D.H. Lawrence commented that not looking at this property of awareness is like somebody who's sitting outside at night by a fire. They get fascinated by all the objects that the firelight is illuminating—the trees and the grasses and the logs and the limbs and the insects and the shadows, everything that goes on in the dance of the firelight. They're so entranced by the objects, they never think to turn and look at the light itself. It's the light that's making all this available, that's revealing it, that's illuminating it. And yet we can get so entranced by the different things that are showing up, we don't look back at the light.

So in this retreat, we're looking at this light that illuminates or knows all the objects of our experience. And that's really where the mystery lies. Fire is kind of a mystery and consciousness is definitely a mystery. Scientists don't have a clue how this happens. I don't think they even have the beginning of a clue about how it happens. But we know it. It's very close to us. It's always active and we can explore it in our direct experience even if we don't have a rational understanding.

As we talk about this factor of consciousness and awareness and the knowing, hold it, please, in the context that it's a great mystery for all of us. We almost can't get too specific in our descriptions of it, in our vocabulary around it, in our terminology, and any definition of it, because it's a vast, mysterious thing. So we'll try to be somewhat precise, as precise as we can be, but just be aware that words can't nail down this factor because it is fundamentally a deep and beautiful mystery.

We may talk about it as consciousness, we may talk about it as awareness. Now I've mentioned before this word "awareness" is used in different meanings by different teachers. Some teachers, like Sayadaw U Tejaniya, will use it more to mean mindfulness. We use it, in this retreat, more to mean consciousness, so vijñāna as opposed to sati. But it's a slippery word, and the reason it's a slippery word is that there's no word in Pali that needs to be translated by "awareness."

The Buddha's language was pretty precise. If we can take a Pali word and bring it into English, we know pretty much what the Buddha was intending by it, because he used it so many times in so many ways and we get the sense of it. But this word "awareness"—it's a beautiful old English word. And because of its old English nature, it has a deep resonance for us. But it doesn't have a Pali equivalent. Therefore, we don't know what the Buddha would have made of it. And it's hard for us to be precise about it for that reason. That's why it can mean whatever a teacher wants it to mean. So Sayadaw U Tejaniya likes to use it to mean mindfulness. Guy and Sally like to use it to mean consciousness, more or less. We'll get a little more specific about that.

So in this retreat, we're mostly using awareness to point to consciousness, this bare knowing of sense objects. But I want to make this little distinction between consciousness and awareness the way I use it. I usually use consciousness to refer to the knowing of an individual sense object, a specific arising at one of the six senses. We'll even talk about eye consciousness, ear consciousness, smell consciousness, taste consciousness, body consciousness, mind consciousness. So there are these six classes of consciousness for the six kinds of sense objects.

When I use the term awareness, I usually mean the broad field of consciousness that includes all six kinds of sense objects. This is often pointed to when we say, open your attention in a wide way and notice any of the objects that are arising. With awareness we can include all the different kinds of sense objects and still call it one big field of awareness. There can be sights and sounds and emotions and thoughts and sensations and smells and tastes, all of that within one field of awareness.

You get this sense when we were doing the pervading metta that there's a big space that we know and that things are happening within. So that's the way I want to use awareness—the broad field in which objects are known, consciousness is revealing objects.

Let's look for a minute at how objects come to arise within our experience. This means we're awake, we're having conscious experience, and all different kinds of objects are coming and going. This is the first quote from the study guide on page 6, quote number 25. This is from a famous discourse called the Honeyball Sutta, which we may take a closer look at later, but I just want to start with the first couple of sentences.

"Dependent on the eye and forms, eye consciousness arises. The meeting of the three is contact."

This is the fundamental definition of contact in the Buddha's discourses. It's the coming together of—in this case—eye, forms, and eye consciousness. This is repeated in the full discourse for all the other five senses. The coming together of the sense organ, the sense object, and the sense consciousness—that's called contact.

Then it goes on: "With contact as condition, there is feeling. What one feels, that one perceives." This is also one of the discourses where it's clearest where the Buddha is using the concept of perception. The Pali term is saññā. So there's contact. From contact, there's feeling. Based on that feeling, we perceive what's happening. We perceive the sense experience.

What I want to come back to is this definition of contact: the meeting of the sense organ, the sense object, and the sense consciousness. Basically, if your eye is working and open and something is in front of you, the eye consciousness will reveal it. Similarly with a sound—if the ear is working and a sound arises, hearing consciousness will reveal it.

So if we have a sound that arises in your experience, you don't have any way to turn it off. It just arises spontaneously. What you're meeting there is the working ear, the sound, and hearing consciousness. In our direct experience, we kind of take the sense organ for granted, so we can set that aside for now. Ears and eyes are mostly working for us.

So there's the hearing consciousness and the sound coming up together. Don't think of this as two separate experiences, like the sound is over here and the hearing consciousness is over here. When the sound arises in your experience, both of those things are together. That's the meaning of the word contact—it's the meeting of the sound and ear consciousness. These two things are together.

But the nice thing is, it's one experience for us, but we can look at either the sound or the consciousness of the sound. One experience, but it's got two aspects, and we can choose which to look at. How does that work? One thing, two experiences.

If you look at this bowl, is it round or is it white? It's both, right? It's one thing.

It's a bowl. Is it round or is it white? It's both. So we could focus on the shape, which is the roundness, or we could focus on the color, which is the whiteness. They're both here together.

So when we hear the sound, two things are going on. The first is the bare sound, just that hmmm. The second is the consciousness of it, the knowing of it. It's in your experience. You're having a direct experience. You're knowing that sound. It's arising in consciousness.

So we can look either at the sound, which is what our traditional Vipassana instructions have told us to do for many years, or we can look at the knowing of it. It's a part of our experience. We can pay attention to that. And in this part of the retreat, that's what we're asking you to do. Pay attention to the knowing of it.

Now, if you pay attention to the knowing, does that mean you don't hear the sound? No. It's still there too. They're together. But you could look at the sound or you could look at the knowing. Choice is yours.

So we're being instructed to pay attention to consciousness itself. Now, is this within the realm of Buddhist practice? Did the Buddha teach this? And if he taught it, why haven't we heard of it before?

It is in the instructions, in the Satipatthana Sutta. The Fourth Foundation lists a few areas that there are instructions to become mindful of, and in that list of topics are the five aggregates. They're the six sense bases and also the five aggregates. So in the five aggregates, the fifth one is vijnana.

So essentially, there is the instruction in the Fourth Foundation to become mindful of each aggregate, therefore to become mindful of vijnana. That's really what we're practicing. We're practicing mindfulness of consciousness.

One of the beautiful things about mindfulness is anything that can be noticed in our whole field of experience, we can become mindful of. We can become mindful of any emotion. We can become mindful of any mood. We can become mindful of any flicker of feeling in the body. We can become mindful of the most subtle thought. We can be mindful of an intention that's just subtly forming. And we can be mindful of this quality of consciousness, although it is one of the most subtle things to pay attention to.

So if you've been having trouble as we've turned the corner into awareness, don't worry. A lot of people have trouble with this. And it can take days to land on finding this quality of consciousness. That's fine. Don't worry about that.

We could describe this kind of practice as mindfulness of consciousness. Some teachers talk about knowing your knowing. But that gets into the complexity of the word knowing, which I'll come back to in a minute. So we could talk about mindfulness of consciousness, but somehow I prefer the term aware of awareness. It kind of evokes that old English familiarity. So I like to talk about this practice as becoming aware of awareness. But if you ask me to be specific and put it in the Buddha's language, what we're practicing is being mindful of consciousness.

Why do we want to explore consciousness? Why is this interesting or valuable? It seems subtle, maybe confusing, maybe hard to get. What's the point? The objects were working pretty well for us. We learned how to liberate emotions and be with the unpleasant and develop a lot of equanimity and insight. Why would we turn to this elusive factor of consciousness?

Well, I'm going to suggest there's a little bit of a problem in attending to objects. The problem is that objects are sometimes pleasant and sometimes unpleasant. As we attend to them and focus on them and build our meditation practice around them, we are building on a foundation of shifting pleasant-unpleasant, pain and pleasure.

This poses certain challenges because unmindful attention easily leads into greed and holding on, on the one hand, or aversion and pushing away on the other. Now, of course, we're meant with mindfulness to develop equanimity in regard to the pleasant and painful aspects, but that's a training. It's not always that easy.

So being involved with objects leads us into this dance with the pleasant and the unpleasant, which can easily lead to reactive formations of desiring or pushing away. And of course that leads into grasping, clinging, and therefore suffering.

Taking a look at consciousness or awareness really helps us not to get entangled with the objects. Why? Well, for one thing, when you connect with awareness, it's like connecting with space. It relieves some of the pressure and kind of takes a step back. As you connect with awareness of an object, you can feel yourself with a little bit more space around it. So that helps develop equanimity. But you're not cut off from the world—you're still knowing sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, mind objects, but you've got more space around them.

The second thing is, as you start to explore this quality of consciousness or awareness, it itself is free from the kilesas. Consciousness does not have qualities of like and dislike. Consciousness reveals everything equally. We could have a beautiful flute concerto in here, and you would hear that clearly. We could have a jackhammer ripping up the floor out in the lobby, and you'd hear that clearly. Consciousness doesn't care. So as we tune into consciousness, we are stepping into a sphere where the kilesas are absent. They don't rule. They don't play. So that's enormously helpful—to have a refuge where the kilesas are not active.

So consciousness and awareness are impartial. They're just like a mirror. They'll reflect anything that comes before them, and they're not harmed by it. This is tremendous.

And then as you tune into the nature of awareness, you'll also find it's not moving. As you connect with objects—any object in the senses—you'll find movement. You'll find change. You'll find variation. You'll find a dance. And that's fine. We can learn to work with that. We get insight about impermanence and unsatisfactoriness and uncontrollability. But in awareness there's an aspect that's not moving, that's still. And as we tune into that, we partake of that stillness. We feel that stillness, and that supports us.

So overall, this practice is meant to free us from the tendency to get entangled with objects through clinging, grasping, fixation, obsession, and suffering. It gives us another place to be that's not entangled but is still in touch. So we aren't disconnected from the world, but we're just not as caught up.

Here's another nice quote. This is on page seven, quote number thirty-nine. The speaker is a woman teacher from Thailand named Upasaka Ki Nanayan. She's passed away now, but she wrote a book—or her talks were collected into a book—called Pure and Simple, which is a very beautiful expression of deep dharma.

So quote thirty-nine: "The mind that's aware of awareness doesn't send its knowing outside this awareness. Nothing can be concocted in the mind when it knows in this way. In other words, an inward staying, unentangled knowing, all outward going knowing cast aside."

So when we're aware of awareness, we're not sending the mind out after sense objects and we're not getting entangled in them. So this is a place of freedom. This is a place of unentanglement, a place where we can rest. It's a place of peace.

Now, she uses this word knowing—unentangled knowing. And so I want to take a little detour for a few minutes to talk about this word knowing. And I'm going to summarize it.

In the Buddha's vocabulary, the fourth kind of knowing is wisdom, which in Pali is paññā. This is the intelligence that develops through training the mind. It's not IQ; it's not intellectual understanding. It's the kind of understanding that comes through our meditation practice, through our training in concentration, in mindfulness, in investigation. This wisdom sees things more clearly. It sees things as they actually are, rather than as we think they should be or as we wish they were.

Wisdom recognizes impermanence in our direct experience. It recognizes the unsatisfactory nature of clinging to things that are impermanent. It recognizes that there's no solid, unchanging self to be found anywhere in our experience. These are profound insights that come through the development of wisdom.

And then the fifth kind of knowing is what's called omniscience, or sabbaññā in Pali—literally "all-knowing." This is the knowing of a fully awakened being, a Buddha. This is the complete understanding that comes with complete liberation. It's the knowing that sees everything exactly as it is, without any distortion whatsoever.

So when we talk about knowing in meditation, it's helpful to be precise about which kind of knowing we're referring to. When Ayya Khema speaks of "unentangled knowing," she's pointing to a quality of awareness that doesn't get caught up in the content of what it's knowing. It's the knowing itself—clear, present, spacious—without being pulled into the drama of thoughts, emotions, or sense experiences.

This unentangled knowing is what allows us to rest in awareness itself rather than in what awareness is aware of. It's what gives us that place of freedom, that place of peace where we can simply be present without needing to fix anything, change anything, or go anywhere else.

The thought might be true or it might be false, but still we can make up these thoughts.

Then a step up from there is the knowing of mindfulness. We went through this in mindfulness of breathing. The Satipatthana Sutta says: "Breathing in long, one knows, I breathe in long. Breathing out long, one knows, I breathe out long." Here the term being translated as "know" is pajanati. One other translator translates it as "understands." So we start to see that within mindfulness there is an understanding of our experience. We understand our experience in a certain way, and this being with that is even more sophisticated than conceptual thought. It's a superior kind of intelligence to conceptual thought.

This understanding piece, pajanati, has the opening into wisdom—liberating wisdom. Pajanati is closely related to sampajañña. Sampajañña, clear comprehension, again gets the ñña on the end, which is another way of saying knowing. It's a kind of knowing.

The final category I'm aware of is what I would call insight knowledge or wisdom. Insight knowledge is referred to as jñana. Wisdom is referred to as paññā. So again, you get the ñña root in both those words. This is the whole purpose of insight meditation.

The purpose of insight meditation is to generate these insights and knowledges. Classically, they're around the three characteristics or the realization of nibbana. These are considered the range of insight.

In the West, we extend it and include things like psychological insight: "Oh, I see, I reacted that way at that time because of an old karmic pattern which led me to reactiveness in that situation." We call that insight. Formally in the Buddhist tradition, insights are really around the three characteristics or the realization of nibbana. So in Buddhist terms, this is the highest kind of knowing because this kind of knowing leads to the end of suffering—insight, knowledge, and wisdom.

So there are these five different levels of knowing. When Upasika Kee says "unentangled knowing," I take it to mean consciousness or what we're calling awareness. She talks about "aware of awareness"—just this bare knowing. This is what we'll be cultivating in this part of the retreat.

Let's look into this quality of awareness a little more. It's not so easy to locate sometimes. And yet, it's always present, isn't it? Anytime you ask yourself, "Am I aware?" does the answer ever come back no? I don't think so. Yes, when we check, we are always aware. Awareness is always there with us. But it's hard to locate, it's hard to find.

The reason is, awareness is what's holding objects. So awareness can hold an object like a sound, but can a hand hold itself? Not really. So awareness is always holding objects, but it's hard to hold. You can't get a hold of awareness itself. You can't grasp awareness, but we know it because it's working. It's functioning. It's revealing things. It's happening all the time. We're always aware—if we're awake.

So awareness isn't a thing. Consciousness is not a thing you can pick up and hold. Consciousness is the holder. But it's there. So we have to intuit it. We have to feel into its activity. We have to feel into its presence, its action. This is what Ajahn Chah said about not grasping awareness.

