish a certain law, or we could carry out a thought experiment called a gedankenexperiment. If it was built on valid assumptions, that proof was considered reasonable.

Here's a gedankenexperiment on the nature of consciousness and awareness. I want you to imagine that you're in outer space on the outer fringe of our solar system, but you're facing away from the sun. You're looking into outer space. The sun is behind you. No planets are in front of you. And for hypothetical purposes, let's say you're looking into a part of the sky that has no stars.

What do you see? Not a trick question. Anyone?

"Nothing."

What's the color?

"Black."

It's totally black, right? And it's not the black of some beautiful dress—it's the black that's a complete absence of any light. No light is reaching your eyes.

But the sun's behind you. And let's say your shadow is negligibly small. Is there light in that space? By light I mean packets of light energy, photons. Are there photons in that space in front of your eyes?

There have to be, because the sun is streaming them out in all directions evenly. So that empty space in front of you is actually pervaded by sunlight, but you don't see it.

Now, let's assume that a meteor comes up from below and passes right in front of your eyes. Do you see it?

"Yeah."

Because what you're actually seeing is the reflected sunlight that bounces off the meteor and then comes back to your eyes. Then the meteor streaks through and it's gone. No more meteor. Again, you're seeing black.

I want to suggest that this is an analogy for the way consciousness works. The light that gets bounced off the meteor as a result of its arising is the light of consciousness. It arises, persists for a little while, and then passes away. But I want to suggest that this underlying phenomenon of sunlight pervading empty space is the unconditioned. Because it's always there, but we don't see it.

I want to suggest that this sunlight pervading empty space is not itself consciousness or awareness, but it's our innate capacity for knowing. Because of this, it's sometimes just called the factor of cognizance or the quality of luminosity. But it is not perceivable except in moments of altered states of mind, altered states of perception. There is no direct realization of this unconditioned luminosity unless there is that moment of breakthrough which is a direct realization of the unconditioned. It's there, but we cannot perceive it. Yet everything that we perceive is only perceived because of the activity of this luminosity.

So in truth, there is no awareness without an object there to be known. And yet the capacity for awareness is that luminosity which is stable beneath all the appearances.

This is one way of understanding the unconditioned. There are a number of Buddhist schools that see it this way: the Thai Forest tradition, the mind-only school of Mahayana philosophy, the Dzogchen and Mahamudra traditions within Tibetan Buddhism.

There are other schools that deny this intrinsic luminosity—some of the Theravadin Orthodox schools based in the Visuddhimagga, some of the pure Nagarjuna schools, followers from the Mahayana and Tibetan traditions. So this is a little bit controversial, but I like it. It's my personal preference as a way to understand the unconditioned and the nature of consciousness.

So consciousness is impermanent, but it is in a way a link to the unconditioned nature of mind. When we are involved in our normal routine of life with our untrained mind—and even the mind we bring to meditation—we tend to glom onto the objects that are coming through. As Sally talked about, there's contact, feeling, craving, and clinging. We fasten onto an object, and notice how in that the mind shrinks down, becomes obsessed with one of the arisings, and there's suffering, contraction, unease in that grasping.

Then the instruction comes from the big mind point of view: turn your attention instead to the empty space of knowing. What this instruction does is give us permission to unfasten from all the arisings and from the tendency to focus on and attach to the individual arisings, and open up to this empty space. In doing that, notice how it feels. Someone just in an interview yesterday was talking about how there was a stable experience of that equilibrium that lasted quite a bit of a sitting, where there was just a sense that everything could come and go and there was no inner disturbance from any of it. Because in a way, our center of gravity has shifted into this other dimension which is close to the unconditioned or a link to the unconditioned.

So the shift away from grasping into knowing—truly, it doesn't matter whether the knowing is in a small way or a big way, but somehow the big way helps us. This is from Ajahn Maha Boowa: "Although all phenomena without exception fall under the laws of the three characteristics—impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and not-self—the true nature of the mind doesn't fall under these laws. The natural power of the mind itself is that it knows and does not die. This deathlessness is something that lies beyond disintegration."

Ajahn Buddhadasa puts it this way: "This emptiness is self-existent. Nothing can touch it, concoct it, or improve it. This is the essential state, for it knows neither birth nor death. Once the mind is rid of delusion, it discovers its primal state, the true original mind, which is sati-paññña."

So as we shift into this space of knowing, start to feel the release, the accommodating power, the lack of change—you could say the timeless quality that comes from moving in that direction. The center of gravity shifts from a fixation on one individual arising into a space of emptiness which is not focused or fixated on any one particular thing.

And then we see that the path starts to come closer and closer to the goal. When you think about the goal of this practice, you could say the awakened mind. Isn't it a mind that stays in balance and knows all the arisings and passings? And yet, the path we are walking or describing is also a state of mind that stays in balance, spacious, equanimous, and knows all the comings and goings.

So we describe this as the quality of resting with awareness. I don't so much like the term "rest in awareness" because it gives an idea that awareness is something separate from the things we're aware of, as though awareness is a destination that we can touch or hold and we can move out of engagement with the arisings and passings. That's a way of detachment under which there's a little bit of aversion to the becomes, to the made, to the compounded, to what appears. We realize that awareness arises together with all the arisings. But we can rest in that state with awareness.

This is from Rumi: "Live in the nowhere that you came from, even though you have an address here. That's why you see things in two ways. You have eyes that see from that nowhere and eyes that judge distances, how high, how low. You own two shops and you run back and forth. Try to close the one that's a fearful trap, getting always smaller, checkmate this way, checkmate that. Keep open the shop where you're not selling fish hooks anymore. You are the free-swimming fish."

I had a very strong manifestation of this on a visit to Kathmandu one year. I had gone over to sit with my teacher at his monastery, and while I was there visiting, this very great Dzogchen master was also visiting, named Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche, who I mentioned in an earlier talk—one of the great Dzogchen masters of the last fifty years. I was in touch with some friends in the U.S. One of my friends who is a student of Khenpo Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche asked me to give him some dana, and I had some extra cash. So I put some money in an envelope, wrote his name on it, and asked my teacher to please give it to him on behalf of my friend.

My teacher said, "Would you like to meet Khenpo?"

And I said, "No, I don't need to. You just give it to him." I thought, seeing one lama, you've seen them all.

And then I reconsidered. I thought, I've heard a lot of great things about this teacher.

Why don't I make that little effort and meet him? So I went to my teacher and said, "No, I would like to take the envelope and present it to Rinpoche myself."

He said fine and set up the meeting. Rinpoche was seated on a cushion, wearing an ornamental robe of some kind, sitting up very straight. I was nervous about meeting him because I'd not only heard what a great teacher and practitioner he was, I also felt this was somebody who could really see through me. I felt I was always exposed going in front of him.

So I was a little nervous, but we made small talk through an interpreter, and then the time came for me to offer the dana from my friend. I went up, and as I got close to him, he touched my head, which was very moving. Then I extended the envelope with the money to him, and he took it from me.

At that point, I was looking right into his eyes, but I was a little nervous, and he did a transmission thing. He dropped into his meditative state. I could feel the change when he did it. His eyes moved slightly apart as though he was looking into a very great distance, and his mind became completely still. As I was looking into his eyes, I felt like I was looking into an ocean of the unconditioned.

I had never seen anyone that still. I didn't even know it was a human possibility to be that still. When I thought about it later, I thought I couldn't even say that his mind was still. There was no mind there to be either still or moving. That's how complete his absence of craving was.

I felt if I could have just kept looking into his eyes a little longer... but I got nervous. He was so unguarded and so undefended, it brought up my own nervousness and kind of fear of exposure, and my ego reassembled. And I remain unenlightened to this day. But it was a very inspiring moment.

It reminded me of another quality that the Buddha probably had that was part of the reason why people were going off right and left around him into full liberation.

So I'll close with this quotation from the Buddha: "One who is dependent has wavering. One who is independent has no wavering. There being no wavering, there is calm. There being calm, there is no desire. There being no desire, there is no coming or going. There being no coming or going, there is no passing away or arising. There being no passing away or arising, there is neither a here nor a there nor an in-between. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

Let's just sit for a minute, please.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 28

The Attitude of Awareness

Guy Armstrong · 53 min

> In this foundational dharma talk, Guy Armstrong addresses the essential attitude needed for effective meditation practice. Drawing on Suzuki Roshi's wisdom about being serious but not too serious, he explores the delicate balance between spiritual effort (dhamma chanda) and relaxation. Armstrong introduces a three-part approach to meditation: relax, observe, and allow, emphasizing how this attitude leads to freedom from the three kilesas (greed, aversion, delusion).
>
> The talk delves deeply into the Buddha's teaching from the Sutta on Totality (Samyutta Nikāya), which describes human experience through the six sense doors. Armstrong distinguishes between consciousness (viññāṇa) - the basic knowing faculty - and mindfulness (sati) - the intelligent understanding of experience as described in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. He introduces the practice of mindfulness of consciousness itself, suggesting we can rest attention in the "pure space of knowing" that remains constant while all phenomena arise and pass away.
>
> This refuge in awareness offers freedom from the endless cycle of grasping at pleasant experiences and pushing away unpleasant ones. Armstrong concludes with teachings from contemporary masters like Ajahn Jumnian, pointing toward the deathless nature of pure knowing that transcends the three characteristics of existence.

Tonight I want to talk about something of the spirit of our practice and how we approach it, and also to define some of the terms that we've been using and will continue to use and hopefully put a little more context around what we're doing.

Suzuki Roshi, the Zen master who founded San Francisco Zen Center, had a lovely statement about the spirit of Dharma practice. He said, "We have to be serious about our practice, but if we're too serious, we lose our way." This is a good reminder for all of us in an intensive practice situation to try and find that lightness of mind and lightness of spirit that Joseph talked about last night.

In doing meditation practice in our tradition, it's easy to get overly attached to some of the fruits of practice. We can get really interested in the concept of enlightenment, for instance. Or having had some very good sittings, even in the past or on this retreat, we might get attached to the strong concentration, feelings of bliss or peacefulness, and have a very strong motivation to recover those. But that kind of approach to practice where we're aiming towards some achievement or attainment can wrap us up in knots.

I got a little feedback on this one time in California. It was a period of practice where I had a lot of zeal for practice. I had a lot of motivation, which in our tradition we call dhamma chanda—love for the Dharma, desire for the Dharma. But it was probably a little out of balance with the sense of relaxation.

I'd been living in California for a few years, and I went to see a psychic. It's something you have to do after you're in California for a few years, kind of like getting a driver's license—you go to see a psychic. My friends had gone to see this guy and raved about him, so I thought I'd go.

I went into his office in San Francisco and walked in the door, and he sort of drew back, almost in alarm, as though my energy was pushing him off his chair. He said, "Whoa, slow down. You're in too much of a hurry to get there." He said, "Don't you know that God comes more often to those who don't want him so much?"

So I realized that I had to balance this dhamma chanda with the opposite side of the spectrum, which is this quality of relaxation that we've been talking about. And yet it's possible to go too far that way also. If you come in and you're too relaxed, you might say, "Oh, I think I'll sleep the first few days. It's so cozy in my room. It takes about three days to get through the tiredness. Then I'll come back to the hall." But the practice isn't going to unfold so well.

So we have to find some kind of approach that is somewhere in between these two—not too much striving, but also not too loose. We'd like to talk about this place in the middle as what we call a right attitude to practice.

One teacher expressed this quality of right attitude with three simple instructions. He said, "This is how you can approach your meditation: Relax, observe, and allow." Just that simple. So let's talk about each of those three steps.

The first step is to relax. As soon as you sit down, it's good to relax. Partway through sitting, if you notice that your shoulders are starting to migrate up around your ears, it's good to notice that and consciously relax again. At any time during the day when you feel wound up, either physically or mentally, it's good to remember to relax.

Relaxation is almost a magical instruction for our whole system. When we can actually tune in and just drop a level, it sort of sends a message throughout our nervous system that says, "Things are okay." If I can relax, things are okay, and the situation is not too bad.

This quality of being able to relax expresses a very important state of mind that we talk about a lot in Buddhism called trust or confidence. It basically says that we can trust in the moment to support us, to be workable, and we can trust in our own hearts and minds to find a way to work in this moment. So when we're able to relax, it really soothes the whole body and mind, and it sort of lays to rest some of those flutters of worry or anxiety.

It's a fair question: why can I trust? Or what can I trust in? Myoshin spoke last night very effectively on the three refuges of trust in Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha, and I think that's always helpful to reflect on. But maybe more immediate to us as we're coming into our direct experience of the moment is trusting in some purity in our own heart and mind, in our own citta—this word that really means both heart and mind.

When the four of us were thinking about putting this retreat together, and I think we've said it's kind of an experiment for us as much as it is for you, what we wanted to convey to you was a sense that you can explore and discover your own experience and find within yourself some kind of refuge that is part of your direct experience. You don't have to go looking outside yourself. It's the reason that we're talking a lot about awareness and the knowing and coming into the present and investigating that side of things, because it has the potential to be a really wonderful refuge and place of trust.

What we find is that the mind itself has a certain strength and purity that doesn't depend on the circumstances around us. So the circumstances don't have to be perfect for each of us to be able to relax. The mind may be a little bit scattered.

There may be thoughts. There may be some flickers of disturbing emotion—some sadness or apprehension, anxiety. The body may not be entirely comfortable. You may be sleepy. You may be bored. That's all okay. The circumstances just have to be sort of good enough. And maybe most of our moments are kind of good enough for us to trust and bring out that quality of relaxing.

Once we relax, the next step is to observe, pay attention, see what our experience is showing us. It really helps to be interested. I think there was a question this afternoon about how does one become interested if one is not supposed to be actively doing. And I think a really helpful ingredient is interest. When we're interested in our experience, then the presence is there. The willingness to look and feel is there.

This is really the heart of being awake. I'm sure you know that the word Buddha in the Pali language that his teachings have come down in simply means the awake one. So really what we're trying to discover for ourselves moment after moment is how do we wake up? Interest, alertness, a willingness to learn are all really important pieces of this waking up process which is actualizing our own awake nature.

So we want to, as far as possible, not spend too much of our time drifting into thoughts of past and future and fantasy and analysis and imaginary conversations, although that will happen again and again. But we want to have the willingness to come back into the present moment, turn to our experience, and see what's happening. So we'll observe our body and the knowing of it, our relationship to that, our mind, the knowing of it, the relationship to that, and the environment, the knowing of it and our relationship to that. We'll talk in more detail about all of these focuses.

The third aspect of this instruction is allow. And that just means once you're relaxed and you pay attention, you let things be the way they are. You allow your experience to be just as it is. Everything happens from past causes and conditions. We aren't in control of creating this moment the way it's unfolding. There are so many factors that have gone into its unfolding just as it is. And based on all those factors, it couldn't be any different. Couldn't be any different. Couldn't be any different.

That's why one of our colleagues, Sylvia Boorstein, who's a teacher also at Spirit Rock in California, likes to say when somebody asks how she is, she says, "I couldn't be any better," because it's the literal truth. We are the way we are. The moment is the way it is. We'd like to have our experience always be a certain way—you know, a pleasant way, an uplifting way. It's not always like that. And there's this kind of universal human tendency to try to tweak it so that it is like that. And if you take a look at a lot of our thoughts and activities during meditation, I think you'll see that we're constantly trying to adjust the experience to make it more pleasant or as pleasant as possible.

But we forget that this attempt to control things carries a certain price. And the price, you could say, is our peace of mind or our freedom. There's this image from the Buddhist tradition of samsara being this never-ending round of birth and death and birth and death. And you can interpret that in a very long time frame of many human lives. You can interpret that in a moment-to-moment way—how we go through the day, sort of incarnating as different beings: the sad being, the sleepy being, the frightened being, the ecstatic being, the joyful being, the contented being, the worker being—all the way through our day, this sense of being born and dying again and again and again, constituting this round of samsara.

And this Tibetan teacher said that the very essence of samsara is correcting. This whole wheel is put in motion by our attempts to make things better than they are. And conversely, the relaxation into freedom comes out of accepting things the way they are. So this allowance is not only a kind of convenient easing of friction, but it turns out to be a very profound teaching about how we can best live with great peace of mind and great ease in the world.

So this is one teacher's pointing to this right attitude: relax, observe, and then allow. Another teacher took this sort of allowing piece and refined it, made it a little more precise, and for this we owe a lot of appreciation to a Burmese teacher named Sayadaw U Tejaniya. All four of us have had a bit of contact with him over the past few years and have appreciated his teachings a lot.

He says that the way we can check our practice attitude is just to ask ourselves a simple question in any moment, and he recommends that we ask it often: "In my mind at this moment, in relation to my meditation, is there greed, is there aversion, or is there delusion?" You may recognize these as what are called the three kilesas or torments of mind, sometimes translated as defilements, that are the root cause of all the problems in our life personally, in the life of the society, for all of us as humans. Greed, wanting more than we need; aversion, the stance of negativity or disliking; delusion, the stance of being confused or not in touch, not seeing and understanding the way things are.

So we can take a look at any moment. Is there greed?

Is there aversion? Is there delusion?

Well, those can be a little abstract. So Sayadaw recommended three simple questions that are very practical to allow us to answer that question.

Am I wanting something to happen that isn't happening? So when I'm sitting, for instance, in meditation, am I wanting the mind to be peaceful? Am I wanting the body to be really calm and pleasant? Am I wanting the lunch bell to ring so the sitting will end and I can go eat? These are the influences of greed or wanting.

Is there aversion means am I resisting something that's happening? There's a pain in my knee and I wish it would go away. There's a feeling of restlessness in the body and I don't like it.

Or for delusion, the question is, am I knowing or not knowing what's happening? So there are many layers of delusion. We'll talk more about them as the retreat goes on. But in a very simple way, am I not in touch with my experience in the present moment? Then delusion is present in the mind.

So I want to recommend this practice to you. I think we'll probably all talk more about it as the retreat goes on. But just to suggest that you could start to ask this question a few times in every sitting period, a few times in every walking period, during meals and in between. Is there greed? Is there aversion? Is there delusion in my relationship to what's happening? And you'll find it a very interesting exploration.

On days like today, we might find that there's a flood of aversion. Often on first days, there's a lot of sleepiness, and it's not a particularly enjoyable state until you finally go to sleep, and then it's actually one of the better ways to pass the time on the cushion. Or body pain. In the first few days when I sit, sitting so many hours when I haven't been sitting so much at home, the body goes through a real adjustment, getting used to the posture and getting accommodated to the discomfort of the first few days. Or boredom. We miss the things at home. Life here doesn't look that stimulating or exciting. We long to be somewhere else—an expression of the lack of interest in the neutrality of the experience.

So there may be a lot of aversion, a lot of resistance in the first few days. You can also be longing for the kind of sweet states you might remember from other meditation retreats. So both greed and aversion are usually big on the first few days. And delusion because we're often away in thought a lot early on.

But see if it's possible that our meditation can be an expression of a relationship that doesn't have an agenda for something to happen and doesn't have a struggle against what's happening. That is kind of the sweet spot in meditation practice. No agenda and no struggle. Notice what it feels like when your meditation comes out of that kind of attitude. It's almost like from this place we find, oh, this is really the proper way to meditate.

And of course we learn we can meditate and be mindful of agenda or be mindful of struggle. But the difference when both of those are absent is really noticeable. It's a qualitative difference. So continue to check in your mind. The more familiar you become with this place of no agenda, no struggle, no greed, aversion, delusion, the easier it will be to get there. And from this place the meditation unfolds in a really beautiful way.

So there's a little bit about attitude and an approach to meditation, but how can we carry out this observation and what do we observe? What do we carry out the observing on? So I want to talk about some of the key terms that we'll be using, but before I do, I want to take a big picture view of what we're doing here.

I just want to ask in a kind of broad way, as a meditator, what do we understand our basic human situation to be? In the most basic terms, what constitutes a human life? Sort of as observed from the meditator's point of view. Where's the difficulty in it? And where's the freedom or release in it?

So thinking in a fresh way, I like to orient myself around this quote from Rumi: "Where did I come from? And what am I supposed to be doing here? I have no idea."

Continue beautifying this talk (part 4/9). Maintain the same tone and style as previous parts.

Ever feel like that at the start of a meditation retreat? How did we get here? What is up?

Another way to say it might be—we talk a lot in Buddhism about our care and compassion for sentient beings. What does it mean to be a sentient being? What does it mean to be sentient? Or you could say conscious.

Are you conscious in this moment? Are you sentient in this moment? Well, you're not unconscious, are you? Or if anyone is, could you wake them up? Generally, we're conscious when we're awake.

How do you know you're conscious? We've all had the experience of going unconscious for a while, either coming out of deep sleep or fainting or emerging from anesthesia. How do you know when you're conscious again? Isn't it that things start appearing? And isn't that our basic nature as sentient beings? Things appear to us. If we were unconscious, nothing would be appearing to us. But because we're conscious, things appear.

From a Buddhist point of view, what appears, the Buddha put into six categories. The first are our five physical senses. But rather than paraphrase, let me read you the sutta. This is called the Sutta on Totality from the Samyutta Nikaya, one of the old Pali texts of the Buddha's teachings.

"Monks," the Buddha said, "I will teach you the totality of life."

That's kind of bold, isn't it? In one discourse, he's going to teach the totality of life. Einstein didn't say that. Freud didn't say that. Marx didn't say that. Here's the Buddha: "I will teach you the totality of life. Listen, attend carefully, and I will speak.

"What is the totality of life? It is just the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and objects of touch, the mind and mental phenomena. This is called the totality of life. Anyone who talked of a totality beyond this would not be speaking of what they knew about."

So basically, it's the five physical senses—sight, sound, smell, taste, touch—plus the mind and objects of mind, which for our purposes are primarily thoughts and feelings. We'll elaborate more on this as we go, but for now, thoughts and feelings are the objects of mind.

It's kind of a simple classification. There are just these six categories, the six senses—five physical and one of the mind. And yet, is there anything in your experience that lies outside this list? Can we take it as a comprehensive list of human experience? Let's take it that way as a platform to work on, at least as a hypothesis, and we'll explore.

So basically our life as conscious beings is that we come into the world and all these sense experiences have confronted us since we woke up—certainly from the time of our birth—and have been happening pretty nonstop as long as we're awake. Some of them are beautiful, attractive, pleasant, delightful, enjoyable. Some of them are frightening, painful, terrifying, hair-raising, to be avoided at all costs, we believe.

And it's really this intense mixture of the pleasant and the unpleasant that makes our human life such a challenging circumstance. If it were all pleasant, we could probably live with that. If it were all painful, in some way we'd just get resigned and numb to the extent that we can. But we retain this sensitivity to the beautiful. And then that opens us up to our vulnerability to what's uncomfortable and unpleasant.

This is really, I think, our basic human situation. We're such sensitive creatures. We're capable of great pleasure and joy. But life continues to present us with difficulties and pain. Moreover, we can't control—as we just talked about a few minutes ago—we can't control the ever-changing flow of these appearances, and we can't control the pleasure and pain ratio.

We're simply subject to these experiences arising whether we want them or not. And it's this constant struggle—because we have such a deep yearning for security—this constant struggle to secure ourselves with the pleasant and to push away the painful that really constitutes this round of birth and death. We're constantly trying to make the pleasure last and make the pain go away.

Where might the freedom be in that?

Meditation attempts to provide an avenue to freedom through the activation of a faculty called mindfulness. A close synonym we'll explore a little later in this talk is the word awareness. As we activate this quality of knowing and understanding our experience—its pleasant and painful aspects and our relation to it—the mind starts to disengage its tendency to grasp. Understanding comes in of the dilemma that we're caught in, this alternation of pleasure and pain, and we start to develop a non-grasping equanimity that understands this flow.

That non-grasping equanimity gives us a place to rest that creates a greater and greater sense of freedom in our life. And in its maturity, in its development, it leads—the Buddha says—to the complete absence of suffering, even in the midst of this changing display of pleasant and unpleasant.

So it's really the cultivation of this quality of mindfulness that we're here to engage in this week and to feel the freedom possible from it.

Let's talk in a little more detail about these experiences that come and their impact on us, and then what the quality of mindfulness develops and how it helps us.

These experiences come alive for us—all the appearances come alive—because of our sentient nature, our conscious nature. In the Buddha's teachings, the faculty of mind that is open to receiving all kinds of experiences is called consciousness. The Pali word is viññāṇa, and it has a particular meaning in his teachings. It is simply that cognizant factor of mind that knows the bare reality of a sense datum.

So a sound arises. And immediately as that sound arises, that consciousness arises in each of your ears. And that consciousness of just the sound, that knowing quality, is this element of viññāṇa. It's the most basic part of mind, as the Buddha described it.

Viññāṇa doesn't have any intelligence with it. You could be almost dozing off and yet that sound could still penetrate. You don't have to do anything verbal with it. You don't have to interpret it or recognize it or think about it. Just that bare pre-verbal knowing of the sound itself—that faculty of the mind is called consciousness. It's what we've been referring to informally as knowing. So knowing and consciousness are synonymous most of the time that we use it.

We all have consciousness. Babies have consciousness. Animals have consciousness. In the Buddhist view, all sentient beings have consciousness. And that simply means that experiences are appearing for beings at their sense doors. We don't have choice about this. We can't decide not to hear. If I ask you not to hear the sound, you can't choose to do that. So it doesn't take volition. It doesn't take intelligence. It's a more or less automatic functioning of our mind and body combination. We have the sense door of the ear, and we have this consciousness factor that receives it.

Mindfulness is—you could say it shares a cognizant quality with consciousness, but it's a higher level of cognition. Mindfulness, and I'd like to use this as our working definition, is the quality that understands what our experience is in each moment.

If you're being mindful and the sound happens, you would notice, "Oh, sound," or "hearing." So there's this reflective quality that mindfulness gives that is understanding what is happening to us.

The Buddha's main discourse on the practice of mindfulness, as you probably know, is the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. And in it, there's one word that he uses again and again to characterize mindfulness. He'll say, "When the practitioner breathes in, he or she understands, 'I breathe in.' When the practitioner experiences a mind influenced by greed, he or she understands, 'The mind is influenced by greed.' When the practitioner experiences a pleasant feeling, she or he understands, 'I experience a pleasant feeling.'"

This word "understand" is a translation of the Pali word pajānāti, and its root is very similar to the root for wisdom. The word for wisdom is paññā. And it could be translated as understanding, discrimination, distinguishing. Sometimes it's a synonym for wisdom. But it involves—I hope you see—all of these involve some measure of intelligence.

So mindfulness means that we're bringing intelligence to these appearances in consciousness. And we know what's going on. We know when there's an in-breath. We know when there's a sensation of pain. We know when there's a feeling of happiness or sadness that's happening in us. That requires a level of intelligence that the simple consciousness doesn't.

It's really this factor of being able to understand our experience that proves to be the liberating factor in our path.

Notice how mindfulness differs fundamentally from consciousness. Consciousness operates quite automatically—it simply happens. Mindfulness, however, sometimes arises and sometimes doesn't. It requires a little effort in the beginning to cultivate this factor, though not an enormous amount of work. Remember when Joseph asked us to move our arm—it wasn't difficult to know we were moving our arm or to recognize that sensations were being known. But it does take some effort to turn our attention in that direction, to know that this is what our experience actually is.

Mindfulness requires a kind of intelligence that I don't believe animals possess. I don't think animals are capable of carrying out our meditation practice. While I can't say this conclusively, I'll borrow an example that Joseph uses, which I find quite illustrative—what he calls "black lab consciousness."

If you've ever watched a black Labrador going about their daily activities, you'll notice there isn't much mindful attention happening. There's a smell, and they're off. Another dog enters their territory, and they're immediately reactive. Imagine the black lab near the kitchen when the scent of dog food being opened reaches them. Does the lab pause and think, "Hmm, a smell is arising at my nose. That's a pleasant smell. Now I notice desire arising for the taste of that food. I hear the sound of dog food being put in my bowl—hearing, hearing. Would it be skillful to wander over for a sniff and taste?"

That's not how the black lab operates—that's how mindfulness works. As humans, we have a choice. When a delicious smell wafts from the kitchen, we can ask ourselves whether we should go to the dining room now. We can check our watch and determine if it's appropriate. But the black lab simply smells and goes—a split-second reaction.

Mindfulness is a special quality we must cultivate, and it's the enlightening factor on the path. Honestly, when we look around, much of the human world operates at a level not so different from the black lab, which explains why the world is in the condition it's in. But mindfulness offers us the genuine possibility of transforming our reactions to circumstances.

We can integrate these two elements. Normally, mindfulness in our lineage focuses simply on the appearances themselves. We would typically open a retreat with instructions on mindfulness of the sensations of breathing, then expand to mindfulness of other bodily sensations, sounds, emotions, thoughts, sights, and so forth.

We've taken a different approach in this retreat. While it's perfectly fine to notice those things—and we encourage you to notice them—we've added and elevated in importance what I would call mindfulness of consciousness. When we ask you to notice the knowing of things, which is synonymous with consciousness, we're actually encouraging you to be mindful of vijnana, or consciousness itself.

In the meditation Joseph led this morning—the big mind meditation—when he said to look at the nature of mind, at the nature of awareness as a combination of emptiness and awareness, he was encouraging you to direct mindful attention toward this quality of knowing. We could simply say "be aware of awareness," but in the technical language of the early Pali texts, what we are practicing in those instructions is mindfulness of consciousness.

For those interested in the details, this practice is part of the fourth foundation of mindfulness where the Buddha describes mindfulness of the five aggregates. Consciousness is one of the five aggregates, so this is the link in the Satipatthana Sutta to this instruction. We can pay attention to the knowing itself, and that's what we're encouraging you to do.

But it's not easy. Did anyone find that today? It's challenging because in my experience, consciousness is the most subtle phenomenon we can pay attention to. The other reason it's difficult is that consciousness receives objects—consciousness is of sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thought, and feelings. But becoming conscious of consciousness presents something of a contradiction, like the eye trying to see itself. The eye sees other things.

We can't grasp consciousness with consciousness in that direct way. We have to approach it sideways. For me, this means feeling its functioning. Consciousness functions moment after moment by revealing things. As we stay close to the revelation of each appearance, we remain close to the consciousness of it, the knowing of it.

If you found it too elusive or subtle at this point, don't struggle against it. Return and pay attention. Be mindful of breathing.

Body sensations, sounds—wherever you find a comfortable base in the realm of appearances, pay attention there. And little by little, this knowing will become clearer, will unfold more through the instructions, more through the Dharma talks, and you will get closer and closer to feeling it, seeing it. It's a very intuitive process. It can't be grasped like other objects are grasped.

So that's consciousness, mindfulness, and mindfulness of consciousness. And then the next word I'd like to talk a little bit about is this word we've been using quite a lot, which is awareness. Does everybody understand awareness clearly? I don't either.

Awareness is a very interesting word, and for those of us who have come up through the suttas of the Buddha's original teachings, it's very interesting to me. There's no word in Pali that we need to translate by the term awareness. There's no term the Buddha used that quite corresponds to our use in English of the word awareness. And yet other traditions of Buddhism, particularly some Tibetan schools, use this word a lot and it becomes really central in their teaching.

So how are we using the word awareness today? The way it seems to me—and it's all a personal take because it can be used differently by different teachers—is that awareness seems to be a word that spans consciousness and mindfulness. Or you might say it blends the two. Both consciousness and mindfulness are manifestations of cognition, of cognizing. And awareness is a word that kind of holds both ends of the spectrum.

For instance, we have said something like awareness is the very nature of mind, that it's spontaneously happening, that it's ever-present. That is a description more of what the Buddha called vijñāna. It doesn't need to be willed or intended. It's ever-present. Consciousness has that aspect, that it's always happening, quite automatic. So awareness conveys things like spontaneity, effortlessness, naturalness, and this ever-present sense, a little bit like consciousness has.

But awareness as we use it in English also has a connotation of intelligence. When we say something like, "Were you aware that you were feeling sad?" that means really, "Were you mindful of the fact of sadness that was present in your mind?" In that, it's more like mindfulness.

So we tend to use awareness in a way that evokes both some of the intelligence of mindfulness and some of the natural spontaneity of consciousness. Because mindfulness has a little bit of intelligence involved. Intrinsic to it, knowing, understanding what's happening. It's the doorway to wisdom. And it's the wisdom that gets developed from mindfulness that starts to liberate the mind. Well, awareness also has this property of intelligence associated with the word. So awareness is a nice lead-in also to wisdom.

The sense of spontaneous intelligence—the feeling of that, the flavor of that—is something that we want you to start to have some faith in, whether we call it awareness or whatever we call it. This is the refuge that we hope you can discover on this retreat, that that natural intelligence and wisdom is always there in us in every moment, just waiting to be recognized.

This is from Ajahn Mahā Bua: "Although all phenomena without exception fall under the laws of the three characteristics—impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and not-self—the true nature of the mind doesn't fall under these laws. The natural power of the mind itself is that it knows and does not die. This deathlessness is something that lies beyond disintegration."

So if that's true, if there is this kind of deathless quality in us that is intelligent and beyond birth and death, that becomes a very immediate resource for us. And so we just need to refine our confidence in that and our ability to touch it, our ability to access it or recognize it again and again and again.

Doing that, whether we do it through directly pointing to the nature of awareness or whether we activate wisdom by exploring the appearances that come, both have the same power to awaken us. So I don't want to say that this looking at awareness is a kind of different order of meditation. It's not. Mindfulness itself will wake up our wisdom, whatever it's directed to. If it's directed to breath, body sensations, thoughts, sounds, or consciousness itself, they're all liberating practices.

The way that mindfulness tends to work in our normal practice, as we start paying attention to the different aspects of our experience, the six sense appearances, we start to become interested. Interest is a really critical component. You notice how when you love something, you love watching it.

I was just teaching a retreat at Spirit Rock, and there was a visitor from Canada who was on the staff side and didn't know our California birds, but she brought a bird book. And she was out the whole month. I would see her for like an hour at a time, out with her binoculars, scanning the trees and listening to the bird songs for all these new birds that she'd never encountered before. And I could tell from her energy and from talking with her a little bit that she loved birds. She loved watching their behavior and learning about their habitats and their flight patterns and their silhouettes in the sky when they flew.

And it's that way with all of us. When we love something, the interest comes really naturally. So this love for what we're paying attention to—the term from the Buddha is called rapture—and we find that that quality of love and appreciation for our meditation grows.

The more we do it and the quieter the mind gets, we love—after a certain point, we love watching the breath and we love observing body sensations because we get so interested in the nature that's living out through this body and mind.

As we start to pay attention to the breath, we see each breath is different. And we become really interested in how it's born and how it persists and then how it dies. We stay with an in-breath till the very last fading away. And then we're right there for the movement of the first flicker of the out-breath and stay with it until it fades away.

And similarly with the other aspects of our experience—the sensations and thoughts and emotions—we really want to understand them as we become so interested in this nature that's living in us. As we do, we become really familiar with their individual characteristics, just like my friend watching the colors and the flights and the sounds of those birds. She got to know each of those birds really well. We get to know the breath really well. We get to know impatience really well. We get to know loving kindness and compassion really well because we start to love them.

We start at first to see their individual characteristics. You know, this breath is long, this breath is short, that emotion is fiery, this emotion is very pacific. But then as we keep observing, we also start seeing without even trying their universal characteristics. Oh, every breath ends. Every thought has a beginning, a middle, and then it passes away. Every mood that I've ever had on this retreat has not lasted. Everything that was pleasant in my life has faded, and I couldn't hold on to it for satisfaction. Nothing lasts forever.

So through these observations we start to see the characteristics of impermanence, lack of satisfactoriness, and lack of abiding self-structure within the whole experience. Then we take that kind of interest and we see how wisdom grows. We see that when we understand that everything fades and we can't hold on for satisfaction, non-clinging becomes so much more natural. We start to live more from a space of not holding on and not grasping.

Then we start to take that interest and investigation and wisdom that have developed and we turn it toward the nature of consciousness itself. In fact, one author said that this type of meditation he described as the penetrative focus free of conceptual elaboration upon the very nature of conscious awareness. And we discover then the possibility of this kind of refuge for ourselves.

There's a Thai teacher who comes to Spirit Rock every spring called Ajahn Jumnian. Ajahn Jumnian is a master of meditation developed in both vipassana and loving-kindness from the time he was very young. He has this incredibly joyful appearance and energy. He said that he hasn't had any anger for the last thirty years. And he seems like that because every time I see him, he's just joyful and energetic and outgoing. His favorite mantra—he doesn't speak much English, but this is the little English he speaks—he'll touch space and he'll say, "Empty, empty." And then he'll say, "Happy, happy." It's a union of emptiness and happiness.

So this is a quote from Ajahn Jumnian about this refuge: "The best way to develop a great awareness"—and he used the Pali term mahasati, which means great mindfulness—"the best way to develop a great awareness is to rest your attention within that knowing space of consciousness, in the pure space of knowing. If you understand and can rest in this pure knowing, that is the place of the deathless. From this pure awareness that's unmoved by what arises, then you see the phenomena of the world which all have the nature to arise and pass away. Phenomena show their dharma of impermanence and this other is the dharma of the deathless."

We start to see that most fundamentally, when everything else comes and goes, this is what we are. We are this empty space of knowing in which everything appears. From the time we were young, everything started to appear. Mother, bottle, milk, kindergarten, high school, career, marriage, income tax, Paris Hilton—everything appears on that screen, some beautiful, some not so beautiful. But the knowing stays with them all, stays somewhat constant with them all.

As we start to place our emphasis, our attention, our trust in that knowing, we start to shift our center of gravity from the preoccupation with the specific objects that are appearing—to which we're inclined to cling if they're pleasant, or push away if they're unpleasant—to simply rest in this knowing space that is free from greed, aversion, and delusion. Because we notice that the knowing doesn't have preferences. It reveals the painful as easily as it reveals the pleasant. So this knowing already has the right attitude that's free from greed, aversion, and delusion. We trust more and more in that. We put our attention more and more in that. We start to trust our being to that.

I'll just close with a quotation from Rumi called "Tending Two Shops."

Live in the nowhere that you came from, even though you have an address here. That's why you see things in two ways. You have eyes that see from that nowhere and eyes that judge distances, how high and how low. You own two shops and you run back and forth. Try to close the one that's a fearful trap, getting always smaller. Checkmate this way. Checkmate that. Keep open the shop where you're not selling fish hooks anymore. You are the free-swimming fish.

So let's just sit for a minute in silence, please.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 29

Awareness Is Like The Unconditioned

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the Buddha's fundamental teaching that all suffering stems from ignorance and misperception. Drawing from the Abhidhamma analysis and the Pheṇapiṇḍūpama Sutta (Mass of Foam Sutta, SN 22.95), he explores how a person consists of three components: material form, mental formations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness. Armstrong demonstrates how careful investigation reveals these components to be insubstantial—like foam, a banana tree, and a magic show—with no abiding self (anattā) at their center.

The talk delves deeply into the nature of emptiness (suññatā), showing how our sense of solid reality dissolves under close examination. Through personal stories, including his experience with autopsies in Thailand, Armstrong illustrates how direct investigation reveals the ephemeral, interdependent nature of all conditioned phenomena. He then turns to the unconditioned realm of nibbāna, described as having no arising, passing, or change. Armstrong offers practical ways to taste this liberation through moments when greed, hatred, and delusion are absent, and explores how awareness itself points toward the unconditioned dimension of luminous emptiness that underlies all experience.

The Buddha said many times that his teaching was all about suffering and coming to the end of suffering. Tonight's talk may seem a little technical and philosophical at times, but I hope you'll hang with me because the intent is really to talk about suffering and the end of suffering.

The Buddha traced our suffering to a lack of understanding. He said that ignorance is the foundation of the way we misperceive the world and ourselves, and because of that, suffering comes into being. He put this in a rather pithy way at one point: "In whatever way they conceive, the fact is ever other than that." Or as one of my teachers said even more pithily, "Everything you think is wrong."

So we want to explore tonight some of the misconceptions that we hold and see how we might understand them differently. As a preface to the talk, I want to quote something else from the Buddha when he was talking about his awakening. He said, "This dhamma discovered by me is profound, hard to see, hard to understand, peaceful, sublime, beyond the sphere of logic, subtle, to be experienced by the wise." The talk tonight may not be profound or subtle, but it may be hard to understand. So I invite you to let the words in, see what resonates, and let them go. Try not to argue too much during the talk. You can argue with me tomorrow.

Generally, when we look at ourselves or each other, we see a person. But the Buddha said that one shouldn't really see in this way. The Visuddhimagga said that looking at somebody and seeing a person is not very refined. That one who has closely investigated the mind-body process wouldn't see in this way. They said it's like a skilled butcher who's cutting up the carcass of a cow and going, "cow, cow, cow." A skilled butcher wouldn't do that. The skilled butcher would go, "rump, tenderloin, sirloin, ribs," because they have so much familiarity with the detail of their work.

So the Buddha said we should bring that kind of detail to our own knowing of what constitutes a person. There are a few ways that the Buddha described a person. One is the description that I talked about on the opening night, which we've referred to a number of times: the six senses and the objects of the six sense types—sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and objects of mind. He used that very frequently.

But there's another model that comes in, referenced in the suttas and then explored also in the Abhidhamma, that I want to use mostly as the basis for this investigation tonight. We'll follow the Abhidhamma model here. This is a part of the ancient scriptures in Buddhism that dates back to about 200 years after the death of the Buddha. In the Abhidhamma, a person is described as being composed of three components: physical form, consciousness—which we've talked about quite a bit—and mental phenomena, or mental formations.

So I want to talk about each of these three and see if you can get a feeling for what is being pointed to here that is our makeup.

The first is material form. But when material form is pointed to, it doesn't just stop at this body. It includes the whole physical world. So you could say that what we're really investigating is the domain of our experience. Our experience includes the physical body, but it also includes our experience of the rest of the physical world. So this first component of form includes all of that.

It is the physical body, but it is also everything external. Everything that we consider in the world of physical matter is included within this first component of form. So it includes the five physical senses—sights, sounds, smells, tastes, touches—as well as the body, which is the base of all those senses.

I think we take it for granted that we know what the body is, but if we stop and ask, do we really? Have you ever been surprised on a retreat at what the body was as you examined it closely? Mostly all we know of the body is primarily through two senses: we see it and we feel it. We also sometimes smell it and taste it and hear it. Those usually don't tend to be too pleasant, so we don't spend too much time on those. But we see the body and we feel the body, so our information about the body comes through those senses already, conditioned by those senses.

When you hear that sound, that is one example of form. This is in the component, part of our experience, that's considered physical matter or form.

I'd like to read from a discourse of the Buddha's that talks about his view of form, and it's maybe a little different than we might be prepared for. This is a sutta called "A Mass of Foam."

"On one occasion, the Blessed One was dwelling at Ayodhya on the bank of the river Ganges. There, the Blessed One addressed the bhikkhus thus: 'Monks, suppose that this river Ganges was carrying along a great mass of foam.'"

A person with good sight would inspect it, ponder it, and carefully investigate it, and it would appear to them to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in a mass of foam? So too, monks, whatever kind of form there is, whether past, future, or present, far or near, a bhikkhu inspects it, ponders it, and carefully investigates it, and it would appear to them to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in form?

This is a little radical, isn't it? What substance could there be in the physical world? It's quite a profound question. We'll return to this later.

The second component that makes us up we could call mental formations. We understand these primarily as thoughts and feelings—the constructed events that flow through the mind. This includes the activity of thought, which we're all familiar with by now, and the different kinds of moods and feelings that arise in consciousness.

These might be the hindrances that Joseph began discussing the other night: doubt or anger, desire, dullness, restlessness. They could equally be the beautiful qualities of the brahmaviharas—love, compassion, or joy. This realm of mental phenomena also encompasses refined meditative states: the presence in the mind of concentration or mindfulness or equanimity or calm. These too are included in this component of mental formations.

For instance, if we're sitting in the hall and we hear the sound of the bell—which usually means the sitting is over—I don't know about you, but often when I hear that sound, I experience a new sense of ease throughout my body. "Oh, it feels so good," and then I think, "You know, I could sit forever." So upon hearing the sound, this mood of ease arises—a mental formation—and the thought comes: "I could sit forever." Both of these belong to the field of mental formations, the objects of mind.

The third component we include in this analysis is the factor of consciousness. We've talked about this extensively—awareness or consciousness or knowing. We've been using these terms largely synonymously throughout this retreat. It's that capacity of mind that receives all sense experience and knows it in this bare, pre-verbal way that makes it part of our experience, part of our sense data.

When the sound arises, it's known immediately. There's no gap. It takes no effort. The way this is understood in the Buddhist teachings is that the sound and the knowing of it actually arise together as one unitary event. Don't think of it as two different things happening. See what occurs if you consider it as one event that has these two aspects: one is the form aspect of the sound, and the other is the mental aspect of the knowing or consciousness. A unitary experience of mind and form combined. We can examine either aspect.

This may seem puzzling—one experience with two aspects. But I'd ask you to look at the base of this bowl and ask: is it round or is it black? It's really one object, but it has two aspects, doesn't it? I'd like you to consider investigating your experience of hearing in the same way. A sound arising and being known is one event, and we can tune in either to the sound or we can tune in to the knowing, the consciousness of it.

Of course, consciousness is present throughout this entire process. There's consciousness of the bell. There's consciousness of the sense of ease. There's consciousness of the thought "I could sit forever." All of these are held within this factor of consciousness.

Why is this investigation worthwhile? Why is it valuable to look in this way? I want to suggest that this approach can be profoundly liberating. Personally, I've found this investigation to be a part of my practice that has brought tremendous freedom over the years.

I began investigating in this way when my older sister died—a sister five years my senior who died at fifty-two, quite young, quite unexpectedly. I was deeply shaken by her death because I had spoken with her just a few days before. She was robust, vital, an interesting and delightful person. Then suddenly, a few days later, she was simply gone, and I couldn't comprehend how that had happened.

Her death launched me into a profound investigation. I needed to understand what constitutes this mind-body process and what happens when someone transitions from living to dying.

And I'll suggest that investigating these three aspects of our being gives us a very good way to understand what that process is.

What became clear to me as I carried on this investigation is that there's an element we commonly think of as being part of a person that is not in form, is not in mental formations, and is not in consciousness. And that is the "I," the self. What we think of as a self is just an unconscious lumping together of all three of these aspects. But when we tease them apart, we find that there's no center within that collection—no abiding or ongoing entity at the center that receives it all, that experiences it all, that is the essence of this collection. There is only form, formations, and consciousness. There's nothing else. There's no self hidden in here.

This itself is freeing. This is one of the very liberating insights along the path of discovery in meditation. We'll come back to this in a minute. But one of the ways I want to suggest this understanding comes through—of the lack of self-essence—is by investigating each of these three components as an aspect of nature.

So we take the physical body, which represents all form. Take a look at this physical body and think about its origin. It came about because your father's sperm met with your mother's egg, came together in conception, and the cells started to multiply. That body was then grown in the womb, emerged from the womb, was nourished by milk and food and water and air, and grew up in a purely physical process over these twenty, thirty, forty, or however many years. So it's always been a natural physical occurrence from its very beginning.

One of my teachers in Thailand, a great monk named Ajahn Buddhadasa, put it this way. He said, "This body came out of nature, it never departed from nature, and it still belongs to nature. So give it back to nature. That'll be a big relief for you."

Can you get the flavor of that? We spend so much time cherishing this body and trying to own it, and yet did you have anything to do with its appearance that you can recall? The "I" that takes possession of this body today had nothing to do with its arising, nothing to do with its growth, nothing to do with its shape and form and color of hair and eyes. Just physical nature created this.

Similarly, if you look at the range of mental formations that constitutes what we usually call personality—somebody being a kind person or a generous person or an unkind person or a thoughtful person—these are based on the moods and feelings and intentions that go through the heart and mind. When you think about all these different components, sure, our particular mixture is different, but everybody has kindness. Everybody has some generosity. Everybody has some cruelty, some anger, some joy, some sadness.

We take possession of these emotions also and identify "my anger," "my happiness." But when we step back just a minute, we see, oh, it's just a human emotion. All humans share this emotion. It's part of our makeup. It's part of the makeup of every one of us. It's part of the human package. So we start to see that this is part of mental nature, or you could say emotional nature, that we carry just by virtue of being human. Again, we didn't create it, we didn't cause it, we didn't bring it into being, but we inherit this package as part of our humanness, and each of us does. So again, just human nature.

And then we come to the third part, this knowing quality, and there the individuality really goes away. Because when you hear the sound of the bell, don't you imagine that your knowing of that is just like my knowing of that, is just like Meoshin's knowing of that? Our knowing doesn't have any individuality at all. There's nothing of "guyness" about that. There's nothing of "patricianess" about the knowing. Again, it's just consciousness—an aspect of the nature of mind, an aspect of human nature, but nothing more than that, something we all share.

So in all this bundle—the body, manifestation of physical nature; the moods, emotions, and thoughts, manifestation of mental nature; consciousness, manifestation of the nature of mind—there's really no individuality. There's nothing we can call a true abiding self. So then we start to see there's not so much difference between us all. Our bodies are so similar, the range of our emotions the same, our capacity for knowing identical. Fundamentally, it's like we're one being that's just been poured into these different vessels, different shaped vessels, and then conditioned in different ways.

So seeing it all as nature takes out some of that identification, some of that grip of the "I." This letting go of the sense of "I" is an aspect of what's called emptiness. In the Buddha's teachings, he used "empty" most of the time synonymously with this understanding that there's not an ongoing abiding entity at the center of this mind-body process—the teachings on the absence of self, even though it sure looks that way sometimes.

He compared this all to a magic show. "Suppose, monks, that a magician should hold a magic show at a crossroads and a keen-sighted person should inspect it, ponder it, and carefully investigate it. It would appear to that person to be void, hollow, insubstantial. What substance, monks, could there be in a magic show?"

This is a continuation of the sutta that we began with this evening. So it's as though we have all been taken in by the magic show of form, formations, and consciousness, believing that there's an existing self somewhere in there when there isn't actually.

What happens when you've seen a magic show and you've been really wowed by it, and then the person tells you how they did the trick? Does it take away some of the glamour? It takes away the wow factor, doesn't it? In Buddhism, this movement from being taken in by the magic show to understanding it and losing that wow factor—the dazzle factor—is called disenchantment, nibbidah. And in the Buddha's teachings, it is a key component for leading us to quit grasping onto the passing show that is this world. When we understand the way it's put together and we see the mechanism of it, we don't hold on quite so tightly.

So the Buddha continues: "Even so, monks, whatever form, formations, consciousness there is, a person inspects it, ponders it, and carefully investigates it. It would appear to them to be void, hollow, insubstantial. What substance, monks, could there be in form, formations, consciousness?"

And then he ends with a little verse: "Form is like a mass of foam, and formation's a banana tree." I didn't understand that at first. If you've lived in the tropics, you probably know a banana tree bears once, and then the whole tree dies because it doesn't have a solid core. There's no solidity at the core of a banana tree. It's gone. "Formations are like a banana tree, and consciousness is a magic show, a juggler's trick entire. All these similes were made known by the kinsmen of the sun"—another word for the Buddha.

So one meaning of emptiness is the absence of an abiding self within this process of form, formations, and consciousness. But this sutta is also pointing to another meaning of emptiness, which is something like insubstantiality, even of the physical world. See the world as a mass of foam. How can that be?

This is very counter to our culture's assumptions. We live in a very materialistic culture, dominated by a firm belief in the solidity and the primacy of physical reality. Not all cultures see this way, but our culture does. So growing up in a Western culture, we come up with the idea that this physical world is the ultimate truth of things. And the ultimate truth is that it has existed for a very long time. We're born into it. And as a result of being born into it, a consciousness develops out of the physical makeup of the body and contacts the physical world, and when we die, we go away and the physical world continues. This is the sort of primary assumption of Western culture.

But other cultures have had different understandings of what constitutes the ultimate reality. There are schools of Indian philosophy that deny that and take the opposite view. They say, no, no, no, no, no. Physical reality is just a bubble arising in consciousness. Consciousness is the ultimate reality. Mind is the ultimate reality. It has existed since beginningless time, and the physical worlds just come and go. World systems play within this vast space of mind or consciousness. In those cultures, this is a more valid view. Personally, I find this view a little more entertaining.

But the early teachings of the Buddha, of the Pali Canon, take kind of a middle way between these two. And he describes consciousness and physicality as mutually dependent. He gives ultimacy to neither one, but says that they lean against each other like two sheaves of reeds, and if you take one away, the other collapses. That's a very interesting thought. Not that body caused consciousness, but that they both depend upon each other, and that is a shift from the Western materialist worldview.

Patricia began to talk last night about some of the implications of this. When she talked about coming out of our concepts about reality and coming into direct contact with reality and touching the truth of our direct experience. And we start to see the insubstantial nature of experience as we get closer and closer to it. So we start, and with sounds, we soon tune into how ephemeral every sound is. Even the big trucks that roll by pass in a matter of seconds. Smells, as we go into the dining room, very elusive. Tastes flourish and then pass away. Thoughts, so fleeting.

One thought arises and within moments dissolves completely. Emotions emerge so tentatively and vaguely that it becomes difficult to maintain connection with them for long. They come and color our experience like passing clouds, impossible to grasp or hold.

When we turn our attention to exploring the body—and I believe this is what Patricia touched upon last night—we discover something remarkable. Most of us arrive at practice assuming the body is entirely solid. I certainly did. Yet as we experience it directly for ourselves, as we draw closer to its actual nature, we begin to notice something extraordinary: there is nothing solid there at all.

Everywhere we direct our attention within the body, we find only change—pulsation, vibration, flickering, arising, shifting, passing away, appearing and disappearing. We begin to feel through direct experience that the body is simply an energy field, a flowing stream of changing sensations, none of which endure in any solid way. We start to feel this insubstantial, fluid nature of embodied existence.

Yet of all the senses, sight has always proven most challenging for me in recognizing any sense of insubstantiality. We look around a room like this and nothing appears to change. The floor looks utterly solid. The walls appear completely stable. The windows, the doors—all seem permanent and fixed. How might we examine sight in a way that reveals it too could be like a mass of foam?

Indulge me for a moment in some seventh-grade science reflection. Let us turn our attention to how this sight actually arises. We understand from elementary science that vision emerges because light particles—photons—reflect off the elements of this room, travel to our eyes, and strike the retina. This light activity stimulates the retina to send signals up the optic nerve, which travels into the brain and stimulates various brain regions. From this stimulation, somehow—quite mysteriously, as scientists haven't yet solved this puzzle—visual consciousness arises.

That final step remains profoundly mysterious. Yet we know all the preceding steps are absolutely necessary. Consider the implications: what would happen to this solid sight if someone switched off the lights and all illumination disappeared? The sight vanishes completely. Perhaps this sight is not so solid after all.

When we reflect further, we realize this sight isn't truly solid but is being regenerated continuously—perhaps dozens or hundreds of times per second—by the constant influx of new photons. Hundreds of thousands, even millions of photons must be stimulating the retina every second, sending fresh signals to the brain, with the brain regenerating the visual picture over and over, many times each second. Without this constant regeneration, sight would cease entirely.

What we assumed was the real world, when we pause to reflect even briefly, reveals itself as something we cannot truly know. We discover we don't actually live in a solid, permanent world but rather in a flickering representation of the world, constructed by our brain based on ever-changing sensory data and interpreted through our human consciousness.

We don't actually inhabit a real, solid world. We dwell within a flickering representation of the world, generated by our senses and neural activity. That is all there is. We cannot know anything else. Even what feels most solid—the sensation of hardness we experience through our fingertips or sitting bones—is only another sensation arising through the sense of touch.

The floor feels like one of the most solid things we encounter. We often take it as our ground, thinking, "Here is something stable where I can place my faith, where I can rest." Yet when we investigate this sensation closely, we discover it too is only the sensation of hardness known through touch. When you pay careful attention to your sitting bones or fingertips, you begin to feel the change, pulsation, and vibration within that sensation as well. You realize that while there may be a physical ground, that physical ground is also merely an appearance in consciousness, flickering on and off through our senses.

There is no ground to consciousness itself. Consciousness exists like a bubble with nothing supporting it underneath. We recognize this truth when we recall the image of Earth suspended in space—nothing holds up our planet, just as nothing holds up our consciousness.

When we reach this level of seeing, we enter the realm of the emptiness of objects. We truly understand how the Buddha could declare that this physical world is merely a mass of foam—nothing but a flickering appearance in consciousness, utterly without ground. This represents one of the profound senses of emptiness.

This also came home to me powerfully when I was a monk in Thailand. As a monk, I had the great privilege of being able to observe autopsies—a profound teaching opportunity for a Buddhist practitioner.

One day, a friend and I went to the coroner's office in a hospital in downtown Bangkok. We walked into the room adjacent to the autopsy theater, where the body of a young woman who had drowned in one of the canals lay on a metal table. She was to be the first autopsy of the day.

I was thirty-four years old and had never been next to a dead person before. Now I stood inches away from a stranger who had died, about to witness the autopsy being performed. They wheeled her into the theater, and the coroner began the procedure—removing and weighing the bodily organs, beginning with the brain. Her chest was opened, the internal organs examined and weighed, then replaced, and she was sewn up. The entire process took about thirty minutes.

After watching this autopsy and two others that followed, I walked back out into downtown Bangkok to a large parade ground where I would catch my bus to the monastery. I had been doing intensive sitting practice before coming to the hospital and was in a particularly open and sensitive state. The experience had been profoundly moving.

It was a sunny day, and people were walking through the parade ground—a mother watching her children play on the grass, an elderly woman wheeling a shopping cart full of groceries from the nearby market, a young couple walking hand in hand, radiant in each other's company. I watched them all and saw them in a completely different way.

On the bus ride home, I reflected on what was different about this perception. I realized I was seeing walking corpses. Everywhere I looked, I saw walking corpses. The bodies I was observing were exactly like those I had seen on the coroner's tables, but with one crucial difference: they were animated by a kind of light that shone out through their eyes—the light of consciousness that we possess when alive.

As I watched these people, I understood something about consciousness that I hadn't grasped before. That light shining through their eyes was completely of the present moment—it had no past and no future. Yet because of our capacity for memory, we construct an imagined past based on recollection and project it into an imaginary future, weaving ourselves into the web of time, into the bondage of time, when we don't see clearly how we're constructing it all.

In that moment, I saw that these walking corpses were completely free—that brightness, that illumination, was utterly free of past and future. It was deeply moving because I could see how all of us wanted to secure our lives and well-being in the midst of this foam of the material world, this foam of life, where all we have is the body and this brightness. You can see how impossible it is to secure anything in such a situation.

The Buddha compared all our attempts to find security to a person caught in a river, being carried downstream by a strong current. Along the bank are clumps of grass, and as the person passes by, they grasp at each clump seeking stability, but each one comes off in their hands, and they're carried further downstream. This is our attempt to cling to what is ultimately passing and transitory.

How, then, do we find any refuge, any release from this predicament? The Buddha began his quest in search of this very solution. He said that as an unenlightened bodhisattva, he recognized that he was seeking satisfaction in the conditioned realm: "I am subject to birth, illness, and death, yet I'm seeking my happiness in what is also subject to birth, illness, and death. Will this ultimately lead to lasting peace?"

The answer, clearly, was no. So he asked himself, "What if I sought my security in that which is beyond birth, beyond illness, beyond aging, and beyond death?" This is what he called nirvana.

He discovered what he was seeking on the night of his enlightenment. It's said that among the first words that came to him after his awakening were: "My mind has attained the unconditioned and reached the very end of craving."

This is the release that he was looking for. This is the security that he was looking for. This unconditioned he also called nibbana, a word that literally means extinguishment or blowing out—the blowing out of the flame of craving and also of suffering.

At one point someone asked Sariputta, "What is nibbana? Can you describe it?" And Sariputta defined it as the destruction of greed, the destruction of hatred, and the destruction of delusion. "This is called nibbana."

The Buddha said there are three marks of the unconditioned or of nibbana: there is no arising, there's no passing away, and there's no change. If there is something within our being, some dimension of our being that is not subject to arising, is not subject to passing, and is not subject to change, then it must be present now. Because it is present in every moment, enlightenment is possible at every moment. Enlightenment is the discovery of, through our direct experience, the nature of this dimension of our being.

Some synonyms for this dimension: the truth, the other shore, the everlasting, peace, the deathless, safety, freedom, the refuge, the beyond.

The entire path leads in the direction of the unconditioned. This is from the Buddha: "Just as the river Ganges slants, slopes, and inclines toward the ocean, so too a practitioner who develops and cultivates a noble eightfold path slants, slopes, and inclines toward nibbana."

So how can we understand it within our experience? We've heard of arahants. There are, according to my understanding, beings in the world today who reach this level of complete liberation, full enlightenment, as the Buddha did. Such a person is said to abide in nibbana, to be fully released, fully liberated.

But since most of us aren't there yet, what can we make of nibbana in our practice? Can it be something that becomes a part of our approach to life and to meditation?

I want to suggest two ways that the element of nibbana can come alive for us. One way is to understand that there can be a temporary—what you might say—foretaste of nibbana in our ordinary day-to-day experience. And it is basically at those times when greed, aversion, and delusion go away. So starting to be alive to, awake for the possibility that when we check on our attitude—is there greed, is there aversion, is there delusion present?—none of those factors may be present. And that at that point, the mind free from greed, aversion, and delusion, at least as far as we can tell, at least first approximation, is a mind that's enjoying a little bit of the taste, the flavor of the release of nibbana.

Ajahn Buddhadasa wrote a really lovely little pamphlet, which I think you can find on the internet, called "Nibbana for Everyone"—not just the property of arahants, nibbana for everyone. He said, "Nibbana is a natural condition. It is the cool state of mind without any kilesas or defilements. That is, without the qualities of greed, hatred, and delusion."

This is not the permanent nibbana that the Buddha discovered. It's not the full nibbana of someone who penetrates directly to the unconditioned and has firsthand knowledge of it. But it is a little bit of a taste that can point our practice in that direction.

In fact, Ajahn Buddhadasa went on to say that we're having many moments of this coolness every day—that we are all experiencing many moments of this temporary nibbana, as he called it. And he said, if we didn't, we'd all be going crazy, because who could stand to be burned by the defilements nonstop all the time?

So this is one way that you can start to have the flavor of this in your practice. Look for those times perhaps the mind has been struggling with an agenda of desire or some resistance of aversion, some delusion of not seeing or not understanding. And as you stay with that experience, paying close attention, the mind will come out of it. At some point, those kilesas will pass—and feel the coolness of that release, of that transition, and know that that's a little bit of the flavor of everyday nibbana.

What else in our experience might be like nibbana? What has the quality of being ever-present, unchanged, and yet accommodating without disturbing all the arisings which are of the conditioned realm?

On a physical level, space kind of has this property, doesn't it? Physical space can accommodate anything. It accommodates all of us. It accommodates all the furniture. Physical space accommodates the earth. And then, of course, when we turn to the big mind meditation, we tune into that inner space which is pervaded by awareness. So we talk about the empty space of awareness.

So we might say that this inner space of awareness also has some of the qualities of nibbana, doesn't it? Whenever we look for it, it always seems to be there. Everything can come and go within it and it's not obscured. It's not stained. It's not harmed by that.

Its nature is peaceful. Nibbana is often described in the texts as the stilling of all formations. This empty space of awareness has that still quality, doesn't it? Because it's ever-present when we turn to it, I wonder if it has the quality of being the deathless.

But when we think back to those three components that make us up—form, mental formations, and consciousness—the Buddha said all three of those are impermanent. All three are coming and going and so can't be a proper refuge. So if consciousness is impermanent, is awareness any different? It seems stable, doesn't it? But could it be another flickering on and off, like the stability of the walls?

So is awareness permanent or impermanent? Deathless or conditioned? I don't know if this question interests you, but it interests some of us very much. And I think it was essentially the spur that led Joseph to write this really wonderful book that he wrote a few years ago called One Dharma. If you haven't had a chance to read it, I highly recommend it. He talks about this from a number of different angles and talks about the response of different schools of Buddhism in answering this question.

I don't want to go into all the different schools tonight because that would take a long time. I want to give you my answer. Realize this is just one person's opinion, but this is what I'd like to talk about.

I want to suggest that awareness actually is synonymous with consciousness and that it's not strictly deathless, but that it serves as a very good approximation to the deathless. You can use it that way as a skillful means in your practice and put a lot of trust in it. It can be a wonderful refuge. Philosophically, when we investigate the actual nature and detail of it, I would say it is not actually deathless. But it sure looks like it, so it works really well.

The other reason that it serves so well as an approximation for the deathless is that it has a direct link, a direct connection to the unconditioned. And that's what I want to draw out with this image.

I want to ask you to do a little experiment—a little thought experiment. Please humor me a little longer. Please imagine that you're on the edge of our solar system. Your back is toward the sun. Your space suit is taken care of, and you have a non-reflective visor. Your back is to the sun and you're looking out into a part of the sky. Let's just say, for point of hypothesis, that doesn't have any stars in it. Your back is to the sun. You're looking into the sky. There are no stars where you're looking.

What do you see? Not a trick question. You see anything? No, it's just black, right? And it's not the color black, but it's just the total absence of light, right? So you're looking into this space and there's the total absence of light, but your back is to the sun. Let's assume your shadow is negligible. Is there actually light in that space in front of your eyes? By light, I mean packets of light energy, photons, electromagnetic radiation.

Yeah, it's full of light, isn't it? Because the sun's light is just streaming out in all directions. So that space in front of you is actually pervaded by the light of the sun, but you don't see it. That light is always there. You could say it's ever-present, but you don't notice it.

Now, let's say a meteorite flies through space in front of your eyes. Don't worry too much about the physics. Do you see the meteorite? Yeah. It's really clear, right? Because it's reflecting the sunlight that's already there back to your eyes.

That's an impermanent arising. It only comes for a second and then it's gone. But it's possible because of this ever-present light that's permeating the space—the infinite space permeated by ever-present light.

So I want to suggest that the infinite space permeated by ever-present light is the unconditioned in its aspect of emptiness, which is the space that's not full, and luminosity—that this is always there. When an object arises, that object is illuminated as a flashing into consciousness. So you could say the light and the object are revealed together, but that's impermanent. That's an analogy for consciousness and the object coming up together. And the luminosity pervading the empty space is an analogy for the unconditioned. This is the way I understand our nature.

Some schools don't agree with this view. Some schools do.

As I understand awareness, it always comes with something being known. Without something being known, we wouldn't feel aware. Often it's the body, it's sounds, thoughts, emotions. A lot of times when you feel the spacious extent of awareness, I want to suggest that what's being known is physical space. You can reflect on that a bit. But all of those things can be known because the luminosity is intrinsic to the nature of our experience, to this dimension of nibbāna.

So I want to suggest that nibbāna is the combination of emptiness and luminosity—unmoving, unchanging, and having the capacity to reveal the whole conditioned world.

When we practice a practice like Big Mind and we kind of let our awareness unhook from the individual objects that we may have been fixated on, can you feel how that shifts your center of gravity away from individual phenomena into this kind of mysterious presence of awareness? As it unhooks from the individual phenomena, it opens us up into this at least approximate union of emptiness and awareness.

We aren't exactly seeing the unconditioned in our day-to-day experience. Usually that perception is a shift, an abrupt shift in experience. But we are sort of letting that unconditioned nature come through to us, come through to our intuition. And with it is a sense of peace.

"The tides of conceiving do not sweep over one who stands upon the foundations of wisdom and peace. And when the tides of conceiving no longer sweep over one, they are called a sage at peace. The sage at peace is not born, does not age, does not die. They are not shaken and they are not agitated, for there is nothing present in them by which they might be born."

So this luminosity has an unborn quality. It has not come into the manifest world yet. But when an object arises within it, then its light is made manifest. And we are in the conditioned manifest realm. And yet right within it, permeating it, is this unconditioned luminous nature.

Ajahn Buddhadāsa: "This emptiness is self-existent. Nothing can touch it, concoct it, or improve it. This is the eternal state, for it knows neither birth nor death. Once the mind is rid of delusion, it discovers its primal state, the true original mind, which is satipaññña, or mindfulness and wisdom."

Some teachers have a way of manifesting this kind of understanding or this kind of attainment. And I want to close by telling you a story of a meeting with one of these people.

I was in Kathmandu practicing with one of my Tibetan teachers. It was a few years ago. There was a very esteemed senior lama visiting his monastery at that time. The lama's name was Nyoshul Kan Rinpoche. I had some money that a friend asked me to offer to Rinpoche as dāna because the friend was a student of Nyoshul Ken Rinpoche.

So I told my teacher I'd like to pass on some dāna to Kempo, that was his name in short, from this student in the States. My teacher said, "Would you like to offer it to him personally?" And I said, "No, I don't need to. You can give it to him." In the back of my mind was kind of, seen one lama, you've seen them all.

And then I thought about it, and I thought, "You know, I actually would like to meet him because I've heard so much about him."

So a meeting was arranged, and I was ushered into his room, and he was sitting up in a meditation posture. I was a little nervous because he's such a well-known and esteemed lama. He died a few years ago, unfortunately.

So I made my bows, we had a short conversation, and then my teacher encouraged me to offer the envelope with the donation to Khenpo. So I did, and as I offered it to him, I looked up into his eyes.

And just in that moment, he seemed to go into a deep meditative state as he looked directly into my eyes. His eyes moved slightly apart, and I felt such a stillness in his mind that it wouldn't even be right to say that his mind was still. There was no mind there to be either still or moving. It was just like looking into this deep ocean of peace.

What I actually felt it was like was looking directly into Nibbana. I felt if I could have just kept looking there a little longer, who knows what might have happened. That was the nature of mind. The meeting ended, and I left, but the image has always stayed with me.

It showed me something that I think the Buddha had—a deep presence of tranquility and unmovability that perhaps was the reason that his talks, unlike our own, can enlighten so many people. There was something in that quality of presence, that depth of being, that could transmit understanding beyond words.

So let's just sit together for a moment in that spirit of deep presence, allowing ourselves to touch that same ocean of peace that exists within each of us.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 30

The Pure And Luminous Mind

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

> In this dharma talk from a retreat setting, Guy Armstrong examines the Buddha's profound teaching that "this mind is luminous, but it is colored by visiting defilements." He explores how our naturally pure awareness becomes obscured by difficult emotional states, yet remains fundamentally untainted underneath. Drawing from the third foundation of mindfulness (cittānupassanā), Armstrong discusses the nature of citta—the heart-mind that encompasses both cognitive and affective experience.
>
> The talk focuses on working skillfully with four primary hindering emotions that bind us to time and circumstance: desire (craving for future pleasure), anger (resentment over past pain), sadness (grief for lost pleasures), and fear (anxiety about future suffering). Armstrong explains how each emotional state has three components: a mental tone or mood, bodily sensations, and sustaining thoughts or stories. He emphasizes that recognizing these patterns is the crucial first step, as difficult emotions often operate below the radar of awareness, creating delusion about our actual experience.
>
> Through personal anecdotes and practical guidance, Armstrong demonstrates how mindfulness can transform our relationship with challenging emotions. Rather than trying to eliminate these "visiting defilements," we learn to understand their temporary nature and develop equanimity toward their arising and passing. This process of emotional wisdom gradually reveals the luminous awareness that is our fundamental nature, allowing the beautiful qualities of heart and mind to naturally manifest.

I want to start tonight with a quotation that Carol used in her talk when the Buddha said, "This mind is luminous, but it is colored by visiting defilements. The uninstructed ordinary person does not understand this, so for them there is no cultivation of the mind."

There's this image that in our nature there is this pure and luminous mind, or you could say awareness, that's the foundation for all of us. It gets colored or covered over or stained by these defilements that visit it and obscure it, but it's still there underneath all the time. Ordinary people don't understand this because they dwell so much of the time in the obscurations, and so they don't bother cultivating the mind to uncover this brilliant original nature.

The Buddha goes on: "This mind is luminous and it is free of visiting defilements. The instructed noble disciple understands this as it really is, so for them there is cultivation of the mind." When we gain some conviction that our original nature is pure and undefiled, it gives us the motivation to rediscover that again and again, to open it up so that it becomes more and more our living experience.

So what stands between us and the manifestation of this pure mind are these visiting defilements. The work of cultivation is about understanding their effects and how to release them. That's really what I'd like to talk about tonight.

These forms are many. There are many such visitors—just a very partial list: craving, lust, anger, hatred, aggression, sadness, despair, loneliness, fear, anxiety, terror, shame, jealousy, confusion, guilt. The list could go on and on. In Mahayana Buddhism, it's said that there are 84,000 of these afflictive emotions. But that was invented about 2,300 years ago when life was much simpler. So I think today there must be at least 168,000 of them.

Of course, when the underlying luminous mind is exposed and touched, as it unfolds it has the capacity to bring forth all the beautiful states of mind too. So qualities like love and compassion, joy, wisdom, generosity, non-clinging, renunciation, calm, equanimity, mindfulness—all of these are implicit, you could say dormant, and just waiting to be activated within this pure and luminous mind that is our basic nature. And I trust that there are at least 84,000 of these also. So that's the strength of our nature.

It is really in the activation of these beautiful qualities of mind that we develop the path. So when the Buddha says, "For the noble disciple, there is cultivation of the mind," it means learning to release or liberate the obscuring qualities, the difficult qualities, thereby exposing the pure nature underneath, which then manifests in all the beautiful qualities. This is really the work that we're engaged in here.

When I first started practice, I was in my mid-twenties, and I was very drawn by the idea of enlightenment. Back then, the books that were available were largely from the Zen tradition, and they talked about these old Chinese and Japanese masters who had become enlightened, and that was very appealing to me because it was a way out of my emotional problems. I thought, being lovelorn, being insecure, being lonely—all I have to do is get enlightened and all that stuff will go away. So enlightenment was so appealing because it was going to rid me of my emotional problems. That's really what generated my interest in the path in the first place.

But as I think of the path now, I have a different take on it. Now I think that it's not possible to get enlightened until we've resolved our emotional misunderstandings and cleared up and liberated those forces. Then enlightenment can perhaps visit us. But we need to do this work first. There's no magic bullet that's going to come along in our practice and solve these conundrums for us. So fortunately we don't need that. We can use our own native intelligence to start to relate to these forces of mind and find out how to become free in the middle of them.

It's really about inviting these states to come, not trying to shy away from them or hide from them or avoid them, because we have the capacity to know them and to let them be. This is from Pema Chödrön: "In all kinds of situations, we can find out what is true simply by studying ourselves in every nook and cranny, in every black hole and bright spot, whether it's murky, creepy, grisly, splendid, spooky, frightening, joyful, inspiring, peaceful, or wrathful. We can just look at the whole thing. There is a lot of encouragement to do this, and meditation gives us the method."

Because we actually have the capacity to make peace with this emotional realm, the states that are the source of a lot of our suffering in day-to-day life as well as in retreat, we do have the potential to make peace with this. I like to think of this process as becoming enlightened before we're enlightened. Because as we understand this whole level of the heart and mind, we open to a great deal of inner freedom.

It's not that we have to make any of these states go away. For most of us, they will not go away for a long time completely. They are not uprooted until very advanced stages of development. But nonetheless, we can come to harmony with them through understanding. So even though the first impulse of our mind is to get rid of them, it's not actually what works because it's simply not possible at our level. They don't go away immediately. And that's why we have the opportunity, and it's a great situation for learning, to learn to relate to them directly.

Again, from Pema Chödrön: "The basic obstacle is that we don't like the way reality is now and therefore wish it would go away fast. But what we find as practitioners is that nothing ever goes away until it has taught us what we need to know. If we run 100 miles an hour to the other end of the continent in order to get away from the obstacle, we find the very same problem waiting for us when we arrive."

So tonight I want to explore this whole area of the difficult states of mind, the source of most of our suffering.

I want to ground this exploration in the Buddha's teachings on mindfulness, specifically in what's called the third foundation of mindfulness. While breath and body are included in the first foundation, the area we're examining tonight is significant enough to have its own foundation—the foundation called citta.

We've mentioned this word several times. Citta can be translated as either heart or mind, encompassing both affective and cognitive qualities. When we say citta, we always mean both dimensions. In the West, we tend to split heart and mind, but in the Buddha's teaching, they were never separated. One teacher suggested that the best translation for citta is psyche—a beautiful way to understand it. This is the realm of our psyche we're exploring today.

If you ask a person in Thailand where their mind is located, they'll point to the center of their chest. Ask someone in the West, and ninety-nine out of a hundred will point to their head. But in Asia, it's assumed that the heart and mind are located here in the chest.

There's a wonderful story that illustrates this cultural difference. You've probably noticed the abundance of neuroscience research today, where scientists use rigorous methods to prove meditation's benefits for mind and body. One of the foremost researchers is Richie Davidson from the University of Wisconsin at Madison, who is himself a meditator. He pioneered studies of Tibetan monks—meditation adepts who were placed in functional MRI machines to map their brains as they entered deep meditative states of absorption or generated strong feelings of compassion.

Dr. Davidson has consulted with the Dalai Lama for many years. They've brought His Holiness to meet with American scientists and have traveled to Dharamsala to meet with him there. On one trip to Dharamsala, Richie decided to demonstrate some test equipment to the Dalai Lama and other monks.

Since they couldn't ship an entire MRI machine—a bit too heavy—they brought a cap: essentially a leather shell with strips running down it, fitted with twenty to thirty electrodes along the strips. When placed on a subject's head, the electrodes contact the scalp, and cables running to a computer detect brain activity, measuring and graphing brain waves in real time. They actually ran experiments here a couple of years ago on yogis after a three-month retreat and found very impressive results. So come to a three-month retreat—it really works. We're not sure about nine days yet.

They demonstrated this apparatus for the Dalai Lama in a great hall with about five hundred monks present. After putting the cap on someone, connecting it to the computer, and explaining through a translator how the experiments work, something unexpected happened. When the translation finished, all five hundred Tibetan monks burst into laughter. They found the whole thing absolutely hilarious.

Richie assumed they were laughing because the cap looked silly—which it does. But when they asked what was so funny, the monks explained: They thought it was ridiculous that people would try to study the mind and meditation's effects by examining the brain, because everyone knows the mind is located here, in the center of the chest.

So that's our next challenge: How do we measure the mind at the center of the chest? I don't have the answer for that.

This is the realm of citta—heart and mind, cognition and affect, all experienced through this third foundation. We'll explore the beautiful states of mind as the retreat progresses, so don't be impatient. We won't give you dukkha, dukkha, dukkha the entire retreat. We usually start there and warm up to the beautiful states.

Two important shifts are necessary to feel relaxed and free with difficult emotions that visit us. First, we need an attitude shift—moving from resisting and judging these forces to acceptance and allowing.

Second, as we open in this more allowing way and shine the light of awareness on difficult states, we develop greater understanding of how they work. We begin to see that all these challenging states of mind have their own mechanisms—they operate in particular ways. Because we all share the full range of human emotions, these mechanisms work in remarkably similar ways for everyone.

Through this study, we're learning about our mental nature, which is the same as all human mental nature, and we're understanding the nature of these obscurations.

As we start to study them, we see how they're put together. We see they all have a process of arising, persisting for a while, and then passing away. We start to have great conviction or faith in their temporary nature. None of them are permanent or very long-lasting.

And we start to see that as they manifest their nature, they come in just like weather systems. Just like this warm breeze that came in today lasts for a while and is temporary, as you probably had guessed, so also all the moods that come in arise, last for a while, and pass away. When we can start to understand them just as weather systems, we don't have to own them. They're not particularly yours or mine. They're just these states. And we become familiar with their own nature.

As we do that, we start to see their essential impersonality. We don't have to own them. We don't have to identify with them. They're present. They come. They go. So this is the operation of wisdom. One of the shifts is just of greater openness. The second is greater understanding through the wisdom factor.

In learning about these states, the first thing that's really helpful is to know what we're feeling when we're feeling it. It's not often taught in this culture. I grew up very untrained in this area. So when I came into meditation and I found that one could actually observe the mind and the kinds of moods that came through, for me it was like discovering a new world. There was a whole landscape I hadn't known anything about.

It was like my wife taught a friend of ours who's, I think, 63 years old. She taught her last year to snorkel. This woman had never snorkeled before. They were in warm waters together. And our friend came up from her first time of snorkeling and said what most people do when they have had their first snorkel: "Wow, there's a whole world under there I never knew existed." Because it is amazing, isn't it, if you start to see that. So that's the way it is looking into our mind. There's a whole world of beautiful states and difficult states that live and breathe and move within us. But until we've closely looked and examined, we don't sort of know that landscape and terrain. So it's a very interesting exploration.

Kids, I think, have a tremendous potential for learning this early. One of our Sangha members at Spirit Rock runs a preschool. And because it's the Bay Area, it turned out that all the parents of the kids in her preschool were supportive of meditation. It might not happen everywhere, but it happened for her. So she has about 20 kids who are aged 3 to 5 in this preschool, and because the parents were into it, she's basically structured it as Dharma training for these children.

She has them from 9 to 1, five days a week. She tells them stories from spiritual sources like the Jataka tales, early lives of the Buddha, other traditions that have clear spiritual messages. She teaches them yoga asanas where she uses the animal poses and makes stories about what the animals are doing while the kids are in the yoga poses. And she teaches them to meditate and takes them into a meditation room and encourages them to sit. And she has these three- to five-year-olds quiet, sitting quietly for 30 minutes at a time because they've so soaked up kind of the vibe of the stories and the movements and everything else. It's an extraordinary thing that she's doing.

One of the ways that she gets them into this meditative state is that she has them do yoga postures and they end up in a lying down posture at the end. I think it's savasana. And as they lie down, see, they can't relate to words like calm and awareness. That's not in their vocabulary, but they relate really well to images. So she said, as you settle down into the floor, imagine that you're just falling into a pool of water. And then you're becoming the pool of water. And within this pool of water, all the fishes swim. And the fishes are your emotions. You can have a happy fish swim through your water. You can have a mad fish swim through your water. A sad fish can come. A friendly fish can come.

All the fish can come and swim through your water. Just lie down and open up the water and let all the fish come.

So one five-year-old boy got up from this exercise and he said, "I could let all my fish come except the mad fish." And she said, "Well, why couldn't you let the mad fish come?" And he said, "Well, when you don't know that you're the water, the mad fish makes you do things that hurt other people."

When you don't know you're this pure, luminous mind in which everything moves, the mad fish makes you do things. It's amazing. The kids have this kind of intuitive understanding available. And we can learn it. We can learn it also. But for me, it wasn't so easy. It wasn't so apparent in the beginning.

I'll give you a little example. I was doing a long meditation retreat sitting in this hall in the early years of my practice. And I'd been settled in for about two weeks, so I was pretty present and pretty concentrated. The morning sitting had ended—I think it was 9:15—and I went out the back door to go for walking down on the grass that's below the parking lot. And I felt I was being very mindful as I left the hall. I was with every step, slowly lifting and placing and lifting and placing.

I got out the back door, and I looked down to my walking area, and there was somebody on my walking path. And I'd been walking in that path every walking period for two weeks. And I look out there and I go, "How could somebody walk in my walking path? I've been there every period. Haven't they been observant?" And then I was just very mindfully still walking, lifting and placing and lifting and placing. I get a little closer and I think, "Are they trying to play head games with me? You know, did I cut in front of them in breakfast this morning or something?" Lifting and placing.

And so all this time I was kind of getting steamed that somebody was in my walking place. But I walked down there and I found another stretch of grass not far away. And to my surprise, it worked just as well. So I was doing my walking, I was about thirty minutes in, and I was still dwelling on this guy who was in my walking path, and all of a sudden I realized: I'm angry. I hadn't picked up on it. I thought I was being really mindful by being with the lifting and the placing, and I was missing the main thing that was happening to me.

This is what we mean by delusion. When I say delusion is not knowing what's happening to us, I was in a state of delusion. I thought I was mindful, but I didn't even know what I was feeling, and it was the main thing that was going on.

When I didn't know what I was feeling, I was completely caught up in it. I believed in my story—that it was my walking path, and that guy shouldn't be there. And I was right and they were wrong. And as I was telling myself this story over and over again, what happened is my mind just kept going back to that person. And I might still be with my feet, but I wasn't really with what was happening. So I was caught. I was completely identified. I believed in the story.

When I realized I was angry, it was like a light bulb went on in my mind. "Oh, anger." Then, instead of pointing all my attention at the other person, I could turn the attention to my inner experience. "Oh, there's anger here." Then I had a possibility of release because I knew how to meditate with anger. I knew how to feel it in the body. I knew how to feel it in the mind. I knew to look for the kinds of thoughts that were going on. But until I recognized it, I couldn't even do that meditative work. I was just completely glued to it.

So this is what these hindering energies tend to do. We think we're being mindful, but they slip in under the radar. Boom, they establish themselves, they take us over, they point us in some other direction—with anger toward the person that we're annoyed about—and we really lose touch with what's going on inside.

So the first step, and it's really the most important step, is to turn that attention back to ourselves and say, "Oh, what I'm feeling now is anger," or whatever else it is. So be aware of this with these hindering qualities.

They're quite tricky. They seduce us in a different direction away from mindfulness. But if we can just remember first to recognize they're there, mindfulness is reestablished, delusion is dispelled a little bit, and we can start to work. We can start to relate.

So there are a few states of mind that I want to talk about specifically tonight. There are four big ones that I see again and again in my practice and in meditators that I work with.

One of the curious things about these difficult states of mind, the unwholesome states, is they're bound up with time. Anytime you're caught in one of these hindering energies, you are also caught in the web of time. Wholesome states don't have this quality. Just in a moment, very freshly, we can feel love or joy or compassion or generosity, not dependent on past or future. But when the hindering energies are there, we're locked somewhere in past or future with them. So this is one of the main axes on which these hindering energies unfold.

The other axis they unfold in is pleasure and pain. We've talked about how this human life is such an unpredictable mix of the pleasant and the unpleasant. And our tendency to lose our balance is largely due to that. We don't know which is going to come. We don't know quite how to rest in the middle.

So I want to suggest that the four main obstructing energies come from this combination of pleasure and pain mapped against past and future. Let me ask you to investigate a little bit with me.

Let's start with one quadrant: past pleasure. There was a pleasurable experience in the past, but it's no longer here. What's the emotion that attends upon that kind of event? There was past pleasure, but it is no longer. Sadness, isn't it? It was here, it was beautiful, I've lost it, and that engenders sadness. This is a strong part of human experience—our response to pleasurable things that were in the past.

Now let's take an unpleasant experience from the past, particularly one connected to another person. What arises? Anger. Anger arises if we remember something that somebody did to us that was unpleasant in the past. And that's another very strong human experience.

Pleasant in the future—that's craving, isn't it, or desire. When we think about something pleasant that could happen in the future, that sparks desire.

And what about unpleasant in the future? Fear.

So I want to suggest that these are the main four dominant kinds of hindrances that come to us: sadness, anger, desire, and fear. These are the four I want to touch on this evening. There are many others—this is by no means exclusive, and you'll find different variations of these. One variation I want to touch on is that when the anger is directed against ourselves, it takes a particular form of self-judgment. It's another strong one for meditators in retreat. And to this group, I want to add one other that I'll talk about toward the end: the factor of doubt.

Each of these four, which can come and visit us frequently in daily life or in meditation retreat, has three main components that I would suggest to you as a meditator are very, very helpful to investigate and explore.

The first is every one of these has a mood that is just a quality of mind. There's a mental tone, a kind of coloring that comes into the mind, an atmosphere or a climate, you could say, that is connected with that particular emotion.

He said, "The problem is my girlfriend. I keep thinking about my girlfriend. And I want to be with my girlfriend." So I said, "Well, that's understandable. How does that feel when you have those thoughts about your girlfriend?" And he said, "Well, it feels good to think about her. I love her very much, and it's pleasurable to bring her to mind."

I said, "Okay, that's fine. But tell me, at the end of thinking about your girlfriend for a while, how do you feel?" He paused for a moment and said, "Well, I feel sad." I asked, "Why do you feel sad?" He replied, "Because she's not here."

This is the bittersweet quality of desire. There's immediate gratification in the fantasy, in bringing to mind something we want. But the end result is always a sense of lack, because we're reminded that we don't have what we're fantasizing about. The very act of desiring points to what's missing.

So when you notice desire arising in your meditation practice, investigate this quality. Feel into that tone of wanting, that reaching quality of mind. Notice how it expresses in your body—perhaps as a kind of leaning forward, a tension, an unsettled quality. And then look at the story that sustains the desire. Usually it's something like: "If I had this thing, this person, this experience, then I would be happy. Then I would be fulfilled."

This story is the glue that keeps the desire spinning. It's the belief that our happiness depends on getting something that's not here right now. But when you look carefully, you can see that the very structure of desire guarantees dissatisfaction. It's always pointing away from this moment toward some imagined future fulfillment.

The interesting thing is that when you see this clearly—not intellectually, but in your direct experience—the desire often just collapses. You don't have to fight it or push it away. You simply see its inherent frustration, and it naturally releases its grip.

This doesn't mean you won't want things or that you'll become some kind of emotionless robot. It means you won't be driven by the compulsive quality of wanting. You won't believe the story that your happiness depends on getting what you desire.

What's wrong? He said, well, this is our vacation time. It was August. And he said, I had two choices. Some friends invited me to go on a vacation to the Caribbean with them, or I could come on this meditation retreat. And I said, why did you come here? He said, because all the tickets to the Caribbean were sold out.

So we were his second choice. And it looked pretty austere compared to Caribbean beaches and the warm waters and being with his friends. And he said he just wasn't getting into being here. But I worked with him to see if maybe the problem was not the absence of the Caribbean, but the presence of the wanting. Because wanting has this unfulfilling quality—when we dwell in it, we feel unsatisfied. Wherever we are, we'll feel unsatisfied if we're wanting something else.

So I suggested, what would happen if you just didn't think about the Caribbean for a while and just were in the present moment? How would that be? And he came back a few days later. He had kind of let go of the Caribbean fantasies, and he had really settled into being in the retreat, and then it was no problem. He settled in, and the meditation unfolded beautifully.

Once we settle into the retreat, the desire force tends to express itself in relation to retreat life. So the things that we start to want are peaceful sittings, concentration, special insights, feelings of expansiveness, a moving quality of loving-kindness. Those are a little harder to pick out because they're so embedded within our environment. But start to tune in that they have the same dissatisfying nature and that it's only when we can release them that we can fully settle back into the moment the way that it is.

So when desire is present, notice how the force feels in the mind. I find there's a kind of leaning forward, kind of toppling into the future to make the next moment the way that I want it to be. And I start to feel that body tension, just a strain in my body as I'm leaning after something I can't quite get. So the tone in the mind, the sensation in the body, the thoughts that come typically about future, and the story of desire as I look within—something like, I would be happy if only I had that. So it's like a promise of future happiness if we could attain that. You take that storyline out, the force of the fantasy really goes away. So play with that.

When anger is present, we find ourselves dwelling on the incident from the past that caused it. Take a look inside. The mental quality of anger is kind of fiery or burning or hot. You feel inside the body, and it's similar. There's usually a constriction, contraction. There's often quite a lot of energy with anger, but it feels like there's a lot of friction in it, as though it's burning. Sometimes heat comes strongly into the body with anger.

Notice what kinds of thoughts come—probably quite similar to when I was looking at my walking path being occupied. Thoughts of blaming. And so we run the thoughts over and over, blaming the other person, justifying ourselves. Those are the kinds of thoughts that come. So the storyline, for me, feels something like—and you might find variations on this storyline; this is not like fixed in doctrine—but take a look and see what the storyline is for you. For me, the storyline is something like, I'm right and you're wrong. And that's the basic belief that sustains anger. And if you take that belief away, the anger just crumples. This is why it's so helpful to have dialogues.

So also take a look in anger at the feeling in your own experience when anger is present. And if you look within, there's this burning, there's this friction, there's this fiery quality. It's very unpleasant. It's a very unpleasant emotion to feel. So there's a saying in the tradition that anger is like drinking poison and hoping the other person will get sick. It doesn't work so well.

One of the most convincing things for me to encourage me to let go of the blaming thoughts was the realization that I was the one who had the poison. Especially in an environment like this, we may be angry at somebody here, we may be angry at someone at home, but we're the ones who are suffering and they're going about their way very happily, quite unaware of the poison that we intended for them.

Another image from our tradition is anger is like picking up a hot coal to throw at someone. But before we can throw it, we have to pick it up, and then we get burned. So I found it very, very helpful in anger to feel the suffering that the state brings to me. Now, that encourages me often to let go of these blaming thoughts because the blaming thoughts keep adding fuel to that fire. Every time I think another blaming thought, the fuel gets thrown on and the fire gets higher.

So it encourages me not to think those thoughts anymore. And when I stop thinking those thoughts, the fire starts to die down. But just stopping to think those thoughts is kind of an act of faith, because at first I thought, "Oh, well, if I don't think those thoughts, then I will be condoning that person's action. I'll be saying, oh, what that person did was fine." And it may not be fine.

You know, it could be accurate that you were right and they were wrong. That could be a kind of clear perception because awful things happen in the world to very innocent people. These things happen. There's war and there's torture going on in so many countries around the world. In our own culture, there's individual violence and domestic violence, racism, assault, and all kinds of injustice taking place that are wrong, unskillful acts.

The question is, even if we perceive that clearly, do we need to keep telling ourselves that story? Once we've understood that someone did something that was unskillful and perhaps motivated by ill will or malice, do we need to keep telling that story, thereby fueling the anger? Or is it possible to hold it with the understanding that yes, that was unskillful on their part, but we don't need to consume ourselves with anger?

The Dalai Lama tells this story of a monk that he used to know in Tibet. The Dalai Lama left Tibet in 1959 after almost 10 years of Chinese occupation and fled to India. This monk stayed in Tibet, was not able to leave at that time, and was eventually imprisoned by the Chinese government for about 20 years. And then finally he got out and escaped to India and met the Dalai Lama in Dharamsala.

So the Dalai Lama received the monk and they had a conversation because the Dalai Lama makes an effort to meet people who have escaped from Tibet. So they were talking about the monk's time in prison. And the Dalai Lama asked him how his treatment had been. And the monk said that he had been in danger. And the Dalai Lama said, "Yes, of course, you must have been very worried about being tortured or even killed." And the monk said, "I was tortured, but that's not what I meant by being in danger. I meant I was in danger of being angry, but I wasn't."

The Dalai Lama said after that, he had to conclude that this monk was a very developed practitioner. This is an extraordinary capacity. It's not a capacity I have. But to me it's very inspiring to know that this is even part of our human potential. To have that kind of mistreatment and to be able to hold it without moving into anger. Because anger doesn't often accomplish a lot for ourselves. There is a strength in it that we may be able to draw on and to use, but we have to be careful of burning ourselves in the process.

One form of anger is self-judgment. And this is something that often comes into people's minds as they enter into the silence, maybe because we're away from social contact. We start to feel the ways that we're very hard and judgmental on ourselves. With self-judgment, most helpful to be able to identify the kinds of thoughts, develop a label for the thoughts as being judging. Notice the impact of that on our mood. Feel the sense, the kind of heaviness and the oppression that comes from self-judgment. And feel the pain and the suffering of it.

Something that really helps to relate skillfully with this is a sense of compassion for ourselves. When we feel the hurt that we bring to ourselves through this judging tendency, let ourselves feel that directly, then some compassion can come in for ourselves.

One of the other strong things we have to deal with in life is a sense of sadness. We've all had a lot of disappointments in life. There have been things that we hoped would turn out that didn't, things that we hoped would turn out better than they have. With sadness, often I think we're afraid to open to that feeling because there may be a belief, "If I open to this, it will never end. I'll drown in it, and it's bottomless and will never lift."

But notice that that's just a belief. And so to have the courage to open and let that feeling come through, feel it in the body. Sometimes there's a heaviness, just a kind of weightiness, maybe in the chest. Feel the mood of sadness. Notice the thoughts. And the storyline for me in sadness is something like, "I can't be happy because I've lost that," that thing that it's focused on. And if we believe in that, we don't allow ourselves even a moment of opening to real happiness. Happiness could be a possibility of just an opening in this moment to a delight or joy. But if we believe in the storyline of sadness, we can't find that willingness. We can't find that openness even for a moment.

So most grief has its own timeline.

If we open and let ourselves feel, not resist, it will move through us. Grief often moves in waves—it comes, and at some time will pass. So we need to trust in that natural process in order to allow the sadness to have its movements.

One of the particular hindrances that meditators encounter, which I wanted to touch on briefly, is the quality of doubt. In this sense, it's skeptical doubt, particularly about the activity we're engaged in here. You'll notice this when the question comes up, often early in retreat: "What on earth am I doing here?" We can't seem to connect with why we came. We can't make any sense out of the instructions being given. The question arises: "What does sitting on my butt and following my breath have to do with happiness for myself or anybody else?" None of it makes any sense.

Then we often fall into questioning the teachings, the practice, the teachers, ourselves, or all of the above. When doubt comes, if it isn't seen clearly, it's in a way the most paralyzing of all the hindrances because the uncertainty, the indecision stops us in our tracks. It keeps us from taking a single step forward. We can't make a commitment to anything.

It's like we've come to a crossroads. Should I go right? Should I go left? Should I go straight ahead? And we can't move in any direction because there's not enough determination to take that step. So we just stand at the crossroads and kind of dither.

If we dither with the meditation, then we don't give ourselves a chance to carry out this experiment. Someone in an interview this morning said something interesting: "This is like an experiment where we're the scientists, but we're also the laboratory." That's really quite accurate. This mind-body investigation is an experiment, and there's a certain formula that we suggest you follow to carry out the experiment. We suggest that if you do, these are the results that will happen.

But it's like you get to the doorway of the experiment and you don't mix the chemicals. Then you go off at the end of the week and say, "Well, nothing happened. I guess this stuff doesn't work, or it wasn't the right thing for me."

So if doubt is there, it can completely block our ability to open and progress in the meditation practice. Once we recognize it, we can see its paralyzing nature and we can just take that determination: "I'm just going to follow, I'm just going to do it, then I'll check after."

The last quality of mind I wanted to touch on tonight is fear. Fear was something that had a really strong presence in my practice in my early years. It was my main hindering energy, and I had to spend a lot of time coming into it, touching it again and again and again.

One of the first things I saw is that when fear arose, I was afraid of it. That tended to multiply it. As fear arose, I'd get more scared. As that got bigger, I'd get more scared. It would be this spiral, and I didn't know how to work in that situation.

What was very helpful for me was learning to come into the body first and foremost. When fear arose, I would always bring my attention directly into the body and just feel whatever sensations were there. It might be a contraction in the belly. It might be a kind of fluttery, light feeling through the chest. There might be sweat under the arms. I would direct all my attention, all that I could muster, to just being with those body sensations.

I would ask myself, "Can I open and feel these? Can I allow these to be present?" And I found that after contact, after contact, after contact, I could. I found that they were bearable.

As I investigated the storyline of fear, it was something like: "This moment is bearable, but something really awful is going to happen in the next." So if I could come back into this moment and bear it, that sort of undercut the fear. That's where I directed my energy: "Can I open and bear the manifestation in this moment?"

First I got comfortable or familiar with the body sensations. They didn't get pleasant, but I could bear them. Then I looked at the state of the mind.

And in the mind, the tone of fear carries a quality of wanting to get away, wanting to move away, wanting to flee, not wanting to feel. So I tried to bring openness to that too. Generally, little by little, I would bring more and more acceptance to the body, to the mind, understanding the story of the fear, and it grew more and more workable. But I still really didn't like it—and this was after many, many encounters.

Finally, one day I was sitting with the fear, and I noted that I still had resistance to it, even after working to bear it so many times. I asked myself: if I was truly going to be accepting of this, could I be okay if this stayed like this for the rest of my life? That, to me, was a sign of true acceptance. Could I be okay with this for the rest of my life? And the answer was no. Are you kidding? No way.

But I didn't stop there. I investigated further: why? Why couldn't I accept this being here for the rest of my life? What came into my mind were images of things I had enjoyed intensely in life up to that point. I would think of times listening to a piece of music, so involved that I'd be in rapture of delight, strong emotions that the music unlocked. Or watching a sunset somewhere beautiful in nature when I was completely open, with a sense of just merging with the sky and the earth—that sense of oneness and deep connection.

I thought I'd have to give these things up if I was going to be fearful. So I sat with that for a moment and thought: you're going to resist it now on the off chance that one of these things might come along later? I realized I was giving up my present equanimity and peace of mind in the hope of some future getting high. Then I just realized that wasn't a good trade.

So I opened to the possibility that I could be with this state the rest of my life and that I could be okay with that. When I did that, the fear lost some deep hold on me. That degree of openness broke something in the grip that fear had held over me. I went through a period of practice where I was completely equanimous to fears arising or not arising. If it came, that was fine. If it didn't come, that was also fine. I truly had no preference.

Since then, fear has come back a number of times—visits from time to time. But I feel I have the way to understand it and relate with it, and it doesn't throw me off balance these days. Of course, I haven't faced a lot of difficult life situations yet, so I'm not making claims about the future, but it's become much, much more workable.

With all these difficult energies that come, we have the potential to bring that same level of equanimity and acceptance to anything that visits us. Your particular main one may be sadness, or desire, or self-judgment, or fear, or anger. But the capacity is there for each of us to develop this complete equanimity in relation to these states so that they really don't obstruct us or obscure us any longer.

As we do that, we find that we start to clear out a lot of space in the mind—areas that were formerly problematic. Experiences in life that we couldn't accept were felt as a threat or problem. They aren't intrinsically problematic, but if we avoid them, then there's a problematic relationship that leads to suffering. As we can open to them, a lot of those problem areas just clear out.

Difficult emotions are one of the most challenging areas of life. So those problems, one by one, as we understand and as we open, start to disappear from life. We begin to develop great confidence that we can relate to whatever life throws at us, because we've learned to relate with some of the most difficult aspects of our hearts and minds.

I'd like to close tonight with this quote from the Tibetan tradition—The Blessings of Gampopa, who was a disciple of the famous Tibetan yogi Milarepa. It's presented as a kind of prayer or supplication, but you can think of it as directed to anyone you like: to a guru, to a deity, to a higher power, to your own inner wisdom. Understand it in whatever way makes sense to you.

The Four Blessings of Gampopa:
Grant your blessing so that my mind follows the Dharma.
Grant your blessing so that my Dharma practice becomes the path.
Grant your blessing so that the path clarifies confusion.
Grant your blessing so that confusion dawns as wisdom.

Let's simply sit together for a moment in this understanding.

Grant your blessing so that the path clarifies confusion.
Grant your blessing so that confusion dawns as wisdom.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 31

A Brief History of Buddhism in India - Part 1

Guy Armstrong · 56 min

> In this comprehensive historical survey, Guy Armstrong explores the fascinating evolution of Buddhism from the Buddha's death (Parinibbāna) in 463 BCE through the formation of the eighteen early schools. Drawing connections between ancient sectarian debates and contemporary Western Buddhist discussions, Armstrong examines key developments including the Second Council's East-West divide, the emergence of the Mahāsaṅghika and Theravāda schools, and the compilation of the Abhidhamma Piṭaka. He traces how the Sarvāstivāda school's influence through Kashmir shaped what became Tibetan Buddhism, while the Theravāda tradition preserved the complete Pāli Canon in Sri Lanka. Armstrong skillfully weaves together scholarly historical analysis with practical insights for modern practitioners, showing how ancient philosophical disagreements about karma, the nature of time, and the authority of scripture continue to resonate in today's diverse Buddhist landscape. This talk provides essential context for understanding the common roots and distinctive developments that shaped both Theravāda and Mahāyāna traditions, making it particularly valuable for Western practitioners encountering multiple Buddhist lineages.

One of the amazing things about Western culture today is that we have available most of the world's religions at our fingertips through bookstores, visits from teachers, and friends who have practiced in various traditions. Just reading through all the interview sheets on this retreat, I think we have most major schools of Buddhism represented, quite a bit of Hinduism, and very little Christianity or Judaism perhaps, but a little here and there. So you all reflect that multi-religious strain.

It's rare that a practitioner in the West today has practiced only with one teacher or in one particular lineage. I find it very awakening that we're subject to all these different influences. It hasn't been like that in Asia for a very long time, probably for over a thousand years since the schools have met and mingled in the way that they're doing now in the West. It's going to be very interesting to see what comes out of this meeting.

It's going to be a long evolution, obviously, because it's not just the meeting of the different Buddhist schools and Hinduism, but also Western psychology is part of the mix. So it's a wonderful opportunity, and at times I think it's also our curse as Westerners, because we hear so many things, we're drawn in so many different ways. Sometimes we don't take the opportunity to go really deeply in one school, but we gain a lot from hearing the different schools that we tune into.

The same was true for me. I started my interest in Buddhism in college by reading Zen. I then discovered Vipassana about four years after I got out of college and practiced that for about twenty years before I met Sogyal Rinpoche on his first retreat in California in 1993. And I loved his teachings from the very beginning.

Sometimes he would be like a playful twenty-six-year-old, which I think is what he was then. I'd be walking down the hallway and maybe I looked a little too somber and he'd reach out and tickle me in the stomach to make me lighten up. And then he'd sit up on the podium and the words that came were like a wise old sage. The Dharma was so pure and elegant.

So I really loved his teachings from the beginning, but it was a little bit of a culture shift, I have to say. I'd spent twenty years getting steeped in the Four Noble Truths and the Eightfold Path and the Four Foundations of Mindfulness. I met Rinpoche, and two days later I was chanting 100-syllable mantras in Sanskrit to this golden-skinned deity who was primordially enlightened beyond time and space. That created a little bit of cognitive dissonance.

And so I said, well, what's going on here? Are these the same religion? Are we even in the same school at all? And as I tuned into Rinpoche's teachings, I began to realize there was a lot more than just Dzogchen in what he was sharing with us. You can hear that in the talks today. He made quite a bit of mention of very basic concepts like the Four Noble Truths and karma and mindfulness, basically the Theravadan kind of foundation. And then he moved on to other topics that are connected with the Mahayana: the topics of emptiness, bodhicitta and compassion. And then he just touched or alluded to some Vajrayana teachings, Dzogchen-po, which we'll start talking about tomorrow, the allusion to the mandala practice and tantric practices. So he touched on all three strains today.

And as I came to look into how this all fit together, I understood what everyone has always talked about: that the Theravada teachings form the foundation, the Mahayana teachings are layered on top of that, and the Vajrayana on top of that. You'll hear that history in his teaching.

So I became very curious to understand how this had all come about and how it all got put together. And it led me to study and then touch on the themes that I want to talk about today and tomorrow, which are: how did we get from the death of the Buddha, the Buddha's Parinirvana, to the origination of Dzogchen? There's about a 1300-year span of history there as Buddhism evolved. How did that happen? What were the steps? What were the schools? What were the stages?

What I found as I started to look into this—one, I was completely wrapped with the history of it because I found that the things that people were arguing about 2,000 years ago are the same things we're arguing about today. If you notice discussions, heated discussions, sometimes debates among different schools of Buddhism today, I can almost guarantee you that they have gone on in the distant past as well. I mentioned this at one of our Spirit Rock teacher meetings, and Deborah, who's here on this retreat, said to me, "Yeah, and probably by the same people." So here we are, continuing the discussion that we may all have begun a thousand or two years ago.

So I found that I was very drawn to the study of our Dharma ancestors and felt a lineage connection to them that I'd never felt with my genetic ancestors. My family of Armstrongs came somewhere out of the border area of England and Scotland, and it's rumored that they were chased out of that area for sheep stealing, but I don't know about that. Ended up in America, and that history never interested me very much. But when I heard about the debates between the Madhyamaka school and the Chittamatra school and the early Vinaya disagreements, that was the lineage I could really feel in my bones.

So this is some of the kind of adventure that I want to share with you tonight, not just as dry historical fact, but because I think it sheds a lot of light on where we are in the West today and the kinds of issues that challenge us and stretch us as we open to the different views and the different schools that are alive in Buddhism today.

One of the frames that I'd like to put on this is that I believe that we have a great opportunity to hold these different philosophical views in a new light apart from the sectarianism of the past, that we can find common ground in our understanding of them. And to frame that, I'd like to read a quotation of the Buddha from the Sutta Nipata, one of the early texts in the Pali Canon:

"This I do now declare. After investigation, there is nothing among all the views that such a one as I would embrace."

Seeing misery in philosophical views without adopting any of them and searching for truth, I discovered inner peace. For one who is free from views, there are no ties. For one who is delivered by understanding, there are no follies. But those who grasp after views and philosophical opinions wander about in the world annoying people.

So let's hope that we can refrain from annoying one another and use our diversity of understandings to enrich our practice and our approach to practice.

Another amazing aspect of Buddhism's history that struck me was its extraordinary reach. At one time or another, Buddhism covered almost all of what we now call Asia. It began in northern India along the Ganges Valley, and within just a few hundred years had spread throughout the entire subcontinent. From there it migrated west into Pakistan and Afghanistan—you may remember evidence of this from those magnificent tall standing Buddhas that the Taliban destroyed seven or eight years ago. Buddhism also journeyed north into Tibet and China, Korea and Japan, and spread throughout Southeast Asia. Much of Southeast Asia remains Buddhist today: Sri Lanka, Burma, Thailand, Cambodia, Vietnam, and Laos. The dharma reached as far as Indonesia, where you can still find the remains of that magnificent temple at Borobudur on the island of Java, one of the great Buddhist complexes in the world.

Virtually the whole of Asia was Buddhist at one time or another. Yet when you look around all those regions today, Buddhism has either disappeared or is in decline. It's sobering to realize that in places where Buddhism was once so strong, its influence is now waning. As far as I can see, the only places experiencing real resurgence are due to Tibetan refugees, who are changing the face of Buddhism in India and finding welcome homes in places like Singapore, Hong Kong, and Taiwan. Otherwise, the outlook is challenging. The situation in Tibet remains difficult. Throughout much of Southeast Asia, what hasn't been lost to communism is in danger of being lost to capitalism. The Tibetan refugees, however, are doing extraordinary work to preserve and transmit the dharma.

Let's begin our exploration of Buddhism's evolution from the pivotal moment of the Buddha's death. The scholarly consensus places the Buddha's parinirvana at 463 BCE. A word about nomenclature: I grew up using the terms BC and AD, but in Buddhist scholarship these Christian-centric terms are replaced with BCE (Before the Common Era) and CE (Common Era), which correspond to the same dates without the Christian overlay.

What happens when a charismatic founder dies? People maintain harmony for a while, then they start arguing. This is exactly what occurred after the Buddha's parinirvana. The Sangha actually got along quite well for about a hundred years. Then reports began circulating that a group in the East was becoming rather radical. They allegedly wanted to change the Vinaya, the monastic code of discipline, to allow monks to handle money—something the original Vinaya explicitly prohibited. This eastern group also rejected the claim that the Buddha's words were the sole authority for dharma understanding. Instead, they argued that personal inner experience could serve as equal authority to the Buddha's teachings, and that rational mind and logic could also guide dharma interpretation.

When news of these liberal views reached the elders in the West—the more conservative faction—a familiar tension emerged. Interestingly, in our contemporary American Buddhist scene, the roles are reversed: the West Coast is considered the liberal wing while the East Coast represents the conservative tradition. Yet the same fundamental struggle continues: How quickly should the dharma adapt to new cultural contexts? What should authorize such changes? Should we abandon traditional texts simply because a charismatic teacher claims a powerful experience that contradicts established teachings? To what extent should we remain aligned with a tradition that has provided a stable foundation for practice and understanding across 2,500 years?

This tension between tradition and innovation seems inevitable in all Buddhist communities and will likely persist for generations to come.

To resolve this ancient dispute, the western elders called for a meeting between the two factions. This gathering became known as the Second Council. To provide context: the First Council had convened immediately after the Buddha's death, when 500 fully awakened beings gathered to establish the authentic legacy of the Buddha's teachings. During that historic assembly, the monk Upali recited the complete Vinaya, the monastic code of discipline.

Another monk, Ananda, who had been the Buddha's attendant, recited all the discourses of the Buddha that he could remember. These became the collection of the suttas. So the Vinaya Pitaka and the Sutta Pitaka were assembled immediately after the death of the Buddha, and those became the formally recognized teachings.

The Second Council was called about one hundred years later to resolve the dispute between East and West. The dispute was not resolved. The Western group could not accept the innovations in the East. The Eastern group could not accept being compelled to follow the norms of the West. This was the first split in the Sangha.

The Eastern group became known as the Mahasangikas, the Great Assembly, the Great Sangha. The Western group, because they were more reverent of the past, became known as the Sthavairavadins. That's a Sanskrit word. The Pali translation is Theravada. Sthavairavada in Sanskrit means "the elders." Theravada is the Pali term, and that's what that school became known by. It has continued in one form or another to the present day.

Through all the splintering, altogether eighteen schools were formed in this early Buddhist phase, where the canon of the Buddha's own words was the foundation and the shared understanding. The splintering continued to happen until at least eighteen schools were formed. Of those eighteen schools, only one remains today, and that is the school called Theravada. Some of the other schools were very influential and important. A lot of this has been lost to history. It's rather sad because there have got to be a lot of great stories buried there.

This tradition that I'm part of, that the Vipassana school is part of, is curious in one respect—very different from the Tibetan tradition and different from the Zen tradition. Let me ask you a question: Could you name three Zen masters from China or Japan in medieval times?

"Bodhidharma."
"Bankei."
"Dogen."

Great. There are many others, right? Hakuin and Huangpo, Huineng—the list goes on and on. Zen is a very literate tradition, beginning with Chan in China.

Can you name three Tibetan practitioners in medieval times?

"Milarepa, Marpa, Naropa."

And you could go on and on, right? The volumes are full of names of ancient Tibetan teachers.

Now, I address this specifically to the Vipassana practitioners—Tibetans are also welcome. Can you name three Vipassana or Theravadan teachers between the death of the Buddha and, let's say, the 1800s?

"Buddhaghosa."

Excellent.

"Shantideva."

Shantideva was Mahayana. Anyone else?

This is rather the state of things in our history. There's not a lot recorded. Buddhaghosa is the most famous. He wrote commentaries in the fifth century. A contemporary of his was another monk named Dhammapala. Another famous Theravadan figure is the person who brought the religion to Sri Lanka—his name was Mahinda. Beyond those three, it gets pretty sparse.

Our tradition is not very literate. There were many practitioners, because it's an unbroken oral lineage going back to 463 BCE—or even further, since the Buddha was in there—but not very literate. That's just how it was in our tradition. I think because there was so much emphasis on the words of the Buddha himself, later writers were not as valued.

The splitting continued to happen, and the development continued.

The next important development in the history of the Theravada schools was the assembly of what's called the Abhidhamma. This is the third basket, the third pitaka, alongside the Vinaya and the Sutta Pitaka—the Abhidhamma Pitaka.

If you ask a devout Buddhist in Sri Lanka, Burma, or Thailand how we got the Abhidhamma, they will tell you a story like this: The Abhidhamma had to be delivered uninterruptedly by the Buddha, but it was too long for any human being to receive. So the Buddha, in one rains retreat, ascended to Tushita heaven, spent the three months of the rains retreat there, and delivered the entire Abhidhamma to his mother, who was residing in that heaven realm. He taught her over three months in an uninterrupted fashion. During that same rains retreat, he projected his psychic body down to where one of his disciples, Sariputta, was staying. Every day he would give Sariputta updates: "This is the part of the teaching that I gave today in Tushita heaven." And Sariputta remembered it and assembled it during the lifetime of the Buddha.

Believe that? Western scholars say otherwise.

From my point of view—because, rather like the Dalai Lama, I believe in scientific research more than I believe in words from some old book—if scientific research indicates that any doctrine of Buddhism is incorrect, as the Dalai Lama said, we should toss it out. There's a funny little footnote to this. Carl Sagan was the one who asked him about this. Carl Sagan said, "What if we proved"—he's a great astronomer—"what if we proved that the doctrine of rebirth is wrong? Would you accept that?" The Dalai Lama said, "Definitely. If science proves it wrong, I'll accept that." And then he was still for a minute. He turned to Carl Sagan and said, "How would you prove that?" And Carl Sagan had no idea.

Western scholars have done a lot of research in this area. It's the viewpoint that I'll be presenting tonight. There are very different viewpoints in Asia on some of these questions, so I don't want to get into arguments about who's right—the Asian tradition or the scholars. I just want to tell you what the scholars say and let you make your own decision.

The scholars say the Abhidhamma was not assembled by the death of the Buddha. The first signs of its collection started to appear around a hundred years after the Buddha's death. The Abhidhamma is this amazing volume—actually, it's seven volumes in English. It analyzes in minute detail the workings of the human mind in an ordinary person and also along the path to enlightenment. It details how moments of consciousness come one after another, how the factor of perception arises, how intentions are born, how karma is generated from wholesome and unwholesome intentions, and how all of that can lead eventually to enlightenment.

It's an extraordinary work that had to have been put together by a very, very still and clear mind. It is associated in the lineage with the name of Sariputta, who was the Buddha's disciple foremost in wisdom. Whether that is accurate or not, I don't know. Perhaps it was students of Sariputta who assembled it.

But there's an indication about the character of Sariputta from the story of his enlightenment. He came to the Buddha at the same time as his boyhood friend Moggallana. They were best buddies from early years, and they turned out to be the Buddha's two chief disciples. Moggallana was the one who was foremost in psychic powers. He got the teachings completely in a week. But Sariputta was slow. It took him two weeks to become fully enlightened. And it's said that the reason was that every time he had a new experience, he analyzed it completely to understand what factors of mind were there and what factors were absent and how it was able to unfold. So he had this amazingly analytical approach to his practice, and that's the spirit of the Abhidhamma.

It's extremely analytical and it maps the whole path from, let's say, a non-ego standpoint. It describes the whole thing in terms of elements that are arising and passing, considered by the Abhidhamma to be ultimate elements of mind and body that they called dhammas—things, little things. And these dhammas were considered irreducible. It's more or less the atomistic view of the Buddha's teachings. So these were called the ultimate. The dhammas were called the ultimate. Other names for things were considered conventional or relative. Things like "sentient being," things like "noble truth" were considered conceptual or conventional.

I think one of the things that happened is that the Abhidhamma tried to answer questions that the Buddha had left untouched in his discourses. As you probably know, there were a lot of questions the Buddha didn't answer, such as: How long does it take from one death to the next rebirth? In the Tibetan system, the answer is roughly forty-nine days. In the Abhidhamma system, the answer is zero.

The view they put forward is that as soon as the mind moment ceases in the being who's dying, in the very next mind moment it arises anew in some being who is being conceived. So they say there is no bardo, period.

The Abhidhamma, because it tries to spell out a lot of these unanswered questions, ends up getting the tradition in a lot of trouble, I think. It's interesting when you think back on what the Buddha taught and what he didn't teach.

You may know this famous story of the handful of leaves. The Buddha's walking in a forest with a bunch of monks, and he picks up a handful of leaves from the ground that have fallen to the earth—a handful of dried leaves—and he says, "Which is greater, O monks, the number of leaves in my hand or the leaves on all the trees in the forest?"

The monks are no dummies. They say, "Oh, Bhante, the number of leaves in all the forest is greater."

And the Buddha said, "Just so is what I know. The mind of a Buddha is like the range of all the leaves in the forest compared to what I have revealed to you. I have only revealed this handful of leaves of all that I know, but this handful of leaves is enough for you to become free."

He didn't teach about what wasn't conducive to awakening. There were many philosophical questions he could have answered, but he chose not to because it wasn't necessary. In the Pali texts, the Buddha doesn't even talk very much about what it looks like from the other shore—what the view is from the awakened mind—because he assumes once you get there, you'll know yourself. I don't have to tell you. All you have to know is it's the end of suffering.

So the Abhidhamma becomes a focal point for disagreements because it tried to fill in areas that the Buddha had, I think, wisely left unresolved.

One of these questions came up a couple hundred years later, actually in 250 BCE, about then. A very influential king had risen to power in India named Asoka, or Ashoka in Sanskrit. Asoka was the first Buddhist king in India to hold a wide range of the kingdom in his power. After his conversion—he was not Buddhist by birth, but he converted from his own understanding—he became a great patron of the Dhamma.

The Dhamma flourished under his patronage. You'll see this in the history of Buddhism: where there's royal patronage, court patronage, the Dhamma flowers. Nuns, monks, monasteries, nunneries are supported. When the political climate changes and that support goes away, Dharma dwindles.

So there was a great flowering under Asoka. He vowed to stop making war. He had been an expansionist, conquering, warring king. He vowed to cease attacking neighboring kingdoms. He outlawed animal sacrifices, which were very common in the Vedic tradition, and even tried to turn his court to more vegetarian diets. And he provided liberally for the people in his society.

There's a lovely teaching in the Dīgha Nikāya, one of the sets of the Pali Discourses, where the Buddha talks about why crime arises in a culture. And he says it arises because of poverty, because there hasn't been fair distribution of the material goods in the country. So Asoka knew that and tried to create a just and fair and generous society.

At the time of Asoka, there was another split brewing. And this one was over the question of karma. So everything arises and passes, right? We know that from the teaching on impermanence. So if your past action has ceased, where are the seeds of its fruit? It's said that when we act, those intentions become the seeds for future results, future karmic results. Okay, where are those seeds right now? Show me your seeds.

Different schools have answered this differently. There's a later evolution from the Cittamatra that tries to answer this in a different way. But a school sprang up around 200 years after the Buddha's death that tried to answer this. Their answer was, "Oh, the past and future aren't really gone. They actually exist here and now, along with the present. And that's how the karmic seeds and fruits get carried on. The past isn't really over."

This group became known as the Sarvāstivādins. They're one of the most influential schools of the early schools of Buddhism. But the original school, the Sthaviravādins, or the Theravādins in Pali, couldn't accept this. They said, "No, impermanence is clear. It's one of the three characteristics. The Buddha said so. We reject this doctrine."

And the Sarvāstivādins split off. They were influential for a number of reasons.

One major doctrine that made them influential was their fascinating attempt to resolve the mystery of karma and how it operates across time. Another significant contribution was that they were the first school to systematically stress the importance of the paramis - the perfections. They developed the foundational list of six paramis that would later form the basis for Shantideva's beloved "Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life" and much of Mahayana thinking. These paramis are considered the very foundation of Mahayana practice, yet it was the Sarvastivadins who first articulated them.

Their canon was written in Sanskrit rather than Pali, and unfortunately, no complete copy has survived. The only complete canon that remains today from any of the early schools is the Pali canon of the Theravada tradition. While fragments of other school canons exist, none are complete - the Sarvastivada canon shares this fate.

Despite this loss, the Sarvastivadins wielded enormous influence because of their geographical position. Their power base was centered in the Kashmir region, having moved north and west from the Ganges Valley. There they established flourishing communities of practitioners, teachers, monasteries and nunneries. This location proved historically crucial because Kashmir served as the jumping-off point for the Silk Route.

When the Dharma traveled to Tibet and eventually through Tibet into China, it followed these ancient trade routes. Consequently, what was carried to Tibet was the Sanskrit canon of the Sarvastivadins, not the Pali canon. This partially preserved canon remains embedded in Tibetan Buddhism today. While there's substantial overlap when comparing their canon to the Pali canon, they are not identical traditions.

This historical reality has created an interesting situation. The Pali canon is not part of the Tibetan canon. I've heard Tibetan teachers claim they possess a complete inclusion of Hinayana teachings, but what they actually have is this partial Sarvastivadin canon, which shapes their understanding of what constitutes "Hinayana" Buddhism. Because these traditions were separated for so many centuries without dialogue between Tibetans and Theravadins, there has been limited cross-understanding of what's actually contained in Theravadan practice or the Pali canon.

So you may be relieved to learn that the label "Hinayana" doesn't actually apply to us Theravadins - it applies to this extinct school called the Sarvastivadins, though we certainly shared many philosophical views.

The establishment in Kashmir led to another fascinating development: this variety of Buddhism took root in Mathura and Gandhara. Gandhara produced some of the most exquisite Buddha sculpture I know of. Here's an intriguing historical footnote - there were no Buddha statues until Buddhism encountered Greek culture. It was Greco-Roman sculptural tradition that provided the first inspiration for creating Buddha images. This cultural contact also produced other remarkable exchanges in the western regions, where King Menander, a Greek ruler governing parts of that territory, engaged with Buddhism. His name was rendered as "Milinda" in the local language, and the famous "Questions of King Milinda" records extensive dialogues between this Greek king and the monk Nagasena. This text now forms part of the Pali commentarial literature.

The Sarvastivadins developed their own systematic psychology, though being a Sanskrit tradition, they called it Abhidharma rather than Abhidhamma. They became deeply absorbed in these analytical teachings, which eventually led to yet another significant split with a group called the Sautrantikas.

"Sautra" is simply a grammatical variation of "sutra" - the Sanskrit equivalent of the Pali word "sutta," meaning discourse. So the Sautrantikas were literally "the people who believed in the sutras" - the original recorded words of the Buddha. Their critique was pointed: "We don't trust your elaborate Abhidharma. We believe you've become too fixated on these ultimate dhammas, taking them too literally and concretely. You've fundamentally missed the point. By focusing obsessively on these minute mental arisings and moments, you've lost sight of the heart of awakening - that transformative realization the Buddha was actually pointing toward and trying to cultivate in us." Their solution was to return to relying primarily on the sutras rather than the Abhidharma.

This philosophical tension resonates strongly in contemporary practice. You'll find in Theravadan countries today some teachers and practitioners who regard the Abhidhamma as the ultimate reference point. Let me share an example from my practice in Burma. I met a teacher there who was explaining the Tripitaka structure, saying: "Here's how we understand it - the Vinaya is for sila, ethical conduct; the Sutta-pitaka is for samadhi, teaching us meditation; and the Abhidhamma is for paññā, wisdom."

It's the liberating wisdom. So they held the Abhidhamma above the Sutta-piṭaka. Other practitioners—I confess to counting myself among them—hold the Sutta-piṭaka as the supreme source of wisdom above the Abhidhamma.

One of my teachers in Thailand, a great monk named Ajahn Buddhadasa, who was a wonderful scholar, practitioner, social activist in his way, and teacher, offered a unique perspective on this. Rather than translating Abhidhamma as "higher dhamma" or "supreme dhamma" as is standard, he said his translation for Abhidhamma was "too much dhamma." So he was more of a Sautrāntika in this ancient split that continues today.

These kinds of divisions and discussions persist in our time. The Abhidhamma is a dazzling intellectual work—I can't imagine how it was ever created. I don't think anything like it exists in any other body of literature. But its intellectual dazzle, for me, doesn't carry the living spirit of liberation the way that the suttas do. Other people see it differently, and that's the beauty of this ongoing dialogue.

Around this same time, 250 BCE, while the Sarvāstivādins were splitting off from the Theravādins, a truly important movement occurred: Aśoka sent his son as a missionary to Sri Lanka. His son's name was Mahinda. Aśoka sent out many missionaries because he was a convert who believed deeply in the Dhamma. He had the resources and sent monks all over the known world, even to Europe to plant the seeds of Dhamma there.

I just heard something fascinating this past week—though I haven't been able to verify it from other sources. According to what I read, some Theravādan monks made their way to Greece, where they were known as Therāputrā—meaning "sons of the Theravāda," sons of the elders. This word Therāputrā, spelled T-H-E-R-A-P-U-T-R-A-E, became the root for our word "therapeutic." So according to this account, the teaching of the Dhamma was the original therapy in ancient Greece.

I don't know if this is historically accurate, but it's certainly intriguing. Today we have discussions about whether psychotherapy is the same as Dhamma practice or different, and here we might have the Dhamma as the original therapy itself.

While the monks didn't successfully establish lasting communities in Europe, they did take root in Sri Lanka. Mahinda established monasteries there, and within a few hundred years of his arrival, the body of teachings known as the Pāli Canon was finally written down.

For four hundred years, these teachings existed only in memory—they weren't written down because the technology for writing and storing books simply wasn't available. When the technology developed, the Canon was inscribed on palm leaves, four centuries after the Buddha's passing. So for four hundred years, it was simply memorized.

This is extraordinary when you consider the scope: the Sutta Piṭaka comprises about twenty volumes, the Vinaya Piṭaka seven volumes, and the Abhidhamma Piṭaka seven volumes. All memorized for four centuries. It makes you wonder about reliability—you know how when you play telephone, the message changes after just three people. Yet somehow we have this remarkably consistent and liberating body of teachings.

Initially, I didn't believe that such vast material could be accurately memorized. Part of the preservation system involved different sections of the texts being entrusted to different monasteries and schools, so each had responsibility for preserving a portion of the overall canon. This distributed approach helped ensure the teachings survived and were passed down intact.

But today in Burma, you can still find monks who have memorized the entire Pāli Canon. Personally, I think they might have been better served by meditating, but their accomplishment is undeniable. You can pick any sutta, any paragraph, ask them to recite it, and they will. They undergo examinations testing their textual knowledge. So clearly, this kind of prodigious memory is possible—people are still doing it today.

The Pāli Canon was first written down in Sri Lanka around the first century BCE, approximately four hundred years after the Buddha's death. The significance of this cannot be overstated: Sri Lanka became the only place where the original schools of Buddhism survived intact.

In India, Buddhism was systematically wiped out around the eleventh and twelfth centuries by Muslim invaders from the west. Buddhism was vulnerable to destruction precisely because it was centralized—concentrated in monasteries, nunneries, and great learning centers like Nālandā. Hinduism survived because it was decentralized, present in every home, every neighborhood temple, every family shrine. Buddhism, being largely monastic and institutionalized, could be eliminated by targeting these centers, and tragically, it was.

All the other original schools of Buddhism were destroyed, their canons largely lost by the twelfth century. But the invaders never reached Sri Lanka, and there the Theravādan school continued in an unbroken lineage, preserving these ancient teachings through the centuries.

Through the centuries when Buddhism had effectively died in India, Sri Lanka maintained the Theravadan tradition in an uninterrupted lineage. That is why there is only one complete canon available today—the Pali Canon, which was first committed to writing in Sri Lanka over 2000 years ago. All the others were destroyed.

There's one other school among the eighteen that I can't resist mentioning. They're called the Puggalavadins. Wouldn't you like to be a member of the Puggalavadins? Puggala means "person," so these are the personalists. Their philosophical doctrine held that the self actually did exist to a greater extent than the Buddha had indicated. They said the person has more reality than the other schools were acknowledging.

According to the Puggalavadins, the self was connected with the five aggregates in a way that it wasn't exactly the same as the five aggregates—which are all impersonal and subject to impermanence—but it was almost like them and very closely associated. This self had some higher degree of permanence than the impersonal, impermanent nature of the five aggregates. So the self existed somewhere in between temporary arising and passing and an ultimate kind of nature. This was called the puggala.

When I was reflecting on this today, it reminded me of the "mere I." Isn't that somewhat like the sense of the mere I? The Puggalavadins held it in a more solid way than Rinpoche was describing the mere I—I don't think Rinpoche is a Puggalavadin! But this school had considerable appeal, and you can understand why. Isn't it comforting to think we really do have an I? Isn't there a little resentment of the Dharma for taking away our sense of self? The Puggalavadins restored it to us.

A visitor to India—one of the Chinese pilgrims who came in the seventh or eighth century—reported that the main early schools that still survived were the Theravadins, the Sarvastivadins, the Puggalavadins, and the Mahasanghikas. Most of the others were of lesser importance by that time.

The Mahasanghikas become significant because scholars believe that it was from their philosophical leanings and attitudes that the Mahayana evolved. This is what I want to explore starting tomorrow: the origination of the Mahayana, the evolution of its schools, and then the later development of the tantras and the Vajrayana.

Rinpoche is spending the first couple of days laying a conceptual framework before we move into meditation. I'm following the same approach—establishing the framework of the teachings and the links between traditions. Then, as he moves into more meditation instruction, I'll also shift toward more meditation guidance in these evening talks.

Tomorrow I want to complete the story of Buddhism's evolution in India. I won't venture into China and Japan, as that's an entirely different subject. But I love the Indian story because you see there the common foundation of Theravada and Tibetan Buddhism.

I feel these two schools have great affinity. I've benefited tremendously from exposure to both Theravadan and Tibetan teachings. The wonderful thing is that we can sit down and have meaningful dialogue together. If I tried to discuss with a Zen master where the seeds of karma are stored, he'd probably just hit me! But with someone like Rinpoche, I can ask such questions and engage in logical discussion.

I believe this is because both Theravada and Tibetan Dharma are grounded firmly in Indian Buddhism and remain strongly connected to that foundation. We share common philosophical underpinnings, which enables very comfortable dialogue between our traditions.

I think that's all I wanted to cover tonight. You're tired, and you've been a wonderfully patient audience. We'll take a couple of questions or comments if you have any. Obviously, we could discuss these topics all night, but I won't keep you long. Please, if there are any brief questions or comments?

A question about the distinction between direct and gradual paths... Could you give an example of what you mean by direct?

The comment refers to Dzogchen being described as a direct path while the Theravadan path is characterized as gradual. I've also heard it said within the Tibetan tradition that there's a sutra path considered gradual, while Dzogchen is considered more direct. This isn't an area I know extensively, so it might be better to ask Rinpoche about it.

I will discuss tomorrow the birth of the tantras—of which Dzogchen is one practice—and the foundational attitude in the tantras. That will give a taste of this directness, but I'll save that exploration for tomorrow.

Faith and Questions

"What's your faith in me?" The comment was that Nagarjuna may be claimed by both the Mahayanas and the Theravadans. I agree. I'm going to talk about Nagarjuna tomorrow night. His central work, the Mula Madhyamaka Karika, Root Verses on the Middle Way, has almost no uniquely Mahayana vocabulary. Virtually the whole vocabulary is in terms of language that the Buddha himself used. So it fits very well in the Theravadan line of understanding.

Understanding the Abhidhamma

The question is about the proper understanding of the Abhidhamma. It's definitely acknowledged that the things that are called the ultimate truths are impermanent and arising and passing. The practitioners of Abhidhamma were saying that these things called ultimates were actually just the ultimate in experience. They said that they were conditioned phenomena, but that they were, this is as far as we could go in experiencing them.

I've always kind of bristled a little when I hear people say, "Oh, you know, they're making it atomistic and they're saying these things are ultimate." I think what happened was that some later practitioners made more of the Abhidhamma than was inherent in it. I think there's a way to hold the Abhidhamma model in a wise light where there's no conflict with the suttas in any way.

But I think that what happened was that later philosophers and practitioners became so fixated on the reality of, for instance, just these fifty-two mental factors. There are only fifty-two mental factors in the Abhidhamma view, no more and no less states of mind. And other kinds of parsing of reality—no moment can touch another. Mind moments are all discrete and they cannot overlap or contact one another. They're said to be discrete.

Nagarjuna's Response

So it's actually on the basis of those kinds of what I would call rigid views—or views too rigidly held—that Nagarjuna mounted his counterattack. Nagarjuna's counterattack was basically to people who were taking the Abhidhamma too literally and fixating a view that this was the only way to view reality. And in doing that, they had lost touch with the essentially empty nature of designations.

So all the things that the Abhidhamma describes, I think we have to hold as merely descriptions of reality. And when it gets taken too seriously, it's held as constituting reality. So I think that's the critique.

Okay, I'm going to liberate you for tonight. We have about half an hour for walking, stretching, and then we'll come back at nine o'clock for our last sitting of the day. Thank you.

CHAPTER 32

A Brief History of Buddhism in India - Part 2

Guy Armstrong · 1h12

In this second part of his historical overview, Guy Armstrong traces the profound transformation of Buddhism around 100 BCE with the emergence of the Mahāyāna. He explores how this movement may have grown from lay practitioners' emphasis on compassion and the shift from the Arahant ideal to the Bodhisattva path, examining the development of bodhicitta and the ten pāramīs as a framework for practice. Armstrong discusses the Prajñāpāramitā Sūtras and their focus on śūnyatā (emptiness), highlighting how these texts balance affirmation and negation to cut through conceptual clinging. He presents the revolutionary philosophy of Nāgārjuna and the Madhyamaka school, including the radical teaching that saṃsāra and nirvāṇa have no distinction. The talk covers the Yogācāra (Cittamātra) school's contributions, including Tathāgatagarbha (Buddha-nature) and the ālaya-vijñāna (storehouse consciousness), and concludes with the emergence of Vajrayāna and Dzogchen. Throughout, Armstrong encourages practitioners to appreciate how different schools address various temperaments and spiritual needs, suggesting that philosophical views should serve awakening rather than create division.

We left our little fledgling Indian religion about 400 years old after the death of its founder, struggling with all kinds of contentious issues and the splits into eighteen different schools over various doctrinal differences. But the biggest upheaval was yet to come. Somewhere around 100 BCE, the Mahayana emerged.

The start of the Mahayana movement is really shrouded in mystery. Nobody seems to know exactly why it arose or where it came from. There are speculations that it grew out of a focus that had started to shift from monastic practice to lay practice. I think this is an interesting point. As we explore these different schools that arose in Buddhism, I'd like to encourage us to look at them from the standpoint of our own lives and hearts and understanding. What I find is that each of the schools speaks to me in a different way, and they all have something important for my overall spiritual life.

This suggestion that the Mahayana grew out of lay people's practice is very interesting to me. We are, all of us, lay people here. Sogyal Rinpoche is a lay person. For those of you who don't know, he has a wife and two children. His oldest daughter is now seventeen and is in a Buddhist nunnery in India, which is a beautiful thing. She plans to stay there seven or eight years, he said. I think this must be every parent's dream—to have a child grow up in their footsteps. Mostly if you suggest a child go in your direction, they'll run the other way. But his daughter is a beautiful young woman.

As lay people, I think we can't withdraw from the world. We are always in contact through our work and through family with human relations. Because of this contact with human relations, we are often up against the dilemma of human suffering. Monastics can withdraw to a certain extent. Of course, then they have to live with other monastics, and that's not easy either, but they're a little bit withdrawn from some of the stress of the world. So it could be in this way that the Mahayana came out of the struggles of ordinary people like you and me and put more immediate emphasis on compassion as a direct response to the suffering that they saw around themselves.

There's another suggestion. These are all suggestions I've read from scholars, none of whom have a firm bead on the true answer. Another suggestion is that the Mahayana arose because it was not so easy to become an arahant anymore. The arahant ideal had fueled the explosion of Buddhism for many years. I'm sure you know how in the early days the Buddha would give one discourse and fifty people would become fully liberated. His third discourse, the Fire Sermon, he was addressing a group of Vedic fire worshipers of the god Agni. He gave a discourse called the Fire Sermon where he pointed out everything is burning—burning with the fire of greed, with the fire of hatred, with the fire of delusion. On completion of that talk, all fifty people were fully liberated. As you read stories of people who came to practice with him, it happened a lot like that. They practiced for one week, two weeks, a few months—full liberation.

So the arahant ideal was strong and realizable then. You had living examples of people who in very short periods of time and moderate effort could completely wake up. But as time went on, that became less and less frequent. The Buddha even made this comment over the course of his lifetime that the quality of the practitioners as he was getting older had declined from the early days. So you can imagine after his death it became probably harder and harder to actualize the arahant ideal. There were fewer fully enlightened beings around to inspire.

There needed to be a new generative ideal, and that became the bodhisattva. Maybe we don't aim just to free ourselves in this lifetime, but we take a much more expansive view—that we aim to develop all the qualities of a Buddha over many, many lifetimes. It's said that the Buddha himself made his resolution four immeasurable eons previously and 100,000 kalpas on top of that. It took him that long to develop the qualities of heart and mind to be able to wake up fully in one lifetime.

The bodhisattva ideal then offers us a different way to view our path. Implicit within it is the notion of bodhicitta—that we carry on our own practice in order to bring enough wholesome qualities to fruition that we ourselves awaken and then can help bring others to awakening. I find this is an ideal that resonates very strongly for Westerners today. We are nominally at Spirit Rock, a Theravadan center, and yet the appeal of the bodhisattva and the quality of bodhicitta is so strong that for me it's hard to imagine teaching without them anymore. I find a great resonance with these qualities in us as laypeople today.

Another group of scholars felt that the Mahayana grew as a backlash to the Abhidhamma—that the Abhidhamma had gotten too dry, analytical, intellectual, divorced from heart qualities and the immediacy of liberation. The Mahayana was a way to bring that back to the center of the teachings.

In whatever way it grew, it grew as a very significant movement. Some suggest that it started in southern India, but I don't think there's clarity even about that. But it clearly grew and spread over the whole of India because there was something so powerful about it.

It's interesting to reflect how this bodhisattva ideal sprang to the center at this time period because it's not as though this is a new idea. Siddhartha Gautama was the bodhisattva in his lifetime and previous lifetimes who became the Buddha of our historical era.

All his followers knew that. He alluded to his previous lives throughout his teaching career. Yet throughout the entire Pali Canon, there is not a single record of Gautama Buddha recommending the bodhisattva path to any other practitioner. I find this quite remarkable. So either he did recommend it, perhaps on an individual basis, and it never got recorded because it wasn't considered a public teaching, or he simply never recommended it—leaving it up to individuals to recognize the possibility and make their own resolution.

There is a story in the Pali Canon that describes how the Buddha we know received his initial inspiration, and I'd like to share it because it illuminates another important aspect of the Mahayana. Four immeasurable eons and 100,000 kalpas ago, there was said to be an ascetic named Sumedha who had been practicing quite intensely. On this particular day, he was planning to attend a discourse by the Buddha of that era, whose name was Dipankara.

On his way to the teaching, Sumedha caught sight of the Buddha Dipankara and was so moved by his nobility, radiance, and dignified bearing that he experienced a profound shift. In that moment, he no longer wanted to become enlightened simply as Sumedha. Instead, he gave up his own immediate awakening to aspire toward becoming a Buddha in a future era. He made this aspiration in the presence of Dipankara, who read his thoughts and affirmed that Sumedha would indeed continue in his growth to become a future Buddha.

The text tells us that if Sumedha had proceeded to listen to Dipankara's teachings that day, he was spiritually ripe and would have attained full enlightenment. But he willingly gave that up. He then retired to a cave for meditation and reflection, contemplating what he would need to cultivate in order to prepare himself for future Buddhahood. The list he developed became known as the Ten Paramitas.

Interestingly, the Theravadan texts enumerate ten paramitas, while the Mahayana tradition lists six. The Mahayana list isn't simply a subset of the Theravadan version—they differ somewhat in their specifics. Nonetheless, these paramitas represent qualities of heart and mind that can be developed both through formal meditation practice and through engaged living in the world. This framework fits beautifully with lay life, unlike other traditional lists such as the Seven Factors of Enlightenment, which develop most effectively only in intensive retreat practice.

The paramitas include qualities like generosity, ethical conduct, patience, and equanimity—virtues we can cultivate whether in retreat or in the midst of daily life. These became the structural foundation for the Mahayana path and form the heart of Shantideva's Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life.

The other crucial element the Mahayana brought to prominence was placing the notion of emptiness at the very center of its philosophical framework. The concept of emptiness wasn't new—it appears throughout the early texts, the Pali Canon, and the teachings of the other eighteen schools of Buddhism. However, it wasn't given such central importance. More commonly, the Buddha spoke of what he called the three characteristics of conditioned existence: impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and selflessness. These occupied the central position in the early teachings.

These three characteristics can be understood as aspects of emptiness, and the Buddha did indeed use the term "emptiness" to describe both the emptiness of self and the emptiness of phenomena. Both concepts appear in the early texts, but they weren't positioned as the primary organizing principle.

The first texts to present emptiness in this new, central way were the Prajnaparamita Sutras, which began appearing between 100 BCE and 50 CE, right around the turn of that millennium. Much of my commentary on the Mahayana draws from the work of translator Edward Conze, a distinguished British scholar who translated most of the Prajnaparamita texts. He maintained great sympathy for the Mahayana—these translations represented, in many ways, the crown of his life's work. Yet I appreciate his balanced perspective on all schools of Indian Buddhist thought.

Conze's assessment is that there was nothing entirely new in the early Mahayana teachings on emptiness, compassion, or the possibility of becoming a bodhisattva. As he puts it, there was simply a "new emphasis on commonly accepted traditional material." Nevertheless, this reconfiguration—the centrality given to compassion and emptiness—created a sufficiently distinct flavor that the Mahayana emerged as a recognizably new school. The Prajnaparamita writings crystallized these differences in viewpoint.

Prajnaparamita means, as you likely know, the perfection of wisdom or the transcendent quality of wisdom. It represents one of the paramitas in both Theravada and Mahayana traditions. In the sutras, it's viewed as an innate capacity that each of us already possesses—a subtle but significant shift from some of the original texts. This wisdom is sometimes described as the mother of all Buddhas because it's the factor of wisdom inherent in every mind that enables awakening.

Prajnaparamita takes a feminine form, and you can see her represented in the statue at the back of our meditation hall. Typically, we place her on the front altar alongside the Buddha because we appreciate the balance of masculine and feminine principles this represents.

One time a Theravadan monk came in, looked at that assortment and said, "Oh, Mr. and Mrs. Buddha." So for that retreat, we moved her away. This retreat, a little more traditional, just the Buddha is up front.

Just another side note, an interesting side note on Prajnaparamita. I've read from a Tibetan scholar and I've also heard Rinpoche say that Rigpa is considered identical with Prajnaparamita.

Now, the Prajnaparamita Sutras took an interesting form. They have the Buddha delivering most of them as though they were delivered by the historical Buddha. The Heart Sutra, for instance—the Buddha makes a comment. He's not the main speaker, but he makes a comment. But it's set on a classical location from the Pali texts, which is Vulture's Peak in Rajgir. It's a place where the historical Buddha delivered a lot of discourses. So the impression is given that these are also the words of the historical Buddha.

And if you ask a traditional Mahayana follower, in Asia particularly, they will tell you that, oh yes, the Mahayana sutras, Prajnaparamita sutras, and so forth, were delivered by the historical Buddha, but to a different group than the Pali suttas. The Pali suttas were delivered to people of lesser capacity because they really couldn't get it. And these pithy teachings were delivered to the people of higher capacity. And that's why they're separate and why they don't appear in the Pali canon.

Western scholars say there is no evidence for that. Western scholars say that these texts were composed by unknown authors—again, the kind of mystery of the evolution of the Mahayana in the period between about 150 BCE and 50 CE. They say that there is no record of any Mahayana schools between the death of the Buddha and this period of around 100 BCE.

And some of the records that they look at, just because you might be curious—they looked at the words that were written on the scrolls or the pillars of King Asoka. He planted pillars all around India that carried Dharma messages. And they sometimes mentioned different schools that were local to that area. There's no mention of a school that fits the Mahayana. There were also records kept from donations by kings to religious groups. And so it enumerates some of the eighteen schools of early Buddhism, but there are no records of Mahayana schools.

So the scholars that I've read say there's not even any controversy about the fact that these sutras were written later, authored later. But they put them in the mouth of the Buddha to give them authenticity, I believe, and to make them appear as original.

The early Prajnaparamita Sutras have one particular focus, which is ultimate truth. Over and over and over again, they are statements of the nature of ultimate truth. The Pali texts have mostly teachings about gradual path, developing, cultivating, application of practice. The Mahayana Sutras go back over and over again to the ultimate.

This is also from Conze: "The lengthy writings on perfect wisdom are one long declamation in praise of the absolute. Everybody knows, of course, that nothing can usefully be said about the absolute. This had prompted the Theravadans to keep silent, or at least nearly silent about it. The Mahayanas, on the other hand, consider everything that might reasonably be said about it and then expressly reject it as untrue and inadequate."

So I love this description. It kind of explains where the paradox comes from in our tradition. And if you listen to Zen teachings, you know they are full of paradox. Zen basically built a dynasty on paradox and the apparent contradictions between the conventional truth of things and the ultimate truth. If you answer from the conventional, the Roshi will show you the ultimate. If you answer from the ultimate, he'll show you the conventional so that you don't get stuck in adhering to either one.

So I love the way that this plays out, for example, in the Heart Sutra, the combination of the affirmation and negation that is in the Heart Sutra. In a lot of Japanese monasteries, this is chanted three times a day with meals. And the chant of the Heart Sutra includes things like the negation of a lot of common doctrine.

One of the lines is, "no form, no feeling, no perception, no formations, no consciousness," which you'll probably recognize as the five aggregates. Then it goes on, "no ignorance and so on up to no end of ignorance," which you probably recognize as the chain of dependent origination in forward order—ignorance creating suffering, and then backward order to end of suffering leading to end of ignorance.

So what's so curious about the Heart Sutra is it affirms the basic tenets of classical Buddhism. So they're in people's minds as the sutra is chanted, and then it negates them. So it says, yeah, here are the teachings, and you get familiar because you're chanting them all the time, but then it takes them away.

So I think this is a beautiful technique. It exposes the practitioner to the basic teachings, and then it negates them to drop the practitioner into emptiness and cut through any clinging—clinging to view, clinging to doctrine.

So one of the interesting flavors you get moving from the Theravada worldview to the Mahayana worldview is you move from kind of a human realm into an archetypal realm.

When you read the stories of the Buddha in the Pali Discourses, you encounter a very human portrait of the man. He had to work with kings who were often in conflict with one another, or the Sangha wouldn't have been supported. He had troublemakers in his community. He had an angry cousin who tried to kill him on a couple of different occasions. When he first awakened, as I think Rinpoche mentioned yesterday, he contemplated not teaching at all. What he said about this was, "If I teach, I think no one will understand it, and that would be a vexation for me." That's a remarkably human emotion to express.

On another occasion, he was visiting a group of monks at a location called Kosambi. The monks were in a very tense period of conflict, having separated into two factions. I don't even remember what they were arguing about, but they were butting heads in quite a mean-spirited way. The Buddha was drawn in and tried to make peace, attempting to get the two factions to drop their complaints and become harmonious, but he was unable to succeed. What he said at the end was, "This is too much of a vexation for me," and he withdrew. Even the Buddha couldn't heal the split within his own sangha.

Late in life, as he was traveling around the countryside on his way to the Parinirvana, he would arrive at a town with his attendant, Ananda, and say, "My back is aching tonight. I need to rest. Ananda, you give the Dharma talk." And the Buddha would go off and rest. You see these very human sides of him in the Pali texts, in the early texts.

When you move into the Mahayana texts, it shifts into a much more archetypal realm. You enter realms of great cosmology and vast expanses of time and space. Let me read a brief excerpt from the Avatamsaka Sutra, The Flower Ornament Sutra, to give you a flavor of this Mahayana vision:

"At that time, the Buddha's lion seat, its round platform of exquisite flowers and many jewels, its base, steps, doors, and all its embellishments, each produced as many great bodhisattvas as there are atoms in a Buddha land. Their names were Oceanic Wisdom, Sovereign King of Occult Powers, Thunder Shaking All, Topknot of Light of Many Jewels, Bold Intelligence of the Sun of Knowledge..."

There's no more Sariputta and Moggallana in there.

"At the same time that they appeared, these bodhisattvas each produced clouds of offerings—clouds of flowers, of all jewels, clouds of all different fragrances, of lotus blossoms, clouds of orbs of jeweled light, clouds of fragrant flames of boundless realms, clouds of jewel-like light spheres from the treasury of the sun..."

That kind of Buddha doesn't get a backache.

It's fascinating. You receive this very inspiring, vast, imaginative view of the cosmos, which offers a perspective on our human life and our work within it. But at the same time, you lose something of the rooted, bare reality of human existence in these sutras.

Another quality of the early Mahayana texts—I'll again let Conze speak to it—he says another characteristic as the Mahayana sutras evolved was an increasing spirit of sectarianism. This is where you begin to feel the tension between the new school that was emerging and the schools that were already established. The Mahayanas criticized the existing schools for being too self-absorbed, too selfish, too dry, too withdrawn. Again, you can sort of see the lay-monastic flavor in that way of looking.

As the sutras were expounded, some of the early disciples who were very well respected in the Pali texts became the whipping boys in the Mahayana sutras. They became the butt of the jokes. In the Prajnaparamita sutras, it's typically Sariputta who becomes the object of gentle condescension. I mentioned he was the chief disciple in terms of wisdom in the classical texts, but here he becomes the one who needs to be educated because he doesn't quite grasp the new teachings.

In the Prajnaparamita Sutras, the person who most often delivers the message to educate Sariputta is another bhikkhu named Subhuti. Subhuti appears in the classical texts, but he doesn't figure very prominently. The reason he becomes so elevated in the early Mahayana is that he was the Buddha's foremost disciple in loving-kindness. As the quality of heartfulness and compassion became elevated, so Subhuti became elevated as the exemplar of that.

A controversy then arose about what to call the new schools. In the beginning, the new school was called, quite logically I think, the Bodhisattvayana—a name we don't hear very much anymore, but it was the first term that emerged. The old schools were called Sravakayana. Sravaka is a Sanskrit term; the Pali word is savaka, found often in the original Pali texts, meaning "listener." So the disciples of the Buddha were called the savakasangha, the assembly or sangha of those who listened—meaning in this case, listened to the Buddha. You'll hear this in Pali chants: "supatipanno bhagavato savakasangho," the sangha of listeners. This term was applied to the early schools.

But in not too long a time, it evolved into the terms we have today: Mahayana on the one hand and correspondingly Hinayana. I don't think the term Hinayana was invented by the Sravakas themselves. The Mahayanas applied that term to the earlier schools in a somewhat pejorative sense.

This division between Mahayana and Hinayana has persisted to this day. You'll still hear practitioners of Mahayana traditions refer to Theravadans as Hinayanas, likely because there has been so little genuine dialogue between these schools over the centuries. Just to set the record straight, we prefer to be called Theravadans.

Of course, the Theravadans couldn't let it rest there either, so they developed their own counter-term for the Mahayanas. They called them Vaitulikas, meaning "illusionists." I won't delve into that any further.

From this early Mahayana tradition emerged one of the towering figures in all of Buddhism—perhaps as an individual second only to the Buddha himself. This was a man named Nagarjuna. Not much is known of his life; he lived sometime around the first century CE. I consider him the greatest philosopher in the entire Buddhist tradition after the Buddha.

His key work is called the Mula Madhyamaka Karika, or Root Verses on the Middle Way. It comprises twenty-seven chapters, each taking a different aspect of life and teaching to reveal where conception tends to form a sense of solidity around the existence of that area—and then cutting it away through rigorous analysis so that we are brought back to the point of emptiness.

He begins with simple things like moving and acting. Is there a doer separate from the action being done? Is there a walker separate from the walking? This isn't too radical—the early schools had this kind of outlook as well. But then he applies this same analysis directly to the Buddha's teachings themselves.

So if you thought you were going to find relief from emptiness by taking refuge in the path, Nagarjuna cuts that out from under you too. Basically, everywhere the mind turns to find some ground, his dialectical inquiry cuts yet again, until finally every place you could go to rest or reify has been taken away.

I think that's both the purpose and the power of his writing—it leads us nowhere else but to emptiness, because any concept we could cling to gets dismantled somewhere along the way.

The philosophical school formed from his teachings is called the Madhyamaka, or Middle Way school, and it remains prevalent in virtually all Mahayana traditions today. He laid a foundation that still endures. All the Tibetan schools revere him for his contribution. In fact, he's probably the single most important philosophical figure in the Gelug school—he's at the very heart of their view of reality.

Let me share a few passages from this pivotal work. There are several good English translations available. If you're just beginning and want something more poetic, Stephen Batchelor's translation is recommended. If you're more philosophically inclined and ready for serious study, Jay Garfield's translation is excellent.

One of the verses states: "Emptiness stops conceptual proliferation." This is remarkably similar to something Rinpoche said this morning when he explained that one meaning of the word dzog or dzogpa is "end"—and in the practice of Dzogchen, fixations come to an end. This same principle appears in Nagarjuna: when we see the emptiness of things as they actually are, we don't tend to spin off into elaborating thoughts.

Another passage declares: "That to which language refers is denied." This is quite a strong statement. That to which language refers—things like floor, chair, mat—is denied. There's no real object there. How about person? How about sentient being? How about suffering? How about the path itself?

"That to which language refers is denied, because an object experienced by the mind is denied." Nothing ever exists firmly enough to be truly called an object. Things appear only fleetingly, and there's no solid existence there. We cannot say there really is such a thing as an object.

He continues: "The unborn and unceasing nature of reality is comparable to nirvana." This is a radical statement—the very nature of reality is comparable to nirvana.

Normally reality is considered as more like samsara. But Nagarjuna says because it cannot really ever be said to have been born, it can also be said to pass away. Therefore, all things are unborn and unceasing. That which is unborn and unceasing is nirvana. So the nature of reality is like that of nirvana.

Then he elaborated this one other step: Samsara does not have the slightest distinction from nirvana. Nirvana does not have the slightest distinction from samsara. This really opens the doorway for the non-dual. This is the first pointing in any literature that I know of to the ultimate non-duality—that between samsara, the condition one might wish to move out of, and nirvana, the goal to which one might wish to move.

This sort of laying of the foundation, although I don't believe he used the word non-dual, set the stage for the elaboration of the non-dual. The first appearance of which I know in literature is in the Vimalakirti Sutra, which has a whole chapter on non-duality and different ways to view non-duality.

So Nagarjuna was a brilliant, creative, powerful force in Buddhism. The school of the Madhyamaka gained great weight over the centuries. But as was commented this morning, one of the shortcomings is because they were so involved in cutting, cutting, cutting, taking away, taking away, taking away, they didn't put forth any of their own positive teachings. And that's why sometimes other schools will look at this school and say it's a little nihilistic. All it does is take away. It doesn't give us anything to put our faith in or move forward into.

In fact, Nagarjuna himself embraced all of the Buddha's teachings, so that is implicit in his argument. So it's truly not nihilistic, but that's the criticism that other schools will make of it—that it's not positive enough.

Somebody commented last night that Nagarjuna has been claimed as a Mahayanist. Is that actually the case? From my point of view, not necessarily. The language that he used in this root text is completely open to both Theravada and Mahayana views. His use of the word emptiness is more complete than you find in the early texts, but it's just an elaboration. It's not really a new pointing. There's not a single mention in this key text of the word bodhisattva, for instance. There's very little stress on compassion or the paramitas. So it is a text that could fit very comfortably right into the Pali Canon. And I think some Theravadans are beginning to appreciate this now and to begin to claim Nagarjuna as their own. Because he was so early in the Mahayana, it's hard to know whether he was coming from a Theravada or a Mahayana viewpoint. But he's had tremendous impact on the tradition, particularly in the Mahayana.

So this opening of the equality of samsara and nirvana really lays the groundwork for the next major school that comes into Mahayana, the next major school in India, which is that of the Yogacara. Yogacara doesn't mean a whole lot by itself—it just means the conduct of union. But they're much better known by their central doctrine, which is Chittamatra or mind only. So this is the same as the mind only school that Rinpoche was talking about this morning.

There are a few kind of central theses in the Yogacara philosophy. The first is that of Buddha nature. They were the first to clearly enunciate this teaching. In Sanskrit, the words are tathagatagarbha, which literally means the womb of the tathagatas. So they considered that this innate purity is the birthplace of the Buddhas, somewhat similar to the Prajnaparamita pointing. But the term didn't originally use the word nature. Just like prajnaparamita, it's a very feminine evocation. And it didn't get called nature until the concept migrated to China. Somewhere in China, the translation turned into nature. Then some teacher who was translating Asian concepts to Western in the last 100 years began to use the term Buddha nature. I can't remember who did that. So now that's what's come down to us.

But remember that that's not the way that it was originally stated. Buddha womb would be a clearer way to state it—our Buddha womb. But it does inhere in each of us. It is identical with the concept of the three kayas—the dharmakaya, the sambhogakaya, and the nirmanakaya, which we've been chanting, which I think Rinpoche will explain more about in the next day or two.

Another key feature of the Chittamatra philosophy was an attempt to answer the same question that the Sarvastavadins tried to answer: where are your karmic seeds? Remember the Sarvastavadins tried to answer it by saying that past and future are both existent now? The Chittamatrans answered it by saying, oh, they're in a different layer of the mind. And they created or assumed or discovered, I don't know which—another layer of consciousness that they say holds the karmic seeds, called the alaya-vijnana, the storehouse consciousness or ground consciousness.

Actually, in their system, it's considered the eighth layer. The seventh consciousness is considered to be, I think it's mana-vijnana. Does anybody know, is that the right designation for the seventh? Seventh. And the idea of that, as I understand it, is that that is where the ongoing ego sort of continues from.

So these two extra consciousnesses, in addition to the five physical consciousnesses and the mind consciousness, help explain how things happen that otherwise were hard to explain, such as the continuation of the sense of self and the continuation of karmic seeds. So these are all part of Yogacara.

They also invented the term of the three turnings of the wheel, which you may have heard. So this comes out of Chittamatra philosophy. They say the first turning of the wheel was the Buddha's first teaching of the Four Noble Truths. It happened in Sarnath shortly after his awakening. The discourse in which that teaching was given is known as Dhammacakkha-pavatana-sutta, the discourse on setting in motion the wheel of the Dhamma. So that's where this concept of the Dhamma wheel and the turning of the wheel comes from.

Then they said the second turning of the wheel was the Prajnaparamita Sutras with the focus on emptiness. And they considered that their teachings, specifically on Buddha nature and the three kayas, were the third turning of the wheel. So if you hear this phrase, three turnings of the wheel, that's specifically from the Chittamatrins.

They became a very influential school also because they became the textual basis for a lot of later developments, including, to some extent, their influence on Dzogchen, Mahamudra, Chan, and Zen. So although Rinpoche said their view is not identical with that of Dzogchen, it provided a philosophical basis for some of the Dzogchen view.

The Chittamatrins peaked in their influence and popularity around the fourth century. So they continued, but they kind of built up and then their influence went on, but they themselves didn't evolve much more. And in fact, philosophically, this is the end to the development of Buddhism in India. It didn't evolve philosophically beyond this school, apart from small variations.

There was a little discussion this morning about the relationship between the Dzogchen view and the Madhyamaka view. And I was curious about this, so I asked Mingyur Rinpoche when he was here on his first teaching trip to the West. It was almost 10 years ago now, I think. Mingyur Rinpoche is Tsoknyi Rinpoche's younger brother, who's now also a wonderful teacher.

He had just done a retreat in Santa Rosa and my wife and I had the privilege of taking him around a little bit to see some of Marin County. We thought he would enjoy the sights and we had a translator who was Tashi, who many of you know from Tsoknyi Rinpoche's monastery. So we thought we'll take him up to the top of Mount Tam, a beautiful day and beautiful viewpoint.

And as we were driving along, I tried to make a little conversation. And I asked Rinpoche how he found the West. And he said, "Square and clean." And that was it. He didn't elaborate any further. He lived in India, so I could sort of understand why it would look square and clean to him. Didn't elaborate anymore.

Well, I tried another time, and I said, "Rinpoche, do you think Tibetans are happier than Westerners?" He said, "Yes." Didn't elaborate anymore.

So we got up to the top of Mount Tam and we were walking around the path at the top, looking at the view of San Francisco and the coastline. There was not much conversation happening. So I thought, I'll try a different tack. I said, "Rinpoche, what is the difference between the Madhyamaka view and the Dzogchen view? The view of Nagarjuna's school and the view of Dzogchen."

Then his eyes lit up. He said, "Ah!" And he started talking. He said, "The first thing you have to understand is there are 18 different kinds of emptiness." And then he talked and talked and he wanted to sit down. So we sat down right on the path. It's a path that only two people can walk by. But four of us sat down and we had about a 10-minute conversation about the difference between these two views.

And what he said in the end was that the Madhyamakas believe that the Dzogchenpas believe that something exists, but we don't actually believe that it exists. Can you get that? It's this emptiness-luminosity union. The Madhyamakas believe that the mind-only school or the Dzogchen school or somebody is attributing more reality to that than they actually are. And that's the basis of the dispute. But in Minju Rinpoche's understanding, the Dzogchen school isn't attributing any more reality to that. So they're off the hook.

But there's a beautiful way that the Yogacarans responded to these attacks. They were basically unfazed by the criticism. And they said, "We're not worried about the theory. It's all constructed, and it all dissolves when you realize emptiness." This is a wonderful view, I think, to hold to.

When we talk about how to appreciate the spirit of these different schools in our own practice, this is one I've come back to again and again. Because the Madhyamakas, truth to tell, are not very far apart from some Theravadans. Practitioners who follow the Abhidhamma and the Visuddhimagga particularly would level the same criticism of the Yogacarans: they're positing something that doesn't truly exist.

I was teaching one part of a three-month course at a center in Massachusetts, and this fellow knew that I was practicing Dzogchen and sometimes taught with a Dzogchen master. He said to me, "How can you do that? Because it says very clearly in the words of the Buddha that if you begin to propagate the false dharma, then it will start to erode the true Dhamma in the world, and the words of the Buddha will be lost."

And what I said to him is, "Well, I don't know about that, but this method really works."

I find that a very helpful thing to come back to again and again. Any philosophical view that is put out, ask yourself: Number one, do you really know how it is? Do you know from your own direct experience that emptiness and clarity are indivisible and the way, the extent to which they exist or clarity exists and the extent to which it doesn't? I think Rinpoche said it's only when one has realized emptiness directly for oneself that one could understand that. Even if one has realized emptiness, one's memory may not be so good.

So I think it's important to keep asking on these philosophical questions: Do I know that absolutely from my own immediate experience? Or am I taking that as someone's teaching, someone else's view that I'm adopting? And if I don't know it absolutely from my own experience, then there's a possibility that both views could have some validity. Maybe not that either one has to be absolutely right, but they're both different ways of validly describing some truthful experience.

Then, if we're willing to live with a little bit of ambiguity, we can say, "Oh, could this view be useful in my practice?" Because all these views are meant to lead to our awakening. They're not meant for us to take philosophical stands on and make arguments about. They're meant to be helpful to lead to awakening, nothing else.

So, can I make use of this view? If you can, then it's a useful and skillful means for you. That's the way I approach the different views that I hear. If I can learn something from all of them, then I'll use them. But I don't have to make a final judgment until I know in my direct experience the way things are.

So one of the things I appreciate a lot in Buddhism is lots of different schools, and therefore they suit different people, different personalities. Some people are drawn to the Yogacara school because it has a great basis for faith. Like Rinpoche, I also feel Westerners need a basis for faith. We've lost our ability to believe in anything transcendent, anything that has the nature of ultimacy, through our intellect. And this presents a very refined philosophical exposition that gives a basis for faith in something ultimate. I find its impact on Westerners very uplifting—gives confidence, hope, strength. A very helpful view to have.

But other people are so logical, like Nagarjuna was, that they absolutely need to cut away anything that they can't directly experience. And then it doesn't work so well for them. So for them, just resting in the quality of emptiness is the useful way forward—not taking up any other view, just emptiness of direct experience. That's useful for them.

So different approaches suit different people. We kind of have a joke in our scene. Of the three major schools of Buddhism that are around in the West today, different people tend to be drawn to them differently. And the joke in our scene is that the artists go to Tibetans, the carpenters go to Zen, and the therapists go to Vipassana.

A little overgeneralized, but you can get the flavor.

So on the whole, Guenther says that the Theravadans tend to be a little more rational and the Mahayanas tend to be a little more mystical. This is a distinction I do see in what draws different people. But then he qualified that. He said it's because they're not exclusively one way or the other. The difference is really between the rational mysticism of Mahayana and the mystically tinged rationalism of Theravada.

They had much common ground in the middle ranges of the path where the ascetic strove for emancipation in a quite rational and business-like manner. That is, if you look at practitioners from the outside, you may not see much difference in what they were doing, but a little bit of difference in personality, and so a little bit of difference in emphasis and philosophy. But the basic work of liberating the mind looks much the same.

Again, the two have a little bit different perspective on how the path unfolds. The Mahayana tends to view it from the point of view of intrinsic purity, which is only covered by obscurations. The obscurations need only to be removed like clouds parting so that the sun can shine through. The Theravada looks more from the point of view of the defilements as being front and center—how do we work with the defilements in such a way as to eliminate them? What this involves is building up strong qualities of mind, the beautiful qualities of mind: mindfulness, concentration, equanimity, loving-kindness, and compassion that can release the defilements.

So do you start from the purity going out, or do you start from the defilements working against them to develop strength? From the point of view of moment-by-moment experience, it may not feel very different, but the flavor is a little different for the practitioner. Just the perspective the practitioner has on their practice may feel a little different.

As Shabkar taught, "Butter is made of the essence of milk, but if the milk isn't churned, the butter won't form"—the butter being the awakened mind, milk being where we are today. In either case, there's a lot of work to be done.

Another thing I was curious about: when the Mahayana came, did the Hinayana schools wither away? They didn't. In many cases, the two lived together in shared monasteries quite happily, practicing side by side. Then there were other monasteries dedicated to one or the other. A Chinese pilgrim who went to India around 400 CE reported that about 60% of the monasteries he found were early school, about 24% were Mahayana, and 16% were mixed, where the two were living together. Again, a later visitor, a pilgrim in the 7th century, came back and reported that the majority of monasteries were early schools, and a minority were Mahayana at that time.

Then came one final development, a big development: the Vajrayana. This is, to me, a very interesting story. I found this story mostly in a terrific book called Indestructible Truth, written by Reggie Ray, who's a student of Trungpa Rinpoche and a professor at Naropa for a long time, and now a dharma teacher in his own right. Indestructible Truth is a really wonderful overview of Tibetan Buddhism. If you're new to the subject, it's a really good way to get a read on the whole range of systems in there.

The emergence of the Vajrayana is not a new school philosophically. There's no new philosophical ground being broken, but it's the development of an incredibly powerful bag of tricks—or as one of my friends put it, incredible implements in the technology of consciousness. Tantra and Vajrayana are more or less synonymous, as I understand. So if we talk about tantric teachings in Buddhism or Vajrayana, we're talking about the same body of techniques.

But they actually started in Hindu schools and not in Buddhist. They started in the Hindu worship of the god Shiva. Shiva had been an old fertility god going way, way back, but the growth of Brahmanic culture overshadowed Shiva for a long time. Shiva was not part of the Brahmanic culture. As Buddhism started to grow up in India, it started to wear away some of the tight hold that the Brahman caste had, and this allowed the influence of Shiva to come back up into the culture.