He said, you're riding on a horse and you're asking, where's the horse? We're riding awareness all the time.

This insight comes from Ajahn Sumedho. It's just like the question, can you see your own eyes? Nobody can see their own eyes. I can see your eyes, but I can't see my eyes. I'm sitting right here. I've got two eyes and I can't see them. But you can see my eyes. Looking in a mirror, I can see a reflection, but that's not my eyes. It's a reflection of my eyes. But there's no need for me to see my eyes because I can see.

It's ridiculous, isn't it? If I started saying, why can't I see my own eyes? You'd think, Ajahn Sumedho is really weird, isn't he?

So we can't grab hold of it, and yet it's so near. It's so close. It's so fundamental to our every moment of waking experience. If it ever seems like you can't quite connect, just ask, am I aware? And just stay with that. Yeah, I feel it. I know it. I'm not in any doubt about that. So just stay with that sense.

There's another quote from the study guide on page 10 that I really like. It's quote 62. This is by a man who took the pseudonym Wei Wu Wei. He was an Englishman living in Hong Kong. His real name was something like Terence Gray—I can't quite remember. He got into Zen and must have had some realization because he wrote all these pithy Zen-like sayings, but he made them up himself. He had some real insight. And this is one of his pithy sayings. He's not alive anymore, but he wrote several interesting books.

He says, "What we are looking for is what is looking."

That's why we can't grab hold of it. What we're looking for is what is looking. That's consciousness. That's awareness.

So we say that consciousness or awareness is the knowing—knowing of sense objects, knowing of phenomena, in this most basic sense of registering, revealing the sense object. Don't think of it as an object in itself. It's more like an activity. Knowing is a verb. And I think it's best to think of consciousness or awareness as an activity. It is doing knowing. That's its function. It's revealing, it's illuminating, it's showing the experiences of our senses.

Now, Joseph Goldstein gives a nice instruction related to this. He says, try putting it in the passive voice. Normally we might say, "I'm knowing sensations." But what if you just say, "Sensations are being known?" He said, try that. He came upon this, I think, when he was doing walking meditation. In walking meditation, there's often this tendency to think that there's an observer in the head who's looking down on the legs and feet and the sensations as you're going along. You sort of locate the eye up here, but the object is down there.

So when you rephrase it as "sensations are being known," you can take out that sense of the separate observer. You're just with the sensations in the legs and feet and the knowing of them. There's no distance. So it can be skillful. Try it in walking meditation sometime: "Sensations are being known."

Think about this passive voice construction. We could say, for instance, "The bell is being hit." And then we could ask, "Hit by what?" We would say, "Hit by the striker." We could say, "The cheek is being stroked." Stroked by what? By the hand. We could say, "The paper is being cut." Cut by what? By the scissors.

And then when we say "sensations are being known," look in your experience—known by what? What is doing the knowing of the sensations? Do you find that actor performing that action? You might say consciousness, but we just went through consciousness as a verb—it's the knowing. What's doing consciousness?

What happens in your mind when you ask that question? Does it kind of bring it to a stop? It does, doesn't it? And in that stopping, that's a nice meditative place to be, because you're not conceptualizing. You're not scrambling for an answer. You're just open, receptive, interested, present. That's not a bad place to meditate from.

There was a Zen teacher who established a big center in Providence, Rhode Island, named Seung Sahn. He was Korean. He came to the three-month course one year toward the end and gave a dharma talk. It was the funniest evening I've ever spent in that meditation hall—he was a very engaging speaker. Seung Sahn had a saying that he liked to mention to people, a core teaching: "Only keep don't-know mind. Only keep don't-know mind."

When you pose a question like this—"sensations are known by what?"—it puts us in a place of "I don't know." That's a good place to meditate from, and it's a good place to investigate from.

One answer, one possible answer, is that this is an invalid question. There's nothing behind the knowing. You're just mixing up the Buddha's teachings. The Buddha spelled it all out clearly—there are the five aggregates, consciousness is the last one, and there's nothing else there. So that's one school of thought on this question.

But another school of thought says that there may be an agent behind consciousness that we might call mind—something more ongoing that's doing the knowing. The knowing of objects is very fleeting, comes and goes, arises and passes with the object. So the knowing, the consciousness, is clearly impermanent. When the object goes, the consciousness goes. But maybe there's some agent behind there doing the knowing. Let's call it mind, for want of a better word.

This has been a question in Buddhism for a long time. There's a very nice story from the Chinese Chan tradition. Bodhidharma is the teacher who, as legend has it, went from India and carried the Buddha's teachings up into China a long, long time ago.

When we look carefully at awareness itself, we discover something quite profound. The story about Bodhidharma illustrates this beautifully. He was a very hermit-like teacher who, according to legend, went into a cave and stayed there for nine years, facing a wall in meditation, refusing to give any teachings. People would come pleading for instruction, but Bodhidharma just kept facing the wall, offering nothing.

Finally, one person became so determined and desperate for teachings—a man named Huike—that he cut off his arm, tossed it into the cave, and asked for instruction. Please don't do that here—if you want teachings, just write us a note and we'll find a time!

He threw his arm into the cave and shouted to Bodhidharma: "Your disciple's mind is not purified. I beg you, master, pacify it."

Bodhidharma calmly responded, "Show me your mind and I will pacify it."

Huike replied, "I have searched long for this mind, but I have never been able to find it."

And Bodhidharma said, "There—I have pacified your mind."

It's just like the question "known by what?"—it stills the mind. Huike was looking for his mind, couldn't find it, and that brought him stillness. He could simply rest there. Actually, according to the story, he was awakened at that point—that's how these tales always go.

We have a quote in the study guide from a nineteenth-century Tibetan lama named Shabkar, a wonderful writer and practitioner. He says: "When you look carefully, you won't find the merest speck of real mind you can put your finger on and say, 'this is it.' And not finding anything is an incredible find. Friends, to start with, mind doesn't emerge from anything. It isn't anywhere. It has no shape or color. And in the end, nowhere to go."

When we turn to awareness and look for this factor called mind, the not finding anything is significant. What this not finding means is that mind is empty—it's not a thing, not substantial. But you also couldn't say there's nothing there, because it keeps functioning. It keeps revealing the phenomena of the world. So you can't say it doesn't exist, but you also can't find it as something substantial, as a thing.

Its basic ability is knowing—we could also say cognizing. But it's also empty. You can look at this in your own experience. When we went into the Pervading Metta meditation, if you felt that boundless quality of space, you could sense that most of it is just open. When you look around this room tonight, there are people and things, but much of the room is open space. As you let your awareness fill the room, you realize that much of your awareness is open space—nothing in it, not full. There are some things in it, but it's not full.

This opening to the vast emptiness of awareness points out a fundamental feature of it. In this expansive view, this is sometimes called big mind. As Suzuki Roshi says in quote 61: "Big mind experiences everything within itself. That everything is included within your mind is the essence of mind."

To experience this is to have religious feeling.

Based on this term "big mind," the meditation practice called Big Mind was developed by Joseph, and we'll introduce that in a couple more days—the Big Mind meditation. The feeling that everything is happening within your own mind is to have a big mind.

This vastness reveals an emptiness that is like space. We say the space in a room contains all the physical elements that are in the room. And the space of awareness includes all the arisings that come moment after moment at the six sense doors. They don't fill it up. There's always room for a new arising. If the mind were full, I'd hit that bell and it wouldn't arise because the mind was jammed up with too much other stuff. But there's always room for one more. That's the basic emptiness of awareness.

Another way to think of this emptiness is that nothing is stuck in the mind that's been there from the very beginning. It's like all the furniture in this room. Once this room was built and they took the construction equipment out and people walked in, it was empty. There were no chairs, there were no cushions, there were no people, there was no Buddha statue. But little by little, they brought all of those things in and the space of the room started to get filled up. But in this room, because of the original emptiness, everything could be taken out again, right? All the furniture could be taken out of this room and then it would be back to its original emptiness.

The mind is the same way. Nothing is stuck there. Nothing is there from the beginning. So anything that has taken up a home within the mind can be taken out again. This is tremendously freeing. Any concepts you have about yourself, any judgments about yourself, any old karmic patterns, any afflictive emotions that have taken root, any kind of suffering at all wasn't there from the beginning. And because of that, it can be moved out like furniture. That's the liberating potential of our dharma practice. That's the liberating potential of understanding the emptiness of awareness. Nothing in the mind is fixed or stuck there.

All different forms of suffering have come about because of particular causes and conditions. And because they've arisen due to causes and conditions, they can cease when the causes and conditions change. That's what dependent arising says: when this arises, that arises; when this ceases, that ceases. Anything that's arisen can also cease. And that's why we can move from the truth of suffering to the end of suffering. That can cease.

When we discover this empty nature, that in itself is freeing. And it produces a lot of faith. We can see the original emptiness of mind. We know nothing is fixed. And then we just have to do the work, which is not easy. But we recognize that emptiness. We recognize it can be done.

There's one important difference between the space of awareness and the space in the room. The space in the room doesn't know the chair, doesn't know the bell, doesn't know the person. It's not conscious space. The space of awareness knows bell, chair, person. Awareness has a greater property than physical space. Awareness has emptiness and it has knowing.

As you feel into it—somebody mentioned this in an interview—the empty space and the knowing are not separate with awareness. They can't be separate. They can't be separated. In the empty space, there is knowing. Joseph sums this up nicely. He talks about the cognizing power of emptiness. As you get in touch with the empty space that you feel internally, it already knows. It knows whatever appears. It's the cognizing power of emptiness.

So there are basically these two qualities that are together in the mind.

There's emptiness on the one hand and there's awareness or knowing on the other. These two are joined. They're not separate and they can't be separated. They're united. They are a union. This is the description of the mind. The mind is a union of emptiness and awareness.

This is not just your mind or my mind. It's every mind. It's the human mind. It's the turkey mind. It's the duck mind. It's the mosquito mind. Every sentient being has this empty knowing combination. And this is to be developed.

Another quotation from the study guide appears on page ten. The Buddha is giving meditation advice to his son, whose name is Rahula. I'm not sure what age—I think Rahula was quite young when he was getting this advice. The Buddha said, "Rahula, develop meditation that is like space. For when you develop meditation that is like space, arisen agreeable and disagreeable contacts will not invade your mind and remain. Just as space is not established anywhere, so too, Rahula, develop meditation that is like space."

Space is not established anywhere, awareness is not established anywhere. That means it's not solid. It's not graspable. It's not a thing. It's not established. This is unentangled knowing. Arisen agreeable and disagreeable contacts do not invade the mind and remain. This is what awareness opens the door to for us. That's why it's such a refuge.

On another couple of pages, Ajahn Buddhadasa has a very nice way of saying it. On page twelve, quote number seventy-four, he says, "We should call the mind emptiness, but because of its awareness we call it mind." This cognizing quality is what makes mind.

In our meditation, we want to move in the direction of recognizing this union. We want to find awareness, which takes practice, but you can do it. Asking the question, are you aware? The awareness will be there, will be felt. Can you turn to it and see that it's empty?

This will take some investigation. When I first started doing this, I had to ask a lot of questions, which don't help the meditation, but I had to go through it. I turned to awareness—yes, I got awareness. I'm aware, I'm knowing things. I definitely know I'm aware. Is it empty? I'd say, okay, it's wide. There's a lot of space in between the arisings. I guess it feels spacious and that space is kind of empty. Is there a self congealing there? Oh, I don't know. It's not too much of a self there. It's kind of empty in that way.

So I would ask those questions and investigate and find that it was actually empty the way it was supposed to be. But it took me a while to have confidence in that. After investigating it again and again and again, I could turn my mind and recognize awareness and it was really clear it was also empty. I could turn to awareness and also see its emptiness and I could see those together.

Once I could do that, then I developed more and more ability just to rest in that. That knowing of the union of awareness and emptiness. Awareness and space, if you like.

Now, there's one other thing that happens when you can recognize the union of emptiness and awareness.

And this is explained by Shabkar on page 11. This is the quote we mentioned at the very beginning of the retreat—one of my favorite quotes in the study guide. It's quote 67. I'll read the whole thing, but there's one sentence I especially like.

"Not being fixed is something. Mind is beyond presence and absence. It neither comes nor goes, gets born nor dies, is illuminated nor obscured."

Does your study guide read differently? Does it say "neither illuminates nor obscures"? Yes, I think that's a mistranslation. I checked another source that I regard as more reliable, and they put it differently—"is neither illuminated nor obscured." So I'm going with that version.

And then this is the key phrase: "Mind's nature is vivid as a flawless piece of crystal, intrinsically empty, naturally radiant, ceaselessly responsive. Stripped bare of samsaric error, mind itself is surely and always Buddha."

This points to that unstained purity of awareness that's not touched by the kilesas. The basic nature of mind is not contaminated. It's not touched by greed, aversion, and delusion. Its nature is vivid as a flawless piece of crystal—intrinsically empty, that's the emptiness piece—naturally radiant. So "radiant" is the aware piece, as though the light of the mind is illuminating the phenomena, lighting up and radiating all the phenomena that arise.

Sometimes this is called radiant, sometimes luminosity, sometimes clarity, sometimes cognizance, sometimes awareness. These are all synonyms for the lighting up of phenomena.

When you have these two together—the emptiness and the cognizance—you open into the third quality, which is "ceaselessly responsive." What this means is that when you can touch that empty awareness, all the treasures of the heart start to come through. The treasures of the heart are the beautiful qualities we've been exploring, that you've known from your meditation: loving-kindness, compassion, joy, equanimity, wisdom, patience. You can go through the whole list of paramis. They start to come out of this empty awareness because part of emptiness is non-contraction, non-self, non-clinging, non-grasping.

When the heart is contracted with kilesas, you won't be able to clearly see the empty awareness. It's not empty—it's full of self at that point. When that clinging, grasping fixation is released, you can see the emptiness, you can see the awareness, and that's when the heart qualities come through.

So when the heart is not constricted by grasping, then it opens up and responds with all the treasures, all the beautiful qualities that are potential within us. As we connect with the empty awareness, the doors are open for these beautiful qualities: peace, contentment, joy, love, compassion.

This is where the practice of awareness leads us—into this state of freedom.

So we want to develop first the recognition of emptiness joined with awareness, and then start to notice how the unburdened heart responds in that situation.

I'm just going to close with this quote from Rumi. It's called "Tending Two Shops."

Rumi says: "Live in the nowhere that you came from, even though you have an address here. That's why you see things in two ways. You have eyes that see from that nowhere and eyes that judge distances, how high and how low. You own two shops and you run back and forth. Try to close the one that's a fearful trap, getting always smaller. Checkmate this way, checkmate that. Keep open the shop where you're not selling fish hooks anymore. You are the free swimming fish."

Let's just sit for a minute.

Mind's nature is vivid as a flawless piece of crystal, intrinsically empty, naturally radiant, ceaselessly responsive. Stripped bare of samsaric error, mind itself is surely and always Buddha.

So we have about thirty minutes for walking meditation, then the final sit with chanting at nine. Tomorrow in the instructions, we'll look at some specific ways to get in touch with this empty awareness as a unity. We'll look at that in terms of meditation.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 174

Nature of Awareness, Part 2

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this second talk on awareness, Guy Armstrong weaves together classical Buddhist teachings with contemporary practice insights, beginning with an inspiring account of Ajahn Sumedho's visit and early ascetic training. Armstrong explores the nature of mind through three aspects found in later Buddhist schools: emptiness, cognizance, and responsiveness - collectively known as Buddha nature or Tathāgatagarbha (womb of the Buddhas). While acknowledging this formulation post-dates the Buddha, he finds hints in the Pali Canon, particularly in passages describing the mind's radiant nature and consciousness as "signless, boundless, luminous all around." Drawing from Thai Forest teachers like Ajahn Jumnian and Ajahn Mahābua, Armstrong addresses the controversial question of whether awareness partakes of the unconditioned, offering a skillful means approach that avoids rigid metaphysical positions. He provides detailed practical instructions for recognizing empty awareness, distinguishing it from choiceless attention practice, and integrating formless awareness practice with object-oriented meditation. The talk emphasizes trusting one's experience of growing freedom while learning to rest in the nature of mind without grasping.

This evening I want to continue the talk on the nature of awareness that we started last night.

But before I get into the content, I just want to mention something about today. You may have noticed some orange-robed gentlemen wandering around the place this afternoon. We had a visit from three monks. We were visiting with them over at Joseph's house for a little bit, and then they took a tour of the Forest Refuge. The senior monk was Ajahn Sumedho. He's been staying at a branch monastery in New Hampshire that's a little over an hour away, and he thought that as long as he's in the neighborhood, he'd like to come by and visit with Joseph. So Joseph invited Sally and me to join them.

Sally and I have had a relationship with Ajahn Sumedho for a long time. I first met him when he came to IMS in around 1978 or 1979. Then when we were living in England, we had the chance to meet with him and we practiced with him on different retreats. He's been an important teacher for both of us. So it was just lovely today to be able to visit and then show him a little bit of this facility. Sorry if any of the talking and visiting disturbed your silence, but he's a very venerable and esteemed teacher. He's one of the few people that I regard as a Western master. I definitely put him in that category. His teachings are highly recommended—books and many talks on the website that are wonderful to listen to. He talks a lot about the quality of awareness. I think his most recent book was called Intuitive Awareness.

It was interesting chatting and getting him to talk about some of his early years of practice. It was not this nice in the early years. He was the first Western disciple of Ajahn Chah, practicing at Wat Ba Pong before Ajahn Chah became famous and before it was very well known or well supported. The food was very simple, the accommodations were rough. He talked about Ajahn Chah giving five-hour dharma talks in the evening, and he would have to sit quietly, basically on a concrete floor covered by a thin mat, through the five hours of the dharma talk.

Then he decided to take a more ascetic route for a while. That was not quite challenge enough. So he asked Ajahn Chah if he could go practice at this remote mountain facility. It was a beautiful spot, but it was way off the beaten track—way out in the country on top of a mountain. There was a little hut, and you had to walk a couple of miles off the road and then ascend on ladders at times up to the top of the mountain. It was beautiful, natural, unspoiled.

He stayed there for about six months practicing. Of course, there was not a teacher there who spoke any English, so he was really on his own. The food, he described using the word "coarse"—I would take that as an understatement. Insects were a staple part of the diet in that part of rural Thailand at the time. There probably wasn't a lot besides rice that was offered to him.

While he was there, he got very ill. He came down with malaria. Malaria, if you haven't heard it described, is a really awful disease with fever and shaking—you feel really terrible. So he got malaria, and of course, way out in the rural mountains, there was no doctor around. He was just struggling through this malaria with coarse food and, he said, swarming flies that would fly into his nose and ears all day long. He was almost too tired and weak to bat them away.

Finally, he was taken down the mountain. He couldn't get down the mountain on his own. He was carried by two men, probably from the village nearby, and they were going to arrange for him to get to a doctor. But meanwhile, while he was waiting, this voice came to him and it said, "Practice anapanasati." So even in his weak condition, he sat up and began paying attention to the breath at the nose, focused all the energy he could, all the attention he could, on that experience. He said in a week he was cured.

He then lived with Ajahn Chah for another few years in Thailand before coming to the West to establish Amaravati Monastery and now many branch monasteries here. So it was wonderful to see him.

He was reflecting that even though the early years of his practice were very difficult, he doesn't remember the pain of it now. But what he's really grateful for is how he's transformed his heart and mind. And now he lives with this great cheerfulness, happiness, contentment from his deep dharma insight. So I find that a really inspiring reminder.

Your time here will go through ups and downs and it will be challenging and it will be difficult at times emotionally and physically. And years later you won't remember that part. You'll be so grateful for all the openness that you've brought into your mind as a result of your dedication to practice. So it was wonderful to see him, a real uplift for our day.

The Nature of Awareness

So, the nature of awareness. We had gotten to the point in the talk last night where we were talking about the mind's nature as having these three aspects: The essence is emptiness. The function is awareness or cognizance. And its capacity, its potential, is responsiveness. That is, when it rests, it has the potential to bring out these beautiful qualities—love, wisdom, patience, equanimity, compassion, and so forth.

In the whole tradition of Buddhism, and this came several hundred years after the death of the Buddha, these combinations were first outlined by a later Buddhist school in India known as the Yogacara school. And this combination of the three qualities—emptiness, cognizance, and responsiveness—as defining or describing the nature of mind came to be known as Buddha nature.

So you may have heard this term, Buddha nature. This is what it means. It means the nature of our mind is composed of emptiness, cognizance, and responsiveness.

Now, I think Buddha nature is not the best translation of the earlier Sanskrit term. The earlier term is Tathagatagarbha. Tathagata, you may know, is one of the names—it's the name the Buddha usually used to refer to himself. It's a Pali word also. And garbha means womb in Sanskrit. So Tathagatagarbha literally means the womb of the Buddhas.

So this nature that we all have is the womb from which awakening comes. And that is to say that each of us has this nature as the seed of awakening within us. Every human being has this as our potential—this nature. So I like thinking of it as a womb because that shows it as a potential, whereas when you call it Buddha nature, it sounds like it's an existent thing within us. It's our potential in this nature of mind.

So the question is, did the Buddha talk about this in the Pali discourses? In his time, did he talk about these qualities? And I have to say, not exactly. But there are some hints that kind of lean in this direction.

Let's take a look at a couple. "This mind, O bhikkhus, is radiant, but it is obscured by visiting defilements. The untaught ordinary person does not understand this as it really is, so for them there is no development of mind. This mind, oh bhikkhus, is radiant and it is freed from visiting defilements. The instructed noble disciple understands this as it really is, so for them there is development of mind."

So the Buddha is pointing to the radiance of the mind, which is a synonym for the luminosity, clarity, cognizance that we talked about last night. So here's a pointing to the luminosity of mind, similar to this later description.

And then one that I find even more suggestive is where someone has come to the Buddha who's not a follower, but he's asking what to him is an important question. He says, "Where are the four elements destroyed?" meaning the physical world, the physical world composed of the four elements, where are they destroyed?

And the Buddha says, that's not the right question, because that implies kind of getting rid of existence. The Buddha says the right question is, where do they find no footing? Which is a way of saying, where are they not made solid and substantial? Where can they not land?

So he rephrases the question and then he answers it. He rephrases it: Where do earth, water, fire, and air, the four elements, find no footing? Where are name and form completely destroyed?

So this question has been debated in Buddhist circles for about fifteen hundred years. We're probably not going to resolve it tonight. But I think it's interesting to consider the possibility of something about this field being ongoing.

This is where we get into different ways of interpreting the Buddha's teaching. In the Pali tradition, everything conditioned is impermanent - that's absolutely clear. But this field of awareness we're pointing to might not be conditioned in the same way that objects of awareness are conditioned.

When you rest in this open awareness, does it feel like it's being manufactured moment by moment? Or does it feel more like you're discovering something that's already here, that's been here all along? Like when clouds part and reveal the sky - the sky wasn't created by the parting of the clouds. The sky was already there.

This is one way to think about this question. Some schools of Buddhism would say this awareness-nature is indeed permanent, not in the sense of being a thing that lasts forever, but in the sense of being the unchanging ground in which all changing appears. Other schools would say no, everything without exception is impermanent, including this field of awareness.

What's beautiful is that for our practice, this philosophical question doesn't need to be resolved. Whether this awareness is permanent or impermanent, what matters is learning to rest in it, to recognize it, to let it be our home base. What matters is discovering that in this field, the grasping mind relaxes. In this field, objects arise and pass away without getting a foothold.

The practical instruction remains the same: get familiar with this dimension of your experience that is like space - open, cognizant, responsive. Learn to trust it. Learn to rest in it. Let it teach you what it wants to teach you about the nature of mind, the nature of suffering, the nature of freedom.

I don't know if you remember from last night's talk, when I asked: sensations are being known—but known by what? In other words, is there something behind consciousness that's doing the knowing? We decided to explore that and call it mind.

What we're suggesting here—what the later tradition suggests, not the Pali discourses—is that this thing called mind, which is Buddha nature, is not subject to arising and passing, but is in some way always there.

So the question becomes: is awareness part of the unconditioned? Is it related to Nibbana? Is this thing called mind synonymous with Nibbana? Or another way to ask it: does Nibbana have an aspect of knowing as part of it?

There are different views on this question. Some schools say yes. Other schools say no, that's delusion—that's fake news. And because the Buddha never said it explicitly, there are grounds for saying no, it's not like that. But if you look at your own experience, you might feel there's something ongoing that you could say is the source of this awareness.

Different schools have different views on this, and we don't have to settle it tonight. But I want to suggest a way we could see it that reconciles these two perspectives.

Many of you are familiar with this. We're going to do a little thought experiment where we go out to the edge of our solar system. So we're out in space. We have a space suit, we can breathe. Our back is to the sun, but we're on the edge, so we're not seeing other planets. We're looking just out into space. And let's say, for the sake of argument—we can make this up—we're looking into a part of the sky where there aren't any stars. The sun is behind us, we're looking out into space. No stars.

What do you see? It's dark, isn't it? It's just blackness out there.

So is it the black that comes from a black crayon or black spray paint? Or is it the black that's the absence of light? Just the absence of light, isn't it? No light coming to our eyes because we're looking at a part of the sky, of space, that doesn't have any stars. So we don't see any light.

But is there light there? Your back's to the sun. You're on the edge of the solar system. Is there light in front of you? Yes. The sun's light is pervading. Your shadow is negligible. The sun's light is pervading that space, but we don't see it.

Now, imagine that a meteor shoots by in front of you, comes up from below, whizzes by. Do you see it? You do, don't you? Because the sunlight reflects off it back to your eyes. But then it's gone.

So this is an analogy for what may be happening with something that's ongoing and something that's impermanent. The analogy is this: the sunlight pervading empty space is the radiance of Buddha nature, of the nature of mind. It's always there. It's not really subject to arising and passing. Sunlight is always there.

When the meteor flashes by and there's light reflected to our eyes just for a moment, that's the illumination of a sense object that is impermanent. So that's the analogy for consciousness. Sunlight pervading empty space.

Buddha nature, ongoing, not subject to impermanence. The flash of light that comes off the meteor, comes and goes—that is consciousness that knows that particular object so briefly.

One of the things I find interesting about this analogy is that it can reconcile the two views: something ongoing in the nature of mind, and something impermanent in the flash of consciousness. The other thing I find interesting is that it's the same light in both cases. One is reflected and momentary, the other is pervading and ongoing. It's the same luminosity, or you could say cognizance. So in a way, it's saying that we're holding that light all the time, but the only way we see it is when it reflects off a sense object. The knowing of a sense object is what brings it home to us.

So this analogy suggests that the cognizance and the emptiness and the responsiveness that are part of the nature of mind are ongoing. And you could almost say that the light pervading empty space is the unborn, because it doesn't have any shape. It doesn't have any color. We don't notice it. But as soon as it illuminates something, it then shows up—shape and color.

Suzuki Roshi in Zen Mind, Beginner's Mind has this very nice line. He says, "It is necessary for us to believe in something that has no form or color, but is always ready to take on form and color. This is Buddha nature." It itself, we can't find form and color, but it's always ready to take on form and color.

And this connection with the unborn is very interesting. There's a beautiful quotation in the Udana about the unborn that goes like this: "There is this unborn, unbecome, unproduced, unconditioned. If there were not this unborn, unbecome, unproduced, unconditioned, there would be no escape from what is born, become, produced, conditioned. But because there is this unborn, unbecome, unproduced, unconditioned, an escape can be seen from what is born, become, produced, and conditioned."

So the unborn is pointing to the deathless. What isn't born doesn't die. This is a synonym for nibbana. That which is unborn and unconditioned provides the escape from what is born and conditioned, the relief from the field of suffering.

Not only is this found in the later Buddhist schools from India, but it's also found within the Thai forest tradition. We can look at a quotation from Ajahn Jumnian, a Thai forest teacher who's still alive. He says, "The best way to develop a great awareness"—and the actual term he used was mahasati, great mindfulness—"is to rest your attention within that knowing space of consciousness, in the pure space of knowing. If you understand and can rest in this pure knowing, that is the place of the deathless. From this pure consciousness that's unmoved by what arises, then you see the phenomena of the world, which all have the nature to arise and pass away. Phenomena show their dharmas of impermanence, and this other is the dharma of the deathless."

I like that he says the pure space of knowing, because that's one of the things we talked about regarding awareness—its purity. It's not affected by the kilesas. It doesn't mind the kilesas. It doesn't acquire them. They don't stain it. Consciousness has a purity when we can tune into it and recognize it. And then it's not giving rise to birth and death. That's why it's a place of the deathless. Phenomena come and go. This other is the dharma of the deathless.

Even more explicitly, there's this quotation from Ajahn Mahabua, another great Thai forest master who died a few years ago. In his book Straight from the Heart, he gives an account of his meditation experience leading up to basically a declaration of his arahantship. This is very interesting and very rare because mostly monks don't describe their arahantship. And he doesn't call it that, but if you read the account of his meditations, you know that's what's going on in his estimation.

He says: "Although all phenomena without exception fall under the laws of the three characteristics—impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and not-self—the true nature of the mind doesn't fall under these laws."

The natural power of the mind itself is that it knows and does not die. This deathlessness is something that lies beyond disintegration. This is very interesting. Personally, I find this inspiring because it suggests that as we connect with consciousness, as we connect with awareness, we're linking back to this thing that is undying—that is the deathless, that is the avenue to liberation. So you might start to get a sense for that as you practice.