So on an informal basis, people in probably villages all over the country started doing forms of worship to the god Shiva. The style was that they would visualize themselves as Shiva or as his female consorts, goddesses, and dance together. In this visualization, imagining themselves as the god, they would start to feel that they were channeling Shiva's energy or the energy of the goddesses who were his female counterparts. This started to be enacted in a ritual way and was called deva yoga—union with the god in the Hindu tradition.

Then some of these practitioners said, "Hmm, this is pretty good stuff. I'm feeling a lot of energy from this. Pretty strong, pretty powerful. What if we actually enacted the intercourse of Shiva and his consort?" Well, this was not a public kind of thing to do, but they went off into private settings and began to enact ritual intercourse between those who were visualizing themselves as Shiva and those who were visualizing themselves as Shiva's consort or goddess. This became a powerful way to practice.

Eventually this drew Buddhist practitioners as well. The Buddhist practitioners started to understand how they could use the bodily energies that were generated either through the visualization or through intercourse to speed their journey to enlightenment. Some of the tantric practices are clearly about generating different kinds of bodily energy and using that generated energy for awakening—not simply for pleasure. The purpose is not pleasure; the purpose is awakening.

So this began to be taken up in Buddhist schools, both the visualization and the ritual intercourse. What do you suppose the classical monks and nuns thought about this? They were not too keen.

They faced a dilemma: either lose all their practitioners to this vibrant new scene that was far more dynamic than what was happening in the celibate monasteries, or make some adaptation. So they chose to adapt, incorporating the visualization aspects of these practices while bringing them into the celibate monastic context.

Since that time, this has been part of the Buddhist tradition called Vajrayana. It can involve either visualization or actual sexual union—both threads have continued down to the present day.

In the Tibetan schools, the Geluk tradition, of which the Dalai Lama is representative, has tended to favor the celibate monastic path ever since the time of Tsongkhapa. They have maintained their inclination toward monastic discipline and celibacy, so they tend to use only the visualization form. But the other schools, particularly the Kagyu and Nyingma, employ both the visualization form and the ritual enactment of intercourse for non-monastics. Monks in those traditions may also follow a completely celibate path, but lay practitioners are able to use both forms of tantric practices.

There are a range of practices that constitute the Vajrayana. I don't know enough about them to speak knowledgeably, but obviously the visualizations of deities, the mantras, and the mandalas are all part of that system. Dzogchen is a tantric practice. In the Nyingma school, there are considered to be six levels of tantric practice, many having to do with bodily energy—altering and raising bodily energy. Dzogchen is considered the highest of the six tantras and is called Ati Yoga in that system. So Dzogchen is indeed a Vajrayana practice, a tantric practice.

One of the most beautiful things that can be said about these practices—and you'll especially appreciate this as Rinpoche unfolds the meditation instructions over the next day or two—is that the Vajrayana takes as the basis of the path the awakened mind itself. Let me say that again because it's very significant: the Vajrayana takes as the basis of the path the awakened mind.

Someone asked a question yesterday about a direct path versus a gradual path. I think possibly one reason Dzogchen might be considered a direct path is that we start from the point of view of awakening and then simply don't let go of it. That will be the instruction, essentially, in Dzogchen meditation. We start with awakening as closely as we can intuit it, and that becomes our path. You'll hear more about this, but I wanted to illustrate how dramatic the Vajrayana approach is, how revolutionary, and point to some of the power inherent in it.

So when did Dzogchen come along? Dzogchen was a later development. The story of its transmission, which I repeat from a scholar named John Reynolds—a Westerner, I believe British, who speaks Tibetan and is a scholar of the old texts—says that from what he understands, Dzogchen originated in a being named Samantabhadra. Samantabhadra is a deity in the Vajrayana system. Let me read you who Samantabhadra is:

Samantabhadra is the ultimate Dharmakaya aspect of Buddhahood, beyond conception by the finite intellect, being without limitation and all-pervading like infinite space.

You got him? So this is where the Dzogchen view originated.

He then transmitted it to a being who was only slightly less connected to our realm, slightly more connected to our realm, named Vajrasattva. Vajrasattva is one of the key deities in the Nyingma lineage—he's the statue behind me on the altar in front of the Buddha—also a being of great purity. This is a description of Vajrasattva: he represents the principle of Buddha enlightenment which is beyond the cycle of conditioned existence, beyond all time and history. So Vajrasattva also exists on a somewhat different level than you and I.

It's said that Vajrasattva transmitted the Dzogchen instructions to Garab Dorje. Garab Dorje was considered to be from Uddiyana, the same area as Padmasambhava, and the times are very tentative, but perhaps around the 6th century CE. Uddiyana, by the way—I don't know if I mentioned this the other night—is considered to be northwest of what's currently India, perhaps in Pakistan or Afghanistan.

Garab Dorje had students who included Vairochana, Vimalamitra, and Padmasambhava. It was these three who took the Dzogchen teachings into Tibet. Particularly Padmasambhava is revered as the founder of the Nyingma lineage in Tibet and the one who primarily instructed Tibetans in Dzogchen.

Interestingly, as a sort of confirmation of that time frame, Padmasambhava went into Tibet around the 8th century. Two Dzogchen texts were found in caves in China in a place called Dunhuang. If any of you have heard of it, it's an amazing archaeological find where practitioners lived for years. There are beautiful frescoes still on the walls because it's so dry—desert-like conditions have preserved the paintings. You can still visit there. Two Dzogchen texts were found in a library that was sealed in the 10th century, so there's clear evidence of Dzogchen teachings in China from the 10th century. It's believed to have been in Tibet from the 8th century.

So that brings us to where we are today—here we are with a Dzogchen master from Tibet.

Here we are today with a Dzogchen master from Tibet instructing us in these meditation practices.

To complete the story in India, as I mentioned last night, Buddhism was essentially wiped out between the 8th and 12th centuries. Invasions from the West began in the 8th century and had swept completely across the Gangetic plain by the 12th century. Buddhism disappeared from India at that time. The monasteries were destroyed, many of the monks and nuns were killed, and the texts were burned. Who knows how many irreplaceable texts were lost—all those early canons from the Sarvāstivādins and the Sautrāntikas and so forth. All of those gone. Who knows how many Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna texts were lost. We rely now on the pieces that remained in Sri Lanka, Tibet, and China primarily.

So here we are today. What can we take from the past? I think we can understand that philosophical disputes are conceptual and don't need to divide us personally, that we can respond to the different points of view in the various schools and use them in our own practice and teaching. There is in the foundation of the Nikāya schools—the classical schools—very clear and concrete step-by-step instructions for a gradual path. In the Mahāyāna schools, we find deep philosophical pointings to the ultimate truth of things and inspiring visions of cosmology. And in the Vajrayāna, there is a very powerful set of tools to transform consciousness, should we wish to explore them.

I think we're very fortunate to be at a position in history when all of this is available to us. All of it is possible.

So we'll stop there.

CHAPTER 33

Mettā: Near and Far Enemies

Guy Armstrong · 55 min

In this dharma talk on mettā (loving-kindness) practice, Guy Armstrong explores the crucial teaching of near and far enemies that arise during cultivation of the brahmavihāras. Drawing on personal experience and traditional Buddhist psychology, he explains how the near enemy of mettā—attachment or conditional love—differs from unconditional loving-kindness, while the far enemy manifests as aversion, anger, or hatred.

Armstrong offers practical guidance for working with difficult emotions that surface during mettā practice, presenting four graduated approaches: allowing emotions to remain in the background while continuing with phrases, opening mindfully to let them pass through, applying compassion phrases to one's suffering, or switching to pure vipassanā investigation. He emphasizes that encountering these challenging states is not a sign of failed practice, but rather an essential part of purifying the heart.

Using the metaphor of gardening and scientific observation, Armstrong encourages practitioners to approach their hearts with patient curiosity, planting karmic seeds of wholesome intention while allowing the Dharma to bring them to fruition. He shares the inspiring example of Ajahn Jumnian, demonstrating the profound happiness possible through dedicated mettā cultivation, while remaining realistic about attachment in intimate relationships.

When I was in college, I began to get interested in Buddhism and read all the books I could get my hands on, which at that time were not very many. This is ancient history we're talking about. I was very inspired by the Buddha's degree of peace and calm, and also by the fact that somebody could be alive and not be afraid of dying. That was a revelation to me—that this was a human possibility. So I was very uplifted by the stories of practitioners and the Buddha's life.

Also at this time in my life, when I turned about twenty—I think this happens for a lot of people entering adulthood—my world really opened up in a big way. I started having very strong experiences of love. Sometimes it would happen through connections with people, sometimes through connections with nature, sometimes through music or art. But my heart was just opening in these really new and unexpected ways. It was very powerful for me.

But as strong as these experiences were, they were equally unstable and unreliable. I didn't know why they came, and I didn't know why they went away. And yet I had this deep longing to refine that field, to reconnect with that way of experiencing life. This connection became a strong motivating force in my taking up dharma practice.

As the years went by, I came to realize that one needed an open heart—which I had to do some clearing to rediscover—and one also needed to understand deeply how not to cling, what we could call the wisdom of emptiness. And then the access to love could become more available, more stable.

Rumi said that someone who does not run toward the allure of love walks a road where nothing lives. So I join you all in running toward the allure of love. It's a central factor in the Christian path and has long been recognized as a powerful force in spiritual development. In our tradition, it is the practice of loving kindness that is the most direct route to awakening this factor in our own hearts and minds.

The Buddha said—actually it wasn't the Buddha, but a later commentary written shortly after his death—that practicing loving kindness develops all seven factors of enlightenment, the forces that lead the mind into awakening. And the Buddha said that when loving kindness is developed to its fullest extent, it becomes a liberation of heart, a liberation of mind.

It's quite interesting that in our tradition we use our connection with people and other beings to open the door to this love. But as you feel it awaken, you'll find it transforms the whole world and your whole experience of life. Our avenue is through connection with people and other beings.

It's extraordinary to meet somebody who has developed this quality to a great extent. The degree to which it's possible to experience this state, you can start to feel when you're around some of these people. One master in our tradition of loving kindness is a teacher named Ajahn Jumnian. Ajahn Jumnian is a monk from southern Thailand, about seventy years old now. He comes to Spirit Rock about once a year. He's been doing mettā practice for a very long time, and you can feel the effect of it in his energy and his level of happiness. He always seems to be happy.

So he'd come and teach—he likes to teach. Sometimes he's around for a week or so, and someone would ask him, "Well, Ajahn Jumnian, what would you like to do today? Would you like to go see the Golden Gate Bridge, or would you like to go to the beach in Point Reyes?" And he'd say, "Is there anybody who'd like to hear the dharma?" because he really loves to teach the dharma. But he said, "If there's no one who wants to hear the dharma, I'm happy to do whatever you like. If you want to take me to the beach, you can take me to the beach. And if nobody comes and we don't go anywhere, I'm happy to sit here because I'm always happy." And he seems to be like that. When you're in his presence, you just feel that joy that he radiates. He says that he hasn't had anger in thirty years, and it seems believable when you're in his presence. So it's a very inspiring example.

But that level of development wouldn't be possible if this seed of love wasn't already in us as part of our deepest nature, part of our human nature. So in the mettā practice, we're encouraging it to come, we're cultivating it, we're strengthening it, and we're making it arise more regularly.

We use this quality of mettā as the foundation. Once it's developed—that open-heartedness and connection with life—then when that open heart looks on suffering, the mettā simply morphs into the emotion of compassion, the second of the brahmavihāras. When that open heart looks on somebody's joy in their life, then it morphs into sympathetic joy or appreciative joy. And when the open heart can simply rest, then it stays in a balanced place, even in its awareness of all the joys and sorrows of life. And that's the brahmavihāra of equanimity. So loving kindness is the foundation of all the rest.

Once loving-kindness is developed, the others come about quite easily. So what supports the metta? What helps us develop it? I want to talk a little about how this practice works during our week together.

It's like gardening, which I'm sure many of you have reflected upon. Any spiritual practice resembles gardening. There are flowers, and there are weeds. You want to cultivate the flowers and dig out the weeds. You must be very patient and work at it day after day, maintaining real steadiness so the blooms can emerge.

Sally and I first met when we were working as gardeners in a Dharma community in England twenty-five years ago. We were doing intensive Dharma practice and gardening for the princely rate of three dollars an hour—the minimum agricultural wage in England at that time. We lived on this beautiful estate in southern England, which the owner had graciously offered as a site for our fledgling Dharma community.

Working in the garden day by day, I constantly saw images of how it mirrors meditation practice: removing weeds and planting good seeds, then nourishing those seeds. This is what we're doing with every metta phrase—planting a good seed. As we continue nourishing those seeds, in time the flower grows, the plant emerges, and the blossom blooms.

What makes it a good seed? Every phrase becomes a good seed when we say it with genuine intention. You know in Buddhism that intention is the heart of everything we do. So as we say each phrase, what is the right intention? What makes that phrase a potent seed?

The right intention is simply that we mean it. Nothing more than that. When you say a phrase with sincerity, you're planting a beautiful seed.

This practice doesn't work like a mantra where we mindlessly repeat words again and again—that has very limited effect. But anytime you can truly mean the phrase for yourself or someone else, genuinely wishing happiness, you've planted a powerful seed. In formal terms, it's called a karmic seed: an action of mind bearing the intention of loving-kindness. It's a pure and powerful thing to do.

We are gardeners in this practice, responsible for planting karmic seeds. But we are not nature. Nature is the force that waters, provides sunlight, supplies minerals in the soil, and tells that seed when to sprout and how to grow. That's not our job. Gardeners can't force those processes. Our job is simply planting seeds, providing the best conditions we can, then letting nature—or the Dharma—do the real work.

The Dharma brings these seeds to fruition in experiences of love, compassion, and joy. Our work is planting seeds as carefully as we can. If we can bring care to each moment of saying the phrase, that's a powerful seed. If we miss it one moment, we try to catch it the next. This is our practice: planting seeds and letting nature take over.

Don't worry if you're doing much planting with no sprouts yet. Gardeners must be patient. Sometimes you wait most of a growing season before the plant appears. You can't tug on that plant to make it emerge quicker—you'll break it. You must be truly allowing, which means being genuinely patient. Remember, our job is only planting seeds, not forcing results.

Don't try to force feelings from your metta practice. We often think we must try hard to make metta come, but that very trying will squeeze it off and choke its life. As Sharda said, you need a light touch and must let it come naturally.

Sometimes it feels like nothing's happening in metta practice, and that's perfectly fine. Don't worry when it feels like nothing's occurring. Someone reported yesterday that sometimes metta would come very strongly, then completely disappear as if nothing were happening, then return strongly before disappearing again. Don't be concerned about these kinds of changes.

Don't feel like it's supposed to be strong all the time because it just can't be. That's like asking for a peak experience all the time, like the Calvin and Hobbes cartoon that Sally read. The heart's rhythm is that it opens for a while and then it closes. It opens for a while and then it closes. And if we expect it to be different than that, then the head tries to put pressure on the heart and that's what causes the heart to shrink.

So I like to think of it that in this week together, this is kind of like a laboratory, a biological laboratory, where we want to learn to understand this kind of wild creature that is our heart. And we're feeding it these beautiful inclinations and beautiful suggestions, and then we just kind of want to sit back and listen and see how it responds. So if you have a child who's kind of shy or a wild animal, you know the thing to do is not stay right on top of them and put a lot of pressure because shy beings will recoil from that. But you want to give a lot of attention but in a very spacious way, and know that you're really interested, but not lean too hard.

So this is the kind of approach we want to take with our heart, to plant these great intentions and then to learn, oh, how is it going to behave? Does it have its own cycle of opening and closing? Are there conditions that make it able to open? What are the conditions that cause us to close with fear or contraction? So we just want to learn and observe all that. And the way to do it is to be like a new scientist with a really open mind discovering this new form of life which lives in us.

It may seem like one little phrase isn't very powerful. But one after another after another starts to build an incredible power. Those of you who have done vipassana retreats know that a moment of connecting with the breath feels like nothing in the beginning. So I feel a breath. So what? But then when we put one moment after another after another and we keep it going, that mindfulness, that awareness builds an incredible momentum. And in the same way in our practice of loving kindness, it's the contact with that caring, moment after moment after moment, that builds this same kind of momentum in the direction of love.

The Buddha said, "Don't disregard the accumulation of wholesomeness, saying, 'This will come to nothing.' By the gradual falling of raindrops, a jar is filled." So each phrase is just like a drop of rain. But as we keep letting them drop in, the biggest jar will eventually get filled from that.

Another reason sometimes metta feels like there's nothing happening is that we're looking for something dramatic. And sometimes metta is not very dramatic. It has a really broad range of feelings in the spectrum of metta. So you could say at the high end, there are these very strong feelings of intense love and even union with people or with nature, with the earth. And then a little down from that, there are really strong feelings of connection and friendship, human kind of love. Down a little bit from that, there's just a mild kind of friendship of appreciating somebody at a little bit of a distance.

And then down a little bit cooler than that is just the flavor of acceptance. Anytime you can be accepting of yourself or somebody else, metta is there. Because as Sharda said last night, there's no aversion. Anytime there's the absence of aversion, there is a form of metta. And even a little cooler than acceptance is the quality of patience. You know, you may get in the food line at lunch and you really want that next dish. And somebody seems to be going really slowly. And the irritation starts to be noticed. Why can't they move a little faster? And then all of a sudden you go, oh, I can be patient. And the patience transforms that aversion into acceptance. And then even that quality of patience has the flavor of metta. So sometimes it's not very dramatic. Nonetheless, metta is there and growing any time the aversion is absent.

The practice is hard going in the early days. Again, as Sharda said last night, just saying a phrase one after another after another seems incredibly laborious sometimes. Vipassana practice has never looked so good as on a metta retreat. Because it's like, just let me rest, please. Please.

So I want to suggest a way to bring some more rest into your practice of loving kindness. You can actually bring a lot of silence into this practice. So you can play with this, and maybe I'll give these instructions again tomorrow morning. You can play with it a little bit then. Think of each phrase as having three parts. There's a part where you connect with your person, let's say your benefactor.

And so maybe you bring up an image of your benefactor, and that's step one. That's in silence. Or maybe you just say their name. That's pretty quiet, pretty easy.

Then the next step is you send the phrase to them. So that's the work. You have to turn the mind on and turn out the phrase and direct it to them. That's labor.

Then for the third step, I want to suggest come back after you say the phrase and rest in your heart center. Just bring the attention into the center of your chest and let it rest there for a moment. No words at this point. And what you pay attention to when you rest there could be the physical sensation. Also tune into the feeling that's present right then. It's almost like you're listening to the echo of that phrase.

The phrase is like offering a gift, let's say to your benefactor. And then you want to just tune in for a second. How did it feel to offer that gift? Let the phrase just resonate a little bit for you. And you might feel some kind of warmth or affection or metta there. You might feel other feelings. You might have been sending metta to your benefactor and you become aware of some way that they've disappointed you or some difficult interaction where you felt hurt by them. And so it may bring up fear or some resentment. All of that is okay. I'll talk in a few minutes about how to work with all the other kinds of emotions that come in. But in that resting time, take time to tune in to what it is you're feeling.

So the three steps are the connection with the person, the phrase itself, and then coming into the heart center and feeling the feeling. So in actual fact, these are three different areas for mindfulness. Those of you who have a Vipassana background and have worked with mindfulness, we're not moving very far away from mindfulness. We're just choosing different things to pay attention to. So we're mindful of the connection to the person, we're mindful of the phrase, and we're mindful of the feeling that is there after we say the phrase.

You could also say that these are the three objects that make up our concentration practice. Metta is a strong concentration practice. Some of you are already starting to report this in the interviews. You can start to notice how it feels when you can string a few phrases together, how the mind collects around that and becomes quiet and a little firm. That's the feeling of concentration. So this will get stronger as the days go by because we keep coming back to these three points. The connection, the phrase, and the feeling.

All of these together—the moment of caring, the person that we feel some warmth for, the mindfulness of the present moment experience that we're having—all these are going together to create the sweet spot of meditation, where the present moment attention is developed as you've learned how to do it through mindfulness, and then it becomes suffused with the warmth of the loving-kindness.

This is the kind of balance of mind that we're looking to find through this practice in combination with the mindfulness practice. And you can think of these two, this fusing of the present moment attention with the warm feeling of the metta as a warm attention. This is really what we're trying to create. And once we find it through the metta practice, we can also find it in the mindfulness practice.

It's not to think that these two practices are really separate fundamentally. We want to shape the mind in the direction that it holds both. So that in doing the metta or doing the mindfulness, both these qualities start to come through and merge for us.

One of the images that I like to remind myself of this quality of warm attention is a story of Roberto Benigni, who was the Italian actor and director who produced the film Life is Beautiful, won an Academy Award a few years ago. He was honored after winning the Academy Award by an invitation to the White House. So he came to the White House when Clinton was still president and entered the room where Clinton was waiting for him. And as soon as he got into the room, he made a dash toward the president and leapt up with his legs around Clinton's waist, hugged him and said, "I'm so happy to see you."

So this is how we can meet our experience. Breath, I'm so happy to see you. They said that Clinton's Secret Service people were freaking out because they didn't expect a bodily assault, but Clinton was totally fine with it.

Another way to say it is that our practice of mindfulness opens up this great spaciousness in our experience. A lot of people talk about that. We get space around our thoughts. We get space around our emotions. We open up to the natural space of the universe. And then the practice of loving kindness fills that space with warmth. So it's no longer a cold and forbidding void, but it's a warm container that holds us really beautifully.

This change that happens as we plant these wholesome seeds and the quality of loving kindness starts to wake up as it's nourished by the Dharma is a process that we could call cleaning up the heart, or washing out the heart, or a more technical phrase we sometimes use: purifying the heart. Because instead of our usual intentions of distractedness, of leaping into the future with worry or desire, or mulling over the past with regret or sadness—instead of those intentions taking us out—we collect the mind in the present moment and the intentions become wholesome, turning to care, wishing well for ourselves and others.

So this moment-by-moment change starts to purify, starts to clean up what's in our heart on just a moment-to-moment basis. And this reconditions us. It retrains the heart how to be in the world. So this is one aspect of the purification that happens through this practice.

Many people will report that one of the biggest things we feel coming out of a week-long retreat—really whether it's Vipassana or Metta—is that it feels like our heart has been cleaned up, has been scrubbed, and we're going back with really fresh and open and kind of childlike eyes into the world. So this is how Metta does that piece.

But there's another way too that I want to talk about, and that has to do with the way that we work with two qualities of mind that are called the near and far enemies of Metta. Each of the four Brahmaviharas has two associated states of mind that are not wholesome states called the near enemy and the far enemy. Sally may have talked about this today with compassion.

So for loving kindness, the near enemy is a state of mind that looks like Metta and smells like Metta, but when you look at it closely, it isn't Metta. And that state is attachment—liking or affection with attachment connected to it. The far enemy of loving kindness is its opposite, and that's the quality Sharda mentioned last night: aversion or hatred.

So the far enemy of each Brahmavihara is its total opposite. The near enemy is something that looks like it, that's kind of an imposter, but is an unwholesome variation of the original.

Very often as we're practicing with the Brahmaviharas, the near enemy and the far enemy will come into our experience a lot. So it's very helpful to start to learn to identify them when they come. When you take that moment and return to the heart center, ground the attention in the body and see what feeling is there, just keep an eye out if one of the near enemy appears or the far enemy appears.

So I'll talk about both of these in a little more detail. The near enemy is affection with attachment. It's a liking, but the feeling is not unconditional. We say in Metta that the caring is unconditional. In this sense, it doesn't mean that nothing can break it. Sometimes I think about Jesus as having had unconditional love because he could still have love when he was being nailed to the cross. Nothing could break, it seems, his ability to love.

This sense is not so much in that. It's just that we can care for somebody without them satisfying any particular condition first. So in that sense, we're not asking somebody to fill out a form or sign on a dotted line or be really nice to us first. We'll care for them anyway. We'll take the initiative in caring. So in that sense, loving kindness is unconditional.

But affection with attachment has a condition, and it is basically: "I'll love you if you'll love me." And when that second part of the contract isn't filled, then my love goes away.

We see this a lot in the phenomenon of romantic love, the phenomenon of falling in love with someone. There's a very strong attraction. Obviously we appreciate a lot of things about that person, but fundamentally the emphasis in romantic love or in the phenomenon of falling in love is on me. "I love you because you make me feel so good. And once you stop making me feel great, I'm not so interested in you anymore."

Metta is different because the emphasis really is on the other person's well-being. It's not fundamentally a narcissistic exchange. It's fundamentally about the other person without regard to whether it profits us or benefits us or not.

So it's sometimes hard to tease these apart in the beginning. We're so used to caring being dependent on this affection exchange that it's hard to know what the pure form of Metta is. And it's why in the beginning we recommend that you don't take a relationship partner as your benefactor. For many of you, your relationship partner may be a great benefactor in your life, but there's also liable to be some attachment, some dependency, some kind of reciprocal need in that relationship.

So in order to discover just the purer flavor of Metta, it's helpful to work first with a relationship where there's not so much expectation. And often the benefactor is relatively free of that. And then we'll move on later to a good friend, where it can be a little bit freer of that kind of expectation or attachment.

I think about the progress of romantic love, and I don't know if anybody's written a pop song exactly like this, but it could certainly be written.

The lyrics would go something like: I want you, I need you, I love you, I'll kill you if I can't have you. It's a little different from metta.

So start to tune in as you're holding your metta subjects. Can you feel sometimes a wanting of something? Can you feel a kind of neediness or an expectation or a looking for some return from the relationship? That's a sign of the near enemy being present.

Now, it's not to be judgmental about that. It's not to expect that that degree of attachment has to go away. It's just to become aware that it's present.

For instance, in our intimate relationships, we usually have quite a lot of forces come together—quite a lot of things that we want focused on that person. There is a desire for companionship. There is a wanting of affection. There is sexual desire. All different kinds of parental influences come into it.

So in my relationship with Sally, for example, I feel a lot of attachment to her. And I don't expect it to be otherwise, maybe as long as I live. It could be that I'll get really, really free and that attachment will go sometime before I die, but I don't have an expectation of that. And I know if something were to happen to her, if she were to get really ill or if she were to die, I would be devastated. So for me, that's just part of the terrain. This attachment piece is part of the terrain of having a close and committed relationship.

So I've chosen to be in that relationship. I know that there's going to be some suffering that comes as a result of my attachment in that field. And I don't think it's within my capability to completely let that go at this point in my development.

I'm just sharing from a personal outlook. I don't know anyone who is in a committed relationship that doesn't have some degree of attachment. Sometimes people can get very idealistic about Dharma language and think they should be able to be in an intimate relationship without attachment. But I haven't seen it work. Usually it means that they want something of the relationship, but they don't want the commitment piece.

Speaking broadly, I don't think it's very realistic to expect the attachment in this central area of our life to suddenly disappear while we still have ego invested in so many other areas—in sense pleasures, in our house, in our career, in having money or status or whatever. So as long as desire is operating in the mind, it's going to latch on to certain objects in our life. Relationship partners are a big one. Children are a big one. Even after children are grown and completely out of the house, and you've done most of the caring that you can for them, there's usually a strong element of attachment that continues.

So it's not something that should be judged as wrong or inappropriate at all. It's part of what we take on in living as laypeople in the world. It's just to recognize it when it's there: There is desire on my part. This desire is born of attachment, and at some point it will cause me suffering, but it's just part of the way that I'm choosing to live in this life.

So there's no need to fight with it, there's no need to judge yourself about it, and no need to push it away—just to recognize when it's there. Then, once you start to see that clearly, you can also start to see the parts of the relationship that are more purely the care for the other person's well-being.

I'll say in my relationship with Sally, one of the really notable changes is that over the years, that pure metta-feeling has gotten stronger and stronger, and my neediness has gotten less and less. And so I regard that as a beautiful development. It gives me a lot more freedom in my day-to-day relating with her, and it puts a lot less pressure on her. I think we've both gotten a lot happier as a result.

So this is the area of the near enemy—affection that has some string or attachment connected with it. The opposite side is the far enemy. And this is when we notice in our relationship to one of our metta subjects, or just someone who comes to our mind as we're practicing, a quality of disliking, of aversion, or sometimes really strong hatred. Mixed in with this aversion can also be the forms that not-liking takes around being hurt or being afraid.

This comes up often during metta practice. As we get into metta for people that we've had long relationships with—it could be a benefactor, it could be a friend—we end up going through a whole life review of our time with those people. All kinds of memories come up spontaneously. Have you noticed that? As you stay with your benefactor, you remember lots of times you've spent together, lots of things that have happened between you.

We start with the benefactor because more of them tend to be positive. As we move into the friend, then there tends to be much more of a mix, as friendships are.

So we'll remember times that we did something unskillful, where we hurt our friend and we may feel a lot of guilt or shame about it. We remember times that they did something unskillful to us, and we might feel hurt, we might feel afraid of them, or we might feel angry or resentful in return.

This whole area of all the aversive reactions that can come in doing metta is a very, very big part of the practice. When we first encounter these other reactions, we often think, "I'm doing it wrong. I was supposed to get metta, and I'm getting the opposite. I must be doing it wrong. Let's push that aside, and I'll try really harder. Or I'll change the person. Yeah, that's it. I'll go to a different person."

In fact, this work is half of what the metta practice is about. This is the other half of the purification of heart that metta brings. As we incline the mind to loving kindness, somehow our sneaky subconscious says, "Oh, but wait, there's another story here." And it will kind of bring to the surface anything that's in there that's not of the nature of loving kindness.

It's sort of like starting metta practice is like running this big magnet right up the center of your system. You've got the strong north pole coming against your heart, and that pulls out all the particles that are magnetized in the opposite direction. "You want to go metta? Boom. Boom." So all different kinds of aversion start to come through, sometimes really strongly.

The more sensitive the heart gets through the influence of the loving kindness, the more impactful the negative emotions can be too. So this is all part of this process of opening up. Unfortunately, we can't just choose to open to the beautiful. When we open to the beautiful, we also open to the difficult. And this is still part of our mindstream. All these different kinds of aversion are in all of us, so they will come and will be experienced to different degrees around different people and with different memories.

There is something quite beautiful and quite magical about the meeting of the force of metta with these different kinds of aversive reactions. You really do not want to push them away. So let's talk about how to work with them.

A common one that comes up is self-judgment. We're sending metta to ourselves, and as we do it, we remember all kinds of things we did in our life earlier that we feel really badly about. When I did my first long retreat, I had this parade that I had to write down to get it out of my thoughts—what I wrote down as the ten biggest mistakes I ever made in my life. I reviewed these things over and over in the silence of the retreat setting because they just kept coming. I hadn't really looked at them before with the spirit of kindness.

One of them was a time I was about sixteen years old and I went on a hunting trip with my father. My father was an avid hunter and fisherman. We got up at like three o'clock in the morning, drove to the edge of this river in the middle of winter where he had a little rowboat with an outboard engine. We motored across to this island where he had a duck blind. We had to get there before dawn came up to go into the blind, so the ducks wouldn't see us, and we'd be hidden away as the light broke.

The light was coming up, but it wasn't time yet to shoot ducks. So my father, who had given me this 410-gauge shotgun, said, "Why don't you take some target practice?" And he pointed to a songbird that was on the limb of a tree not very far from me. I was just a sixteen-year-old kid. I didn't know what to feel. I didn't know what I was feeling. So I followed my father's advice, and I pulled the trigger on the 410, and there was just this explosion of feathers where the bird had been.

We went through the rest of the day hunting, and I was never a very good shot, fortunately, and didn't contribute by killing any ducks that day. But as I was sitting in meditation, this memory came up, and I felt so badly about it. In light of the first precept, refraining from killing—innocent songbird, I hadn't even thought twice about taking its life. There was nothing I could do to make it better, and so I was just left with this incredible guilt.

In starting to work with that, I just had to let that be. There wasn't anything else I could do with it. We have now a practice that will be shared with you, I think tomorrow, of forgiveness, where as we come in touch with things that we've done that have been unskillful, we have a practice very much like the metta practice that works to forgive ourselves for those actions.

So we'll share that with you.

I didn't know about the forgiveness practice at the time, so I just had to sit with this memory. And in the investigation, I learned something interesting about the quality of guilt. Guilt is not a helpful emotion. Guilt is the judging of ourselves, beating ourselves up over what we've done, taking the blame, directing anger toward ourselves. Not helpful.

But what is helpful and ultimately cleans it up a little bit is the willingness to feel the remorse. I felt deep regret about having shot that songbird. And although I couldn't make it up to the songbird, the regret that I felt strengthened my resolve to be really careful in my relationships with creatures from then on. So that remorse is a very wholesome quality, that feeling of regret.

Now I can think about the incident. I still have a feeling of regret and some remorse, but I don't have guilt anymore. Do I wish it was different? Yeah. But I no longer beat myself up about it.

So when self-judgment comes, if this review of our own actions arises, remember to examine the difference between guilt and remorse. See if you can open to the feeling of regret without strong judgment and self-blame. Because you're a very different person now than you were then. Your actions were different. Your understanding was different.

Other times, the memories that come are times that we've been hurt. So we might find a strong feeling of hurt arising. And then we have to allow that to be there. Sometimes in response to the hurt, anger can come really strongly. And then how do we work with that?

You probably know that one of the traditional ways is to send loving kindness to the person who has hurt us. That's difficult to do if you're angry. I had one retreat where some memories came up of an incident and I was getting angry at the person. I thought, I should probably try sending loving kindness to them. And I thought, I don't want to do that. That's really hokey, because then I'd have to pretend like I really love that person or at least like them a lot. There's no way I'm going to do that because I'm pissed off.

But I was at the end of my rope. This scenario kept running. The image kept coming. I kept getting angry, and it was unpleasant—one of the things we find about anger is that it doesn't feel good. So I was tired of the pain of it, and I was getting desperate. So I thought, okay, I'll try it.

I started directing thoughts of loving kindness to the person. And what was so interesting is that I found as soon as I could really wish for their happiness in a sincere way, the anger was gone. Because the anger has a component of ill will, which means there's a piece in anger that wants the other person to hurt the way we were hurt. If you take it a step further, that's what leads to cruelty.

So when I saw the connection between ill will and cruelty, I sort of couldn't stand the sense of myself being a cruel person or wanting to be cruel. So it really motivated me not to prolong the ill will. And as soon as I could bring in a sense of good will, that blocked the ill will.

So it's a very interesting thing with anger. If metta is truly present, anger can't get in because goodwill is the opposite of ill will. So it was very skillful for me to find I could wish the other person well, and that really deflected, diffused the anger.

But nonetheless, we can find different ways to work with the individual emotions that come. Metta is very skillful for relating with a number of them. But I want to talk generally about how to hold any of these feelings that come, whether it's guilt or remorse or fear, anxiety, anger, hurt.

So let's say you're going along, you're doing the loving kindness phrases, and you come to rest in the heart center and you notice a different emotion is there. Let's say it's a form of the far enemy of aversion, some degree of negativity there. You feel the pain of it, you recognize it's not metta—what to do with it then?

There are about three different things that you can do. The first is the simplest: you just let it be there in the background and you keep turning your intention to the metta phrases.

So continue to do the metta practice, again meaning each phrase as much as you can. You know the emotion is there in the background and you just let it be there. Then as you continue with the metta, you'll find that the metta will develop and start to come in contact with that difficult feeling.

When metta starts to wake up, it's not directed to just one person. It fills the mind and heart, and so it touches the whole world. As the metta starts to come through, it begins to touch that aversive mind state. The meeting of those two is where the magical thing happens that we could call healing. The presence of metta makes that aversive state much more acceptable—not something that we have to toss out of ourselves, but something that we can simply acknowledge as another part of the human psyche, something that we all have. We all have a reaction of anger sometimes.

So in this mode, just continue with the loving kindness and allow it to hold and eventually touch and change that aversive reaction.

If the aversive reaction gets stronger—let's say anger is there really strongly—it will block the ability to generate an intention of loving kindness, and you really can't do a phrase with any meaning anymore. The emotion is strong enough that it's blocking the metta practice, so there's no point in continuing with the phrases. Then turn your attention with mindfulness to the direct experience of the difficult emotion and just open up to it. Say, "I invite you in, let me feel you."

If you've caught it near its beginning, or near its beginning of intensity, often just that opening up is enough. You can have the sense, "Okay, come on in, express yourself, I surrender." That invitation lets it present itself and often just wash through. Very often after you do that opening, it'll come, manifest for a short time, and pass through. Great. When it does, when it gets weaker or goes away, you can just return to the metta.

Let's say that doesn't work. You open to it for a minute and it's still strong. The next thing you can do is turn to a compassion phrase, as Sally introduced this afternoon. You're suffering because it's a painful mind state. Recognize that suffering and bring the compassion attitude directly to it. You might say something like, "May I hold this anger with compassion?"

Feel the pain of it for yourself. You're not trying to make it go away. You're not trying to aim above it by looking for happiness, because sometimes metta can be too idealistic. In times like this when we're suffering, metta aims too high. Compassion goes right to the reality, the truth of our present moment experience, can meet it and hold it in a bigger picture. Just "May I hold this pain, this anger, this hurt with compassion." Be with that for a while. Often that will soften the whole mind state and soften the aversive reactions.

It's nice to move to compassion because you stay within the brahmaviharas family. You're keeping the concentration part of the practice going, staying connected to the metta field.

The fourth thing you can do is switch to vipassana—switch to mindfulness practice. Drop any phrases. Just turn your attention to the experience of the emotion in the body, in the mind, and through the door of thinking. Stay with it as long as it's presenting itself. Because of impermanence, it will eventually fade. When it does, you can return to the loving kindness.

This approach of four graduated steps—leave it in the background, open and let it wash through, turn to it with compassion, or turn to it with mindfulness—can work for any of the difficult and painful emotions that come. You can try each of them. These are just four different tools. Try them and see which ones work for you when these visitors show up.

As we keep opening and allowing in ourselves again and again, letting metta widen our hearts and widen our being, we find there's room for all these difficulties. The heart can expand enough to hold them and finally accept them so that we don't have to push them away. That's where the second stage of this purification comes from.

By opening to the difficult and transforming it with all the different tools that we have, another kind of purification of heart and mind takes place. These states may recur—they may come again—but once we learn the tools, we learn that they're all workable, and we develop more and more confidence that we know our way back to balance. Whatever is thrown up by the mind, whatever presents itself, we start to trust: "I know how to work with this. I know how to come back to my center, find my balance, and restore the loving kindness in my heart."

This gives a lot of self-confidence. We really don't have to be afraid of these parts of our mind because we find the tools to make them workable.

So this is very healing.

I'll close with this segment of a poem by Galway Kinnell, which many of you know, "St. Francis and the Sow":

"The bud stands for all things, even for those things that don't flower. For everything flowers from within of self-blessing. Though sometimes it is necessary to reteach a thing its loveliness, to put a hand on the brow of the flower and retell it in words and in touch, it is lovely, it is lovely, until it flowers again from within of self-blessing."

So let's just sit for a minute together, please.

Sometimes it is necessary to reteach a thing its loveliness until it flowers again from within of self-blessing.

Thank you for your attention. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 34

The Seven Factors of Awakening - Part 2

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

In this second part of his exploration of the seven factors of awakening (satta bojjhaṅga), Guy Armstrong delves into the three pacifying factors that balance the energizing ones. Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10) and reflecting on the Buddha's teaching that "peace is the highest happiness," he examines passaddhi (tranquility) as the mind's natural rest when disturbance ceases. Armstrong explains samādhi not as mere concentration but as unification of mind—the gathering of scattered mental energies into a powerful, collected state that forms the foundation of spiritual power.

The talk illuminates how these factors develop sequentially: tranquility arising from the joy of the first three factors, deepening into the strength of concentration, which then gives rise to upekkhā (equanimity)—that balanced awareness that can meet changing conditions without being thrown about by craving or aversion. Armstrong offers practical guidance for recognizing and balancing all seven factors, emphasizing that this balanced development creates the optimal conditions for insight. He concludes with the Buddha's promise that these noble and emancipating factors, when cultivated together, lead to the complete destruction of suffering and the realization of nibbāna.

Last week I introduced the topic of the seven factors of awakening and talked about the first four factors. Mindfulness gets everything else rolling and then keeps the factors in balance. Then come the first three awakening factors of investigation, energy, and rapture—that joyful interest in meditation. We talked about how these three together work to bring up the interest and the energy, and how that creates a kind of joy in the mind that's focused on the meditation object. This joyful quality then starts to settle the mind because the presence of joy itself is satisfying.

This week I want to talk about the final three factors, which are the tranquilizing factors of tranquility, concentration and equanimity. To introduce this phase of the awakening factors and set the stage, I was thinking as I walked up the path tonight of a time at Spirit Rock before the meditation hall was built and before we had the paved road. If you can imagine back to that setting, you'll see that this slope of hill around the meditation hall and up to the site creates a kind of natural amphitheater. In fact, there was no landscaping then. The little bulge to the right of the road as you come up wasn't there either. It was just a smooth contour from here down to the residence halls and then sloping down the hill to the stream.

The dining hall was already there. With this natural amphitheater, once every couple of years we invited Thich Nhat Hanh to come and teach here. We built a platform, a raised wooden platform for him on the other side of the stream. He would sit there, his voice was amplified, and we had a thousand or more people spread out on the hillside listening to him. It reminded me of what it would have been like in the time of the Buddha, when the Buddha is said to have addressed five hundred or more people at a time. Even without amplification, somehow he was able to do it.

Thich Nhat Hanh, more than most teachers that I know, has the ability to manifest this quality of tranquility and calm—and not only manifest it, but radiate it. There's something about his body language and his deep inner stillness and the place that he speaks from. I felt like the whole day that he was talking, he was casting a spell of tranquility over the whole hillside. Everybody over the course of the day just calmed down and settled into the space that he created.

Toward the end of the day, it was very sweet—he took the whole group for a slow walking meditation up the dirt road to the very end of the path. If you've walked back to the end, you know there are a couple of lovely little meadows back there where one day we hope to build a hermitage with about twenty retreat cabins. But for now it's undeveloped. We have a photo of five hundred or so people walking in single file behind him as he did slow walking up to the other end of the property. It was very beautiful. The whole thing unfolded in this space of tranquility and stillness.

As I tuned into him that day and reflected on the incredibly difficult and violent years that he'd lived through during the Vietnam War, where both sides of the war made death threats against him—which is why he had to leave Vietnam—it struck me that his stillness came from somebody who was no longer afraid of dying. He had faced death in all its manifestations so many times that he'd lost his fear of death. And that's why he was so completely at peace in himself.

This transmission of peace and settledness is one of the great blessings of our path. When you meet a master like Thay, you can see it, you can feel it, and how it manifests in his life—his mind, his speech and his body. It's really quite a transmission.

This is the part of the path that I want to explore tonight in these facets of calm, concentration and equanimity. But first, just a little more about the general role of tranquility in the Buddhist path.

The Buddha talked about the practice of mindfulness leading to two main developments. One he called samatha or serenity, the other he called vipassana or insight. Now we've named this an insight meditation practice, an insight meditation center. So we seem to emphasize the vipassana aspect. And I think it is more important because it's only wisdom or insight that has the potential to liberate the mind. It's only the direct seeing of the nature of reality that can really truly free the heart and mind. So insight is supreme in the teachings of the Buddha.

But this factor of samatha is nearly as powerful. The translation is serenity. It could equally well be called tranquility—we just give it a different word to differentiate it from the other terms. This development of samatha is what allows the mind to relax and settle into what has been talked about during this retreat as its natural peace and ease. The mind and body find their own natural peace and ease, which is their very nature when we don't go disturbing it or stirring it up.

It's the opening to serenity, the discovering of this property that lets us settle into that faculty, which is already potential within ourselves. This is not something new we have to construct. It's already our birthright. We just have to open to it and sort of find the way in.

When we find this ability to rest in this peace, this becomes the doorway to contentment. As we rest and there's a satisfying quality in that, we can let go of a lot of the desires to be elsewhere. A lot of the cravings and wantings can fall away as we find a natural satisfaction in this resting in peace.

The enlightened teacher looked at his student and said, "So that's why the Buddha said that samatha is for the abandoning of lust." This is a profound statement because the desire force is considered such a formidable hindrance on the spiritual path. Samatha enables the abandoning of lust precisely because we discover in this peace a profound contentment and settledness—a natural satisfaction that allows our cravings to fall away.

Vipassana, meanwhile, is for the abandoning of ignorance. Only the wisdom that penetrates the ultimate nature of reality can remove ignorance and truly liberate the mind to its fullest potential, uprooting the deepest bonds that hold us captive. Yet these two work together harmoniously—samatha and vipassana, serenity and insight, like two wings of the same bird.

This evening we'll explore the qualities that comprise this serenity, examining how they develop and how we can skillfully support their cultivation.

The first of the pacifying factors is commonly translated as tranquility, sometimes as calm. The Pali word is passaddhi. Other synonyms might include repose, rest, or as one translator beautifully rendered it, relaxation. I find this particularly appealing—the notion that relaxation itself may be one of the factors of awakening. This is precisely why we place it so centrally in our meditation instructions.

This factor of tranquility represents a state where the body has become calm, free from strong energy movements that might disturb its natural equilibrium. The mind, too, has found its peace—no longer churning with the rapid succession of thoughts and emotions that typically stir up our mental processes.

Picture the surface of a pond when no strong wind disturbs it and no currents bubble up from below. That serene, undisturbed surface—the very absence of movement—points to what we mean by this first factor of calm or tranquility.

I trust that everyone here has touched these awakening factors to varying degrees in your practice. When you encounter this feeling of calm, what is your experience? What affect does it carry? What mood does it evoke? Is it difficult to bear?

There's usually something pleasant about it, isn't there? When the mental chatter subsides and those turbulent energies that shake the body finally settle, a pleasant feeling tone often accompanies the experience. It frequently carries a sense of wellbeing, a quality of rightness.

When I first discovered this state in practice, there was an unmistakable recognition: "Ah, this is what I've been seeking—at least part of what I've been seeking." In our busy Western culture, we receive few pointers toward this state and even less instruction on how to access it. As active Westerners, we often live in perpetual motion—active, active, active, stirred up, stirred up, stirred up. You can feel how exhausting this becomes for both mind and body when we lack knowledge of where to find genuine rest.

Suzuki Roshi observed when teaching at Zen Center in the late seventies: "You know how to rest physically, but you don't know how to rest mentally." The mind grows weary from this constant activity. When we finally touch this factor of tranquility or calm, we begin to feel: "Oh, now I can truly rest." It brings profound soothing to the mind.

Yet because this represents new territory for many of us, it can feel unfamiliar at first. I remember a meditator friend who, upon first encountering this experience while noting her mind states, found herself thinking: "Calm?" As if to say, "What is this? I've heard about it, but I don't recognize this experience. Can this be real?" We must gradually become acquainted with it, learning to recognize its subtle presence.

Because tranquility is such a delicate state, it doesn't announce itself with fanfare. No neon sign flashes "CALM HAS ARRIVED—THE AWAKENING FACTOR IS HERE—PAY ATTENTION!" It's far more subtle than that.

We might not notice it initially and thus overlook it entirely. When it goes unrecognized—when it's not mindfully noted or properly acknowledged—several reactions commonly arise. We might think, "Oh, now nothing's happening. The lights have gone out." When there were fireworks of emotion or cascades of thought, that seemed fascinating. But now that the excitement has subsided, we assume nothing significant is occurring and slip into boredom, wondering when the next stimulating event will awaken our interest.

This reminds me of another of those wonderful cartoons by Gahan Wilson set in a meditation hall...

I think Sally and Sylvia both mentioned. And in this one, there are two monks sitting next to each other. One's clearly older, one's clearly younger. The older monk is leaning over to the young monk and whispering in his ear, "Nothing happens next. This is it."

So sometimes that might be how it feels when we first touch calm. Oh my God, nothing happens next. This is it. Especially if we're used to a lot of storm and fireworks in our practice, either lovely or difficult, then this can seem really uninteresting. And a reaction can be boredom.

But this itself is a clue. When boredom comes, let this be an invitation to investigate what's up. I tend to think of boredom as a reaction that's formed to a neutral feeling tone. So take a look at your experience when boredom has set in. See if there isn't something neutral in the experience that you're having at that moment. This is the feeling tone that tends to be the condition for boredom to come. And then I think of it as an aversion to the neutral, because in some ways we want the drama of pleasant or unpleasant.

But this neutral is a very interesting place to investigate. If it's neutral, that means there's not anything particularly painful going on. That itself is a good development in meditation. Oh, there's the absence of pain. I can appreciate that. Having encountered a lot of pain, I can appreciate that. So take a look at that and then notice if there is a sense of calm in that neutrality and then note it. Oh, this is what the mind state of calm is like. And you know, the Buddha spoke rather highly of this mind state. So there might be something to it.

So take a look at the factor of calm, the sense of neutrality, and if there's any aversion to the neutralness of the experience, but realize that this is a place of great potential. In some ways, this is what we have been waiting for. This calm is part of the fruit of meditation that can really enrich our life. We just want to become more familiar with it, more comfortable with it, and then it tends to become pleasant.

There's another reaction to calm that often happens, and that is we can feel quite unsettled by it. Because calm has a sense of spaciousness that can feel kind of empty to us. When there's a lot of movement, either pleasant or unpleasant, then there's a lot of activity and the I can relate to that. We know what to do with activity. We sort of know how to find ourself or define ourself in relation to mental activity. But when that mental activity stops and there's space or silence or nothing, then where are we?

So we might get a feeling: I don't know how to find myself in relation to this much space, this much emptiness. And that can be scary. Not knowing where we are in that experience can be unsettling. So sometimes what happens as soon as calm is really opened up and discovered is that there's some degree of fear or anxiety that comes in. So just be open to that. If that's the next thing that arises, you might be noting calm for a few moments, and then you might note anxiety. That's okay. Then just be with that. Let the experience unfold however it does. But start to notice this presence of calm. As we meditate more, it comes more often, is more available.

The Buddha said, in the Dhammapada, "Peace is the highest happiness." This, I think, is a really interesting thing to reflect on. Peace is the highest happiness. To see if we believe this or not. Because I think when we come into meditation, we often are looking for something other than peace. There's a wanting for, or a belief that the highest happiness is a really strong, uplifting experience of bliss, or a great hit of ecstasy, something strongly energizing and moving. And here's the Buddha coming in and saying—who has explored the mind over and over and over again—saying the highest happiness is peace.

What if that's true? Then we might be looking in the wrong places for our ultimate contentment. I think this is a really interesting comment on human psychology and something that's worth pondering. What if the thing that is really going to satisfy us is peace and not any kind of fireworks?

Would that reorient your sense of seeking or aim in life?

This quality of calm can also be developed somewhat. It can be invited. In the Discourse on the Mindfulness of Breathing, the Buddha says at a few different points, "I shall breathe in tranquilizing the bodily formation. I shall breathe in tranquilizing the mental formation. I shall breathe out tranquilizing the bodily formation. I shall breathe out tranquilizing the mental formation."

This is really a meditation instruction. See if this is possible. As you're breathing in and out, if you turn your mind to calm, see if the breath has that capability of bringing calmness into the body and mind. You can just play with this in any sitting. As you tune to the breath, connect it in your thoughts with the factor of calm and see if it has the capability to bring that alive somewhat.

So as this quality of calm comes in more, we trust in it more, we relax in it, we just settle our being in it, then it deepens into the next factor, which is concentration. The Pali term is samadhi.

Concentration grows out of this collectedness of mind that has come about through the mind's settling in rest or repose. This factor has been in human culture for a long time. It's one of the most powerful qualities in mind, and it's been known since ancient, prehistoric times. Shamans in indigenous cultures all over the world have used this factor to enter the altered states that they enter, to contact other realms, to do the kind of magical healing things that they do. It rests on the power of concentration.

Before the Buddha's awakening, the first two teachers that he went to taught him how to enter deep states of concentration. And in a very short period of time, he reached the same level of attainment that his teachers had. They invited him to teach, but he felt it wasn't the final release he was looking for, so he left those teachers. But those technologies were already in place early in the Buddha's lifetime.

Even today in the West, some aspect of this power is alive in our culture. It's quite interesting to discover this. You can find it in cartoons. You know if it's in cartoons, it's in the common consciousness.

There are two types of guru cartoons that you'll see. The first is a wisdom type. It's the cartoon of the seeker who goes and meets the wise person on the mountaintop and gets all their questions answered. Here is one cartoon that was in the New Yorker. The picture shows somewhere that looks like the Himalayas because there are really tall mountain peaks in the background. There's a cave on one of these mountains, and in front of the cave is a man with a long white beard, sitting cross-legged, wearing just a white loincloth. There's a figure in Western clothes who looks like he has just climbed up the peak to sit in front of the guru and pose his question. The guru's reply: "If I knew the meaning of life, do you think I'd be sitting in this cave in my underpants?"

So I guess that's the wisdom aspect. But the other aspect is the yogi, the yogi who is deep in concentration. There's this archetypal image of the meditator. Think about a person on a mountaintop, seated cross-legged, wrapped in a shawl, eyes closed, not much expression, and what that image evokes. Of course, for you who've been involved in this, you know it from the inside. You get that feeling when you walk into the hall and people have already started to sit. You can feel that presence and groundedness.

I think there are three qualities in this image that I want to draw out. They're aspects of concentration.

The first is stillness. The person is sitting unmoving. There's the implication that as the body has come into stillness, the person's mind has also come into stillness. This is that quality that Thich Nhat Hanh was radiating.

The second quality is that it's an inner experience. There's a sense the person has closed their eyes and somewhat withdrawn from contact with the world. One has turned away from outer engagement and looked inwardly at the mind's own qualities and found rest and stillness inside. This is important because the Buddha talked often about the importance of seclusion, not only seclusion from the outer world, but seclusion from the inner forces of distraction.

The third feature that I think we carry with that archetype is that there's a sense with this inward looking of some deep happiness or contentment or bliss. The yogi in turning away from the world and going inside has found a more meaningful or more lasting or more significant kind of happiness than is available outside.

All these qualities are aspects of concentration. In the Buddha's teachings, it's hard to overstate how important this factor is. It's the last factor in the Eightfold Path, and because the Eightfold Path is presented as a sequence, it's the culmination before it wraps back around to begin with wisdom again.

When the Buddha summarized the Eightfold Path, he spoke of it as sīla, samādhi, and paññā—ethical conduct, concentration, and wisdom. He didn't speak of it as ethical conduct, mindfulness, and wisdom. This is quite interesting. Why is the meditation portion represented by samādhi rather than sati, mindfulness? Because in many ways, samādhi is the culmination of mindfulness. It's the fruition of mindfulness.

Concentration appears in what are called the Iddhipāda, the four bases for progress in spiritual life. It's part of each one of these foundations. It's also found in the five spiritual faculties and in the seven factors of awakening. So it appears again and again in the Buddha's teaching, and I think we have somewhat underrepresented it in Western teaching.

So what is this quality? The word samādhi is usually translated as concentration. It's not a very good translation. I'm going to stay with it because it is so common, but it's a little misleading for us. The fact is, as far as I can tell, there's no single word in English that really conveys the whole meaning of concentration. And that in itself is interesting.

What does it say when a whole culture—and I'd say this is true in any European language—doesn't have a word for something? It generally says we don't know what it is. We don't know how to perceive it or we don't know how to develop it. You know how the Eskimos are said to have seventeen words for snow? Because they've looked at it really closely. And the cultures that have looked at the mind really closely have words for this. You'll find it in most of the Asian languages.

So in English we don't really know what it is, and it took me a long time in practice to understand how concentration is different from mindfulness. I'll talk a little about that tonight.

We usually think in English that the word concentration means I have an exclusive focus of attention on something. Like we say, "I'm concentrating on my homework—can you please turn off the television because it's distracting me?" So we mean my attention is just on one thing. But the term samādhi doesn't have anything to do with attention being just on one thing. What it means is that the mind's substance has gotten collected. The mind's substance has gotten unified or pulled together.

So the best translation that I like for samādhi is "unification of mind." This appears once in the Majjhima Nikāya that I know of—unification of mind. Other synonyms that I think we've been using often are collectedness, composure, non-distractedness, wholeheartedness. So I hope you get the sense that all of these are pointing to how the mind's energy has come together, and in that coming together, it takes on a certain kind of strength.

Normally, what do we do with the mind's energy? We send it into past, we send it into future, we send it into plans, we send it into memories. All these stray random thoughts are taking our energy and just dispersing it, tossing it out to the four winds, and that's how we lose it. When we stop doing that and we let this quality of resting happen, all the mind's energy comes together. And then we find the mind has a tremendous power.

The concentrated mind is at the base of spiritual power because of the strength that builds up as we pull those energies back in. And I want to emphasize this quality of rest. It's not so much that we have to effort, effort, effort to collect this energy. We just have to non-distract ourselves, and the energy will collect by itself. So the quality of resting will bring this energy together. It's not that you have to effort really hard. In fact, efforting too hard will disturb this natural peace. There just has to be enough effort to stay in touch with the present moment and not become distracted.

So this energy will naturally collect within us. Basically, it's just our attention to the present moment and our not turning away from that which allows this energy to become collected and for the mind to become whole again.

Now, there are two ways that this collectedness can be cultivated. One is through the very open attention where we're in touch with changing appearances moment after moment. This is called momentary concentration, and it's represented in that kind of open attention meditation that we did the other morning. As long as the mindfulness is there moment after moment, that is enough to draw the attention in.

Another way that it can be developed is to pick one steady focus, like the breath, and keep returning the attention there again and again. You could feel it in the abdomen, you could feel it in the chest, you could feel it in the nose. Or the metta phrases are another example of a single-pointed focus. So this collectedness can happen around a single focus, but it doesn't have to. That's not the only way it can develop.

At this point in the retreat, I would invite each of you to reflect and maybe discuss with your teachers: what's the best way in my practice for this sense of collectedness and unification to develop? For me, is it most harmonious to develop through a kind of open attention to anything that comes, but a real commitment to being there moment after moment? Or is there a place in my practice for choosing a single focus at times and being with that—just returning the attention to breath, sounds, body, metta—as a way to bring that collectedness together?

Both can work. It's something of an individual suitability question. What harmonizes best for you?

So start to notice when this factor is present. This is one of the instructions in the Third Foundation in the Satipatthana Sutta. The Buddha says, "The practitioner understands concentrated mind as concentrated mind and unconcentrated mind as unconcentrated mind." The instruction is that we should know whether the factor of concentration is present or not. So just start to explore and look at that.

How do we know when concentration is present? The simplest way is that we're able to sustain mindfulness moment after moment continuously for a while. This is how it feels differently. When you can be in the present moment, moment after moment, and that goes on for a while, that's a sign of developing concentration. You probably remember the first days of the retreat—you were lucky to catch two breaths in a row. Now maybe you can catch five. That's progress. That's the sign of concentration. That's not the definition of concentration. The definition is the mind comes together and it has a kind of strength. But that's the symptom. That's how you can tell when it's happening.

Concentration is basically generated just by being fully present for each moment of experience. You could say doing one thing at a time. So in your work meditation, to the extent that you can just do your work meditation and be present—say for the movement of your arms and hands—then your attention will collect in doing your work. Really take it as an opportunity through your work period to use it as a meditation practice, and you can continue to develop this factor of unification or collectedness.

When you're walking from here to your room, be in touch with some clear activity—movement of the body, for instance—and that will continue to collect even though it seems like an informal period.

The Zen teacher Seung Sahn used to instruct his students like this. He'd say, "When you sit, just sit. And when you walk, just walk. Just do one thing at a time." So one morning, a student who was living in the Zen center at Providence came into the dining room and found Seung Sahn eating his breakfast and reading a newspaper. The student was very upset and said, "But teacher, you said just do one thing at a time, and here you are eating your breakfast and reading a newspaper." And Seung Sahn replied, "And when you eat and read, just eat and read."

So we don't have to do anything different to cultivate this collectedness. Just be wholehearted in the way you do it. In each moment, just give yourself to that moment.

Now, sometimes you'll feel this factor quite strongly and then it'll go away. How does that feel? Yeah, it's disappointing. That's one of the hard things in meditating—when the concentration factor has been here and goes. So then watch what happens. Often there's a strong desire to be back there. Sometimes that's unconscious. But if we don't catch it and see the wanting, then it drives us. Often we don't see it and we don't notice: oh, craving.

We're basically craving for a pleasurable state, but we don't see it. So we start efforting strongly, hardly, as much effort as we can put in trying to get back to that concentrated state. But when we effort with that kind of striving mentality, that kind of craving underneath, it doesn't work so well. And it ends up tying us in some kind of knot. We get caught up in a lot of tension of desire.

So if you can notice this strong desire, oh, I really want the concentration back, then you can avoid that extra striving kind of effort. Because concentration has to come out of relaxation. It has to come out, it grows out of a real acceptance of the present moment. Not a striving to be somewhere else, but a settling into here.

One of my favorite meditation instructions is one that Joseph Goldstein has been using for thirty-some years now, when he says, "Just settle back into the present moment." I love to remember that as I'm sitting, just settle back into the present moment. And it has this sense of drawing me from an outward reaching kind of future-oriented grab to just relaxing into the body and settling into the base of the sitting posture.

Because it said in the texts that the proximate cause for concentration is happiness. When happiness is present in the mind, then that settling takes place easily. So striving or craving are the opposite of happiness, and they'll block concentration from being able to happen. But happiness and relaxation will let that settling happen quite naturally.

Some people, it turns out, have a real faculty for concentration, and some people don't. Ajahn Jumnian is one of the teachers who comes here about once a year. He's a Thai meditation master. He's now in his late sixties. When he was a boy of four and a half, his father, who was an ex-monk, decided he should learn meditation. So at four and a half, his father made him sit down on the floor of their cottage in southern Thailand. They lived in the countryside.

And he told the young boy to repeat the term "Buddho"—it can be used as a mantra. So Ajahn Jumnian, or back then, Little Jumnian, would just repeat "Buddho, Buddho, Buddho," but he really wasn't into meditation. Imagine when you were four years old, if your parents had told you you had to meditate, that'd be the last thing you'd want to do. So he'd be sitting there, but his fantasy, his mind would be with flying his kite out in the fields. And so he'd be wandering off in his imagination.

And his father then would actually read his mind because his father had been a monk of some accomplishment and would say, "Jumnian, let go of that kite fantasy or I'm going to whack you upside the head." And so Jumnian would have to just focus again or he knew his father would be on him.

So something about that intense kind of training worked. Because at age four and a half, Ajahn Jumnian was sitting there doing his "Buddho, Buddho, Buddho," and he went into a deep absorption state. A deep state of concentration where the mind kind of shifts into another gear and gets enclosed within itself. His parents couldn't reach him. They'd talk to him and say, "Are you okay? Come out, come back, what's going on?" But he wouldn't come out. He just stayed in his absorption.

And his father, because of his training, understood where his mind had gone, but no matter how much they asked him to come out, he just stayed in his meditative state. And they got quite worried. You can imagine how you would feel as a parent if your four-and-a-half-year-old just went away on you.

So finally his mother, whom he loved very much, was a very kind and loving person, entreated him over and over, "Please come back to us. We'll have a very nice meal when you come back. I'll cook your favorite dinner if you come out." And so he did eventually come out.

But they recognized at that point they had a meditation prodigy on their hands. So from that age, very young age, he was trained both by a village monk, as his father turned him over for training to another monk, and by the local shaman. So Ajahn Jumnian has both traditional Buddhist training and also shamanic training because of his concentration. So he was quite a prodigy recognized at an early age.

I, on the other hand, was not. And when I came into meditation practice, concentration was really my weak suit. And I would look at some of my friends, and we'd compare stories after retreats. "I was in the first jhana in this retreat." I opened my eyes in one retreat. I looked at a friend of mine, and she was just kind of... And I could tell she was just in some deep bliss and surrender state. And here I am dealing with tension in my chest and pain in my knees, and I was not there.

So it comes to some of us, and it doesn't come so easily for others. But although concentration was not so available, insight was more available to me.

And so over the years, I put some effort in and strengthened the factor of concentration, and it has gotten better for me. But be aware that if concentration isn't your strong suit, it's not the end-all and be-all. Wisdom can operate whether or not there's strong concentration. You can use ordinary life, unconcentrated retreat experience, and if you reach it, concentrated retreat experience to develop the faculty of wisdom. Whether concentration is present or not does not stop the development of insight and understanding on our path.

If you're able to develop this quality of concentration, I recommend it because as the path develops, it gives us a strong foundation of stability of mind so that we can see clearly with some depth to develop wisdom. It also gives a sense of well-being and ease in life.

The Dalai Lama said: "Inner peace is the key. If you have inner peace, the external problems do not affect your deep sense of peace and tranquility." This factor of samadhi is an important part of the quality of inner peace.

As this factor develops, it develops into these qualities called jhanas. On the road to jhanas we reach states where the mind is so collected and so unified in the present moment that the five hindrances can no longer arise in that state. This is described in the text as something called access concentration, meaning that the access to the jhana state is close.

Finding this experience in meditation where the five hindrances are not arising is to discover a place where the mind is not swayed at all by the forces of wanting and disliking and restlessness and doubt and dullness. The Buddha said that it's really quite extraordinary. He said when these five hindrances have been abandoned, one sees that as freedom from debt, like health after a long illness, like release from prison or freedom from slavery and a land of safety. He talked about this state of concentration as being a liberation of mind—only temporary, but a liberation of mind because the hindrances are no longer arising.

Part of what happens as the mind becomes collected in this way is that it achieves a stability and a strength so that you can feel unmoved by the comings and goings of the changing conditions of comfortable and uncomfortable experiences in life. This is one of the most notable things that happens as you're sitting. Things keep happening, pleasure and pain keep arising, but the mind is no longer so moved by them. We're not thrown all over the place by the changing conditions.

This strength of concentration is what gives rise to the final factor of awakening called equanimity. Equanimity is this balance of mind that comes out of a sense of strength—not out of indifference—that can feel all the changing conditions in our experience but is not caught up in greed and aversion in reaction to them. There's enough confidence and support in the mind that we can experience a certain amount of pleasure and not crave for more. We can experience a certain amount of pain and not need to push it away. The mind has the strength and the spaciousness to hold it.

Above all, it feels like the mind has achieved a kind of balance within the changing field of appearances—to be on an even keel, an even temper, even as the phenomena keep changing. You can take a look at this. When your mind is concentrated, observe things that were formerly drawing you with their pleasure or things that were repelling you with their unpleasant quality, and see if the mind is still as moved by them. You're not out of touch. You still feel them clearly and distinctly, but you're not caught up and thrown around by them.

This also becomes a great support in daily life. This is part of that inner peace that the Dalai Lama was talking about.

The term equanimity sometimes has a connotation in our culture of being—what in the Brahmaviharas is called its near enemy—indifferent. Sometimes we get the sense that in equanimity there's no feeling, there's no heart, there's no love, there's no compassion. But that's not the way the experience of it feels. Rather, there's a balance of mind and a strength and a confidence so that all the emotions can go through us and we're not so shaken up by them.

That confidence itself gives more room for the other three Brahmaviharas to come through and be felt and expressed. The qualities of metta, compassion, and joy are supported by the equanimity. They're not turned off by it, they're not dampened by it, they're not dulled by it, but rather this inner confidence gives them the freedom to start to move through more strongly.

We had a discussion group at the end of the last three-month course at IMS. I was asking people to share some of their experiences from having sat the six weeks or the three months. A lot of what people shared about was this growing spaciousness of mind that let them feel into their family relationships at home, feel into the bodily aches and pains that came during the long sits, feel into the difficult states of mind—fear, anxiety, worry, planning, or wanting that visited them. What they reported was that all these things happened and those experiences just weren't burdensome in the same way that they had been previously. They didn't suffer around them in the same way. They associated with this spaciousness the word equanimity.

I said, "I want to ask you something. Is this a flat or dull or turned off place?" And they said, "Absolutely not. My heart is more open, more alive. There's more warmth and more connectedness than before."

So don't think of this as a dull place because of this term.

It's not like the emotions get turned off, but it's an unburdened place where the beautiful qualities can come through more easily.

This factor of equanimity appears throughout the Buddha's teachings. It's included in the list of the paramis, the qualities we develop for liberation. It's also found in the Brahmaviharas—the fourth one, which we'll practice later in this retreat. The Visuddhimagga, the sixth-century commentary, outlines a very detailed "progress of insight" leading to awakening, showing step by step how the process often unfolds as meditators advance. In this progression, equanimity is the stage that comes just before awakening. And of course, it's one of the factors of awakening itself, which we're exploring tonight.

In all these lists—paramis, brahmaviharas, progress of insight, factors of awakening—equanimity is mentioned last. These are all sequential progressions. What the Buddha's teachings are essentially saying is that equanimity is considered the worldly state closest in nature to the unconditioned, to nibbana, to awakening. It's not possible to describe a worldly state of mind more similar to the deathless than this factor of equanimity. It's considered the highest of the conventional states that can be developed.

At one point, the Buddha said, "Clinging to equanimity is the highest kind of clinging, but it's still clinging, and you need to let go even of that."

So this is the complete list of the seven factors: mindfulness, investigation, energy, rapture, tranquility, concentration, and equanimity. For the mind to come into its fullness, these factors need to be brought up together and balanced.

Let me talk about how, in a practical way, to do that balancing. First of all, mindfulness starts the rolling, and all the other factors arise from that. So you don't need to do any different practice to start these factors going. Mindfulness will engage them, and they all follow. Mindfulness is also the balancer.

As you're practicing, begin to notice when the energizing factors are high and what that feels like, and then when the tranquilizing factors are strong and what that feels like. I find it simpler in the beginning to keep monitoring three factors in particular, and I do this in my practice almost continuously.

I try to keep an eye on: Where's my mindfulness? That is, am I present? Am I knowing what's happening? Where's my energy? I use energy to stand in for the three arousing factors. And where's my concentration? I use concentration to stand in for the three pacifying factors.

So if my teacher came along and tapped me on the shoulder and said, "Guy, right now, where's your mindfulness, energy, and concentration?" I would hope I'd be able to say, "They're like this." And they can all be different.

Think about a time when energy is high, but concentration and the pacifying factors are low. What's that experience like? Someone said restless? Yes. This is the quality of restlessness. There's too much activity, not enough pacification. There's a lot of energy—we're really up—but maybe there are many thoughts, a lot of movement in the body. Emotions may be flashing through, and there's not a sense of rest. There's a restless quality. That's the feeling when the energy factors are high, but the calming factors are not.

What about when the energy factors are low and the calming factors are high? What's that like? Dullness, sleepiness, sloth and torpor. In the beginning of the retreat, this was common and you really felt the sloth and torpor. What's interesting is it returns later on in the retreat in a slightly different form that we call "sinking mind."

Your mindfulness is much stronger now. Let me give an example, and you can see if this has happened for you. You might be very mindful, very present and connecting with the breath, breath after breath after breath.

So mindfulness is present. Concentration is good. There's enough wakefulness—you're really with it. But as you're connecting with the breath, all of a sudden the breath feels so soothing, like Brahms' lullaby. You're just getting so soothed by the breath that you start drifting off, moving into a kind of hazy, dull, very pleasant fog.

This is not strictly sloth and torpor. It's more what we call sinking mind. Mindfulness is strong, but here you see clearly how the energies of calm have gotten a little too strong for the amount of energy present to meet them, and consciousness has toppled over into this state of dullness or fogginess. It's not exactly a hindrance, but rather an energy imbalance.

When you notice that the energizing factors are too high, you want to bring in more of the pacifying factors. One of the best ways to do this is to think about whatever helps you relax—let relaxation be your way in. Another useful approach is reflection on space, making the attention very broad. Sounds can help bring in that sense of wideness and relaxation. You can use the breath with the intention of breathing in, tranquilizing the bodily formation; breathing out, tranquilizing the mental formation. See if the breath with that intention can help bring in a sense of calm.

Also, when energy is high and thoughts are very active, don't put too much energy into investigating that state. Part of our cultural conditioning as Westerners is that we're really good at investigating. Generally, as a culture, we do a lot of investigation. When we come to meditation, we tend to be a little overactive in investigation. So when things are already active, don't heighten the energizing factors. Investigate a little less and just tune into resting in that, even if it's resting in a little bit of turmoil.

When the calming factors are too high and the experience is one of dullness or fog, you want to find a way to bring in energy. Obviously you can bring it in through the physical response to the hindrance of sloth and torpor—open the eyes, stand up, take a brisk walk, splash some water on your face. In bringing up the physical energy, you'll bring up the virya overall.

But there are other ways to work with it. If it's not quite sloth and torpor but more just dullness of mind, you can pick it up through the meditation itself. You basically want to energize the investigative faculty—that's the way to come in. Get more interest. Explore your experience in more detail. Find something to ask questions about. Bring some vividness to your exploration.

Another way I find really helpful to pick up energy out of dullness is to turn to noting and do it really steadily. Turn on this regular noting practice: in-breath, out-breath, sound, sensation, thought, mood, hearing, and so on. That will wake up the perceiving quality. It will wake up mindfulness, and mindfulness will wake up the energy. It's a nice way to investigate—it will brighten the mind and bring that energy in.

When the factors are brought up together and they're all in balance, you get this beautiful quality of a mind that is poised and still, but also really alert and interested. Everything is alive and vivid and clear, yet it's being experienced with a great deal of peace and stability of mind. This is the mind that is ripe for insight. This is the kind of mind that is getting tuned closer and closer to the factor of the unconditioned.

As that attunement gets strengthened and heightened, at some point it may get so tuned that the mind just tips over into that unconditioned place—tips over and opens to nibbana, the unconditioned, or the deathless.

Let me close with this quotation from the Buddha: "Bhikkhus, these seven factors of awakening, when developed and cultivated, lead to peace, to direct knowledge, to awakening, to nibbana. They are noble and emancipating. They lead the one who acts upon them to the complete destruction of suffering."

So let's just sit for a minute together.

So this beautiful teaching concludes with the Buddha's own words about these seven factors of awakening. When we develop and cultivate them, they lead us to peace, to direct knowledge, to awakening, to nibbana. They are noble and emancipating. They lead the one who acts upon them to the complete destruction of suffering.

This is what we're working toward—not just momentary states of calm or clarity, but the fundamental transformation that comes from understanding the deepest truths of our experience. The seven factors of awakening are our pathway there, our companions on the journey toward complete freedom from suffering.

Each time we notice mindfulness arising, each time we cultivate investigation or energy, each time we touch joy or tranquility, each time we deepen our concentration or rest in equanimity, we're moving closer to this ultimate goal. We're training the mind in the very qualities that the Buddha identified as essential for awakening.

And perhaps most beautifully, these factors don't require us to become someone else or to transcend our human experience entirely. They ask us to work skillfully with what's already here—with our capacity for awareness, our natural curiosity, our innate potential for joy and peace. The path to the unconditioned runs right through the heart of our conditioned experience.

Let us sit now in appreciation for these teachings and in dedication to putting them into practice. May our cultivation of these seven factors of awakening benefit not only ourselves but all beings everywhere. May all beings be free from suffering. May all beings know the peace of nibbana.

CHAPTER 35

From Ignorance Come Impulses

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines why the untrained mind experiences a constant rush of thoughts and emotions, rarely finding true peace. Drawing from the Buddha's teaching on paṭiccasamuppāda (dependent origination), he focuses on the first two links: avijjā-paccayā-saṅkhārā - ignorance conditions volitional formations or impulses. Armstrong explains how avijjā (not-wisdom) - specifically our failure to fully embody the Four Noble Truths and three characteristics - gives rise to unwholesome impulses rooted in greed, hatred, and delusion. He describes three layers of obscuration that veil our true nature: the false construction of self, afflictive emotions, and karmic obscurations from unskillful actions. The path works in reverse through the threefold training: śīla purifies conduct and removes karmic obscurations, samādhi develops concentration to calm afflictive emotions, and paññā cultivates wisdom to see through the illusion of self and touch the unconditioned. Armstrong emphasizes how understanding these dynamics helps practitioners recognize that disturbing thoughts aren't random but arise from deep habitual urges, offering a framework for liberation from suffering.

At this point in the retreat, if we take a look back at the mind that we entered the retreat with, or the mind of ordinary daily life, we can see that the normal human experience is one where there's a kind of ongoing rush of thoughts and emotions.

This ongoing rush of events, of movements of mind, tends to bring along with it also a swirl of emotions. So that in the normal course of an untrained mind, there's a feeling of being stirred up, never fully at peace or at rest. This is so much an ordinary part of life that most people don't even notice that that's what's happening in their minds.

But from the perspective of meditation, where you have touched a different experience and a degree of inner peace, then looking back at the normal daily life experience, it looks busy—some degree of turmoil and disturbance, and some degree of flooding of emotions as just an ordinary experience.

At one point in my meditation practice, when I had tasted some degree of peace and then was looking at this mind, the question came to me and became a subject of a lot of interest: Why does the mind move at all? Why is this the normal human experience of things? Why do we not just rest in a state of inner peace until thought is needed to carry out a task, and then we summon it up, employ it, and then put it to sleep again? Wouldn't that be a saner way to live? Isn't this kind of ongoing turmoil that is the normal human condition a little crazy? And why are things the way they are?

This is the area I want to explore in the talk tonight. We've talked about the role of intention in movements of body, in utterances of speech. Tonight, I want to bring a little bit of the investigation of intention into the area of thinking. I'd like to suggest that the thoughts that come are not just random or uncaused, but that if you look closely at their nature, many of them—I don't want to say all, but many of them—spring from some kind of deep and habitual inner urge, or really more accurately, urges. There are lots of different motivations, volitions, intentions, and urges that propel thoughts into our mind, into our experience.

Just some common examples that I know we're all familiar with: A friend comes up in our meditation and there arises a spontaneous wish for them to be well and happy. That's the urge of loving kindness or metta. Of course, we cultivate it through formal practice of the Brahmaviharas, but it's a natural urge that is there often when we connect with people we care about.

Or we're feeling a lot of gratitude, a common visitor in a retreat at this point, and a friend comes into mind who we feel is not as fortunate as us, and there's an urge to share some of what we have. It may be our time and energy. It may be other of our resources. We want to share something with them to improve their situation. And that's the urge of generosity, another natural urge that we take care to develop through meditation.

Or another time, someone will come to mind whom we've had a conflict with and a feeling of resentment or anger will come up, and we feel in that an urge or a mood of ill will. There's some way we'd like them to be a little less happy than they are when that mood is present—another of these urges from habits of mind.

Or we might start to think about someone that we're really close to, maybe a partner or a good friend that we'd like to go on a great trip with, a vacation of some sort. And we think about being in the company of our friend and we think about the lovely place or places that we'd visit. That's entertaining for a while and somewhat pleasurable. And we look into that thought and we say, "Oh, that's expressing this urge of desire"—especially comes in when the atmosphere is so austere and we want to provide a little hit of pleasure. So this deep force of desire coming through in that way.

We might think about our job back in our daily life and feel a sense of, "Oh, I wonder if anything's going to have changed while I'm away. Are people taking care of things all right? Is office politics going to stab me in the back while I'm gone and can't defend myself?" And this fear urge, another primal movement of heart, may come in.

Then what we start to notice is that when these thoughts come from these kinds of urges, they're not just neutral, equanimous events in the mind, but they carry an emotional punch. And the emotional punches, like the other conditions of life, roll through us with an alternation of pleasant and unpleasant experiences. It's lovely to feel loving kindness and generosity. It's not so lovely to feel anger, longing, ill will, and fear.

So the net result is that in the untrained mind, these thoughts travel through our experience rather pell-mell, completely out of control, rushing one after another with this alternation of some wholesome—but honestly, if we look closely, the majority are not metta and dana, are they? When we first come into retreat and establish ourselves in those first days, it's not like we're overwhelmed out of so many thoughts of love and compassion and joy and generosity. It's more the other stuff that's going through—the force of all the hindrances that we've talked about.

And that's why, as we just look on this experience without trying to change it or to judge it, we start to see why our life feels so stirred up outside of our arena of meditation, the avenues we discover to peace and calm. There's just this random flow of thoughts from these deep urges that carry these packets of emotion—some wholesome, many unwholesome—and it leaves us feeling tired, tense, sometimes beaten up, sometimes quite victimized by the force of these habits of mind.

So this is the area where we start to understand that thoughts are also carrying intention. Of course, many of them we could carry to the next step. We could call our friend and tell them how much we love them. We could go to the pay phone and place an order with REI and send them a really nice gift of a new bicycle that they've been wanting and express that generosity. We could get really upset and write them a letter expressing our anger.

But because you all are such well-trained yogis, I know you're not doing any of that. So these impulses are only being born in thought, but they could be carried out, couldn't they, in actions of speech or body. These volitional forces move through us. We can hold them in mind, where they act as disturbing forces, or at times we can express them through speech and bodily action as well.

It's quite interesting to tune into how thoughts carry an emotional charge—many of them—and those charges are expressing some kind of, often a deep kind of intention or wish.

So this is a little digression. I don't want to go into this in the talk, but I want to plant the seed for your exploration. Are there thoughts that don't carry any emotional charge? That's the first question. The second question: Are there thoughts that don't carry any intention or volition? Are there thoughts that arise without volition, without expressing an urge like this?

I'm going to leave that question for you to reflect on later if it interests you. But what I want to talk about tonight are the ones that come with an intention or an urge, that express a volition of the mind, and can act in this disturbing way.

Because of this volitional component, these thoughts—and then if we move into actions of body and speech—are sometimes called volitional formations. They're sometimes also called mental formations. They're sometimes also called karmic formations, because the volition or intention is the seed of karma, wholesome or unwholesome. The Pali term that we're using here is sankhara. And this is the same term as we talked about in the aggregates—the fourth aggregate, the third mental aggregate called formations.

So again, looking at the influence of these, we have to ask: why do these keep arising over and over in the mind? James quoted the Hsin Hsin Ming last night, the verses on the faith mind, that said something like, "Stop talking and thinking and there is nothing you cannot know." But you see how extraordinarily difficult it is to cease this process of talking and thinking. There's no off switch up there that we can just reach up and turn. This is a powerful process.

As we start to look into it—which is what I want to explore in the talk tonight—we'll see that this is not just a random or superficial occurrence, but rather this is a phenomenon that is deeply rooted in our psyche. But not just in our individual psyche—you could say it's deeply rooted in the human experience.

So that's what I'd like to look into. Where does this movement come from? And that this is essentially the problem of meditation to resolve—the arising of this disturbance from our inner volitions and urges.

I'd like to link it to what the Buddha called his most profound insight, his most profound teaching, which is the chain of dependent origination, which many of you have heard of. We're not going to go into it in detail. I want to focus just on a part of it. But in the chain of dependent origination, the Buddha outlined twelve links or steps that carry us into suffering. It was a very detailed explanation of how suffering comes to be in our experience, step by step.

The heart of it is the territory that Carol was describing in her last talk—how sense contact brings up pleasant and unpleasant feeling tones, and the mind habitually responds with some form of craving, either greed or aversion, and then that leads to clinging, to taking hold of the object, either to draw it in or to push it away. And where there's clinging, there will be suffering. That's the heart of dependent origination.

It's actually not the part I want to focus on tonight. Carol did a great job of covering that, so I think we've been through that terrain. What I want to cover tonight are the first two links of dependent origination. And colloquially, the way we could describe it is: the first two links say that impulses come from ignorance.

So that's our topic. Impulses come from ignorance.

The way that the chain is presented, ignorance is the very first link. And so it's considered the root of everything that can lead to suffering. When ignorance is in the mind, suffering will inevitably result to a greater or lesser degree. And the whole twelve links of the chain explain that process in a lot of detail.

The second link in the chain is volitional formations. The Pali term is sankhara—it's the same word we were talking about earlier in the talk. And the word that links them can be translated—the Pali word is paccaya—and it can be translated as "conditions," "is a necessary condition for," "gives rise to," "influences."

So the traditional translation of these two links were: ignorance conditions volitional formations. The term for ignorance in Pali is avijja. So the whole Pali link has a very nice sound. It's avijja-paccaya-sankhara.

Ignorance gives rise to sankhara or these volitional formations. But in this context, I prefer the term "impulses" as a translation for volitional formations because it captures that inner experience more vividly.

As a meditator, when you sit down on the cushion and tune into this part of your experience, it is felt—or I feel it anyway—as an impulse that comes into me, often from somewhere quite deep down. This impulse is out of my control. It's experienced as something that springs up from some deep layer of mind, uninvited, unrequested, and uncontrollable—just a budding into the mind of this force. So I'm quite fond of this term "impulses." We can say that impulses come from ignorance. This is the meaning of these first two links.

Now it's crucial to understand that the chain of dependent origination not only describes the arising of suffering—it also describes the undoing of suffering. When you trace the chain in reverse order and examine the ceasing of each step, suffering ends. The key to this is that when ignorance ends, the whole chain collapses and suffering comes to an end.

So ignorance is considered the linchpin in our human condition. When it is present as a force in the mind, we will fall into suffering. When it is eradicated, suffering is over and done with. The entire journey of the Buddhist path can be understood as the uprooting of the force of ignorance from the mind. But as you know, that's not a simple undertaking.

The first term, ignorance, is a translation of the Pali word avijja. Avijja literally means "not wisdom"—that's all it means. "Ignorance" has a rather pejorative connotation in our culture, but the Pali is simply "not wisdom." So if you prefer to think of it as "unwisdom" or "not wisdom," that might feel less harsh.

The important thing as we examine this is not to be judgmental about the factor of ignorance in the mind. We all have it. We're going to have it for a while. There's no need to be embarrassed about it, so I hope you won't feel judgmental about yourself as we explore this term.

One of my teachers explained it beautifully. He said the wisdom mind arises in practice—that's one side of the hand. Ah, wisdom is there: clarity, peace, understanding. Then a minute later it swivels, and unwisdom is there: confusion, obscuration, some measure of suffering or discontent. This is our life as meditators—wisdom, unwisdom, wisdom, unwisdom. They go back and forth like this for a long time.

So don't be discouraged by the presence of unwisdom. It's simply a fact of life, a way we're put together right now.

The basic meaning of avijja-paccaya-sankhara is that when ignorance is operating in the mind—which it will be much of the time—this will give rise to these not-well-thought-out impulses, which will lead to suffering through actions of body, speech, and mind.

So what fundamentally drives these impulses, these unwholesome forces of mind? It's our old friend craving in its manifestation as greed, aversion, and delusion. You're very familiar with the forces of greed and aversion. Delusion means we don't recognize their activities. It acts as a veil that prevents us from seeing clearly how greed and aversion operate, because when we start to see clearly how greed and aversion work, we want to give them up. We do give them up when we see them clearly.

As Ajahn Sumedho expressed it: when you start from ignorance, you end up in suffering. This is a helpful way to think about it—start in ignorance, end up in suffering.

Here's an example. A bank robber went into a bank with a note for the teller. He approached the window and handed the teller this note.

It said, "Give me all your money. If you don't, I will shoot you. I have a gun in my pocket."

The teller, having gone through the usual training, knew it wasn't worth risking their life. So they put the money from their drawer in a bag and handed it over the counter to the robber. He got in the car and drove off.

When he got home, the police were waiting for him. He couldn't understand how they had tracked him down so quickly. When he asked, he found out that the note he had written to the teller was on the back of his deposit slip, which had his name and address.

So that's ignorance leading to suffering—unwise choices. Of course, we're not quite that unaware. But when we don't understand how our actions come out of unskillful impulses, when we act out of greed or aversion, we end up causing harm, and we leave a kind of karmic deposit slip that's got our home address on it. The karma police track us down, and it all comes back.

Sylvia has this beautiful saying—I haven't heard her say it this retreat, but I've heard her say before: "When we see clearly, we act impeccably." This is the factor when wisdom is there. We see clearly, these impulses don't dominate our consciousness, they don't dominate our actions, and we stay out of the realm of suffering.

These forces of greed and aversion we feel in our personal life are also rampant in the world, as I'm sure you know. All the misery of the world is also traceable to these three roots: greed, aversion, and delusion.

Just a couple of simple examples. The financial system is in such bad shape basically because of greed. When credit was easy, bankers were writing unbelievable mortgages, handing out loans that they really should not have. As an example, one of the stories I heard: a gardener who was making $14,000 a year in California went to a bank and applied for a loan on a $700,000 house with no money down and was given the loan. Why would a banker do that? That seems really unwise for the institution. But it made sense because the bank got fees off generating the mortgage. Then they took the mortgage and bundled it up with a bunch of other mortgages and loans, bundled it all together and sold it to a financial institution. Why would the financial institution buy it? Because they packaged it with other instruments and sold it to investors, making a commission. So the banker's greed and the brokerage's greed combined to put all this worthless debt out there that could never be paid off, but people were profiting along the way. All the predicament we're in right now, mostly caused by greed—rampant, unrestrained greed.

And for the force of aversion or hatred, you don't need to look further than the daily headlines from Iraq or Afghanistan, where almost every day some suicide bomber is killing more people, mostly innocent civilians. Just hatred and fury unchecked, unreasoned.

This is a dynamic that causes the suffering in our own hearts and minds—we see this clearly in meditation. This is a dynamic that spreads all the harm in the world. It's underlain by this force of ignorance.

So let's talk about this ignorance a little bit. Ignorance here doesn't mean not knowing certain facts. It doesn't mean you don't know who the president of Zimbabwe is or you don't know how to conjugate a verb in Latin. It's not about that kind of knowing.

The Buddha described ignorance as not knowing the Four Noble Truths. Now, I could ask a lot of you, "What are the Four Noble Truths?" and I'm sure you'd be able to tell me. There's the truth of unsatisfactoriness in life—that's the first. The cause of that unsatisfactoriness is craving—that's the second. The third states that the end of unsatisfactoriness or suffering lies in the end of craving. And the fourth says the way to the end of suffering is through the Eightfold Path.

So we may all know that, but there can still be ignorance in the mind because we haven't fully embodied it. We haven't gotten all the implications. For example, if we understood the truth of unsatisfactoriness as it applies to all the sense realms, we wouldn't crave or cling any longer. We crave and cling for conditioned things because we haven't quite understood they don't really fully satisfy. And when they pass, we suffer with their loss.

So the Buddha's injunction is that we should understand the first noble truth, and we haven't fully understood it because we keep craving. So we haven't carried out the second injunction for the second noble truth, which is to relinquish craving. We fail to relinquish the second noble truth because we haven't fully understood the first.

And because we haven't fully relinquished craving, we haven't fully seen its end, which is the third noble truth. And we haven't fully seen its end because we haven't fully walked the eightfold path to its conclusion. So we understand them intellectually, but we haven't taken them all the way into complete integration with our experience. And that's why ignorance is still there.

Another way of understanding ignorance is that we don't really get the three characteristics: impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and not-self. Again, if we truly saw change, we wouldn't try to hold on because we'd know that anything we held on to was going to change and that would be painful. Because all conditioned things are unsatisfactory, we'd know not to cling to any of them. And in seeing the selfless nature, we'd understand there's no way we can collect things around the center of self.

So in shorthand, a nice way to think of ignorance is to think of the construction of self. As long as we're believing in a self, we're caught in ignorance. So that's a nice shorthand way to think of it. The sense of self, the belief in a separate I, is the sign of ignorance.

Ignorance is related to the factor of delusion in the list of the roots of the unwholesome. The Pali term is moha, as Carol mentioned. This word moha originally means, in its etymology, stupefied. So that might be a nice way to think of delusion—stupefied. And that feeling is not so far off at times in our practice. At times when there's confusion, you feel lost or uncertain or bewildered, not sure where the ground is—that is the factor of delusion. This sense of bewilderment is a part of it. And this sense of bewilderment supports the operation of greed and aversion. When we're not seeing them clearly, they have more reign. If we saw them clearly, they wouldn't take us over so much.

These three forces—greed, aversion, and delusion—are talked about in Buddhism as different personality types. And when we look into the personality types—the greedy, the aversive, and the deluded—what we really understand is they're all just different ways of trying to manage the unsatisfactoriness of experience. Trying to manage dukkha.

The greedy type undertakes a strategy in the face of dukkha of trying to pull in as much pleasant stuff as possible and as often as possible. So it's to keep the dukkha at bay by maintaining a steady diet of pleasure. That's the first strategy.

The second strategy, the aversive type, is to prevent against dukkha by constantly being on guard and pushing it away. So the aversive type sees the unpleasant and wants to keep it at some distance. And that's the pushing away effect of aversion.

The deluded strategy is quite interesting. It is not to feel. The deluded type sort of steps out of the interplay, the variation of pleasant and unpleasant, by going into a bit of a fog so that the intensity of that variability is not really felt so much. So this is kind of the origin of the fog of delusion. It's like, let me not feel. Let me stay in space. Let things not come too close. So with deluded temperaments, there's often a little bit of a spaciness about them.

I get this feeling sometimes when I travel a lot. At different times of year, I may be in different places, and I notice this happening more as I get older. I'll be driving a car down some road which I've been on before, but all of a sudden I wonder, what season is it, and what town am I in? And I just don't know. I have to think for a minute, and I just feel spaced out and not really in touch while that is going on.

Sharon Salzberg is a self-confessed deluded type. She's talked about it a lot in talks, so I can share this. She recounted an experience that's very typical of the deluded mind. She was teaching a three-month course at IMS. She lives right next door to IMS. She'd driven home at night the night before, parked her car in the driveway, went home and slept, and in the morning she walked over to do interviews at the center next door. She walked across the driveway where she'd parked her car, and it wasn't there. And she thought, did I park my car here last night?

So that's the first sign of a deluded temperament—not really knowing where you left your car. Did I park my car here or not? So she wasn't really sure, but she walked into the center and she saw somebody who is a good friend and might know, and she said, "Do you know where my car is? I parked it in my driveway, but it's not there this morning." And the friend who knows her as a deluded type said, "Are you sure it's not there?" So that was the right person to ask that question of. And she said, "Well, a car is a pretty big thing. I think I'd have noticed it this morning if it had been there."

But she said that just for a minute, she had this confusion—was it really there and I just didn't see it? And so that's another sign of the deluded temperament: not being quite sure. It turned out somebody had borrowed her car without telling her, and that solved the mystery. But it was an interesting chain of reactions to watch.

So there's this quality in the deluded mind of being a little disconnected from our own experience. If we don't make that connection moment by moment, it doesn't go clearly in, and then it's easy to forget what's happened, where we are, what's going on.

The countermeasure for the deluded temperament is that the proximate cause for wisdom is wise attention. So this is the way to get the counterpart to delusion—wise attention. What I think is very helpful for deluded temperaments is steady noting practice, just waking up the mindfulness in each new moment to take clear account of what's happening right now. Just that moment-by-moment kind of refreshing of the wisdom factor will bring in the strengthening of this factor of wise attention, which overcomes delusion.

So I want to look a little more deeply now at how our current situation has come about, how we find ourselves in this situation of impulses coming out of ignorance being such a disturbing force in our life. I want to suggest that there are three steps that have happened somewhere along the way in our development. It may be back in beginningless time, as the Buddha has mentioned, but somewhere along the way there was this primal step where we lost touch with our true nature.

There is in each of us an essential nature that is sometimes called the deathless, sometimes called the unchanging or the unconditioned. Somewhere along the way, that was lost track of. Its quality of not being subject to change, which was lost touch with, got substituted with a belief in an ongoing self. So can you get a sense for that flip? There is the unchanging. There is the unconditioned. There is the stable. There is the permanent. But somewhere along the way, consciousness lost touch with that and, in order to try to compensate, let's say, it created the notion that the self is that ongoing, enduring, permanent entity.

So it constructed this sense of I in a way as a replacement for the essential, deathless nature that we all share. But it forgot it. And that's the operation of ignorance. It forgot the substitution. It forgot that that substitution was generated from its own volition. And it started to believe in the reality of the self, identified with a particular body and mind, and therefore had to project all the rest of experience as other.

So there was now this creation of a duality. There's a belief in myself on the one side and all the rest of creation, all the rest of the appearances that arise in consciousness are now labeled other. This fundamental split is what we could call the first level of obscuration. This is the basic sense of ignorance.

Once we buy into it, all of a sudden we have an activity that can never be completed. That activity is to protect the I against the threatening aspects of the other and to nourish the I from the pleasing aspects of what we have labeled other. Once we undertake this project, it can never be done. The I can never be completely protected. We're always vulnerable. Anything can happen to us—illness, accident, natural catastrophe. We could die. All of us could die in the next hour. So the I can never be fully protected, nor can it be fully nourished. We have very beautiful experiences. We have pleasure. And they all pass. And then we're back in this open space again.

Out of that creation of the false sense of duality comes the strategy of greed and aversion. And the delusion is we don't recognize the split that we have created. So we keep operating, searching for the pleasant, pushing away the unpleasant, on and on and on. And this is what essentially removes our inner peace. When we commit to this project of defending and nourishing the I, we give away our inner peace, and we commit it to caretaking the self.

Then, as greed, aversion, and delusion start to become habitual, highly conditioned, deeply conditioned tendencies of mind, they give rise to all the other afflictive emotions. In the Buddhist texts, it's said that there are 84,000 afflictive emotions based on greed, aversion, and delusion. Now, that number was made up like 2,000 years ago. The world's in much worse shape today. I think we must have at least 160,000 today.

Different varieties of afflictive emotions. Just start looking at the list: sadness and loneliness and fear and self-judgment and shame and humiliation, wanting and longing and yearning. The list goes on and on. These become habitually conditioned and then make up that swirl of afflictive emotions and thoughts which is our normal human condition. This is the layer of obscuration that keeps us from seeing clearly, so we have trouble reconnecting with our essential peace. We call this the swirl or the layer of afflictive emotions—the second layer of obscuration. The first was the false creation of self. The second is the layer of afflictive emotions.

Then, because we're often taken over by, driven by, compelled by these afflictive emotions, we act them out in ways that harm others. When we harm others, of course, we end up harming ourselves because the duality was never true in the first place. There is no real division between my heart and your heart. If I harm you, I'm also harming myself. But we pretend that's not happening from this place of ego. We pretend the rest of the world doesn't matter because all we're committed to is nourishing and protecting this self, and we don't worry about the impact elsewhere.

This is delusion because deep in the unconscious we know duality has never been true. The unconscious knows that, but delusion keeps us from understanding it consciously and from integrating that understanding. Sometimes we act out of desire and hurt ourselves or others—sexual desire, intoxicants, killing beings for food. Sometimes we act out of aversion, hatred, lying, killing, and so forth.

This creates another level of problem for us. These unskillful actions build up in our whole body and mind and form a layer called karmic obscurations. It's hard to see through the thickness that results from a lot of unwholesome deeds because there's a level of regret and remorse and shame that we're at first in denial about. We can't see them because we pretended it doesn't matter. Our ignorance gets compounded with greed and aversion expressed outwardly in all kinds of unskillful actions that end up harming others and ourselves.

So these are the three layers: the sense of self, the afflictive emotions, and the karmic obscurations.

Then how does the path work? What are we doing here? I find this really fascinating because the Eightfold Path starts at the outer layer and works back in to the deeper layers. This is the path of, as it's traditionally described, sīla, samādhi, and paññā—ethical conduct or virtue, concentration or meditation, and wisdom or insight.

We start by beginning to practice with virtuous conduct. Really, if we simply practice with the five lay precepts, it goes a long way. We start to look at these areas of killing, of taking what's not given, of lying, of misusing sexuality, and misusing drugs and intoxicants. As we start to clear up our behavior in all those areas, then we have the openness to start looking at some of the past misconduct. That's when the life review comes in, and we open to the feelings of real remorse and regret for the unskillful actions that we've done in the past.

As we start to make our peace with the past actions and our present conduct becomes much more refined, that itself brings a level of great harmony into the mind because we're no longer in as much conflict with the outside world. The relations start to become harmonious and stable and undisturbed. This is a terrific advance, simply the practice of sīla and the clarification that brings in the heart and mind. It takes out the factor of regret, remorse, and the denial of wrongdoing.

Now this practice can be really beautifully refined. I love to think about this story of the Dalai Lama when he was being interviewed by Oprah Winfrey. Oprah ran an interview with His Holiness in O Magazine a few years ago, and this is the account of that interview.

Oprah began by asking the Dalai Lama, "Have you ever had to forgive yourself for anything?"

The Dalai Lama replied, "Small incidents, like accidentally killing an insect."

"Killing an insect," Oprah said. "An insect? Hmm, okay."

The Dalai Lama continued, "My attitude toward mosquitoes is not very favorable. Not very peaceful. Bed bugs also."

"And that's it," Oprah said. She couldn't quite believe what she was hearing. "In your lifetime, that's what you have to forgive yourself for?"

"Small mistakes every day, maybe," the Dalai Lama said evenly, "but major mistakes, it seems, no."

"No major mistakes," Oprah repeated, mulling over the idea. She fell silent and looked out the window. There was awe in her voice when she finally continued. "You have nothing in life that you have regrets about. That's a great life, to have no regrets."

"Regarding service to Tibet," the Dalai Lama said, "service to Buddhism, service to humanity, I have done as much as I can. Regarding my own spiritual practice, when I share my experiences with more advanced meditators, even those who have spent years in the mountains practicing single-pointedness of mind, I don't lag too far behind."

So that quality of...

of this understanding, we recognize that the very process of seeing clearly is itself enlightenment. This is not a distant goal we're working toward—wisdom is already present in every moment of clear seeing.

When we look closely at any experience—watching a thought arise and dissolve, feeling sensation flow through the body, hearing a sound emerge and fade—we discover that nothing has the solid, permanent characteristics we once attributed to it. Everything is revealed as fluid, interconnected, arising from conditions and dissolving back into emptiness.

This direct perception gradually dissolves the fundamental delusion that there is a solid self at the center of experience who needs to be defended, promoted, or satisfied. The ego-structure, which seemed so real and important, is seen to be a mental construction—useful for practical purposes but not ultimately real.

As wisdom deepens, we naturally begin to live from a place of greater freedom. The compulsive reactivity that once drove our behavior starts to relax. We respond to life's circumstances with increasing clarity and compassion, because the self-centered agenda that once filtered everything through the lens of "what's in it for me" begins to dissolve.

This is what the Buddha called the purification of view—seeing reality as it actually is rather than through the distorting lens of self-concern. When we truly understand that there is no separate self to protect or aggrandize, our hearts naturally open to the welfare of all beings.

These three stages—ethical conduct, concentrated meditation, and liberating wisdom—work together as one integrated path. Each supports and enriches the others. Without the foundation of skillful conduct, the mind remains too agitated for deep concentration. Without the peace of meditation, wisdom lacks the clarity needed to see deeply. And without wisdom's insight into the illusory nature of separateness, both ethics and meditation remain subtly self-centered.

Together, they constitute what the Buddha called the Noble Eightfold Path—the way leading to the complete cessation of suffering and the realization of our deepest freedom.

of the implication of impermanence, we see that all these factors are uncontrollable. The outward world is uncontrollable. Inner experience is uncontrollable. They're all just coming and going according to their own nature through many, many causes and conditions.

So that lets us take our hands off the steering wheel. What we are really doing is surrendering those outworn strategies of greed and aversion. We start to see that if we simply relax and trust the unfolding of the moment, there's a deeper ease, peace, and happiness that comes from that trust and relaxation than came from any degree of control, which is always governed by fear. Control is always based in fear.

As we start to trust the natural unfolding of things, we let go of these strategies of greed and aversion. We rest more in the present moment. And as we see through this duality, the interconnectedness becomes so apparent. We start to see that we are not so different. When we look at ourselves in terms of nature, my body and your body are the same nature, put together in the same way. My emotions and your emotions are the same emotions. We have the same range, put together a little differently from person to person. My awareness and your awareness—it's the same nature. It's just human awareness. We start to feel like we're just the same water poured into different vessels, as one of the old poets said.

At some point in my practice, as that kind of deep interconnectedness became clear to me, my very motivation in practice started to shift. First, I was only concerned with these levels of obscuration getting cleared in this mind and body. I just wanted my awareness to be free from the delusion, from the karmic obscurations, from the afflict-ive emotions. But then I started to see it's the same awareness everywhere. My wish started to be: I'd like all the awarenesses to be free of obscuration and be able to shine with wisdom—with the wisdom that is our common nature, the wisdom that is at the heart of all of us.

So even my intention in practice changed, and this is something I offer to each of you. Our intention can become working for our own understanding and liberation as a way to help remove the obscurations everywhere. This is the quality in practice that we talk about as bodhicitta.

We can reflect on this, make it a part of our daily contemplation. I like to make a resolve in this direction at the start of every sitting. I just say something like, "May I come to awakening in order to benefit all beings." The understanding is that if I can awaken, then it will be easier for others to awaken.

This term bodhicitta, sometimes translated as enlightened mind—I like "awakening heart." You can just bring this in and make it a part of your daily experience, your daily reflection. We can start to include as motivation in our practice to wake up in order to benefit others, to be able to liberate awareness wherever it's obscured.

So this is called purification of view. We start to see through the duality, the falseness of the duality of self and other. We see how everything is arising according to its causes and conditions. This is the work of paññā, or wisdom. But the work is not done yet.

Wisdom has one more step. Seeing through the falseness of self is good. Seeing the truth of impermanence is good, and it brings a certain freedom. It doesn't bring complete freedom. So wisdom has to take one more step, which is to go beyond the duality and touch again that essential nature. We could call it our essential emptiness, our essential unconditioned nature, our unchanging nature, the factor of nibbana.

When the mind has been collected through the purification of conduct, the purification of view, when wisdom has been developed and the mind comes into balance, there is the possibility for that penetration to take place, where there's the touch—the direct touch of the unconditioned.

Some people on this planet have developed this quality to a very high degree. I was in Nepal a few years ago. I was practicing with my Tibetan teacher named Soni Rinpoche, a young lama. One of his teachers was staying at the monastery while I was there. My teacher said, "Would you like to meet this lama? He's a very highly regarded teacher. His name is Nyoshul Ken Rinpoche."

At first I said, "No, I don't really need to." I thought, seeing one Rinpoche, you've seen them all. Then I thought about it for about a day and said, "Yeah, I would like to meet him if I could. I've heard a lot of good things about him." I actually had an offering from a friend who asked me to pass on some dana to him.

So I had an occasion to meet him. I went into the room where he was prepared, sitting in meditation posture. His wife was there, along with a couple of attendants, and my teacher translated. We had a little chat, and then I prepared to offer the dana.

I crawled forward, did three prostrations to him, and then offered out the envelope. As he took it from me, I looked directly into his eyes, and he looked back into mine. As he did, he went into his meditation state. I'd never experienced anything like it before.

I looked into his eyes and his eyes moved slightly apart as though he was looking into a great distance. Then something in him went completely still. I felt like I was looking into the unconditioned nature. When I thought about it later, it wasn't even accurate to say his mind was still. The feeling was there was no mind there to be either still or moving. He was just utterly empty.

As I kept looking into his eyes, I felt like I was falling into that empty and unconditioned nature. I felt if I could have just looked a little longer... I don't know what would have happened. But I felt so exposed. His gaze was so penetrating and he was so undefended that some nervousness came up in me. The nervousness broke the spell and he saw it in my eyes. Then he just went back into his normal mind state and the moment passed.

But I felt I had seen at that moment one of the qualities of the Buddha that is probably why so many people woke up when they came into his company—because of his deep touch and manifestation of this utterly still, unconditioned nature, the highest kind of happiness that we can each touch as a possibility when we penetrate through these layers of ignorance and obscuration.

So let's just sit together for a minute, please.

This is the peaceful. This is the sublime. That is the stilling of all formations, the relinquishing of all attachments, the destruction of craving, cessation, nibbāna.

CHAPTER 36

Impermanence

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this retreat dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines impermanence (anicca) as one of the three fundamental characteristics taught by the Buddha—alongside dukkha and anattā. Drawing from the Hebrew folktale of King Solomon's ring inscribed with "this too shall pass," Armstrong explores how we can work skillfully with the truth of constant change in our lives and practice. He outlines the Buddha's three levels of wisdom: hearing (sutamaya paññā), reflection (cintāmaya paññā), and meditative insight (bhāvanāmaya paññā), focusing particularly on reflective and experiential understanding. The talk addresses how impermanence manifests across cosmic, personal, emotional, physical, and spiritual dimensions, including aging and death contemplation as recommended in the Buddha's daily reflections. Armstrong explains how meditative insight reveals the moment-to-moment arising and passing of all phenomena through the six sense doors, leading to the understanding that there is nothing solid to grasp. This recognition naturally inclines the mind toward nibbāna—the unconditioned element beyond change—and the freedom that comes from non-clinging.

There's an old Hebrew folktale that probably many of you have heard, but I like the story and I can't resist sharing it again. It is set in the time of King Solomon.

They were about six months away from a festival, and Solomon thought he'd have a little bit of fun with one of his ministers. So he said to him, "There's a magic ring that I really want, and I'd like to have it in time for this festival, which is six months away. Six months should give you plenty of time to find it. The properties of this magic ring are that it will make a happy man sad and it will make a sad man happy. So please go out and find me this ring. I really want to have it."

The minister was very obedient and dutiful to the king. He said, "Yes, I will go and search and find you the magic ring." Solomon knew that such a ring didn't exist, but he was playing with the minister.

So the minister went all around the countryside asking everyone he could find if they knew of such a magic ring, and no one knew of such a thing. Six months passed, and it was time for the festival. The day before the festival was to begin, he was at his wit's end. He didn't want to let down the king, so he kept searching.

He went to the marketplace and the bazaar in the town to a poor looking jeweler. He came up to the jeweler and said, "Sir, I need to find a magic ring that will make a happy man sad and a sad man happy. Can you help me?"

The jeweler said, "Yes, I can." He picked up a simple gold ring and inscribed on it while the minister waited. Then he handed the ring to the minister who looked at it, read the inscription, and his face lit up.

So he went to the king. The celebration was to begin the next day. The king and his retinue were all around, and he thought he'd have a little more fun by embarrassing his minister. He said, "Well, minister, have you found that magic ring for me?"

The minister said, "Yes, your royal highness, I have." The king was shocked—it took the smile right off his face. The minister handed the ring to the king. The king read it, and the inscription said, "This too shall pass"—which makes a happy man sad and a sad man happy.

This story, if it's true, goes back about 3,000 years. Who knows if it's true? Solomon died in about 930 BCE, so it's an old, old story. Abraham Lincoln told the story in a little different form in 1859. It was reported in the newspapers. He was giving a speech in Wisconsin and he told the story this way: "It is said an eastern monarch once charged his wise men to invent him a sentence to be ever in view and which should be true and appropriate at all times and situations. They presented him the words 'And this too shall pass away.' How much it expresses, how chastening in the hour of pride, how consoling in the depths of affliction." That was Lincoln's comment on this story.

Of course, the message of the story is on impermanence and change. This teaching on impermanence and change is one of the central themes of all the Buddha's teachings—a very powerful teaching that can lead to a fundamental change in how we understand the world and therefore how we relate to it.

It's so interesting. There are so many directions we can come to the Dharma through that make fundamental shifts in us. Just the precepts, for example—really understanding the precepts, we start to understand how being kind to others creates our own happiness. It's such an awakening when we find that out. Working with emotions and learning that what was unacceptable formerly, if we can accept it, starts to weaken the difficult emotion that we had been resisting.

This teaching on impermanence likewise goes against the grain of our conditioning. So tonight I want to explore this theme—how we feel it in our lives, how we can work with it, and ultimately where it takes us in Dharma practice.

We can sum this teaching up: "This too shall pass away" is another way of saying everything changes. We all know this is true. I'm not telling you anything you didn't know before, but we haven't yet fully realized all the implications of this message. How do we know? Because we keep holding on. If we had fully realized this, we would no longer be holding to anything in the world. So we know it intellectually.

We may know it a little bit down here in the heart, but it hasn't gotten completely into our marrow and bones yet. In fact, you could say that the whole of our Dharma practice is about fully understanding the truth of this teaching.

As we look into this more deeply, I want to mention that the Buddha talked about three levels on which wisdom, or insight, comes to us. First, there is wisdom that comes simply from hearing teachings—sutamaya paññā, the wisdom that comes from hearing. As you listen to Dharma talks, read books, and hear words from others, a certain amount of understanding comes through. This is the first level. As Sayadaw U Tejaniya says, it's important to have the right information at this level, and the Buddha's teachings constitute pretty good information at the level of hearing.

The next level takes what we've heard and applies it through reflection. We examine whether these teachings are true in our own lives, seeking to apply them in our experience and life situations. We reflect on them, turn them over in our minds, connect them to other things we know, and see if they still hold up. In this reflective process—using thinking for a Dharma purpose—we learn more deeply. This is the level called wisdom from reflection, or in Pali, cintāmaya paññā. Cintā means thought, maya means "produced from," and paññā means wisdom.

Then there's a third level of understanding that cannot come through hearing or reflection alone—the level of meditative insight. When we calm and still the mind, it moves into a new way of seeing, a deeper and more penetrating way of understanding the nature of things. This opens the door to meditative insight, or bhāvanāmaya paññā—bhāvanā means meditation, the wisdom produced from meditation.

Tonight I want to focus particularly on the second and third ways we can learn and gain insight. Impermanence lends itself well to all three levels, but especially these latter two. The wisdom from hearing you've already received—everything changes. We're done with that one, right? You know that. But how far did it get you? Not very far, though you do have the right information.

The second level, wisdom from reflection, is particularly valuable because impermanence is one of those themes that's always relevant for contemplation. Just as the sentence "this too shall pass away" is always applicable, so is reflection on impermanence itself.

Let me place this in the context of one of the Buddha's central teachings. Through the practice of vipassana, he encouraged us to understand clearly the nature of this world—the body, mind, and external environment. He described them in terms of what he called the three characteristics of all existing things. I'm sure you've heard these before, but let me remind us all of what he taught.

The first characteristic is that all conditioned things are impermanent—anicca in Pali. This feature of impermanence is one of the fundamental characteristics of existence. The word "conditioned" is important in this formulation. What constitutes a conditioned thing? Something that arises from prior causes and conditions.

Your body, for example, was the product of your father's sperm meeting your mother's egg, nourished by countless conditions—each of our bodies is a conditioned thing. It arose dependent on conditions, and the Buddha said everything that arose from conditions will pass away. So we know that our body will pass away. This building is also a conditioned thing, put together by carpenters, bricklayers, and foundation workers who erected it piece by piece. This building, too, will pass away at some point.

The second characteristic is that all conditioned things are unsatisfactory—dukkha. Everything that comes from prior causes and conditions does not have the power to deeply satisfy us. Why? Because of its nature of impermanence—it will pass. In this context, I prefer "unsatisfactory" as a translation, which is broader than the more common "suffering."

The third characteristic is that all things are not-self—anattā. There's nothing we can really claim in this whole world, inner or outer, as being "I," "me," or "mine." We'll explore this more as the retreat continues. This is one of the more enigmatic parts of the teaching, but absolutely central.

Notice a difference in the formulation between the first two characteristics and the third. The first two say "all conditioned things"—impermanent, unsatisfactory. The third says "all things."

What's the difference between all conditioned things and all things? There's one thing that's not a conditioned thing, and that is the unconditioned. One thing that's not a conditioned thing, called the unconditioned—also called the deathless or nibbana. So even nibbana is characterized by being not-self, but it is not subject to impermanence or unsatisfactoriness. That means it's not subject to arising and passing. We'll come back to this later.

The Buddha went on to say that whether a Buddha arises to describe them or not, these three characteristics always apply. They're always true—impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and selflessness. Whether they have been proclaimed or not, they're always true.

The curious thing is how hard they are to see. There is something in the psychological makeup of the self that doesn't want to see it. It's not good news for the self, because what is the self's project? The project of the constructed self in this world is to find permanence, lasting happiness, and something it can call me and mine. That's what selves do. That's basically all that selves do.

Because we have invested so much in the I, me and mine through our psychological creations, we don't want to see these three characteristics. This is the operation of ignorance. There is in each of us at this moment—unless you're really awake right now—a veil which is more active than simply not knowing the truth. There's an obscuring force at work that will make it difficult to see clearly these three truths. It's part of the operation of self. It's part of what we are subject to.

For example, in our human condition, somewhere deeply we kind of know this truth about impermanence. Here we are—twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, sixty, or seventy years old. Have any of us found a lasting happiness yet? Does it stop us from looking further? No. But somewhere underneath, we kind of know that impermanence is the name of the game, that it's the way this universe has been put together.

How do we know it? By feeling anxious, by not having found that lasting happiness. We all have—it's part of human nature—a deep longing for some kind of security, a lasting kind of happiness. And so we keep trying to find it through things of the world which don't last. So the happiness doesn't last and it keeps us perpetually unsatisfied, looking, craving, striving, trying to fill this hole of our insecurity.

This is the human existential dilemma. We know on some level the shifting nature of things and yet we can't stop this longing to find a secure base. So even as we try to hold on to one pleasurable thing, lasting happiness, and it passes away as all things do, we move on restlessly to the next. Rather than meet this anxiety, this fundamental insecurity—it's so uncomfortable—we keep reaching out and looking for something else. And nothing ever fills this underlying hole.

This is from the Buddha: "Before my enlightenment, O bhikkhus, when I was still a bodhisatta, this thought occurred to me: What is the gratification of the world? What is the danger in the world? And what is the escape from the world? Then I thought: Whatever joy and happiness there is in the world, that is the gratification in the world. That the world is impermanent, pervaded by suffering and subject to change, that is the danger in the world. The removal and abandoning of desire and lust for the world, that is the escape from the world. So long, monks, as I did not fully understand as they really are the world's gratification as gratification, its danger as danger, and the escape from the world as escape, for so long I did not claim that I had awakened to the unsurpassed supreme enlightenment. But when I had fully understood all this, then I claimed that I had awakened to the unsurpassed perfect enlightenment. The knowledge and vision arose in me; unshakable is my deliverance of mind."

The Buddha is saying that really by looking into this question of the delights of the world and their changing nature and finding a resolution to that—finding a way out of this dilemma—that's where awakening lies. That's where freedom and deliverance lie.

So this is the theme I want to explore this evening. Remember, we're still in the reflective area of insight that comes from reflecting on. These are themes that are useful to reflect on in daily life as well as in retreat. We can look on the very most vast level that we have at our disposal. We can look on a cosmic level, and we can see impermanence on that level too.

The Earth is said to be 4.5 billion years old. The oldest parts of the known universe are something on the order of nine or ten billion years old. And it's assumed by most cosmological theories that these will return to nothing again. At some point, the sun will burn out, the Earth will disappear. Perhaps the universe will coalesce again in that very dense coagulation that preceded the Big Bang, and even on a cosmic level, everything may go away again.

This is echoed in the Buddhist texts where the Buddha talked about eons of world expansion, eons of world contraction, worlds arising, worlds passing away. Even on the greatest level, we can see this truth of impermanence.

Coming down from that level, looking at one lifespan, this is where it gets a little more interesting, a little more gripping to look at the truth of impermanence. What is the case in our own life?

We've all seen through this promise of finding happiness outside—that's the way our culture trains us to look. We've all kind of been over that route and we found it's unsatisfactory. So we've come here looking for happiness from a different direction and we start to see that true spiritual practice, real happiness doesn't come from things outside. It comes from inner qualities. You could say it comes from having an inner purity, a state of heart and mind that is not clogged up with greed, aversion, and delusion.

As you touch this place in your meditation—temporary freedom, relative freedom from these three forces—take a moment to explore the peace that's in that, the quelling of restlessness, the fading away of craving, the satisfaction of that state. And you'll come to trust that this is the direction of our practice. This is the direction for true happiness.

So we start to uncover this possibility, but we notice we tend to have brought our old habits of mind along with us. And what happens when we find it? We tend to hold on.

I remember when I first started to discover this peace through meditation, and it was after some period of having a really restless mind. I thought, wow, now I've got it. I've got this peace. It's going to be like this forever now. I found it. Now I can live my life from this place. I go, wow, what would it be like to live in the world from this place of peace? And I start spinning out on all my fantasies about working at jobs with this place of peace and having relationships from this place of peace and all the great things I could do.

What happened to my place of peace? It's gone. So as we hold on to it, build it up, project into the future, we destroy it.

Well, for me, that loss of that place of peace was devastating the first times it happened. I thought I'd found it and my life was going to be like that for the rest of my years. And then half a day later, it had disappeared. That was devastating. So it was actually much more important to me, that place of peace, than my car or my bank account or things that I had had in the outer world.

So we find this real meaning in spiritual practice, a deep sense of satisfaction. We touch it and then it also goes away. So our spiritual practice also is characterized by this same kind of impermanence.

Often we come into meditation—I can see this habit in myself, I've had it for a long time, it's weakening, still comes in from time to time—we think we're going to find, based on the development of concentration and beautiful factors of mind, this kind of nice plateau through meditation that then we can kind of cruise at. We work, we develop some peace. Oh, this is what I've been looking for. Now I can sort of stop working and I can cruise at this for a long time. It's a search for another kind of security based on factors that will change.

Unless we arrive at that peace through the same deep understanding the Buddha was talking about—gratification, danger, and escape—then we realize, oh, it's only temporary. The peaceful places that we come to in meditation also have the quality of arising and passing, until wisdom, in its fullness of development, can establish them in an unshakable way. So at this point, they are temporary, but we often think they're going to last, so we get disappointed. Again, we miss the truth of impermanence. Or let's put it a different way. We need to learn the truth of impermanence in this dimension also. It applies in spiritual life as well as in our outer life.

In all these research projects that are going on these days, a lot focus on meditation specifically. There seems to be an equal number that focus on the question of happiness. Every week, it seems, you read a new research study on happiness.

An interesting one that was done some years ago was by a team at Harvard, led by a professor named Daniel Gilbert. They basically studied this question of impermanence by looking at what happened to people's level of happiness when they got what they want, and then what happened to the level of happiness when they got something they really didn't want. What they found was we're really bad at predicting how what happens to us is going to affect our happiness or unhappiness.

So people would get a large sum of money from an inheritance or winning a lottery or something like that, and the expectation was that's really going to make me happy. You probably know from reading these studies that lottery money makes you happy for at most a year, and then the crash is really painful because it doesn't continue. Similarly, if people got a big paycheck, a raise, a new car, something like that, it would make them temporarily happy, and then that would fade quickly—much more quickly than people expected.

But the other side was also true. If people broke a leg or lost a job or even lost a loved one, a family member, they found they recovered from that more quickly than they expected to also.

So what does this say about our tendencies of mind? What it says is—and this applies in meditation too—when we get what we want, we tend to overestimate its importance. So we tend to get kind of inflated when we get what we want. And it's true in meditation states as much as in outside. When we lose it or something bad happens, we tend to get more unhappy than is justified. We tend to think it's a bigger deal than it is.

This happened to me when I would reach some peaceful state, happy state, concentrated state in meditation and it went away. Then the crash made me think it's gone forever. I'll never get it back.

This was really strong for me a couple of years ago. I had been a monk kind of early in my practice history, for about a year. Then, once I'd left, I always felt a little unfinished. I wanted to go back and experience that again. I kind of had a longing to be in robes again.

So, a few years ago, I went back to Asia, and I took robes again, just for a short period of six weeks. It was in Burma with a teacher named Paok Sayadaw, who teaches a very strong form of concentration practice. There's only one place you're allowed to put the attention, which is right below your nose. You follow the breath there for every waking hour. Sitting, walking, eating, moving around, the attention should never move from this very small area under the nose. So that was my practice for six weeks. A little demanding.

I'd arrived at the monastery at the start of the rains retreat, which happens to be the start of the rainy season. So I showed up one day in my lay outfit from California. The next day, my head was shaved, and I was wearing the robes, and I was on this practice schedule, which was fairly strenuous. The shortest sitting was an hour and a half. The longest sitting was two hours, and I kept it up throughout the day.

Well, the start of the rainy season means the start of the monsoon. And it was raining about three hours a day there. The first two weeks I was there, I did not see the sun. It was raining all the time. I'd sort of forgotten how to tie my robes on because it had been a few years. So here I am, a fairly new monk, walking back from the dining hall, trying to hold my bowl in one hand, an umbrella in the other, and keep my robe from falling off my shoulder while the Burmese lay people who are visiting the monastery are down on the ground kneeling to me because they so venerate the bhikkhus. I was embarrassed. I thought, you should not be venerating me. I'm not a very good monk at this point.

The practice was difficult. The usual hindrances came up. The rain and the weather were sort of driving me crazy. I wasn't having a huge amount of success with the meditation practice. I felt very awkward being in the robes again. And I got depressed. I thought, this is just awful. And I didn't see any end to the rains. I thought, it's going to be like this for six weeks. What on earth am I going to do?

So one of the characteristics of falling into these states is we forget about impermanence. We think the state we're in is going to last forever. That's why it's so helpful to reflect on these changing conditions when we're in the middle of them.

So I'll tell you what I did. I tried to reflect on impermanence. I didn't have a lot of conviction in it.

But I had a photograph of the Dalai Lama with me that I'd brought from the States. He always has this very equanimous smile on his face. He's such good company if you're ever bummed out. So I asked him a question. I said, "Your Holiness, I'm really going through a hard time. Do you have any advice for me?"

And immediately I heard his voice in my head, and it came in his Indian-accented English. It was very clear. He said, "Yes, stay optimistic, cheerful, and confident. A positive attitude is the best support." Okay, I'll try.

So I tried to stay positive, optimistic, and cheerful, and sometimes I could, and sometimes I couldn't. But eventually, what do you think? The weather changed. The mood changed. Things seemed to lighten up. The situation improved. So even then, in the midst of all that difficulty on every level, impermanence came through. It got easier for a while. The rest of it's another story.

But what did come from the reflection and the conversation with the Dalai Lama was a real confidence that whatever happened, I would come out the other side of it. This is something that grows in our practice from going through all these ups and downs, going through the highs that meditation offers and then the lows that we touch. The first times we go through them, we think it's always going to be like this, especially the lows. We become really convinced they're going to last. But all we have to do is keep going. Just keep sitting and walking and don't form conclusions, and they do change. Every time, they will change.

Once we go through this cycle of up and down and up and down enough times, we really start to get that conviction. "Oh, what I'm in now is not going to last." And again this phrase "this too shall pass" starts to ring really true. So don't lose sight of that. Notice in a difficult space if the mind starts to project it into the future, as mine was doing in Burma thinking this is going to be like this the whole rest of the retreat. And then notice when it starts to change, because it always will.

One of the other areas that we notice are subject to impermanence is with emotions. As I mentioned in the talk the other night, every emotion has the nature to arise and pass away. Is there any emotion that stayed the same the whole time you've been here? Probably not. This is actually why it's safe to open to the emotions and really feel them. We don't have to push them away because their very nature is to go away. The only thing that makes them stay is suppressing them. It's kind of curious. As long as we're open to letting them come, they will also go. So we start to really trust in this. We don't have to worry about any of these emotions if we can let them arise, because their very nature is to pass through just like weather.

Obsessive thoughts are the same. Earlier this year, I was in a period of conflict with somebody, and it was quite painful for both of us at times. We basically had a good relationship, but we got into this little quarrel, and I think we both contributed to it, and we both suffered from it. We were able to talk about it and talk it through, and we've resolved it, but while we were going through it, it was quite painful for both of us.

When it was first up, my thoughts went there a lot. I was kind of obsessing on what am I going to do about this problem and how am I going to fix this in the relationship. So when I had a spare minute, my mind would turn to and kind of obsess about that particular conflict, that particular problem in my life. And that also started to feel like it was always going to be there. I thought I'm never going to solve this problem. I'm always going to have this to deal with.

A few months later, the thought's gone. It doesn't come. Every once in a while, something will remind me of that period, and we can get together and talk about it. It doesn't stir up the obsessive thinking.

So it's sort of like everything that makes up our personality and our struggles at this point in time—it's all a passing show. The things we think about, the ways we feel about it, the situations we create in our imagining, all of that is going to go into the past the same way all the past has gone away now. All the things you were thinking about five years ago—not here now.

So we really start to see all these changes of mood, changes of thought, problems, fixations—they're just all going. And a year from now, there's going to be an entirely new set. So watching that process happen over and over and over, we no longer put so much weight on what's happening now.

They all pass.

This is a poem from Rainer Maria Rilke that I like. It's called "God Speaks to Each of Us." This is from a period when Rilke was in quite a religious mood. He had done a lot of tours of churches, I think in Russia, and then came back and wrote a short book called The Book of Hours, all specifically on religious themes.

In this poem, he's imagining that God the Creator fashions each of us and then gives us a little pep talk before launching us into life. This is Rilke's imagining of that conversation:

God speaks to each of us as he makes us, then walks with us silently out of the night.

These are the words we dimly hear:

You, sent out beyond your memory,
Go to the limits of your longing and embody me.
Flare up like flame and make big shadows I can move in.
Let everything happen to you, beauty and terror.
Just keep going.
No feeling is final.
Don't let yourself lose me.
Nearby is the country they call life.
You will know it by its seriousness.
Now, give me your hand.

I especially love this section: "Let everything happen to you, beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final."

There's no final resting place in this journey, in what could be called a state of mind or heart or emotion or feeling. There's only change and a growing equilibrium within the change. No feeling is final.

One of the other areas where it's really helpful to reflect on impermanence is in the way the body changes. Aging is a fact of life. Sometimes it's quite a beautiful fact of life. If you talk to someone who has a small child, it's a delight to watch that child grow and develop and change—how their bodies grow, their capabilities grow, their capacity to express their love grows. It's an amazing thing that the child doesn't will that. It just happens through every child, has happened through each of us.

I have a friend who has a six-year-old daughter. He says the hardest thing about coming away to teach is having to leave his daughter, because at six, she's still changing quite a lot. And in such a beautiful phase of life, he wants to be there for all that change. It was a beautiful aging process at that time.

Just so you know, there's a fire drill tonight, so there may be voices outside. They're all beneficent. There's no fire, but there are firemen and firewomen.

As we get a little older, the aging process doesn't look quite as inviting. We all have to start relating to the change in our appearance. If we were handsome before, we are probably not quite so handsome as the years go by. We start to lose some of our physical capabilities. We can't do all the things that we were able to do, and certainly not as quickly as we could when we were younger.

Our brains start to deteriorate as well. We lose some of our conceptual ability, and there's something else that we lose but I've forgotten. Oh, memory. We lose our memory as we get older. So we have to adapt to all these things.

Ajahn Sumedho, who is going to turn seventy-five this year, said something really interesting. He was talking at Spirit Rock—I think it was last year. He said, "You know, from the ego's point of view, this aging process is really awful. I look in the mirror and I think, where is that handsome young man I used to know? I have more aches and pains throughout my body. It's not pleasant for the ego. But," he said, "for a Dhamma reflection, it's very, very interesting, because we really feel this truth of impermanence. We feel the fact of change day by day."

In older people who have a spiritual foundation, I've noticed many who open into this very beautiful kind of deep acceptance, surrender, love, and peace. Within the aging process, from a spiritual point of view, there are really great treasures that open up. Nobody told me this when I was young. I didn't think about aging very much anyway—I thought it happened to my parents, but not to me. Now that I'm getting older, I understand. Aging is also accompanied by a beautification of the heart if there's a spiritual foundation. So that's a wonderful thing to see.

Nonetheless, it's hard to lose our physical and mental capabilities. It's hard to see our appearance change the way that it does. This process of aging will test us, and there needs to be a lot of openness to impermanence on that level. And of course, aging only leads in one direction, as probably most of us are aware.

A friend of ours was in the hospital with a parent who had to go because of a critical acute illness, and was there with a family member, a brother. The brother said, "Wow, being here really makes me depressed. Seeing our parent go through this and all the other people here really makes me depressed." Our friend, who's a Dharma enthusiast, said, "Well, you know, your life's only going in one direction—aging, sickness and death." Her brother, who had no spiritual context to hold that observation, was shocked and felt it was quite a rude comment to make. But it is true. This is our direction.

Once we get into the aging process, we become very aware of where it's leading—that death is in our future. Sometimes this change, the extent of change that we encounter on a day-by-day basis when we're really paying attention, can feel like a kind of death. Especially in meditation like this, we get created so new each morning when we wake up that it can really feel like yesterday's over and there's kind of a new being coming alive out of that death.

This is from Krishnamurti: "Death is extraordinarily like life when we know how to live. You cannot live without dying. You cannot live if you do not die psychologically every minute. To live completely, wholly, every day, as if it were a new loveliness, there must be dying to everything of yesterday. To die is to have a mind that is completely empty of itself, empty of its daily longings, pleasures, and agonies. Death is a renewal, a mutation. When there is death, there is something totally new. Freedom from the known is death, and then you are living."

It's not always easy to keep this fact of dying in mind. You may have heard of this story from the Mahabharata, an ancient Indian text, where a wise person is asked, "What is the greatest miracle in existence?" And they answer, "The greatest miracle is that everyone is surrounded by death but believes that they won't die." So interesting.

This reflection on death is a powerful Dharma aid. It's encouraged as a support for our Dharma practice, and there are many stories in the texts of this kind of reflection. Dogen, the great Japanese Zen master who trained in China for many years and then came back and started Soto Zen in Japan, said that his whole spiritual journey was begun when he was at his mother's funeral. He saw the smoke from the stick of incense wafting up and kind of disappearing into the air. He was just profoundly moved by the truth of his mother's passing and the disappearance of the incense smoke to reflect deeply on impermanence. He felt that's what eventually led him into his awakening.

Of course, one of the experiences that prompted the Buddha to undertake his quest was the seeing of the heavenly messengers—an old person, a sick person, and a corpse. This is what the Buddha said about seeing the corpse: "An uninstructed person seeing a corpse feels repelled and disgusted. But I reflected that I too will die and come to be a corpse someday. So it is not befitting for me to be repelled and disgusted by a corpse. Seeing this, the pride I took in life entirely vanished."

There are within the Buddha's instructions the recommendation to reflect on our nature and the susceptibility to aging, sickness, and death on a daily basis. The Buddha recommended five reflections for laypeople and monastics to undertake every day. I'll read these reflections in case they appeal to you. We just run these thoughts through our minds:

"I am of the nature to grow old. I have not gone beyond aging. I am of the nature to become sick. I have not gone beyond illness."

I am of the nature to die. I have not gone beyond death. At death I will be separated from all that is dear to me. And last, I am the owner of my actions. All that I do, for good or for ill, of that I will be the heir.

These reflections are recommended so that the truth of impermanence comes through again and again in our understanding of ourselves, of life, of the world. The Buddha said this about seeing impermanence: When the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated, it eliminates all sense desire. It eliminates all desire for existence. It eliminates all ignorance and it uproots all conceit of "I am." This is equivalent to full awakening—this seeing impermanence again and again.

So how can we come into alignment with what we know to be true? There's a quote from a movie I quite like called Bedazzled, which I think has been underappreciated generally. The hero, a celebrated author who uses his role to be a bon vivant and seductive, delivers this charming come-on line: "Why does the existential dilemma have to be so damn bleak? Yes, we're alone in the universe. Yes, life is meaningless. Death is inevitable. But is that necessarily so depressing?"

This is a good meditator question too. The interesting thing is that the teachers who have really understood these truths of impermanence and unsatisfactoriness are some of the happiest people I've ever met on the planet. So there is some way in which seeing these truths is not actually depressing but freeing. How is that?

There's a lovely chant often sung at funerals in Thailand and other Buddhist countries that says in English: "All conditioned things are impermanent. Their nature is to arise and pass away. To live in harmony with this truth brings the highest happiness."

When we first hear this teaching on impermanence, it may seem like a bitter pill we're asked to swallow. But we find that as we explore it, investigate it, realize it, and bring that realization into the way we live, it has the possibility of opening us up to a very deep happiness—the deepest kind of happiness.

This relies on the third kind of understanding which comes from meditative insight, the bhavana-maya paññā. Meditation can reveal these deep truths about impermanence in ways that thinking, hearing, and reflecting cannot.

As the mind quiets through this practice, through the continuity of attention moment by moment, we develop an ability to see more and more clearly the way things are. Out of that still and deep attention, we start to examine every aspect of our experience to see if this feature of impermanence can be seen in it.

What is the experience we investigate? It's these six realms of experience I mentioned in a very early talk: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thought, and feeling. We start to bring an interested examination in each moment to every phenomenon that arises at any of these six sense doors to see if every appearance is characterized by arising and passing. To see if this teaching on impermanence applies on this moment-to-moment experiential level.

Usually one of the first doorways that opens up to see this is sensations through the body. When we come in from outside and sit down, the body may feel solid, fixed, lumpy, earth-like, immobile. As we sit for a while and the concentration deepens, as the mindfulness becomes more refined, it starts to seem like waves of energy—just pulsating energy everywhere the attention is turned. If you look even more closely, you can see how that energy is rising and passing, getting bigger, getting smaller, pulsing on, pulsing off, moment by moment, everywhere the attention is turned.

What was solid soon starts to be seen the way it really is, as just these momentary flickers on and off, on and off. We apply the same kind of inquiry to every sense door. Sight is a little more difficult, but sounds, smells, tastes, as well as sensations start to become very clear. This reflection on the rapidity of thoughts and emotions passing through becomes very clear.

All of a sudden, we start to see there is nothing fixed in this whole field of inner experience, whole field of outer experience—only arising passing, arising passing very quickly, moment after moment after moment.

When we start to see this in its full reach, we really understand there isn't anything there to cling to. It's not that we can hold on to something for a while and then it's going to change. We start to see that in the very moment, every part of our experience is arising, passing, arising, passing—or you could say coming into being and dissolving out of being. There's nothing solid there to hold onto even for a few seconds.

When we see in this way, we really know it's futile to cling because there's nothing that can even really be called an object that we could hold onto. This is getting into the understanding of emptiness—nothing substantial anywhere that can be even made an object for a short time.

The Buddha said that our situation is like someone who's being swept downstream in a fast-moving river. It's the river of our changing experience. But this person who's being swept downstream keeps reaching out for something to hold on to on the banks of the river, but all they can grab hold of are stalks of grass. And because the current is so swift, they're just pulled out as the person is tugged along by the rush of the river. Everything that one tries to hold on to pulls away and becomes part of the moving stream.

This is from Rumi:
Think of how phenomena come trooping out of the desert of non-existence into this materiality. Morning and night, they arrive in a long line and take over from each other. "It's my turn now. Get out." This place of phenomena is a wide exchange of highways with everything going all sorts of different ways. We seem to be sitting still, but we're actually moving, and the fantasies of phenomena are sliding through us like ideas through curtains.

So meditative insight sees this is the reality. There is nothing to hold on to. And seeing at this level really shows us the only thing we can do is to let go. This turns out to be the escape. If pleasure is the gratification, and this dissolving change is the danger, the escape is in letting go, or more precisely, not taking up in the first place. The escape is in not clinging.

We can touch this through our meditation. Just because the world is subject to change and the phenomena of the world are inherently insecure, and as I think Joseph said, anything can happen at any moment, that doesn't mean that we have to respond with fear or wanting. Those are our two conditioned responses: "I want it" to hold on the pleasure; "I don't want it" to come, the pain, because we know how quickly it can change and things come and go.

Through meditation, we discover a different stance, a different relationship. Even though things are coming and going, we find the peace of mind that comes from not holding on—not holding on to keep the pleasant, not holding on to push away the unpleasant. We're in touch with impermanence.

And this is a good criterion to check your meditation. Are you in touch with change? It doesn't take such a deep concentration to realize this. "Yes, I experience change." We're in touch with impermanence. We're fully present. But there's no holding on to any of the passing phenomena. This is the doorway to peace.

This is from the Buddha: "When one establishes the perception of impermanence in all formations without exception, then the mind inclines to nibbana." Nibbana, you remember, is the element within our whole possibility of experience that is not subject to change. By developing the perception of change in every experience, the mind is inclining to this peace that's beyond change, that's not subject to arising and passing.

We could call this by different names. We could call it the unentangled knowing—full awareness, but not caught up in any of the passing show. We could call it the freedom from greed, aversion, delusion. We could call it right attitude. This is the place we're looking to discover in our meditation. This becomes our refuge. This becomes our safety, again from the Buddha: "Having nothing, clinging to nothing, that is the island. There is no other. That is nibbana, I tell you, the total ending of aging and death."

From that place of unentangled knowing, of full presence without clinging, the mind has a possibility of opening to this direct experience of the unconditioned.

And I'll just close with this quotation from Rumi: Be with those who mix with God as honey blends with milk and say, "Anything that comes and goes, rises and sets is not what I love most." Live in the one who created the prophets. Otherwise, you'll be like a fire left by a caravan burning out alone beside the road.

Let's just sit for a minute, please. Anything that comes and goes, rises and sets, is not what I love most.

Live in the one who created the prophets. Otherwise, you'll be like a fire left by a caravan, burning out alone beside the road.

Let us rest in this profound teaching. Anything that comes and goes, rises and sets, is not what we love most. In this recognition lies the doorway to the deathless, the unconditioned, the peace that surpasses all understanding.

May this practice of seeing clearly, of releasing our grip on the impermanent, lead us ever closer to that which neither comes nor goes, neither rises nor sets—the timeless awareness that is our deepest nature.

Thank you for your presence and your sincere practice.

CHAPTER 37

Starting A Long Retreat

Guy Armstrong · 54 min

> Guy Armstrong opens a three-month retreat with profound reflections on undertaking long retreats as one of humanity's greatest endeavors. Drawing on his experience practicing as a monk in Burma with Paok Sayadaw, he explores the unique challenges and extraordinary benefits of intensive practice. Armstrong discusses inspiration as being 'filled with the breath of life,' connecting it to the Ānāpānasati Sutta and the spiritual urgency that motivates deep practice.
>
> The talk examines renunciation (nekkhamma) as one of the ten pāramīs, explaining how letting go of ordinary comforts creates the simplicity necessary for wisdom to unfold. Armstrong addresses the practical aspects of retreat life - accepting what is offered, maintaining noble silence, and refraining from external communication. He emphasizes that beneath all technical instructions lie two fundamental elements: silence and presence.
>
> Reflecting on Thoreau's Walden and poetry by T.S. Eliot and W.S. Merwin, Armstrong frames retreat as learning 'how to live deliberately' - developing the art of meeting each moment with openness and wisdom. He concludes with Bhikkhu Bodhi's teaching that liberation requires only two things: to start and to continue, offering encouragement for the transformative journey ahead.

So I hope you had a pleasant day today. In terms of an ordinary start of retreat, was this a little more pleasant? You got a few extra things to do—talking to each other, getting to know some people, picking apples. I think we're going to be eating apples now for the rest of the three months. So you did a great job.

But it is a special time starting a retreat like this, whether you're here for six weeks or three months. It's a big undertaking. And tonight I want to talk about this approach of starting a long retreat, because it's like nothing else in our lives and nothing else in the world. I think we all believe that it's one of the greatest things a human being can do.

There are many cultures throughout history who have revered this in that spirit. When you practice in Thailand or Burma or other parts of Asia, you practice in a culture where this has long been understood as one of the greatest undertakings that a person can make. And meditators who undertake it are really respected more highly than government officials or well-paid generals or politicians.

It's very unusual to be practicing in a culture where a meditator is kind of at the pinnacle of status because, as you know, it's not like that in our culture—rather the opposite. Our culture doesn't really have any frame of reference for what we're doing. So if you look from the outside with sort of modern Western eyes, this looks pretty strange. And the only thing I could really compare it to to get any respect in this culture is like an extreme sport. You're doing one of the most extreme things you could possibly do.

A few years ago, I went to Burma and ordained for about six weeks and practiced with a very wonderful meditation master named Paok Sayadaw. The conditions were difficult. I lost about, on average, about half a pound a day while I was there, eating just one meal, not a lot of protein, rainy season. And so I came back after six weeks and met some people that I've known for a lot of years.

One of the people that I spent some time with—he's a friend, not a close friend, but he is a friend—is an ex-Navy SEAL. And for those of you who aren't from this country, the Navy SEALs are a very elite part of a fighting force. They're the kind of guys who get dropped off in submarines in James Bond style operations and climb up on the shore and then do battle in foreign lands. They're trained to do that kind of work. So their training is very intense, physically demanding. Sometimes people die in the training.

So I came back having lost a lot of weight. My head was still pretty shaved. I looked pretty bedraggled, to tell you the truth. And the monastery didn't impress him. Buddhism didn't impress him. Meditation didn't particularly impress him. But what he was really impressed by was that I sat still for eight hours a day. Because he knew that was not an easy thing to do. And it's not an easy thing to do, as you all well know.

So there's this combination of extreme effort that's required in doing this practice fully with a wholehearted commitment. But you also know the incredible benefits that come out of it. I don't know any other path to get to this range of benefits so directly and have them be developed so strongly and so reliably.

We heard a number of them this morning as you were stating your intentions: the development of peace, of compassion and love, of wisdom, of coming toward the end of suffering, of healing, of equanimity, of spaciousness, of inner strength and balance. The benefits when you stop to think about it are really unmatched, but the effort is also kind of unmatched. We are fortunate enough to know that it's worth it. A lot of people don't, but I want to appreciate again the challenge that you're all undertaking and also the possibilities, which are really tremendous here.

So I want to talk about—given this very unique and fruitful situation, and I know it's going to be fruitful and a wonderful experience for everyone, because that's just been our experience through so many of these—I want to talk about how to approach it both in very practical terms, what to do with the body, in heart terms, what to do with attitude and our motivation in it, and also just some information, conceptually some things about undertaking a long retreat. Those are the three areas I want to talk about this evening.

And I want to start by touching on two things that Carol mentioned last night: inspiration and aspiration. The first one, inspiration, is a very important element of why we're here. So I was curious what the dictionary had to say about it. And when I looked it up, I found, as many of you know, that it's from the Latin word spirare, which means to breathe. And this word, spire, is also the root of the word spirit. So inspiration and spiritual are linked in their root meanings, and it's linked to the breath.

And you'll find this connection between breath and spirit in a number of cultures. It's in English, Western culture, of course. In the Hawaiian language, the word aloha means the breath of life. And it also means love or affection. It has a lot of broad meaning. So when someone in Hawaii says aloha to you, they may be saying hello as a greeting or goodbye as a greeting, but they're also saying love, affection, and life in that word.

In Pali, the language of the ancient suttas, we find this connection beautifully illustrated. The famous sutta about breathing is called the Anapanasati Sutta, the discourse on the mindfulness of in-and-out breathing. Here, breath is pana. Of course, it's central in our meditation practice.

In Sanskrit, which forms the basis of much Hindu thought, that word becomes prana, again meaning the breath of life. So breath and life are closely associated across traditions.

And now here's the deeper meaning: inspiration is defined as being filled with an exalting influence. You can feel how the breath of life and all that life means fills us. That's what it is to become inspired—to be full of the breath of life.

Carol touched on this last night, and I wanted to bring it forward again. Often these moments of inspiration are central to our dharma life, to our path. So I invite you to reflect: what have been some of the inspiring moments in your spiritual life?

They may have been things that happened before you knew about practice. They may have come through practice itself. They may have been the very things that started you on this path. Could have been a book, an experience when you were younger—children have many deeply inspiring experiences. Could have been meeting a teacher, someone whose being inspired you. Could have been an experience in your own meditation or hearing about a friend's experience.

As you think about those experiences that perhaps form the foundation of your understanding of spirituality and your own potential, what comes to mind? Would anybody be willing to share one of those moments of inspiration?

"At the conclusion of a metta retreat—actually it was a New Year's retreat I did here—the person sitting next to me and I exchanged blessing cords. Speaking for myself, I was so full of love at that moment. I was crying from happiness, perhaps a little sadness, I don't know, but so full of love. We tied them on each other, so I tied it on her with the utmost love and affection, and she did the same for me. I still wear it, but that moment was so explicitly clear."

Beautiful. So at the end of a metta retreat, tying a red blessing cord around each other's wrist with a real spirit of care and openness of heart and loving-kindness. Moments like that can move us, stay with us, and show us a human possibility—a possibility that's real within our own hearts.

Another offered: "I think it was my first ten-day retreat here, and I was really struggling with a lot of inner suffering, my mind going over and over things. Then I was walking and touched a railing, and there was this immediate presence in touching something physical. All that mental construction just evaporated, and there was this sense of freedom."

So beautiful—carrying around a history of suffering, then coming into the present moment, touching a railing, feeling the freedom in the here and now, and having that whole cloud of mental construction simply evaporate, opening into freedom.

I'm sure all of you have your moments, near or far in time, that in some ways inspire your whole path. I'll share one from my own history. I was in my early twenties, out in a forest in East Texas where I was living at the time. It was late afternoon, the sun was setting, and I was surrounded by these tall pine trees. The light coming through the pines was so beautiful—the green of the pines and the streaky sunlight coming through them. I just said to myself—I don't even know where this came from because I'm not particularly theistic—but the thought arose: "God is love." There was this ecstatic and exalted feeling of touching something truly divine.

In some ways that moment has always provided inspiration for me on the path—that there's the possibility of feeling that degree of love so directly. I wanted to live with openness to that, availability to that.

When our heart responds to these moments of inspiration, they form what we want from spiritual life, or what Carol called our aspiration. This morning, many of you shared your aspiration for this retreat, which were all lovely and beautiful to hear. I could relate to all of them.

I'd also invite you to think about your aspiration over the long term. I hope you consider your spiritual practice a lifelong endeavor. For me, I consider it extending beyond one lifetime, possibly to many lifetimes.

So when you think on that bigger scale, where do you want to go? Where do you want your practice to take you? And I'm not going to ask you to share this because this can get quite personal. But to think on a really big scale, what's possible for you? What would you really like to realize through your dharma practice?

And just to mention that the Buddha's aspiration when he started his journey was for the complete end of suffering. He was convinced that there had to be a way. And he didn't care what it took to find it, but that's what he dedicated his journey to—finding that complete end of suffering.

Aspiration is an important thing. I work out in a gym near my home in California, and there was a guy who used to work there who was one year a competitor in the Mr. America contest. This was back before it became Mr. Universe and Arnold won it—things kind of changed after it got into the movie world. But back in the days of Mr. America and that level of competition.

So this guy who worked at our gym was a Mr. America competitor, and they had a photo of him in the window in his Mr. America outfit. You know, they wear the skimpy bathing suit, they oil their body, and they strike one of these poses where all the muscles stand out in great relief. And he was very impressive.

I had been working with him—he was giving me some pointers on a couple of the exercises, and I happened to put my hand on his shoulder. It felt like touching a brick wall. He was so solid. There was no soft give there. Very solid. His name was Lance.

One day I was in the gym, and these two teenagers were working out together. They were spotting each other on the machines and helping each other with the heavy weights, and I was eavesdropping on their conversation. One of them said, "Did you see Lance in here the other day? He pressed 515 pounds"—which is, for me, an inconceivable amount of weight. At my level, it's considered really good if you can press your own weight, which for me would be about 160, and I'm not quite there.

So Lance pressed 515 pounds that these young guys had witnessed. These were teenagers. They were not highly developed in their physiques yet. But the way that they talked about their hero, Lance, really indicated to me they were basing an aspiration on that. Something about Lance had inspired them of what was a possibility, and because of that their motivation was somewhere up here, whereas my motivation was somewhere down here.

So it's a different kind of inspiration maybe than we're interested in here, but for them Lance was really inspiring and he changed where they aimed their workouts. They had a different idea of what was possible.

So I encourage us all to think high in our aspiration. There's no downside, as long as it doesn't come with expectation in a certain amount of time. But as we aspire to something like the compassion, the clarity, the wisdom of the Buddha or the Dalai Lama or Thich Nhat Hanh or whoever is a great being for you—that can only uplift us and move us down that avenue. It's a beautiful thing.

And also with aspiration, a few people mentioned it this morning. I just wanted to draw it out. Whether we consciously include it or not, it's always helpful to remember that as we develop our own hearts and minds, as we develop our practice, we touch and benefit many, many other beings through our example, through our kindness, through just our way of being in the world. So we can take that into account. We never know how far those ripples will go.

And so we say—it may be a little inflated, but we like to say—we practice for the benefit of all beings, because we may inspire friends who then might take up practice, open their hearts, touch many other beings, and we never know how far it goes. So we'd like to remember that our practice is never just for ourselves, but it's always for the benefit of many, many—we could say countless, we could say all other beings, all sentient beings.

So from this beautiful aspiration, the inspiration that it came from, and a great deal of faith—everyone here has got a lot, a lot of faith. To put yourself in this situation for six weeks or three months, there's a lot of trust, a lot of faith—beautiful quality.

We come here and we leave behind our normal life. We leave behind our friends and our family, comforts of our home, our choice in food, our cars, choice in music or movies or books or television, all the kind of pleasures of our daily life to come into this very spartan environment. The word for this classically in the tradition is renunciation—we let go of all those kind of pleasant things of our daily life in order to come into a situation which is not so gratifying on that level.

And this is not an easy thing to do.

Of course, we're reenacting what the Buddha did when he left his very comfortable home life - his palaces, his family, the wealth of his household at age twenty-nine - and embarked on six arduous years of spiritual practice. We're reenacting that journey in our own way.

This quality of renunciation, an important step in any spiritual life, is in our tradition one of the ten paramis. The paramis are the qualities that, when fully developed, lead to complete freedom and awakening. They include loving kindness, equanimity, patience, determination, and effort. One of them is this factor of renunciation - the willingness to let go of our usual comforts.

But it's not an easy thing to do. In the Buddha's discourses, he sometimes spoke of the sorrows of the renunciate life. You may feel those in the early days of retreat - missing what you left behind at home: comforts, friends, family, food, chocolate, all those things. You may experience that longing as a form of grief. This is part of the adjustment to this life, the sorrows of the renunciate life. The Buddha said that in the end, these sorrows are overcome by the joys of this way of being. I'll speak more about that shortly. But first, let me acknowledge that there is genuine difficulty in making this shift. The transition is usually felt quite keenly in the first several days, when the contrast is most apparent.

Sometimes this word "renunciation" doesn't sound appealing in our culture. It suggests something unpleasant, like a hair shirt being forced upon us. Other terms that capture this quality include simplicity, voluntary simplicity, letting go, relinquishment. It's said that the proximate cause for this letting go is spiritual urgency - there's something we really want to understand, and that urgency allows us to release our attachments. So it's important to stay in touch with the urgency of why you're here. It all has a purpose.

This is from Thoreau, from Walden: "I went to the woods because I wanted to live deliberately, to front only the essential facts of life and see if I could not learn what it had to teach me and not, when I came to die, discover that I had not lived."

In a way, you could say we're here in order to learn how to live. Sometimes all the vocabulary of meditation doesn't make that connection apparent, but that is really what we're all doing here - learning how to live wisely and with love.

The world contains both beauty and pain. A big part of the spiritual life is opening to both dimensions of what life holds. We'll find this reflected in our retreat experience as well. Much of it is about opening to the joy and love that's available, and also to the dukkha, the difficulty that is an essential element of life. As we open our hearts, we feel the beauty and love more directly. We also feel the pain more sensitively. But it's through our capacity to open, to feel both dimensions, to continue opening and holding them, that we grow and learn. This is an integral part of our journey.

It's such a remarkable choice, coming into this renunciate situation. I feel we're very fortunate today as lay practitioners. We have this opportunity. In many cultures, even in Buddhist societies, one is either a nun or monk choosing the renunciate life, or one is a householder with family, responsibilities, and work. To taste the beauties of the renunciate life, one traditionally had to abandon daily life completely.

But our situation is different. We can live a full daily life, a rich engaged life, and also come into a situation like this to experience what it's like to live as a true renunciate. On shorter retreats - a week, ten days, even two weeks - we get a taste of this. But as you settle in for six weeks or three months, you get to really explore this terrain. In the first week, you sort of settle in. Then - this has been my understanding - you're really living here. As you truly inhabit this place, you're adjusting to this new style of life that is like a monastery, a temporary monastery. And then you get to experience that opening to the beauty and difficulty that has always been integral to deep spiritual life across traditions and cultures.

It's such an interesting choice. The riches of this life are often covered over by the busyness of our daily existence. I think it was T.S. Eliot who described life in the twentieth century - normal, busy daily life - as "distracted from distraction by distractions." We don't even notice we've become distracted because the distractions have carried us away again.

In this life, there's only the essential activity to occupy us: sitting and walking and breathing and eating and sleeping and working and taking care of the body. From that simplicity, richness opens up.

I don't know if you all tuned into this, but two weeks ago in California, there was a very lovely event—the ordination of a bhikkhuni, a word for a Buddhist nun, a fully ordained nun, in the Theravadan tradition. That's the Southeast Asian tradition of Buddhism that our practice comes out of, and it took place in California. It was the first bhikkhuni ordination in our Theravadan tradition to happen in North America. There have been many legalistic complications and obstacles that prevented it from happening, but the first one took place two weeks ago and four women were ordained. That means they took the 254 precepts of a fully ordained Theravadan nun. So it's quite a step forward, I think, for the Dhamma in the West.

Our good friend Sylvia Boorstein was there. Sylvia teaches at Spirit Rock, an old student here, friend of all of ours. She wrote about it for the Huffington Post, so when you get home you can look up Sylvia's article. It was a beautiful description of the event. Afterwards, when we were at a couple of days of meetings together at Spirit Rock, Sylvia was just reflecting on that experience and she said, "You know, I could have been a nun." She isn't—she has a family with a husband and four children and lots of grandchildren, very involved in an active daily life. But that call to a kind of quiet contemplative life was really speaking to her as it has spoken to all of us.

So there's often, as you move, as you make this transition from busy daily life—active, rich, engaged—into this simple way of life, there are often a lot of different feelings, especially when you're looking at six weeks or three months ahead. I just want to name some of those to let everyone know that these are included and just part of the normal process, a part of our practice at this point.

A common one is exhaustion. Often people come in from their busy lives and think, "I just need to sleep for two days, then I'll be ready to go." There can be some nervousness—I read that on one of the interview sheets—or some fear, such a long time, maybe haven't been in retreat for such a long time before. Some inspiration as you reflect on the possibilities and a sense of excitement. Often there can be self-doubt: "Am I going to be up to this? Am I going to be able to do it?" And based on our experience with many, many people, the answer generally is absolutely. Can be some loneliness and also some confidence: "Yeah, I can do this. I've done days and days. I've done weeks. I can do this."

So all those feelings may be at play and may alternate during the early days of the retreat. We just take those into account. Notice that they're present. Don't resist. Don't hang on. And part of the heart's opening.

Then in terms of living in this renunciate way, I'd say, especially having practiced as a monk in Asia where conditions are a little tougher than this, the essential spirit of that life is to take what's given. We have lost control of our outer situation. We have surrendered in being here. We have thrown ourselves on the mercy of strangers. In some cases, you may know the staff and you may know they're really lovely strangers, but in many ways, we're at the mercy of the cooks and managers and teachers and housekeepers and so on. And we've surrendered in a big way.

So in this spirit, we take what's offered to us. We take the food that's served. It may not be our first choice. We may have many good ideas on how the cooks could improve it—we generally refrain from expressing those. We accept the room that we're given. We might like one with more sunshine or a better view of the forest, but we accept where we have been offered to stay. We notice that the clothing that we have with us is what we'll be working with and living with for the time that we're here. When we're a monk or a nun, we accept the medicine that's offered by the monastery.

So we work with these conditions, whether they're to our liking or not. Most of the places that I practiced in Asia as a monk, we received just one meal a day.

Usually it was at breakfast. And I have to tell you, if you haven't had a red fish curry at eight o'clock in the morning, you really haven't lived. So it's a little easier here.

In Zen, they have a saying: "The mouth of a renunciate should be like a furnace that can burn the finest sandalwood or dried cow dung with equal ease." So I don't think you'll be served dried cow dung, but just in case—with equal ease.

The Spirit Rock cooks have a sign on the bulletin board there that says, "When we prepare a delicious meal, that's our practice. When we prepare an undelicious meal, that's your practice."

Along with the renunciation of our control, we also give up communication. We settle in here and, in the spirit of noble silence, make a commitment not to communicate with our friends and family back home unless there's an emergency. We make a commitment not to communicate with one another, with other yogis who are on the retreat. So we give up conversations. We give up different forms of contact.

We recommend that even through the process of snail mail, you keep your letters to what's really necessary and urgent. No need to check the mailbox every day. No need to send outgoing letters every day to people. They'll know if they don't hear from you that you're doing fine.

This also includes all these new forms of communication that are multiplying at such a rate in our culture today: cell phones, text messages, instant messages, email, Facebook, Twitter. You may be used to following two dozen friends' activities through social media. All those things stop when we come here.

It's so interesting because five years ago, we didn't have to say much about this. Cell phones didn't work so well here, and there weren't smartphones. So people couldn't really check their email. Now you bring in a smartphone or a tablet or some netbooks, you could be running your own internet business from the annex for all we know. But we recommend that you don't. We ask that you not.

Really, for the sake of your own practice, we recommend that you give up all those forms of outside communication. It's not necessary to check your email or text messages or IMs or Facebook and Twitter while you're here. And if there's a continuing temptation to do that, Marilyn is really happy to receive your smartphone or tablet or netbook or whatever it is and keep it under lock and key for the time.

This is what's going to make the kind of space and simplicity that lets those beautiful qualities of heart and mind unfold. It's the lack of complication that allows this flowering. So I really encourage you to be very careful and follow this kind of guideline.

It's getting harder and harder to unplug from this always-connected world. Nielsen, the company that used to rate who was watching what TV programs—they're still a media rating company, but they've extended it beyond television—just released a report that says American teenagers on average send over one hundred text messages a day, send or receive. The actual number was 3,146 a month. So those images you have of teenagers wandering through the malls with their thumbs never stopping? That seems to be fairly accurate—over one hundred a day.

One of our teachers works with a lot of young people and commented that this year, unlike any other year, it was harder for that group to unplug from all these different forms of connecting. She said the young people on this retreat seemed more afraid of the silence and solitude than in any other year. When they unplugged, they reported feeling a lot of fear of the emptiness.

So this is a great place, as Thoreau said, to get back to the essential facts of life. What is it to just face life in its bare and simple form?

What we often find is we have a lot of identity—self-identity—based on this frequency of contact. It's sort of like: Is somebody talking to me now? Is somebody being aware of me? Is somebody messaging me? Because every time that happens, we get affirmed in someone's eyes. We get validated and appreciated, at least recognized that we exist. So we've started to construct our identity, a different kind of identity, on the frequency of these contacts. It's a new kind of phenomenon.

I think based on this, we need to do an update of Descartes' famous posit of cogito ergo sum: "I phone, therefore I am." This is the new rendering.

We're in a place where we're not looking to build up the self. We're looking to decrease the formation of self. So letting go of all those connections will help with that.

We also really request in the spirit of this renunciation that you not communicate with one another. This is so central for keeping an even keel in our community. As you know, when you drop into the silence and you start to open up, you get really sensitive. A little bit of contact from someone else, especially when it's not expected, can be very disturbing. You know, maybe somebody just wants to say, "I love you, I really think you're cool." Even that can set a lot of thoughts off.

But what's more problematic is—let's take it from the other side. Let's say you found someone's behavior annoying. God forbid it should ever happen during these three months. But just occasionally, sometimes one yogi doesn't 100% like what another is doing. And they feel the need to let the other person know where they are falling down. So they'll write them a note expressing this level of irritation. It's always signed "Metta." But if you're the receiver of a critical note in this silence and with this sensitivity, it's like a bomb has gone off in the middle of your body. And people are thrown into tumult by that for days, literally days, because we hear about it and we track its effects. It's one of the most difficult things that people can deal with on a retreat like this.

So please be kind to one another. Please don't send notes to one another. If there's something that someone else is doing that you feel is inappropriate, maybe annoying you, maybe annoying other people, please tell one of us and leave it to us to work it out with that person. We'll try to smooth the situation out in the way that seems most appropriate, and you don't need to try to work it out on your own. So if there's one request that I would make, that would be it. If you're having a problem with someone else, please let us know. Carol's really good at that. Joking. She is, but I don't want them all to go to her.

I wanted in this spirit to say a little bit about the fact that there are lots of different ways to communicate. You can write a note. You can touch someone. You can make gestures, kind of pantomime around somebody. All those are different ways of communicating, of connecting with someone here that can feel intrusive if you're on the receiving end. It feels like somebody's coming into your space or making an inappropriate communication with you. So please refrain from all those different ways of communicating.

Sometimes in seeking to communicate, we might look to make eye contact as a way of starting a communication, initiating a communication. So again, I would refrain from using eye contact as a way to start communicating with somebody, hoping to catch someone's eye and maybe a spark will fly and then you'll be married by the end of the retreat or whatever. But if we were to say don't make eye contact with anybody, then it would feel really—to me—too frozen, too rigid. So it's not like that.

I think looking at people's faces in the middle of the retreat can be very heart-opening. You know, I've learned a lot and opened to a lot of compassion and affection through just noticing the expressions on other people's faces while I'm sitting a retreat. And then if somebody happens to open their eyes and you make eye contact, it's not a problem. So it's not that we always have to go around eyes downcast and I can't ever look at another person's face, but just be sensitive that eye contact sometimes can be a little electric. Some people may prefer not to have any and maybe want to keep their eyes down. But if your eyes are up and someone else's eyes are up and they cross, not a big deal. Don't worry about it. But also don't use it as a kind of way to say, "Now we really have something going together." Just simple. Keep it simple.

So just remember that the purpose of living so simply as we're doing here is so that the mind's activity gets laid bare. We're not really so concerned with the things that the mind is fastening onto—whether it's the food or the bed or the noise or the teacher's instructions that day or the dharma talk didn't work for us or those kinds of things. It's more that those are the outer places where our movements of mind land and sometimes fixate, but we're more interested in the movement that's landed rather than where it's landed.

So movements of liking and disliking and greed and aversion—that's what we want to understand, not the external circumstance so much. So the simplicity here kind of lays bare those workings of the mind. It's like as we're here over these six weeks, most of the leaves will come off these trees. And then you can really see how the limbs are filling the space that the leaves are currently covering.

The leaves obscure the structure of the tree. When the leaves fall, that structure becomes really clear. So when we take away the busyness of life, then the bare movements of mind stand out like those limbs in fall. And that's what we're here to learn about because that's where the freedom comes.

This is from T.S. Eliot: "Quick now, here, now, always, a condition of complete simplicity costing not less than everything and all shall be well and all manner of thing shall be well." It's this complete simplicity that allows the wisdom and the love to grow. And these are the deep sources of happiness that come through in an experience like this.

That's why the Buddha said in the Dhammapada of renunciation: "If by renouncing a lesser happiness, one attains to a happiness which is greater, then the wise pursue that happiness which is greater." And that's what you're doing here—by letting go of the lesser happiness of our daily lives and all the pleasures and comforts of it, you're all pursuing a happiness which is greater, deeper, more reliable and lasting. So this is why, for me, it's so inspiring to see all of you here and wanting to do this work, wanting to undertake this.

Let me share a few more things before I finish. I want to talk a little bit about what really matters during your time here. You're going to hear from us lots of Dharma talks—most nights of the retreat there will be some Dharma talk. You'll hear lots of instructions. At times they'll sound really complicated and you'll probably go crazy trying to figure out which one you should be doing at any given point in time.

I just want to say that all the techniques are really secondary. They're refinements that are very helpful. They're good, skillful means. But the two primary things for me are the silence—and I don't mean the external silence, but I mean the silence that you feel as you stop and listen—the silence and your presence within it. If you carry on and return to those two elements, your retreat will unfold. That's our baseline. So even though the instructions may get complicated, the techniques may get complicated, just keep coming back to that: the silence and the presence.

Silence has so much to teach us. This is from Walt Whitman: "There is that in me. I do not know what it is, but I know it is in me." That's sort of what we hear when we touch into the silence. There's something there. I can't say what it is, but there's something there. And that's what we want to let unfold in us.

Another beautiful quote that I love on silence is from W.S. Merwin. Merwin is in his eighties now and lives on Maui. I got to meet him once—he was doing a book signing on Maui and autographed a book. He's a very lovely, gentle presence. It turns out he practiced Zen Buddhism for many years with Aitken Roshi, who lived on Hawaii and taught for many years. A line from one of his poems is: "Now all my teachers are dead except silence." All my teachers are dead except silence. So this continues to teach us, continues to inform us.

And the quality of presence, awakeness—it leads to the more specific forms of mindfulness and awareness that we'll be talking about. Just that sense of being awake and present in this moment. This we can trust in, this we can always come back to. It's very, very simple. Really what we're learning is to live well, to live wisely. And there's an art to this. It's not really a science, it's an art.

When I first started meditation practice, I was very focused on the technical aspects of meditation and the technical descriptions of the progress of the Buddhist path—things like the possibility of enlightenment, the stages of concentration referred to as jhanas, stream entry, arahantship, and so forth.

Those teachings really called to me. And I didn't realize that during those long retreat experiences here, what I was really learning was how to live artfully, skillfully, wisely, compassionately, and lovingly.

Over the years, as I've taken the practice back into daily life and applied it, grown in the Dharma and grown in my daily life, it's become really clear to me that I learned all those things here. In silent retreat, I learned how to listen. I learned how to open to what was difficult. I learned how to have compassion for myself, acceptance, and loving kindness. I learned to wait before I spoke. I learned to know whether my mind was in a loving place or an angry place before I acted. Then all those flowers have bloomed over years of carrying these teachings back into daily life.

This is from Alan Watts: "The art of living is neither careless drifting on the one hand, nor fearful clinging to the past on the other. It consists in being sensitive to each moment, in regarding it as utterly new and unique, in having the mind open and wholly receptive."

Does that remind you of meditation? That's a lovely description of meditation. That's what we're learning to do here—how to find that place in the mind and then how to meet each new moment from that kind of place. We discover it here because it's easier to discover it in the simplicity. We get grounded in it, we get steeped in it, so that when we take it back home, it becomes our baseline. That is what, more and more over time, we live from. And that's the place that allows all these beautiful qualities to flower.