I don't know if you have read Joseph's book called One Dharma, but he became very intensely occupied with this question of which view is right when he first started being exposed to the view that the nature of mind may be undying. Because all his training in the Burmese tradition was there's nothing beyond consciousness—it's all impermanent and that's it. And so he was really wrestling with this dilemma for a while in his practice and it became, it had him in its grip. And he explains how he sort of resolved it in his own understanding as understanding that both of these views were skillful means. And he could use the view without coming to a solid belief about which one was right. And that was his way through.

And we can do the same. We can use the meditation practice of awareness with the sense of its inclining to the deathless, without having to take a position, a final position, on the metaphysics of it. So I was sitting in a retreat one time with Ajahn Sumedho, and he talks a lot about awareness and its connection to the deathless. He's kind of in that Thai forest camp. And so I went in for an interview with him, and I've gone through the same questioning, and I said, "Ajahn, there's this one view that awareness really partakes of the deathless, which you find in the Thai forest. And there's this other view that it's all impermanent. There's nothing else besides the impermanence of the five aggregates. How did you reconcile those two in your own practice?"

And he said, "Oh, I never worried about that." He said, "This practice worked for me." So we can do that too. We can not worry about it. Use the practices, see what suits you, and you don't have to take a metaphysical stand. I don't think metaphysics liberates anyone. But your own practice from a place of trust.

Another thing that Ajahn Sumedho said, which I thought was interesting, he said, "Western yogis don't trust themselves enough. They need to trust their own experience." This is really true in the practice of awareness because sometimes there are not such clear signposts along the way. You have to trust what's evolving for you, especially in this area.

One of the things you can really trust in is the sense of freedom that comes when you open to this empty awareness. As you connect with it, as you recognize it, as you learn to rest within it, there is a growing sense of freedom that comes. That is really trustworthy. Whether you think it's connected to nibbana or not is up to you. I find it inspiring, but you don't have to feel that. But the freedom is the key point. The way it releases us from entanglement with objects and takes us out of some suffering—that is real.

And it's a little bit like, I don't know if you've ever been in a neighborhood that had a bread factory, but it smells great. You know, you get near the bread factory and you get that fresh bread baking aroma, and you just kind of want to follow the smell to see where the factory is because it gets stronger and stronger. This sense of freedom that comes from empty awareness is like the aroma from a bread factory. Just follow that scent and the freedom continues to grow. That is really trustworthy.

So we talked this morning about specific ways to access this freedom—empty knowing. And I just wanted to talk about a couple of other practice specifics tonight. One is this practice can look a lot like the choiceless attention that we practiced in the instructions from Mahasi Sayadaw. In choiceless attention, we open the mind in a wide way and we notice each arising at different sense doors. We can notice an in-breath and we note it. We can notice a sensation and we note it. We can notice a sound and we note that. We can notice a mood, we note that.

We can notice a thought and we note that.

So the mind is very open and it's connecting at all six sense doors, one after another. Similarly, when we're practicing awareness, we're very open and we notice things. Is this the same practice as choiceless attention? No.

In choiceless attention, we are still mostly interested in the objects. So when an object arises—let's say a sound—we connect the attention there, and that's the quality of vitaka. We connect the attention there and we sustain it. We rub it long enough to really know the nature of that sound. And then we'll recognize it as a bird or a door or a footstep or whatever. But rubbing the sound is what that practice is about.

As we rub it, we know its individual characteristics. We also know its universal characteristics, which are that it's impermanent, it's unsatisfactory, and it's not self. That's why we rub it. We want to get to know the object clearly and closely. So there's vitaka, connecting, and then there's vicara, sustaining or rubbing, just long enough to know each object when it arises. This is the practice of choiceless attention.

In the practice of awareness of awareness, we will still notice objects arising. We don't take the step of connecting and sustaining. We let them arise and then just let them go. We don't direct the attention there to land, connect and rub. We keep the attention on the broad field of awareness. And that's when it feels like things are just kind of coming up, touching a wall, and falling down. Coming up, touching a wall, and falling down. And that's one way that we keep from getting entangled with those objects, with those sense phenomena.

Another question that came up in the hall about awareness practice is basically, how do you know if you're doing it right? And this is kind of the nub of the matter. It's hard to know in the beginning because it's not so clear. And this is where it's really helpful to take one of those techniques for connecting with awareness: turning the mind back, asking who is looking, making the statement "aware of awareness," or simply the question, "Am I aware?"

Take what you get and then trust in that. We have to trust in something here. Trust in that and see where it goes.

Now as you start to rest in that, one of the ways to check if it's authentic is: are you still aware of impermanence? In other words, with the open awareness, are you still knowing objects arising and passing? You don't connect and sustain to them, but is that within your field of experience? Because you could get in this open space and kind of go into trance, where the senses are shut down and you're sort of wrapped up and cut off.

But in the openness, you should still be knowing things coming and going. So if that's true—feels wide, expansive, somewhat settled, but you know things are coming and going—that's a good sign.

So we talked this morning about adding emptiness to the seeing. You want to see awareness, and you also want to see emptiness. And then to see that they're joined—they're not two things, but they're one thing merged or indivisible.

So at first, I think I mentioned, I had to reflect a lot on the emptiness piece. The awareness piece was pretty clear. I was knowing things. I was aware. The emptiness piece was a little harder to find. But it's worth investigating so that you can get some confidence. Because eventually you want to look and see emptiness and awareness with one glance.

So at first you put these techniques in and it takes a few seconds. You say, "Am I aware?" or "aware of awareness" or turning back to awareness—it takes a few seconds. But as you get more skilled in it, it's very immediate. You just have the intention to see it.

And it comes, the emptiness and awareness together. So that's where you want to be aiming your practice—to see the emptiness and the awareness with a glance.

If the emptiness is ripe, mature, and full, there won't be a self in it. That means there won't be grasping—there won't be big grasping in it. This openness reveals the absence of a center that's pulled together by contraction. So when there's opening to emptiness and awareness, it should feel spacious and not contracted. This means there's no self-ing, no grasping. It means the kilesas aren't there—greed, aversion, and delusion are absent. Therefore, the mind is getting purified. As you rest in that place, it's getting purified.

When you can rest in empty awareness, the beautiful qualities of the heart come forth as responsiveness.

This brings up a question: Do all beings have empty awareness? This Buddha nature exists in all beings—the emptiness, the cognizance, the capacity for responsiveness. Are all beings manifesting beautiful qualities of heart and mind all the time? No. But as practitioners, you are developing this skill.

In this approach, what makes the difference? All beings have empty awareness. What creates the distinction? Yogis recognize it, and uninstructed worldlings don't. You recognize it as the nature of your own mind. Those who haven't been instructed don't. That's what makes the difference. That's what opens the door to responsiveness.

It's said that there is one nature for beings but two paths. One path simply acts out one's habits of mind and karmic patterns because there is not clear seeing. The other path recognizes the nature of mind and unlocks the door to all the beautiful qualities of heart and mind. This is what leads us out of suffering and into freedom.

So it's all about this recognition—recognizing awareness first, and then the union of emptiness and awareness. That's what unlocks the door.

When we went through the techniques this morning, we talked about turning to awareness and recognizing it. Start to add in there: recognize the empty awareness. See emptiness and awareness together, and then rest.

The fourth step is release. As you're resting, you don't need to try to make it stay longer. You don't need to try to prolong it. If you did, that would be a form of desire. What we're trusting in this practice approach is the purification of heart and mind that comes from resting in the nature of mind. We're trusting the nature of mind to do the work.

Our only work is to turn and recognize it. We can't even say that we do the recognizing—we turn, and recognition either happens or it doesn't. All we can do is turn. But as we become more familiar with it, recognition happens more and more often.

Once you've recognized, just rest. You let go of effort, let go of trying, let go of doing. Just rest. In that, you're trusting this pure nature to do the work of the path for you, on you.

It used to be, when I was starting out, I would say to myself, "Okay, I'll rest and I'll stay there as long as I can." But then I realized that wasn't the right way to say it. I changed it to "I will stay as long as it stays"—because it's up to the thing and not up to me.

So don't make this attempt to escape from phenomena, but rather recognize that awareness is the space in which phenomena appear. The sounds, the sensations, the thoughts—they're all arising within awareness itself. You're not trying to get away from them; you're recognizing the open space that holds them all.

Another near relative that can arise is making awareness into an object of concentration. This happens when you focus on awareness as if it were a thing you could grasp or hold onto. But awareness isn't an object—it's the knowing itself. It's not something you concentrate on; it's what you rest as. This is a subtle but important distinction.

Sometimes you might find yourself in a very peaceful state, and you think, "Ah, this must be it." But if you're holding onto that peaceful state, trying to maintain it or make it last, then you've moved away from the effortless resting we're pointing to. The peace is lovely, but don't make it into another project for the mind.

Another thing that can happen is what I call "awareness as a mood." You create a particular feeling or atmosphere and think that's the recognition. But the nature of awareness isn't a mood or a feeling—it's what's aware of all moods and feelings. It's more fundamental than any particular state.

And sometimes there can be a subtle sense of "I am aware" or "I am the awareness." But even that "I am" is still a thought arising in awareness. The recognition we're pointing to is prior to any sense of self, even a spiritual sense of self. It's the pure knowing before the "I" claims it.

So as you continue to practice, keep refining. Keep letting go of anything that feels like effort or doing. Keep returning to that simple recognition and rest. Trust that this pure nature of mind knows how to reveal itself when you get out of the way.

The beauty of this practice is its simplicity. We're not trying to create anything or achieve anything. We're simply recognizing what's already here, what's always been here. And in that recognition, we rest. That's the whole practice.

And that's really awareness. That's a kind of attempt to dissociate, to disconnect from phenomena.

So that's why it's important to see that when you're resting in awareness, you're still noticing objects. You notice them coming and going. So you're not separate. Awareness and objects are always there together. Consciousness comes with objects. Awareness is the field of consciousness. So they come together.

But then the question comes up: okay, I feel my awareness out here. What object am I aware of? Space. Sometimes we're aware of physical space. That's the object that's being met with awareness. So awareness always comes with objects until some altered state happens. There are altered states where that changes, but ninety-nine point nine percent of the time, awareness comes with objects.

Another way that sometimes people misunderstand the practice is they say, "Oh yeah, I'm doing that practice that you talk about, but I'm just being. I'm doing the practice of just being. That's what you're talking about, right?" No. Dogs and cats and babies are really good at just being. But in dogs and cats and babies, the recognition of empty awareness is not happening. The light of mindfulness is not turned on. The light of wisdom is not turned on.

So there's more going on here than just being. The key is the awareness. The awareness is smart. The wisdom comes in through the cognizance, through the awareness. And that's really what we're growing. So just being doesn't really do it either in mindfulness practice or in awareness practice.

And then one other thing that comes in is exactly what was mentioned in a question this morning about feeling that there's a center to the awareness which is in the head. This is a really common experience that probably all of us have or have had. And it's just our conditioning coming through that we identify with—basically we identify with consciousness and construct a sense of "I am the observer." And that "I" tends to get located in the center of the head.

So it's very deeply conditioned. It's a rare moment, I think, when that isn't present to some extent. But as meditation deepens, as wisdom deepens, as we explore that sense, as we look at locating the center in other places, we realize that it's just a construction. And there can be moments when we're free of it.

One thing that can be interesting to try in playing with this—don't get the sense that you're wrong if you have a sense of an observer. It's just part of the karmic conditioning playing out the same way we still have greed, aversion, delusion, the same way we still have hope and fear. It's not a huge deal. As meditation deepens, it can change.

But if you want to play with it, one of the things you can do is take the awareness, wherever it's being directed, and turn it toward the observer. And just ask, "Oh, who's looking?" And then you'll see if there's anything there or not. Perhaps.

In the last minutes I want to talk a little bit about integrating the practice we're doing now—the awareness practice—with our earlier practices of breath and metta, or any other practices you're doing: choiceless attention, or body sweeping, or compassion practice. And we'll put these all in the category of object-oriented practices. These are practices where we're bringing our attention to objects, whether it be the breath or sensations or metta phrases.

But we're moving now into a phase where we're putting our attention into formless practices. The awareness practice is a formless practice. You will find it really helpful in this last part of the retreat to work with integrating these two types of practice. They're both really valuable practices.

So what is the value of an object-oriented practice? It gives a really good place to collect the mind around, to collect the attention. An object gives something for concentration to develop around. And the purpose of concentration is stability, and the purpose of stability is insight.

So when you're with the formless practice, what's the risk? Moving into space can lead to spacing out.

There's not a clear enough focus sometimes and the mind goes off thinking, thinking, thinking, drifting, drifting, drifting. And as we said early on, distracting thoughts are not just a distraction. They are the feeding ground for the kilesas. When we go into distracting thoughts, we go into past and future. We go into hope and regret. We go into fear and worry. So these excursions come with a price. The price is they stir us up.

When you are with the awareness practice and you find your mind getting distracted and lost in thought, that's a good time to come back and collect with an object-oriented practice. It could be any—breath, body, choiceless attention, body scan, mettā, compassion, any of those. Once the attention has gotten stabilized again and you feel you're pretty present, open up again to empty awareness.

So in these remaining days of the retreat, have as part of your intention: I'm going to learn how to integrate these two. I'm going to know when I need to be with objects and when I can really go formless and still stay present. The staying present is the key thing.

Just one other point about this formless practice. When you open up to true emptiness and awareness, it happens in a place without grasping. That's part of the emptiness. The self is not being constructed out of grasping at that point. And then from time to time, of course, grasping will come back again. That's just what we do—so deeply conditioned.

So you can make, in a way, a focus of your practice: Are you in a place of openness, emptiness, and awareness? You'll feel this as a free, relatively free place—ease, peace, settledness. And then notice when the grasping happens. You'll feel it as a physical contraction, taking hold, fixating, obsessing, clinging. And so your practice can be a noticing of: is there openness or is there contraction? Freedom or clinging? Clinging always leads to suffering, gross or subtle. So that can become an interesting exploration. You just watch. The mind's going to go back and forth so many times. Openness, grasping. Openness, grasping. We can learn from that.

I want to close with a quote from Patrul Rinpoche, who was a Tibetan yogi and teacher from the 19th century. He summed up the practice very nicely:

"Don't dwell on the past. Don't invite the future. Don't alter the innate wakefulness. Don't fear phenomena. Apart from that, there's not a damn thing."

Let's just sit for a minute.

"There is this unborn, unbecome, unproduced, unconditioned. If there were not, there would be no escape from what is born, become, produced, conditioned. But because there is, there is an escape from what is born, become, produced, conditioned."