I'll close with a quotation from Bhikkhu Bodhi, one of the great translators and teachers of our time: "Liberation is the inevitable fruit of the path and is bound to blossom forth when there is steady and persistent practice. The only requirements for reaching the final goal are two: to start and to continue. If these requirements are met, there is no doubt that the goal will be attained. This is the Dhamma, the undeviating law."

At the end of our talks each night, we like to allow just a minute or so of quiet time together, just to let the words settle before we stand up and leave. So let's just take a moment, a minute, to sit together in silence.

The only requirements for reaching the final goal are two: to start and to continue.

Thank you for your attention. We have now about forty-five minutes for walking, and then we'll have the last period of the day with chanting. Skye will lead the chanting at 9:15, so I hope you will have the energy and come back for that. The sit will be a little shorter today just to entice you to come—not the whole forty-five minutes.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 38

The Sources of Happiness

Guy Armstrong · 58 min

In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong examines the Buddha's teachings on happiness through five progressive sources. He begins by exploring the Pali vocabulary of happiness - sukha (contentment), pīti (meditative delight), ānanda (bliss), pāmojja (joy), and somanassa (gladness of mind) - noting how the entire gradual training can be seen as a progressive refinement of joy.

Drawing inspiration from observing a remarkably content Buddhist monk, Armstrong outlines five avenues to happiness found in the Theravāda teachings: sense pleasures (kāmaguṇa), merit (puñña), concentration (samādhi), insight (vipassanā), and awakening. Each represents a progressively more refined and reliable form of happiness, all resting on the reduction of greed, aversion, and delusion.

He discusses how sense pleasures, while temporary, have their place in lay life when enjoyed ethically. Merit - comprising generosity (dāna), virtue (sīla), and mental development (bhāvanā) - forms the foundation of wholesome action that creates happiness through the law of kamma. Concentration brings the joy of mental unification and temporary freedom from hindrances, while insight reveals how clinging creates suffering and its release brings freedom. Finally, awakening offers the possibility of discovering unconditioned peace beyond time and change, representing the Buddha's highest happiness that surpasses all conditional forms by incalculable measure.

The subject of tonight's talk is the sources of happiness. The whole point of the teachings of the Buddha was for us to find happiness. Although he often talked about it in terms of the end of suffering, the outcome is the same. However you want to language it, the outcome is the same. The Buddha often used this kind of negative language in his teaching, so the end of suffering is consistent with his terminology. But he also used many very positive expressions for different kinds of happiness.

In the Pali, I'll mention a few words and their sense in English. One word he often used was sukha. I really like this word because it sounds a lot like "sugar" and has that kind of sweetness, which means alternately happiness or pleasure. I think of it as a quiet kind of contentment.

The word pīti, which many of you are familiar with, refers to a happiness specifically associated with meditation. There's a kind of delight when you really connect well with your meditation focus—whether it's the breath, the body, a mood—and you're really present with it and meeting it with fullness of attention. There's a delight, a meditative delight in that.

The word ānanda means bliss, and it's used in many names. The Buddha's attendant was named Ānanda. You see it frequently in monks' and nuns' names in Asia. My preceptor was the Venerable Paññānanda, the bliss of wisdom.

The word pāmojja means joy. It's one of the factors in what's called transcendent dependent arising, the increase in joy. Somanassa means gladness of mind. I believe it's mentioned in the Satipaṭṭhāna in a few places.

One contemporary scholar and commentator named Venerable Anālayo wrote a wonderful book called Satipaṭṭhāna, a book-length exposition of the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. He put it this way: "The entire scheme of the gradual training can be envisaged as a progressive refinement of joy." So really, that's what we're here to do. We're here to refine the sense of joy and happiness that we experience both in our retreat life and in our daily life. That's what the path is about.

This summer I was sitting with a Buddhist teacher who is a monk. I decided not to name him because I want to be able to speak freely about him based on my own suppositions. I may or may not be right, so I don't want to taint his name with my projections. I also don't want to create expectations in you. There's nothing worse than being told somebody's a fantastic teacher, then meeting them and thinking, "Oh, what a disappointment." So I'm not going to share his name, which will enable me to speak more freely about him.

But in spending time with him, listening to his teachings, being around him personally outside the formal teaching role, I was really struck by his happiness, his degree of contentment and joy. That's not a purely subjective impression, because he'd been through those machines at Madison. The University of Wisconsin does MRI tests and brain scans of people, and his happiness quotient in the brain scan was off the chart. So he had been coined by some there as the happiest person in the world. But they haven't tested everybody yet, even at Madison, so we won't call him that for sure.

But as I observed him through many different situations, I watched how this happiness had different facets. If he was not called on to do anything, it wasn't like he was always bubbling over with some kind of cheerful, smiling delight. Often if he wasn't interactive, he'd be very quiet, peaceful, very low-key. You could sort of just overlook his presence if he was in a room with people and wasn't called on to do anything—very simple and modest and humble. But when he taught, and often when he interacted, he was really playful. He'd break into smiles and laughter very easily, and it was very contagious. So being around him for a while, one tended to soak up that happiness through his manifestation of it. But he was quite charismatic also.

As I spent time around him, I started to wonder: where did his happiness come from? Because I wanted some also. And I thought if he developed it, that means any of us could develop it to that extent. That's one of the promises of the path.

As I reflected on it, it seemed to me that in the teaching of the Buddha, there are basically five avenues or five means to developing happiness. I reflected on each of them in relation to him as I observed him and listened to him teach. So that's what I want to talk about tonight—these five sources of happiness in the teachings of the Buddha.

But first I want to say why this is of interest to us. Because happiness is the destination of the path, it's something I think we're all interested in. Once we learn what the causes of it are, then we know how to create it for ourselves. Happiness is a mental factor like any other. It's a conditioned state that arises based on prior causes and conditions and comes into being when those conditions are right. It's very scientific.

So if we go through the steps to prepare the mind for happiness, happiness is the inevitable result. This is not a whimsical thing. It's not a random thing. It's not an elusive thing. As it often feels in Western literature, it's really hard to figure out in Western life why some people are happy and some are not. But in the Buddhist teachings, it's very predictable.

Now, of course, we're all starting from a different point. And so it's not easy to predict. It's not possible to predict the timing of the development of happiness in anyone's practice. But the eventual outcome, if we persist, is inevitable. And that's one of the things that I love about the Buddha's teachings. There are very predictable ways for us to get where we want to go. Happiness in its various gradations are points along this route. And if we know the causes, we know how to reach that destination.

So in my understanding of the Buddha's teachings, there are five avenues to happiness, each one is kind of a set of practices. Again, it's not random. It's something that we can practice and develop. Four of them can be taken to a lot of depth. You could almost say unlimited depth of development in four. And one of them is always going to be shallow and superficial. So we don't worry as much about that one, but it's available also.

The other thing I want to say is this is just in our tradition of Theravadan Buddhism and the Buddhist teachings in the Pali Canon. This is not meant to be an exhaustive list of the ways to happiness. I looked up the word happiness on Amazon just this evening, and the response came back of 18,000 books dealing with happiness. So there are a lot of other ideas out there. The Buddha's list is not exhaustive, but it is reliable.

Just to name some of the others that are common in our culture: psychotherapy, exercise—there's a new formulation of exercise that some of our friends are into called the happy body. I don't know if you've heard of that one. There's a whole system to make the body happy that makes the mind happy too. Developing creativity, spending time in nature, and I'm sure you all have your own lists as well.

The five that I'm going to talk about tonight from our tradition are sense pleasures, merit, concentration, insight, and awakening. I'll talk about each one a little bit as we go in the order that I gave them. Each one is a progressively more refined, more reliable, and more satisfying form of happiness.

The other thing to say about all five of these avenues is that they rest on a common understanding in the Buddhist tradition of what constitutes genuine happiness. And that is that the forces in the mind of greed, aversion, and delusion are reduced and eventually absent. So this is the sense of when we say in our practice that the mind becomes more pure, we mean something pretty precise by this, which is that greed, aversion, and delusion decline over the course of our Dharma practice. So I'll talk about how each one of these contributes to that sense of decline.

So the first one is sense pleasures. This is from the Buddha talking to his attendant. "Ananda, there are these five chords of sense pleasure. What five? Forms—which is a synonym for sights, often when the Buddha says form also means sights—cognizable by the eye that are desirable, lovely, agreeable, pleasing, sensually enticing, and tantalizing."

Isn't that nice to think of all the sights in the world that have that combination of qualities? "Sounds cognizable by the ear that are desirable, lovely, agreeable, pleasing, sensually enticing, and tantalizing. Odors cognizable by the nose, tastes cognizable by the tongue, sensations cognizable by the body. Similarly, the pleasure and joy that arise in dependence on these, that is called sensual pleasure."

And what came to my mind when I read this was a trip that Sally and I took to a museum in San Francisco, the de Young Museum in Golden Gate Park. It was showing this quite wonderful exhibition of Impressionist paintings.

The Musée d'Orsay in Paris was undergoing a renovation, and so they were lending out quite a large body of their works in two stages. The first stage, called "The Birth of Impressionism," traced the early development of this revolutionary art form into its more mature expressions.

As we walked through the exhibit, we witnessed Impressionism's evolution through time—from the early, more realistic paintings by Manet and Degas to the later works by Renoir and Monet that became pure plays of light and color. The further we progressed, the more impressionistic the paintings became, and I noticed my smile growing wider and wider. I wasn't even conscious of it at first, but as I gazed upon the beauty of these Monets, Renoirs, and Pissarros, joy simply arose, and my smile expanded until I became aware of it and felt slightly self-conscious.

It truly is a delight to encounter beautiful things—to see magnificent art, to hear beautiful music like a symphony in concert. I've often thought that if an alien visited this planet and wanted to experience the greatest achievement of Western culture, I would take them to a symphony hall to hear Beethoven's Fifth. The interplay of instruments and the resulting harmony is simply magical.

We can indeed experience very high degrees of pleasure, bliss, and joy through exposure to the delights of the five senses. This is a natural part of life for lay people. When you think longingly about your life outside these walls, I suspect it's often the sense pleasures that come to mind—sharing a good meal with friends, savoring your favorite latte, making love, listening to beloved music at home or while driving. These experiences create the small moments of delight in our lay lives, moments of uplift through pleasurable encounters with the physical world.

When we enter this contemplative environment, as I mentioned in my previous talk, one of the sorrows we face is the loss of those familiar pleasures. We feel this absence for a while until we adjust, and then the joys of the renunciate life tend to compensate, making us less concerned with what we've temporarily set aside.

I'm sure you've noticed that in the Buddha's teachings, there are numerous warnings about the dangers of sense pleasures. Generally in Buddhism, sense pleasures receive rather harsh treatment—they certainly get a bad reputation. Here's a classical statement from the Buddha:

"Bhikkhus, these two extremes should not be followed by one who has gone forth into homelessness. What two? The pursuit of sensual happiness and sensual pleasures, which is the way of worldlings—ignoble and unbeneficial. And the pursuit of self-mortification, which is painful, ignoble, and unbeneficial. Without veering toward either of these extremes, the Tathagata has awakened to the middle way, which gives rise to vision and knowledge, which leads to peace, to enlightenment, to nibbana."

But notice the crucial preface: "for one who has gone forth into homelessness." The Buddha's warnings about sense pleasures are primarily directed toward monastics—people whose entire lifestyle involves renouncing access to sense pleasures. This renunciation forms the very foundation of the monastic path, just as it provides a foundation for our life here during retreat.

We don't make the pursuit of sense pleasures a central part of your experience here, nor is it highly recommended. Such pursuits tend to distract the mind from our essential concern: observing the mind and its movements.

In other suttas, the Buddha offers vivid comparisons for sense pleasures—likening them to a dry bone because ultimately there's no real sustenance there, or to a dream because they're so fleeting they can seem almost illusory and not worth pursuing.

However, it would be incorrect to believe that the Buddha condemned sense pleasures for lay practitioners. He didn't. In one sutta, he explicitly stated that one who enjoys sense pleasures may be praised, provided the wealth they depend upon has been acquired lawfully and is shared to create happiness for oneself and others.

There's a logical connection between sense pleasures and wealth that the Buddha recognized—many sense pleasures require money. As lay people, we use our resources to enjoy these pleasures, and this is a natural part of householder life.

But of course, we all understand that sense pleasures are not the final word. They represent a limited kind of happiness—temporary, transient, coming and going with fleeting satisfaction. The pleasure is genuine while it lasts, but it ends very quickly.

I remember one summer day when Sally and I were eating lunch at our kitchen table. We had fresh, homemade chocolate chip cookies, and as I bit into one straight from the oven, I remarked to her, "It's really hard to be unhappy while eating a fresh chocolate chip cookie." But then came the inevitable problem—it ends so quickly. The cookie is gone, and with it, that particular moment of pleasure.

The Buddha continued his teaching to Ananda about sense pleasures and the joy that arises based on them...

Though some may say that sense pleasures represent the supreme pleasure and joy that beings experience, I would not concede this to them. Why is that? Because there is another kind of happiness more excellent and sublime than that happiness.

So we move on to examine this next kind of happiness, which exists at a higher level. When I reflected on the enjoyment of sense pleasures in relationship to this teacher I mentioned, I realized that as a monk, sense pleasures didn't make up a huge part of his life. All I really saw was that he enjoyed some meals, but he seemed to enjoy every meal equally. Whatever he was served, he ate it with an equal degree of happiness or equanimity. I didn't see any particular preference or craving, and it wasn't a big deal for him. So for him, sense pleasures were not a significant component. For us, they form a bigger component in our daily life.

The second avenue, the second source of happiness, is a word that carries some ambivalence among Westerners: merit. It's a translation of the Pali word punya, and it basically means wholesome action or skillful action. But this term "merit" feels somewhat tied up with merit badges, or perhaps with the idea of bringing an apple to place on your high school teacher's desk to be seen as a good student. There's something a little too goody-goody about the word, and many of us don't feel comfortable with it. Unfortunately, there isn't another word in common use to translate this term, so I'll continue using "merit." You'll encounter it frequently in Buddhist teachings. If you simply think of it as skillful action, hopefully that will remove some of the uncomfortable associations.

The understanding is that when we engage in skillful action, it brings positive results back into our life. Some of these results may be experienced on the physical level, some on the mental or emotional level. But in any case, the results tend to lead to happiness. This is the basic law of karma.

One quotation that has been mentioned several times is this opening of the Dhammapada: "All states come from mind, are preceded by mind, are ruled by mind. Speak and act with a pure mind, and happiness will follow you like your shadow, unshakable." This captures the essence of merit—that when we act from a purity of mind, happiness and good results return to our life.

I find it fascinating to contemplate this understanding. If you understand karma in this way and have some degree of faith in it, you begin to realize that this provides the lever, or the engine, for building happiness into our lives. We can control, to some degree, the future outcome of our life by examining the intention from which we act in the present moment. If we make an effort—if we develop a regular practice of acting from beautiful or wholesome intentions—that lays the groundwork for happiness to return to our life on both physical and material levels, as well as emotional and mental levels. This understanding of karma begins to give us a certain degree of agency in our lives and reduces some of its apparent randomness.

This concept of merit is what most lay Buddhists in Asia practice for. Most lay people in countries like Thailand and Burma don't engage in the kind of intensive meditation we're doing here. Some do, but the majority of Buddhists don't enter intensive retreat the way you're experiencing. Rather, they feel that their happiness will be generated by an ongoing series of wholesome actions. They structure their relationship to Buddhism around offering food at the temple to monks or nuns, making prayers, developing loving-kindness, observing the five precepts or eight precepts. This is considered in Asia—and the roots lie in the Buddha's teachings—a good lay path. Someone following this course is considered to be carrying out authentic lay practice.

Because we have a foot in both worlds, I think it's valuable for us to undertake both the monastic practices based on insight and concentration, which I'll discuss later, and also the lay practices based on carrying out wholesome action. This is a teaching we haven't always emphasized during the years the Dharma has been in the West, but I believe it's tremendously important for us who live most of our lives in the lay world.

The Buddha said there are "streams of merit, streams of the wholesome, nourishments of happiness, which are heavenly, ripening in happiness, and which lead to whatever is wished for, loved and agreeable—to one's welfare and happiness." Part of the understanding of merit is that developing merit through abundant wholesome action leads to realizing your aspiration. It leads to whatever is wished for.

Because different people hold different aspirations, the outcome of wholesome action varies depending on the person's heartfelt aspiration. If your heartfelt aspiration is liberation, this practice of merit will conduce to liberation. If your aspiration is simply to live more comfortably in the world with greater prosperity, health, or ease, then developing wholesome action can lead in that direction as well.

The Buddha spoke of three particular practices that form the basis of this wholesome action, the foundation of happiness for lay practitioners: generosity, virtue or integrity, and bhavana or mental development. The Pali terms for these three are dana, sila, bhavana—generosity, virtue, mental development.

Let me speak briefly about each of them. Generosity is a tremendous part of the Buddha's teachings for lay people. It's the first of the ten paramis.

So in some ways it's considered the foundation for developing the qualities that bring one to awakening.

Generosity is a very powerful practice because it cuts across the assumed separation between ourselves and others. Generosity is about tuning into someone else as a being like ourselves, who experiences happiness and unhappiness, who has wants and needs, and wanting to care for that person's needs the same way we care for our own needs.

The act of generosity is based on seeing through this assumed duality, through the force of empathy—feeling what another feels, and then acting in a way to share, which breaks down the assumed division or separation. When we have an understanding of non-separateness with one another and then act based on that understanding, the action plants that truth of non-separation in a deeper place in our heart, our mind, and also in our karmic stream.

It's a wonderful thing to carry out acts that bridge the divide between ourselves and other beings—human beings, animal beings, any other beings that you may encounter. We notice something of this in the joy we feel in giving. When you think about a time that you've given freely—not because you had to, not because it was your uncle's birthday coming up—but when it was a freely given gift, there's a lot of joy in thinking about making that gift, feeling into what would make the other person happy. When you find the right gift, there's joy in offering it. It just feels beautiful. And when you reflect on it afterwards, there's joy in thinking about the gift, the person receiving it, and the happiness that it hopefully brought to them.

You can feel how this happiness builds from the act of giving. And you also understand that it leaves a karmic imprint that will bear good fruit in the future.

One of the great things about being around the Dharma for long is you meet people doing extraordinarily generous things. Of course, many of you are devoting your lives to serving others. It's always inspiring to meet people on retreat who serve in this way—who serve at Dharma centers, serve as nurses or therapists, serve as teachers in schools, as caregivers to aging parents, as parents to young children. So many people I meet in the Dharma have based their lives around giving of their time and their energy and their skill. It's beautiful to be in the presence of that.

I was teaching a retreat in New Mexico one time and driving home with this woman who had recently returned from Thailand. She had gone to Thailand as a relatively wealthy person. She had worked as a management consultant for many years and built up savings, invested in real estate and different properties. She went to Thailand with the intention to give it all away and to retire to live in a monastery or nunnery.

She got to Thailand and made connections with different places, both monasteries and nunneries. While there, she sold her properties in the States and channeled her money to give to these different places that she'd visited and wanted to support. She sold all her properties except one and gave the money away—hundreds of thousands of dollars. She moved into one of the monasteries and got sick. She could no longer really practice and needed to return to the States to look after her health. She only had one property left.

She came back, sold that property, got enough money to live on for a while to look after her health, then went back into her job as a management consultant. The beautiful thing was she had no regrets. She'd given away almost everything she owned to support the Dharma, and she had no regrets about it. I just knew that the fruit of that giving was going to enrich her for years to come. It was very inspiring.

The second foundation is sila, or integrity or virtue. Skye talked about this extensively in her talk earlier this week, so I won't go into great detail. I'll just mention one thing that Skye said and repeat it. When we observe our sila closely, keeping the spirit of non-harming and being really conscientious with that, we're also giving a gift in that observance. The Buddha said what we give to countless beings is freedom from fear. That's a wonderful thing.

When you know somebody who has really good sila, there's a real feeling of trust in that person. It makes it very safe to be around them. You can feel that atmosphere influencing the other people who come into their orbit, so that those people create a zone of safety. The people who move in that zone are all receiving this gift of fearlessness. It makes a safe place for countless beings.

In terms of the benefit of observing this kind of integrity closely, the Buddha said that it brings a certain kind of happiness which he called the bliss of blamelessness. When we know that for a long time we really haven't harmed another being intentionally, there's a wonderful feeling of relief that's there—a lack of guilt or inner pressure or regret or uneasy conscience, a real feeling of purity and ease. The Buddha called this the bliss of blamelessness. That's a fruit of integrity.

The third practice, bhavana, is very interesting. Bhava means being or existence or becoming. So bhavana means bringing into being. It's sometimes used as a synonym for meditation.

A common translation is mental development. And I love this sense that we are bringing into being our own hearts and minds. That's really the essence of bhavana—we learn how to shape our heart and mind in a beautiful direction.

The French poet Paul Valéry kept a series of notebooks that became his spiritual practice at a certain point. I think he didn't publish them during his lifetime—they were published posthumously—but he wrote for one or two hours every morning in these personal notebooks, which were kind of a diary of his inner exploration. He'd write on many different themes. It wasn't poetry. It was just reflecting on the things that he read and his own understanding of them. It was his spiritual practice. He said of it: "Other people write books. I am making my mind."

That's what we're doing here. We're making our minds step by step, moment by moment. We're fashioning what's in here.

When the Buddha talked about bhavana as a form of merit or wholesome action, he tended to talk about it specifically in terms of developing the practice of loving-kindness. In terms of merit, the sense is something that lay people—people in daily life—can easily access and build: the sense of loving-kindness, compassion, connection. You could put gratitude in that. The other quality he talked about often was the development of faith.

So in this dana, sila, bhavana combination, I think of it as developing loving-kindness and faith. When faith is strong, life goes more easily, practice goes more easily.

This is not an exclusively Buddhist law, as you must know. Think about people you know in your life who you feel are truly happy, and just run over your acquaintances. See who comes to mind among the people you know who you feel are happy, and take a look at their lives. See if they aren't characterized by generosity, integrity, and some degree of loving-kindness.

You could say that these are the requisites for normal human happiness—not happiness that even conceives of a spiritual path, but just what it is to be a good person in the world, in human society, across cultures, across religions, across any part of the globe. You'll find these people: generosity, integrity, loving-kindness. That's what makes for a normal, happy human life.

As we develop these three in our lay life, we also will be generating the conditions for a normal, happy life.

I think it's interesting—just one final note—what all three of these have in common is they're all based on empathy and caring for others. And that's so interesting to me: the basis of a happy human life is caring for others and then expressing that.

When I thought about this in relation to the teacher I was with, the connection was very apparent. His conduct was very, very blameless. I'd never seen him do anything that would in any way give offense to someone. Very gentle person, spoke kindly when he spoke. Of course, he was practicing a lot of precepts, but you could just feel there was a genuine intention of kindness and compassion behind them.

The next of the avenues to happiness is concentration—the third, after sense pleasures and merit. Now we're getting into the realm of what you're doing on this retreat. So this is something special. This is not something that a lot of people in normal daily lives have access to or are able to develop strongly, but it's one of the key things we're doing here.

Concentration is the common translation of the Pali word samadhi. It really refers to a mind that has gathered itself into the present moment—that has become, as Carol said the other night, one-pointed in its awareness of the present moment. This gathering into the present moment brings a lot of strength to the mind.

Normally in our daily life, we're distracted by past thoughts, by future thoughts, by what we have to do next, by running here and there. In this situation, because our activities become so simple, we're enabled more and more to gather our full attention and put it into just this moment.

When that happens, you'll feel it. You'll feel the mind really collect upon the breath or body or sound in a very wholehearted way. Then we find the mind has a lot of strength.

When the mind collects in this way, it becomes still, and you can feel that in that place, it's hard to shake it. When the mind's distracted, any little sound might throw us off or start us down a path of thought and papañca. When the mind really comes together in this way, it acquires a strength that lets it stay connected to the present moment.

That brings a sense of stillness and peace and well-being. So this unification of mind, the strengthening of mind, brings with it automatically a sense of well-being.

If you look back over some of your fondest memories in meditation or what you might say are some of the happiest moments you've had, I bet they'll exhibit this factor of concentration. This is one of the things that put the dharma hook in me and made me keep coming back—because I tasted some peace through meditation I'd never felt before. I kept coming back because I wondered: wow, if a little bit feels like that, what would a little more feel like?

This cultivation of peace brought me back again and again. One of the things that's so satisfying about this state of concentration is that when it's strong, the hindrances don't arise. This is one of the hallmarks of strong concentration. The hindrances are temporarily at bay. They haven't gone away for good, but these movements of liking and disliking and sleepiness and restlessness and doubt have temporarily quieted. The mind then feels a certain kind of freedom. It's a beautiful experience not to be assaulted by these chaotic movements of our own mind.

So it's said that this state is one of seclusion. We're not only secluded from outer distraction, but we're secluded from the impact of our own kilesas to a large extent. And that's part of the beauty and delight.

The concentration can develop further into these states called jhana, which are described as absorption states of concentration. This is the Buddha's description of the first of the jhanas. There are seven states beyond this, but this is the first one: "The meditator enters and abides in the first jhana with rapture and pleasure born of seclusion. She makes the rapture and pleasure born of seclusion drench, fill, steep, and pervade her body so that there is no part of her whole body unpervaded by the rapture and pleasure."

The development of this kind of joy and pleasure in meditation naturally reinforces our ability to stay present, because now the present moment experience is satisfying in itself. So this concentration enables the mind to relax into its own experience of the moment. And it can become self-supporting because the mind's not being drawn out through likes and dislikes, through wants.

One of the other things that happens as the mind settles into itself more and more is that the body also starts to settle. I think for most of us in the West, we've grown up in a very busy culture and our body reflects that. When we come to meditation, often we've picked up the energy of the fast-paced society that surrounds us. In the early years of practice, I often felt that energy was vibrating my body and rising up, coming into the head a lot. It was hard for me to settle in a relaxed way lower into my body because I felt I was still reeling from all the busyness that my life had picked up. And especially if there's any injury, trauma, or deep hurt, that kind of buzzy energy gets even stronger.

So a lot of what happens as we calm the mind in meditation is that the body also calms and lets go of that unnecessary frantic energy that's so prevalent outside. Sometimes it can take a long time for that calming to happen, but it's part of the natural process. And when the body does start to calm, it's much simpler for the mind to rest because it's not meeting the jangly energy in the body.

The practices that you're doing, the practices that we've been instructing in the mornings, all develop this quality of concentration and samadhi. You don't need to do anything differently. Sometimes people want to develop concentration very strongly and go in a particular direction, and a few people on the retreat may end up doing that. But for most of you, the practices that you are doing through the vipassana instructions will lead you to deeper and deeper concentration as you go through the retreat, and that will be sufficient.

The next of the avenues is insight. This is basically the growth of wisdom or understanding. This is what all our instructions are pointing to. This is what most of the evening talks will be pointing to. This is really what the retreat is structured around. I don't have to talk about this a lot tonight—I know you're very familiar with this ground. I'll just recap.

Insight is really around understanding what it is that we do with our minds that leads to suffering, and what we can do through our minds that leads to the end of suffering or to happiness. This is what we're here to understand.

The Buddhist formulation of this question came in two or three different main paradigms. The first, probably most important, is the Four Noble Truths: to understand suffering, its cause, its end, and the path to its end. In this, we spend most of our time on the second and third noble truths. How do we understand the arising of craving, which is the source of suffering, and how do we release that craving to come to the at least temporary end of craving and to that place of freedom? So this is really the crux of our meditation practice. If we're caught in something, there's some kind of craving at work—how do we release that and return the mind to a place of freedom, relative freedom, ease, relaxation, well-being? There's a central investigation that goes on through the Four Noble Truths.

Another insight that's commonly talked about is the insight into the three characteristics: the understanding of impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and not-self. But these insights are very closely related to the Four Noble Truths. As we understand that everything is in the process of change, we don't tend to hang on or to grasp as much.

So we move through life more easily, letting things come as they come and letting things go as they go. As we learn to let things come and go naturally, there's less clinging and therefore less suffering. We learn not to hold on, and then the craving and clinging doesn't arise so much in the first place.

The Buddha talks about this in a third way as well—through the direct observation of clinging or grasping. We learn to notice when there's clinging in the mind through some form of contraction, either through liking or disliking, and how to release that. All these insights revolve around the same core issue: How do we get caught? How do we release? How does the mind get stuck? How does the mind free itself?

The understanding of not-self is particularly helpful here because we begin to understand that all the different phenomena that arise are not really commentaries on me, myself, or I. Everything arises according to its own causes and conditions. Everything passes away according to its own causes and conditions. This kind of understanding seeps in gradually through our practice, but it has a deep and lasting impact.

I have a friend who's an old meditation student, interested in coming to a longer retreat next year, who recently emailed several of us with reports of a difficult health condition. He's about my age, and his body is starting to break down in different ways. He said, "I don't know—this may be the last long retreat that I may be able to come on." He's someone who's participated in long retreats with us for many, many years. But then he added, "You don't need to feel badly for me. I know I'm not this body."

Even in the midst of that health crisis, even while seeing the end of his life on the horizon, he could say with genuine conviction: "You don't need to feel badly for me. I know I'm not this body." There's tremendous freedom and lightness when we let those truths of not me, not mine, not I really settle in and grow slowly, slowly.

When I reflect on the teacher I was with this summer, one of the most enjoyable things about watching him was observing the kind of lightness with which he approached everything. I simply didn't see stickiness or grabbiness in his mind. He was someone who really seemed to have understood the fleeting nature of everything in this world, and he wasn't getting too caught up in any of it that I could see.

The fifth and final avenue to happiness is awakening. You could say this is another form of insight, but because it's insight on such a deeper level, I place it in a different category—awakening or enlightenment. This points to the realization that it's our human potential, through meditation practice, to discover a peace that's beyond time, beyond conditions, beyond change. There's a dimension within us that has this absolute purity—it cannot be corrupted or made imperfect by anything, no matter what happens to us.

The discovery of this dimension, whenever it happens in practice, represents at least one stage of the awakening process. This discovery gives us truly unshakable faith in the end of suffering as a possibility for ourselves. We know it because we've experienced it directly. Nothing can take away that knowledge. Nothing can take away that faith.

In addition, this realization gives a certain confidence in life—certainly confidence in the path and the teachings. When it happens, it removes some of what are called the fetters in the heart and mind—some of the very structural elements that lead the mind into suffering. These can be removed once and for all.

This happens in different stages, so different fetters are removed at different points in the journey. But ultimately, the Buddha said, all the tendencies of mind that can possibly lead us into suffering—meaning all forms of greed, aversion, and delusion—can be taken out of the mind so that there's no longer any potential for suffering to arise in the mind stream. This, the Buddha said, was the highest happiness.

The Buddha taught that the happiness of sense pleasures was not one-sixteenth of the happiness of this kind of awakening. It's hard to imagine what that would be like because we're buffeted every day—as we live, as we sit, as we practice—by these forces in our own hearts and minds. The forces of wanting, of not wanting, of not seeing clearly—this is our normal human life. To come to a place where we knew that those forces could not come again to harm us, to injure us—what a relief, what a blessing, what happiness that would be.

In closing, I want to mention that this monk who seemed to know what he was talking about said that the main cause for this kind of freedom is happiness—the development of sense pleasures in moderation, of merit through generosity and virtue, of cultivating the heart, of concentration and discovering inner peace even if conditional, and of the growth in wisdom through understanding clinging and its release. The happiness from all these sources becomes the main cause for liberation.

So as we practice all the different avenues to happiness, if we practice them all, then they all channel toward this possibility—a real human possibility of awakening and the final end of suffering.

Let's just sit for a minute together.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 39

Working with Difficult Emotions

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong offers practical guidance for working with difficult emotions through the lens of Buddhist meditation practice. Drawing from the third foundation of mindfulness in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10) - mindfulness of citta (mind/heart) - Armstrong explores how emotional and cognitive aspects are interconnected in Buddhist psychology.
>
> The talk examines four primary difficult emotions that meditators commonly encounter: grief/sadness (clinging to pleasant experiences from the past), anger/resentment (aversion to unpleasant past experiences), desire/craving (wanting future pleasures), and fear/anxiety (aversion to anticipated future pain). Armstrong explains how these emotions arise through our relationship to time and our attachment to pleasure and pain, illustrating the Buddha's teaching that dukkha emerges from taṇhā (craving).
>
> Rather than trying to eliminate difficult emotions, Armstrong emphasizes developing two key capacities: shifting from resistance to acceptance and understanding the three characteristics (tilakkhana) of all phenomena - impermanence (anicca), unsatisfactoriness (dukkha), and selflessness (anattā). Through mindfulness practice, we learn to recognize the 'storylines' that sustain emotional suffering and discover freedom within difficult states. The talk includes practical guidance on working with the physical sensations, mental qualities, and thought patterns that comprise emotional experiences, offering a path toward what Gampopa called the transformation where 'confusion dawns as wisdom.'

Working with Difficult Emotions

The subject of our exploration this evening is working with difficult emotions. The Buddha's teaching, as you know, is all about suffering and the end of suffering.

When I'm in daily life and living that busy life in the world, the question of suffering seems really complicated. You can just talk to people in your circle of friends and family and you hear all the different situations that people are dealing with—there's such a range. Maybe somebody's son is using drugs and they don't know how to help, or somebody's aging parent has contracted Alzheimer's but they don't have the money to pay for a good care facility, or a family loses their jobs and their home in the economic downturn and they wonder where to turn for support. Looking more broadly, I think everybody these days tends to feel that the other political party has gone crazy—whichever political party you're from, you feel that about the other side. Or looking on a broader scale, it's just hard to believe that human beings are ruining the only planet that we have to live upon through the effects of climate change. It's really disheartening.

So there are so many problems on so many levels—personal, societal, global. The question of suffering seems very complicated.

But then we come into a situation like this and it gets really simple. When I'm in retreat, it seems clear there are only three things that cause us pain.

There's the body, and that's often present. Physical discomfort probably comes in a number of times during the day, and we've talked some about how to work with that.

There's emotional pain. As we start to pay attention and go through our days, we see the movement of different states—loneliness or anxiety or hopelessness or judgment—move through the mind, some of them more difficult than others.

And then being here, we're privileged to have a different kind of pain: the pain of frustrated meditation. So if your mind wanders, sometimes that's really the most difficult thing in a day. I can't stay connected to the present moment. If you were to go into the outside world and talk to the man or woman on the street, they wouldn't even notice that their mind was wandering, much less care. But here, through our aspiration, we generate a new type of dukkha—so it's a very privileged kind of pain that we enjoy. That's our third kind: wandering mind, restlessness, lack of stability, lack of concentration.

So in retreat, these are the only things we really have to deal with on a difficult level—body, emotion, meditation. Really simple.

We've talked some about working with the body. We talk a lot about the craft of meditation, how to work with the third. Tonight I want to talk specifically about this middle portion: how to work with the difficult emotions that come.

Again, whether we look in retreat or in outer life, this area of pain is one of the greatest that we can see. In the world, we probably know a lot of people whose lives have been really affected by depression or anxiety or panic or serious loss and grief that comes from that, self-doubt, lack of self-confidence. In retreat too, some of our most difficult experiences are dealing with these kinds of feelings that come up for us.

When I first came into meditation, I didn't feel I knew this terrain very well. When one of these difficult states would come up—like fear or anger—the only thing I wanted to do was to get rid of it. I thought, "This is not why I came to meditation. I don't want to have this be happening while I'm here on retreat. How can I make it go away?"

You're all sophisticated meditators and you know that that doesn't work. In the short term, we can't just push these states aside. In the long term of practice, it's said that they do all disappear. It's said that the very roots of them are uprooted and they never arise again. But that's a high attainment. So for us, it may not happen this week, and we should probably be prepared to have them around for a while.

So the aim is not for them to go away, but rather: How can we find freedom while these states are present?

I think that one of the biggest and most immediate benefits of our meditation practice, our mindfulness, is in this area—that through the understanding and working with difficult states, we can immediately find a lot of freedom, both in our meditation and in our daily life. This is a very, very fruitful area for our practice.

Pema Chödrön puts it this way: "In all kinds of situations, we can find out what is true simply by studying ourselves in every nook and cranny, in every black hole and bright spot, whether it's creepy, grisly, splendid, frightening, joyful, inspiring, peaceful, or wrathful. We can just look at the whole thing."

There's a lot of encouragement to do this, and meditation gives us the method. This is really key. Meditation gives us the method, and the method is mindfulness—paying attention in this area and learning from the experience, learning from what we find out.

In the teaching of the Buddha, this falls into the third foundation of mindfulness as described in the Satipatthana Sutta. This is the foundation of the mindfulness of mind. The word that we're translating as mind is the Pali word citta. Most often translated as mind, sometimes translated as heart-mind to emphasize the fact that this word citta includes both emotional components as well as thinking or intellectual components.

So we may translate it as mind, but in Buddhist teachings generally, mind includes both the emotional and the cognitive aspects. Don't think when we say mind that we're just thinking about thought.

We're also including the whole range of emotions. In fact, the best word to translate citta is the word psyche because it encompasses that same whole range of thoughts and feelings.

One pointer to this understanding comes from asking a person from Thailand where their mind is located. They don't point to their head, indicating the brain. They point here, to the center of the chest, or what we call the heart center. Their word for mind is jit, which is derived from citta, and they believe that the base of the mind is in the heart center, the center of the chest. Many Buddhist teachings share this same understanding, that the center of the mind is really in the center of the chest.

Here's a little story that illustrates this beautifully. There's a lot of neuroscience research going on these days around meditation, and one of the foremost researchers is Richie Davidson who heads a lab at the University of Wisconsin in Madison. Richie is a longtime Vipassana meditator and developed his approach to experiments in order to validate what he had experienced firsthand from meditation, which is a lovely thing to know.

We have a meditator on this retreat who works at the university in that field and knows Richie well. At one point, Richie was going to Dharamsala to give the monks around the Dalai Lama a little taste of the kind of work and research he was doing. He couldn't take his whole equipment—his basic equipment is an MRI machine, which is a little too big to ship to Dharamsala. So what he took was one of these caps studded with electrodes that make contact with the scalp and signal the activity in the brain underneath each electrode. You get thirty or forty electrodes all sending signals to a computer, and you can get a map of where the brain activity is happening.

There was this meeting with the Dalai Lama and Richie and about five hundred monks. Richie modeled this leather cap studded with electrodes for them. He felt kind of silly with it on because, truthfully, it looks kind of stupid. But he explained what he was doing and then took the thing off.

All the monks burst out laughing. Richie thought it was because he had looked so silly. But one of the monks spoke up and said, "Oh, that's so funny! You're trying to measure the mind through the brain when everybody knows the mind is located here," pointing to the center of the chest. "Like, what a joke, you guys." So they talked a little bit about how you might measure mind activity around the heart, but he hasn't figured that one out yet. It's a later experiment.

In the Satipatthana Sutta, in the third foundation of mindfulness, this is how the Buddha begins: "And how, bhikkhus, does a bhikkhu abide contemplating mind as mind?" Just to mention this word bhikkhu, which we normally translate as monk—many of the commentaries say that bhikkhu here should be understood as a sincere practitioner. Anyone who's sincerely practicing the path of meditation is a bhikkhu. So all of you are bhikkhus tonight. Some of you may be bhikkhunis if you prefer, but either way.

"How does one abide contemplating mind as mind? Here, a bhikkhu understands mind affected by lust as mind affected by lust, and mind unaffected by lust as mind unaffected by lust. She understands mind affected by hatred as mind affected by hatred, and mind unaffected by hatred as mind unaffected by hatred. He understands mind affected by delusion as mind affected by delusion and mind unaffected by delusion as mind unaffected by delusion."

Again, greed and aversion tend to be more on the affective side, more on the emotional side. Delusion tends to be more on the cognitive side of not understanding things the way they are. So again, in this definition of the foundation of mindfulness of mind, we have both the emotional and the cognitive aspects coming in.

Just a word on vocabulary—I think this was mentioned a few days ago. In this talk, I'll be discussing emotions, which are the strongly felt affective components: fear, anger, loneliness, jealousy, rage, happiness, joy, sympathetic joy, compassion, and so forth. I'll be discussing moods, which are sort of softer or lighter forms of emotions, kind of the cloud-like backdrop. You might be having a mood that's a little melancholy someday, or feeling a little tender or a little blue or a little nostalgic. It's not quite strong enough or fully formed enough to be called an emotion—it's just kind of a background flavor in the mind.

And then broader than that are these things we could call states of mind, which include emotions, moods, and refined meditative states. Qualities like calm or peace or concentration or equanimity. So states of mind is the most inclusive. Moods are a little bit lighter. Emotions tend to be the stronger expressions.

We'll talk more as the retreat goes on about working with positive states of mind, pleasant states that lead to happiness. But for tonight, I'm going to focus mostly on the difficult ones.

In finding greater freedom in relation to the painful emotions—we might call them difficult, we might call them afflictive—we need generally two things to develop through practice. And many of you have already spent time developing these.

These are not new to you, but I want to single them out.

The first is we need a shift in attitude. To go from the attitude like when I came into practice—I just wanted to get rid of these states. I didn't want to feel them. And every time they came, I thought something had gone wrong. We need to shift that attitude to one more of acceptance and allowing and non-judging.

The second thing that we need is a greater understanding of the nature of these emotions—not just the particular nature like the flavor of desire, rage, or terror, but also their universal nature.

All emotions can be seen as having what the Buddha called the three characteristics of phenomena, which are that they're impermanent—none of them lasts forever. They're unsatisfactory, especially as we talk about the difficult ones. You know they're not satisfying in themselves. And we can't really claim them as "I" or "mine" because we all have them. It doesn't make sense to try to own an emotion like anger because it's part of the whole human makeup. It's in every human being who hasn't practiced to be free of it. So it's not yours or mine—it's part of human nature, just part of all of us. Nothing personal really about it. So we need to understand these three marks of impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and selflessness as they apply to our emotions. These three together make up what we sometimes talk about as the emptiness of emotions.

Emptiness doesn't mean that emotions are boring or vacant. It doesn't mean they're absent. Emotions can be rich and vivid and lively and energetic and energized, but they're also impermanent, unsatisfactory, and selfless. And that sort of expresses their empty nature.

So attitude shift to acceptance and an understanding of the empty nature. These are the things that can free us in the near term.

As we start to relate with emotions in our practice, the first step is really to know what we're feeling. This sounds easy, but it's not. I know growing up, nobody told me how to explore my emotional landscape. Not my parents, not my teachers, not my favorite TV shows, not my siblings. Nobody explained it to me, that there's a whole world in here that's very rich, partly beautiful, partly difficult, but a world that's really worth exploring.

So we have to practice. Most of us have to practice knowing what these are.

There's this beautiful program that's happening now in the public schools in Oakland called Mindful Schools, where a number of trained Vipassana teachers are going into public schools at the elementary level, spending, I think, fifteen minutes at a time, taking a whole classroom and teaching them mindfulness and teaching them to be aware of what they're feeling.

To me, this is really revolutionary. And it's beautiful that the public school systems are opening to allow this to happen. Of course, it can't be called Buddhism, because then somebody else would have to come in from every other religion, but it can be called mindfulness. So nobody really has to know about what the roots are. That doesn't matter. The point is that these kids are getting to know how to explore their inner landscape.

And I just remember the kids wrote back a number of letters on what was so great, and they said things like, "I love mindfulness. It helps me be nicer to my baby sister." Or "I love mindfulness. Watching my breath helps me to go to sleep at night." So they're really getting a firsthand taste of meditation kind of under the radar, and it's beautiful.

I have another friend and student who runs a preschool in the Bay Area that she runs as a Dharma preschool. So she takes kids who are three to five. She has them five days a week for the mornings. And the whole time that they're with her, she's teaching them Dharma through yoga, through spiritual stories, through guided meditations.

And she said that in dealing with kids of that age, you can't talk about things like mindfulness or awareness or phenomena of the six senses. Way too abstract. So what she does—she's had them lie down and imagine their mind like a big lake. So just imagine that there's this big lake. You open your mind, there's this big lake and all kinds of fish are swimming through it, all different colors.

She said there's a happy fish that can swim through, there's a sad fish, there's a loving fish, there's an angry fish. Just open yourself to this lake and let all the fish swim through. And she'd guide them along those lines for a while.

And then at the end of the meditation, she asked the class one day, "Well, how was that? Could you let all the fish come? Could you know what fish were there? Did you let them swim through?" And this one young boy, I think he was four years old, raised his hand and said, "I could let all the fish come through, except I couldn't let the mad fish come."

And she said, "Well, why was that?"

And he said, "Well, when you don't know you're the water, the mad fish makes you do things that hurt other people."

When I finally recognized there was anger present, it became anger plus awareness. And that's a completely different state. The awareness doesn't eliminate the anger right away, but it creates space around it. It gives us options. It prevents us from being completely consumed by it.

This recognition is what the Buddha called "clear comprehension" – knowing what's actually happening in this moment. It's such a basic teaching, yet incredibly profound in its effects. When we can clearly see what's arising, we're no longer completely identified with it. There's a part of us that remains free, observing.

The hindrances are particularly tricky because they create their own kind of trance. They generate compelling stories that seem absolutely true in the moment. When I was angry about someone being in "my" walking path, the story seemed completely reasonable. Of course I should be upset – this was clearly an injustice! The mind creates this whole elaborate justification for why the emotion is not only appropriate but necessary.

But these stories are usually based on some form of delusion. In my case, I had unconsciously claimed ownership of a piece of grass. I had decided that because I'd walked there for two weeks, it belonged to me. How absurd! Yet in that moment of identification with anger, it seemed perfectly logical.

This is why the Buddha emphasized that ignorance is the root of all suffering. Not necessarily intellectual ignorance, but this fundamental misunderstanding about the nature of experience. We take things to be solid, permanent, and personal when they're actually fluid, changing, and impersonal.

The practice of mindfulness helps us catch these misperceptions as they're happening. Instead of getting swept away by the story, we can learn to step back and examine what's actually occurring. What does anger feel like in the body? What kinds of thoughts does it generate? How does it affect our breathing, our posture, our relationship to others?

This investigation isn't meant to be analytical or judgmental. It's more like the gentle curiosity of a scientist observing a natural phenomenon. Oh, interesting – this is what anger looks like when it moves through this particular human system.

When we can observe our experience this way, something remarkable happens. The emotion doesn't necessarily disappear, but our relationship to it transforms completely. We're no longer the victim of our own mental states. We become the witness, the space in which all these experiences arise and pass away.

This shift from identification to observation is one of the most liberating discoveries we can make in meditation practice. It's the difference between being caught in the storm and watching it from a place of safety.

Anger plus wisdom or intelligence or recognition or mindfulness or awareness—whatever you want to call it—creates a much better combination. When we can bring that quality in, we know there's not just anger there. There's an ally that's helping us work with the situation. That's the mindfulness, the wisdom, the awareness.

I want to focus tonight on a few states of mind that seem particularly powerful for us as human beings, for us as meditators. They're states that come over and over in life and in meditation. It's a little different list than Skye talked about last week. She talked about the five hindrances—the key list for meditators from the Buddha: sense desire, aversion, sleepiness, restlessness, and doubt.

I'm going to make a slightly different list, which is really the kind of big emotions that I see people working with in actual meditation practice—in retreat, out of retreat, in meditation, out of meditation and so forth. But rather than name them, I'm going to ask you to tell me what they are. And if you've heard this talk before, which some of you have, you can't participate. So this is for the new audience only.

To start drawing this out, I want to make a distinction between beautiful states of mind, as they're called in our tradition, and these difficult states. Beautiful states of mind can arise just in a moment and exist just in momentary being. For instance, you might see somebody and have a real feeling of affection or love that just pours out of you. You might see someone else and have a sense of compassion. You might walk out into the evening setting sun—the beautiful light and the warm air—and have this upsurge of joy. These are just momentary floodings of beautiful feeling that come.

The difficult emotions, on the other hand, for them to involve any degree of suffering, we have to be clinging to them with some concept of time. And as we go through some examples, I think this will become clearer. Time has to be a factor in a difficult emotion that causes suffering for us.

So one of the ways we're going to look at these emotions is using an axis system where we'll have the axis of time running from past through present to future. The other thing that difficult emotions are born around is the range of pleasure and pain that we experience as human beings. This is a very mixed realm. There's great beauty here. There's a lot of joy and love. There's also a lot of suffering and pain. Anywhere you look on the globe, on almost any level—personal, social, cultural—you see this whole range of experience. So our range of openness, our range of sensitivity as people to these extremes of pain and delight, are also a basis for the afflictive emotions to build upon.

So the other axis that we'll use—the vertical axis—goes from pain to pleasure. The horizontal axis is going from past to future. The vertical axis is going from pain to pleasure. That gives us four quadrants.

Let's start with the quadrant up here: past and pleasant. So I want to ask you to think about if there was something in your life that was really pleasant in the past and it's not here anymore. That's what it means about being in the past—not here anymore, not in the present. What emotion could get stirred up? What difficult emotion could get stirred up by that? Very pleasant in the past, not here anymore.

"Nostalgia." "Missing it." "Grief."

This is basically it. This is the basis for sadness. Nostalgia, missing, grief, loss—it's all about clinging to something that was very pleasant in the past that is no longer with us. So this is one of the things that human beings everywhere struggle with. You can read accounts of this in the Buddha's time of those who lost family members and were driven really into states of great suffering and distress.

What about something unpleasant in the past? And we'll circumscribe it a little bit more. We'll narrow it a little bit by saying something unpleasant to do with another human being that happened in the past. What emotion might you be feeling today in thinking about that?

"Anger." "Resentment."

If somebody hurt you, insulted you, offended you, stole something from you, took something away, you could be angry or resentful.

This is the second of these primal emotions that we all work with—grief and anger.

Let's move now to the future end of the spectrum. If there's something you're anticipating that's pleasant and lies ahead, what emotion might that condition? Desire. Wanting. Imagine if I told you that you were going to get ice cream sundaes tomorrow for lunch—though that's not true, by the way, and I don't want anyone waiting around for them. That would condition a response: "Wow, that would taste really good. I'd really like some now." This is how pleasant future possibilities give rise to desire—wanting, longing, yearning, lust. These are very strong primal forces.

And on the other side, what if there's something unpleasant that you think might happen in the future, something painful? What emotion arises then? Aversion or fear. When we anticipate something truly painful—like a scheduled visit to the dentist for a root canal—we become anxious, fearful, nervous.

So these are the four primal emotions I particularly want to explore: sadness or grief, anger, desire, and fear. These are the forces I encounter over and over in myself and in other meditators.

We've discussed before how each strong emotion has two major components. First is the coloring in the mind—fear feels different than anger, which feels different than happiness or jealousy. Each mood has a distinct taste, a different quality of mental experience. When the emotion is strong, it also manifests in the body. Fear often brings contraction in the belly. Sadness frequently creates pressure or heaviness in the chest. Anger commonly produces a burning sensation around the shoulders or neck. So we have both the mental tone and the physical expression.

There's a third component that's equally important: thoughts. When we're in certain frames of mind, we tend to think thoughts that match that state. In fear, we think fearful thoughts. In rage, we think angry thoughts. This is helpful to notice because thoughts and emotions reinforce each other—thoughts can trigger emotions, and emotions can launch thoughts.

There's one particular kind of thought that serves as a foundation for these afflictive emotions, and I call this the storyline around the emotion. The specific storyline varies from emotion to emotion, and each of us needs to feel out what our particular storylines are. I'll suggest a few tonight, but the words that quite fit you might be different, so it's helpful to investigate: What's the belief or story underlying my difficult emotion when it arises?

In that walking meditation experience I described earlier, I believed that person should not have been in my walking place. As silly as it sounds, I really did believe that. And as long as I held onto that belief, I couldn't let go of the anger. The storyline was essentially: "I'm right and they're wrong." As long as I clung to it, the anger remained locked in place.

As we examine these other primal emotions, I'll point out the storylines that support them. It's really helpful to see that there's a conceptual underpinning to these emotions—they're linked to time, either past or future, and connected to specific beliefs. Understanding their nature this way helps us recognize their empty quality, how they're all fabricated from various causes and conditions. Once we see how the whole mindset is assembled, like a Lego set, we can understand how it can be taken apart. Then it's no longer such an overwhelming mystery.

Let's take desire as an example. Desire is this movement that wants something pleasant in the future. It's especially common on retreat, particularly during the adjustment period when we often experience homesickness—missing people, places, things, and comforts we associate with home.

As the retreat progresses, this desire force often attaches to experiences within the retreat itself. "I'd really like to have that meditation I had last week again." We don't ask why we'd want to repeat something that disappeared last time, but never mind—we want it again because it felt good.

So we desire things both outside and inside the retreat setting. When we examine the nature of desire itself—how desire feels while it's present—we discover that desire has an inherently bittersweet quality. It's pleasant and sweet to bring in an object we like, whether ice cream or concentration. This brings a sense of pleasantness into what's often a fairly stark environment, serving as a way of comforting ourselves.

Desire has this comfort aspect. But the problem is that the thought of ice cream isn't ice cream. The thought of concentration isn't concentration. And we're still left without that thing we want. So desire always has this built-in frustration. It reminds us of what we want, but it doesn't deliver it. There's always an unsatisfying aftertaste with desire.

This is really what the Buddha was pointing to when he taught that the source of suffering is craving. Dukkha arises out of this force of wanting. And it's curious—we never want what we already have. Have you ever wanted a hand at the end of your arm? No. We take that for granted. We never think about that. We just want what we don't have.

When this hits a meditation practice, some really good learning can happen. I was teaching a retreat a few years ago in Italy, which was a delightful experience. Carol and I were teaching, and Sally was there also. First of all, it was just a delight to work with Italian yogis because they seemed to me very familiar with their emotions and were able to share them very openly in interviews.

There was a young man on the retreat who came in for his first interview. We worked through an interpreter. He said he was having trouble settling in. I asked why. He said, "Well, I keep thinking about being somewhere else." I asked what was up. He explained that some of his friends were going on holiday to the Caribbean, and they had asked him to join them. He could either go on the holiday in the Caribbean or come on this meditation retreat. When I asked why he came to the retreat, he said, "All the plane tickets to the Caribbean were sold out."

So we were the consolation prize. But while he was on the retreat, he kept thinking about his friends on the beach in the Caribbean—how much fun they were having, the people they were meeting. He said he just couldn't stop wanting to be there, so he couldn't really settle into being here.

What we talked about was how maybe the unhappiness he was experiencing was because of those thoughts about the Caribbean. Maybe the meditation retreat wasn't actually an unhappy environment, but he was making it unhappy by thinking about wanting to be somewhere else.

After he reflected on that for a couple of days and came into his next interview, he had settled down. This is a brilliant teaching—that the situation we're in may be totally fine, but if we want something else, it will make us miserable. Desire has this effect of stirring up discontent, taking a situation that may be absolutely fine and introducing a level of discontent to it.

The storyline that the young man was working from, I would say, was "If I had that, I would be happy." That's the storyline behind desire. That's why it's so compelling. "If I had that, I'd be happy."

Of course, desire never looks at the next step. What happens when that's over? Whether it's an ice cream or a vacation or a concentrated sitting, what happens when that's finished? Oh, I'm just back to where I am already now. But desire never looks that far. It doesn't look at impermanence.

So when desire is present, feel it in the body. What I sometimes notice is a kind of tension, like I'm leaning forward to make something happen. That's what you sometimes hear described as "toppling forward into the next moment." There's some kind of strain in the body that's looking for something else, even with subtle movements of desire. I feel it that way.

Then get familiar with this bittersweet quality. The object brings a sense of pleasure or comfort, but also a built-in sense of frustration. It's really helpful to investigate the unsatisfying nature of desire as it's present.

The second quality I want to talk about is sadness, as a form of aversion.

Aversion manifests in countless flavors: ill-will, anger, hatred, impatience, irritation, fear, sadness, grief, judgment, blame, resentment, depression, despair, and resistance—to name just a few. Yet beneath their varied surfaces, they all share a similar quality, one that the Buddha illustrated beautifully in a story he once shared with his monks.

While the Buddha was meeting with monks in a forest clearing, a jackal suddenly ran out from the trees, stood in the open space for a moment, then darted into the underbrush. After sitting there briefly, it ran to the hollow at the root of a tree and lay down, only to jump up again almost immediately. Next it moved to a nearby cave, sat for a minute, then wandered back into the forest.

"Did you see that jackal?" the Buddha asked. "It couldn't find contentment anywhere. It ran from the forest—no contentment there. It stood in the clearing—no contentment there. It lay down at the tree root, went to the cave—still no contentment. Everywhere it went, it remained discontent. It blamed its discontent on the forest, on the underbrush, on the tree root, on the cave. It blamed walking and running and lying down and sitting."

The Buddha explained that the problem wasn't with any of these places or postures. The jackal had mange—an intensely itchy skin disease. Because of this condition, it was miserable everywhere it went.

This is precisely what aversion is like. When the mind dwells in aversion, nothing satisfies. Everything we try, everything we pick up, everything we touch feels somehow not quite right. The storyline behind aversion follows a familiar pattern: there's some unpleasantness somewhere in our field of experience, and because of that unpleasantness, we form the belief, "I can't be happy." With sadness, this manifests as "I can't be happy because I've lost this thing from the past." As long as we hold this belief, it blocks our ability to find contentment or happiness.

Sometimes opening to sadness feels daunting, especially when we've been carrying it for a while. It can seem enormous, and we fear that if we truly let ourselves feel it, we might go under—might drown in its depths. But this too is just another belief. With all emotions, mindfulness offers the skillful approach: touch the feeling, be mindful of it, and when it becomes too overwhelming, gently back away. Find refuge in a different object of attention, take a walk, practice loving-kindness—place the mind somewhere else that feels safer.

Anger represents one of the stronger forms of aversion. The body feels tight, the mind seems on fire or burning. The storyline, as I discovered during my walking meditation, typically follows the pattern: "I'm right and you're wrong." This becomes the foundation for all angry narratives.

Here's where watching our thoughts becomes crucial. When we're angry, we tend to string together self-righteous and blaming thoughts one after another. Each thought is like adding fuel to an already burning fire, making it burn hotter and hotter. We keep stoking the flames with our thinking, repeating "I'm right and you're wrong" in endless variations.

But if we stop feeding these thoughts to the fire, the emotion naturally dies out—this is the nature of every emotion. Unless continuously stoked, emotions fade away on their own. The challenge arises when our "I'm right and you're wrong" thoughts happen to be true. These are the ones that catch us most completely, because they feel so justified.

Sometimes it may be true, but that doesn't mean that it's skillful to keep telling ourselves that story.

The Dalai Lama in the early 1980s met a monk who had just escaped from Tibet. The Dalai Lama had known this monk back in the 1950s when he still lived in Tibet and had thought he was a monk of just middling capacity—a good monk. Then the monk had been put in prison for over twenty years and had finally escaped and made his way to India, where the Dalai Lama was able to meet him again.

In the conversation, freshly back in India, the monk said, "You know, when I was in prison, I really felt I was in danger." The Dalai Lama thought, as it happened to many people, "Do you mean you were in danger of being tortured?" And the monk said, "No, that's not what I mean. I was tortured. But what I meant was I was in danger of getting angry at them." He said, "But I didn't."

The Dalai Lama said he had to revise his estimate of this monk's practice.

So even in a situation like that—he was imprisoned for being a monk, that was his crime, he had done nothing wrong, he was not resistant or angry to his guards—nonetheless, he was tortured. Very clearly, he was right, and they were not. But he did not let that perception give rise to anger.

So just observe when anger comes, how we tend to feed it and create it through these thoughts that justify ourselves and blame the other. And feel the feeling. Anger is painful. That's one of the things that's really easy to see—it's such a painful state. In the texts, it's likened to someone picking up a hot coal to throw at another person. But by picking up the coal, we burn ourselves first. And the other thing it's likened to is drinking poison and hoping that the other person gets sick. But we get sick first.

So we have to feel this pain of anger. For me, it was the only thing that really encouraged me to let it go. I didn't see any other way out of the pain except to let it go. So we need to feel that fire and dukkha and learn from it.

One of the forms of anger, you could say it's a form of anger that comes up, is that we judge ourselves. We feel angry about things we've done in the past or we blame ourselves or we put the wrong onto ourselves, and that's doubly painful. This form of self-judgment seems to be really widespread in our culture today.

Again, a story from the Dalai Lama. Some Western teachers were meeting with him a number of years ago in Dharamsala—Western Buddhist teachers—and were explaining this problem in the West of people not feeling good about themselves, of judging themselves, of being critical about themselves, of not really having self-love. The Dalai Lama could not understand what was being described. He said, "What are you talking about?" And when he finally got it, he said, "You know, we just don't have this in Tibet. Children are raised in an atmosphere of love, and they're given positive messages from their family and the culture. And people grow up really caring and trusting in themselves."

So this factor of self-judgment I think we'll talk about more because it's so common in the West. It comes up very often on meditation retreats, particularly because we're not getting the kind of supportive affirmations of friends and family and normal human contact. So in the silence often there's a sense of loneliness, and our fears about ourselves come to the surface. So often in retreats these judgments become really apparent, and we want to talk about ways to work with it.

In the classical tradition, the best antidote for all forms of aversion, including self-judgment, is the practice of loving kindness. So for self-judgment as well as anger, the development of loving kindness is a really powerful way to offset that.

One little word about the storyline behind self-judgment is that it has something to do with "I'm not good enough" or "I'm not lovable the way I am"—some underlying belief. And it's so ironic in a way that meditators feel this so strongly at times because you all are some of the best people that I know. Anyone who comes here and has the intention to make the world a better place by developing understanding and love is one of the highest aspirations. And just from knowing each of you that I've met and knowing what my colleagues are finding—you are all really good people. So there's not a rational basis for this kind of self-judgment in this group. And yet a lot of us carry it. And it's a burden that we don't really deserve. There are ways to work with it.

The last of the kind of primal emotions I wanted to mention is fear. This is the one that was my constant companion in practice for many, many years.

This is the one I would say I cut my emotional teeth on. I became so familiar with this state of mind. The first thing that made it workable for me, I think it was after a Joseph Goldstein dharma talk on the topic of fear in this very hall some thirty years ago, was that he simply encouraged us to look into the direct experience in the body and see if we could accept it.

So my practice for a long time was: can I feel the body sensations that arise when I'm in fear, and can I bear them? Fear is this projection into the future, and there's some kind of belief like this present moment is bearable—just barely—but the next moment isn't going to be. Something unbearable is about to happen, or something disastrous is about to happen. So if we can set aside the future story, future thinking, and come into the present moment, the question becomes: can we bear the fear?

The first avenue in for me was could I bear the body sensations of fear? The contraction, the flutteriness, the sweat under the arms, the lightness and ungroundedness that came with the fear. So I worked hard at it. I couldn't right away. But little by little, meeting it time and time again, dozens of times, meeting it, feeling it, trying to open—eventually I could. And I said, I can bear this.

Then I went to the mental experience. Can I bear that mood in the mind? Again, it wasn't easy, but eventually I could. And finally, I could come enough into the present that I could let go of the future. Because when we're in fear and the world feels like a scary place, there's some kind of projection going on that isn't in this world. I was in a meditation center—it's got to be one of the safest places on earth—and I was feeling like something bad was going to happen to me. It was a total projection made up just out of that feeling of fear.

So over the years, just bringing mindfulness to this quality again and again and again, I've just seen its power ebb, ebb, ebb, ebb, all by the force of mindfulness and loving-kindness. It's kind of like mindfulness has this wearing away quality with these old habit patterns of mind and heart. It wears them down little by little, just like a wheel would get worn down if you put your hand on it every time it went by. It wouldn't wear away quickly, but it would get worn away. And mindfulness is like putting a hand on this churned up energy every time it passes. And every pass slows it down, weakens it, until it can pass through.

So this is our approach with the difficult emotions: coming into the present moment, feeling them, noticing them in the body, noticing them on the emotional level, noticing the connection to thoughts. This is how that whole complex has gotten constructed, and this is how it can dissolve and fall apart as we bring to the difficult emotions this investigative and curious attitude.

What we're doing is waking up in the middle of the difficulty. It's not that we get rid of this stuff first and then we wake up, but in the very moment of difficulty—of fear or anger or wanting or sadness—we bring qualities of interest, kindness to ourselves, presence, wisdom, compassion, investigation. All these qualities are waking up in the very middle of the difficulty. That's what transforms the emotion, and ultimately that's what transforms us. Our confusion gets woken up out of its own very nature, not by making it go away, but by bringing aliveness and awakeness into the middle of it.

So I'll just close with a quotation from the Tibetan tradition, which is kind of a supplication. The supplication could be to the universe, it could be to your own wisdom, it could be to the Buddha or a teacher—whatever you like. It's called the Four Blessings of Gampopa:

Grant your blessing so that my mind follows the Dharma.
Grant your blessing so that my Dharma practice becomes the path.
Grant your blessing so that the path clarifies confusion.
Grant your blessing so that confusion dawns as wisdom.

Let's just sit for a minute together.

Grant your blessing so that confusion dawns as wisdom.

CHAPTER 40

The Seven Factors of Awakening (Bojjhaṅga)

Guy Armstrong · 1h03

> In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong presents the seven factors of awakening (bojjhaṅga) as described in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10). Drawing on the Buddha's teaching that these factors "lead to peace, to direct knowledge, to awakening, to nibbāna," he explains how mindfulness sets the foundation for the arising of investigation (dhammavicaya), energy (vīriya), rapture (pīti), calm (passaddhi), concentration (samādhi), and equanimity (upekkhā). Armstrong illustrates how the first three factors are energizing while the final three are calming, with mindfulness providing the crucial balance between arousing and tranquilizing energies. Through practical examples and stories of accomplished teachers like Dīpā Mā and Ajahn Jumnien, he demonstrates how these wholesome mental factors naturally develop through sustained meditation practice. The talk emphasizes how practitioners can recognize these arising qualities in their own experience and learn to nurture them, understanding that "the one that I feed" - referencing a Native American teaching story - determines which mental qualities predominate. This detailed exploration provides both theoretical understanding and practical guidance for cultivating the mental factors that lead directly to liberation.

At this point in the retreat, we've talked quite a bit about the difficult energies that come into the heart and mind—the hindrances, the roots of the unwholesome, working with difficult emotions. Now we're turning a corner in our discourse and are going to start talking more about the beautiful states of mind. Carol talked last night about the quality of loving kindness, which you've been practicing for a few weeks. Tonight I want to talk about another set of beautiful qualities called the seven factors of awakening.

The reason I want to talk about them now is that I'm hearing them a lot in the interviews and the questions. These beautiful qualities, now that you're settled in for three weeks, are really starting to come alive and percolate in you, in everyone that I've talked to, and I think they're there in everyone here. It's very helpful to start to pay attention to them, recognize them, and know how to nurture them.

There's a story from the Native American tradition that was popular right after 9-11. Many of you may have heard it. A story about a young boy who goes to school and has a conflict with a classmate and feels that he's been treated unfairly. He comes back in the evening to his home and talks to his grandfather about it, describing how he feels so angry and wants to get some kind of revenge for what happened at school that day.

The grandfather listens to him and says, "Yes, I know just what you mean. When I think about all the things that have been done, people taking what didn't belong to them and not caring for the people that they injured, I can feel very angry and full of hatred and want to take vengeance on them. It's like there are two wolves inside of me. This one wolf is the angry and quarrelsome and hateful wolf. But there's another wolf inside of me that is patient, wants to be kind to everyone regardless of what they've done and live in harmony with others. These two wolves often battle inside me and each one tries to dominate my spirit and each one tries to come out on top."

So the young boy asked, "Well, grandfather, which one will win?" And the old man said, "The one that I feed."

What I was struck by in this story—it's a very touching story about spiritual life in general—but I was really struck by the language that the old man used because it's very similar to the language that the Buddha used. He talked many times about how the path is all about starving the hindrances and feeding these factors of awakening that we'll be talking about tonight.

So really the question is, in all of our practice, how do we starve or weaken the afflictive forces in the heart and mind, and how do we strengthen and grow and build up the beautiful qualities of heart and mind? This work is the work of what's called bhāvanā, or mental development.

If you remember, I quoted this French poet, Paul Valéry, who in one of his works, his notebooks, said, "Other people write books, but I am making my mind." In this work of meditation, we are making our minds also, and we can shape them in the direction of these beautiful qualities once we understand how they come about. There are no limits that I know of to the depth of development of these qualities.

A teacher who comes to Spirit Rock often is Ajahn Jumnian, a Thai monk who's now in his 60s and has been coming for probably the past 10 years every year. In one of the conversations with him, Ajahn Jumnian said that he has not had any anger in 25 years. That's a nice mind. That's a mind of some accomplishment. The Buddha talked about how through this development, the mind can really become tamed, brought under some kind of control so that the afflictive forces don't torment us any longer.

Another person who was very impressive in this regard, this degree of development, was an Indian teacher named Dipa Ma. I know many of you have heard of her and there's a wonderful book about her life simply called "Dipa Ma" that many women practitioners resonate strongly with because she was a very strong figure as a woman teacher in our tradition.

I had the chance to spend some time with Dipa Ma in the early 1980s and look after her for a month on her first visit to this country. She was accompanied by her grandson, who was about four years old at that time and was a little bit of a whirlwind. We would take them out shopping in the local mall near Amherst. I remember the young boy, his name was Rishi, running down the aisles of this department store and tugging at clothes, clothes falling off in the aisle, hangers falling down in the aisle, and kind of chaos just following him. Then Dipa Ma running after him—she was probably in her 60s at that point—and her white robes were flapping behind her as she ran down the aisle, but there was always a little smile on her face. She had such great love and patience for her grandson. I thought, if you can be cool shopping in a mall in America, you're a pretty cooled-out yogi. So that was Dipa Ma.

At one point, she helped teach a three-month course here. Some yogis were spending time with her. Everybody was struck by her presence, her quality of stillness and openness. They asked her, "What is in your mind? What's there? What do you feel?" And she replied, "I only have three things in my mind. There's peace, there's concentration, and there's mettā." That was it. And she seemed to abide in that place most of the time.

So the kind of development that is possible is really unlimited. People like Dipa Ma show us some of that potential.

The states that I want to talk about tonight, the seven factors of awakening, are probably the group that the Buddha talked most about when he was describing the unfolding of meditation. As the hindrances are the list of difficulties that meditators frequently encounter, these are the list of wholesome qualities that are directly developed through the meditation practice. So they're ones that it's very helpful for us as meditators to get to understand.

Really, I would say that these factors become the meditator's best friend. These are the qualities that accompany us on the journey and produce the beautiful outcomes as well as the insights that arise on the path.

So the seven states that are included in this group are mindfulness, investigation, energy, rapture, calm, concentration, and equanimity. These are the ones I want to talk about tonight, and the Buddha said they lead to awakening—therefore they're called factors of awakening, which makes sense. He said they're all described as "maturing in release"—that is, when we develop them and bring them to strength, they lead to our release or liberation. That's their destination.

Another quote from the Buddha: "Just as all the rafters of a peaked house slant, slope, and incline towards the roof peak, so too when a practitioner develops and cultivates the seven factors of awakening, he slants, slopes, and inclines to nibbana"—to the unconditioned, to awakening. So these are the factors that lead in that direction.

They can also be understood as the qualities of a mind that is approaching the moment of awakening or enlightenment. As the mind is filled with these factors and as they come into strength, maturity, and fulfillment, the way that mind is formed is right next door to the unconditioned, right next door to nibbana. You might say it's the closest approximation that can be made to that. So it's as though we're tuning to or imitating this unconditioned nature. And as the mind gets closer and closer in approximation to it, it can then fall in. And that moment of enlightenment or awakening happens because of that proximity.

The Buddha described these factors in a given order because he said one leads to the next, leads to the next. So I'll explain it that way, and I think it's helpful to understand them in that developmental line. But they're also nonlinear in the sense that every one of them supports the others. So it's not really that we have to strictly start at the first and only then go to the second and only then to the third. They grow all along the path.

In the fourth foundation of mindfulness in the Satipatthana Sutta, the Buddha describes this as one of the important areas of dhammas or principles that the meditator should understand. And what he says is we should know these seven factors. We should also know what leads them to arise and how to bring them to fulfillment or real strength. So that's pointing to the basic terrain of knowing the factors, but also being open to their arising and being weak in the beginning. But then as the meditation develops, as we learn how to strengthen them, we can grow them up into quite strong forces in the mind.

So again, it's my impression that everyone here has tasted these factors by this point in the retreat to a greater or lesser degree. And in coming to recognize them, they don't have to be built to a very strong level. We can start to get familiar with them just in their first taste. So I want to describe them tonight and encourage you to begin to tune into them in your practice. I think they're already there, and it's just a matter of looking for them, getting to know them, and then understanding how to develop them further.

The first of the factors in the sequence the Buddha described was mindfulness. Because we've been developing this from the very beginning, it is really the practice of mindfulness that has set the chain going for these other factors. So whether you consciously knew the other factors were developing or not, mindfulness has been the engine that has made them grow already.

The next three factors are what are called "arousing"—they're qualities that tend to pick energy up. The final three are called "calming"—they're factors that tend to settle the energy that's been brought up by the first three. Mindfulness starts the chain going, and then mindfulness is also the factor that balances the energizing and the calming sets of the seven factors.

So overall, what this grouping describes is a group that balances the factor of arousing energy and tranquilizing energy. For instance, when we gave simple instructions in the beginning, pointing to a way of being that was both tranquil and alert, that's an expression of this same balance. So you can see this is a really fundamental place we're aiming in our meditation practice—to find this balance where there's enough energy to be alert, awake, sensitive to each moment as it unfolds and changes, but also relaxed, steady, to some extent still, and able to observe clearly. It's the balance of these qualities that makes the mind ripe for meditation, ripe for insight, ripe for awakening.

So we'll talk about these one by one. Mindfulness we've talked a lot about already. I don't need to say a lot about this factor this evening—you've been doing it hour by hour, day by day, and it's grown quite strongly in everyone that I've seen, and I suspect in everyone who's here.

Sometimes we don't notice it because the growth of mindfulness doesn't mean that the movement of mind stops, but it means that we're much more aware of it when it's happening. One thing that I'm noticing and hearing in the interviews is it's taking less effort to be present than it did at the beginning. This is something you may notice—it's easier, more effortless to be in contact with the present moment. Sometimes it can start to feel like you're not working hard enough, and you may question, "Am I really doing it?" Because in the beginning, it takes a lot of effort to connect with the present, not be swept away by thinking. As the mindfulness has gotten stronger, that becomes a little more natural, a little easier to do.

But you can trust that. When that more effortless quality appears, you can use it as an indicator to relax. Trust that awareness will reveal what you need to see.

When mindfulness is present and we start to look at our experience, we tend to get interested in it. We get curious. We notice a level of detail, a level of activity we haven't seen before, and that leads us to pay closer attention. That leads to the second factor, which is the factor of investigation.

Investigation sounds very conceptual, like we should be raising lots of questions and thinking about it and reflecting. But in meditation, that's not the meaning of investigation. Investigation really means drawing the attention closer to our experience. So it's not that we have to ask a lot or think a lot or wonder a lot. We just have to connect more directly. You might say feel things more intimately in our experience.

I'll give you a simple example. In experiencing the breath, many people report feeling bored after some time. "Oh, the breath seems so similar. I've been with a hundred breaths in the last hour. It seems like nothing is changing. My attention's drifting off." What do we do? Boredom is often a factor of just not looking for all the richness that is there already. So by looking more closely, we can often refine that interest.

Here are a few simple suggestions for investigation of the breath. Every breath has three parts: a beginning, middle, and end to the in-breath; a beginning, middle, and end to the out-breath. Can you notice those? Try it sometime and see. Can you feel the breath just as it's making itself known? Can you feel that long stretch of the in-breath coming in? Can you feel it fading away? Then how soon do you feel the first touch of an out-breath? Can you be with it through that whole middle portion of exhaling? And then can you feel it fading away to nothing again? If the mindfulness is close to the breath, you'll feel these three parts. Being interested in that will keep your attention there more easily.

Another good way to investigate the breath was an exercise that Sayadaw U Pandita used to assign meditators. His instructions were to follow the breath at the abdomen with the rising and falling. But if you're experiencing it at the nose or the chest, you could also ask the same question. He would mention this in an interview and then ask for a reply later: "Tell me three distinct sensations that you notice in an in-breath. Tell me three distinct sensations you notice in an out-breath."

Often we might think, "Oh, there's just the in-breath." But if we look more closely, we see that in the in-breath, there are lots of little sensations coming and going, coming and going, coming and going over the course of that whole breathing in. Over the course of the out-breath, same thing. Lots of little sensations coming, going, coming, going, coming, going. So he would say, "Tell me three sensations you notice for an in-breath and an out-breath."

When you have to find it and report to a teacher like Sayadaw U Pandita, it brings your interest into the moment. You don't want to walk into the room next day and say, "I couldn't find anything." So you get very motivated. And then if you were successful, he'd say, "Well, next day tell me something new that you haven't told me before." So you'd get motivated all over again.

This kind of investigation really draws on a quality of what you might call careful attention. In the Pali, there's a phrase that the Buddha used over and over again called yoniso manasikāra. Manasikāra means attention. Yoniso is often translated as wise. The Buddha talked about how to apply attention that got us in trouble, how to apply attention that led to growth in meditation. And this word yoniso, which is often translated as wise, actually has a meaning of womb-like, like the womb from which babies come.

So it's beautiful to think about our mindfulness as embodying a womb-like attention, because that has this beautiful image of whatever our object is—breath, sound, sensation, emotion—being embraced with mindfulness. It's being surrounded and held and nurtured.

as it emerges from this womb-like quality of attention. So there's a sense that mindfulness is not some cold, clinical, detached quality of observation, but rather embodies what Carol spoke of last night—a quality of non-hatred, or adosa in Pali, leaning toward metta. This suggests an attention that is warm, caring, embracing—genuinely friendly in its quality.

You can feel this happening quite naturally when certain things arise. When you smell dessert emerging from the kitchen at lunch, attention moves toward the back table in this truly embracing way, holding and nourishing whatever delicious creation is appearing there.

I was taking a short walk after tea the other evening when I heard a single honk up in the sky. Looking up, I saw a flight of about twenty Canadian geese passing overhead in a beautifully formed V—this was before the rain started. They were flying fairly low, and I could see each one clearly. When that happened, my attention was simply there, effortlessly. I wasn't distracted, didn't want to be anywhere else. Because of that natural interest, attention sustained itself.

When we can cultivate genuine interest in this experience of mind and body, mindfulness arises with remarkable ease. Investigation can truly support this quality of interest.

Consider investigating an emotion as another example. If we can discover genuine interest in it—even when the emotion itself may be difficult—that quality of interest brings in a positive element. We sense that we can learn from this experience, that there's something to be understood here. Wisdom can grow. Our capacity to hold whatever arises can expand. When we bring in this positive element, this positive feeling, there's actually a kind of joy, even in being with difficult emotions.

Notice if sometimes, even when being with primary patterns you find—anxiety, worry, fear, sadness—being present with them and maintaining interest doesn't bring a certain joy to the experience that helps sustain attention with that emotion.

Then, as we remain with the experience out of this interest, we feel not only the immediate characteristics—with breath, we feel all the small sensations coming and going, the flutters, pressure, relaxation, or expansion. With emotion, we sense its particular quality—how joy differs from contentment, differs from anxiety. We feel these particulars, but as we continue staying present, we begin to see some of the universal characteristics.

All those small sensations with breath—coming, going, coming, going—reveal that nothing solid exists there. Everything is constantly changing. Breath demonstrates impermanence beautifully when we look closely. There isn't just one sensation; all sensations arise and pass away continuously.

We can observe impermanence with emotions as well—none of them last. We can begin to investigate how this quality we call fear exists in all of us. The quality we call happiness exists in all of us. It's not "mine" or "yours"—it's part of nature, part of human nature. We start to see beneath this notion of self. It's not about me or you; it's simply part of human nature. We begin to release some of the ownership, some of the "I, me, mine" from that experience.

This understanding emerges naturally from the interest in investigating combined with mindfulness.

Investigation is also powerful because it directly expresses the wisdom nature of our mind. The practice we're engaged in—Insight Meditation—ultimately relies on developing wisdom and understanding. But sometimes it's challenging to know how we cultivate that. Among all the factors available for us to directly strengthen, investigation is one that truly draws out this wisdom element. Investigation expresses "I want to see, I want to understand, I want to know." We're activating that wisdom quality quite directly.

Now, as we become more interested, as we launch this investigation, we move into the third factor—the factor of energy. The Pali word is viriya, sometimes translated as energy, sometimes as effort, sometimes as energetic effort—because translators couldn't decide, so they combined them.

And I'll just say a few more words that are sometimes associated to give you a sense of the meaning: strength, courage, ardor, or my current favorite—enthusiasm. For me, virya is about what quality of enthusiasm we bring. This enthusiasm relies on this level of interest and investigation, so it's triggered by those, conditioned by those.

It refers to energy in both body and mind, but it's a specific kind of energy—an energy or enthusiasm that's directed to the path. It's directed to the work that we're doing here. So this is the Buddha's description: "Energy is aroused for the abandoning of unwholesome states and the development of wholesome states. One is strong, firm, not shirking from the responsibility of cultivating wholesome states." There you kind of get a feeling for where the quality of courage comes in. The word vira, that's the root of virya, means hero in Pali. So this quality of virya has a heroic quality about it.

And you all manifest this day by day. I'm touched by this every day in the interviews. We know it's not easy doing the discipline that you're doing—having left your homes, sitting, walking, being present, sitting still moment after moment after moment. It takes a lot of resolve to keep coming back and greeting the present moment. It's not always pleasant, not always easy. So each of you is carrying out a kind of heroic undertaking in your willingness to be here. That's the expression of the courage quality of this nature of virya.

Of course, it comes out of our motivation, our aspiration, and understanding what we need to do to carry out the practice. You can see this in any walk of life—people who want to reach a difficult goal carry out this quality of courageous effort again and again and again.

When I look for analogies to this, I look at the area of professional athletes where it's very clear. My particular sport addiction is tennis. I like to play and I like to follow it and I like to watch. The level of physical conditioning in the world of tennis has gone way up in the last ten years. So you have people like Roger Federer and Rafael Nadal who are these amazing super guys—they can go out and run around a court for five hours or longer and still look fresh. I mean, you hardly ever see Federer even sweat. Nadal is working hard, but he can do it all day long. They're incredibly well conditioned.

I remember when I was following Andre Agassi, who retired a number of years ago—I read about his training regimen. He had a very tough workout coach who would lead him on runs in the hills around Las Vegas, where Agassi lives. It's a desert, as you probably know, and it gets really hot most of the year. So he would be pushed to sprint up these hills until he got so tired that he was throwing up. And when he reached that point, the trainer said, "Okay, that's enough for today. You can go back down." But that's the extent to which he worked to achieve his goal of conditioning.

Another realm, and this is the one that I'm really most in awe of, are professional bike riders. Every year I like to follow the Tour de France when it happens in July and a little bit into August, because I think those are the most amazing athletes on the face of the planet. They go for most of a month going full out day after day after day. How they get the energy to climb back on the bike the next day and do it again—going up thousands of meters, up these really steep grades, racing other people who are in the best physical shape imaginable—it's just amazing.

I followed Lance Armstrong for a number of years when he won the tour seven times. And he made a comment: "Yeah, I do well in this sport because I have a high tolerance for pain. Basically, when I go out and race, I know that I'm just going to be setting myself up for eight hours of continuous physical pain. That's what happens when I get on a bike." That's a lot of determination. That's a lot of courage. And in the training for that, there's a lot of hours of pain too.

So these people are just going for fame and fortune. We're going for the end of suffering. But actually I think our effort is not inferior to theirs. The effort that you all put in on a course like this is similar to that of world-class athletes.

I remember one three-month course where the style was intensely oriented toward virya. The teachers recommended that we plan to sleep only four hours a night, dedicating the remaining twenty hours to continuous mental noting. I took on that challenge, though it wasn't my normal style—I was accustomed to at least six hours of sleep in retreat.

I thought I might not be able to do it. Initially I managed about six hours, but I held the sincere intention to keep working until I reached the requested four hours. Every day in interviews with Joseph and Sharon, they would ask how many hours I'd slept, so there was no escaping accountability.

After countless sleepy sittings, walkings, and standings, I managed to reduce my sleep to four hours while maintaining awareness and noting practice for the other twenty. It was probably the hardest I've ever worked in meditation retreat, and I learned tremendously from it. Looking back—fortunately it's looking back now, as I was younger then—I discovered things I don't know if I could have learned any other way. I'm deeply grateful for those demanding teachers and that rigorous style. The lessons were invaluable.

The fruit was extraordinary continuity. That sustained noting across so many hours of wakefulness created the finest moment-to-moment continuity of mindfulness I've ever experienced. That was the true reward.

This represents the courageous side of virya—the extending, going-to-the-limit aspect of this energy. But there's another way to understand virya that doesn't rely so heavily on that courage element: the quality of simply persisting.

Bhikkhu Bodhi wrote in one of his books on the Eightfold Path that only two things are required to reach liberation. One is that you start, and the second is that you continue. He said if you do those two things, the outcome is guaranteed. That's the quality of persistence—just keep going.

This quality appears beautifully in a story from the Tibetan tradition about the great yogi Milarepa, who practiced in the eleventh century. He lived most of his practice career in a cave, very simply, always dressed in just a thin white cloth, sustaining himself through winters by practicing inner heat yoga. He trained great disciples, particularly Gampopa and Raichungpa.

The story tells of Milarepa saying goodbye to Gampopa, who had studied with him extensively, receiving teachings, transmissions, and secret instructions. Now it was time for Gampopa to find his own cave and practice independently. The student, sorry to leave his teacher but knowing it was time, came to say farewell. He bowed, took leave, and started down the path.

Then Milarepa called him back. "There's one more teaching I must give you," he said. "This is really the secret to everything I've achieved through meditation."

To give this teaching, Milarepa turned around, flipped up the hem of his white robe, leaned over, and showed Gampopa his buttocks, which were calloused as hard as a camel's hoof.

"This is really the key to my success," Milarepa said. "Sitting on my backside is what has made my meditation successful. This is the kind of perseverance you need too, Gampopa."

Gampopa took that advice, practiced with great dedication, and became himself a great teacher with many disciples and schools.

Another teacher, the modern Burmese master Sayadaw U Tejaniya, expresses this quality of perseverance beautifully: "Right effort means to keep reminding yourself to be aware. Right effort is persistent effort. It is not energy used to focus hard on something. It is effort simply directed at remaining aware. It is not difficult to be aware or mindful. It is difficult to maintain it continuously. For this, you need right effort, which is simply perseverance."

Again, just this steadiness of application. It's not hard to be aware—can you feel your seat on the chair right now? That's not difficult. But maintaining awareness moment after moment after moment is challenging. That's what Sayadaw U Tejaniya points to: relaxed effort, but very persistent.

When this kind of energy arises in practice—this interest in what we're doing—the mind becomes alert, bright, and present. This naturally leads to the next factor of the seven: rapture.

"Rapture" is perhaps too strong a translation. When I think of rapture, I imagine someone almost unconscious in ecstasy—that's excessive. A better rendering might be "joyful interest" or "rapt attention." The Pali word is pīti, which describes the quality of being bright, alert, energetic, and connected to the present moment. Within that connection—whether with breath, body, sensations, or sounds—you begin to discover happiness.

It's truly a wonderful moment in meditation when you find you actually like your object of attention.

It might be the breath, it might be sounds, but there's a sense in coming into contact with it that it's pleasant to be there. There's a happiness in being with the object itself. In the beginning, it just seems like work. And the object doesn't seem that exciting. It's certainly not delightful. But as this quality of present moment interest and attention grows, it takes on a pleasant quality. Then it becomes easier to stay connected because of the enjoyment of it.

There's a teacher in Australia who lives in Skye's hometown of Perth. A Western monk named Ajahn Brahm teaches extensively on the qualities of the breath for strong concentration. It's his central interest and teaching. The way that he encourages people to make a really close connection with the breath is to see it as beautiful. Because if you can see the breath as beautiful, you'll naturally want to be there. Just like seeing a flock of geese, just like watching a sunset, just like seeing the face of a child.

So finding this quality of delight or joy in relation to the meditation object is the next factor of awakening. It's a mental factor because it comes out of the mind's relationship to the object, but it's said that it expresses itself physically. And it can manifest in varying degrees.

Often when people reach this stage, there's a kind of release or opening to energy in the body. The energy can be experienced, it's said, classically in five different ways. It can be minor—it just feels like there's a kind of trembling on the surface of the skin. It can be momentary, and there's a kind of rush of energy, like a bolt of lightning. There's a showering kind of energy where it feels like waves of energy pass through the body. One wave passes away and later maybe another wave. There's an uplifting kind of energy where the body starts to feel really light. You could sit for a long time on the cushion because there's a lightness to the body, and sometimes you feel you could almost float off the cushion.

It's said that it's this uplifting quality of piti that allows yogis to develop a quality of levitation. Remember those old stories about the Maharishi when he was teaching levitation in Indiana somewhere? I recently met someone who had been on those retreats and she said people actually were kind of bouncing across the room based on the development of this factor of piti expressing itself through the body lifting. This is also described in the Buddhist texts as well. And the fifth kind of rapture is said to be all-pervading, where it's felt throughout the body.

Mostly this energy is felt as pleasant because it comes out of this kind of happy relationship with the meditation object. But as the factor gets developed more strongly, the bodily energy becomes stronger too, and it can become unpleasant. The bodily energy can become strong enough that it's no longer felt as pleasant. It can be felt as a little too intense or at times as overwhelming.

It's not that the meditation at this point has gone wrong or that anything bad is happening. Generally one just needs to open and accommodate this slightly too strong energy. And as the meditation deepens, it tends to smooth out. But sometimes it's a little unpleasant at this point.

Piti is one of the factors that's connected with the strengthening of concentration. It has a quality of happiness, and it's often paired with this word sukha, which I think I've mentioned before, which also means happiness. So together, the kind of enjoyment of the object and the growth of this quality of sukha or pleasure or contentment starts to lead into the second half of the factors, which are the calming factors.

So the fifth factor that appears is the factor of calm or tranquility. And the way that it comes about is as more happiness comes in through this bright energy connecting with the object, finding that delight, a certain satisfaction comes in just based on the meditation. Not based on having a particular experience or object or anything special, but just in the ordinary meditation, the mind starts to become contented. And because there's a quality of contentment, satisfaction, the mind is not tending to go out so much through desire, restlessness, aversion, and so on. So this leads to a sense of the mind starting to settle within itself, finding its contentment within its own operation. And that settling is felt as a calming of mind and a calming of body. It's as though the mind starts to settle within the body itself.

And this is often a kind of new discovery in the meditation process. This unfolding of calm doesn't happen so often in daily life and it's a new experience within meditation after often a lot of active thoughts and restlessness and other hindrances. So as this calm starts to develop, thoughts are no longer so frequently assaulting us. Hindrances are no longer so generally plaguing us. And because there's a sense of calm and the body can relax, there's usually less pain in the body as well.

So it's as though it feels like—and again, you felt this in the first weeks of the retreat—like you come in and the ocean, you're kind of on an ocean with a lot of stormy waters, right? The waters of the hindrances and thoughts and bodily discomfort and restlessness and quite turbulent. And then maybe just for short periods and maybe just for five minutes, ten minutes, this other space opens up where you feel like you've kind of floated into a really calm harbor somewhere, out of the storms of the sea into this calm space. May not last very long, but it's a really different kind of experience.

Emily Dickinson has a poem that kind of expresses this movement, this discovery. It's a section from a poem called "Wild Nights": "Futile the winds to a heart in port. Done with the compass, done with the chart."

Rowing in Eden. That's kind of what it feels like. It feels like you've come upon this blissful lake for a while—perhaps only briefly, but you've touched it.

At this stage, one can start to open to a different approach to meditation, which is a sense of resting. One has opened to, discovered, unfolded a new quality that has a sense of stillness and rest in it.

Ajahn Amaro, a monk who used to live in Northern California and now serves as the abbot of Amaravati in England, likes to offer this meditation instruction: "Rest in the natural peace and ease of mind and body that is the natural peace and ease of mind and body, and pay attention to that. But if something comes to disturb that peace, then pay attention to that." That's a lovely thing to be able to do, and you can take it as an encouragement, as an instruction anytime you'd like.

Joseph gave that instruction early on in working with the breath: "As I breathe in, I tranquilize the bodily formation. I tranquilize the mental formation. As I breathe out, I tranquilize the bodily and mental formations." So we can make this quality of calm more accessible by suggesting it to ourselves.

Sometimes when this quality of calm comes, it seems like it has snuck up on us, and we may not recognize it. One meditator said that her first note was "calm"—like, is this what they're talking about? She couldn't quite recognize it when it first came.

Because it's a subtle state, it can slip under the radar. Often people will come into interviews and say, "I had really interesting things going on a few days ago. I was working with this pain in my chest and it was really opening. There were a lot of thoughts. I learned a lot about a relationship that I had in the past. But all that's over—there's nothing happening now." Often we overlook the fact that what's happening now is this quality of calm.

The Buddha said the state of peace was a pretty good state. But we often don't see it because it doesn't have the drama of the hindrances or a torrent of thoughts. So it's important to notice it and appreciate it. It really opens the doors to a new movement in meditation. It's the foundation for a lot of inner contentment and inner peace.

This then sets the stage for the unfolding of the next factor, which is the quality of concentration. As the mind settles within itself and is not sending itself out in desire for the future or regret about the past, its natural energy starts to collect. When the natural energy of the mind comes together and is unified, you discover that the mind is naturally strong. Its very nature is strength, and that strength is felt as stability—or you could say stillness.

Whereas calm might be a momentary and easily disturbed state, as it grows further into concentration, there's a sense that this concentration has a power. It has the power to be unmoved, unshaken by some of the normal comings and goings.

Thich Nhat Hanh used to come and teach at Spirit Rock before we built our retreat facility. We had a big open hillside that was like an amphitheater. We built a platform for him at the bottom of it, and about a thousand people or more—maybe fifteen hundred people—could sit on the hillside and listen to his teachings during these day-long events.

It was amazing to be in his presence. His voice was amplified, but we could see him across the hill. He was so still in his body and in his speech that he transmitted this quality of concentration to all fifteen hundred people who were watching. It was like a samadhi engine that was generating and filling the whole space. Over the day that he taught, you could feel everybody settle, settle, settle.

So concentration has this strong quality where you feel really grounded in the present moment. Even if thoughts come, they're seen in the present moment. It doesn't feel like they're going to knock you off your mindfulness. This is a very satisfying feeling. The mind being stable is a great relief—not being swayed so much by the hindrances, by past and future.

The Dalai Lama put it this way: "Inner peace is the key. If you have inner peace, the external problems do not affect your deep sense of peace and tranquility."

Concentration is a big part of inner peace. This factor of concentration, the stability of mind, also prepares the mind for insight. When things become still, then we can see clearly what's happening. In this place of peace and stillness, when an insight comes, it goes deep. Concentration is a beautiful ground for understanding.

Somebody can say something to us in our daily life like, "Body sensations are always changing," and we'll go, "Oh yeah, I've heard that before." But when you're in a concentrated place and you look everywhere in the body and you see every body sensation is changing, it affects your view of the body forever. It goes deep and it affects your relationship to life.

One of the things that happens in concentration is that pleasant things and unpleasant things don't have as much impact on the mind. Someone mentioned this in an interview the other day. They said that they were sitting, they were concentrated, they felt a strong sensation in the leg that normally they would have identified as pain. So from the stable attention of concentration, they looked at it more closely. And in that closer look, they couldn't actually see pain there. All they saw was a strong sensation that really had the quality of neutrality. It was intense, but it was basically neutral. This happens out of concentration. The pleasant and unpleasant things that come to us don't shake the mind so much, don't move us so much.

And this leads to the last of the factors of awakening, which is called equanimity. Equanimity is a state where we're not so thrown by the changing factors of pleasure and pain, and that gives the mind a lovely balance. You could call it balance, you could call it spaciousness, you could call it an openness that can include a lot of different things without being thrown off our centeredness.

In English, sometimes we hear this word equanimity and we think it means unfeeling, but it's not like that. When the mind has this quality of balance and space and openness, actually the beautiful qualities of heart can be felt more directly and more strongly. The strength of equanimity makes us much more open to loving kindness, to compassion, and to joy. So it doesn't become a colder place as equanimity develops. It becomes a warmer place. We have the strength to open, to feel those qualities.

So mindfulness starts the unfolding. The first set of factors are energizing. Then as happiness develops out of the energy, the mind moves into a settled state within itself that leads to the calm and concentration and strength that grows into equanimity.

As you meditate, start to notice as these different factors are arising. They may not last for a long time at first. They're all impermanent. When they come together well, that's kind of a peak experience. It's not something that's going to happen every sitting. But start to look for the balance. Look for the quality of presence or mindfulness, the factor of energy that makes for the alertness, brightness, and interest, and the factor of steadiness or calm.

Particularly keep an eye on the relationship between the energizing factors and the calming factors. It's this balance that is most important for keeping the mind in the kind of really sweet spot of meditation. If the energizing factors are too high, you'll feel a lot of bodily energy and restlessness and a lot of thoughts may dart around taking you into past and future. Then the counterpoint is to bring up the calming factors, maybe go back to a primary object like the breath, work with a spacious awareness on sounds, consciously relax the body.

On the other hand, if the calming factors get too strong and the energizing factors are low, this leads to the state that we call sinking mind. It can be very comfortable, very pleasant, you get a little bit drowsy, you could sit for hours, but the brightness of insight is not happening. So that needs the arising of the energizing factors. You can accomplish that by bringing up energy directly, the antidote to sleepiness, or start doing steady noting on changing objects. And that will wake up the alert, interested wisdom faculty of mind.

When these factors come together and into balance, then we are in the place where we can open to insight, open eventually to awakening.

I'll just close with these two quotes from the Buddha. "Bhikkhus, these seven factors of awakening, when developed and cultivated, lead to peace, to direct knowledge, to awakening, to nibbana. They are noble and emancipating. They lead the one who acts upon them to the complete destruction of suffering."

And from the Anguttara: "Whoever has been liberated, is liberated, or will be liberated in the future, all will do so by overcoming the five hindrances that stain the mind, by firmly establishing the minds in the four foundations of mindfulness and by cultivating the seven factors of awakening in their true nature."

Let's just sit for a minute together.

CHAPTER 41

Unentangled Knowing

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

> In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the spiritual journey from suffering to freedom through the lens of "unentangled knowing" - a phrase from Thai lay teacher Upasaka Ki. He explores how bondage arises through the chain of dependent origination (paṭiccasamuppāda), focusing on the crucial links between contact (phassa), feeling (vedanā), craving (taṇhā), and clinging (upādāna). Armstrong demonstrates how freedom can be found by resting in the gap between feeling and craving, where no reactive formations arise and no new self is born.
>
> Drawing from suttas including the Totality Sutta and teachings from the Saṃyutta Nikāya, he explains how our basic human situation involves constant contact at the six sense doors, each carrying pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral feeling tones. When mindfulness is strong enough to remain present without falling into greed, aversion, or delusion, we experience what Ajahn Chah called aspects of the unconditioned mind.
>
> The talk concludes with three practical approaches: checking our attitude toward experience (inspired by Sayadaw U Tejaniya), becoming aware of awareness itself, and recognizing the empty nature of mind. These methods shift focus from objects to the subject of knowing, offering immediate access to freedom that doesn't require special conditions - only strong mindfulness and the willingness to let go without grasping something new.

The spiritual life is about making a journey from a state which is subject to suffering to a state that is free and beyond the reach of suffering.

There are many different words that describe the bare reality of this suffering state. Sometimes it's called bondage. Sometimes it's referred to as states of clinging, grasping, attachment, or the generic overall term of samsara—wandering on through realms of being. This word samsara gives a sense of how deeply conditioned are the habits of mind that keep us in a state of suffering. It indicates how daunting a task liberation might be.

There are also many words that describe the awakened state: awakening, enlightenment, freedom, release, liberation, emancipation, nibbana or nirvana in Sanskrit. Our path is to take the journey from a state of suffering to a state of freedom.

Tonight I want to explore what the path is and offer some reflections on this quality of freedom. The subject of this talk is unentangled knowing.

This phrase comes from the Thai teacher Upasaka Ki, a lay woman who taught from the 1950s through the 1970s. She has a book I highly recommend called "Pure and Simple," which is a collection of many of her dharma talks. She was always very good at pointing to the heart of practice, turning her listeners back to the very central focus of the teachings and of liberation.

This phrase, unentangled knowing, appears in her work within a short verse: "An inward staying, unentangled knowing, all outward turning, cast aside." We'll return to this and explore it further.

For those who are not native speakers of English, "unentangled" is a rare word. To explain it: a tangle often refers to a ball of string or thread or yarn that's gotten all jumbled up, and when you try to pull it apart it just falls into knots. "Entangle" is the verb that describes that condition. "Unentangle" means to unthread or take apart the tangled bits that have all gotten jammed up together.

This word "tangle" is one that the Buddha often used in describing our state of affairs, our state of mind. He said, for example, "The world is smothered and enveloped by craving like a tangled ball of yarn." The idea is that our desires go in so many different directions and contradictory directions that they form a tangle in the world and in our mind.

There's a wonderful question from the Samyutta Nikaya. Someone has come to the Buddha and asked: "A tangle inside and a tangle outside. This generation is entangled in a tangle. So I ask of Gautama this question: who succeeds in disentangling this tangle?"

That's really us, isn't it? We are at work disentangling this tangle—the inner tangle in the work of purifying our hearts and minds. And that gives us the understanding to know how the outer tangle has been created. The Buddha's reply was that it was the one who developed sila-samadhi-panya—conduct, meditation, and wisdom—who disentangled the tangle.

In Upasaka Ki's language, unentangled knowing refers to a quality of mindfulness that doesn't get caught up in reactive formations to the experiences of the world that we contact, both outer experiences and inner experiences. It's a mindfulness that is fully present, fully aware, but is not caught up in or bound by the arisings.

We are all dropping into this state very often throughout the day in meditation practice. This is a state that's happening for us repeatedly. There are many moments of this unentangled knowing arising at this point in the retreat. We may not yet have taken the time to notice them.

I want to emphasize this quality of mind, encourage you to start to notice when it's arising in your practice, and especially to notice and feel the element of freedom that's there. Sometimes when the mind is in these free states—and we know they're temporary—we don't take the time or effort to notice the quality of freedom. If we start to notice it, it can really enrich our practice, motivate our practice, and bring a lot of interest and appreciation.

This is happening already with all the meditations you've been doing—meditations on breath, sounds, body, thoughts, emotions. Continue as you're doing, and notice the freedom that comes. Later in this talk I want to discuss three approaches to practice that focus on this unentangled knowing as their central feature.

But before we go into that, I want to talk about how bondage happens, because we can't really understand freedom fully until we know how we get caught, how we get bound.

The Buddha's central teachings are all about this question of how bondage happens and how release happens. The Four Noble Truths are one of the central pointings. There's another teaching where the Buddha went into more detail, which is called the Chain of Dependent Arising or Dependent Origination. There are twelve links to that chain, which could be a whole talk in itself.

We're going to focus on the experiential heart of the teaching. We're not going to examine the first four or the last four links. We're going to zero in on the central four links of the chain because they're very experiential. This is really where the heart of the question lies.

Before we get into that, let me pose a question: what is our basic situation as human beings? Whether we're meditators or people out in the world, what's the basic reality of life for all of us?

Because there's a reality we all share. We're going to die. We are going to die. That's in the future somewhere. What about here and now? What's our basic situation?

Things are how they are. And what are those things? Our basic situation is that experiences keep happening to us at the six sense doors, all the time. Whether you're enlightened or not enlightened, whether you're a meditator or a layperson, wherever you live in the world, as long as your six senses are uninjured, those things keep unfolding for us.

The Buddha gave one discourse that pointed directly at this called the Sutta on Totality. He said, "Listen monks, and I will explain to you the totality of life." He was not one given to modest pronouncements. And he said, "It is simply this: the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and sensations, the mind and mind objects. This is the totality of life. Anyone who would describe a totality beyond this would not know what they were talking about."

So we've said a few times—I think Joseph has said it—there are only ever six things happening, and these are the six, the objects of the six sense doors. Can you turn those off at will? No. When we fall asleep, we lose touch with them, but a loud sound in the middle of the night will wake us up, so there's some thread of consciousness still hanging out there, alert, able to be contacted.

But basically these six things, as long as we're awake and our senses are functioning, are coming to us all the time. They're impinging on us. They are contacting us. And so these elements are known in the Buddha's teaching and in this chain of dependent arising. These aspects of our experience are known as contact. There are six types of contact: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and mind objects. This is where we'll pick up this thread of dependent arising.

So we're constantly receiving these contacts. They are mixed in terms of their pleasure or pain. Some are pleasant, some are painful, some are neither. And that's the quality of feeling tone. Every contact has associated with it a feeling tone, or vedanā, and that's the next link in the chain of dependent arising.

This is a very important point. Why is the feeling tone so important? It's based on the feeling tone that desire and aversion arise. The pleasant feeling tone often gives rise to wanting. The unpleasant feeling tone often gives rise to aversion. The neutral feeling tone often conditions delusion—like, that's not important. That doesn't have enough charge to interest me, so I won't pay attention to that.

So the feeling tone is often the ground for the arising of these reactive formations of mind: greed, aversion, and delusion.

And then when we notice that we can't have it, and that we have to just let it go, there's a death there too. The hungry yogi dies. So there's suffering in the life and suffering in the death.

But let me give you an example that goes the other way. Say you're sitting in meditation and you have a really peaceful sitting. There's some lovely concentration, maybe some joy arising, and the mind notices this and says, "Oh, this is really nice. This is what meditation should be like. I'm finally getting it." And we take hold of that pleasant state.

In that grasping, we're born as a successful meditator. We have a new identity - I'm someone who can do this, I'm good at this practice. So that birth feels really good. We're happy to be the accomplished practitioner. But of course, in the very next moment, that concentration shifts or changes, as all conditioned things do. The pleasant state fades, and suddenly our identity as the successful meditator dies.

So even when the birth is pleasant, the death is unpleasant. This is why the Buddha said that wherever there is birth, there will be aging and death, and wherever there is aging and death, there will be suffering.

This is the heart of dependent origination - this process by which we continually create new forms of suffering for ourselves through our reactive relationship to experience. Contact arises, feeling tone arises, craving arises, clinging arises, and in that clinging a new self is born that will inevitably suffer and die.

The beautiful thing about understanding this process is that it shows us exactly where we can interrupt the chain. We don't have to go unconsciously from contact to suffering. We can learn to see the feeling tone clearly. We can notice when craving is arising. We can catch ourselves before we move into clinging. This is the essence of mindfulness practice - learning to see these links clearly so that we have choice in how we respond rather than being driven by unconscious reactivity.

It may not be profound unhappiness, but there's a subtle dissatisfaction present. Then, as you continue walking to another part of the building, the aroma fades, the craving dissolves, and your mind naturally returns to equilibrium.

This balanced state is what Upasaka Ki calls "normal." It's an amusing choice of words because it's certainly not normal in worldly terms. But from a Dhamma perspective, this is what she describes as a normal mind—a balanced awareness that remains free from entanglement in desire or aversion.

That example illustrated a mildly suffering existence. But consider instead those times when you sit and experience a truly beautiful meditation. The concentration feels effortlessly present. You rest naturally in the moment as mindfulness flows with strength and clarity. The hindrances remain dormant because awareness is so well-established. There's a profound sense of relaxation, comfort, and ease suffusing the body. You observe each moment with remarkable precision.

When you rise from such a sitting, you think, "That was extraordinary. I must share this with the teacher."

In this moment, something subtle has occurred. You've grasped hold of those beautiful meditative qualities—the concentration, the stillness, the ease—and claimed ownership of them in some way. This constitutes a happy birth.

But by the time you complete your walking period and return to sit again, everything may have shifted. Sometimes after such experiences, we hurry back to the meditation hall, eager to recapture that state. We settle onto our cushion expecting the same profound concentration, only to encounter physical discomfort, mental chatter, and emotional turbulence. "Where did my concentration disappear to?" we wonder with dismay.

Then comes the pain of witnessing the death of that happy birth.

When we cling to any experience, we generate a sense of selfhood around it. We either endure a painful existence followed by perhaps a happy ending, or we enjoy a blissful life followed by inevitable suffering when it passes. This is how clinging invariably leads to dukkha, just as the chain of dependent arising demonstrates.

For most untrained individuals, the mind knows nothing but this endless cycle of grasping. It exists in a habitual state of reacting to feeling tone, clinging to one experience until it loses interest, then immediately latching onto the next. It's like a monkey swinging through the forest—never releasing one vine until it spots where to grab the next. This represents the ordinary condition of human consciousness.

This observation isn't a judgment of anyone; it's simply our inherited conditioning, the way we've all been programmed to operate.

But as meditators, we have access to another possibility entirely. This is truly the heart of our practice: we can learn to let go without immediately grasping something else. We can release our grip without immediately forming new attachments.

As you know, this isn't simple. When Skye spoke about letting go, she illuminated just how challenging this process can be. Ajahn Chah once observed that roughly eighty percent of spiritual life consists of recognizing that you're holding on while feeling unable to release. This aligns remarkably well with my own meditation experience—it's often exactly what unfolds.

Yet sometimes we do discover how to let go, and no new clinging arises to take its place. This is where we encounter genuine freedom in the present moment.

We often conceptualize the spiritual path as an enormous journey, with descriptions of liberation only arriving after tremendously long periods of practice—one lifetime or perhaps many lifetimes of effort. Sometimes we forget that we can taste profound aspects of this freedom right here, right now.

When we recognize this possibility, it can tremendously energize our practice. The fruit of the path needn't wait many years to manifest—it can be witnessed in this very moment. This strengthens faith, deepens motivation, and builds conviction that the path is actually working in our lives. These immediate glimpses prove invaluable for sustaining our commitment to practice.

This is why learning to notice when these moments of freedom arise becomes so crucial.

What we're describing is the possibility of breaking the chain of dependent origination that typically leads from contact to suffering. We experience contact, then feeling tone—but must craving inevitably follow? When a pleasant sensation arises at any sense door, must greed automatically appear? When unpleasant feelings emerge, must aversion immediately take hold?

The answer is no.

When the mind remains present with its object and mindfulness possesses sufficient strength...

We don't have to move into a reactive formation, even though that feeling tone may be there strongly. This is where we find freedom in the chain, and this is what keeps us from moving on to suffering.

So more and more, our meditation is about opening to the pleasant, opening to the unpleasant, but not reacting from greed or aversion. Again, in worldly life, in normal life, the greed and aversion formations are usually accompanied by delusion, because we don't see what we're doing. That reaction is so instinctive, it's not seen and it's not questioned.

In meditation, we also see clearly. There is no greed, there is no aversion, so there is no delusion in that moment. So in the moment of no greed, no aversion, and no delusion—clear seeing—that's a description of a mind that's free. Temporarily, yes, but free.

So it's very helpful to start to look into the mind at this place in between feeling and before there's any craving and feel what that feels like and become familiar with that, because more and more that's where you find your sweet spot in meditation. One teacher said that the whole of the Buddhist path is about resting in the gap between feeling and craving.

This is available at any moment. It doesn't depend on special conditions. It depends on your mindfulness being strong, but anytime your mindfulness is strong, that is a possibility to rest between feeling and craving. And that resting is a place of some freedom.

Really what we're talking about is finding a place in that gap that's not determined by conditioned things. The impact of the six sense doors is conditioned, sometimes completely out of our control. We're all receiving pleasant and unpleasant contact alternately, but our response can be unaffected by the conditioned things around us. Ajahn Chah called that an aspect of the unconditioned mind, the mind that is not bound by external conditions.

And I'd like to read a little bit from Ajahn Chah on this. It's a little long, but I hope you'll stay with it because there's a lovely expression in this.

"The Buddha talked about conditioned and unconditioned things. Conditioned things are innumerable, material or immaterial, big or small. If our mind is under the influence of delusion, it will proliferate about these things, dividing them up into good and bad, pleasant and painful, liked and disliked. Why does the mind proliferate like this? Because there is still the belief that all these things are oneself or belong to oneself.

The tendency to conceive things in terms of self is the source of happiness, suffering, birth, old age, sickness and death. This is the worldly mind, spinning around and changing at the directives of worldly conditions. This is the conditioned mind. Not knowing these things, the mind doesn't see the Dhamma. Not seeing the Dhamma, the mind is full of clinging. As long as the mind is held down by clinging, there can be no escape from the conditioned world. As long as there is no escape, there is confusion, birth, old age, sickness, and death. This kind of mind is called the conditioned mind.

The unconditioned refers to the mind that has seen the Dhamma, the truth of conditioned things as they are, as transient, imperfect, and ownerless. When we know conditions as neither ourselves nor belonging to us, we let go of conditions and attain the Dhamma. We enter into and realize the Dhamma. When we attain the Dhamma, we know clearly."

So we have that possibility of realizing the Dhamma in relationship to the changing conditioned things at the six sense doors.

What is it like resting in that gap? You could say that resting in that gap means we're not taking birth. Not taking birth, we're not subject to death in this moment-to-moment kind of living and dying. So that is described as a place where we're not turning into a new self or a new I.

This is from the Sutta-Nipāta. There was a chapter where a number of Brahmin youths all came to visit the Buddha, and each youth asked him their own questions, and the questions were collected into this one chapter. This is a youth named Todeyya. And Todeyya asked, "For one who is freed, what is that liberation like?" Wouldn't you like to ask the Buddha that? What does it feel like to be you, to have your mind, to have that freedom?

And the Buddha said, "The sage is without desire. He has nothing. He is unentangled in becoming." Becoming is this process of taking birth again as a new self. "The sage has nothing and is unentangled in becoming." That means he hasn't taken ownership at the six sense doors.

Ajahn Chah put this non-becoming in terms of a hall where he was giving a talk. He was giving a talk probably in an open-air sala in Thailand that had basically a roof, a floor, and pillars, but open walls. And he said, "When you look at this hall, the roof is a becoming. Something has taken birth there."

You could take a stand there. The floor is a becoming—it's something constructed, you could take a stand there. But the space that's in between the floor and the roof? You couldn't take a stand there. He said there's no becoming there, and that's what's called emptiness. And he said, to put it bluntly, we say that nibbana is this emptiness—this state of resting between feeling and craving, where a new self is not being born.

Ajahn Chah says this is the place of peace, this deathless place, uncreated, unbecome. It's deathless because no birth is taking place. No birth means no death will take place. And it's always available. It's not that special conditions are needed for it. It's always potential for us.

The Buddha made an interesting comment about the deathless in another sutta from the Samyutta Nikaya. He said that our path, the path that we're walking, has the deathless as its ground, its destination, and its final goal. So when you think about that, the path that we're walking is going from suffering or bondage toward freedom. Does the path partake of bondage or freedom? Here, the Buddha is saying that the path has the deathless, freedom, as its ground. The path is founded upon the deathless. The path is built upon the goal.

In another sutta in the Anguttara, the Buddha says that merging in the deathless are all things. So all things are being supported, held by this deathless state. This becomes quite an interesting point. The mind that is balanced between feeling and craving, that does not fall into craving even though there's feeling, is residing in this place of deathlessness, of not taking birth—and that is the path.

So it becomes very interesting. Not only is it immediately, inherently free, but that furthers the freedom, that grows the freedom. The path keeps unfolding, keeps uncovering more and more of this freedom as we rest there.

Something that's happening when we make that shift is we are no longer staking our happiness on objects. We've given up clinging. We've given up trying to find a lasting happiness through the six sense doors. And something that helps this shift is that we turn from a main concern with objects to a greater concern with the subject.

So I want to talk in the second half of the talk about three approaches to our meditation that are based on this shift from focusing on objects to starting to take into account the subject. It doesn't mean we give up connecting with objects. The objects of the five physical senses are very good groundings for mindfulness in daily life. Even this looking at the subject involves some of the sixth sense door, looking at formations of the mind. So we're not putting away the practice that we've done so far. These are only suggestions of additional ways you might like to try if you find them helpful. The practice we've described so far is completely sufficient for you forever. But if you'd like to try these, they're also good practices.

The three that I'm going to talk about are a practice of checking the attitude, a practice of becoming aware of awareness, and a practice of noticing the empty nature of awareness. I'll talk about each of these.

In the last few years, a number of us have spent time with a Burmese teacher named Sayadaw U Tejaniya. He has a very refreshing approach to practice, which is not so focused on what we're paying attention to, but more how we're relating to what we're experiencing or contacting. I think you've probably heard Carol talk about his approach a few times in the retreat already.

One of his central practices is what he calls checking the mind. And he says, okay, you're relating to the breath, you're relating to sounds, you're relating to your body, whatever your meditation object is, that's fine. But what I'm interested in is how are you relating to it? If you have a strong emotion in the mind, are you wanting it to go away? Are you wanting something else to be in its place? Are you noticing clearly what's there?

So his instruction is, while you're doing your meditation relating with thoughts and emotions and physical senses, also notice: is there greed, aversion, or delusion in the mind? Sometimes that's not so easy to see, so he has a simple checklist.

First question to check on greed: am I wanting something else to happen? So often you sit in your meditation—I wish I could be a little more still. You sit and think, I had that really beautiful metta opening yesterday, a strong feeling of love for my benefactor. I'd like to have that again. So we notice, I'm wanting something else to happen. This is the force of desire or greed.

Sometimes we look and the question for aversion is: are you wanting something to stop happening? Yeah, I'd like this pain in my knee to go away. I'd like this experience of fear not to be here. I'd like the restlessness in my body to calm down.

So if we want something to stop happening, that's a sign of aversion. And the third one, delusion, he treats very simply for this level. There are many layers to delusion, but just on this checking, you ask, am I not in touch with what's happening?

Generally by the time we've asked this question we're back in touch with what's happening, so usually the answer to delusion is no. But often the answer to greed or aversion is yes. So he just suggests checking very often—it could be, in the beginning, four or five times a sitting. As the practice develops, it could be ten times a sitting, twenty times a sitting. As this practice gains momentum, this becomes the main place we look, more or less continuously.

And this is very doable. This is not unrealistic or impossible. Our main item of interest is: Is there greed in the mind? Is there aversion in the mind? Is there delusion in the mind in the way I'm relating to what I'm experiencing? This is a very, very interesting path to follow.

If you notice that there is greed, aversion, or delusion, then just become mindful of that. You don't have to make that go away, because that would be aversive. You just notice it's there, but the noticing shifts things. As you know, noticing these formations of mind makes a change in them.

Upasaka Kee puts it this way. Her teaching uses different vocabulary, but it has a really similar emphasis. She says, "Your awareness has to take a firm stance right at the mind in and of itself. When mindfulness is standing firm, the mind won't be affected by the objects of sensory contact. If mindfulness slips and the mind goes out latching onto things, troubles will arise. So you have to keep checking on this in every moment. There's nothing else that's worth checking on. Just keep checking: How am I relating? Am I trying to grasp at the changing factors of my experience?" If so, notice it as greed, aversion, or delusion.

This is the first of the three ways I wanted to talk about.

The second one is becoming aware of awareness. And here's where we make a very conscious shift from object to subject. Objects are known. What are they known by? They're known by some aspect of subjectness. Now, what is that?

In the Buddha's description of our experience, well, first let me say, Buddhism as a domain is interested in the experience of human beings. That's not true of every field. Physics is interested in interactions between physical objects. Chemistry is interested in the interactions between atoms and molecules. Earth science is interested in the formation of rocks. All those things are interested in objects. Buddhism is interested in human experience all the way through. That means that it's only interested in objects as they're known by a human subject.

So how do we know things? When you hear a sound, you recognize the sound as an object. In the Buddha's language, this is in the field of materiality because it's arising from a material object. But from the point of view of the teachings, the important thing is that it's arising in a human consciousness. This element of consciousness is a critical piece that in ordinary disciplines we often don't talk about. But in Buddhism, it's central.

So when you hear the sound, there are actually two aspects that we want to tune into. One is the sound itself, which has a fairly pleasant quality. It arises, it lasts a certain amount of time, and it fades away. But the second thing is you are conscious of it. Is that clear to everybody? We're conscious of that sound.

The way that I understand it is it's not like that consciousness is in you and the sound is out here, but rather when the sound arises, there's one experience, which is the sound and your knowing of it, which come up together. We can distinguish two aspects of the experience, but I want to suggest there's only one experience happening, which is your hearing of the sound.

So how can it be that there's this material thing called the sound and there's this knowing, which is of the mind, that's happening at the same time? That's kind of the mystery of our existence. Nobody knows how that happened. Science doesn't have a clue.

How that happens nobody does, but it does happen again and again and again. Or you might wonder, how can one thing have these two different parts? Well, if you take a look at this bowl, I could ask you: is it round or is it black? It's one bowl, right? But it has two aspects. It's both round and black.

So in the same way, when a sound arises, it's one thing, but it has two aspects. There's your knowing of it and there's the sound. So this knowing is what the Buddha called consciousness. The Pali word is viññāṇa.

When we start to take that into account in our practice, it starts to shift things. We come into meditation generally from this worldly perspective where we think the world is made up of objects. Yeah, the world is made up of earth and cars and dollar bills and women and men and parents and Britney Spears and Paris Hilton, all that stuff. That's not what the world is made of. The world is made of our consciousness of all those things, because it's only through our consciousness of things that we have the possibility of finding freedom in relation to them.

So consciousness is one of the five aggregates. It's in the fourth foundation of mindfulness that Sally talked about the other night. And we can make it a focus for our meditation. We can make it a focus for our mindfulness.

So right now, let me just ask: do you know that you're conscious? Those of you who are asleep don't need to answer. But for everybody else, do you know you're conscious? Okay. Can you connect with that quality of—we could call it awareness or consciousness—and recognize it in this moment? Yeah. No? If it's difficult, I'll just say: remember what unconscious is like. Unconscious is like being asleep and you're not knowing any experiences. So in the moment, if you're having experiences, you're aware, aren't you? You're conscious. Yeah. Okay.

Rather than turning our attention to the objects that are filling our momentary experience—if your eyes are open at sights, if your eyes are closed you're hearing things, you're feeling your physical sensations—what if you turn your attention to this quality of awareness?

Let me suggest a way to kind of get into this. Let your mind just roam over the objects in the room or in your experience right now. If your eyes are open, they can just roam over your body and the sounds. If they're open, include the events of the room. Take a look around. Let your eyes just gaze and travel around and see interesting things and uninteresting things.

And now, instead of looking outward, take that quality of attention or awareness and direct it back toward where the seeing is happening. One way this is sometimes expressed is "become aware of your awareness," or it can be described as turning awareness back on itself, or it can be described as letting the eyes roll back into the head.

When you make that shift from the eyes wandering around or the senses wandering around outside and then coming to look back at the source of awareness, does it feel any different? You get a little shift in the way that feels? Okay, keep playing with it if you like.

What happens when we make that move away from outer objects and toward the inner seeing is to some degree we unhook from the objects. So it can be for some people—if it doesn't work for you, you don't have to do it—it can be a way to consciously let go. It can kind of consciously take our fixation off of objects. You know, it could be body sensations that we're fixating on because they're pleasurable or painful. It could be a sense of space in the room. It could be a sound. But we can unhook, look inward, and in that kind of let go.

Now, we can't, of course, really see awareness, because that's like trying to see your own eyes, which someone read Ajahn Sumedho talking about. He said, "I can't see my eyes, but I don't need to because I know they're working." So in the same way, we may not see the awareness so clearly—consciousness is a subtle object—but the very act of turning in that direction, being interested in the subject rather than the object, lets us stop clinging or stop being so fixated on objects.

I was taking a walk yesterday in the rain and walking down by the pond down the hill from here, and I just stood and watched for a while the raindrops falling in the pond and then making their ripples, one after another after another. And it struck me that that was a lot like the experience of contact that the Buddha talked about. Our awareness is just kind of open. And then there are all these sensory inputs just coming in and landing, coming in and landing one after another. The surface of the pond is very still if it's not being disturbed.

It can be disturbed by wind. It could be disturbed by rain. It could be disturbed by an animal swimming in it. But if it's not being disturbed, it's very still.

In the same way, our awareness has this ability to be very still and just let things land and touch it, land and touch it. They make a little ripple, but the ripple will die out really quickly unless we try to grab hold of it. Some of the things that land we get fascinated by - we grab hold of and fixate on. That's the way clinging works. But when we start to feel this receptive quality of awareness, we can simply let things land and ripple, land and ripple, and that mind can return to its basically placid and tranquil state.

When we're not clinging, we're not creating a disturbance. We're not taking a new birth. We're not leading into more suffering.

So if this appeals to you and you would like to play with it a little bit, then here's what I'd suggest: just try this exercise. Sometimes a visual cue is helpful, so have the sense that you can let your senses roam outside as much as they want. Become interested, and then at some point take the attention and turn awareness back on itself, or direct the attention inward to the source of knowing. Sometimes the phrase "aware of awareness" helps people connect with that experience. See if in doing that anything shifts in you.

If something connects and you want to practice with it as a practice, then these are the steps you could go through. Take a look back - in other words, become aware of awareness. Notice if anything shifts, and then just rest there. How long can you rest? Until you get distracted, until the mind gets caught up in thinking, proliferating, grasping onto something. And then when you notice it again, you can do the same sequence: turn the attention back on awareness, notice what the effect is, and then rest.

Upasaka Ki put it this way: "The mind that's aware of awareness doesn't send its knowing outside this awareness. Nothing can be concocted in the mind when it knows in this way." That's another synonym for grasping - making up from grasping. In other words, "an inward staying, unentangled knowing, all outward going knowing, cast aside." That is, the tendency of mind to look for its gratification through objects has been put down. And there's a contentment, an interest, a vitality in this turning to awareness itself.

When we turn to awareness, it doesn't block out any of the sensory arisings. Awareness is still there receiving them. But our attention is not fixated on the objects. And for some people, that gives a sense of greater space, greater equanimity. It's not for everyone. And again, if this description doesn't appeal to you, there's no need to take it up.

The last quote I'll mention in this section is another one from the French poet Paul Valéry, where he says, "I only refer to my pure self, by which I mean absolute consciousness, through which one turns loose from everything else." That's pretty good intuition for a non-Buddhist.

The third of these approaches that I wanted to mention tonight looks at the empty nature of this awareness. And I want to approach this by another question - a simple question. It is not a trick.

Do you have a body?

Do you have a mind?

It's not a trick. We all have a body, and because we're alive and breathing and walking, we all have a mind. If I ask you where is your body, it's really clear, right? It's here. Where is your mind? And to answer that, we have to know: what is your mind?

Somebody points to the chest. That's a good place to look. What is the mind?

When the Buddha talked about the sutta on totality, and he talked about the six kinds of things, he talked about the mind and mind objects. So mind objects we've talked about many times - as thoughts, emotions, meditative states, feeling, perception, intention. Those are all objects of mind. What's left that could be called the mind in this schema?

How about consciousness? Maybe consciousness or awareness is the mind. I'd like to refine it a little bit by saying that I want to call the mind that which is the source of consciousness, or more simply, that which knows. Other parts of what we call mind, like thoughts and emotions, those will be mind objects. But mind is going to be the organ that knows in this consciousness kind of way.

So in this sense, in this language - it's only language - consciousness is the activity of this thing we're calling mind.

Can you buy this temporarily as a hypothesis?

Is consciousness limited in space? Your consciousness, is it just around your body? Does it include the meditation hall? Does it include the grounds of IMS? Does it include the trees down the road? Does it include the stars? It's pretty unlimited, isn't it? It seems to be everywhere we turn. There's some consciousness happening.

So where is the mind? Can you find that which is the source of the knowing? Where does this knowing come from? It's tough, isn't it? I will encourage you to explore. You could ask questions like: does the mind have any shape? Does it have any color? Does it have any limit? Does it have any boundary? See what you come up with.

If you can't find it, that's also significant because it says it's empty—we could say it doesn't exist. That's a fine thing to say, but then what is it that keeps knowing? Knowing continues to happen, so in this language something like the mind is still doing that. So we can't find it, but it seems to function. All we can say is it's ineffable.

What if you let your attention kind of evaporate into that ineffable place? What if you let your attention release into that limitless, boundless, unfindable place of mind?

Connecting with the empty nature of mind can also bring in a sense of unhooking from grasping at phenomena. This is from the Buddha talking to his seven-year-old son who became a student after the Buddha's awakening: "Rahula, develop meditation that is like space. For when you develop meditation that is like space, arisen agreeable and disagreeable contacts will not invade your mind and remain. Just as space is not established anywhere, so too, Rahula, develop meditation that is like space."

As you let your attention kind of fill the vastness of this limitless space of awareness, there's a natural letting go of fixation, preoccupation and clinging to the individual comings and goings of contact.

I'll just close with another quotation from the Buddha. This is also from the Sutta Nipata in the dialogue with another Brahmin youth whose name is Kapha. So Kapha asks this question: "For one stranded in the middle of the lake, in the flood of great danger, overwhelmed with aging and death, tell me the island, dear sir."

And the Buddha replies: "Having nothing, clinging to nothing. That is the island. There is no other. That is Nibbana, I tell you, the total ending of aging and death."

Let's just sit for a minute together.

CHAPTER 42

Keys To A Long Retreat

Guy Armstrong · 58 min

> In this opening dharma talk for a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong offers profound guidance on how to approach extended meditation practice. He introduces the foundational attitude of 'relax, observe, allow' as a touchstone for the entire retreat experience. Drawing from the Buddha's teachings on saddha (faith/trust), Armstrong explores how we can place our hearts upon the essential purity within us—the seed of awakening that exists in every practitioner. He discusses the transformative power of settling back into the present moment, referencing how the Buddha's community appeared radiant because they had learned to abide fully in the now. The talk addresses the challenges of renunciation and simplicity that come with retreat life, drawing parallels to the traditional monastic requisites of food, shelter, clothing, and medicine. Armstrong emphasizes how this voluntary simplicity creates the conditions for the mind to settle naturally, allowing practitioners to see the basic tendencies of mind that usually remain hidden beneath our busy activities. He concludes with encouragement about the inevitable fruition of steady practice, quoting Bhikkhu Bodhi: 'The only requirements for reaching the final goal are two, to start and to continue.'

So in beginning the dharma talk tonight, I just wanted to mention something that Carol referred to last night, which is this is the 10th anniversary of September 11th, 2001, the bombing of the World Trade Center. I wanted to acknowledge for a few moments the significance of that event and this anniversary, because I know for everyone who lives in America, it has affected us profoundly. And I think probably for those of you from Europe or other parts of the world, it has affected you too.

So I think we all share in holding this event and this memory with a lot of sadness and also, hopefully, with a lot of compassion. Because I think the one way that we can use events like this in the deepening of our dharma practice is to let the pain of the world really touch our hearts and let the heart move into compassion evoked by what touches us from that situation.

Many of us, I think, probably knew somebody who was touched by that event, especially those of you who live on the East Coast. Sally and I were at home that morning—I think it was a little before 8 o'clock California time. We got a call from a friend telling us about it because we hadn't turned on the news that morning. Our friend said that she was on the phone to someone who was working at the World Trade Center when the first plane hit, and it hit their building. So that brought the reality of it home to us really strongly and just made me imagine what it must have been like to be in that situation.

And then we became aware, as you become attuned to this possibility, that life in America would never be the same again after an event like that, because our country had been pretty removed from war on American soil for a long, long time. And then you realize it's not like that for a lot of the world. So we start to use events like this to link to the experiences of other people.

I have a friend who has family in Sri Lanka, and she mentioned that people in Sri Lanka have been used to this kind of event happening for a long time. That was a shock to think about—that around a lot of the world, things like 9/11 happen almost as a matter of course.

Sally and I were in Mumbai a couple of years ago, and a friend there took us to the hotel where, after the terrorist attacks of 2008, the terrorists had hidden after they had killed a bunch of people in the hotel. We were walking across this beautiful white marble lobby, and our friend told us how after the attacks, when they had been able to go back in, that lobby was awash in blood. It was a shock because it was a five-star hotel—it used to be the Oberoi.

So this event links us to the pain of violence that takes place throughout the world. That can not only deepen our compassion, but also broaden it to help us realize something of our human vulnerability—that things like this have been happening forever across the world, and it really connects to our fragility and our exposure at any time. So that in itself is a painful but I think really worthwhile dharma reflection: that we share this tragedy with all those around the world who are touched by violence through all kinds of war or terror or physical violence in any form.

Then there's the question of how we respond. As practitioners, how do we respond to an event like this? One of the groups in California said that as they considered this question, they came upon what felt to them a very meaningful form of action. It's something that you all did last night, which was to restate their commitments to the refuges and precepts—to acknowledge where true refuge is in this uncertain world, and to restate our own personal commitment to non-harming and non-violence.

We don't know what the rest of the world is going to do. The rest of the world doesn't live by the five precepts. We can imagine what a different world it would be if everyone did, but we can. And in doing that, we make our own personal commitment to making this world a place of safety for everyone we come in contact with. So I found that a very beautiful reflection. And I love the fact that we will take the precepts regularly through this retreat and restate our own personal commitment to living in that way of non-harming.

The last thing that I think we can all take from this is to generate the intention—the intention out of compassion—to end hatred in our own minds. This is a real human possibility, and this is the purpose of our path, one of the purposes of the path that we're walking. To be able to show through our lives and through our dedication that it's possible to put an end to hatred, anger and violence within our own minds is, to me, a really inspiring direction and intention and statement. And that's what we're doing here.

I can't think of any more effective way to do that than to do what we are doing here for these six weeks and three months. So in a way, I feel this is our collective response to 9/11. This is our memorial of those events: to refrain from violence and to work to end hatred. I hope you feel that this is something you can personally feel connected to. I think it's where we're all aiming, and we can make it our conscious intention and really the gift of our community—one of the gifts of our community to this world.

So a long retreat is a very powerful thing to do. In my view, it's one of the greatest things that we can do as human beings. It has so many terrific benefits. It's wonderful to practice in some parts of Asia because there are whole cultures that revere this as the highest human activity. When I practiced in Thailand and Burma, I felt that. I received the support of the people there because they valued what I was doing as a monk as one of the highest things that a human being can do.

Of course, in our culture there's not that general understanding. What we're doing looks kind of weird from the outside. You're going to take your vacation time or three months of your personal leave and you're going to sit quietly and not talk to anybody?

It looks kind of out there. The closest thing I can relate it to is doing some extreme sport, like skiing off the top of a mountain or gliding in those suits across the mountain faces in the Swiss Alps. It's something like that.

I have a friend who used to be a Navy SEAL. We don't connect on a lot of cultural events. He's more into rodeo and hunting, and I'm more into sitting quietly. When I came back from Burma, I came back and my head was still really mostly shaved. And of course, I told him what I'd been up to. He wasn't so impressed by the shaved head and the taking of robes and eating one meal a day. That kind of stuff didn't impress him. But he was impressed by the fact that I sat still without moving for eight hours a day. He kind of got that that was a hard thing to do. He didn't understand the reason I was doing it, but he knew it was difficult. I could see my respect level went up a notch because of that.

But of course, if this was easy, everybody would do it. Because the benefits are so wonderful, but you know it's not easy. This is really a challenge. There are so many things that come out of an experience like this—things that I believe will guide you for the rest of your life. I feel that after a six-week retreat or a three-month retreat, many of you already know this, the development of qualities that come stay with you for a long, long time. Some of the specific experiences, meditative experiences won't, but some of the qualities that you build will. I'm thinking of things like equanimity, peace of mind, understanding, a degree of healing of old hurts and disappointments, opening to qualities of love and compassion, development of patience, and just overall the amount of freedom you feel in your heart and mind can stay with you forever to some degree.

So tonight I want to talk about how best to use your time here, because this is such a rare opportunity and one of so much promise and so much power. I want to focus on two aspects. We're going to talk in a lot of detail about how to practice mindfulness, so I'm not going to go into that so much tonight. But I want to talk about two things in particular. One is the attitude that we bring to a retreat like this. And the second is what it means to live in such a simple way with such a level of having given up or renounced so much of the world.

We will be giving you a lot of instructions over the next couple of weeks. We'll give a standard set of sequential meditation instructions. We'll refine them. We'll work with you through interviews and questions in the hall on more detail. But as you follow the different techniques, maybe even more important is the attitude of mind with which you approach them. It's possible to take hold of a technique, any meditation technique, and cling to it very strongly and go at it rather fiercely. This can have certain results—I'd say somewhat limited, but it can have certain results. But our approach is going to be to start from the very beginning talking about how you use the techniques and how you approach meditation in general. Because our trust is that if you come from the right place, it doesn't so much matter what technique you use—the retreat will unfold in a great way for you.

So we want to talk about this basic way that you move into meditation and how to do it most skillfully. One teacher expressed this approach or this attitude in three words: relax, observe, and allow. And I hope you can take these and work with them as something of a touchstone over the length of the retreat, because I can't think of a time when they're not useful. In a way, they kind of describe the whole of the practice. Relax, observe, allow.

So I want to talk about each of these just a little bit this evening. When Sally was giving the instructions this morning, she really stressed this factor of relaxation and how important it is. And by putting it first in this list, we also want to stress it. Relax means, as far as you can, you make the body soft and you make the mind soft. So however you can move into doing that—and of course you can't always relax completely, either the body or the mind—but to the extent that you can, we encourage you to start from there.

In the beginning of every meditation, even right now as you listen, you can practice with this a little. Let the body be soft. Let the mind be soft. That creates a kind of receptive and open attitude to your experience. Also, when we can relax, it sends a strong signal to the brain. It basically says to the brain, "You can chill. Things are okay. Things are all right. Nothing really has to be fixed because I can relax into the way things are. Things are okay just right now."

This is a very liberating place to come to in meditation—recognizing that we don't have to change anything. Things are okay. This quality of relaxing expresses a state of mind that's really central in the Buddha's teachings. In English we could call it a quality of trust. We can trust in this moment because we can relax and drop into it. Synonyms for this are faith or confidence. We can think of it as faith in the Dharma. We can think of it as confidence in ourselves. The moment is okay. I can trust it.

This term in Pali that we're translating as trust is saddha, and it literally has the meaning of "to place one's heart upon." So it's a way of saying, what can we place our hearts upon? There is something that we can have faith and trust in and have our own confidence in.

So what is that? What is that quality that we can have faith in? The world is uncertain. As we learned from this reflection on 9/11, the world is uncertain and things can happen to us at any moment. We can't necessarily place our faith in changeable external conditions. But maybe what we can place our faith in is the essence of our own heart and mind. That we trust that there is already within us some quality we might call the seed of awakening or the ground of awakening. This quality that the Buddha brought forth under the Bodhi tree on the night of his enlightenment. That seed, that potential is already in each one of us.

This says there is some kind of essential purity in each of our hearts and minds that if we let go into it, it will hold us. It will support us. It will carry us. It's almost like saying when we trust in that, the Dharma will carry us on this path. It's not that we have to force every step, but as we relax into this essential quality, which has a flavor of peace, then the Dharma can carry us.

I think of our practice in this way. We can't push our own unfolding, but if we relax and trust in it, the energy of the Dharma will carry us through healing, through difficulties, into understanding, into love and compassion and into awakening. The Dharma is there in each of us and will do its job when we ask it to, when we let it do that work.

I don't want to get too worldly about this, but you can kind of see this in good athletes. I love to watch tennis, and a lot of you probably know the last couple of weeks the U.S. Open has been on in New York, and there was a great semifinal match yesterday with my favorite current player, Roger Federer. I'm not going to tell you the outcome, because there may be one tennis fanatic who's taped it and is going to watch it when they go home, which I might do if I were in your place.

Federer is an amazing athlete and a great tennis player. If you watch him in the middle of a very intense match, he can go into relaxation in about one half of a second. He'll be running all over the court, high energy, sprinting, and then an easy shot will come along, a kind of easy volley put away, and his whole body will just settle, and he'll just do a tap. Right from the high voltage, immediately—tap.

When we are relaxed, our best responses come out of us. You'll see this in meditation. You'll see it in your own life. When we can relax and feel that trust, feel that confidence, then what comes out of us is the right response, the right movement.

Another way to talk about this is a phrase that Joseph uses a lot, and I love it because I find it very evocative physically. Joseph uses this phrase, "settling back into the present moment." You have this sense from the phrase of an attention that's been drawn out, kind of getting involved with activities that are happening outside, and the energy kind of moving out. As you feel into that phrase, it's like bringing the energy back into the body and settling it lower down. You get that sense of relaxing, calming and stilling because when we settle in, we still the body and that brings a kind of stilling of the mind. This phrase for me evokes a beautiful place of practice which has a quality of relaxation, peace and ease.

As we play with this factor of trust and the ability to relax, we find out the moment doesn't have to be perfect for us to relax. Sometimes we think, well, I can't really meditate right until all the aches are out of the body and the mind isn't distracted by random thoughts and I don't have any movement of aversion going. We don't have to wait for that. All the moment has to be is kind of good enough. Our average kind of moment is good enough.

So we start to learn that we can trust and relax in most of our moments. The more we do that, the more that flow of the Dharma can carry us. We don't actually have to do so much when we can relax into the moment.

So then the second part of this little formula is observe.

We relax, we're in the present moment. Observe means we get interested. What's happening? Okay, I'm relaxed, I'm in the moment, what's up? So this is the alert, you might say the slightly more active part of the meditation. We simply tune in: what's my experience in this moment? When we can get interested in that, then again, the meditation kind of takes care of itself.

This word observe sounds a little clinical or detached, so some synonyms are to pay attention, to be aware. This is really what's pointed to with the phrase "be mindful"—notice, watch, or one I especially like: feel. Feel your experience in this moment. Feeling brings you into closer contact than watching does. I like this word—feel the experience. This is really the quality of awakeness.

I'm sure you know that the word Buddha means "one who is awake." That was his central quality—one who is awake. So this is our awakeness, our entry into awakeness. When we get interested, then that interest and the energy of it starts to burn off the fog.

In the first days of retreat, usually there's a lot of fog. You may have come in from a busy life, maybe just a little tired when you get here. A lot of the sittings in the first couple of days can be very sleepy, drowsy, foggy, hard to see clearly. This interest starts to burn through that.

The other thing it cuts through is this kind of distracted tendency where we just wander off into past and future in our thoughts a lot, and we miss the present moment. We miss this contact.

There was a cartoon in The New Yorker I like a lot for this. It was in three panels about a guy's life and what he's thinking about his life. In the first panel, he's at work at his desk, typing on his computer, and the thought bubble is a picture of himself on the golf course. So he's not really with his work—he's thinking about being on the golf course.

The second panel shows him on the golf course, about to drive the ball, and the thought bubble above his head is a picture of his girlfriend without any clothes on, just to make it a little more energized. So he's golfing now, but he can't stop thinking about his partner.

The third panel is him at home, making love to his girlfriend, but the thought bubble is of his computer at work. So wherever he is, it doesn't fully satisfy. The mind is somewhere else. A lot of people live this way.

Our training is really to let us be fully with whatever it is that we're doing. We learn to be fully with something as simple as sitting and breathing, sitting and hearing, walking and feeling the earth, chopping vegetables, cleaning a toilet. When we learn to be fully present with that, it's much easier to go home and be fully present in things that are really compelling.

This is a training that goes on a long time and has lots of benefits. We learn not to drift off so much into thinking or fantasy or figuring it out or rehearsing conversations or analyzing. We're just awake here and now, and we feel the life of this moment. This has so many beautiful and beneficial qualities. It's so opening.

Somebody came and visited the Buddha and his community of monks and nuns during his lifetime. I think it was a king—I can't remember exactly, but I think it was one of the high-placed figures in the world at that time. The visitor was struck by the appearance of the community. Here they were living really simply. They didn't have the riches that he had or that the people in his court had. They were just eating probably one meal a day and wearing these simple robes.

But the visitor said, "Your community seems so happy. In fact, they look radiant. Why is that?"

And the Buddha replied, "They're radiant because they've learned to abide in the present moment."

This abiding in the present moment brings a great sense of lightness and relief, because the present moment is usually pretty uncomplicated, just like now. This is a pretty good present moment. We're in the company of like-minded people, and we're turning our attention toward the Dhamma. Your butt may be a little uncomfortable, or you may have an aching shoulder from apple picking.

This is not a bad moment, if we can just be here fully in this moment, and most moments are like that.

Henry David Thoreau, who lived just about an hour from here in a little hut near a pond called Walden in the 1800s, wrote: "I feel a little alarmed when it happens that I have walked a mile into the woods bodily without getting there in spirit. What business have I in the woods if I am thinking of something outside the woods?" This is a beautiful sentiment. When you go for a walk in the woods, you might think about that. Can we just be in the woods when we're walking in the woods?

One of the insights we get in Vipassana practice, which is actually really freeing, is that only the present actually exists. The past and future don't exist on their own. They're only thoughts if we call them up. It's not like the past is hanging out back there somewhere. It's gone. It's over. It's not like the future is waiting for us up there somewhere to arrive. It hasn't happened yet, and our actions in this moment will change it. So the past and future don't exist. All we have is this present moment. And that insight supports the concentration just to be here fully now.

So we come into the now with that relaxed observation. We start to tune in: How's the body responding? And then, how am I relating to the body? How's the mind responding? And how am I relating to the mind? How's the environment around me in this moment? And how am I relating to that? We're always feeling into both halves of this relationship. How's the world—my experience—and how am I relating to it?

This is where our meditation really takes hold, because especially we want to understand in this relationship: How is it that I suffer, and how can I free myself? In relation to bodily events, in relation to mental events—and when I say mental, I include emotional too, heart and mind together—and in relation to environment, other people, the world in general. We observe: How do I get caught? How do I get free?

So then allow. The third part of this attitude practice means from a meditative point of view, whatever happens, we let it be the way it is. We allow things to be the way they're coming through in our body, in our mind and heart, in our environment. Normally, this is not our natural habit of mind, just to say, "Oh yeah, this is groovy." Normally, we're wanting things to be a certain way and not be another way.

But part of wisdom is we start to see that everything that comes, comes from past causes and conditions. The present moment as it's arising right now couldn't be arising any differently. And so if we get in conflict with it, it's like being in conflict with reality. The present moment has happened because of many, many past conditions. Here it is. If we don't like it, who's going to win that fight—reality or us? Reality always wins. We'd like to have it be a certain way, but we can't affect that a lot of the times.

One of the practitioners at Spirit Rock, a student of Sylvia Boorstein, had a really nice comment. She said when somebody asked her how she was, she learned a skillful response. She said, "I couldn't be better," because that was strictly true. I couldn't be better in this moment, the way it's presenting itself. This is as good as I can be. If I knew how to be better, I would, but this is how I am right now and I couldn't be any better. What a great response. No matter how you're feeling, "I couldn't be better."

We start to see that this tendency to make things different is not just a random or occasional turn of mind, but it is a deeply conditioned habit that pervades our normal way of relating to the world. It's a little bit alarming when we start to see the size of it, the frequency of it, the unceasing style that it's in. What we're always trying to do in these different forms...

Our sense of self is always engaged in this activity—increasing pleasure and decreasing pain, moment after moment. As you start to get quiet on the meditation cushion in this quiet atmosphere, you'll begin to see these habits of mind over and over again. This current will become very familiar, this tendency to fix things. In the beginning, we might think this is just a minor little habit of mind, but it's not. It actually has profound implications.

You know this term samsara, I think. Samsara is the Buddha's term for how we've taken birth many, many times—countless times in the past, he says. We've lived lives, we've died, and then we've taken birth somewhere else to live another life and go through all the trials and ups and downs of that existence. We've died again and taken birth again. This is also called the wheel of cyclic existence. In the Buddha's teaching, this process of going through birth, life, death, birth, life, death goes on and on until we figure it out.

You may not believe in the rebirth image that he was pointing to, but in similar ways, we take birth through our many different modes of mind throughout a day, throughout a week, throughout the many years of our life—from being children to adolescents to adults. We take birth in different forms, and each of those has its own way of passing away. We can get that sense of the ongoing nature of birth and passing away, even in that model.

The Tibetans say that the motive force behind this wheel continuing is trying to correct. This energy to make things better is the motive force behind samsara. This is a big deal. So what if we stop trying to make things a little bit better? This is the function of wisdom—to stop just trying to make these little adjustments and go to the root. Then there's the possibility of coming out of samsara, and coming out of samsara means discovering nibbana, this place of peace that's not shakable, not conditioned.

That's why this allowing comes to be so important. It's really the entryway into peace. We don't have to struggle with the way things are when we develop this capacity to allow them to be.

Now I want to say that I'm talking here about the inner attitude in meditation. This is not meant to apply as a blanket statement to life in the world. In life in the world, sometimes we need to take action. It doesn't mean allowing everything to be when people are being harmed, when things are being done that are not right. But in our own inner relationship, this is how we can discover peace in our own hearts and minds.

You can see this in people like the Dalai Lama, who spent basically sixteen lifetimes perfecting this practice. Someone asked him, "You have so much responsibility. Things are so difficult for the Tibetan people right now. How do you stay cheerful?" And he answered, "It's my profession." It's our profession, too. Our profession is to stay cheerful, all of us here. I hope you'll find that in this retreat and discover how to do that—that this is part of all of our potential.

One of the great supports for being able to open in this way is the lack of busyness here. It's really the simplicity of this life that lets us relax. We're not being constantly bombarded by requests from friends or from work or from partners or from children or from parents or from the world. In that lack of stimulation, we can just let the mind settle. And if we let it, it will settle. This tendency of relax, observe, allow leads to settling. We create the simple environment for the mind to be able to settle into itself, to find calm and a natural kind of peace.

But in coming into this really simple environment, we create another problem, which is all the things we leave behind. It's not easy to leave behind your friends and your home and your preferences for food, the internet and your Facebook account and your family and your television and your bookshelves—all of that you've given up to be here. That's not an easy thing to do.

The Buddha talked about this quality of—you could call it renunciation, simplicity, letting go—as one of the ten paramis, one of the ten beautiful qualities to develop on the way to awakening. But he also talked about the sorrows that come with this life of renunciation. Moving into retreat, it seems to me that often we go through a period of homesickness. As we adjust to living our life here, making our life here, we go through a letting go of the things that we've left behind that has pain in it. It's not easy to say goodbye to the things that made up our outside life.

As we're going through this adjustment and settling in for a long retreat, many different emotions come up for people in this transition. I just want to name some of the common ones that are happening at this stage, often for people.

There can be an excitement about being here and starting this big adventure. There can also be an element of nervousness, not knowing what's coming, or even a fear. I remember starting one long retreat at the Forest Refuge. I was getting instructions on work meditation on the opening evening, sitting in a chair in the dining room, when all of a sudden I was gripped by this fear. I thought, what have I gotten myself into? And that fear lasted for about half a day. It was still there when I woke up overnight, still there as I went through the morning meditations. I was just kind of gripped by this fear. And then I just kept practicing, and it went away.

So don't worry if there's some nervousness or fear. Watch it. Relax, observe, allow it to be there.

Other feelings people often have at this point: feeling exhausted, coming from a busy life; feeling inspired by the beautiful potential that is in this form; a sense of self-doubt—I don't know if I'm capable of this; or a sense of regret—Why did I sign up for this course? Where's the exit line here? Or you might feel very confident—I can do this. I can be with my experience. I can make it through and I'll grow and learn. There might be a sense of loneliness, a sense of depression—It's so hard. Or it might be a strong sense of determination—I don't care what comes. I'm going to just put one foot in front of another and meet it directly and deal with it as it comes. I can do this.

This is from Thoreau in Walden: "I went to the woods because I wished to live deliberately, to front only the essential facts of life and see if I could not learn what it had to teach me, and not when I came to die, discover that I had not lived."

So in living with these essential facts of life—sitting and walking and eating and sleeping and being in community—we really learn how to live in so many ways. And I think you will feel that when you've been through a retreat of this length. Many of you know this: that you have something with you that will also be there at the moment of your death. In many ways, you could say our whole path is preparing us for that moment. And learning to live and learning to die are not so different.

So the Buddha talked about the challenges of the renunciate life, but he also said that the way to overcome them is to develop the joys of the renunciate life. Because this style of life opens up levels of happiness that we never knew were possible from a busy daily life, at least for most of us. There are levels of stillness and peace and love, wonder, awe, compassion and insight that for me were totally new to discover in meditation that I hadn't touched outside. And all that potential is opened up by the simplicity of the life we're living here. It's really beautiful when that starts to unfold.

We appreciate this quote from the Buddha, from the Dhammapada: "If by renouncing a lesser happiness, one attains to a happiness that is greater than the wise pursue that happiness, which is greater." And that's what a retreat like this is for. There is happiness in daily life, but the possibility is that there's a greater degree of happiness here, one that can truly satisfy. A lot of times the happiness of daily life is beautiful, but kind of fleeting, and it changes. And here we find the possibility, we start to glimpse the possibility of a satisfaction that doesn't go away.

So I want to talk a little about the details of this renunciate life that we're all involved in. Here we've also left our homes and our familiar places. The basic spirit for all of us in the renunciate life is to accept what's offered. And in the life of a traditional renunciate, this is in the area of what are called the four requisites, the things we really need to live: food, shelter, clothing, and medicine.

Those are fairly simple here. The food will be offered three times a day. The lodging has been provided—a fairly simple single room for each of you. The clothing is just what you've brought with you.

And the medicine will be whatever you need. The office will help you take care of that.

In Asia, you really get the flavor of this kind of simplicity. Most of the monasteries I practiced at, we ate only one meal a day in the morning. If you haven't had a red fish curry at 8 a.m., you haven't really lived. Then that would be it for twenty-four hours.

In Zen, they put it this way: the mouth of a renunciate should be like a furnace that can burn the finest sandalwood or dried cow dung with equal ease. So there won't be dried cow dung on the menu, I can assure you. But there may be things you don't like, so you just think of it as fuel. It's okay.

At Spirit Rock, the cooks put up a sign that says: "When we prepare a delicious meal, that's our practice. When we prepare an undelicious meal, that's your practice." So please hold it in that sense.

We make a commitment to noble silence. We don't get in touch with our friends and family outside. We don't communicate with the other yogis who are here. If you have to write a letter, the office can help you with envelopes and stamps. Just do what is really necessary, please.

We give up reading. We give up journaling. Just part of the simplicity to keep the mind out of the realm of concepts. We want to keep the mind in the realm of direct experience.

And of course, there's a whole new level of renunciation in about the last five years with smartphones, tablets, and netbooks. Because then it's like you're never out of touch. So email, texting, instant messaging, contact through the web, Facebook, Twitter—all this stuff, sometimes it's really hard to leave behind. It's not so hard for people my age, because we didn't grow up with it. But for young people, it can be really hard to unplug because this frequent, incessant contact can become pretty addictive.

Nielsen is an American company that used to measure how many people watched a television program. Well, now they measure a bunch of other stuff, including internet usage and texting. Nielsen did a study and reports that teenagers, on average, send and receive over one hundred text messages a day. Teenagers—that's hard to give up.

So we teach a young adults retreat here, and one of the main teachers is Rebecca Bradshaw. She wrote me an email last year and said that young people on retreat seemed more afraid of the silence and solitude than in any other year. When they unplug, they report feeling a lot of fear of the emptiness.

So this may happen as you unplug. We really ask you to do it—to unplug from your smartphones and texting and instant messages and web and so on. And there may come kind of what feels like a loss of identity in this. That's okay. You can let go of that identity. You'll find a new identity here that's not so dependent on continually connecting with other people. That's where our independence and freedom comes from. But it may be a little bit of discovery. It's a little bit like Descartes has been updated. Descartes said, "I think, therefore I am." The new one is, "I phone, therefore I am."

So feel free to give your cell phone or smartphone to Elizabeth. She will guard it safely and won't send any spoof emails on your account.

In addition to not communicating with friends and family back home, please don't communicate with one another. It may seem innocent, it may seem minor if you're the communicator, but when that lands in the mind of someone who has gotten still over a few days or a few weeks or a few months, a communication can go off like a bomb. And I have seen when a yogi writes a critical note to another yogi—it might be something as simple as "Please don't wear that rustly jacket into the meditation hall. Remember the manager asked us to wear silent clothes?"—and they're always signed "Metta, a fellow yogi."

But when that lands and your heart is open, you just feel like the world has turned against you.

Continue beautifying this talk (part 9/10). Maintain the same tone and style as previous parts.

And it takes people days to recover from a note like that, from criticism that comes from a fellow yogi, because it breaks down the sense of safety and trust. We all go through this incredibly delicate process of opening here because of this field of trust. It's a great gift that we give one another in not violating that container of silence and trust that holds each of our open hearts. It's such a big thing.

If there's a problem with another yogi, please tell one of us. We will confer among ourselves. We know either you or the person you're talking about. We'll figure out how to work with it. But please bring any problems to us and let us handle them. Please don't communicate with another yogi, especially critical things, but even friendly things. It's just simpler if everybody can be in their own experience.

Communicating by gesture, by movement, by walking near someone, sitting near someone, eating near someone can all be forms of communication if that's your intention. Please just be simple. Stay in your experience, let others stay in theirs.

We don't say don't make eye contact because that feels a little too frozen to us. It's not that you shouldn't make eye contact because sometimes looking at other faces in the middle of a retreat brings a lot of caring and a lot of compassion. My heart's been opened many times being on retreat and feeling into where my fellow yogis are. You'll develop really close bonds with people.

So looking at people's faces is not forbidden, it's not prohibited, but don't use it as a way to try to engage them in a connection or a relationship. Let each person have their own space. That will really support their practice and your practice.

The purpose of all this living simply is so that the mind becomes kind of bare. When we're not involved in outer activity, we see the mind's basic nature so clearly. It's like in another month, when the leaves start falling off these trees, then you'll start to see the outline of the limbs. The limbs are there, right? But you can't see them now because they're all covered over by the leaves. As the leaves fall, you start to see what supported them. You start to see the limbs.

In the same way, when our outer activities fall away, we see the tendencies of mind that are behind them all. That's really what we're here to see—those tendencies of mind. So let that bareness come to you.

This is from T.S. Eliot: "Quick now, here, now, always, a condition of complete simplicity, costing not less than everything, and all shall be well, and all manner of thing shall be well."

I love this—a condition of complete simplicity. Anytime we come completely into this moment, that's where we're at. We're in a condition of complete simplicity, just open to what is, nothing extra added. What does that cost? Not less than everything. That means basically letting go of our past and future. That's what identity is built on. Coming into the present, inhabiting the present, we come into our true self, our true richness, our true fullness, letting go of identities that aren't quite real. We find a real identity, a real self in that experience.

So what can we trust in this process and in this part of our journey? At home, we might trust in our thoughts. In the beginning of the retreat, we might trust a lot in our thoughts. When I first sat a long retreat, I figured, "Well, I'll think all I want, and eventually I'll run out of things to think." Never happened. Six months in, I was still finding plenty to think about.

So you might as well give up the thinking now as far as possible. Not so easy, but when you have a choice, you can give it up now because what we really want to trust in is not so much this conceptual mind that turns things over and tries to figure it out. You want to trust in your intuition. It's the intuitive knowing that brings breakthrough insights, that discovers new ways of seeing things, that discovers new ways of understanding the world and ourselves. This intuitive insight operates best out of silence.

So let's say there's a problem in your life that you'd really like some guidance with from your deep meditation. Rather than trying to figure it out while you're sitting, trust in this quality of quieting when you have the choice.

Trust in the quiet. Let that take your whole awareness into what I would call a deeper level of your being. You come from a deeper place, a more intuitive place, a more integrated place, a more heartful place. It may come from your gut. It may come from your heart. It doesn't so much come from your head. That is the place where some of the difficult problems of life can get understood. But it comes more through intuition than through concepts.

This is from Walt Whitman: "There is that in me. I do not know what it is, but I know it is in me." This is our awareness, our intuition, the beautiful riches that are there.

And this is from W.S. Merwin, who until recently was the poet laureate of this country, lives in Hawaii and is a beautifully spiritual person. In one of his early poems, he made this comment: "Now all my teachers are dead except silence."

Silence is always a teacher for us. Trust in the silence, listen in the silence, open in the silence.

I'll end with this quotation from Bhikkhu Bodhi, one of the great American teachers and translators: "Liberation is the inevitable fruit of this path and is bound to blossom forth when there is steady and persistent practice. The only requirements for reaching the final goal are two: to start and to continue. If these requirements are met, there is no doubt the goal will be attained. This is the Dhamma, the undeviating law."

So you've started. All you have to do is continue.

At the end of our talks during this retreat, we like to just have a minute or so of quiet to let the words settle. So this evening, we'd like to sit together for a few moments in quiet.

[Silent pause]

The only requirements for reaching the final goal are two: to start and to continue. This is the Dhamma, the undeviating law.

Thank you for your attention on this first night—not the easiest time to pay attention. We have forty-five minutes now for walking meditation on the schedule. The last sit will be at 9:15, and we'll begin with a period of chanting that James is going to lead. I really encourage you to come to it. James promises it won't be as long as it says on the schedule tonight, so you can come, learn the chant, and you won't have to stay until ten o'clock. If you have some energy, I hope you'll come give a listen. It's a beautiful and uplifting chant.

So lovely to see you here. Thank you for your apple picking and other good work this afternoon. I hope you enjoyed connecting with one another. We look forward to seeing you in the morning. Please rest well.

CHAPTER 43

Working with Difficult Emotions

Guy Armstrong · 1h03

> In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong addresses one of the Buddha's core teachings: understanding suffering fully. He focuses on the second type of dukkha we encounter in meditation—emotional pain or mental suffering—drawing from the third foundation of mindfulness in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), cittānupassanā (mindfulness of mind).
>
> Armstrong explains that while the Buddha taught about suffering and its cessation, on retreat our suffering simplifies into three main categories: physical pain, emotional pain, and meditative frustration. He explores the "84,000 afflictive emotions" described in Mahāyāna teachings, showing how these states are connected to time and our relationship with pleasure and pain. Using a framework of past/future and pleasant/unpleasant, he identifies four primary emotional patterns: grief (pleasant past), anger (painful past), desire (pleasant future), and fear (painful future).
>
> For each difficult emotion, Armstrong teaches a three-part approach: recognizing bodily sensations, understanding the mental mood or flavor, and identifying the underlying storyline or belief that sustains the emotion. He emphasizes that naming these states—simply recognizing "this is anger" or "this is fear"—can be transformative, as research shows this alone helps with emotional regulation. The talk includes practical guidance on developing an allowing attitude toward difficult emotions, understanding their impermanent nature according to the three characteristics (tilakkhaṇa), and finding freedom through mindful relationship rather than elimination.

The Buddha said often that his teaching was only about two things: suffering and the end of suffering. In regard to the first, he said that our job is to understand it—to understand it fully.

When we consider this in the context of our daily life, this task can seem complicated, unending, a little overwhelming. We look around at our friends and family and may feel something similar because we may have people in all sorts of different difficulties and life situations. We ourselves may have been in very difficult life situations.

It's not uncommon that we have a friend who has become addicted to drugs, or one of our children, and we don't know how to reach them to move them out of that. Or we may be bringing up a family and lose our job, and our home becomes in jeopardy with all the foreclosures that are happening. That situation seems overwhelming.

We may find as we look around society that there are different currents that seem unworkable. The political polarization happening in this country and around the world today seems almost insoluble. The difficulties of violence in all its forms—racism and injustice and the suffering of poverty all around the world. What do we do? How do we understand that? It's very difficult.

But when we come on retreat, the situation becomes simpler and the suffering becomes workable. This is one of the beauties of life in retreat because we can leave behind some of that complexity.

As I come into retreat, suffering comes down to basically three things. One is physical pain. I'm sure you all have experienced that, felt that, know that meditation isn't able to solve it in all cases, but it can help us learn to relate to it. So a very frequent source of suffering in retreat is our reaction to physical pain. This is a good learning ground because it will be with us in our life as well.

The second kind of suffering is emotional pain or mental pain. There are so many different varieties here: qualities like desire and wanting, longing, yearning, hatred, aggression, despair, depression, jealousy, loneliness, envy, pride, sadness, grief, sorrow, embarrassment, shame, guilt, confusion. There are more, right? We're vulnerable, aren't we? And we all know all of these.

In the Mahayana teachings, these are described as afflictive emotions. That's a nice term because when these states assail us, we are afflicted by them. We suffer on account of them. They cause us pain. In the Mahayana descriptions, there are said to be 84,000 of these states. But those texts were written 2,000 years ago, and life has gotten a lot more complicated since then—there must be at least twice that many now.

All these different forms of emotional pain come to us in our daily life and also here while we're on retreat. For most of us, I think these are the most common and probably intense forms of our personal suffering—the different kinds of emotions that visit us. This is really what I want to talk about: how to work with these difficult and afflictive emotions, sources of so much pain in our life here and outside.

Then there's a third kind of suffering that we have as meditators that normal people in daily life don't have. We're very privileged, you could say, to have this third kind of pain, and that is the pain of meditative frustration. We sit down, we direct the mind to be present, we pick up our anchor. Does it stay there? No, of course not. So it wanders off. When it comes back, we often feel some degree of disappointment, discouragement, frustration, anger, self-judgment—all those things that we are subject to because we've taken a meditative path.

If you were to go ask the person on the street, "Did your mind wander much today?" First, they wouldn't know what you were talking about, and second, if you explained it to them, they really wouldn't care. So as meditators, we have this third kind of high-class suffering, which is the suffering of the wandering mind.

But it's primarily the difficult emotions that assail us that are most of the suffering in our human life. So that's what I want to talk about.

The beautiful thing about mindfulness practice is that it gives us very immediate tools to begin to relate to these states. In the long run, the promise is that they can be uprooted through the different stages of awakening and be completely removed from the mind.

The Buddha said that they are cut off like a palm stump, no longer subject to future arising. But that is a very high level of attainment. And if you aren't an arhat yet, you wouldn't be familiar with that. I'm not familiar with that.

So for us, for a long time in our spiritual practice, we're not going to be rid of these states. I used to think that was really disappointing. When I began meditation, I thought, "I'll clear this up in a few years." It didn't work that way for me. But you never know. I'm not saying what's going to happen for you. You never know.

I had to take a different approach, which was to learn how to find some freedom in relation to these states when they came. That is possible. It is possible for all of us and all of you who have this level of commitment to find that through the practice of mindfulness and its supporting factors. So this is what I want to talk about tonight—how we develop that kind of freedom in relationship to these difficulties.

As we explore the range of mind through meditation, we find out we don't really have to be afraid of what we're going to find there. When I came into meditation, I really was afraid of my emotions and the range of them. But just having observed them and survived them for many years, most of that fear has gone away, and this is possible for all of us.

This is from Pema Chödrön: "In all kinds of situations, we can find out what is true simply by studying ourselves in every nook and cranny, in every black hole and bright spot, whether it's murky, creepy, splendid, spooky, frightening, joyful, inspiring, peaceful, or wrathful. We can just look at the whole thing."

There's a lot of encouragement to do this, and meditation gives us the method. So this is part of our project here on retreat, part of the work of each one of us. The more fully we're able to take it up, the more freedom will unfold within our experience, even before we're enlightened. There's a great deal of freedom available even before that effect of enlightenment.

This area, in working with mind states, traditionally comes under what's called the third foundation of mindfulness in the Satipatthana Sutta, which is the mindfulness of mind. The word that's used for mind, the Pali word, is citta. It's spelled C-I-T-T-A, and it's pronounced "citta." So this is the realm of cittanupassana, mindfulness of mind.

To be sure we're on the same page, this word citta doesn't refer to mind as just the thinking mind, but it refers to mind as the thinking and feeling mind both. One word in Pali refers to what we might call heart and mind. So we're talking about the emotions as well as the thought process when we use this word citta.

Sometimes we'll call it heart-mind, and sometimes we'll talk about getting in touch with our heart. Sometimes we'll just use the word mind. Tonight I'll probably mostly just use the word mind, but I want you all to be clear I'm talking about heart and mind, emotions and thoughts together. I'm not separating them. The Buddha didn't separate them so much.

This is understood in Asian countries as well. If you go to a Buddhist country and you ask a person where their mind is, they tend to point to the center of their chest. If you ask someone in the West, "Where's your mind?" they'll normally point to the head. That's not true in Asian countries. They'll point to the center of the chest.

There's a nice little story about this. You know, there's been a lot of interest lately, a lot of research in neuroscience on the effects of meditation. And you don't need to have neuroscience to prove to you the effects of meditation because you know it firsthand. But in this culture, scientists really are the high priests. And there's a lot of the population that will only listen to something when the high priests say that it's actually true. So it's very helpful for getting the Dharma out to a wide audience that the scientists validate through their research the effects of meditation that you know for yourselves firsthand.

One of the foremost researchers in this field is Dr. Richard Davidson, who teaches at the University of Wisconsin in Madison. He was really a pioneer of this whole field. What he may not tell his colleagues, but is true, is that he was a vipassana meditator before he was a neuroscience researcher. His motive for doing the science was to give this empirical validation of the effects of meditation that he already knew. There's a nice connection between him and this community. He's helped us on retreats here for scientists to introduce them to meditation.

Richie is the one who did the groundbreaking experiments with the Tibetan monks, where advanced practitioners would enter these MRI machines and they'd look at the activity of their brains and discover that they were kind of off the charts in areas like compassion and stillness and meditative states of concentration.

The Dalai Lama invited Richie to India, to his home in Dharamsala, to demonstrate some of this research to the Tibetan monastic community. It wasn't practical to transport an MRI machine—those things are bigger than a station wagon. Instead, Richie brought scaled-down scientific equipment consisting of a leather cap fitted with rows of electrodes. The electrodes touch the scalp at many different points, connected by wires that trail from the back of the cap down to a computer. As subjects perform different tasks, the triggered brain activity is recorded by the electrodes, which roughly map what areas of the brain are being stimulated. The computer then analyzes these signals in relation to the tasks being performed—a poor man's MRI, you might say.