So we have about thirty minutes for walking practice and then the last sitting of the day with the chanting. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 175

Morning Instructions: Natural State

> In this gentle morning instruction from the Forest Refuge, Guy Armstrong shifts from detailed explanations to the profound simplicity of meditation practice. Drawing on the wisdom of Ajahn Chah, he explores the concept of the mind's 'original nature' - a state of intrinsic purity and peace that exists when not stirred by lobha (greed), dosa (aversion), and moha (delusion). Armstrong introduces the key teaching that this natural state of empty awareness is not something we construct, but rather our fundamental condition that emerges when we 'stop messing' with conceptual elaboration.
> The instruction focuses on recognizing the fundamental choice present in every moment: resting in openness and freedom, or engaging in grasping and clinging (upādāna). This teaching reflects the Buddha's understanding of the mind's natural luminosity mentioned in the Anguttara Nikāya, where consciousness is described as naturally radiant but temporarily obscured by visiting defilements. Armstrong emphasizes that once practitioners can experientially recognize this state, the practice becomes remarkably simple - just seeing it and resting there.
> This approach offers profound practical guidance for both formal meditation and daily life awareness, helping practitioners distinguish between states of mental freedom and fixation, ultimately pointing toward the effortless abiding in our true nature.

We have almost exhausted the words of instructions. This morning is going to be very sparse on instructions. In coming days we still have a couple of different meditations we'll want to open to, but for today it's going to turn the corner from explanation to simplicity. You'll find that once you learn to understand and recognize this empty awareness, it doesn't take much. Just see it and rest. This morning, we're going to be emphasizing the simplicity of that.

I want to begin by rereading something that Sally read last night in this quote from Ajahn Chah about this mind: "In truth, there is nothing really wrong with it. It is intrinsically pure. Within itself, it's already peaceful. Our practice is simply to see the original mind."

Another word that's sometimes used for this original mind is the natural state. When the mind isn't stirred up with greed, aversion, confusion, it settles down and relaxes into its natural state, our natural state, which is this empty awareness. We've put a lot of words into the understanding of what this state is, but now that you can find it experientially, you can just go there and rest. Incline toward it, recognize it and rest.

The one thing I'll suggest that you notice today, some in the formal sitting, some throughout the day, is that when you're able to rest in this natural state, grasping is not taking place. And when grasping is taking place, you won't be able to rest and relax in this natural state. The meditation becomes one of moving between the openness of the natural state and the fixation of grasping. That's what I would encourage you to notice today.

Is the mind in a state of openness and freedom? Or is it in a state of clinging, selfing, and grasping? These are always our two options. See which form the mind is in as we go throughout the day. Again, you don't need to investigate a lot when you're resting. It's better to keep free from even investigation in the time of resting. But you'll notice when grasping comes in again, the contrast. Just reflect on it from time to time through the day today.

The instruction for this morning: Rest in the essence of meditation, the natural freedom without fixation.

In your meditations today, try and get a sense for the naturalness of this state of meditation. When it's not being stirred up with our thoughts and grasping, it settles into itself—peace, calm, empty, aware. It's not that we have to go out and construct this empty awareness and the peace; it's already there. We just have to stop messing.

The Aggregates Are Empty

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines how the five aggregates (pañca-khandha) reveal the profound teaching of emptiness. Drawing from the Samyutta Nikāya's famous "lump of foam" discourse and the Buddha's instructions to Bāhiya, he explores two fundamental aspects of śūnyatā: first, that there is no permanent self (attā) at the center of experience, and second, that all conditioned phenomena lack substantial existence. Armstrong skillfully unpacks each aggregate—rūpa (material form), vedanā (feeling tone), saññā (perception), saṅkhāra (volitional formations), and viññāṇa (consciousness)—demonstrating how they operate through causes and conditions without an independent controller. He addresses the practical implications for vipassanā meditation, showing how recognition of anattā leads to profound letting go and how understanding the momentary, dreamlike nature of all appearances can transform our relationship to experience. The talk includes guided reflections on releasing identification with body and mind, and concludes with the famous verse from the Diamond Sutra on the fleeting nature of conditioned existence.

The subject of tonight's talk is the aggregates are empty. We've been discussing emptiness in connection with awareness for about a week now, but we really haven't explored it in any detail. So tonight I want to go into the topic of emptiness in a little more depth, speaking about it in terms of the five aggregates.

As many of you know, the aggregates are a framework for describing our whole human experience. Everything that we know as human beings falls under one of the categories of the five aggregates. These aggregates are empty in two ways, which we'll explore. The first is there's no self in the center of them, no one who owns them or to whom they're happening. The second way they're empty is that all the phenomena of the aggregates are insubstantial. These two approaches are called the emptiness of self and the emptiness of phenomena. We want to look at both of these tonight in terms of the aggregates.

We can turn to the study guide if you're interested on page five. Ananda was obviously puzzled by this word too, because he approached the Buddha and said, "Venerable Sir, it is said 'empty is the world, empty is the world.' In what way is it said 'empty is the world'?" And the Buddha replied, "It is, Ananda, because it is empty of self and of what belongs to self that it is said, 'empty is the world.'"

So the world is empty of self, and yet our personal experience doesn't seem so empty of self. Our personal experience seems to be dominated by the sense of I and mine. It's something that we have to look into. We look at ourselves and we definitely see a self there. We look at another person and we assume there's a self there.

The Visuddhimagga said that this is like someone who's a butcher—excuse the analogy, I'm a longtime vegetarian and I support animal rights, but this analogy is in the text. It's like a butcher who's carving up a cow into pieces of meat for sale. As the butcher cuts it up, he's not saying "cow, cow, cow." In fact, the butcher doesn't do that because he's so familiar with the anatomy that he's going "ribs, tenderloin, sirloin, rump." So the analogy is that if we are really familiar with this mind-body process, we don't say "person." We see what's actually here. We want to look to see the way the Buddha looked, and he didn't look in terms of self.

Because as it says in quote twenty, "In whatever way they conceive of self, the fact is ever other than that." One of my teachers put it a little more directly. He said, "Everything you think is wrong. Everything you think about self, if you believe in one, is wrong. The fact is ever other than that."

When the Buddha looked at a human being, I think he saw in one of two ways. One is the six types of sense organs and their objects. This is described really nicely in quote twenty-two. The Buddha says, "Bhikkhus, what is the totality of things? Listen, attend carefully, and I will teach you the totality. What is the totality? It is simply the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and sensations, the mind and mind objects. If anyone were to proclaim a totality beyond this, that person would be speaking of something outside their knowledge."

This is really a pretty radical statement. Here we have the founder of one of the world's great religions, one of the most influential humans who's ever lived on the face of the earth, and he's saying the totality on which I am basing my view of things is the six sense organs and their objects. That is your direct human experience of things. We're not talking about some transcendent God figure or Brahman or monotheistic God. The foundation of Buddhism is your direct experience. This is pretty radical.

It's what opens the door for our meditation practice to look at these six classes of objects. This is what Vipassana meditation does. It looks at the sense experience and investigates it because that's what makes us up. So I said the Buddha saw in one of two ways. This is the first way. Bhikkhu Bodhi said that he tended to use this analysis to cut through craving—the analysis through the sense doors. The other way of looking is through the five aggregates. It's describing the same realm of human experience.

The aggregates form a complete map of human experience, with each category representing a different kind of process. When we recognize how these five collections function together, we begin to see the mechanisms that create our sense of being a solid, permanent self.

Let me walk through each aggregate in more detail. The first, material form or rupa, encompasses everything physical. This includes not just our body and all external objects, but also the sense impressions themselves - the sights, sounds, smells, tastes, and physical sensations we encounter. Even the interactions between physical forms belong to this category. When I strike this bell, both the bell and the sound it produces are forms of rupa.

The second aggregate, feeling tone or vedana, describes the immediate quality that colors every moment of sense contact. Each experience carries with it a flavor of pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant - what we often call neutral. This feeling tone appears instantaneously with any sense contact, before we even recognize what we're experiencing.

Feeling tone holds tremendous significance in the Buddha's teaching. It occupies its own position among the aggregates, forms the second foundation of mindfulness, and serves as a crucial link in dependent origination. Why such importance? Because feeling tone triggers our reactivity. Pleasant experiences generate craving and attachment. Unpleasant ones provoke aversion and resistance. Neutral experiences often get ignored entirely, leading to delusion or ignorance. We can think of feeling tone as the spark that ignites the three poisons.

When I ring this bell, most of you probably experience the sound as pleasant - particularly because it signals the end of sitting! But feeling tone remains subjective. What one person finds delightful, another might find irritating. Consider how differently people respond to the taste of beets or the sound of jazz music. This subjectivity reveals that feeling tone, while seeming automatic, actually involves mental activity. As Sayadaw U Tejaniya says, we feel into each experience to discern its pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral quality.

The third aggregate, perception or saññā, involves recognition based on memory and learned associations. When consciousness encounters a form, perception immediately categorizes it: chair, person, tree, microphone. This process happens so quickly we rarely notice it, yet it fundamentally shapes our experience.

If you examine your visual field carefully - perhaps by closing one eye to flatten the three-dimensional effect - you'll notice it consists simply of shapes and colors. Yet perception instantly organizes these raw sense impressions into meaningful categories drawn from past experience and language. This recognition process proves enormously influential because we respond to the world based on our perceptions, not the raw sense data itself.

A powerful example in the world today is this factor of implicit bias. When we are out and about in the world and we perceive someone of a different race or class or ethnicity, we often form a quick assumption about them based on that perception. And the perception is biased if we don't know them or know people like them. Generally, implicit bias acts to harm the people who are not in the dominant group of a culture based on that particular attribute.

So in terms of race, the dominant group being white tends to have some implicit bias toward people of color. The dominant group being heterosexual tends to have some implicit bias or judgment against people who are not heterosexual. These are widely culturally held assumptions. It doesn't mean that every one of us sees in this way, but this is what forms a culture—the dominant group having some implicit bias toward a non-dominant group. And it's very harmful. So we need to examine our perceptions, purify our perceptions, clarify our perception so that we see things the way they are.

Sometimes a perception can just keep us from going right to the root and seeing exactly what something is. For instance, sensation in the body, which we label as pain—often we just stop at that and draw back or push it away. But with our mindfulness training, we can penetrate to the actual experience. We can look beyond the label and say, oh, what's actually there? And sometimes when we do that, it's not quite as bad as we had thought. Sometimes the concept is scarier than the actuality of the thing.

Or we label things in the world and we don't look at them closely. Like this white thing that's in front of me right now—we might just think of it as a bell and then we stop looking. But if we look more closely, we might not know what that is. If we haven't been in this hall before, we might not know. And we'd say, is that supposed to be a planter? Is that supposed to be a bowl that a monk or a nun would eat out of? Wow, that would be a big meal.

So, looking past the perception and the label to see what's actually there, we get closer to the reality of the thing. They play with this a lot in Zen koans. You've probably heard this—a Zen master will go, "What is this? If you call it a stick, I will hit you. If you say it is not a stick, I will hit you." All I got from that is if I went to Zen, I'd get hit a lot. That's partly why I ended up in Vipassana.

So perception, we can investigate and clarify and observe. And when we hear this, generally we know that's a bell, that's a meditation bell, that sound. So we recognize it.

The fourth aggregate is called volitional formation, sometimes just mental formations, but I like "volitional formations" as a translation of the Pali word saṅkhāra. So this category includes mostly states of mind, moods, emotions, thoughts, meditative states of mind like mindfulness, concentration, tranquility—all included within this aggregate of volitional formations.

These are the things that form in the mind. One moment they may not be there, the next moment they may form. Mood, emotion, thought, mind state, come and go. But they are mind objects. So, hearing the bell coming at the end of a sitting, we might feel a sense of ease—it's over. And then we might think, oh, now I could sit forever. Somehow that bell just takes away the pressure. I could sit forever. So that feeling of ease and the thought, "I could sit forever"—those are volitional formations.

And the fifth aggregate is consciousness, vijñāna, which we've been exploring a lot, talking about a lot for the last week. It's that knowing quality of mind that reveals sense objects, knows sense objects, illuminates sense objects. It holds our experience, reveals our experience.

So as soon as one hears the bell, there's hearing consciousness with that sound. The two come up together. But we've been training—we can either look at the sound or we can look at the knowing of it. Both are there and we can look at that one experience from either aspect. So the interesting thing about consciousness is it's present with all the other aggregates. It knows the sound.

It knows the feeling tone. It knows the mental formation around the feeling. It knows the perception as well. So consciousness is with all the other aggregates.

Now, I'm not going to open this up tonight for discussion because it would be a long conversation, perhaps. But for you to check: is there anything in your experience that doesn't fit in one of these aggregates? This is a useful investigation. Is every part of your experience able to be slotted into one of the aggregates? I'll leave you to investigate and check that out.

If it's true—which I think it is, having been tested for about 2,500 years now—then this is a complete description of our human experience. Just like the discourse on totality, anybody who tried to talk of something outside this would be speaking of something they didn't know. So we'll take the Buddha's word for it.

Why is this model of the aggregates important? If it describes the whole of our human experience, there's one element it does not include, and that is I, me, my. This list is telling us there is only form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness. There's nothing else. There's no "I" that's at the center of it, who's experiencing it all, to whom the aggregates happen, who owns them, or who controls them.

These are hidden assumptions when we think of a self. We're at the center. We're independent of things. We experience hearing, seeing, smelling, tasting, touching, thinking, and so forth. Or, "I am the thinker. The thoughts come from me. I'm making them happen. I'm in control of my emotions." The self is woven into all these false assumptions, but there is only form, feeling, perception, formations and consciousness.

We start to see that all of these aggregates have their own causes and conditions. They're all unfolding on their own, and they're out of our control. There's a limited amount we can do to influence them—some, but it's limited. When we start to see this, we realize that we don't have to try to control our experience the way we habitually do, and then we can surrender into it.

There's a great letting go that happens when we realize we don't have to protect a self, we don't have to maintain a self, we don't have to feed a self. We let things be the way they are.

There is something here that looks like a being, right? It looks like there's some kind of being here, but can you find a being? It's a little bit like Bodhidharma talking to Huike about "show me your mind." Show me your being. Well, you might point here, but that's just a body. So a being—there's no being. There's only a conventional designation of a bunch of pieces that have been put together in a certain way, which are the aggregates.

It's just like—if I hold this up, can everybody see? Is there any uncertainty about what this is? It's a pen, right? But if I take it apart into all its little pieces, I've got five little pieces now. I've got a tip, a cap, a cartridge, a barrel, and another cap. Five little pieces. Is this a pen? Nobody would call this a pen. These are the parts of a pen, but it's not a pen until you put it back together. Just five independent parts assembled in a certain order, and then we call it a pen, and we don't really think about it.

That's what the Buddha said we have to see about this mind-body process. We have to see the five different parts of the aggregates just as clearly as you see the five different parts of the pen to understand what a "being" is. There's no being apart from this assemblage of separate parts.