This was the equipment Richie brought to Dharamsala. His Holiness was on stage, Richie was on stage, and five hundred Tibetan monks filled the audience. Richie wore the cap while explaining how they were trying to measure mind activity by recording electrical signals in the brain. When he finished his lecture and removed the cap, all the monks burst out laughing.

Richie was certain they were laughing because he looked silly in this black leather cap with dozens of trailing wires. But that wasn't why. One monk explained their laughter: "You're trying to measure the mind by putting the cap here," he said, pointing to his head, "when everybody knows the mind is located here," pointing to his heart. They found it absolutely hilarious that these scientists were missing the boat entirely.

This is fascinating. In the Buddhist tradition, the seat of consciousness is generally understood to be in the heart center. This gives us an interesting way to hold our thoughts—they're not necessarily just originating in the head, but something more profound is happening at the heart. This is the sense of citta. It encompasses both heart and mind activity, and this is the area of the third foundation.

The best translation for citta is actually "psyche." Psyche also carries that sense of moods as well as thoughts, though it's a bit cumbersome, so we'll generally use "mind."

If there are 84,000 afflictive emotions that we uncover through meditation, I believe there are also 84,000 beautiful emotions. We'll explore these in much greater detail as the retreat progresses. Usually in the early days, the difficult emotions are more obvious, so we'll start by addressing the difficulties as they unfold. Later, we'll go much deeper into the beautiful states.

To develop greater freedom in relation to these emotions, two shifts are needed. The first is a shift in attitude. We touched on this the first night by discussing the quality of allowing. This is the attitude shift we truly need regarding our difficult emotions.

When people first come to retreat, they really don't want these emotions. That was certainly my experience. I didn't come to meditation to experience anger, fear, and desire. I came to find peace and love. But this is part of what comes as we deepen. All these states move through us. We need to become familiar with them, so we must open to them. We must allow them. If we have the sense that they shouldn't be there, we'll always be in conflict with them.

This is an important question to examine as you begin touching these difficult emotions: Is there an attitude of accepting that it's okay for them to be there? This is really important.

The second piece is developing greater understanding of them. We need to understand their nature—not only their individual nature (how anger feels, how disappointment feels, how depression feels), but also their universal nature. Like all conditioned things, they're subject to the three characteristics: impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and selflessness.

We begin to see that these three characteristics apply to our emotions just as they do to every phenomenon that arises. The impermanence lets us know they won't stay forever. This is why it's safe to open to them. They come, and if we leave them alone, they'll also go. They're unsatisfactory—that's clear in this case. And they're also not who you are. They're not you, and they're not even yours.

They belong to the human heart-mind of which we are instances, but we are not unique owners of these emotions. The emotions are not unique to us—we all know these things. This is simply part of nature. Just as our bodies are part of nature and not all that different from one another, our heart and mind is part of nature, and we're not that different from each other. So we start to understand this about these emotions. We don't have to claim them as "I" or "mine."

In working with these states, I want to describe in greater detail how to engage with them. The first step is knowing what we're feeling. If we don't know that, it's very difficult to begin making a relationship. But this is not as easy as it sounds. We're not generally taught this in our culture. I didn't learn it from my parents, my school teachers, or my university professors. Nobody sat me down and said, "What are you feeling now? When this person said that to you, how did that make you feel? And when you felt like that, what emotions were connected?" I didn't have those kinds of dialogues across the dinner table at my parents' home. So I grew up really unaware of this inner landscape. It was only when I started to meditate that I realized I needed to learn what this was all about, because there was a whole world in there that I became fascinated with and wanted to understand, needed to understand.

I think one of the greatest gifts we could give the world would be to let children learn what their emotions are when they're still not afraid of them. You know how kids will just let anything rip through them? They don't hold back at all. They're open to feeling anything. If we can educate them at that point in their lives, they'll grow up with tremendous emotional intelligence.

One of the projects I'm really excited about is based in Oakland and called Mindful Schools. Some Vipassana meditators have created an organization dedicated to taking mindfulness training into public and private schools. They've now trained over a thousand people to go in and teach. In some cases, they've received grants to do the work. In others, they've gotten funding from the schools because it has real benefits for the children. They've been successful in teaching in elementary schools and middle schools—ages roughly ten to fifteen.

This is wonderful. One of the teachers goes in and the students love to see her coming. They call her Miss Mindfulness. "Oh good, Miss Mindfulness is coming today!" At the end of the training, when asked what they appreciated about it and if they enjoyed it, one child said, "I love to be mindful because if I do it before I go to bed, I get really happy and I have wonderful night's sleep." Another said, "If I'm really mindful, I don't feel like hitting my little sister." So this is unfolding in a lovely way, and I think the potential here is great.

There's another school developing as well. One of our sangha members near Spirit Rock in Marin, California, has started what is essentially a dharma preschool because she found enough parents in the area who wanted their kids to grow up learning the dharma. She has twenty three- to five-year-olds, five mornings a week, and she teaches them dharma. She teaches them yoga and spiritual stories and some chanting, and finally a little bit of meditation. She's gotten them to love silence. They'll have their lunch for thirty minutes, and twenty three-, four-, and five-year-olds will be quiet while they eat because they've come to love the process of just being present. It's kind of magic—it's hard to imagine kids that age being quiet that long.

One of the meditations she leads I particularly love. She'd come to the end of a yoga session and have them lie on their backs in corpse pose. You can't use words like mindfulness and awareness and attention—that's too abstract for them. So she leads them with imagery. She'd have them lie on their back, close their eyes, and she'd say, "Imagine a big lake. You're floating in a big lake. Through the lake are swimming all kinds of fishes. Just let all the fishes swim around. There might be a happy fish and a sad fish and a jealous fish and an angry fish and a loving fish."

You just let all the fishes swim through, but you're not any of them. You're the water. Let yourself be as wide as the water and just let all the fishes swim through. Whatever fish is coming, you just let it swim through.

After the meditation, she asked the kids to report. This four-year-old boy said, "It was pretty good. I could let all the fishes come, except I couldn't let the mad fish come."

She asked, "Well, why couldn't you let the mad fish come?"

He replied, "Well, when you don't know that you're the water, the mad fish makes you do things that hurt other people."

Four years old. It's beautiful. Kids are really ripe for this stuff—it's going right in there.

Knowing what we're feeling doesn't necessarily come so easily to us, but we can learn it. We can learn to tune in and understand that. As an example, I was doing a long retreat here one year—sitting the six weeks. I was a couple of weeks in, and so I was pretty present. I felt I was pretty concentrated. I had just finished a sitting in the hall, probably the 8:15 in the morning, and I was going outside for the walking period.

Every walking period in the first two weeks, I'd walk down on the grassy paths in Yogi Park. I'd walked in the same spot every day for two weeks. So I leave the meditation hall, and I'm pretty with it—stepping, lifting, moving, placing, going out the back of the hall, down the steps, lifting, moving, placing. I felt very present.

I looked down at Yogi Park. There was somebody in my walking path. I couldn't believe it. Lifting, moving, placing. What's he doing there? Doesn't he know I've walked there every period for two weeks? Lifting, moving, placing. Did I cut in front of him in breakfast this morning? Is he playing some kind of head game with me? Lifting, moving, placing. He's not very sensitive. If he was sensitive, he would have known that was my spot. Lifting, moving, placing.

So I walked down to the grass. I found another patch of grass, which to my great surprise worked just as well. And so I was walking along and occasionally just cast him an evil glance. He just kept walking also.

It was about thirty minutes into the walking before I finally realized I'm angry. I had thought I was so mindful. I had really thought I was present with my steps, and I was missing the biggest thing that was happening to me. I was pissed off.

Once I recognized that, I could work with it. I could relate to it and I could release it. Until I saw that, I was just enmeshed in it, because I was believing the story I was telling myself. He was in my space, and he was wrong to be in my space, because it was my space. Once I could see that, I could let go of those thoughts and the story, and then the whole thing was over.

Next walking period, I beat him to it. So order was restored.

This showed me something fundamental about these afflictive states that come. They're propped up by what I'd call a storyline or some belief or view. Andrea alluded to this the other night in talking about releasing her anger. There was some belief I had that kept that anger in place, and the belief was: I was right and they were wrong.

There was no real reason that he shouldn't have walked there. My name was not on that patch of grass. IMS had not deeded me that strip. It was open for everybody. If I'd let go of that belief, I couldn't have sustained the anger. But when I did let go of it, the anger fell apart.

All these afflictive emotions have some kind of belief underpinning them that supports them. That's what I call the storyline, and we'll come back to that. One way to release the afflictive emotion is to give up the storyline.

What was happening to me in that walking meditation—I was fairly mindful, but the anger came in like a low-flying aircraft that slips beneath our radar. I didn't have the radar up in the emotional terrain. I had it up in the physical domain, but it slipped into the emotions without my seeing it. As long as I couldn't name it, I was just caught in it. Naming it, recognizing that it's present, is a really important first step for beginning to make a good relationship with it.

One way to think about this is that when these states come, we need to shift where our attention's pointing. My attention was pointing at the person in my walking path, and as long as it was pointed there, I was caught in my reaction. I had to turn the attention to look at what I was feeling, and then there was the potential to release it.

So you could say that these hindrances—I think this is true, but I'm not going to state it categorically, you can play with it—hindrances are a result of misplaced attention. We direct the attention outside to the situation instead of inside to what we're feeling, and that's what gives rise to and sustains these states. When we can name what's happening, that's a recognition that we've turned the attention inwardly, and that's when we can start to work.

In conversations with scientists who are doing research, I heard of one study where they were investigating different ways to work with anger in people in daily life who had a problem with anger management. They were looking at different kinds of intervention for people who had trouble acting out their anger. One of the methods that they tried with them was to just get them to name anger when they noticed they were feeling it. That's all they had to do. They didn't have to try and be mindful of it. They didn't have to try to put an antidote in place. They didn't have to do anything else. Just name it. And that proved to be one of the most effective interventions that they worked with.

This power of naming is part of the mindfulness practice. It's like the noting. But with difficult emotions, it's so important because it shows there's not only anger there, there's also some kind of awareness that knows it. We're not just angry, we're also knowing it. And that knowing is a little bit of wisdom. So now all of a sudden there's not just anger, there's anger and awareness and wisdom. The odds start to tilt in our favor at that point.

There are a few states of mind in particular that I see a lot in my own practice and in meditators that I want to focus in on this evening. I want to suggest that afflictive emotions are bound up with time in a way that the beautiful emotions aren't. With a beautiful emotion like love or joy, it can just arise spontaneously in a moment. You walk in, you see somebody, you feel a surge of loving kindness. Beautiful. Walk out the door, the sun is setting, there's this beautiful pink-red streak across the sky, joy comes up. Or you see someone with a little sadness in their face or a few tears in the meditation hall, compassion comes through right in the moment.

But for an afflictive emotion to be sustained and for it to cause suffering, it needs to be sustained. It depends on time. We have to get involved in time to keep these things going. That's one of the features. The other feature that difficult emotions revolve around is pleasure and pain. As human beings, we are subject to ever-changing flows of pleasure and pain in our normal experience. Andrea gave the instruction this morning on feeling tone—pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. We'll leave the neutral out of this discussion. But this changing flow of pleasant and painful is just part of our human condition, and it's around these strong experiences that the difficult emotions come.

So if you enjoyed eighth grade algebra, I'm going to take you right back. I'm going to suggest we have a horizontal axis, which is time, going from past to future. And we're going to have a vertical axis that's about pleasure and pain, going from painful up to pleasant.

This divides our territory for the afflictive emotions into four quadrants. Let me ask you: what are the emotions connected with those four quadrants?

Let's start with past and pleasant—this quadrant up here. Something that was in the past means it's not here now. Very pleasant, but it's gone. What's the emotion connected with that? Loss, nostalgia, sadness, grief. That's where loss and grief come from. It was beautiful in the past, but we don't have it anymore. It could be a relationship, it could be a loved one, it could be someplace we lived, even some beautiful experience. We feel sad at the loss of that—its pastness, its gone-ness.

What about painful in the past—and I'm going to restrict it a little bit—connected with another human being? What's the emotion that tends to arise around that recollection? Could be guilt. But there's a stronger one, which is anger. If someone has hurt us, caused us pain in the past, then the emotion that constellates around that memory is anger. Guilt would be if we had caused pain to someone else, so guilt is in that family also. Shame as well. Let's say anger is often the strongest or hardest of those.

Let's go to the future scale. Something pleasant that's out in time in the future—what's the emotion? Craving, desire, wanting, hoping. That's pleasant in the future and we can get very bound up in that as well.

What about unpleasant in the future? Fear, dread.

This came through to me just a few weeks ago when I had to make a presentation at the Marin County Board of Supervisors. Spirit Rock was putting forth a new master plan with building plans, wanting to increase the number of people who could use our facility. So I had to make the main presentation to the Board of Supervisors where we were seeking approval.

For about two weeks before that presentation, I had this sense of dread about it. It kind of surprised me because I don't mind speaking in public so much, and it was fairly short. But there was something about the responsibility that felt like a burden. There are sometimes hostile people in the public hearing phase of a proposal who will attack one, and the people I was talking to were not people I knew. All of that contributed to just this sense of dread about going and giving the presentation.

But even though I dreaded it, I didn't mind the dread. I would rather not have had to do the presentation, but I didn't mind the fact that I dreaded it. So it was okay. And in the end, the presentation went fine—Spirit Rock got approved. So we're moving forward with building plans as we speak.

So these are the four what I would call primal emotions that we often feel: sadness or grief, anger, desire, and fear. These are the ones that I hear again and again. One variation of anger is when it's directed against ourselves—it comes as self-judgment. We become disappointed and blame ourselves, and that's where self-judgment comes in. So these are the five big ones that we hear a lot, and shame and guilt are also significant for people.

As we explore these states—and I want to go through these four or five tonight—I want to look at three facets of them. If they're strong, they'll be felt in the body. So in coming to relate to one of these emotions, the first place to look is: how does it feel in the body? This is a good place to ground the attention because it's usually a very concrete object and easy to find.

The next one is to look at the mood that's in the mind—there's a coloring or a flavor that's a mental piece. You know how joy feels different than sadness.

Fear feels different than hope. There's a mood that each of these have. So we want to get familiar with it. It's kind of a taste. Each has a unique taste or flavor. And that's a mental component. That's of the mind, not of the body.

And the third thing is: what's the storyline? The belief or thought or view that props the emotion up, which if we didn't believe it, the emotion couldn't continue.

So I'll talk about these four or five emotions and how these components reveal themselves.

First, let's look at desire or wanting. This is wanting a pleasant experience. It comes up often in retreat, especially in the early part. The desire is often about things we've left behind. We want something from home that isn't here—a person, a food, a comfy chair, a TV, a movie, a record, something like that. We find our fantasies going there, sometimes quite a lot, especially in the early phase of a retreat.

Tune in when it comes. Tune into the energy of this wanting because there's something nice about it. The nice is that pleasant experience. We don't have it. In fact, the environment here is pretty austere. The time between pleasant experiences is sometimes rather large, like one lunch to the next. So pleasure becomes kind of a big deal. It's very understandable that if it's not there, the mind will bring it in—will bring in something pleasant. And it's like comforting ourselves by thinking of something pleasant.

So notice that there's a pleasant quality to these desires that's a little bit comforting. But is it satisfying? And this is the other side of desire. There's always something a little frustrating in wanting because we don't have the thing. There's a separation from the thing we want. The image of it isn't the same as the thing, and it doesn't satisfy us in the same way.

So that's the kind of bittersweet nature of desire. There's something pleasant, and also there's some frustration involved in it. It's not as satisfying as the present moment, but that's one of the things we have to learn about it.

And this frustrating quality is intrinsic in desire because we never want what we already have. Have you noticed? Do you ever want a hand at the end of your arm? That doesn't really come up, does it? But if you didn't have it, you'd really miss it. But we never want that because we have it.

Some years ago I was teaching a retreat in Italy and this question of desire came to the fore. A young man came in early on in the retreat for an interview. And I really loved the interviews with the Italian yogis because they had this kind of fluency with their emotions that I didn't have before I started meditating. They tended to know what they were feeling and were very comfortable with it, able to talk about it and report it quite easily. It's a little bit the stereotype of the Italian character, but I found it true in the meditative setting. So it was a delight to talk with them.

So this young guy comes in, and I asked him how he was settling in. He said, "I'm not doing very well. I don't think I really want to be here."

I said, "Well, what's going on? What comes up?"

He said, "Well, I think I'd rather be somewhere else."

I said, "Well, why are you here?"

And he said, "Well, this is August. It's our holiday time. And my friends asked me to go on a trip with them to the Caribbean, or I could come to this meditation retreat."

I said, "Okay, why did you come here?"

And he said, "All the tickets to the Caribbean were sold out."

So I came here.

So I get it. We're the consolation prize.

He said, "Yeah, and I just keep thinking about my friends there and the beautiful beaches and the blue waters and the sunshine. I just don't really want to be here."

So what we talked about was this nature of desire—how maybe it's not the absence of the Caribbean that's the problem, it's the wanting for the Caribbean that's the problem. And if you could let go of these images of the sand and the water and the sun and just be here, maybe it would be okay here. So try that. See if that would be all right.

I didn't see him again for a couple of days, but by the next interview he came again, we spoke, and he was totally fine. He'd been able to let go of the desire, and then he'd really landed, and it was great.

So when desire is an obstacle, it's sometimes helpful to remember it's not the absence of the object that's the problem. It's the wanting for it. And that's one way of releasing. Because the storyline is something like: "If I had that, I'd be happy." Then we keep telling ourselves that storyline. The corollary is: "I can't be happy because I don't have it." If we let go of the object and we don't have the storyline, then maybe we can be happy. That's the lesson with desire.

After we've been here for a while, the desire force gets tuned more toward things in the retreat, and especially it gets tuned around meditative experience. So we find ourselves really wanting that sitting that was calm and collected, or the one where the body didn't hurt, or the walking meditation where we had unlimited loving-kindness for all sentient beings everywhere. And those are the things that desire forms around.

Sometimes it's hard to pick up because it's so much a part of the fabric of our life. So we come and sit and we're in some kind of conflict, but it's sometimes hard to know what it is. With desire, I look for a kind of leaning forward tension, like I'm moving towards something. And that's that kind of future pull towards something. Sometimes I don't even know what it is. But I'll feel like this pull out of the moment, which is different than that settled back feeling. And that will clue me in. There's some kind of wanting, moving forward, leaning into, going on.

Then I'll look at my thoughts. And I'll say, "Well, what have I been thinking about?" Oh, I was thinking about a concentrated sitting. And then I'll realize, "Oh, I'm wanting concentration." And then it's easier to really—oh, just here now. Just come into this moment.

Anger is one of the difficult forces to work with. Andrea talked about this quite a bit the other night. I won't go over it a lot. But as you feel anger, generally connected to some episode in the past, notice first how it feels in the body. Often with anger, there's a strong sensation of tension, contraction, kind of burning. It's often a fiery quality in the mind and can be really unpleasant.

I was doing a metta retreat here one year, a six-week metta retreat, and my difficult person was on the retreat with me. So our paths would often cross during the day. When I'd cross paths with them, I'd start going: "Just think about what they did this past year." We had had different kinds of conflict over the year. "Just think about the way they behaved." And I'd start getting stirred up, and I'd get angry, and I'd go back to my room and sit, and I'd be angry for like twenty minutes, thirty minutes. It sort of moved through, and then I'd get back to the metta: "May all beings be happy. May all beings be peaceful."

Then we'd cross paths again. "I can't believe they acted that way." And then I'd go to sit, and I'd be stirred up. As I was getting more sensitive and more open with the metta, my body was really open and my mind was really bright. And then this anger would come in and I just felt the contraction so strongly—it was so painful. I felt like my body was being held by these vice grips. Finally it just became so unpleasant.

I would do anything to get out of it. "How do I get out of this?"

So I started looking at those blaming thoughts. The storyline with anger is basically: "I'm right and you're wrong." And every time we think another thought and believe it, we throw another log on the fire. So I kept building the fire up hotter and hotter, and I kept suffering from it. When I could stop the blaming thoughts, the fire went away—died down, went away.

So the only thing that could persuade me to let go of the blaming thoughts was the pain I was in from the anger. So look closely when anger is there, how it feels. It's not pleasant. In the texts, it's compared to someone picking up a hot coal to throw it at another person. But of course, before you can throw it, you have to pick it up and then you burn yourself. It's also compared in the texts to drinking poison and hoping the other person falls ill. Often the other person doesn't even know you're upset, right? It's just hurting you.

Of course, sometimes this storyline of "I'm right and you're wrong"—sometimes it's true. And those are the hardest ones to let go of. Sometimes it's really clear somebody has done something unskillful and really has hurt us in an unkind way.

So I'll tell you this little story from the Dalai Lama. He left Tibet in 1959 to escape to India. At the time that he left, he had known a monk in one of the monasteries, and he judged the monk to be a rather average practitioner. Then he escaped to India in '59, established his center in Dharamsala. About twenty-five years later, this monk escaped after being in prison for many years. He escaped to India, and as many of the escaped Tibetans do, he managed to see the Dalai Lama very soon after he arrived. The Dalai Lama loves to welcome the Tibetans who have gotten out of their country to India.

So he met with the Dalai Lama. The Dalai Lama, of course, was very concerned for him and said, "Well, I heard that you were in prison for twenty years." The Dalai Lama was worried that he may have been tortured—at least he wasn't killed. But terrible things happen in those prisons. So he said, "How did you fare?"

And the monk said, "Well, I often felt that I was in danger."

The Dalai Lama said, "Do you mean you were worried about being tortured?"

And the monk said, "Oh, I was tortured, but that's not what I meant. I was in danger of becoming angry." He said, "But I didn't."

Imprisoned for twenty years, tortured often, didn't generate anger. The Dalai Lama said he had to revise his opinion of the monk's practice. That's an awesome level of practice. It's not something I feel capable of, but it points us to a human potential. And so maybe when somebody cuts in front of us on the freeway, we can sort of remember that as an inspiration. We may be right that they were wrong, but maybe we can let go of our anger.

This quality of self-judgment—James talked a lot about this the other night, so I'm not going to talk about that tonight. Just to say that it comes up frequently for people on retreat, and the tools of mindfulness and especially loving-kindness can be really transformative in working with this quality. So if this is up for you, please talk to your teachers about it. There are lots of great ways to work with it, and it can make our whole level of self-trust and self-confidence entirely different. So it's a great one to work with.

Sadness or grief—another of the difficult primal emotions arising out of a sense of loss. Often the feeling in the body is a kind of heaviness, and the tone in the mind is kind of dark and burdensome. And the belief, the storyline, is something like: "I can't be happy because I've lost this. I can't be happy because of the loss." And if we keep believing that, that perpetuates the sense of burden or weight that's in the mind.

But sometimes opening to sadness is difficult because we might feel like it's so big. It might be carrying a lifetime of disappointments that we haven't ever really been able to open to or let ourselves feel. And there's the worry: "If I open to this, I'm going to drown under it. I'm going to get lost in it. I'll never make my way out."

But that's just another belief. That's just another thought. And with sadness, as with anything else, we just need to open little by little and feel it. As we open to feel it, every time we contact it with mindful attention, it releases a little bit of the weight of it. It's really the bringing into consciousness, touching it with awareness, letting go, that starts to allow these emotions to move through. And this is how grief and loss get processed also.

Finally, with fear. I love to talk about fear because it was my main hindrance for the early years of my practice, and I worked with it a lot. One of the breakthroughs for me was when one of my teachers, I think it was Joseph, said in a talk that in order to begin to develop this allowing attitude with fear, we needed to open to the body sensations that came with it.

So I'd had fear come up a lot. Every time it came, I hated it. I didn't want anything to do with it. And it made me more afraid. I was really afraid to feel my fear. So I couldn't move to open to the whole thing at all. But my teacher said, open to the body sensations and see if you can allow and bear those. I started to feel those. I started to feel the contraction in the stomach, the kind of fluttery energy, the lack of grounding that came up into the chest and the head, that shakiness that goes with fear. I asked myself, can I bear this?

Then I learned something kind of interesting. The storyline in fear is that this moment may be bearable, but in the next moment it's not going to be. Something disastrous is about to happen, so be on your guard because you may be okay now, but you're not going to be for long. Watch out. That's where that vigilance comes from. If you've carried fear for a while, there's a vigilance about, I can't trust the world. It's not safe.

That part of the vigilance really came through to me one evening. I was meditating in England. I was sitting a long retreat in England. I was doing standing meditation before the Dharma talk. It was one of these really incredibly beautiful soft summer evenings where it had been a warm day and the warmth of the day was still in the air. I was standing out by an apple tree in the back. It was full of leaves and the apples were growing and the doves were calling in the distance. There was just this soft twilight.

I was standing with my eyes closed and I was in this pattern of fear. Wow, everything's so scary. My body's scary, my mind's scary. And then I opened my eyes and I opened my ears and I tuned into that incredibly beautiful and gentle and nourishing English summer twilight. I just went, wow, it's really a scary world, isn't it? And it was so clear the whole thing was just a projection of my mind. The world wasn't threatening. It was beautiful and supportive.

So there's a storyline that we create that's gotten embedded somewhere. Something disastrous is going to happen. But if we can come back into the present and feel the sensations as a starting point, we find we can bear those. Then I could open and feel that quality in the mind, the mood that's fear. That was harder. Because the essence of fear is run away from. Run away from it. And so it wanted to run away from the feeling of fear. So it was very hard for me to bring mindfulness to touch the emotion of fear directly. But then finally I could do that. And then that became bearable.

So the whole experience became okay, but I also wanted to get out of it as soon as I could. And then my teacher said something else. He said, if you really accept it, it would be okay if this fear was with you for the rest of your life. So I had to ask myself that question. And that kind of became the acid test.

Would it be OK if this fear was here for the rest of my life? And the answer was obvious. Hell no. No way. I couldn't take that.

And so I asked myself, well, why? Why couldn't I allow that? And I thought, I could never listen to music the same again if I was always scared. I could never have this kind of merging experience with a sunset if I was scared. I could never fall in love again if I was scared. So I'm not going to give those things up. And I didn't. So I kept clashing with fear. I couldn't really accept it that deeply.

And finally, it wore me out. The fighting with it wore me out. And I thought, I can either find peace now, or I can cling to these hopes of future gratification. Which would I rather have? And finally, I wanted peace now. And I said, OK, if this lasts the rest of my life, it's all right.

And when I opened to it that fully, something in the power of fear just started to drain out of my mind. And it lost some kind of grip over me. Some kind of obsessive relationship went out of my relationship with fear. Fear has come again many times, but it's never had that kind of grip in my mind because I learned how to be with it so fully with so much equanimity. I really didn't care if it arose or not. I really didn't care. It didn't matter to me one way or another.

And so if you develop this kind of relationship with your main hindrance, whichever one it is, you'll learn a lot about how to open to all the hindrances and the kind of freedom that's available through that. So you don't have to go through such a struggle with every one, but by learning from one, you'll find out how to relate to all of them. And then a great deal of freedom opens up in the mind because we're not afraid of our emotions so much anymore. We find that space that lets them all come and go.

So I want to close with a poem from Rilke, the German poet, from a small book of his called The Book of Hours. And a little bit of setup to this: Rilke was in a very religious phase in his early 20s, and this book came out of that period. And so this is about an image where, as each of us is created by God, God gives us a little pep talk before he launches us into this human life. So this is the pep talk.

God speaks to each of us as he makes us, then walks with us silently out of the night. These are the words we dimly hear:

You, sent out beyond your memory, go to the limits of your longing. Embody me. Flare up like flame and make big shadows I can move in. Let everything happen to you, beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final. Don't let yourself lose me. Nearby is the country they call life. You will know it by its seriousness. Now give me your hand.

So let's just sit for a minute together, please.

Let everything happen to you, beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 44

Five Aggregates: Self and Emptiness

Guy Armstrong · 1h02

> In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong builds upon previous teachings on the five aggregates (pañca-khandhā) to explore two fundamental aspects of emptiness in Buddhist understanding. Drawing from the Anattalakkhana Sutta and other core teachings, he examines how the aggregates of form (rūpa), feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), mental formations (saṅkhārā), and consciousness (viññāṇa) reveal the absence of any permanent, unchanging self.
>
> Armstrong guides practitioners through the Buddha's classical inquiry: investigating whether any of the aggregates can be considered "mine," "I am," or "myself" when all are impermanent and subject to change. He shares the teaching given to Bāhiya Dārucīriya about experiencing phenomena without adding the fabrication of self—"in the seen, let there be just the seen"—and explores how clinging to the aggregates gives rise to the illusion of selfhood.
>
> The talk also addresses the second aspect of emptiness: the insubstantial nature of sensory experience itself. Using the Buddha's Foam Sutta (Pheṇapiṇḍūpama Sutta, SN 22.95), Armstrong illustrates how all phenomena are like foam, bubbles, mirages—appearing solid but lacking substantial existence when examined closely. This understanding, he explains, leads not to nihilism but to greater compassion and freedom, as we recognize our shared condition of living within this "magical display" of consciousness.

Andrea talked a couple of nights ago about the five aggregates, and I want to pick up that theme and explore it a little further. It can be, in our meditation, the basis for a lot of great insight. She explained very well the basic concepts and how to work with them in our practice. I just want to extend it a little bit more tonight to talk about opening this scheme for greater insight.

I'm going to talk about insights in two directions, both of which have to do with the quality of emptiness. In the Buddhist tradition, emptiness tends to get talked about in two ways. One, that our overall experience is empty of self. And the second, that the nature of sense experience is insubstantial. So I'm going to try to cover both of those tonight.

In talking about this sense of self or I, we start to realize that this question about I or self is really at the center of what the Buddha taught about. It was a unique contribution that he made to the whole meditative journey and really the history of philosophy. So a big encouragement is to examine this sense of I, because when we don't examine it, it gets us in a lot of suffering.

I would say one way of understanding the Buddha's teachings is that this unexamined sense of I is one of our biggest misunderstandings in life. The actual truth of things is a lot lighter than we imagine it to be. When we carry around this sense of self, we put an unnecessary burden on our experience of life. The experience of life as we see clearly becomes much easier, lighter, and more joyful. This is not an intellectual question so much as a way to free the heart and mind.

The sense of I tends to be at the center of our whole universe. You could say that our whole life revolves around it—our thoughts, our words, our actions, our values, our associations, our directions, our motives. It all comes out of this sense of I. And this sense of I seems like the most obvious fact in the world at first. It seems totally self-evident. Why should we have to question it?

But it's very curious. You've been examining your experience really carefully for two weeks. Have you located the I yet? Have you ever kind of looked inside and said, "Well, where is it? It's here all the time. It must be somewhere. I must be able to find it." Have you found that I? It's really curious, isn't it?

The Dalai Lama said that when we are sure something exists, but we can't find it when we turn to it, that's a sure sign of delusion. So that's basically where we start from with this question of I. There's a sense of delusion or confusion about it.

The classical analogy is to walking through the grass and believing that we see a snake. We become very startled and afraid. But when we look more closely, we see that it's not a snake at all. It's a piece of rope with different colors—maybe white and green and red—but they're intertwined in such a way, with such a length, we thought it was a snake. When we see that it's a piece of rope, we're not afraid anymore.

In the same way, when we examine our experience with the sense of I, it's kind of scary and burdensome. But the Buddha said when we investigate it correctly and we can see things as they really are, that sense of fear and burden and dis-ease goes away for us. This is the motivation to understand this sense.

We can see some of the confusion by the language that we use around I. So let me ask you a simple question: How tall are you? This is not a trick question. I assume everybody knows the answer. This is a common question we hear every day. I would answer it and say, "I'm 5'10"." You might have your own measurement in feet and inches or in centimeters if you're from Europe.

But this is a very easy question for us to answer. Yet when we say, "I'm 5'10"," what we're really talking about is the body, right? The body's 5'10". It's not the thoughts that are 5'10". It's not my joy or anxiety that's 5'10". It's not my feeling tone that's 5'10". It's the body.

So here we're using "I" to mean the body. The "I" is completely identified with the body: "I am 5'10"." Oh, really?

Well, let me ask another question: What color are your eyes? That's easy too, right? This is not a trick either. So I'd say my eyes are brown. So here we're not the body, but we're someone separate from the body who owns eyes that are a part of the body. They're my eyes. So we've moved from being the body to being the one who owns the body. That's a little odd, isn't it?

So which are you? Are you the body or are you the owner? And can you really be both? Is that logically consistent? How many selves do you have?

We can do the same thing with the mind. Sometimes we'll say, "I'm happy" or "I'm sad." So here we're identifying with an emotion, or let's say with the mind. I am the emotion of happiness or sadness. Other times we'll talk about my joys and my sorrows, my hopes and my fears. So now we're someone apart from the emotions who has them, who owns them. So are you the body or the owner of it? The emotions or the owner of them?

Or there's one other really familiar sense, which is that it feels like we're somewhere behind the eyes, like maybe in the center of the mass of brain, and we're kind of looking out. I am looking out on the world, and everything happens to me, who am the observer. I'm the center of it all, I experience it all, and that's what I really am. It's like there's a command and control center somewhere up here. We're that observer and director of everything.

These are five different ways that we think we're the "I," and there are more. The Buddha enumerated twenty, but that's another talk. So there are at least five and maybe more. They're all delusion. Every single one of them is delusion.

The Buddha put it this way, and he said this a few times—he didn't just say it once: "In whatever way they conceive of self, the fact is ever other than that." And one of my teachers put it even more crisply than this. He said, "Everything you think is wrong."

It reminds me of a great phrase that somebody heard on a talk radio show. It's an unusual source of wisdom, but a yogi told me he heard this on a talk radio show where the announcer was commenting on the mind. There are a lot of opinions that go back and forth in talk radio, so maybe this is the right place for a comment like this. The commentator said, "The mind: often wrong, seldom in doubt." It's kind of like that, isn't it? We hold lots of opinions and beliefs and we seldom really question them. It feels like they should be true.

The Buddha said that the "I" is basically a fiction. Until we examine it clearly, we won't be able to see through it. When we are bound by it, then it creates a lot of unnecessary suffering in our lives.

So this concept of "I" has kind of entranced us. The whole world, the whole human world is roped in by it. And then it sings—we listen to that tune, we're kind of caught in that tune, and that tune has three main chords: greed, aversion, delusion. These are all the activities of the "I."

So undoing this misunderstanding is the central work of insight meditation. Spring talked last night about the truth of impermanence and how many ways that affects our lives, on how many levels we can see that truth.

This teaching on impermanence is closely tied to the teaching on self. The more we see clearly the truth of impermanence on all its levels, the more we understand how this self does or doesn't exist.

One way to approach this is to look around the room. Most likely we see people. I'm suggesting that as you look around, you notice persons—there's a person over there, there's a person over there, there's a person in the back. Most likely we see persons.

But in the Visuddhimagga, an ancient commentary, the author says that if you look and see a person, you're not seeing very clearly. Put another way, one who sees a person hasn't investigated deeply enough.

The commentary offers the analogy of a butcher. If you're a skilled butcher who's been working for twenty years and you have the carcass of a cow on your table, as you're chopping it up, you don't say "cow, cow, cow." A skilled butcher wouldn't do that. A skilled butcher knows more intimate detail—rump, tenderloin, sirloin, ribs.

So one who wants to investigate one's own body and mind needs to see more clearly than this tag "person." We need to examine that assumption.

We might ask, well, how did the Buddha see? I think the Buddha saw in two different ways when he looked at a person.

Sometimes he saw the six sense bases—sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and mind objects. We've talked about this framework extensively. It provides the structure our meditation instructions are based around, so it's very comfortable for us. It's becoming more and more familiar, and this is a good way of understanding what constitutes human experience, what makes up a person. Most often, the Buddha used this format of the six sense bases to cut through craving, because we attach to things based on their pleasant nature at a sense door. So if you want to cut through craving, look at the six sense bases. This is very skillful.

But the other scheme he used—and I'd say he used it just as often—was the scheme that Andrea presented the other night: the five aggregates. Understanding our experience in terms of material form, feeling tone, perception, formations, and consciousness. He used this scheme for a different purpose. He used this scheme to cut through wrong view—that is, delusion about the way we're made up.

This goes to the heart of the two ways that we're bound. Craving is the affective manifestation of our bondage—this constant lure of attractive sense objects. It's how we get pulled off center again and again, either through desire or through aversion. The not seeing clearly is the delusion part. So that's one thing we have to understand enough to not continue to get caught in.

But the other basic component of our suffering is ignorance. The Buddha said something like: "Fettered by craving and obscured by ignorance, beings have been wandering this samsara since beginningless time." These are the twin poles of our problem—craving on the one hand, which is affective, and ignorance on the other, which is delusional and has to do with wisdom.

So to cut through craving, we use the sense bases. To cut through ignorance and delusion about our experience, we use the schema of the five aggregates. The Buddha used it again and again to point to right understanding.

One meta comment about the five aggregates. I looked at this list for years and thought, this is a very funny list. How did anybody come up with this kind of strange list? Body is important—the physical world, that's important. Consciousness is important. What are we without consciousness? Mental formations are basically mental states—those are important. But what are feeling and perception doing in there? These two little blips, what are they doing in there?

I could never figure it out. And then why, if feeling and perception are in there, aren't some other things that are just as important? Volition, contact, and attention—why aren't those in there?

Why is it five and not eight? I don't know. Somebody suggested that this list existed before the Buddha, so perhaps he was simply working with an established framework. He could have expanded it to eight aggregates, or in my view, he could have simplified it to just three: form, formations, and consciousness, incorporating feeling and perception within formations. I could never quite understand the reasoning, and I still don't know the definitive answer. But I came to realize it doesn't actually matter.

It truly doesn't matter whether we work with three, five, or eight categories. The crucial question is: can everything in your experience be placed within one of these categories? This is what matters. Does this framework provide a complete outline of human experience?

We'll continue with the traditional five aggregates. Is there anything in your experience that cannot fit into form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness? Is there anything else happening beyond these categories? You can continue exploring this question. It's not essential that you simply accept my word or the Buddha's teaching. What matters is that you discover what rings true in your own experience. So keep investigating.

For now, let's proceed on the understanding that these five categories encompass our entire experience. This assumption is significant because it suggests this is an exhaustive list—it covers everything we experience.

So what's notably absent from this list? There's something quite important that we've been discussing that doesn't appear here. Someone might say emptiness. Emptiness isn't explicitly listed, though it could be understood as an insight, perhaps fitting within mental formations.

Nibbana—that's true. The list doesn't include Nirvana. In the Abhidhamma, they specifically addressed this as an additional category. This framework doesn't include the unconditioned, and there's good reason for this omission. Most of us don't realize nibbana moment after moment. When the realization of nibbana does arise, it exists outside the reach of the five aggregates. But that's advanced territory—graduate level, if you will. For now, we're working with what falls within our sensory experience, since nibbana lies beyond the reach of the senses.

The most significant absence I've mentioned tonight is the "I"—capital I. It's not included in this list. We don't have form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness, and self. This omission carries profound implications.

The understanding here is that there exists only form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. There's no need for an I. Our entire human experience consists of these five aggregates, and the I is not among them. You could express this same truth through the framework of the six sense bases: our complete human experience consists of six types of sense objects and the consciousness that knows them. That's all there is—sense objects and the knowing of them, the five aggregates including consciousness. Nothing else exists. There's no self lurking anywhere.

This provides a complete and exhaustive description of experience. When we begin to see in this way, this understanding brings greater freedom into our lives. But untangling this sense of I is not easy work.

It's so integral to our concepts. It's not easy to untangle.

Let's take a simple example. In the traditional description, it was said: if you look at a chariot, what is a chariot? What is this thing we call chariot? Is it the wheels? Is it the cart? Is it the axle? Is it the steering post? Is it the reins? Is it the yoke for the horses? Or is the chariot just an assemblage of all those little pieces? It's not a specific thing in itself, but rather just the way the pieces are put together.

Here's a simple example. Can everybody see what this is and recognize this? It's a pen, right? It's a ballpoint pen. Clearly it's an object we all know and are familiar with. It's a pen.

But what happens if I start to take it apart? Then we see there are about five or maybe six different pieces to it—the cap and the tip and the end and the barrel and the ink cartridge. So where's the pen now? Is there a pen now? Or are there only these five parts, which might be compared to form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness? They're separate parts. Sometimes they don't have anything to do with each other. Is your liver very much like your compassion? They're really different, aren't they?

But when they're assembled in a certain way, all these different disparate pieces form something useful. They form a kind of unity, a kind of unit, that is very helpful. It's called a pen, or conventionally we call it a human being. But it's just an assemblage of really different kinds of parts.

Yet it's very useful to know. If you need to write a note to Elizabeth, it's very helpful to know where the pen is. And when you go out of the hall tonight, it's very useful to know that your room is not someplace where somebody else thinks is their room, or you'll end up on their floor.

So this concept of objects or beings is really useful, but let's not be deceived that there's anything essential there—anything more than an assembly of parts fit together in a certain way and functioning as a kind of unit.

There is not within us some essential entity that is the self, that is the I. When I came into meditation, I sort of assumed that there was somewhere like a mini-me inside that was kind of running things and experiencing things, and I kept looking for it. William James undertook the same investigation, the philosopher, and he said, "I search for this sense of self, but the closest I can find is a tickle in the back of my throat."

But we need to carry out this search. If we don't carry it out, we'll always be left with this suspicion that it is somewhere—we just haven't found it yet. That's why it's so helpful to look very clearly at all these sense experiences of sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, mind objects and the knowing of them, to realize that's all there is. Or the five aggregates—that's all there is: form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness. There's nothing else.

One reason this is important is because all these component parts, these five aggregates or the sense bases, are all impermanent. When Spring talked last night, I imagine she talked about how impermanence goes all through our experience. It goes down to this very fine level of detail. As closely as you can see through the aggregates, through the sense bases, all of these things are impermanent. That means they all arise, persist for a while, and pass away. There's nothing ongoing.

One of the assumptions about self is that it's continuing, right? If we didn't have that assumption about self, we wouldn't really be afraid of dying, because we would think, "Oh, that's somebody else that's gonna die." But it's because we think, "I'm going to die," that it causes that kind of anxiety or dread. So we have this assumption of continuity with the self, and that's where some of the problem comes from.

So it's very helpful to understand that impermanence applies to these component parts. It doesn't apply to nibbana. And actually, when Brent said emptiness, he may have been pointing to nirvana. So I may have—is that right? My apologies. So Brent was also pointing to nirvana when he said emptiness. Christine said nirvana. That is the element that's not included in the five aggregates. That's not subject to arising and passing. But all these components are.

So the Buddha had a lot of dialogues where he explored this. Here's one place where it came in. After his awakening, he decided to find this group of five friends that he'd been practicing with before his enlightenment. And he saw that they were near the town of Sarnath. And so he traveled there from Bodh Gaya and met them there and offered to give them teachings.

At first, they weren't interested because he looked too healthy. "Oh, he's gotten lax, he's given up the ascetic practices, he's fallen off the path." But as he approached them, they tuned in that there was something going on with their old friend, Gautama. So they decided tentatively, "Okay, we'll give an ear."

And he gave them a discourse on the Four Noble Truths. During that discourse, one of the five, Kandanya, had beginning enlightenment insight and saw the truth of the Dhamma. The other four didn't get it. The Buddha wanted them all to get it, so he had them practice meditation, develop some concentration. A little later, he gave them another talk. In this talk, all five of them came to awakening. This talk was on the characteristic of not-self.

And the gist of it was using the theme of the five aggregates to explore impermanence and not-self. So he asked them these questions: "Is form permanent or impermanent?" That means the body and physical senses. Is it permanent or impermanent? They're all impermanent, right? So they replied, "Impermanent, venerable sir."

He said, "Is what is impermanent unsatisfactory or happy?" This is a great question, right? I'm sure Spring touched on this too. Whatever is impermanent, even if it's delightful, will pass away. And if we're basing our happiness on it, we lose that happiness. So is what is impermanent unsatisfactory or happy? They said, "Unsatisfactory."

So then he asked them, "Is what is impermanent, unsatisfactory, and subject to change fit to be regarded thus: This is mine. This I am. This is myself?" And they said, "No, venerable sir." And in the course of that dialogue and that investigation, they all became fully enlightened, all five of them.

This is a powerful inquiry. It's better to get it from the Buddha than from me. It can be a powerful investigation. Is it fit to be regarded thus? This is mine. Like if I hang on to this pen because I really like this pen, is that fitting? Well no, it's going to run out of ink or the barrel's going to crack or the tip's going to break off and then I'm going to be disappointed.

Or "this I am." Can I take this body to be what I truly am knowing that one day it's going to die? Or "this is myself." Our personality, let's say, we identify with as ourself, but it's so changeable. It's so variable. It never stays the same for very long at a time. And so if we identify with that in ourself, we're always insecure.

We're riding a wave that doesn't have any solidity.

The Buddha conducted this same dialogue with Anuradha regarding feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. None of them fit to be regarded as "this is mine, this I am, this is myself." You could do the same inquiry with the six sense bases—either approach would lead to the same understanding.

So where is this "I"? What constitutes this "I"?

A monk once approached the Buddha and said, "Venerable sir, wanderers from other sects—all deluded, as the other sects in the Buddha's time hadn't developed this kind of wisdom—are approaching me with philosophical questions. They ask whether the Tathagata exists after death or not. I don't know how to answer them. How should I respond?"

The Buddha led this monk, whose name was Anuradha, into another dialogue, another inquiry. He asked, "Do you think the Tathagata is this body?" This seems rather preposterous—that the most enlightened being would simply be the body. Anuradha, being wiser than that, answered no.

"Do you think the Tathagata is this feeling tone, the vedana quality?" No.

"Do you think the Buddha is his perception?" No.

"Do you think the Buddha is just a collection of mental formations?" No.

"Do you think the Buddha is just this consciousness?" No.

"And Anuradha, do you think the Buddha exists apart from all the aggregates? Do you think the Buddha is somewhere else?" No.

The Buddha then said, "Well, Anuradha, you can't even find the Tathagata here and now. How much sense can it make to talk about where he's going to be after he dies? This is how you should answer the wanderers from the other sects to dispel their confusion."

Sometimes we think perhaps the self is all these things taken together—I'm my liver and my blood and my pleasant and unpleasant experiences and my perceptions and my thoughts and feelings and consciousness. That's all me. This is the conventional idea of a human being, much like the pen—an assemblage of parts, quite different and distinct, functioning together as a kind of unit. That's what we take to be a person.

But the problem is that all these things are coming and going continuously. If you truly feel that all these things constitute you, then you must be coming and going moment by moment by moment. If you can feel this—that your self is arising and passing and arising and passing on all these different levels moment by moment—and you want to call that "I," fine. But there's nothing continuing there when you see with proper wisdom.

The other problem with this view is that it raises the question: how many selves do I have? Can the liver be your self and your compassion be your self? They're not the same thing. So how many selves are there? Is there a liver self and a compassion self? It becomes quite problematic.

This concept of all these things being our self doesn't really work either. We find that the self is an unnecessary appendage to the aggregates. We don't need to add it. All we need to see is form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness. The self isn't needed.

This became really clear in an interaction the Buddha had with another wanderer named Bahiya. You may have heard this story, as it's quite famous. Bahiya was meditating somewhere near the coast and thought that he was perhaps an arahant.

He had never met the Buddha or heard his teachings, but he had the feeling, "I'm a pretty spiritual guy. Maybe I'm at the end. Maybe I've completed the journey and maybe I'm an arhat." But then he heard that there was someone who really was an arhat, the Tathagata, Gautama Buddha. And he said, "Well, let me just go and check myself out. If this person is genuine, he can tell me if I'm an arhat or not."

So he found the Buddha. He had a great deal of urgency because he actually had a lot of great qualities, a lot of good spiritual qualities. The Buddha was on alms round, and Bahia came up to him and said, "Venerable sir, I've come a long way. I have a great deal of passion about this question. Can you please give me your teaching in brief?"

And the Buddha said, "This is not the appropriate time. I'm collecting my meal for the day. Please wait until it's over."

But Bahia said, "It is hard to know how long you will live or I will live. Please, can you give me your teaching now?"

And a second time, the Buddha refused. He said, "I'm on my alms round. Please come see me later."

But as these stories usually go, if you ask the third time, the Buddha can't say no. So Bahia again asked and said, "It's hard to know how long you will live or I will live."

So the Buddha gave him this very brief teaching. First, he told him he wasn't an arhat. Oh, sad day. But he told him how to understand so that he could become awakened. And he said, "Bahia, this is how you should train. In what is seen, let there be just the seen. In what is heard, let there be just the heard. In what is sensed, let there be just what is sensed. In the thought, let there be just what is thought. Then there will be no you in terms of that."

You get that in his formulation? In the seen, let there be just the seen. That means there's no one standing aside who's thinking they're doing the seeing. In the seen, let there be just the seen. In that way, there will be no you in terms of that. You won't create an "I" that believes "I'm doing the seeing." There's just what is seen.

"When there is no you in terms of that, there is no you there. When there is no you there, then you will be neither here nor there nor in between. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

This is a pith meditation instruction. You can explore this in your experience. When you are experiencing any sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, is it just standing on its own? Is there just the seen, the heard, the sensed, the cognized? Or are you adding an "I" that owns it or experiences it or is it? See what that's like. There's just the seen, there's just the heard, there's just the sensed. That's the end of suffering.

Bahia's mind was so balanced and so interested that at these words he awakened, completed his journey, got what he had come for. That afternoon, walking through a field, he was attacked by a bull, gored, and died. Who knows how long you will live or I will live? Bahia died that afternoon, but he had understood. And so he had come to the end of suffering.

So this is the possibility in our practice—to explore this quality when self is absent, and then to see what brings it about. I want to go into a little more detail about this in another talk, but there are specific things that give rise to the sense of self.

This is the Venerable Ananda, who was the Buddha's attendant for the last twenty-five years of his life. A beautiful, kind, compassionate, thoughtful person.

After the Buddha, Ananda is one of the people you really would have liked to know from the Pali Canon. He had a great heart. And so he was describing to the monks that after he had ordained, when he was not understanding very well, there was another monk who gave him this very clear instruction of how to understand.

This other monk told him, "Ananda, it is by clinging that the notion 'I am' occurs, not without clinging. And by clinging to what does 'I am' arise? By clinging to form, to feeling, to perception, to formations and to consciousness." So when there is clinging or grasping, the sense of 'I' follows on from that. And once there is clinging or grasping, we're on the way to suffering because eventually change will take it away from us. And when we're holding on and there's change, we suffer.

One meditator, I thought very nicely, defined suffering as rope burn—holding on to what's passing through our hands, it burns.

The Buddha put it this way: "When there is form, by clinging to form, by adhering to form, one regards things thus: 'This is mine, this I am, this is myself.'" And similarly for the other aggregates. So the 'I' is built on clinging, and clinging leads to suffering. We can feel this again and again. So when we let go...

It's not that in the absence of self there's this cold world that opens up. I mean, this description sounds kind of technical—lack of clinging, aggregates, all of that. This is really about freeing the heart. So when the sense of 'I' is lifted, there's a lot more ease. And from that ease, more loving-kindness and compassion and joy and contentment naturally come through.

A lot of you know this story, but for those who haven't heard it, it's a great pointing. Jack Kornfield was in Sri Lanka and visited an old Sri Lankan monk. The monk invited him into his bedroom and had heard that Jack was doing some teaching. It was in the early years of his teaching in the West, and so he wanted to check him out. He said, "Well, I understand that you've studied Buddhism and you're doing some teaching. What's the essence of the Buddhist teachings?"

And Jack said, "Well, the essence of the teachings is that within this changing flow of experience, there's no abiding entity that we could call an ongoing self or 'I.' There's really no self here."

And the old monk smiled and he said, "No self, no problem." And he just laughed. "No self, no problem."

So that's the pointing. That kind of seeing opens the heart.

So one way we can investigate is this lack of self in the experience of the five aggregates. Another way that we can investigate is the emptiness of what constitutes our sense experience, the lack of substance in what constitutes the experience of the senses.

So let me read to you the start of a sutta. This is from the Samyutta Nikaya, and the sutta is called "A Lump of Foam."

"The Blessed One was dwelling at Ayoja on the bank of the river Ganges. There he addressed the bhikkhus thus: 'Bhikkhus, suppose that this river Ganges was carrying along a great lump of foam. A person with good sight would inspect it, ponder it, and carefully investigate it, and it would appear to them to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in a lump of foam? So too, bhikkhus, whatever kind of form there is—internal or external, gross or subtle—a practitioner inspects it, ponders it, and carefully investigates it, and it would appear to them to be void, hollow, insubstantial. What substance could there be in form?'"

So the Buddha's talking about our bodies and the whole physical world. And he's saying that our body and the physical world is void, hollow, and insubstantial, just like a lump of foam. That's a fairly radical statement.

So this is the investigation that's suggested by this sutta: How can form, how can this body, this world, be like a mass of foam?

I was teaching at Spirit Rock a few years ago and giving a dharma talk at the same time of day—at 7:30. It was getting dark outside. In the middle of the dharma talk, we heard this kind of harrowing cry. It was like a baby crying or someone crying in real pain and anguish. We all noticed it, commented on it, but let the dharma talk finish. I think a manager went out to take a look.

When the talk ended, I went out and a number of people went out to see what that had been about. By one of the residence halls near the meditation hall, there was a deer lying there with its neck broken—a young deer with its neck twisted back at an untenable angle. One person reported that they'd seen a couple of large dogs running off. So what we think happened is that two dogs attacked this deer and somehow broke the deer's neck and killed it. But when people showed up, the dogs ran away. By the time we got there, the deer was dead.

We formed a circle around it and said loving-kindness meditation and sent good wishes for it. Then, after spending some time with the deer, we went on our way. The caretakers said they called the Humane Society, who promised to come by the next day and pick up the body of the deer. So the caretakers took it and left it down by a parking lot so that people could easily load it into the van. We continued to say prayers and send loving-kindness for the deer.

But the Humane Society never came. Day by day, we would go by and look at the body of the deer. Every day there would be a little bit less of it left because coyotes and raccoons and turkey vultures and ants were making it their food. Little by little there was less and less of the deer until eventually there was just some fur and some bones. After about a week, that was all that was left.

Where was all that body? Where was that flesh and blood and sinews and organs? Just gone, like a mass of foam. Just gone, as one day all of us will be just gone. So in this way, we can see that our body is like a mass of foam.

But there are other ways too. When you're meditating and you're very present—you've been here for two weeks now—and you're really looking closely at a sensation in your body, this is as close as we can know the nature of this body. Our awareness is right there touching the sensation. What do you find when you're really present, really awake and touching a sensation? Is it solid, firm, unchanging? Can you rest your life upon it? Or is it more characterized by pulsing, vibrating, up and down, intense and weaker, always changing, flowing, vibrating, with just waves of energy?

When we get right into the sensations in the body—which is really as close as we can get, closer than a microscope—we just find change, fluctuation, pulsing, vibration, really insubstantial.

When you listen to a sound, is it solid? Or does the sound have a nature of just arising and passing away? A car passes by, a bird calls, someone coughs in the meditation hall. The bell rings, comes together, glides away, back into the silence. Smells and tastes are even more floaty than body and sounds. Emotions—have you ever tried to hang on to just a bare emotion? They go so fast. If you can find it in the body, it may be easier to stay in contact, but the body, as we know, is dissolving too.

All the senses, when we look closely from this quiet meditative mind, reveal this dissolving nature, this transient nature. One of the hardest to penetrate is the sense of sight, so let's do some reflection on seeing, because it looks solid. This world looks really solid, and that's one place where we believe in the solidity of the world. So let's question this a little bit.

We know from seventh grade science how sight works. Light particles travel from somewhere, bounce off objects like the wall, floor, ceiling, people, and then come to our eye. These light particles strike the retina and then travel up the optic nerve to the brain, where some kind of processing goes on. Then mysteriously—and nobody knows how this happens—that gives rise to the consciousness of seeing. There's this huge leap that scientists haven't even begun to find an answer to, because it's transitioning from the world of matter to the world of consciousness. But this leap happens—we know it does, because we experience sight.

So the sight forms—that wall looks really solid and unchanging. But if we think about how it arises, we start to realize it's only appearing because all these photons are striking the retina many times a second, generating a nerve impulse that the brain translates and concocts into some appearance of wall. That's all that's happening.

So this appearance of wall is a fabrication based on what's actually there, which I don't know what it is. The way the light hits our eye and then the nervous system and the brain work together to concoct that image, that sight.

So we kind of think we're living in a real solid world. We think we're living in a real world that's made up of walls and floors and people. But actually what we're living in is an appearance of a world that's constructed by our senses. And that construction is not solid because it's turning on and off many times a second. It's being generated by these nerve signals in the brain and it appears to us as consciousness. It's some kind of representation of what's there. We're not questioning that. But it's not the same as what's really there. It's a fabrication. It's a human fabrication. A dog would see it differently. A cat would see it differently. A mosquito would see it differently. So it's kind of our creation. So it's an insubstantial appearance, not a solid world.

One of the things I used to like to play with: This book is blue, right? But where is the blue that this book is? It's not really here, is it? Because what's really happening is white light falls on this and the blue color gets reflected back to you and to me and all the other colors get absorbed. So what's coming to you is blue light and that means what's not in the book. Every other color is in the book. So the book is everything but blue. But it looks like blue. So where is this blue? It's not in the book. It's in your consciousness and nowhere else. So this world we inhabit is a world that's created by our senses and what's out there. So in that way, even the world of sight, which seems solid, is insubstantial.

So the Buddha continued in this way: "Suppose, monks, that a magician should build a magic show at a crossroads, and a keen-sighted person should inspect it, ponder it, and carefully investigate it. It would appear to them to be void, hollow, insubstantial. What substance, monks, could there be in a magic show?"

And then he says, this play of consciousness is the magic show. If we understand it, it's kind of delightful. It's kind of amazing that this happens. The Tibetans call this a magical display. And not to lose sight of the kind of entrancing quality of magic. But if we don't understand it, we get deceived into thinking that it's more substantial and more solid and, in a way, more real than it is.

Do you remember that book, The Unbearable Lightness of Being, Milan Kundera? There is something a little bit unbearable about how light reality actually is. And so with our concepts, we invest it with more security and more solidity and more stability than it actually has. And part of the work of meditation is to untangle that apparent solidity and see the insubstantial nature.

This can feel a little unsettling at first. It kind of feels like the ground has gone out a little bit. But it's actually not dangerous. It's freeing to see it, but we need to be patient with ourselves as we understand this, because it can feel a little unsettling.

So the Buddha continued, "Whatever form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness a person inspects, it will appear to them to be void, hollow, and insubstantial. What substance could there be in form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness?"

And he concludes with this image which is very lovely and runs through a lot of later Buddhist literature. Form is like a lump of foam and feeling just an airy bubble. Perception is like a mirage and formations are like a banana tree. What? I didn't get that one for a long time, but when I lived in the tropics, I came to know banana trees don't have a solid trunk. They're basically hollow in the trunk. So when one banana tree grows up and gives rise to bananas, the trunk dies. It just crumples.

And a new trunk needs to grow for another batch of bananas. Formations are like a banana tree. Consciousness is a magic show, a juggler's trick. All these similes were made known by the kinsmen of the sun—another name for the Buddha.

This insubstantial nature of reality is something we can discover directly through our meditation practice. We begin to understand how one of my teachers could say, "Everything that appears has no solid existence whatsoever. It's just a play in consciousness. Everything is held in consciousness." This is the meaning of the emptiness of phenomena or the emptiness of sense experiences. They're not solid. They're not substantial in that way.

This also is not meant to be a cold experience. Sometimes we think emptiness is just a dark black space that doesn't have any heart, that we have to surrender our humanity to, but it's not like that. When we see this, we're all in this same situation. We're all living in this insubstantial world through our bodies and through all our senses. We're all in this same boat.

Here's a quotation from a student of ours who was exploring this in a class for senior students a few years ago. She wrote: "It's spooky. I would look at everything—like this Japanese lamp that I love—and I'd see that it's just an appearance. Where that took me is that we're all appearances. When I went from an object and say it's an appearance to a person and say they're an appearance, it made my hair stand on end. But it's true, and it makes you both more compassionate and more vulnerable. When I look at my friend Mary, I see that she's changing all the time. When you start thinking like this, you have to be more compassionate because we're all in the same boat and we're all so fragile."

You may know this figure of Kuan Yin, who in Mahayana literature is the embodiment of compassion. She's a female figure, a deity figure that embodies the quality of compassion. It's said that Kuan Yin listens to the whole world and hears the cries from our hearts—the ten thousand joys and the ten thousand sorrows of our human lives. She's there to hear them all and be receptive to them all and to care for us all.

But Kuan Yin is not a beginning meditator. She knows that this is okay. She knows that because of the insubstantiality, our suffering is also not substantial. And that when we see the insubstantiality clearly enough, it releases our suffering also. As it says in the Heart Sutra: "When the Bodhisattva Avalokiteshvara perceived that all five aggregates are empty, he was saved from all suffering and distress."

So it's seeing the emptiness that liberates, and Kuan Yin knows this. That's why she, like the Buddha, has a half smile. She sees the sublime beauty of the magical display, and she also feels the poignancy of the transience of it, both at the same time. So she can't land in sorrow, and she can't land in joy, but she holds them both.

This is the word of wisdom that is attributed to Kuan Yin: "The winds of circumstance blow across emptiness. Whom can they harm? The winds of circumstance blow across emptiness. Whom can they harm?"

So let's just sit together for a moment, please.

From the haiku poet Issa after his four-year-old daughter died:

"This dewdrop world is just a dewdrop world, and yet, and yet..."

CHAPTER 45

Unentangled Knowing

Guy Armstrong · 59 min

Drawing from the Thai laywoman teacher Upāsikā Kee, Guy Armstrong examines how freedom from suffering can be accessed in the present moment through 'unentangled knowing.' He explores the Buddha's teaching on dependent origination (paṭiccasamuppāda), focusing on the experiential links of contact (phassa), feeling tone (vedanā), craving (taṇhā), and clinging (upādāna). Armstrong demonstrates how mindfulness can break this chain between feeling and craving, offering a taste of temporary nibbāna.

The talk includes practical meditation approaches: Sayādaw U Tejāniya's method of checking one's attitude for greed, aversion, and delusion, and turning awareness back toward awareness itself rather than getting entangled in sense objects. Through vivid examples of how we construct temporary selves through clinging - like the 'angry yogi' or 'good meditator' - Armstrong shows how we can rest in the gap between feeling and reactivity, touching the unconditioned nature of mind while remaining fully present to experience.

Sally talked last night about the Four Noble Truths, the teaching of the Buddha that describes the journey from suffering to the end of suffering, or nibbana, the state that's free from all craving. And the question arises in our meditation practice: is that kind of freedom that the Buddha was pointing to, some taste of freedom, only available at the very end of the path when the person has become completely established in nibbana, in the state of final awakening? Or is there some freedom that we can find in our journey before then? Sally pointed to this phrase of temporary nibbana that Ajahn Buddhadasa used.

So in the talk tonight, I want to focus on this question of the freedom that may be available here and now, before several lifetimes of journey along the path to full awakening—something possibly available sooner to us. And I'm going to describe it in terms of what one teacher called an unentangled knowing. So that's the subject of the talk this evening: unentangled knowing.

For those of you who aren't native English speakers, this is a very odd word, unentangled. A tangle refers to a twisting of yarn or string or hair if you've been riding in a convertible and it's gotten in a knot. It's not easy to undo those tangles. Then entangle is the verb that describes that process happening. You can think about when a kitten plays with a big batch of yarn, how the kitten can get entangled in it and get their paws all wrapped up in it, or we can get entangled in a web of untruth. I remember when I was in my teens, somebody that I really respected asked me to tell a lie for them. I felt very conflicted and it was really painful for me. So we can get entangled in all these different ways, and putting "un" in front of it means that it's not entangled. So this is the phrase: unentangled knowing.

It was coined by a Thai laywoman teacher named Upasika Kee. It's unusual for women to teach in Thailand. Most of the teaching is done by monks. And it's even more unusual for the teaching to be done by a lay woman, which she was. She was not an ordained nun. This name Upasika means a lay woman supporter, and Kee was her given name. So she's known as Upasika Kee.

This phrase comes out of a dharma talk of hers in a very wonderful book, which I recommend to you called Pure and Simple. She taught in Thailand somewhere between the 1950s and the 1970s. So she's sort of contemporary. And her teachings are a very clear pointing, again and again and again, to the central point of the dharma: how we get caught and how we can work to free our hearts and minds. I found her teaching really powerful and a direct pointing.

This concept of tangle was used often by the Buddha in his lifetime in describing the situation of things. He said, for example, "The world is smothered and enveloped by craving like a tangled ball of yarn." So you get the sense of how all these contradictory desires that make up craving sort of weave us into this web that is confining and traps us. It's hard to release the mind from that tangle.

On another occasion, there was this kind of nice dialogue. A questioner came up to the Buddha, who you remember had the family name of Gotama, so he was often known as Gotama Buddha. And this questioner said, "A tangle inside and a tangle outside. This generation is entangled in a tangle." Doesn't sound so different from now, does it? We could say that of our generation too. This generation is entangled in a tangle. "So I ask of Gotama this question: who succeeds in disentangling this tangle?"

That's our situation, isn't it? We find ourselves caught in this tangle. We could call it craving or greed, aversion, delusion. Who succeeds in disentangling it? And the way the Buddha answered the question was that one who is developed in virtue, meditation, and wisdom disentangles this tangle. That's the development of the Eightfold Path that Sally was talking about: sila, samadhi, and paññā. So that's the work that we're engaged in here—disentangling ourselves from this tangle.

So Upasika Kee picked up on this image, which is used often in the suttas, and her central quote reads like this: "An inward staying, unentangled knowing, all outward turning cast aside." We'll come back to this later. An inward staying, unentangled knowing.

This inward staying is kind of the work of meditation, isn't it? We're always examining our inner world in response to both our inner world and the outer world, but this inner world of response—an unentangled knowing. This will be the theme.

The way that she uses this phrase evokes a kind of mindfulness that is very aware of all the objects of our experience but isn't caught up in them, isn't attached, isn't clinging, isn't holding on, isn't enmeshed in them. It's a quality of mindfulness that is in a state of some freedom.

in relation to all the things that are coming and going, the objects of our experience.

So there's a sense with this word knowing that there's a full kind of presence and awareness, that this mindfulness is not limited in scope, but it's kind of fully there with everything that is happening to us, but it's not caught up. It's not caught in the reactive formations of greed, aversion, and delusion.

This is actually our experience, many moments of the day. When Sally was talking last night about temporary nibbana that Ajahn Buddhadasa was pointing to, I think she quoted him as saying that if we didn't have moments of coolness like this throughout the day, we'd all go mad. If we were enveloped in the kilesas nonstop, it would drive us crazy. But in fact, we're not. And we have these moments of unentangledness many times throughout the day.

So in the talk tonight, I want to point to how we can recognize those, how we can develop them further. And by recognizing them and developing them, they can become more and more of our experience. We will know how they take place.

In addition, I want to describe a couple of approaches to meditation that lead directly to this kind of relationship, this kind of outcome.

Just one little footnote or caveat. A lot of the vocabulary I will use in the talk tonight comes from one particular school of Theravada, and that is the Thai forest lineage. So some of the vocabulary would not be comfortable for practitioners from other lineages, lineages that are very closely tied to the Abhidhamma or the Visuddhimagga or very orthodox Theravadan sources. Thai forest tradition has a little different way of expressing things. So that's the viewpoint that I want to communicate this evening.

In order to understand clearly how freedom is accessed, we want to understand a little more deeply how bondage takes place, how it is that we get caught or entangled with the objects of our experience.

The Buddha's primary outline for the detailed way that we get caught is a teaching called the Chain of Dependent Origination. In the chain of dependent origination, the Buddha uses these twelve causal links that start from ignorance and go through intermediate steps that lead to the final outcome, which is forms of suffering. This teaching explains in detail how suffering gets generated. It puts it as a kind of cyclic process that will happen over and over and over again until we learn how to interrupt it.

Now I'm not going to go through all twelve links because that would be a whole other talk in and of itself. Later someone may do that in this retreat, I'm not sure. So I'm going to drop out the first five links, which for my taste get a little bit philosophical and stir up views and opinions. I'm going to drop out the last three links, which also get a little philosophical and can stir people up. I'm going to focus on what I consider the central four links of the chain, which are the most experiential and which we can start to notice in our meditation practice and work with directly in our immediate experience.

These four links start from what I'd say is our basic situation as human beings. And what is our basic situation?

The Buddha described it in this sutta, which could be translated as the sutta on totality. And so I'll read you the gist of this sutta.

"Bhikkhus, what is the totality of life? Listen, attend carefully, and I will teach you the totality of life."

That's pretty far out, isn't it? I haven't heard many other philosophers or teachers say that they will teach the totality of life, so that caught my attention.

"Listen and attend carefully. The totality is simply the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and sensations, the mind and mind objects. Anyone who tried to describe a totality beyond this would not know of what they were speaking."

So this is the totality of our sense experience, isn't it? We've talked about this a number of times. These are the six senses and the organs that receive them. This is what makes up our human experience, and every part of our normal sense experience is included here.

One way of saying this is there are only ever six things happening. That's why it gets very simple in one way in our meditation. The basic experience for us as human beings is that things keep happening to us at these six sense doors. It doesn't matter if you're old or young or male or female or from any culture or race, if you're awakened or unawakened, this is our common shared experience. Things keep happening in the realm of sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and mind objects.

So the word for this, these six kinds of things, the word that the Buddha used for this is contact. This is the sixth link in the chain of dependent origination. This is where we're picking up the chain. Five other things have already happened to us. We're not going to go into those, like how we got here and why contact is happening. But the reality is contact is happening at these six sense doors. That's what we pick up on.

Contact is defined really precisely in the Buddha's terms. It means the coming together of the sense organ, the sense object, and the sense consciousness. So for a sight to arise, there has to be an external object, my eye has to be working, and I have to have functioning sight consciousness. If I was asleep, my sight consciousness wouldn't be functioning.

Even if someone propped my eyes open, the sight consciousness might not be functioning. So when these three things come together—object, organ, and consciousness—there is this phenomenon called contact.

The next link in the chain is feeling tone, the Pali term vedana, which we've discussed extensively. This means that every one of these sense contacts has a feeling quality of being either pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

This is a crucial point in the Buddha's teachings. Why is feeling tone so important? Because it's on the basis of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral that our conditioned reactions arise. Greed is based in relation to pleasant feeling tones, aversion arises in relation to unpleasant feeling tones, and delusion often arises based on neutral feeling tones. The combination of these three reactions—greed, aversion, and delusion—is what we call craving or tanha, which is also the second noble truth.

As Sally mentioned, even though tanha, craving, has a desire nature, it includes the formation of aversion because that too expresses a preference. If we want things to be one way, we don't want them to be another. This desire force expresses itself both as greed—wanting the pleasant—and aversion—not wanting the unpleasant.

These formations happen constantly, and in normal life we don't see them happening. That's why they're usually accompanied by delusion. It's usually greed with delusion reacting, or aversion with delusion reacting, because we're not seeing them clearly. When we start to see them, that changes the whole equation.

Craving is the conditioned response to feeling tone, the next link in the chain of dependent origination. It flows from contact, which brings about feeling tone. Feeling tone conditions craving, which is the reactive formation of greed, aversion, or delusion.

After craving comes something even more solidified. Craving identifies the object and inclines the mind in that direction. Then, if you pay attention, usually what happens is a fastening onto that particular object—either a fascination with its pleasant quality or its unpleasant quality. There's a taking hold that occurs, which is called grasping or clinging.

This grasping or clinging is simply a further solidification of the movement of craving. It's like: "Okay, I'm drawn there, I kind of like it—got it." If you watch how your mind relates to these charged objects with strong feeling tone, you can observe this happening. As the mind becomes more settled, you can see that inclination and then the taking hold of, called grasping or clinging.

Once we've taken hold, we tend to stay there for a while and often proliferate about it: "I like it, I don't like it, I want more of it, I've got to get rid of it, this is going to ruin my retreat, I can't have this in my life," and so on.

These are the central links in our experience of the chain: contact, feeling, craving, clinging. The key thing to understand is that clinging, once it has taken form, invariably leads to suffering. I'll explain that in a moment. But this is important to know—clinging is what provides the fuel for suffering to happen.

Here we are. We come into conscious experience when we're fairly young. You can think of it as being a baby, and all these objects start appearing in the world, forming our world of contacts: mother, breast, food, father, school, friends, high school, crushes, college, jobs, career, money, taxes, government, Britney Spears, VH1, income tax, Barack Obama, global economic crisis. It never stops.

Of all these objects that go by, some are very attractive, some are very scary. We end up moving in relation to them, taking hold, wanting. Even to push something away, we have to take hold of it first. If you want to get rid of a pain in your knee, mentally you've got to take hold of it before you can push against it. So clinging happens not just with things we want to bring close, but also with things we want to push away.

This is how we get entangled. Once entangled, suffering results.

What actually happens is that when we grasp something and hold on for a while and start to proliferate around it, we create a new kind of sense of "I" in that relationship. We could almost say we give birth by taking hold of and then proliferating. What's happening is a new sense of self is getting created in that movement.

The sense of self is always bound up with suffering because there's birth and death with this sense of self. Let me give a couple of examples.

I told a story earlier in the retreat of how I was going out for a walking meditation one morning while I was on retreat here. I looked down to my walking path and saw there was somebody already walking there. Unpleasant, very unpleasant kind of contact. And I didn't like it, so there was immediately aversion, and then I started to proliferate about it.

So I made a big thing of it. I latched onto it, and I got angry at that person who was in my walking path. I thought all kinds of thoughts about why they shouldn't be there, and what could their motivation be for being in my walking path, and they weren't very sensitive. I proliferated about it for thirty minutes before I finally realized, hey, I'm angry. It took me that long. Once I realized I was angry, then I could kind of work with it.

But in the middle of that, I had constructed a new sense of self, which was the angry yogi. I was angry with one of my fellow yogis because he had appropriated something that belonged to me. So I took birth as the angry yogi. I sustained that birth for a whole thirty minutes by thinking about it more and dwelling on it and basically grasping the situation over and over and over again through my thoughts and feelings. Of course, there was a lot of delusion because I wasn't seeing it. There was a very solid taking of birth as an angry walker.

Then, when I could see what was happening, mindfulness came in and identified it as anger, I could release it. In just a few minutes, the anger passed and I was happily doing walking meditation. That angry yogi died then. He had a lifespan of about thirty minutes. He was very real. It was a very real formation of personality characteristics. Then he passed away. I took birth, lived out a lifespan—thirty minutes in this case—and then passed away.

So that was an example of an unpleasant birth, an unhappy birth. But there are other examples of happy births that also take place here every day.

You come in for a sitting. And all of a sudden, you notice the mind has gotten really still. Everything has just settled down. The body feels relaxed but very comfortable. You're fully present. There are not a lot of thoughts dragging you away. The body energy is settled. Not a lot of hindrances going on. Wherever you turn your attention, you can connect kind of effortlessly. Feel the breath. Pay attention to sounds. Open up to choiceless attention. And you're just there moment after moment with a sense of ease and peace.

And now you realize, this is what I always knew my meditation could be like. It's taken me three weeks, but I've figured it out. Now I know how to meditate. I know the secret to this stuff. Wow, this is going to be so much fun. I'm going to be able to go back into my daily life and carry on conversations like this. I'm going to be completely at ease. I won't be rattled by that next-door neighbor or my boss at work. Wow, I'm going to have so much power in my daily life.

And you think all of a sudden the concentration continues. Wow, I can think anything I want, and it's not disturbing this concentration. This is fabulous. And then let's take this out for a walk. So the bell rings, sitting ends. Go out for a walk with every step. Life is going to be so fantastic from now on. I can't believe this. Can't wait to get back to sit next time. Walk slowly into the hall, sit down. It's all gone. The body energy is all stirred up.

Looking at this as a whole, we can recognize this cycle playing out throughout our entire day. From morning until night, we can observe countless different selves taking birth in response to the various experiences that unfold. Yet eventually we release each one. This is precisely why this process is called the wheel of samsara—we keep getting born into new identities, then letting go and passing away from them.

Upasaka Ki describes how, when we finally let go of whatever we've been clinging to and return to balance, we come back to what she calls "normal mind." This normal mind isn't what the outside world considers normal—we might wish it were! Rather, she calls it normal because it's the place meditators can discover again and again, making it our home base. This is our natural state of balance, though we certainly experience many ups and downs in between our returns to this center.

This quality of clinging—the fourth step in that sequence of contact, feeling, craving, clinging—is precisely where a new self solidifies. This raises a fascinating question: Where does the self actually come from? Is there some pre-existing self that does the grasping? Or is grasping itself simply another mental activity that creates the very sense of self?

Andrew Olendzki, director of the study center down the street, offers beautiful clarity on this point in one of his essays. He writes: "What becomes clear through this analysis of moment-to-moment experience is that grasping is not something done by the self, but rather self is something done by grasping. The self is constructed each moment for the simple purpose of providing the one who likes or doesn't like, holds onto or pushes away what is unfolding in experience."

Let me repeat that profound insight: Grasping is not something done by the self, but rather self is something done by grasping.

This transforms our understanding completely. Every time we take hold of something—whether pleasant or unpleasant—we construct a new sense of self. There's the birth of a new "I" in a new form.

This principle becomes particularly clear when we consider how our minds typically function. The untrained mind is often compared to a monkey mind, and there's an image I find quite helpful of how a monkey travels through a forest. The monkey grabs hold of a vine and swings across on that vine, but generally won't let go of it until there's another vine within reach. Then it swings on that second vine until yet another vine becomes available to grasp.

When we observe the untrained mind—one that's not watching itself with awareness—this is exactly how we all tend to function.

We grab hold of something and don't let go until there's something else to grasp. This process of birthing into a new self happens over and over, moment after moment, with only very brief respites that offer a little pause.

So where is there any freedom in this? This chain that the Buddha laid out—contact, feeling, craving, clinging—he said was one of his most profound insights. The repetitive nature of this cycle is what keeps us on the wheel of samsara. Where is there freedom in it? Are we really doomed to go through this cycle again and again?

If there is some freedom in this cycle, that would be good to know, because not only would it lead to insight here and now, but it would bring the fruit of the path closer to us. Rather than expecting the fruit to come only after many lifetimes, if we could find the fruit of the path now, it would give us tremendous confidence and faith and trust in this process.

The question becomes: how is the chain to be interpreted? Can the chain be broken? Is it a strict causal sequence or only a conditioning sequence—a leading to, but not always?

The right understanding is that the chain is not a strict causal sequence. It is a leading to, not necessarily causal. Classically, where the chain can be broken is between feeling and craving.

This is important to understand. If there's enough mindfulness—and I know you all have experienced this in your meditations here—can you be with a pleasant feeling and not move into greed? Has everybody experienced that? If there's an unpleasant contact, unpleasant feeling tone, can you be with that and not move into aversion? I've heard it a lot in interviews. If there's a neutral experience, can you be with that and not be oblivious, not space out, not go into delusion? I think all of you have experienced those moments in this retreat.

This is really a key point in our practice. This is a point we could call acceptance, non-reactivity, equanimity—where we're fully with the experience of the feeling tone, but we don't move into the reactive formations, we don't move into craving.

You are finding out in your direct experience that it's possible to be with feeling tone—pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral—and not have craving arise in the next moment. This is revolutionary. This is what can get us off the wheel.

It's vital to become familiar with what this feels like, because this place is the sweet spot in meditation. Meditation goes best when we can be there. The more we contact it and recognize it, the easier it is to find that place.

You could call it the place of non-craving. You could call it the place of non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion. You could call it the place of temporary nibbana, as Sally mentioned last night.

One Buddhist teacher put it this way: the whole of the Buddhist path is resting in this gap between feeling and craving. Finding this place where feeling is present and you're fully with it, you're really aware, you're totally mindful, but it doesn't lead into craving. That's the place to rest. The whole of the path is resting there.

Start to recognize this. Start to explore it. What does that feel like? People will have different descriptions. You might say it feels easeful, spacious, restful, non-conflicted, light. But the word I want to emphasize here is that this place feels free. We can start to feel the freedom that's available when we're not caught in reactive formations.

Resting in that gap is the path, as this teacher said, but it's also in some way our goal. The definition of nibbana expressed by Sariputta in the suttas is the destruction of greed, aversion, and delusion. Well, we're resting in a place where, relatively at least, greed, aversion, and delusion are absent. So we're getting a little foretaste of this total experience of nibbana.

This freedom is like the nibbana of an awakened one. It's not as full, it's not as complete, it's not finished, but it's a little bit of the same stuff. It's the path and it's also the goal.

As we start to feel into it, recognize it, and access it more, it starts to expand. More of our practice comes from this place that feels like a fruition—feels like an end point, not a total end point, but a kind of reaching of an end point.

Something else about this resting place: feeling tone is there, but we're not reacting out of blind conditioning. Greed, aversion, and delusion are blindly conditioned reactions. We're not reacting out of those. So somehow the mind has found a place that's not being determined by the conditions. The conditions would say, "Oh, you should go now to greed, aversion, delusion." But our mind isn't being determined by that. We're not being forced into that conditioning.

So we've also found something in here that is less conditioned, leaning toward the unconditioned nature of things. We're not being determined by the conditions—we've stepped out of the conditions to a certain extent—and so we've touched a little bit on the unconditioned, which is a synonym for the Dhamma. So we start to see this resting place as a kind of dhammic way to be, and then conditioned things go on at the same time. They don't necessarily interfere with that.

This is a quote from Ajahn Chah. It's a little long, but I hope you'll stay with it:

"The Buddha talked about conditioned and unconditioned things. Conditioned things are innumerable—material and immaterial, big and small. If our mind is under the influence of delusion, it will proliferate about these things, dividing them up into good and bad, pleasant and painful, likes and dislikes. Why does the mind proliferate like this? Because there is still the belief that all these things are oneself or belong to oneself. The tendency to conceive things as oneself is the source of suffering, birth, old age, sickness and death. This is the worldly mind, spinning around and changing at the directives of worldly conditions. This is the conditioned mind.

The unconditioned refers to the mind that has seen the Dhamma, the truth of conditioned things as they are—as transient, imperfect and ownerless. When we know conditions as neither ourselves nor belonging to us, we let go of conditions and attain the Dhamma. We enter into and realize the Dhamma. When we attain the Dhamma, we know clearly."

So resting in this gap, we can be at peace, and yet all the conditioned world is still unfolding. We're not caught up in it. We're at rest. We're at peace, but we're also fully aware. And by resting, not grasping, we're not giving rise to a new sense of I. So we're not taking a new birth at that point. We're not creating a new self with this rest. So not taking birth, we're also not subject to dying.

There's this kind of sweet sequence in the Sutta Nipata where a bunch of young brahmins come to ask questions of the Buddha. In that day, the brahmins were the religious elite, and the wanderers—like the Buddha and other ascetics—were kind of outside the realm of normal society. And so the brahmins tended to look down on them. So when young brahmins would come to ask questions of the Buddha, it was just kind of a sweet stepping out of their social role because they had a deep spiritual interest and weren't so concerned with the social role at that point.

So this is one brahmin youth asking his question. His name is Todeyya. He asked the Buddha, "For one who is freed, what is that liberation like?" Wouldn't you have loved to ask this question? What is that liberation like?

And the Buddha replied, "That sage is without desire. He has nothing. He is unentangled in becoming."

So again, this pointing to unentangled nature.

Ajahn Chah had a nice gloss on this concept of becoming. You can imagine him giving a Dharma talk in Thailand. The Dharma talks were usually given in outdoor halls. They had a floor, they had a roof, and they had pillars supporting the roof, but they didn't have walls. They weren't closed in because the temperature was so mild they could just let the air come and go. So imagine Ajahn Chah giving a talk in an outdoor sala, a hall like that.

And he would point and say, "The roof is a becoming, the floor is a becoming, but in the empty space between the roof and the floor, there's nowhere to stand. There's no becoming. Where there is no becoming, that's where there's emptiness." And to put it bluntly, we say that nibbāna is this emptiness.

So when we rest in this gap, we're not becoming. We're not taking a stand. We're not taking a stand on any of the sense phenomena that are coming our way. In that, there's a kind of empty place. And in that emptiness, we're not being born. And so we're not subject to death.

This is from Ajahn Jomian, another Thai Forest teacher: "The best way to develop a great awareness is to rest your attention within that knowing space of consciousness, in the pure space of knowing. If you understand and can rest in this pure knowing, that is the place of the deathless." From this pure consciousness that's unmoved by what arises, then you see the phenomena of the world, which all have the nature to arise and pass away. Phenomena show their dharmas of impermanence, and this other is the dharma of the deathless.

Oh, and yet, we're still fully aware—full presence, full knowing, all the sense phenomena are in contact.

So by balancing in this place, this gap between feeling and craving, we're moving into a place of unbecoming, which has an undying and unconditioned quality.

One of my teachers in Thailand, another Thai Forest teacher, was Ajahn Buddhadāsa. He was one of the great masters in Thailand in the last half of the last century. He seemed always to be resting in this place. I never saw him move out of this place.

Frankly, it kind of disturbed me as I was getting to know him because he was very accessible in those days. He was kind of iconoclastic. He had a habit of speaking his mind, and whether that was against the government or the military or the social order, he'd just tell it the way he saw it.

In the days that I was there, he was always available to us as monks or to the visitors who came to the monastery. After breakfast, he would just sit on this stone bench that was outside his little house. And the forest chickens would come out, and they'd be scratching around in the dirt at his feet. The temple dogs would be wandering around. A couple of them would be lying at his feet.

These temple dogs, I swear, they always could smell a Westerner. They'd bark at us and bite at us, but they'd let the Thai monks go by. So it was always a little bit of a challenge to go up and visit with Ajahn Buddhadāsa. You never knew if you were going to get attacked by a temple dog.

But if I wanted to ask him a question about Dharma, I could just go up basically any day and visit with him there. I could go up, make my three bows, and then address him. And his expression never changed. I'd make my bows, I'd start to ask my question. He wouldn't say, "Oh, how nice to see you today," or "Is your practice going well?" or "Could I get you a cup of tea?" He's not like a Western Vipassana teacher. He was just sitting there watching everything arise and pass away, observing all the phenomena of his senses, and he was observing me too.

So at first I took it as a rejection. He's not being at all friendly. He doesn't want me here. But I'd stay and ask my question. He wasn't impatient at all. And it took me a long time to realize that if I wanted to hang out there for quite a while and talk Dharma, I could. But normally I got intimidated and I thought, he doesn't want me here. So I'd get up and go.

But he was equanimous about the arisings and passings. And he was equanimous about my arising and passing. He didn't care if I came, asked questions, or went away. It was just all the same to him. So he rested in this great balance. And looking back, I really admire him for that.

At some point in one's meditation practice, it can become skillful to make a little bit of a shift. We start off looking very closely at the objects of the senses.

It's really important in Vipassana meditation that we become quite skilled at looking at the six sense doors and their associated objects so that we see how we can get caught and entangled with each one. It's only through clear investigation of sense phenomena that we learn how not to get caught.

When we've grown somewhat skillful at noticing and being mindful of different sense objects, sometimes the question arises: I've become pretty fluent with objects—what's the subject side like? In other words, there's all this awareness happening, and usually we focus it on knowing objects, but what about the quality of awareness itself? Here I'll use awareness as a broad kind of mindfulness, a knowing of objects in an expansive way—not so much focusing on particulars, but on this faculty that knows in a comprehensive manner.

We start to realize that objects are not ultimately where fulfillment lies. They cannot satisfy. If we cling, we suffer. None of them will give lasting happiness. The quality of awareness itself becomes more interesting as time goes by, and we might want to direct more of our attention there.

I want to briefly discuss two approaches for doing this—two meditation methods I mentioned that lead toward placing awareness on awareness itself.

The first is a practice we've alluded to several times, which I want to spell out more clearly. I learned this from Sayadaw U Tejaniya: the process of checking regularly on our attitude, which is his term for our relationship to whatever experience we're having in that moment.

We've discussed this—checking whether there's greed, aversion, or delusion in the mind. This is what he recommends. Simply carry on with meditation, being mindful of arisings and passings, with your anchor—breath, body, sounds, choiceless attention, whatever. Then turn and ask: what's my relationship to those experiences? Is there greed, aversion, or delusion in my relationship to them?

This isn't always easy to see, so he suggests three simple questions. To check for greed, ask: "Am I wanting something else to happen?" To check for aversion: "Am I wanting something to stop happening?" And to check for delusion: "Am I not in touch with what's happening?" Usually by the time you ask about being in touch, you're already back in touch. The answer to delusion is usually no. But very often we discover, yes, I would like something to happen—I want more peace in this sitting. Or I want something to stop—I don't want this pain or wandering mind to continue.

If you see greed, aversion, or delusion, don't be judgmental about those reactions. Simply make that reaction the new subject for mindfulness. Don't judge it, don't try to push it away or make it disappear. Just include it as part of your experience now. Be mindful of that.

When I first started practicing this way, I was doing choiceless attention practice, but perhaps every ten minutes—maybe five times per sitting—I would turn and check my attitude. As I grew more comfortable with it, I could check without so much internal dialogue. I wouldn't need to go through elaborate questions. Having practiced it repeatedly, I could simply turn inward and see if there was greed, aversion, or delusion present.

Then I became more interested in this investigation. I really saw there was tremendous depth to this question of how I was relating. So I started checking more often—ten times per sitting. Eventually I realized that if my mind was steady, this could become my main practice. If I didn't need sense objects to steady the mind, if there was inherent steadiness, I could remain tuned in to the arising of greed, aversion, or delusion.

By staying attuned to this, I was more often able to see these patterns arising, and often that very seeing, when the pattern was weak, would release it. It became a very helpful way to center myself and not get carried away so much by greed, aversion, and delusion.

Upasika Kee says the same thing: "Your awareness has to take a firm stance right at the mind in and of itself. When mindfulness is standing firm, the mind won't be affected by the objects of sensory contact. If mindfulness slips and the mind goes out latching onto things, troubles will arise. You have to keep checking on this in every moment. There's nothing else that is so worth checking on."

This, then, is Sayadaw U Tejaniya's practice of checking on attitude, and eventually it can become the primary practice when the mind is stable.

So this is one approach. The second approach in meditation is to turn awareness toward awareness itself.

As you're sitting here now, let your eyes roam if they're open, or your ears if they're open, to all the objects in the room. Notice the beautiful things and the things that are not so appealing—the nice sconces on the walls, the shiny faces of the yogis who have been in retreat for three weeks already. You're getting more beautiful every day. Notice the texture of the floor and the walls, and anything that's unpleasant that you might react to. Just let your eyes latch on and delight and play with that field of pleasant and unpleasant.

Now, instead of sending that attention outward, what if it's turned back on the awareness itself? Or you might say the source of the knowing. Does that feel any different? You've been out, out, out, out, out—awareness going out through the eyes, latching on to things, getting involved, liking, disliking. Now you come back and you turn it inward, back toward awareness itself. Does it feel any different? Do you feel a shift when you do that?

Sometimes people say that brings a little sense of relief, a little sense of ease, a sense of disentangling, a sense of spaciousness, of stepping back, of settling down a little. You can play with it in your meditation. Sometimes it offers a way that we can unhook from a fixation on sense objects, coming back into awareness itself.

This is not a simple meditation instruction like "notice the sensation of your breath at the nose." This quality of looking at awareness is very subtle. I think it's the most subtle way to look in meditation, so it may not be so apparent at first. That's okay. Just play with it over time if it appeals to you.

Different phrases are used to suggest this, and different ones might work better for you than others. Some are: turn your attention to awareness, become aware of awareness, turn awareness back on itself. Or sometimes you might ask the question: who is aware? Or what is knowing? There's all this going out, knowing, liking, disliking, sense objects, pleasure, pain. Then ask, who's knowing? And just come back inside and feel how that settles.

"The mind that's aware of awareness doesn't send its knowing outside this awareness." This is Upasaka Ki's description of the way to this unentangled knowing. In this language, we send our awareness outside when we get involved in sense contact. And outside in this case means not just the objects outside us, but even the body and even the thoughts and moods that are inside, quote unquote, that are part of mind objects. We stay just with the awareness itself. Anything else is outer.

"The mind that's aware of awareness doesn't send its knowing outside this awareness. Nothing can be concocted in the mind when it knows in this way." In other words, an inward staying, unentangled knowing, all outward going knowing cast aside.

This inward turning doesn't mean that we cut off from the world. When you ask a question like "who is knowing?" or "what is aware?" or turn awareness to awareness, do you lose contact with your senses? Do you lose touch with the world? No. Sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thoughts, feelings—they all still come. But it's as though we've moved into a little different center of gravity. And it's a center that's not bound to whether things are there or not. But if we need to relate, we're still in touch. We're in touch from an even more peaceful place.

If you like, you can play with this. We're going to do another meditation in a couple of days that will give another avenue into this, probably an easier way in. But for now, if you'd like to play with the sense of turning toward awareness, do it sometime when you feel a little stuck. Some kind of greed has caught in, some kind of aversion. You feel entangled. There's contraction. There's something unpleasant. Turn to the knower or the knowing. I'm just using knower as "who is knowing," not that there's someone there. Turn to the knowing. Turn to awareness. See if you can feel that.

And see how that feels in relation to this place of being caught, being entangled, hanging on to something.

When the Buddha was visited by these Brahmin youths, this is another question from another young man named Kappa: "For one stranded in the middle of the lake, in the flood of great danger, overwhelmed with aging and death, tell me the island, dear sir."

And the Buddha replied: "Having nothing, clinging to nothing, that is the island. There is no other. That is Nibbana, I tell you, the total ending of aging and death."

So let's just sit for a minute, please.

Having nothing, clinging to nothing, that is the island. There is no other. That is nibbana, I tell you, the total ending of aging and death.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 46

Mettā: Tenderness and Connection

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong examines how mettā (loving-kindness) practice gradually develops two profound qualities: tenderness and connection. Drawing from the Buddha's teaching on the eleven benefits of loving-kindness practice, Armstrong explores how these qualities grow slowly over time, much like equanimity develops through vipassanā meditation.
>
> The talk weaves together inspiring stories of compassion in action—from marine biologists rescuing a whale to community members stopping traffic for a duck family—illustrating our fundamental interconnectedness. Armstrong references the Jewel Net of Indra from the Avatamsaka Sutra and the Buddha's teaching that all beings have been our relatives in past lives, pointing to our deep connection beyond apparent separation.
>
> The discussion covers how mettā naturally leads to bodhicitta (the awakening heart) and supports ethical conduct through the precepts. Armstrong shares examples from contemporary figures like the Dalai Lama and Aung San Suu Kyi, demonstrating how loving-kindness practice strengthens the heart against anger and criticism. The talk concludes with the recognition that compassion is, as the Dalai Lama states, "the best source of happiness for happy life and happy world."

The talk this evening is on loving kindness, tenderness, and connection.

The loving kindness practice brings so many benefits into our lives. It makes life sweeter, warmer, and more enjoyable. It brings a quality of concentration, greater comfort with ourselves, and therefore greater comfort and ease with others. It reduces the amount of judgment that we bring to ourselves and the judgment we bring to others.

The Buddha said that there were eleven benefits of loving-kindness practice. I'm going to read this list slowly so that you can feel them. It says that one who has really developed the heart of loving kindness will sleep easily, wake easily, and have pleasant dreams. People will love you, devas and animals will love you, and devas will protect you. Weapons can't harm you. The mind is joyful. Your face is serene. You will die peacefully. And when you die, you'll be reborn in a happy destination.

Kind of makes it worth it, doesn't it? I'd sign up for that. That's a great list.

But I want to talk tonight about two benefits that come to us from loving kindness practice that develop rather slowly. These are the qualities of tenderness and connection. These qualities grow slowly, kind of in the same way that through vipassana practice equanimity grows slowly.

A lot of experiences come and go in doing our mindfulness practice. A lot of insights come and pass away. If we look for something that's an enduring result from years of vipassana practice, one of the things we can definitely point to is a growth in equanimity. The mind is less ruffled by the alternations of pleasure and pain that meet us. This is something that is a lasting fruit from that practice.

With mettā, I would say that these qualities of tenderness and connection are also lasting fruits. But like equanimity, they grow slowly. Different experiences in loving-kindness come and go, and these build over a long period of time.

One of my teachers put it like this. He said, "Experiences are like clouds, but true realization is like space." So experiences are like clouds in that they're always coming and going, taking different shapes, different forms, here for a little bit, passing on. Realization is like space in that it's always there, and it's a little underappreciated at first. But as time goes by, it seems to expand, expand, expand, and we realize that's where our freedom is.

So through loving-kindness practice these qualities of tenderness and connection grow over time like realization in vipassana practice. That's what I want to talk about tonight.

There is for us in being people a kind of inherent tenderness because we're sensitive beings. If you look in the animal world, for example, other creatures don't have this bare skin that's exposed to the four elements. We have horses on the land at Spirit Rock. It's fun. They're out where yogis can watch them. A lot of people do because there's not much entertainment when you're a yogi. People love to walk by and look at the horses.

What you'll find, because we do a long retreat in February when it rains a lot, you'll often see the horses standing outside while the rain is falling down upon their skin, a cold rain. Even though there's a shelter they could move under, they sort of don't bother to do it because their skin is just not as sensitive as ours.

But we have very sensitive skins, and we also have very sensitive emotions or hearts. So in our practice of loving kindness, we take advantage of this sensitivity. It's built on this quality of sensitivity, and we grow it by examining one another's welfare. The practice of loving kindness is all about: How are you doing? I hope you're safe. How are you doing? I hope you're happy. How are you? I hope you're healthy.

I hope you're at ease.

We check this over and over again for ourselves and for others, and in that way we're constantly connecting our heart to others' hearts. The whole practice is about well-being and the feeling of that.

This tuning to other people's welfare, tuning to our own welfare, starts to sensitize our hearts even more. It wakes it up, you could say, to the joys and sorrows of living. We feel those joys and sorrows in our own life. We feel them in others' lives.

The brahmaviharas as a whole are very balanced between joy and sorrow. We tend to emphasize love and compassion a lot in practice, but when we round out the brahmaviharas, there's love, compassion, joy, and equanimity. Metta establishes the caring, compassion tunes into the suffering, but appreciative joy tunes into the happiness in life—our happiness and others'. And all these factors are held within the balance of equanimity.

So we're really exploring through the brahmaviharas how happiness comes, how unhappiness comes. And we don't bias towards suffering or happiness. We open ourselves either to compassion or to appreciative joy, depending on what meets us. In a way, we're working this sensitivity to joy and sorrow all the time with metta.

This is from Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche: "It is as if we had a pimple on our body that was very sore, so sore that we do not want to rub it or scratch it. During our shower, we do not want to rub too much soap over it because it hurts. That sore spot on our body is an analogy for tenderness. Why? Because even in the midst of aggression, insensitivity, or laziness in our life, we always have a soft spot, some point we can cultivate."

"A more vivid analogy might be of an open wound which is always there. That open wound is usually very inconvenient and problematic. We would like to be tough. We would like to come on strong, but there will always be a sore spot. At least we are accessible somewhere. So we are not completely covered with a suit of armor all the time. What a relief."

So this is the beginning of our practice, this point of sensitivity, this soft spot in our being. One of the reasons that it's soft and that we're intrinsically tender is because we're vulnerable. As we've said, as human beings, anything can happen to us in a moment. A visit to a doctor can change our lives. A walk on the beach could change one's life.

We have a good friend who was taking a spiritual journey to southern India a few years ago, staying at a little bungalow on the beach not far from Madras. He went out on the beach on a warm winter morning—it's always warm in Madras—and was doing some movement on the beach, waves coming in, swaying with the gentle tropical breezes. All of a sudden a big wave came up on the beach, and he thought it looked kind of strange, this wave, especially because when it went back out, it left a huge gulf as it was leaving. He thought, this is not normal.

It turned out that it was not normal. This was the date of December 26, 2004. He was vacationing there with his partner and he saw this weird outgoing wave. He went to get his partner from the bungalow and said, "Come out, I think something strange is happening." They hopped up onto a concrete wall that was about four feet high. There was a palm tree growing there. He hung onto the palm tree and his friend hung onto him. That's when the second wave hit.

That's the wave that was the tsunami of 2004 that killed tens of thousands of people in the southern parts of Asia and Thailand. The tsunami hit. It came up high, but because he was holding onto the palm tree and they were a little higher and his friend was holding onto him, they were okay. Other people were washed out to sea and never seen again, but he was okay. It was a time when the practice of non-clinging was not advised—but by holding on, they were saved.

So you never know. You're just out on a beach on a warm morning in December, and anything can happen, anything can change.

There's a very interesting story of the life of one Tibetan teacher, Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche. He was born in old Tibet and did years of retreat practice and became a very recognized Dzogchen master. But he fled Tibet after the invasion in 1959, the same year the Dalai Lama fled, and came to India. But things weren't so well established for the Tibetans at that point in India. They were just starting to come out. And so his life had a lot of unexpected turns when he was living in India.

Because he was a very recognized master, he was in demand as a teacher and as a figurehead. But other times things didn't go so easily for him. This is his description of his life: "Sometimes I gave empowerments to great assemblies of people, including dozens of Tulkus and thousands of monks. At other times I was utterly poor, living hand to mouth on the streets in Calcutta, wandering around with my hand out begging for pennies. So many unexpected ups and downs. Who can describe them?"

Life presents us with this really changing array of experiences. How do our hearts stay strong enough to be open to those experiences and not crumble? How do we meet all those kinds of changes and stay strong within? I think this is the gift of the Brahmaviharas. The Brahmaviharas are about strengthening that heart. As we tune in, we see the opportunity for love and compassion everywhere.

This is from Bob Dylan's memoir, Chronicles: "My grandma was filled with nobility and goodness. Told me once that happiness isn't on the road to anywhere, that happiness is the road. Had also instructed me to be kind because everyone you'll ever meet is fighting a hard battle."

When we can approach life from this understanding of the sensitivity that everyone is facing—everyone is vulnerable, and everyone is trying to find their way—it opens us up to a new kind of connection, which sometimes comes through fairly dramatically.

There was a story reported in the San Francisco Chronicle a few years ago about a female humpback whale that was migrating south. These whales migrate from the colder waters up by Alaska down to the warmer waters, where they tend to give birth in Hawaii. She was passing by the California coast, close to San Francisco, about ten to fifteen miles off the coast near the Farallon Islands. She was estimated to weigh forty-five to fifty tons.

But she happened to be swimming in an area where crab fishermen had set up their lines. The way crab fishermen work is that they hang nylon ropes with crab pots, and the pots are quite heavy. She had gotten tangled up in a whole bunch of these lines. Some of the lines had wrapped around her four times, and the crab pots, because they were so heavy, were weighing her down. Each line that she got tangled in, with the weight of the pots, was about a thousand pounds.

A fisherman happened to have his boat nearby and saw what was happening. He noticed that she was being weighed down and was in danger of sinking and drowning. She would struggle to come up to get air, but then the weight of the pots would carry her back down. Then she'd struggle up again, but she would exhaust herself in this cycle.

The fisherman contacted the Marine Mammal Center in Marin County, and they sent a boat out. They gathered a group of divers and went to see if they could help. It took them a couple of hours to get there, and by then she'd been struggling and was getting weaker.

When they came upon her, they looked at the situation and thought, "This is not going to be easy." The only way to save her would be for each of the divers to get in the water and cut through the ropes. But when you're near a whale that big, one splash of her tail could kill you. So there the divers were—safe on the boat, while she was drowning in the water. Do we get in and risk our lives, or do we just say it's too much?

They all jumped in.

Each diver took a special curved knife, and they worked very close to her body cutting through the ropes that were binding her. There were ropes around her back, a line that went through her mouth, one around her tail, and one that caught her front flipper. She was totally tangled up.

They worked for about an hour cutting through the ropes right close to her body. One of the divers said that all the time they were doing it, the whale just floated very passively in the water. Wouldn't you think if there were four strange people around you, you might get a little freaked out? But it seemed like she trusted them. She was just floating there very still, and the diver said she was giving off a strange kind of vibration.

One diver was working right by her face, cutting that line that went through her mouth, and he was working next to her eye. He was swimming and cutting right next to the whale's eye for quite a while, and this is what he said: "When I was cutting the line going through the mouth, her eye was there winking at me, watching me. It was an epic moment of my life."

Can't even imagine that.

So after an hour, they managed to cut all the lines and she was free. When the whale realized she was free, she began swimming around in circles in apparent joy, according to the rescuers. She then swam up to each diver, nuzzled him, and then swam to the next one. "It felt to me like she was thanking us, knowing that she was free and that we had helped her," one of the divers said. "She stopped about a foot away from me, pushed me around a little bit, and had some fun. She seemed kind of affectionate, like a dog that's happy to see you. I never felt threatened. It was an amazing, unbelievable experience."

So at moments like that, this connection to life just comes through so dramatically. Can you imagine the human consciousness and the whale consciousness kind of eye to eye like that in that meeting? It's really beautiful.

This quality of love and compassion can lead to that kind of connection. It's so important because part of our delusion, part of our ignorance is we only see the separateness. We tell ourselves again and again that we're different. "I'm special. I'm unique. I'm not like everyone else." And because we tell this story again and again, we believe it. And it's only at these times of special contact that we can feel how alike we are.

So these stories are missing half the point. We are different in ways, but we're also just alike in just as many ways. And so the Brahmaviharas practices—loving kindness and compassion—reconnect us with this quality of likeness which we tend to forget.

Researchers are finding that one of the deepest sources of unhappiness for people is a sense of isolation. And we can look at Western culture and see what's happened over the last couple hundred years with the breakdown of the immediate family, the separation of the extended family as people move apart, the loss of community, and so many families living just within their home or apartment and not mingling the way that we all used to. And so in that not mingling, we're losing the sense of the bigger human family that we're a part of.

This isolation has a very frustrating impact on us because we don't get to live as social creatures. And based on that isolation, we tell ourselves more stories about how we're not enough or we're not like everybody else. But it's not true. We're connected in many, many deep ways, and that's part of what I want to talk about during this talk.

One of the ways that we're connected is this beautiful image from the Avatamsaka Sutra of Mahayana Buddhism called the Jewel Net of Indra. The picture is a very cosmological kind of sutra. Later Buddhist teachings got very cosmological. So this one is the image of the cosmos as a vast net. So you can just imagine a big net that has vertical ropes and horizontal ropes. And at every place the two meet, they're joined by a gem, a jewel, which is at the intersection.

So there are all different kinds of jewels on this net and this net is infinite. It stretches across the whole of the cosmos. So there are emeralds and rubies and diamonds and sapphires and they're all these translucent or transparent gems. So at each intersection, there's a gem and that represents consciousness. It represents a sentient being.

And if you look inside a gem, what it contains is an image of the whole rest of the cosmos. So any jewel that you look at is reflecting all the other jewels and that whole net that ties them together. And that's an analogy for you and me. Each one of us reflects a whole universe of beings and nature and meaning. That's what a human consciousness is. That's what it holds. Each of us reflects the whole or has within us the whole, just like the gems on the jewel net.

So when you start to think about that, are you really separate or isolated from anybody? I mean, right now, in this moment, I'm part of your experience and you're part of mine. So you're in my consciousness and I'm in yours. So in this way, we're more than connected. We interpenetrate each other. We become each other. So we're connected in that way.

Then we're also deeply connected on a heart level. This is a poem from Naomi Shihab Nye, a Palestinian-American poet called "Kindness."

She and her friend got out and gently guided the baby ducks up onto the concrete divider to join their mother. But then Caroline realized the mother duck still needed to cross the other three lanes going in the opposite direction to reach the bay. So she and her friend walked over to those lanes and began waving down traffic in both directions.

Now picture this scene: a busy six-lane highway in Marin County, and all these cars—maybe fifty or sixty vehicles—coming to a complete stop so that one duck family could cross the road safely. Caroline said that as she stood there directing traffic, she looked at all these faces in their cars. Nobody was honking. Nobody seemed irritated or impatient. Everyone was just quietly waiting, watching this little drama unfold.

The mother duck, with her babies following in a line behind her, waddled across those final three lanes. They made it safely to the grassy area near the bay, and then all the traffic resumed.

Caroline said what struck her most was seeing how readily people stopped their busy lives for this duck family. It made her realize something beautiful about human nature—that we have this natural impulse to protect life, especially when we see a mother caring for her young.

This story captures something essential about loving-kindness practice. We already have this capacity within us. It's not that we need to manufacture compassion or create it from scratch. We're just learning to extend what we already naturally feel in certain situations—like watching a mother duck protect her babies—to a wider and wider circle of beings.

When we practice metta, we're cultivating this innate quality of the heart. We're training ourselves to access that same tenderness we feel for the duck family, that same spontaneous wish for safety and well-being, and learn to offer it more consistently and more broadly.

This is why the Buddha called loving-kindness a "natural state." It's not foreign to us. It's not something we have to import from outside ourselves. It's recognizing and nurturing what's already there, this basic wish for all beings to be free from harm and to experience happiness.

They were too small. So Caroline went out and gave each of them a little boost. So the mother and the six ducklings are all up on the divider—not over yet.

Then the mother jumps down on the other side to head to the bay, and the traffic in the other direction starts backing up. People are honking and leaning out of their windows, shouting: "What's the problem? Get it moving! What's happening?" Caroline and her friend go to the other side and stop those three lanes of traffic, holding them up while they escort the duck and the six ducklings safely across, where they finally have a straight shot to the bay.

"Just as a mother protects with her life her child, her only child." I thought that was such a beautiful gesture—"I don't care if I'm going to hold up six lanes of traffic, I'm going to get the ducks across." That's metta in action.

This feeling of caring for others can become truly boundless. It's not limited in who it can be extended to. I want you to think into this a little bit, because it leads to another beautiful quality.

Suppose we're able to develop this kind of boundless loving-kindness and compassion. We realize that for all sentient beings, we really don't want them to suffer—we want them to be happy. We can generate this limitless love and compassion in our own hearts that feels authentic and genuine. We'll do that meditation in another week with the loving-kindness practice.

Then the question arises: if you really want all those other sentient beings not to suffer and to have the best kind of happiness, how can they do that? What's the best way for beings to come fully out of suffering and fully into real happiness?

As we've been discussing, the most authentic and deepest kind of happiness is the happiness of awakening. When we take metta and compassion to its logical consummation, it becomes the wish that all beings everywhere come to awakening.

Then how can we best support that? Wishing is good, but is there another way we could be more effective? We wonder: can I really help others come out of suffering if I haven't come out of suffering myself? Could I help others more fully come out of suffering if I come out of suffering myself?

This inclination can become a motivation in practice—as the most effective way to help other beings come completely out of unhappiness, I could come out of unhappiness first and then help them.

This aspiration has gotten a name in the Buddhist tradition. This aspiration to awaken ourselves in order to help others awaken is called bodhicitta. The literal meaning: bodhi is awakening, and citta is mind or heart. A beautiful translation is "the awakening heart." We can see it as the logical conclusion of metta and compassion for all beings, brought back as a motivation in our own practice.

I mention this in case you like it as a motivation—it resonates for me. At the start of every sitting, I make the aspiration: "May I come to awakening in order to benefit sentient beings." Every time I start a sit, I remind myself that's one of the reasons I practice.

This is a subtle thing. It's not generally a big flame that takes over our motivation, but it can be a little candlelight that, if you connect with it, you can nurture and it can grow stronger. It's not easy to maintain this as a motivation—doing this much work for the benefit of other people doesn't come so easily. But if we nurture it, it can become a real motivation.

Even the Dalai Lama says it's difficult. So if he says it's difficult, it's okay for us too! He said, "I cannot pretend that I am really able to practice bodhicitta, but it does give me tremendous inspiration deep inside me. I realize how valuable and beneficial it is."

This loving-kindness, through this sense of connection, also expresses itself through our conduct. When we think about the precepts and their meaning, we realize they really come out of a sense of loving-kindness. We wish for others' happiness, so we don't want to harm them in any way.

The Buddha said that as we develop the precepts, we're offering a gift to other beings—the gift of freedom from fear. You can feel this if you know someone who has really developed their conduct well. They create an atmosphere of safety. When people come into the field of their presence, they feel safe. This is that gift of fearlessness.

This can be cultivated to a very high degree. The Dalai Lama was being interviewed by Oprah Winfrey a few years ago, and I have to say I have great appreciation for Oprah and her skillful editors, because they have brought teachings that help people to a very broad and popular audience through her television show, her magazine, and now her television network. Those of you from Europe may not know, but Oprah has established her own TV network in this country called the Oprah Winfrey Network, which she describes as "mindful television." You've got to love it—mindful television.

She has carried teachings from many of our friends out to this very wide audience, including James Baraz, who appeared in O Magazine, and Sharon, Jack, and Joseph. Joseph did an article on non-attachment in relationship and earned him the nickname "Dr. Love." That was Joseph's contribution.

In this particular interview, Oprah started by asking the Dalai Lama, "Have you ever had to forgive yourself for anything?"

"Small incidents like accidentally killing an insect," the Dalai Lama replied.

"Killing an insect?" Oprah responded.

"My attitude toward mosquitoes is not very favorable," the Dalai Lama continued. "Not very peaceful. Bed bugs also."

"And that's it?" Oprah couldn't quite believe what she was hearing. "In your lifetime, that's what you have to forgive yourself for?"

"Small mistakes every day, maybe," the Dalai Lama said evenly. "But major mistakes, it seems, no."

"No major mistakes," Oprah repeated. She fell silent and looked out the window. "You have nothing in life that you have regrets about. That's a great life to have—no regrets."

"Regarding service to Tibet," the Dalai Lama said, "service to Buddhism, service to humanity, I have done as much as I can. Regarding my own spiritual practice, when I share my experiences with more advanced meditators, even those who have spent years in the mountains practicing single-pointedness of mind, I don't lag too far behind."

Wow. That's impressive. But all that separates us is about fourteen lifetimes of practice, so we can catch up.

This is a beautiful expression of the refinement of his meditation practice and the refinement of his conduct. These two things really go hand in hand. You can't separate them because when the mind is free of greed, aversion, and delusion, it's easier to be skillful in our conduct. And as we purify these forces, our conduct becomes cleaner and more purified also. They really go together.

So loving-kindness is a foundation for sila, for conduct. It's also a foundation for dana, for generosity. It's really the source of generosity. In order for us to want to give, we have to tune in to what someone else is going through and what they really need.

There are many discouraging signs in the world today. Overall, globally, it feels like the darkest period I've ever been alive for. But there are also some very positive signs happening in the world. One thing I'd like to point to is a recent book by Paul Hawken, a New Age commentator and entrepreneur. I'll just read you the title and say a little about it: "Blessed Unrest: How the Largest Movement in the World Came into Being and Why No One Saw It Coming."

The book is about all the individuals and small foundations around the globe who have taken a look at the massive amount of problems that no governments are dealing with, and just said, "I'm going to tackle that one." Very small groups, very committed to social action, environmental action, social justice—maybe on a small scale, but people saying, "I'm going to do what I can to make a difference," and taking their time, energy, money, speaking skills and talents, and rallying these forces to make a difference in the world. One group, one individual at a time.

He made a catalog for this book and counted up something like a million organizations worldwide on this rather small scale, each doing what they can. I think that's extraordinary. I don't think that was going on at that scale when I was a kid.

This awakening of consciousness is part of a global movement happening on an unprecedented scale. I think this represents something fundamentally new in our world - this widespread impulse toward engaged compassion.

Some of these initiatives have gained recognition. Dr. Paul Farmer established health clinics in remote regions of Haiti. Greg Mortensen, despite some financial missteps, has done remarkable work with girls' schools in Afghanistan and Pakistan. Within our own dharma community, we have three friends doing extraordinary work in Burma.

Carol Wilson travels there annually, collecting donations that have grown to tens of thousands of dollars. She creates proper homes for nunneries - buildings, residences, bathrooms - allowing nuns to continue their practice with dignity. She also provides food relief to families devastated by natural disasters, families the government essentially ignores.

Steve Armstrong and Kamala Masters have established a school-building project in Burma. For just $25,000, you can build a complete school. The remarkable thing is that if you build the school, the government will provide a teacher. They won't build the infrastructure, but they'll staff it. Over recent years, Steve has traveled there with donor funds, typically constructing four to five schools annually.

Our friend Hal Nathan, former board president of Spirit Rock, established the Foundation for the People of Burma, dedicated to healthcare and sanitation improvements wherever he could find teams to collaborate with. Last year alone, he raised six million dollars to create meaningful change there.

These initiatives spring from individual caring - people who have committed incredible amounts of time and energy to manifest their vision. They express love and compassion through generous action, tuning into suffering and responding with whatever capacity they possess. This quality of heart remains central to all genuine service.

Alice Walker, author of The Color Purple, captured this beautifully: "As I get older, I realize the thing that I value the most is good-heartedness." This is exactly what our metta and compassion practices generate - this fundamental good-heartedness from which so much else flows.

Trungpa Rinpoche continued his teaching about the sore spot on our body, saying: "There's also an inner wound called Tathagatagarbha, or Buddha nature. This is like a heart that has been sliced and bruised with wisdom and compassion. When the external wound and the internal wound begin to meet and communicate, then we begin to realize that our whole being is made up of one complete sore spot altogether. This is called bodhisattva fever. That vulnerability is compassion. We really have no way to defend ourselves anymore."

This creates a beautiful sense of connectedness with life. As this quality develops, it also creates a strong presence in the heart that naturally guards against the hindrance energies of the mind.

A few years ago, we had a remarkable opportunity - the Dalai Lama came to Spirit Rock for a day and a half. About two hundred Buddhist teachers, both Western and Asian, spent time with him. The first day's format was somewhat awkward - different people would make presentations about aspects of Western Buddhism, usually three presenters with five to ten minutes each, followed by requests for his comments.

It was quite touching to observe. Sometimes he had much to say. Other times, after three presentations, when asked for response, he'd simply say, "Oh, nothing left up here. First person spoke, I had something to say, but then other people kept talking. Now all gone." He would just laugh about his memory, completely unbothered, and remain peacefully quiet.

One presentation focused on Buddhism's growing popularity in the West. A Western presenter said something rather bold: "Your Holiness, you are the biggest popularizer among all of us. This has led to things like a perfume called Samsara and a resort advertising 'We'll carry you to Nirvana the first day.' Your Holiness, this popularization risks trivializing the Dharma. What do you think?"

The Dalai Lama sat quietly, reflecting. Then he replied: "Some people call me Living Buddha. Others say I am God-King, but I am not. I'm just a simple Buddhist monk. But then others call me counter-revolutionary, or say I'm a wolf in monk's clothing. But you see, I look back at my own intention."

He said, "I got to Bangkok and I was standing in line to buy a ticket to Paris, and I just thought about my people here in the camp. How can I abandon them? So I turned around and got on a train back to the camp."

His supporters said, "But what about the threats on your life?" And he said, "If they want to kill me, they can kill me. But I'm not going to abandon the Dharma or abandon my people."

So he stayed and continued teaching. And remarkably, over the years, as Cambodia began to stabilize, Maha Ghosananda became one of the most respected figures in the rebuilding of the country. He organized peace walks across Cambodia, bringing together former enemies to walk side by side in reconciliation. His unwavering commitment to loving-kindness, even in the face of death threats, became a beacon of hope for an entire nation torn apart by hatred and violence.

The power of his practice of metta was that it enabled him to see beyond the immediate threat to the larger healing that was needed. He understood that only through love could the deep wounds of his people be healed. This is the transformative power of loving-kindness - it doesn't just protect us from anger, it enables us to act with wisdom and courage even in the most difficult circumstances.

These examples from the Dalai Lama, Aung San Suu Kyi, Martin Luther King, and Maha Ghosananda show us that loving-kindness isn't just a nice feeling or a spiritual luxury. It's a practical tool for navigating life's challenges with grace and effectiveness.

When our hearts are established in metta, we become unshakeable in our commitment to what is wholesome and beneficial, regardless of external circumstances or opposition.

This brings us to one of the most profound aspects of loving-kindness practice: it creates what we might call "fearless compassion." When we're truly rooted in metta, we're no longer driven by the need to protect ourselves from criticism, rejection, or even physical harm. Instead, we're free to act from wisdom and care for the benefit of all beings.

He said, "Oh, I had more pamphlets printed." So he had 10,000 more pamphlets to distribute saying, "Hatred never ceases through hatred. Hatred only ceases through love." And Cambodia has done a lot of work in reconciliation since that time. When the government got somewhat back together, he returned to the country and became the next patriarch of Cambodian Buddhism. He was a strong leader for years.

So this loving kindness makes the heart strong. It can withstand criticism. It can withstand anger. It can withstand fear. And it's a tremendously healing energy. This quality of love as it develops can heal a lot of our own hurts and injuries.

There's a poem from an Australian man named Michael Leunig: "When the heart is cut or cracked or broken, do not clutch it. Let the wound lie open. Let the wind from the good old sea blow in to bathe the wound with salt and let it sting. Let a stray dog lick it. Let a bird lean in the hole and sing a simple song like a tiny bell and let it ring."

So loving kindness has this great healing energy and connects us through the uniting energy of care to all other beings, all other people. We start to understand that we're not so different and we're not so separate, that we're actually put together in pretty much the same way. When we look at our bodies, they're not that different. There are minor variations, but we all have eyes and nose and tongue and ears, heart and mind, belly. Our bodies are more or less the same.

As we start to understand these deeper needs and wishes—safety, happiness, health and ease—we realize that's pretty much the same also. And you start to feel like there's really just one human heart that has been poured into different vessels and then gone through different experiences and gotten shaped in different ways. But it's fundamentally not any different between any of us. It responds in much the same way in all of us.

And so, although a lot of our thoughts are about how we're different, we could also choose to reflect on all the ways that we're the same. We have the same emotional package. We have the same physical body more or less. And that's the deepest kind of connection. When we see that there's some underlying unity in this human experience, despite all the distinctions, there's some way that we're all alike. It cuts through the sense of separation.

This is a poem from Rumi's teacher Shams of Tabriz: "I, you, he, she, we—in the garden of mystic lovers, these are not true distinctions." And in the garden of loving kindness, these are not true distinctions either. We see an underlying unity despite the apparent differences.

So I just want to close with the way Oprah concluded her interview with the Dalai Lama. And before I read it, I just want to mention that in our tradition, metta is the primary of the Brahmavihāras, and it's the one that we emphasize. In the Tibetan tradition, compassion is seen as the primary one of the four immeasurables. So that's the one they emphasize. But love and compassion are not very different. So what the Dalai Lama says of compassion, we would equally say about love.

This is the conclusion of the discussion between Oprah and His Holiness: "In my magazine, I do a column called 'What I Know for Sure.' So what do you know for sure? The one thing of which you have no doubt." The Dalai Lama did not hesitate. "Compassion is the best source of happiness. For happy life and happy world, there is no doubt."

So let's just sit for a minute, please. Compassion is the best source of happiness for happy life and happy world. There is no doubt.

CHAPTER 47

Kamma and the End of Kamma

Guy Armstrong · 1h04

Guy Armstrong offers a thorough examination of one of Buddhism's most fundamental teachings: kamma (action with intention) and its results. Drawing from core suttas and the Dhammapada, he explains how the Buddha redefined the common Indian concept of action to emphasize volition (cetanā) as the key factor determining whether actions are wholesome or unwholesome. The talk covers the ten unwholesome actions across body, speech, and mind, and explores six ways karmic results manifest - from immediate effects during contemplation and action, to long-term habitual patterns and mysterious future consequences. Armstrong addresses Western resistance to karma teachings, clarifying misconceptions while explaining how this understanding differs from fatalism or indifference. He connects kamma to the brahmavihāras, particularly the equanimity practice of recognizing beings as heirs to their actions, and explores how the teaching relates to anattā (no-self). The discussion culminates in examining how the noble eightfold path leads to what the Buddha called 'the end of kamma' - the cessation of self-centered volition that reveals the unconditioned state of nibbāna.

Kamma and the End of Kamma

The Dalai Lama was once asked if he had to choose between teaching Westerners about karma or about emptiness, which was more important. He said, "If I could only teach about one, I would teach them about karma." We've spent considerable time discussing emptiness on this retreat, but we haven't devoted much attention to karma. Perhaps, by the Dalai Lama's guidance, we've missed something essential. Tonight I want to rectify that.

Why is the teaching on karma so important, especially for us as Westerners? First, because it's not a teaching we're very familiar with in this culture, and second, because it really is the science of happiness. Karma teaches us a clear road to happiness—whatever our aspiration may be, whether for ordinary human happiness, divine happiness, or the happiness of liberation.

I want to preface this talk by saying that some of what I'll discuss tonight is beyond my personal experience and that of most people I know. I'll be relating teachings from the Buddha that I haven't been able to personally verify. I'm not trying to convince you that you should believe in them—I want to make that clear from the start. Whether you believe in them or not is up to you. It's not my job to make you believe; it's simply my job to tell you what the Buddha said. Then you can decide for yourself.

Don't feel you have to subscribe to anything in tonight's talk, and don't feel you have to figure it out this very evening. Many of these concepts may be new, so just let them settle, take them in, and try to keep an open mind. But I do want to convince you that karma is your best friend along this path. Karma is really your only friend along this path of awakening.

I'll divide this talk into four parts: karma and the concept itself, what the Buddha said about the results of karma, how it relates to anatta (the teaching of no fixed self), and what's meant by this mysterious pointing to the end of karma.

What is Karma?

Karma is a Sanskrit word. The Pali word is kamma. If you read the Buddhist texts in Pali, the word will be kamma, but they're identical—they mean the same thing. This was another common Indian word that the Buddha took and gave special meaning to. The original Indian word simply means action. That's all it means. Karma means action in Sanskrit; kamma means action in Pali. It's a standard concept in many Indian dialects.

But the Buddha put a new spin on it. At the time of his teachings, there were many philosophical schools in northern India, and every one of them had their own interpretation of what action meant, what karma meant. There was a really wide range of philosophical views. People would say things like: karma matters or it doesn't matter; action has consequences or it doesn't have any consequences; all our action is predetermined; all our action is freely chosen. These turned out to be speculative views because most of the teachers at the time didn't know from direct experience what they were talking about. They made up ideas and philosophies and propounded them.

The Buddha put a different spin on the word, and his originality in this understanding, he said, came from his own insight. In the Buddha's definition, karma meant action with volition, or you could say intention. The Pali word here is cetanā, the same word we've been using in the meditation instructions when we talk about mindfulness of intention.

This is how he defined it in one of the passages: "Volition, O bhikkhus, is what I call action, for through volition one performs the action."

This was a revolutionary concept. All the emphasis in other philosophies at the time was about the action itself. But the Buddha's particular emphasis was on the question: What is the intention or volition behind the action? Where does it come from as a motivation?

Synonyms for this word of intention or volition could be urge, motive, impulse, will, or motivation. You get the sense that it's the mental energy that drives the outer action.

Although in fact, thoughts themselves and emotions are also actions. We'll talk about that in a moment. And the Buddha said that actions are wholesome or unwholesome depending on what this inner force is that drives them. If the inner force is wholesome, it's considered a wholesome karmic action. If the inner force is unwholesome, it's considered an unwholesome karmic action.

As you probably can guess, the unwholesome actions are influenced by these three kilesas, the roots of the unwholesome, which are our old friends: greed, aversion, and delusion. And wholesome volition is that volition that comes out of their opposites. The opposite of greed being renunciation, or you could say generosity—letting go in its different forms. The opposite of aversion being loving kindness. The opposite of delusion being wisdom. So the wholesome roots are renunciation, loving kindness, and wisdom.

So in the Buddha's teaching, it's not the action in and of itself, but rather the motivation behind it.

Just a couple of simple examples. An infant is sleeping in its bed, rolls over, and in its sleep knocks over a candle. The candle catches fire to the drapes, and the fire burns the house down. The baby is, of course, saved—I want you to understand that. The baby's been rescued. Don't worry. But the house is burned down. This is not a particularly good outcome, but there is no unwholesome intention behind that knocking the candle over, so there's no karmic impact for the infant. There's no karma in that action. It was just an accident.

Or we could take an action like someone cutting another person through the abdomen with a very sharp knife and blood spews out. Is that wholesome or unwholesome? Depends on the intention. If a surgeon is performing an operation to remove an inflamed appendix, that's a wholesome action based on compassion. If a thief has cut the person in order to subdue them to steal their property, that's an unwholesome action. So the root that we judge by is the wholesomeness of the intention.

And also to be aware that some actions have mixed motives. We can see this a lot. We give someone a gift—there's generosity, but maybe we also want some gratitude in return. So often actions have mixed motives, and that means that they have a mixture of wholesome and unwholesome motivations.

I think what's interesting about this formulation of the Buddha's is that he's pointing to the fact that actions coming out of mental impulses in themselves have moral weight. There are morally wholesome and morally unwholesome actions based on the impulses that they come from. And this has a lot of big implications, which we'll get to.

The Buddha considered that action could take place in three spheres: thought, speech, and body. We're normally used to considering actions of speech and actions of body, but the Buddha said actions of mind can also be volitional. That means that thoughts sometimes come out of a motivation. Emotions sometimes express a motivation. For instance, a motive behind desire is to gain something pleasurable. The motive behind aversion is to get rid of something unpleasant.

But just so you don't get too paranoid in terms of your meditation, actions of thought have relatively little weight compared to actions of speech and body. So let's say you're angry at somebody—the thoughts are kind of angry—but if you don't express it in speech and you don't express it in action, meaning you don't blast the person and you don't punch the person, the karmic effect of the thought itself is relatively weak. It's not non-existent, but compared to the other actions, it's relatively small.

Fortunately, the Buddha was very clear about what kinds of actions are skillful and what kinds are not. He made a list, which appears many times in the texts, of what he called the ten unwholesome actions. Of these, there are three related to bodily action, four related to actions of speech, and three related to actions of mind. This is very helpful because we can understand that these are the ones we need to be careful with. We've already worked some with this topic in exploring conduct and the precepts. Some of them link very closely to the precepts, but it gets even more refined through this list. Some relate to the mind, which we haven't talked about so much.

Here are the ten unwholesome actions. The three unskillful actions of body are: killing living beings, taking what isn't freely offered or given, and sexual misconduct—harming others through our sexuality. And you can clearly see these form the first three of the five lay precepts.

Then there are four actions of speech that the Buddha considered unwholesome: speaking what isn't true, using harsh or abusive speech towards someone, speaking maliciously of others to undermine their reputation, and wasting time in what he called idle speech and gossip. You can sort of get the flavor of this as like gossip—using the events of other people's lives just for entertainment and stimulation and kind of judgment.

And then he identified three actions of mind: covetousness, which is wanting something that belongs to another; ill will, which is wishing someone harm; and the third is quite interesting—wrong view. If we don't understand the world the way it is, which forms right view, the first element in the Eightfold Path, if we don't understand the way the world is, we have wrong view, and that becomes the basis for our relationship with life. If we understand the nature of life incorrectly, that becomes an unwholesome foundation for actions.

So these are the ten unwholesome actions, and the wholesome actions are simply to refrain from the ten unwholesome. It's pretty clear. Then in addition, there are many wholesome actions that go beyond this, but the basic list is to refrain from the unwholesome.

These teachings on karma and skillful action are very helpful to reflect on and take care with in our life in the world. As we've already discussed, the precepts form guidelines that protect us and protect others. The Buddha said that one who has taken real care with their conduct in the world enjoys what he called the bliss of blamelessness. He considered this a very high source of happiness in life. When we are so careful with our conduct that we don't have regrets about the way we have treated others, then we feel this freedom from remorse and freedom from guilt that has a very pleasant quality—this is the bliss of blamelessness.

I mentioned in a talk a while ago how the Dalai Lama had this quality. Someone else who I thought also had this was Dipa Ma. Dipa Ma was this wonderful Indian teacher from Calcutta who visited IMS in 1980 on her first trip to America. Carol and I had an opportunity to look after her at that time. We had been on staff at IMS, and so we were asked to look after her for a month when she first arrived. We were all living together in a house in Western Mass, so I had the chance to see her in many different situations—some situations that would have been trying for me. But I never saw the slightest flicker of anger in her or even impatience.

I particularly remember a visit we took her and her family on. She also had a daughter and a grandson with her at the time. We took them shopping in a department store near Amherst, and the grandson was about four years old—a very rowdy four-year-old. He was loose in this American department store; I don't think he'd ever been in one before. It was spacious and quite big and fun, so he was running down the aisles. Shirts would be falling off and hangers clattering to the ground, and there was Dipa Ma running along behind him, both to pick things up and try to catch him. Her white sari was flapping out behind her as she ran down the aisle, and on her face was just this sweet little smile. There was no frustration, irritation, impatience, or anger—just a very sweet attitude toward her grandson.

In the whole month that we were together, I never saw anything approaching impatience or irritation in her. She was someone who, as far as I could tell, really enjoyed this bliss of blamelessness. She was a very happy and contented person.

So this is the quality of the action itself—really taking care not to harm, not to harm ourselves through unwholesome actions, even with our thoughts.

The reason this is important is that actions have consequences in the Buddha's teachings. So let's talk a little bit about results. I'm sure you're familiar with this basic concept: wholesome actions lead to wholesome results in our lives; unwholesome actions lead to unwholesome results. Wholesome actions lead to happiness; unwholesome actions lead to unhappiness for ourselves. This is clearly stated by the Buddha in one of the first passages in the Dhammapada, where he says:

"Mind is the forerunner of all things. Mind is chief. Speak and act with an impure mind and sorrow will follow you like the wheel of the cart follows the oxen. Mind is the forerunner of all things. Mind is chief. Speak and act with a pure mind and happiness will follow you like your shadow, unshakable."

So this is the basic message of karma and result: wholesome actions lead to happiness; unwholesome actions lead to unhappiness. It's interesting that this notion is becoming fairly well known in modern culture, the basic outline of it.

James and I, some years ago, were teaching a series of classes at a juvenile hall in California. That work was actually the basis for what later became the Mind-Body Awareness Project and the Lineage Project.

We were invited in by a student of James who worked there. For those unfamiliar with the American juvenile justice system, Juvenile Hall is where people stay when they've been arrested and charged with a crime if they're under eighteen. These were teenagers, mostly fifteen, sixteen, seventeen years old, but we were in the maximum security wing. These were young men who had been arrested and charged with crimes like theft, armed robbery, assault, and murder.

Fortunately we had a very good ally who worked with the young people and supported our being there. Otherwise, I don't know if we would have had the nerve to do it. But it was a very good experience for us.

We had completed the entire class series on mindfulness, following the breath, and how to be with difficult emotions. They were a very appreciative audience because they had a lot of time on their hands. Also, they were young people in a very scary situation where a judge could put them away for a long, long time. So many emotions were up for them - fear, anxiety, uncertainty in their lives. They were very receptive to the teachings.

When we got to the last class, James and I talked to each other and said, "Should we talk about karma? I don't know how that would go down." We were also going to talk about sila if we taught karma, and we decided to go for it.

So we began teaching about karma and this understanding that wholesome actions lead to happiness. We simply asked, "Does this sound like something you've ever heard before?" One of the young men said, "Oh, you mean what goes around comes around? Sure, we've heard that." That was pretty cool - it's already out there in the vernacular. What goes around comes around. That's the essence of it.

This sense of things coming around is also expressed in the Tibetan tradition in their phrases for metta and compassion. Tibetans also work with the Brahmaviharas, the same ones that we work with, but they have a slightly different name. They call them the four immeasurables because all the Brahmaviharas are considered to be boundless or immeasurable states.

The Tibetan phrases for metta and compassion weave in this teaching on karma. Let me read you the phrases and you'll see. This is the phrase for metta: "May all beings have happiness and the cause of happiness, which is virtue." This is the phrase for compassion: "May all beings be free from sorrow and the cause of sorrow, which is non-virtue."

What's interesting about this formulation - the way the Buddha expressed it, the way the Tibetan phrases express it - is it applies to all beings. In the Buddhist understanding, it's a universal law. It doesn't matter whether you believe in this or not, it applies. It doesn't matter whether you know it's true or not, it applies. It doesn't matter if your religion believes in it or not, it applies. It doesn't matter if your culture believes in it or not, it applies.

In fact, our whole growth on the path is dependent on this law. So it's fortunate that it applies for us. There are these universal laws, and the Buddha's whole teaching was really about discovering them and revealing them. He did not teach speculative views. He taught things that he understood directly to be the way things are.

Another of those universal laws we discussed last week with Mahagosananda handing out pamphlets and chanting with his Cambodian refugees on the Thai border: "Hatred never ceases through hatred. Hatred only ceases through love. This is an ancient and eternal law." Another phrase from the Dhammapada, one of the Buddha's teachings.

This understanding that virtue is the cause of happiness and non-virtue is the cause of unhappiness is reflected in the phrase for the equanimity practice in the Brahmaviharas. There are different phrases for loving-kindness, for compassion, for appreciative joy, and for equanimity. The equanimity phrase is directly related to the teaching on karma.

Here is the phrase we use for the equanimity meditation: "All beings are the heirs to their karma. Their happiness and unhappiness depend on their own past actions more than on my wishes for them."

This is the classical phrase. Sometimes this isn't so easy, so we soften it for people. But for now, we'll talk about it as the classical approach.

This is a very useful practice if you have friends or family members who you always see making the kinds of choices you wish they wouldn't. Most people know one or two people like this. You wish you could get into their control center when they're about to make the next major choice in their life and say, "Don't do that. That's not the wise way to go." Then you watch the effects play out in their life some months or years later.

As you repeat this phrase, you understand that people make their own choices, and they're going to keep making their own choices—some of which don't help them. Some of their choices lead to their own unhappiness. This phrase gives us equanimity about acknowledging that everybody has their own journey and their own direction in life based on their choices. It brings about a sense of acceptance.

This phrase for equanimity, the Buddha actually stated even more strongly in his teaching. I'll read this passage: "Beings are owners of their actions, heirs of their actions." The word here, of course, is karma, but it means action with volition. "Their actions are the womb from which they are born. Their actions are their friend, their refuge. Whatever acts they perform, for good or for ill, of those they will be the heirs."

This is a powerful message. Our actions are the womb from which we are born. Our very being, moment after moment, emerges from our own past actions—a huge sense of personal responsibility in that formulation.

Westerners often feel a strong resistance to this notion. I think because it's not so familiar in our culture and also because we have a very democratic understanding of the way things ought to be. For those of you who aren't from this country, you might not know that the very beginning of the American Declaration of Independence from 1776, when America formally separated from Great Britain, starts off—I'm just paraphrasing a little—"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all people are created equal."

This is a very deep notion in our culture, the notion of the equality of all human beings, and a very noble and inspiring one. But sometimes I think it leaves a little bit of an impression that all beings should be equally happy. And that doesn't work. Things just don't work that way.

So this teaching on karma, which basically says that we have a lot of personal responsibility for our situation, can seem cold, can seem indifferent, uncaring, and like it glosses over a number of ways that suffering comes to us. We'll explain this a little more as we go along.

But one of the ways this is sometimes felt in the West is that it means if you're unhappy, you deserve it—that beings deserve to suffer. That is not in the notion of karma and it's not in the Buddha's teaching. And I don't think it was at all in his intention in delivering this teaching. I strongly believe if he had had the ability to reach into the heart of everyone he met and pluck out the source of suffering, he would have done it in an instant.

A good example of this is his relationship with Angulimala. Angulimala was a former spiritual student who got some bad instruction. On the advice of his spiritual teacher, he murdered 999 people and collected a finger from each person he'd killed in a necklace which he wore around his neck. That's the literal meaning of his name, Angulimala. And he intended to kill the Buddha as his thousandth and final victim.

The Buddha was walking near Angulimala's hangout place in the deep forest. His friends said, "Don't go there. That murderer is going to get you." But the Buddha said, "I'm not worried," and he went there. He met Angulimala and avoided being killed. Angulimala was so taken with his presence and his centeredness that he asked the Buddha for teaching.

So if the Buddha thought Angulimala deserved to suffer, he would have said, "No, you just live out your karma. You're going to have a really bad road, but you deserve it." But that's not what happened. The Buddha taught him the Dhamma. He ordained Angulimala. Angulimala practiced and became awakened—ending the basic mass of suffering through his awakening.

Now interestingly, when Angulimala went on alms round, he was attacked by local people who knew him as a murderer. He came back to the Buddha and said, "Why are these people attacking me?" The Buddha said, "That's your karma." But he had freed his heart and mind from suffering.

The teaching on karma does not mean anyone deserves to suffer, but it's simply pointing to a natural law. Expecting this law not to operate would be like expecting the law of gravity not to operate. It would be like expecting an apple to ripen and fall from a tree in the orchard down the road and not drop to the ground. You can't arrest the law of gravity, and you can't arrest the law of karma. It simply happens.

Another way that karma is sometimes misheard or misunderstood is that it seems to provide an excuse or rationale for not caring. It's as though we think, "Well, that person is suffering, but that's their karma. So it's their problem. Therefore, that's not my problem." That is not what the teaching of karma is about either. That is called indifference.

Compassion recognizes suffering and wants to help, and it doesn't care what the cause is. The cause could be something from outside, something accidental. It could be something in one's own body, an illness. It could be mental afflictions. It could be something karmic. Compassion doesn't care about the source. It sees suffering, and it wants to alleviate it.

Using a rationale like, "Oh, that's their karma, so that's their problem," to turn off the feeling of compassion is called indifference. And indifference in the Brahmaviharas is recognized as the near enemy of equanimity. In other words, when equanimity isn't ripe and it falls into an unwholesome state that mimics it, it falls into indifference. What this means is that if we're feeling indifferent and rationalizing why we don't need to help somebody, then our equanimity isn't right.

Equanimity supports metta and compassion, but metta and compassion also need to suffuse equanimity. If they don't, equanimity becomes too cold and turns into indifference. In that case, there needs to be a suffusion of compassion that will fill out the equanimity and ripen it so that there's balance but also caring. The heart can then respond to the suffering that we meet.

The results of actions happen in at least six ways, and I want to go through the six ways that they're seen and described.

The first is that before we act, we pick up the energy of the action we're thinking of doing. So if we're thinking about being generous with someone or kind with someone, even as we contemplate that action, it feels good. It uplifts us. It makes us happy to think about helping other people. Similarly, if we think about doing an action that's not kind, that's going to hurt somebody, it feels kind of creepy.

I work on various committees, both at IMS and at Spirit Rock. One time, we had a phone call about what to do regarding a certain situation. It wasn't clear-cut, and so we were all giving our opinions about what we should do. I put forth one opinion, and somebody else on the call put forth a different opinion, which is fine. I don't mind being disagreed with.

But afterwards, the person sent me an email about the topic, restating the disagreement, but in a way that I felt was really dismissive of my view and disrespectful. I felt it was very clear from the email—it was really dismissive and disrespectful. So I didn't feel good about it.

The first thing that occurred to me was, "I think I'll forward this email to the rest of the committee." I thought, "Oh, then they'll see the unskillful nature of my opponent's argument, and that will sway them to come to my side of the argument." But as soon as I saw that my motivation was basically to undermine the person, I couldn't send the email. So I didn't. I didn't forward it. I called the person up and talked about it, but I didn't forward the email because it felt creepy to think about doing that.

The second way that we feel this effect of karma is in doing the action itself. When we're in the process of giving to someone or helping someone, it feels great. A staff person was collecting wood for the winter, and they asked if any other staff would like to help them stack it. It ended up being three and a half cords of wood, which is a lot of work. A bunch of staff people came over and helped them, and in return, their friend offered them some nice food.

And at the end of the day, the staff who had come to help thanked the people who needed their wood stacked. Part of it was for the food, but also because it simply feels good to give. It feels good to help. In a way, they were thanking them for the opportunity to be of service, to be community.

So giving feels good, helping feels good. Hurting somebody feels painful. If you reflect on times when you've caused harm and examine the state of heart and mind in that moment, you'll find it was contracted, unhappy—a state of suffering. Our friend

Sylvia Borstein has a beautiful phrase: "Anyone causing great pain is themselves in great pain." This is true. Reflecting on this can sometimes open a doorway for compassion.

The third way we experience karma is when we've completed an action and reflect back on it. We feel the happiness or unhappiness of what we've done. When we give instructions for sending metta to yourself, we often say: reflect on your skillful actions in the past. Reflect on ways you've been generous. Reflect on ways you've helped people. When you do this, you feel good about yourself. You remember the joy in doing something that helps another, and this creates a wholesome quality that allows the metta to grow more easily.

Similarly, as we enter a long retreat with extended silence, we often remember things we've done in the past that have hurt other people. The forgiveness practice has a whole element directed toward this recollection. Remembering the ways we've harmed others becomes very painful as we grow sensitive and attuned to the precepts, the wish not to harm, and the value of loving-kindness. Those moments in our lives when we haven't been able to live by these values are profoundly painful to feel. We often experience deep guilt or remorse at such times.

The fourth way we can observe karma's influence is that as we treat other people, our actions return to us in relationship. If you tend to be friendly, warm, and generous with people, they welcome you, want to see you, are open with you, and value being with you. If you are irritable, judgmental, or unfriendly, people remember that. When you meet them again, they step back and eventually close off to you, shutting you out. Our actions come back to us in relationship—this too is karmic.

The fifth way we see karma manifest is through what I would describe as habitual states of mind. When we repeatedly engage in certain patterns of thinking and feeling, these are actions arising from intention or volition, and they create patterns that then repeat almost automatically, almost compulsively.

The Buddha taught: "Bhikkhus, whatever a person frequently thinks and ponders upon, that will become the inclination of their mind. If they frequently think and ponder upon thoughts of sense desire, ill will, or cruelty, then their mind inclines to thoughts of sense desire, ill will, or cruelty. If they frequently think and ponder upon thoughts of renunciation, kindness, and compassion, then their mind inclines to thoughts of renunciation, kindness, and compassion."

Through our habitual ways of thinking and feeling, we wear a groove in the mind that makes it easy to fall back into again and again. This is the fifth way we can observe karma's effects.

Then there's the sixth way: according to the Buddha, actions we perform for good or ill can have mysterious results in the future—results we cannot see or understand, but which he said do happen. He described these quite clearly. This sixth way represents aspects of karma we cannot experientially verify, but the Buddha spoke of them with certainty.

For instance, how is it that acting out of kindness brings happiness? It's rather mysterious, isn't it? And yet, that's the basic teaching of the Dhammapada passage—that it simply does.

What I find so fascinating about this entire teaching, which points to the effects of wholesome and unwholesome actions, is what the Buddha seems to be saying: this concept of good and ill—what we call morality—is woven into the very fabric of the universe. It's not something accidental, not merely an adaptive mechanism of evolution, but exists at the center of the laws governing sentient life. Wherever there are sentient beings, these actions and their results apply.

Initially, the teaching of karma can seem cold, impersonal, or uncaring. But as I felt into this message more deeply, I realized what it truly means: we live in a moral universe where morality is one of the central features of sentient existence. This began to feel to me like a universe with a heart—a caring universe. When I then reflected on the idea that there was no morality in the universe, that the universe was essentially cold and amoral, that began to feel very uncaring and heartless.

So as I contemplated this teaching on karma more deeply, it warmed up the whole universe for me. It gave existence a sense of a beating heart, right at the center of all sentient life.

Now the Buddha said that actions play out in complicated ways that we cannot figure out.

He said that the results of karma are one of what he called the four imponderables. He said if you try to figure this stuff out, you will go mad and experience vexation. I'm not sure in which order, but either way, the outcome is not so great. There's no point in trying to figure out how this works. It's beyond the scope of reason. The Buddha said he could intuit it through insight, but it's beyond the scope of reason.

The three other imponderables, in case you're interested, are the range of the mind of a Buddha—the kinds of things that a Buddha can see—the beginning of things, which I take to be the origin of the physical universe, and the power of a concentrated mind. All impossible to figure out.

These imponderables leave us necessarily humble. And the teaching on karma does get misused sometimes. You've probably had this experience where someone you know gets sick, and a friend will say, trying to be helpful, I guess, something like, "Oh, that's your karma." And how does that make the person who's sick feel? Not very good. Like, I have to blame myself for this illness now.

But saying "that's your karma" is just a speculative view. We can't see that, and the Buddha never said that. He was asked at one point whether everything that happens to us in the way of pleasant or unpleasant feeling comes from past action. And he said, "You can't say that." He said you can see for yourself that there are other causes for pleasant and painful feelings. Illness of the body is a cause for painful feeling. Climate is a cause for pleasant or unpleasant feeling. Diet can be a cause. Accident can be a cause. And assault or attack can be a cause. These are all causes for pleasant and unpleasant feeling, and karma is another cause.

This is the way we understand it. It's not that everything in the universe happens because of karma. There are lots of other kinds of causes—physical, chemical, biological, genetic, climatological. Karma is one cause among many. But not everything that happens to us is because of karma, the Buddha said quite clearly.

I think the way to hold this teaching is to take it in broad terms and mostly look forward, knowing that wholesome actions will lead to more happiness, unwholesome actions will lead to more unhappiness. It doesn't work so well as a rearview mirror. Like, how did I get here? It must have been that karmic action. I don't think so. We can't see that. The Buddha said that he could in certain cases, but we can't. So speculating on that doesn't really take us anywhere.

There are these six ways that we can describe the workings of karma, six ways we can see the results. When somebody says, "I don't believe in karma," usually what they mean is they don't believe in this sixth kind, this mysterious kind that the Buddha talked about that we can't see directly. But the other five we can see and understand. So I wouldn't just take it on faith if we're inclined to say we don't believe in karma. We don't believe in one small slice, perhaps, of the teaching on karma.

You may or may not resonate with this teaching at this point. It took me a lot of years of hanging out with it, observing and reflecting on it over a long period of time to get confidence in this teaching. At this point, I have a lot of confidence in it. I've looked at my own life. I've looked at the lives of many of my friends over thirty, thirty-five years. I have a lot of confidence in this message, but it took me a while to get there.

What I'd recommend is if you feel unsure about this, just let your mind open to the possibility. You could close off and say, "That's not true. I don't believe that." But this "that's not true" thing—we don't know either. To say that's not true is just another view and opinion. There's no basis from which you can know that. The proper attitude, as I understand it, is just to stay open. Consider it as a possibility and watch as your life unfolds and as you practice the dharma, and see what you think.

Just hang out with the possibility and consider and reflect on it.

So then the next place that this leads, of course, is the question of rebirth. Because to fully understand the workings of karma, for it to fully play out, it has to be seen across lifetimes. We look at a figure like Hitler, for example. I don't see enough suffering in this lifetime proportionate to his misdeeds. So in order to consider where the karmic result might be taking place proportionate to his actions, I have to look at a future life. And the Buddha described this again and again also.

So as I understand it, rebirth is needed to make full sense of karma. Of course you can understand it in a more limited way in one lifetime, but really to understand the fullness of it, I think it helps to understand it in the prospect of several lives.

So I was also skeptical about rebirth when I came in contact with these teachings. But I didn't close my mind to it. I just said, I don't know the situation here. Maybe it's true, maybe it's not. And again, it's just a concept I hung out with over a lot of years and became more and more appreciative of. So now I don't know what happens when I die. As Ajahn Sumedho said, I haven't died yet. How could I know? But I have a certain confidence in this teaching also. But again, it may not be true for you.

So the Buddha said a few things about the actions in future lives. He said that if one is generous in this life, one will experience now or in a future life an abundance in material things. If one is stingy and not prone to giving, then in this life or future life, one will experience a lack of abundance in material things. If one takes care and doesn't kill living beings, then at some point one will experience a long lifespan, kind of reflecting that commitment to life. If one is non-injuring of living beings, at some point one will experience health over a lifespan.

About karma and its influence in future lives, the Buddha put it this way. Grain was a form of wealth in the agricultural society 2,500 years ago in India, so it's one of the ways he points to wealth here. "Grain, possessions, money, all the things you love, servants, workers, and dependents, none of these can you take with you. You must cast them all aside at death. But whatever karma is made by you, whether by body, speech, or mind, that is your real possession, and you must fare according to that karma. That karma will follow you just as the shadow follows its owner. Therefore, do good actions. Gather benefit for the future. Goodness is the mainstay of beings after death."

So again, I can't tell you to believe this or not. But the Buddha said that it would be a good bet to make because if rebirth turns out to be true, you'll be well positioned. If it turns out not to be true, you'll have done good in this life and you'll be loved and respected.

So rebirth also raises the question of who is reborn. And in a way it relates to the question of karma also. This question on karma was addressed to the Buddha in his lifetime. A bhikkhu approached him and said, "What self, then, will actions performed by the not-self affect?"

It's a good question, isn't it? What self will the actions performed by the not-self affect? And the Buddha said, basically, you haven't been listening to me. And that was really all he said. It's a great question, isn't it?

So in order to understand this, both about karma and about rebirth, think about the way your experience unfolds moment after moment in meditation. You're observing very carefully and you see everything is changing. Body sensations, sounds, thoughts, emotions. Nothing is solid from one moment to the next. Nothing is fixed.

And yet, there's a kind of ongoing continuity, isn't there? There's some way in which my experience at the end of a meditation is like my experience has been for a while. I don't turn into the Dalai Lama as a result of one sitting meditation. There's a way that there's a continuity going on, we could say, of a pattern. There's a pattern in my experience, even though everything is changing.

So we might say that this pattern is what continues in us moment by moment because one moment of experience touches and conditions the next, touches and conditions the next, touches and conditions the next. Nothing solid or fixed all the way through, but there is a conditioning process that creates an ongoing appearance of patterns. This is basically how rebirth happens also.

Nothing is fixed, but there is some way that the pattern is transmitted to the next birth. Ajahn Amaro had a really nice way of saying this. He said, "The process of going from one life to the next is not very different from the process of going from one moment to the next." You can reflect on that. I think that's a great pointer.

But let's talk a little more about how this unfolds. Think about a river or a stream. If you like, think about that stream that flows from the little pond at the end of the parking lot. It's kind of fun to watch a stream and ask, "Where's the stream? What is a stream?" Because we could call that the IMS stream, and it would have a name. It means something to us. If we say "the IMS stream," you know what I'm talking about. It's different from, say, the Connecticut River, which is much bigger, has a lot more water. It's also dirtier.

But if you look at the IMS stream, is there anything solid there? Is there anything that stays the same from moment to moment? It's all changing, isn't it? Heraclitus said you never step in the same stream twice. It's totally different water, moment after moment after moment. Nothing is the same in that stream from one moment to the next, yet it sort of forms a predictable shape, or we could say pattern. There might even be an eddy that's in the same place all the time, even though it's completely different water.

We can also use this concept of a stream for our inner experience. We can call it a mind stream. We look into it and there are thoughts and emotions and sense impressions going by moment after moment after moment. Nothing's fixed, yet this mind stream that we call mine is different from that mind stream that we call yours. This mind stream has certain recognizable patterns and eddies. Your mind stream has certain recognizable patterns and eddies. Even though there's nothing fixed, there's no self at the center of it all.

And personality is basically just this collection of feelings, thoughts, speech, and actions, right? Isn't that basically what personality is? So personality is kind of the total sum of our karmic patterns, just unfolding from this mind stream as it rolls on.

Our mind stream, when we come into the Dharma, is headed one place, and that is Lake Samsara. Driven by greed, aversion, and ignorance, it's just heading again and again to Lake Samsara. And we know what keeps it going. Greed, aversion, delusion keep it on that track. That's our pattern. That's the destination.

But then the teachings of the Dharma come in. And the teachings of the Dharma in the beginning are just this little tributary that come in from one side and add a different kind of current to it. We start adding the current of mindfulness, a current of metta, of compassion, of renunciation, of tranquility, of generosity. In the beginning, these don't seem to affect the basic flow very much. They're kind of a minor impact. But as time goes on, these things become really strong. All of you who have been here for five weeks now, they've become very strong in your mind stream. You are now not headed toward Lake Samsara. You are headed to the Nirvanic Ocean.

And as this tributary becomes stronger and stronger, it totally changes the direction of our mind streams and leads us in an entirely new way. So the only way this can happen is because there's nothing fixed here to begin with. If our ignorance was fixed, if our craving was fixed, if our aversion was fixed, this tributary couldn't move the direction of this current, but they're not. They're also conditioned and subject to change. So this new stream that comes in starts to take us in an entirely different way, an entirely different direction.

And we start to see that Dharma practice is basically using the power of karma for personal transformation. Because these are all intentional actions that we undertake through our thoughts and feelings. The intention for mindfulness, the intention for metta, the intention for calm, the intention for renunciation. We act these over and over and over again. And it's a karmic unfolding that's able to change the direction of our mind stream. Another way to say this is the path itself is a karmic unfolding.

And without the law of karma, this path couldn't unfold the way that it does.

This great Indian teacher, Nisargadatta Maharaj, put it this way—I love this expression. He was in dialogue, I think with a Westerner, and said, "Your own will has been the backbone of your destiny." This is very much like the equanimity phrase: "Your choices have been the backbone of your happiness and unhappiness."

The questioner replied, "Well, surely karma interfered." And Maharaj said, "Karma shapes the circumstances of your life. The attitudes are your own. Ultimately, your character shapes your life, and you alone can shape your character."

This is profound. Your character shapes your life. And ultimately, you alone can shape your character. This is what we're engaged in here—shaping our character moment after moment after moment with these very powerful and wholesome intentions. And as we do that, the whole shape of our life is changed.

Eventually, it ends in this direction, rather cryptically expressed by the Buddha as the end of karma. The Buddha said that one who is fully awakened has come to the end of karma. By that I understand the end of self-centered volition or intention. And what is it that takes us there? He said, "It is this noble eightfold path—right view, right intention, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, right concentration—that is the way leading to the end of karma."

And so we start to understand how sila, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom start to still our being. We come into a place of so much peace and so much stillness that the urge to act on behalf of ourself goes away. And we trust in that stillness and that abandoning of individual will. We feel then that we're at this place where the Buddha described nibbana as the stilling of all formations, and we start to feel we're in close proximity to that.

And so we let go the individual volition, the self-centered willfulness, and surrender to that stillness. And that has the power to reveal to us something else beyond karma, beyond conditioning, beyond the individual—the power to reveal to us the unconditioned nibbana, the real stilling of all formations.

We trust in that. We trust in that stillness, the ending of karma.

Let's just sit for a moment, please.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 48

Day One Instructions For the Three Month Retreat

Guy Armstrong · 40 min

> Guy Armstrong offers welcoming and practical guidance for the opening day of an intensive three-month vipassanā retreat. This foundational talk addresses the natural disorientation that comes with settling into retreat life and establishes the core framework for developing continuous mindfulness (sati) throughout all activities.
>
> Armstrong emphasizes that mindfulness is the heart of awakening and should extend beyond formal sitting and walking periods to become "a continuous thread of presence throughout the day." He guides practitioners through establishing awareness of the six sense doors - seeing, hearing, bodily sensations, thoughts, emotions, and the overall field of consciousness. The instructions focus on developing non-conceptual awareness that knows what's happening in the present moment without getting caught in thinking.
>
> The practical meditation guidance includes proper posture (upright yet relaxed), breath awareness integrated throughout the body, and gentle acknowledgment when attention wanders to thoughts. Armstrong addresses the common challenge of trying too hard with the breath, offering the alternative of simply resting awareness in the sitting posture. This talk sets the stage for the gradual unfolding of instructions over the retreat's first two weeks, emphasizing patience with the settling-in process and the importance of attending daily morning sessions for evolving guidance.

Good morning, everyone. Nice to see that most of you have found your way back to the hall. I hope you got some sleep last night. You know, the first day or so of a retreat can kind of go by in a blur of sleepiness and wondering where's the food, when can I take a shower, what are these instructions for my yogi job? So don't worry if it feels like there's a bit of fogginess around the whole enterprise this morning. It's normal.

We'll begin with some simple instructions for sitting. We will be unfolding the instructions over about the first two weeks of the retreat, so they'll be changing every day. That's why it's really helpful to come to the morning sitting, because this is the time when we'll be giving new instructions each morning.

I want to lay a general framework for what we're about. You all know well this quality of mindfulness, which is really the heart of waking up. We want to have that quality of mindfulness available to us throughout the day—not just during the formal sitting periods, not just during the formal walking, but to have it be a continuous thread of presence throughout the day. That is really the challenge for us all as practitioners: how can we stay connected to the present moment?

The formal sittings and walkings will have very clear instructions for that. As time goes by, we'll fill in how to bring that into all the other activities of the day as well. But you can begin working with that throughout the day today as you move between silence and talk, between activity and stillness. You begin to work with just filling in with the continuity of mindfulness.

In the sitting meditations, I want to start with a very basic fact: that we are already aware. We are conscious beings, we are sentient beings. So take in now what's occurring within your field of consciousness, because this is the field for our meditation.

If your eyes are open, you're experiencing seeing. When we live with eyes open sixteen or eighteen hours a day, we sort of forget that the eyes are another sense and that contact is happening a lot of the time. In meditation we want to know at times, "Oh, what's predominant now is seeing." So we can use seeing as simply another sense door.

There are the sensations in the body as you're sitting, and with some stillness, the sensations are often strong or quite apparent. There's hearing—you're hearing the sound perhaps of the fans, the sound of my voice, the sound of one another. Thoughts will be coming and going: my words, your words. And there will be a mood or emotional tone that's present for all of us right now. You've probably had a lot of different moods and emotions in traveling here, in arriving yesterday. So maybe just tuning in: what's that mood and emotion right now?

This is the range of our senses as we sit. There may be some smell, there may be some taste, but these are the primary senses that we'll be working with in the sitting posture. So just first having the attention very broad and aware of everything that you're experiencing in this moment: sight, sound, sensation, thoughts, mood, letting that all be just as it is. This is the field of human experience. This is the field of meditation.

Now you can let your eyes gently close. If you're used to a practice where you meditate with your eyes open, that's fine. Mostly in Vipassana, we sit with our eyes closed. So if that's comfortable for you, it's recommended. Let the eyes be gentle. As you close them, there's not a hard gaze, there's not staring. They're just softly closed and relaxed. Maybe slightly downcast gives a little more sense of relaxation.

Then connect with the sense of your body in the sitting posture. Let your posture be such that the back is fairly straight. You might feel that a balloon is stretching your head up toward the ceiling, and that will lengthen your spine. But at the same time, you want to have a real feeling of relaxation. So don't strain. As one teacher said, don't sit like your spine is a steel rod. Let it be soft and flexible and upright.

Take a quick look through the body posture to see if there are any areas that you can consciously relax. The forehead can be unknotted. The eyes can be soft. The jaw can be loose. The shoulders can drop.

And the belly can be soft. The hands don't have to clench tightly. Let them relax too.

Notice how it feels to sit in this upright and relaxed body—relaxed as far as possible. We can't relax everything at once, but as far as possible, we're relaxed, upright, and alert.

As you know, mindfulness is not about thinking. It's really about discovering a new dimension that we have—this non-conceptual awareness that knows what's happening in the present moment. So right now, know the body posture, know the body in sitting. Have a sense that you can just rest within the body. You can let the mind drop into the body and allow its stability to hold the wandering mind.

As you rest your attention within the body, eventually you'll notice the sensations of breathing. Begin to feel how the breath is impacting the body. Every time you breathe in, certain sensations are known in the body. Every time you breathe out, a different set of sensations takes place. Let your interest be just with feeling those sensations as the breath comes and goes in the body.

It's not so much that we want to observe the breath from the eyes or from the head, but we want to integrate the awareness throughout the body so that we feel the breath where it's happening. Some of you may find that you feel the breath more clearly in one part of the body—it could be in the belly, the chest, or the nose—and your attention naturally goes there. That's fine. For others, it may be that the breath is just felt throughout the whole body every time it enters, every time it leaves. That's fine too.

In whatever way the breath is felt most clearly for you, let that be the focus for your attention, whether that's small or wide. If you ever find that bringing attention to the breath creates some sense of strain or trying too hard not to miss a breath, then just return to the sense of awareness filling the body posture. Knowing when you sit that you're sitting—that's enough.

Sometimes you'll notice that you've lost touch with the present and your attention has been involved in a train of thought for some time. That's natural. It happens a lot. Don't worry about it. When you notice that, you're already back in the present moment. So acknowledge the thinking, appreciate the return to the present, and then remember just to notice again: sitting and breathing.

Today is something of a transition day, a settling-in day. It's time to take care of any unfinished business that you may not have been able to wrap up yesterday, time for formal practice, time for informal practice, time for a little communication. We're going to be together a long time—three months for some of you, six weeks for all of us. It's really helpful just to have a little base of getting to know a bit about each other before we go into the extended period of silence. So we'll do a little bit of that today as well.

CHAPTER 49

Morning Instructions - Intentions

Guy Armstrong · 2 min

> In this morning instruction from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong examines cetanā (intention) as one of the most powerful mental factors, ranking it alongside sati (mindfulness), paññā (wisdom), and samādhi (concentration). He teaches that intention is the very root of kamma, determining the moral weight of our actions of body, speech, and mind, and ultimately shaping our future happiness or suffering.
>
> Armstrong explores the three wholesome roots of action: alobha (non-greed), adosa (non-aversion), and amoha (non-delusion), which manifest positively as generosity, mettā (loving-kindness), and wisdom. He emphasizes how aligning our intentions with these wholesome qualities leads to long-term well-being, illustrating the fundamental principle of kamma in action.
>
> The teaching offers practical guidance for daily life, showing how meditation develops the crucial skill of recognizing unwholesome intentions before they manifest as actions. Through simple exercises like mindful posture changes and door opening, practitioners learn to cultivate awareness of intention as the foundation for transforming their life's direction and contributing to both personal and collective happiness.

I mentioned at the beginning that intention is a really powerful factor of mind. After mindfulness, wisdom, concentration, and perhaps loving-kindness, I'd say it's the most powerful factor of mind. This is surprising because, based on this little exercise, it wasn't like knocking you over the head, right?

Intention is the root of karma. The intention behind our actions of thought, speech, and body is what gives them their moral weight and leads ultimately to our increasing happiness or increasing unhappiness. Intention is the influencer of our future well-being.

It is said that when we speak and act from a wholesome intention, this will lead directly to happiness. Speaking and acting from an unwholesome intention will lead to some kind of suffering for us. It is very important that you start to be in the driver's seat of your whole life when you take hold of intention. You shape your future happiness or unhappiness with this factor of intention.

The wholesome roots of action are non-greed, non-aversion, and non-delusion. Put another way, we could say it's generosity, loving-kindness, and wisdom. When you negate greed, it turns into generosity. When you negate hatred, it turns into loving-kindness. When you negate delusion, it turns into wisdom. If we keep our actions of body, speech, and mind aligned with non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion, this is what leads to our long-term happiness. This is the principle of karma, and that's why this factor of intention is so important.

In daily life, the first thing we start to notice is when there's an unwholesome intention arising, and then we have a choice to restrain it. Before I found meditation, when an urge would come, action would just follow. Once I started to meditate, the urge would come, I'd notice it, and I could restrain the unwholesome ones. This is a great skill and a great contributor to your own happiness and others' happiness.

Being able to tune into intention in this simple way—changing posture, opening doors—is the lead-in to directing our life's outcome. It all starts here, really simply.

CHAPTER 50

Morning Instructions - Intention or Cetanā in Pali

Guy Armstrong · 44 min

> In this morning meditation instruction from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong introduces practitioners to cetanā, the Pali term for intention—one of the most important mental factors in Buddhist psychology. This teaching focuses on developing awareness of the subtle mental signals that precede voluntary bodily movements, what Armstrong calls the 'about-to moment.' Through careful observation of simple actions like adjusting posture, swallowing, or shifting position, practitioners learn to recognize the intention that arises in mind before the body responds.
>
> Armstrong explains that cetanā (also translated as volition by scholars like Bhikkhu Bodhi) represents the connection between mind and body, demonstrating how mental factors direct physical actions. This practice builds foundational awareness for understanding the broader role of intention in karma and mental formations (saṅkhāra). The instruction emphasizes starting with simple, observable movements during meditation before extending this awareness into daily life activities.
>
> This teaching offers both beginning and experienced practitioners a practical entry point into understanding one of the key mental factors (cetasika) in Abhidhamma psychology, while maintaining focus on direct, experiential investigation rather than theoretical study.

We're going to introduce one more meditation focus this morning, and we've waited until this point because it's one of the more subtle things that we can pay attention to—the factor in the mind called intention. The Pali word is cetanā.

This is an incredibly important mental factor. I'll talk at the end about why it's so important. But being able to recognize it in simple situations first, as we'll do in this meditation, will be really useful for carrying it through the rest of our days and also out in the world. Intention has a tremendous amount of power in our life.

We're going to look at it very simply in this meditation and through the rest of the day as the connection between mind and body. Generally, body doesn't move unless mind tells it to. There are a few exceptions to that—like when you're sitting in the doctor's office and she taps the mallet on your knee and your leg goes up in a reflex reaction. There's no intention or mental urge behind that. But otherwise, everything we do —when we sit down, when we stand up, when we move our arms, when we speak, when we make physical movements with our body—happens because the mind is telling the body to do that.

What we want to look at and discover in the meditation is that moment when the mind instructs the body to move. We'll keep it simple since you're not speaking. We're going to focus on movements of the body during this sitting period.

Here are a couple of examples. Anytime you notice you've slumped and you want to straighten your posture, notice that before you straighten, there's an intention to do that. The mind directs the body to do that. Notice each time you swallow. The mind usually says, before it happens, "It's okay to swallow, go ahead and swallow." Then the swallowing takes place. Not in so many words, but there's a signal from the mind to swallow.