We can even go farther. We can say, this pen is gray and black and it's a ballpoint pen with a certain kind of gel ink in the cartridge. We can say all that about it and that's good in terms of conventional designation. So when we talk about a conventionally designated human being, we can say, "I'm white, I'm male, I was born middle class, I'm cisgender." All different kinds of things we can say about the beings that we see or the beings that we are.

Those descriptions are accurate. But there's no I in the middle of them all. Yes, there are characteristics to things that are put together, but there's no one thing called pen apart from this assemblage. There's no one thing called being apart from this assemblage of parts.

When we say there's no self here, we don't deny individual characteristics—that we're different, that we're all unique in the way we're put together. We can examine many different descriptions of people and those are all valid. But there's no I in the middle of them all. There's no self at the center.

We begin to see all the different pieces that make us up, and they're all conditioned. The Buddha had a dialogue with the bhikkhus about this in quote 24 on page 5. It begins with someone asking him, "How does personality view come to be?"—this belief that there really is a self here.

The Buddha replies, "An untaught ordinary person regards material form as self, or self as possessed of material form, or material form as in self, or self as in material form," and then repeats this for the other aggregates. "This is how personality view comes to be."

I don't want to unpack this tonight, as it would make a good theme for a three-month reflection—a little long for this evening. So I'll continue with the passage.

"Bhikkhus, what do you think? Is material form permanent or impermanent?"

Well, they're smart: "Impermanent, venerable sir."

"Is what is impermanent suffering or happiness?"

"Suffering, venerable sir."

Let's pause with this language. What the Pali says is "dukkha or sukha?" Is material form dukkha or sukha? And they reply, it's dukkha. I like to think of it in the broadest sense of being unsatisfactory. Can any material form give you lasting satisfaction and happiness, or does it eventually turn out to be unsatisfying because it changes?

So the bhikkhus, no dummies, say "unsatisfactory, dukkha." Here it's translated as suffering, but it's not all unpleasant. Material form isn't all unpleasant, but it's ultimately unsatisfying.

"Is what is impermanent, suffering, and subject to change fit to be regarded thus: 'This is mine. This I am. This is myself'?"

In other words, would you bet your life on what's going to change? Would you put your identity on what's changing and unreliable? Not a good idea.

This is the thrust of the Buddha's teaching: all these conditions of the five aggregates are subject to change, to passing away, and unreliability—dukkha. They all have their own nature, but they all share these characteristics.

We have a different assumption about the self. We think the I is ongoing. There's this assumption that I'm the same observer now who was there in grade school. I've been observing all these things happening over all these years and will keep observing until the day I die. That's the stable, ongoing self that the Buddha denies, saying it doesn't exist that way.

All we are is an assemblage of parts that are all subject to arising and passing moment by moment. You could call them I if you felt yourself arising and passing every moment. But we don't. We feel like the self is going on and we're having different experiences. But in fact, our whole being is arising and passing moment by moment.

So the Buddha continues, and this goes on to page 6: "Therefore, any kind of material form should be seen as it actually is with proper wisdom thus: This is not mine, this I am not, this is not myself." And then that's repeated for the other of the five aggregates.

So this line—"not me, not mine, not who I am"—is a short way to say it. It's a kind of interesting line to play with. If you're in vipassana mode and you're investigating your experience, so not resting in awareness but investigating your experience, try adding these words to any experience you have. A sensation in the body: not me, not mine, not who I am. A thought: not me, not mine, not who I am. An emotion that's arising: not me, not mine, not who I am. A sight that you see outside, the suitcase you brought into your room: not me, not mine, not who I am.

So cutting through, using investigation to cut through this sense of "I" where it forms. And of course one of the places that it forms in a big way is around the body. We have a lot of identification with the body. If someone tells us that they think our body is not very attractive, we feel, "Oh, I'm not very attractive in that person's eyes." It's really close together.

But when you think about it, did you have anything to do with how this body came out? Okay, we can affect it a little bit with diet and healthcare and exercise and all of that. But did you have anything to determine whether you were tall or short? Whether your hair was straight or curly? Whether you were thin or broad-shouldered? Nothing. We didn't get to choose. Father's sperm met mother's egg. They merged, cells grew in the womb, popped out of the womb one day, nourished on milk, air, sun, and water, grew and grew, became grown up, aging, continuing. We didn't have any choice about that. That's just nature. It's the physical nature of the body. It wasn't our will, wasn't ours to choose. The body just happened and we've come along for the ride. Consciousness is just kind of along for the ride in this form.

And yet we take a lot of pride or embarrassment about how our body is. My teacher in Thailand, Ajahn Buddhadasa, put it this way. He said, "This body came out of nature. It's part of nature. It never departed from nature and it belongs to nature. Give it back to nature. That will be a big relief for you."

So we can look at the other aggregates in this way too. Let's for the moment lump feeling and perception into volitional formations. They could go there—they got pulled out, singled out for some reason. Let's lump them back into volitional formations. So then we could talk about three aggregates: the body, volitional formations, and consciousness.

Take a look at volitional formations. Look at your thoughts and your emotions. Are these unique to you? Are you the only one who has self-judgment? Are you the only one who has joy? Who has mindfulness? Who has fear? Who has anger? Our emotions aren't even unique. They're nature too. They're all part of human nature.

And what about this consciousness?

Is your consciousness unique? Are you the only one who has that consciousness? We imagine the knowing faculty is privately ours, yet this is the most universal thing in the world. I think ants have it, to tell you the truth.

So the body's physical nature, emotions are human nature, consciousness is sentient nature. It's all just the play of nature. There's no I in control. There's no I to own it.

And yet, why does it seem like there's an I? This is so curious—such a curious thing. It's not the same all the time. People have told me in interviews during this month, "Oh, there was a period of real openness, didn't feel an I present." And yet other times the I can be really strong.

This brings us to quotation 27. Ananda said, "Another monk told me when I was newly ordained: It is by clinging that the notion 'I am' occurs, not without clinging. And by clinging to what does 'I am' arise? By clinging to form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness."

That is, the sense of self arises when we cling to one of the aggregates. And if clinging isn't happening, the I sense isn't arising. So the sense of I is something that's not stable or ongoing. It comes into being when we take a hold. It comes into being when we cling.

How does it feel when you cling? What's the feeling in the body? There's a contraction, isn't there? There's a tightness. So the I is felt as a contraction. It narrows our world. It narrows our experience.

This is why opening to empty awareness is so powerful. It undoes the contraction. It releases the contraction of self and opens up to the vast awareness of the original mind. And that opening allows all the contractions that have happened over years, decades, maybe lifetimes—it allows them to unravel.

So this is a big part of the purification. All those karmic patterns can start to open up, move through in the empty space of awareness.

Notice—start to notice in your vipassana times, and you'll notice at other times too—when the I word arises, I or my, does it ever arise by itself? Does it ever just pop out of nowhere and go, "me"? Or does it always arise in relation to something else? Like "my knee is hurting," "I'm hungry for lunch," "I hear a sound." Take a close look. I think you'll see the I only arises in relation to something else, when we've focused on it and taken a hold of it.

And the more we fixate on something, the more I thoughts proliferate. Grasping and I thoughts always go together. If you're hanging on to anything for any length of time, the I thoughts will proliferate around it. So this grasping is more or less synonymous with creating the sense of self. And so we can also call it selfing.

Here's a quotation that's not in the study guide. I love it because it's one of these poignant moments in the discourses. The Buddha's talking to Sariputta, one of his chief disciples, and he says, "Whether I teach the Dhamma in brief or in detail, those who understand it are hard to find."

You get the poignancy of that from a teacher as great as the Buddha—those who understand my teachings are hard to find. And Sariputta, who's always encouraging, says, "Now, blessed one, is the time to teach the Dhamma."

There will be those who will understand.

And the Buddha, drawn out, says, "Well then, Sariputta, this is how one should train. In regard to this body and its consciousness, and in regard to all external signs, let there be no eye-making and no mind-making and no underlying tendency to conceit."

So conceit is this word mana, establishing a sense of self. But I like these instructions: let there be no I-making and no mind-making. The Pali words are ahankara and mamankara—I-making and mind-making. And it makes clear the I is not some ongoing thing. We make it in some moments. We make the sense of I or the sense of my in a moment. We create it. And the Buddha says, don't do that. Stop making I and my. That's how you should be training.

Well, that's kind of a high bar, because it's an old habit. But that's what he's telling us. The I is extra. When there's pain in the knee, we can just note pain. We don't have to say "my pain." When there's a strong emotion, like anger, we can just say "anger," not "I'm angry."

So notice when the sense of I is there and when it's not. And aim toward experiences where the sense of I is not arising. Empty awareness is a good place to begin to discover this.

So here's the famous instruction, which I'm sure you all have heard, from Buddha to Bahiya. Bahiya had come across half or more of the country of India to receive this teaching. He came upon the Buddha when he was on alms round, and the Buddha originally didn't want to give him a teaching because he was on alms round. But Bahiya asked three times. So the Buddha gave him the teaching very briefly.

And this is the teaching: "Then, Bahiya, this is how you should train. In the seen, let there be just the seen. In the heard, let there be just the heard. In the sensed, let there be just the sensed. In the cognized, let there be just the cognized. Then there will be no you in terms of that. When there is no you in terms of that, there is no you there. Then you will be neither here nor there nor in between. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

So this is pointing to the extraordinary freedom that's available seeing the emptiness of self. When we perceive the world as empty of self, there is this great freedom that's the end of suffering—at least temporarily, the end of suffering. So this is the promise of the emptiness of self.

Then the other half is the emptiness of phenomena. So we want to look into that a little bit. And I'm going to start with a discourse from the Samyutta Nikaya. The main gist of which is on page 8 in your study guide, quote number 46. But I just want to give the introduction.

This is from the Samyutta Nikaya. On one occasion, the Blessed One was dwelling at Ayodhya on the bank of the river Ganges. There the Blessed One addressed the bhikkhus thus: "Bhikkhus, suppose that this river Ganges was carrying along a great lump of foam. A person with good sight would inspect it, ponder it, and carefully investigate it.

It would appear to that person to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in a lump of foam? So too, bhikkhus, whatever kind of material form there is, a practitioner inspects it, ponders it, and carefully investigates it. It would appear to that person to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in material form?

Well, if material form doesn't have substance, what does? Material form is the hardest thing we know. It seems really solid. And the Buddha is saying material form, all of it, is just like a lump of foam. You put your hands around it and it just goes pop. There's really nothing there. How are we supposed to understand this?

There are several ways we can understand this. One is that quantum physics has been telling us this for about a hundred years now. My professors in college, my physics professors, were all very clear on this point. Matter is mostly empty space, with the occasional stray electron or clump in the nucleus. Mostly empty space. I didn't notice that my physics professors were any happier than my other professors, however—except they were happier than those in the psychology department.

We know intellectually that matter is insubstantial, but how do we bring that into our direct experience?

One fall I was teaching a retreat at Spirit Rock. I was in the middle of a dharma talk in the evening when there was this loud cry outside the meditation hall—a loud cry like a baby in pain. A couple of staff members went out to see what was going on and I just continued with the talk.

When the talk finished, I went out and saw a group of staff standing in a small circle. I walked over and they were standing around the body of a deer lying on the ground with its head twisted back at a disturbing angle. The staff said the deer was dead. One of them explained that they had gone out and seen a couple of large dogs running away from where the deer lay. So probably what had happened was that a couple of dogs had attacked the deer. There are many deer around Spirit Rock, and occasionally these dog packs roam around Woodacre. I'd never seen that on Spirit Rock land before, but that's probably what happened. A couple of dogs attacked the deer and perhaps broke its neck.

We all stood around, did some metta for the deer for a while, and then dispersed. One of the staff called the Humane Society, who said, "Sure, take the body down to the driveway at the bottom of the hill, and we'll come by and pick it up." So the next morning they put it into a golf cart and drove the deer's body down to the entrance. The Humane Society never came.

The retreat continued. Over the next ten days I would walk by the deer and observe its state of decay. Every day there was a little bit less of the deer there. We have coyotes, vultures, crows, ants, and insects all around Spirit Rock. All these beings were feeding on the mass of the deer. Until after about ten days, the only things that remained were the hide and fur, the hooves and the bones. That was about it. The rest had just been eaten. Form just went poof, like a lump of foam—gone, as though it had never been there before.

Another time, Sally and I went to hear some teachings from the Dalai Lama. He was teaching on the Heart Sutra, which relates closely to emptiness. In the midst of the discussion, he said that there are three kinds of dukkha. This is straight out of the Pali Canon, so he was very much in line with our teachings as well.

He said there's the dukkha of pain, which is called dukkha-dukkha. There's the dukkha of alternation, where something pleasant continues but then changes into something neutral or unpleasant. And he said the third kind of dukkha is called sankhara dukkha, the dukkha of formations. It means the dukkha of all conditioned arisings.

He said the dukkha of formations is that nothing is stable—everything is dissolving. And he said if you understand that things continue along for quite a while in a certain way and then they turn into something else, that's the wrong understanding. Sankhara dukkha shows that things are arising and passing, arising and passing, arising and passing, moment after moment after moment. Nothing is stable in our experience for longer than moments when you look at your experience closely.

This is the unsatisfactoriness of conditioned things. Nothing is lasting. This momentary dissolving nature can be found in meditation experience.

One of the purposes of concentration—remember we talked about the purpose and benefit of concentration is to see things the way they really are—is to see this dissolving nature moment after moment after moment in our direct experience. The body is a good place to see it. S. N. Goenka's whole meditation technique is directed towards seeing the dissolving nature of body sensations in a state of good meditation, moment after moment after moment.

We can start to see this in our direct experience of the body. Then we start to notice sounds also come and go really quickly. Smells and tastes are very fleeting, insubstantial. Thoughts come and go rapidly. Emotions may linger a while, but even when an emotion's there, it's hard to really get a firm grip on it. You can feel it in the body, but try getting a hold of a mind state all on its own without going through the body.

There's this other beautiful quote, number 47. This is a deva who's come to talk to the Buddha: "Having seen form's flaw, its chronic trembling, the wise one takes no delight in form. The wise one takes no delight in form."

Further in this discourse on the lump of foam, on the top of the next page, the Buddha offers other analogies. Form is like a lump of foam. Feeling is like a water bubble. Perception is like a mirage. And formations are like a banana tree. If you haven't looked at the trunk of a banana tree, there's nothing solid there. It's just rings of green vegetation wrapped around each other. There's no heartwood. And consciousness is like an illusion. So explained the kinsmen of the sun. Consciousness is like an illusion.

Another expression of this is consciousness is like a magic show. Very interesting. How is consciousness like a magic show?

To explore this, we can see that sounds, body sensations, smells, and tastes are very fleeting, insubstantial. But sight is a little harder to see that in. Sight really makes it look like there's a solid world out there. When you look at a wall, you look at a rock, it looks really solid. So let's investigate the sense of sight.

If you're looking at a wall right now, remember the way that the sight of wall arises for you. There's light that's coming off of the lights in this room and a little outside light that hits the wall, reflects and bounces to your eye, strikes the retina, and then that stimulates a signal up the optic nerve into the brain where it gets interpreted and then somehow, boom, image of wall comes up. Somehow, right? That's a huge mystery. Nobody knows how that happens. The retina gets stimulated and sight of wall comes up. The neuroscientists don't understand that. The physicists don't understand that. The biologists, nobody knows how that happens. That's the magic of consciousness and the senses.

So the sight of wall pops up. Is that the real wall that you're seeing? Is that the reality of that wall? Or is it just a representation of wall that's been constructed by your sense organ and your brain? It's arising in your consciousness. It's a picture of a wall. Is it the same as the real wall? How could we ever know, right? We can only know it through our senses.

So we're living in this representation of the world and we think it's the real world. Let's be honest. We go around thinking, "Yeah, that's the real wall. That's the real tree. That's exactly what that tree looks like." But we're living in a representation of the real world. We don't know what the real world is, but we live in a representation constructed by consciousness and only existing, in our experience, in consciousness.

So this wall seems very stable and ongoing, but what if the flood of photons to your eye stops? What if the light is all cut off? Does the image of the wall remain? No. The image of the wall is not solid. It's being recreated thousands of times a second by the impact of many, many photons and the transmittal of that nerve signal over and over again to the brain and the reinterpretation.

So this image is actually not stable. The image of the wall that looks so solid is being recreated hundreds of times a second by the activity of the photons landing on the retina and the nerve traveling up to the brain. It's just being regenerated again and again and again, and it's only in consciousness. There's nothing stable or solid in that at all. It could vanish in a moment. So the sight is also insubstantial. Even though it looks solid, the sight is not.

The wall is hard—that's for sure. That's the sensation of touch. And we know what that is: just electrons in one object meeting and being repelled by the electrons in another. That's why our hands can't go through each other. The electrons won't allow it. But that sense of hardness—that's just electrons, very fleeting.

Here's another one that I would have fun with. If I ask what color this book is, it's pretty clear, right? It's blue. Is it really? What's really happening from science is that light is reflecting off this book. It comes to your eye. It looks blue. But we know what's really happening. White light is hitting here. All the other colors are being absorbed and the blue is being reflected. White light has all the colors of the rainbow. The other colors are being absorbed. What's being reflected is the blue light.

So actually, if anything, this book is every color but blue, because it's pushing back the blue. And that's what you see. And you say, "Oh, that's blue." No. It's every color but blue.

So here's the other question. I used to ask this when I was first starting to investigate this: Where is blue? Is blue really an attribute of the book? Or is blue just in your mind? Blue's just in our mind. It doesn't exist anywhere but in our perceptions.

So all these aggregates are really insubstantial. You could almost say there's an unreal quality to them. There's a magical quality to them. This is how it's said in the Diamond Sutra:

Thus shall you think of all this fleeting world, like a star at dawn, a flickering lamp, a bubble in a stream, an echo, a mirage, and a dream.

A dream.

Is there any difference in your experience of a moment in a dream and a moment in waking life? In just a moment, could you tell with certainty, "Oh yes, this is a dream," or "Yes, this is waking life"? Is there any real difference? Take a look.

This dreamlike quality of experience, when you realize that it is only an appearance in consciousness, gives rise to understanding the insubstantiality of all sense phenomena. They're fleeting, they're conditional, they're not the solid world we imagine them to be.

One of my teachers put it this way: "Everything that appears has no real existence whatsoever." Instead of calling them objects, we begin to call them appearances. They do appear, but the substantial reality is not as we think it is.

This is the way in which consciousness is like a magic show, or consciousness is like an illusion. The appearances have a reality in our sense world, but they don't have solidity. Though consciousness is revealing them, it's our understanding or misunderstanding that gives them a solidity they don't really have.

That's why the Buddha offered this wonderful teaching: "This world, Kaccana, for the most part depends upon a duality—upon the notion of existence and the notion of non-existence. For one who sees the origin of the world as it really is with correct wisdom, there is no notion of non-existence in regard to the world. And for one who sees the cessation of the world as it really is with correct wisdom, there is no notion of existence in regard to the world."

Existence is the attribute we normally give phenomena—we really think this stuff exists. Yet the Buddha is saying that to assume existence is wrong, and to assume non-existence is equally wrong. Everything is just arising and flickering, arising and flickering.

These are the two primary meanings of emptiness that have been discussed in the tradition for two and a half thousand years. The world is empty of self—there is no one at the center to whom it's happening or who owns it. There's no one at the center we need to protect and no one who can control it. This leads to a deep letting go, an understanding of all the causes and conditions that are at work.

The beautiful thing about our awareness practice is that as we let go from the control of self, we have somewhere to rest. We have something to surrender into, which is the quality of empty awareness. As we rest in empty awareness, we begin to see—we don't have to investigate, we'll simply see. All the sense appearances that are coming and going don't have solidity either. They arise and flicker and pass, arise and flicker and pass.

As the mind gets steadier and steadier, this becomes more and more apparent. It's a purpose and benefit of concentration to see things the way they really are.

Let me close with this quotation from Suzuki Roshi: "Everything is in flowing change. Nothing exists but momentarily in its present form and color. One thing flows into another and cannot be grasped. Before the rain stops, we hear a bird. Even under the heavy snow, we see snowdrops and some new growth."

Let's just sit for a moment together.

Thus shall you think of all this fleeting world, like a star at dawn, a flickering lamp, a bubble in a stream, an echo, a mirage, and a dream.

CHAPTER 177

Morning Instructions: Abiding in Emptiness

> In this morning meditation instruction, Guy Armstrong offers a guided visualization practice based on the Cūḷasuññata Sutta (MN 121), the Shorter Discourse on Emptiness. The meditation begins with traditional refuge and precept chanting, then guides practitioners through a systematic simplification of perception—from visualizing the bustling town of Barre, Massachusetts, to the Forest Refuge retreat center, then progressively narrowing focus to the meditation hall's container, its empty space, and finally to boundless awareness itself.
> Armstrong adapts the Buddha's teaching on the four formless attainments (āruppajjhāna)—infinite space (ākāsānañcāyatana), infinite consciousness (viññāṇañcāyatana), nothingness (ākiñcaññāyatana), and neither-perception-nor-non-perception (nevasaññānāsaññāyatana)—making them accessible through visualization rather than requiring deep absorption. The practice demonstrates how simplifying perception naturally quiets the mind, offering a practical tool for both formal meditation and daily life situations.
> This instruction is particularly valuable for understanding how emptiness (suññatā) practice works through progressive letting go of mental fabrications, leading to the recognition of awareness's naturally spacious and unbounded quality. Armstrong emphasizes that we need only perceive these qualities, not achieve deep meditative absorption, making this ancient teaching accessible to contemporary practitioners.

This morning's meditation will be a guided practice on the theme of abiding in emptiness. It's based on a discourse in the Majjhima Nikaya, number 121, the shorter discourse on emptiness, which Sally mentioned in her talk the other night. This guided meditation relies somewhat on visualization, so it's not strictly a "recognize and rest" kind of practice. It will be a little more active than that, but it will lead in a similar direction. Please be patient with the process.

Before we begin, let me first guide you to establish your meditation posture by resting easily in the present moment. Bring your attention into the body, finding in your posture a balance of uprightness and relaxation.

Notice how you could describe your experience in two ways. You could say the awareness fills your body—feel that quality, with the emphasis on awareness in the body. Or you could say awareness holds the body, with a sense of the wider awareness that the body exists within. So awareness is in the body, or the body is in awareness. Simply rest as comfortably as possible in the present moment.

Now I'd like to invite you into a visualization, a fabrication, an imagination. Imagine that you're up in an airplane, cruising above the town of Barre, looking down at the forests, the roads, the houses, the traffic, the people, the town. You're reasonably high up, so you can see quite a distance.

First, notice the small town of Barre. If you haven't driven through it, it's a typical small New England town laid out around the square, with the post office, a bank, police station, food stores, gas station, and restaurants. You can imagine all the traffic passing through. At this time of day, people are going to work, commuting, heading off to schools and offices, stopping for food or gas, getting out of cars, walking around, greeting one another.

As you connect with these images, this visualization, let yourself make any associations that come around the activities of a town, around the people. Perhaps some pets are out—cats stealing around, dogs out for a walk. Get a sense of all the activities and the hustle and bustle of a town on a Monday morning.

Now the plane continues flying and heads a couple of miles north. You're over the area of the Forest Refuge and the retreat center, the IMS land, the study center, and all the woods and fields around them. Looking down, you see that the traffic is reduced but still present—cars driving by, staff arriving for work. Yogis may be sitting in the halls or out walking. There are retreats at all three centers. Cooks are busy, office people are booting up their computers.

Again, let your mind make any associations you have with any of the centers in this area—the Forest Refuge, the retreat center, the study center, any people you've known there, any experiences you've had, any staff you've known. Get a sense that even at a retreat center, a lot of human activity goes on. Bring in the creatures too—the birds, the squirrels, the chipmunks, the deer, porcupines. Notice that although it's not as busy as the town, there's still a considerable extent of activity and associations around this area for you.

Now direct the plane to hover just above the Forest Refuge.

Looking down on the buildings, staff and teacher housing, administration building, dining hall, council house, residence halls, meditation hall, and all the people in those buildings—housekeeping staff, facilities, kitchen, office, meditators.

As you look down, you can also see the trees, the lawn, the central courtyard, the fields, the lupine and other flowers, the roads and new paving. As you connect with all these areas of the forest refuge, let any associations or memories just come. Moments you've seen people, interacted with people, experiences you've had in meditating or in working or in dining.

Forest refuge is a lot more tranquil than the town of Barry. And yet still you can find the perception of activity of people, of creatures, associations.

So now coming just above the meditation hall, looking down on the square roof of the hall, and then coming inside. Imagine that you can be toward the ceiling of the interior of the hall and looking down.

So you see all the meditators, all of us here meditating, quite still, not much activity. See all the other things in the room—the chairs, zabutons, zafus, shawls, plants toward the front, meditation bell, the platform, the podiums.

Let any associations come to you. Connections with the people here, connections with experiences in the hall. Anything that comes to mind. Notice that the simplifying of the field, the simplifying of the activity might also feel more tranquil.

Now you're still within the hall, but you're more like at your own eye level. Direct your attention just to the container of this hall—your visual image of the hall. You can open your eyes if you'd like to refresh it, refresh that image.

But as you connect with the hall now in your visualization, just focus on the walls, the floor, and the ceiling. So there's the front wall behind the altar and Buddha statue. The side walls looking onto the forest. The rear wall, which has the shoji screen. So just perceiving in the hall the floor, the walls, and the ceiling, disregarding the rest.

Other images may come into your mind of people or other things. Just let them go. Return to the perception of floor, walls, and ceiling. Notice how it feels to simplify your perception in this way. Notice there are not as many associations or memories. So as the perceptions simplify, we say they are present with what we are perceiving, but they are absent of what we are not perceiving. Simply floor, walls, and ceiling.

We can simplify our perception still further. Within this container bounded by floor, walls, and ceiling, now bring your attention just to the space in the room, the empty space bounded by floor, walls, and ceiling. Just perceiving the empty space in the room, just free from the perceptions of objects.

If it would help you to connect with the space to open your eyes briefly, feel free to do that. Get a sense of the size, direction of the space that's in front of you, to the sides, behind you, above, perhaps below.

How does it feel to abide with the perception of space? Space is present, but this perception is empty of the earlier perceptions of people and things.

Although the physical space in the room is bounded by floor, wall, ceiling, can you get the sense that, in fact, there is also physical space on the other side, other side of the windows, other side of the roof, below the floor? You get the sense that the space inside connects to the space outside. And then that space stretches on and on. Doesn't have a boundary. Doesn't have an edge.

Letting the attention be wide and open, just in touch with space as far as it feels to you that it extends. Space without boundary. What's the feeling of the perception of that wide space, that unbounded space?

And then turning the attention toward awareness. Can awareness know this unbounded space? Wherever the space extends in front and behind, to right and left, above and below—is awareness there too? However far the space extends, does awareness extend that far also?

How can you feel that this awareness is as wide as the space that you can perceive? And because that space doesn't have an edge or boundary, awareness doesn't have an edge or boundary.

How does it feel to be with this perception of awareness in its unbounded nature?

So now simply resting in the spaciousness of this unbounded awareness.

If the attention becomes distracted from the perception of the awareness, don't worry about it—that will happen. And when the attention returns, then either connect again directly with this spacious awareness, or go through a few steps to find it: receiving floor, wall, ceiling, receiving space in the hall, extending it to wide space outdoors as well, and then to awareness. Its boundless spacious quality.

This meditation was adapted from a discourse in the Majjhima Nikaya. It's not a strict relating of it, but you might like to go to the original and read it. You'll find two other steps. And the terms the Buddha uses are a little different.

As we get into the space that goes beyond here, the Buddha calls it the perception of infinite space. I like to interpret that in my experience as boundless. I found boundless a little easier to come to grips with than infinite. And similarly with awareness, he uses the term infinite consciousness. Moving from infinite space and then what knows it? Infinite consciousness. Again, I think boundless awareness is more in line with our vocabulary.

And then he adds two more steps, which are the perception of nothingness and neither perception nor non-perception. And if you know the sequence of samatha instructions, these are the four formless attainments: the sphere of infinite space, infinite consciousness, nothingness, and neither perception nor non-perception, which are states that are more developed than the four jhanas—the four form jhanas.

But it's important to understand that in this discourse the Buddha is not requiring us to be immersed or absorbed in those states. It's only the perception of those qualities that we're asked to undertake. So just being able to perceive boundless space is enough for this meditation. We don't have to be absorbed in it. Being able to perceive boundless awareness is enough. We don't have to be absorbed in infinite consciousness. And then I've omitted the last two steps because they're quite subtle.

If you'd like to read more, you can read the original sutta. And Bhikkhu Analayo has a chapter that includes this meditation in his book, Compassion and Emptiness. He gives more detail. And he came to the last APP retreat and taught on this discourse, so some of you are a little familiar with his approach from that.

So if you found this helpful as a way into boundless awareness, feel free to bring it in. If you can simply turn and recognize, no problem. Whatever's easy for you.

Could you feel as the focus narrowed from the big broad town of Barry down to the retreat center and then into the hall and then container and then space, could you feel how it tended to quiet the mind? As the perception simplified, the mind got quieter. That's the purpose of it. That's the function.

So this is a helpful thing to remember. Ajahn Sumedho used to give regular instructions on noticing space. So if you're in the middle of a meeting, let's say in daily life, and emotions are starting to get volatile in the meeting, try noticing the space in the room that everything's happening in. Again, space removes pressure. And so the perception of space opens up ease in the mind. This can be a useful instruction even in daily life.

Morning Instructions

> In this intimate morning instruction from a June 2019 retreat at IMS Forest Refuge, Guy Armstrong offers beautifully simple yet profound guidance on the core practice of resting in empty awareness. Drawing from both Vipassana and Tibetan meditation traditions, he emphasizes that despite all the detailed explanations given throughout the retreat, the fundamental instruction remains elegantly simple: rest in empty awareness.
> Armstrong addresses the common experience of doubt (vicikicchā) that arises when practitioners question whether they're 'doing it right' or truly accessing awareness. He encourages trusting whatever arises from the various methods of turning attention inward, whether through the 'big mind' approach of visualizing vast empty sky or simply asking 'am I aware?' He explains that different techniques may initially produce slightly different experiences, but as practice deepens, these approaches naturally converge.
> The talk includes practical guidance on integrating awareness practice with mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati) and the brahmavihāra practices, particularly mettā. Armstrong suggests using these more structured, object-oriented practices when the mind is distracted or caught in clinging, while accessing awareness practice when the mind is naturally open and uncluttered. He concludes with gentle advice about staying present during the final days of retreat, encouraging practitioners to fully commit to 'being here now' rather than mentally preparing for re-entry into daily life.

As Sally mentioned yesterday, we have offered the essential instructions for this part of the retreat. The teaching is quite simple: rest in empty awareness. While we've explored many details about how to arrive there and what it all means, the basic meditation instruction remains elegantly simple—rest in empty awareness.

Sometimes the mind complicates this because, as one of the quotes in the study guide says, it's so close you can't see it, and so simple you can't believe it. But that's what this practice is about.

Twenty years ago, Sally and I, along with a few friends, went to visit a great Tibetan master in Kathmandu. We had arranged to see him for four days of teachings while we were there, which was very fortunate because his time was extraordinarily valuable. Toward the end of the four days, he said, "You'll notice I'm repeating myself a lot.

There's really only one thing to say. It's just like a field mouse—he runs across the field and the only thing he says is squeak. I'm just like the field mouse. I only have one thing to say to you."

So that's where we are in this retreat: rest in empty awareness.

The important thing is to trust that. This trust takes time to develop. Very often in this practice, especially in the beginning, people wonder, "Is this it? Is this what they're talking about? Is this the awareness? Am I seeing the emptiness? Have I really got it?" There's no way to figure that out conceptually.

You've surely tried many different ways of turning to recognize empty awareness. Some of them may even give you slightly different results. When I think about the instruction of big mind—the image of a vast empty sky—that leads to a different experience sometimes than asking the question, "Am I aware?" This is perfectly fine.

Whichever means you find that gets you in touch with something, trust what you get. Trust what comes from that pointing and put your chips on that. This means believe in it, trust yourself, follow it, develop it. What you'll find is that as you do, it deepens, it clarifies, and it becomes more apparent what's happening.

Even if the different ways of entering, the different methods of turning, get you slightly different experiences, over time those will converge. As they deepen and develop, they all move in the same direction.

Don't worry too much about whether you've got it. We have a word for this in the Vipassana world—it's called doubt, and it's not particularly helpful. Recognize when doubt is present and simply trust. Trust what you get when you turn and stay with that. Let it develop in its own time, in its own way, and you'll be doing just fine.

So that's the squeak for today: take what you get and trust in that.

Now, for this past week we've been talking almost entirely about the awareness practice, resting in empty awareness. But remember that as you move through these days, take time to integrate with your mindfulness of breathing and your practice of the Brahma Viharas. These practices are very supportive of resting in awareness.

As a reminder—and I've probably said this before, as has Sally—when the mind tends to be distracted or caught in the middle of some clinging, it might be simpler to turn to one of the object-oriented practices, breath or metta. When the mind is open and uncluttered, then awareness is usually more accessible.

One thing you'll notice is that it doesn't necessarily take very big clinging to make it difficult to access awareness. In the Tibetan system, they say that a thumb in the right place can block out the sun. So a very small obstacle can block this opening to awareness. When that's the case, either let go if possible, or return to a simpler practice—one that you know well.

I know that the end of retreat starts looming in people's minds at this point. You don't need to start preparing yourself yet. We will have a plan for that transition.

easing you out of the silence and back into activity. You don't need to do it yourself ahead of time. We'll tell you when it's right for it to start happening.

So really take these days to devote yourself as fully as you can to being here now. When thoughts about the future beyond these days come up, it's a good time to say, "not now." Not now to those thoughts. There will be plenty of time when the time comes.

Do you have any questions this morning?

Emptiness and Kamma

> In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong addresses an apparent paradox in Buddhist teaching: if there is no self (anattā), who performs actions and who experiences their results? Drawing from the Buddha's foundational definition of kamma as cetanā (volition or intention), Armstrong explains how actions of body, speech, and mind create consequences without requiring a permanent self. He explores the ten unwholesome actions (dasa akusalakamma) and their opposites, illustrating how wholesome intentions rooted in generosity, loving-kindness, and wisdom lead to happiness, while unwholesome volitions based on greed, aversion, and delusion create suffering. Using practical examples and stories, including the transformation of Aṅgulimāla, Armstrong shows how personality is merely a stream of saṅkhāras (mental formations) - collective habits of thinking, feeling, speaking, and acting that can be redirected through mindful practice. He emphasizes that while we cannot determine past causes of present circumstances, we can skillfully direct our future through wholesome intentions in each moment. The talk concludes with the profound teaching that the Noble Eightfold Path itself is the action that leads to the end of kamma, pointing toward the liberation where self-centered activity ceases.

The talk tonight is on emptiness and karma. I hope you all came back in one piece from your little excursion into activity. Because we're going back into the world of activity and relationship, I thought this might be an appropriate time to talk about karma. Sally talked about it earlier in the retreat in regards to the practice of equanimity. Tonight I want to talk about it in regards to emptiness, because karma and emptiness might seem like they oppose each other. If there's no self, who do actions come back to? If there's no self, who does actions in the first place? These are the kinds of things we want to look at.

We've talked about how the self tends to get formed around taking ourselves to be the body—this is my body, or I am the body. We form it around emotions: I am happy, I am sad, my joys, my sorrows. We form it around thoughts: I'm the thinker. We form it around an identification with consciousness when we take ourselves to be the observer looking out from the eyes and experiencing sight, sound, smell, taste, touch—like there's an observer, a little being inside our head. You've had weeks to look at these questions, and hopefully these are not so firmly held anymore, this sense of self around these areas.

But there are two other ways that self sneaks in. One is we identify with making a decision. Who decides? When you decide to stand up after a sit, who decides? When you decide how much food to take at lunch, who decides that? Often in this moment of choice, it feels like there's an "I" there who's doing the choosing or the deciding. You may remember our former president famously said, "I'm the decider." That identification comes in easily.

The second place it comes in is around the area of personality. We take ourselves to be a certain way based on our personality, the way we show up in the world, the way we manifest. Maybe most deeply, that's who we take ourselves to be—this particular personality. And that's who we take others to be. We know somebody by their personality, and we think that's who they are.

Both these questions—the decider and the personality—are really questions about karma. We want to look at them in relationship to the concept of emptiness and see if there's a self lurking there that isn't actually a self.

So we're going to look at this field of karma, which means action. In the Indian languages that we work with, karma is a Sanskrit term. It just means action originally. The Pali term is kamma—same thing, just meant action. In the time of the Buddha, there were all kinds of theories in India about action. Some schools, philosophical schools, said action doesn't matter: I can kill someone, I can steal, it won't affect me. Actions have no consequences. Other schools said action is all predetermined, all set beforehand by prior causes and conditions. So it doesn't matter what you do or don't do, the same thing's going to happen. That was another school. And another school said it's all God's activity. There's no individual responsibility because God is directing everything.

The Buddha came along and said these are all speculative views—you people don't know what on earth you're talking about. This is when he defined kamma from his own direct insight and his own knowledge. This is in the study guide, quote 15 on page 4. This is the foundational teaching that he gave on the question of karma: "It is volition that I call kamma. For having willed, one acts by body, speech, or mind."

Two important things here: Action is based in the volition.

In the sphere of speech, we find four unwholesome actions that the Buddha identified. These are lying speech, speech that divides people—sometimes called divisive or slanderous speech—harsh speech, and frivolous speech or idle chatter.

When we examine these carefully, we can see how each one creates suffering both for ourselves and others. Lying speech breaks down trust and connection. Divisive speech destroys relationships and communities. Harsh speech wounds hearts and creates enmity. And frivolous speech wastes precious time and energy, distracting us from what truly matters.

In the sphere of mind, there are three unwholesome actions: covetousness, ill-will, and wrong view. These mental actions might seem less tangible than bodily or verbal actions, but they're equally powerful in shaping our experience. Covetousness fills the mind with wanting and dissatisfaction. Ill-will poisons our hearts with resentment and hatred. Wrong view distorts our understanding of reality, leading us to make choices that bring suffering.

Now, the Buddha didn't just tell us what to avoid—he also gave us clear guidance on what to cultivate. For each of these ten unwholesome actions, there's a corresponding wholesome action. So instead of killing, we practice protecting life. Instead of taking what isn't given, we practice generosity. Instead of sexual misconduct, we practice wise and loving restraint.

For speech, instead of lying we practice truthful speech. Instead of divisive speech, we practice speech that brings people together. Instead of harsh speech, we practice gentle, kind words. And instead of frivolous chatter, we practice meaningful communication that serves wisdom and connection.

In the mental sphere, instead of covetousness we cultivate contentment and appreciation for what we have. Instead of ill-will, we develop loving-kindness and compassion. Instead of wrong view, we cultivate right understanding—seeing things as they truly are.

This framework gives us a very practical roadmap for living. Every day, in every moment, we're making choices in these three spheres. We're either moving in the direction of wholesome action, which leads to happiness, or unwholesome action, which leads to suffering. It's really that simple, and that profound.

The beauty of this teaching is its clarity. We don't have to guess what will bring us happiness. The Buddha has laid it out with perfect precision. When we align our actions of body, speech, and mind with these wholesome patterns, happiness naturally follows. When we don't, suffering inevitably arises.

This is why the Dalai Lama emphasized teaching karma to Westerners. It's not abstract philosophy—it's the most practical guidance we could ever receive for living a fulfilling life.

There are four unwholesome actions, and the first is also found in the precepts—false speech, telling lies, speaking what is untrue. The three other kinds of harmful speech are harsh speech or angry speech, divisive speech that sets one person against another, and meaningless speech—essentially gossip or idle chatter. These are not helpful.

And then we come to something very interesting: there are three unwholesome actions of mind. You rarely hear this list discussed. They're not included in the precepts because they don't rise to the level of bodily conduct, but the unwholesome actions of mind are covetousness—wanting what belongs to someone else—ill will, which means wishing harm to another, and wrong view.

This last one is particularly fascinating. Wrong view means not understanding the way the world actually works. You can see this, can't you? If someone believed, for instance, that action doesn't matter and that it's fine for them to kill people, that wrong view can lead to real injury for others and for oneself. The Buddha taught that wrong view is the foundation of all the other wrong actions.

The ten wholesome acts are simply to refrain from the ten unwholesome acts. If you don't commit any of the unwholesome actions, then your conduct is considered wholesome. This is not easy to do. Have you ever found yourself killing insects or telling little white lies or saying something to one person that you know would hurt another if they overheard it? These are profound areas for practice, and we can continue refining our conduct in all these dimensions.

Some years ago, James Baraz and I were teaching a class in the Bay Area at a juvenile hall. This was the first I know of Vipassana teachers going into juvenile facilities. It later became well established, with several different projects in the Bay Area offering such programs. James and I had been invited in by a nurse who was a Vipassana practitioner working in the juvenile hall.

If you're not from the U.S., you might not know that a juvenile hall is a holding facility—basically a jail for people under eighteen, below the adult age. These young people are awaiting trial. We were taken into the maximum security wing of this juvenile hall in San Mateo, where we worked with a group of young men accused of serious crimes: larceny, grand larceny, assault with a deadly weapon, murder, rape. They had not yet come to trial, so we didn't know if they were guilty or not, but they were in on serious charges. Generally they would be held for months before their trial date came up.

These young guys—sixteen, seventeen, maybe fifteen years old—had little self-knowledge at that age. None of us had much self-knowledge at that age. They were penned up for months with other young men in similar states of worry, anxiety, and fear about their futures because they didn't know what the judge would decide. They might be imprisoned for years if convicted. There was this atmosphere of intense anxiety and underlying aggression that they were living within and trying to cope with as best they could.

We went in and met with a group of about ten from this maximum security wing. Fortunately, one of their guards—or probation officers—was someone they respected. He was a big, strong guy, somebody they would listen to. He sat in on the sessions with us. We went in and taught meditation. I don't think he was there because he was interested in learning meditation, but he supported the program to make it work for us.

We had no idea what these young men would think about a couple of middle-aged white guys coming in and talking about Buddhist meditation. But we just taught them. We structured it over six weeks, with a different class each week covering breath, then body, then sounds, emotions, and thoughts.

When we reached the emotions, the liberating potential of the practice became clear to them. We gave them specific instructions for working with fear and anger. These young men took these instructions seriously, and because they had considerable time just being in their cells or lying on their beds, they could practice. They discovered that mindfulness could actually relieve the stress of the emotions they were experiencing.

By the end of about five weeks, we had gained a certain amount of credibility—just a little bit. As James and I approached the last class, we wondered: should we teach about karma? Or to phrase it another way, should we teach about sila? This was potentially fraught territory because these young men didn't want to be lectured to. They didn't want us to come across as moralistic.

And so we were curious whether we should do it or not. We said, "What the heck? It's our last meeting. Why not? We're going to be out of here."

So we went in and framed the teaching as the science of happiness. We basically said, "If you want to be happy, these are some things you might want to think about." And then I started to lay out the general principles of the way karma works, and I just asked the group, "Does this sound like something that might fit for you?"

One of the guys held up his hand and said, "You mean what goes around comes around?"

I said, "Yeah, absolutely, you got it."

So this concept was not all that far away.

One of the interesting things about the teaching on karma is that it operates whether you know it or not. It operates whether you believe in it or not. It operates whether your religion believes in it or not. It operates whether your culture believes in it or not. It's a universal law. It's one of those things about nature that the Buddha discovered. It works.

So as we go back into daily life, it's really helpful to start to look at this area of cause and effect in relation to our own conduct. And one of the things the Buddha said is that when we take real care with our conduct, we enjoy what he called the bliss of blamelessness, which is a really delightful thing to have.

Here's one quote from his discourses: "Restraint in conduct is for the sake of lack of remorse. Lack of remorse is for the sake of gladness. Gladness is for the sake of peace of mind."

So as we take more and more care with our conduct, our heart gladdens and the mind comes into peace. This is the beauty of taking care with conduct. And it's all based on our intentions. You start to see how important this factor of volition or intention is.

The Dalai Lama was at Spirit Rock some years ago. It was a really wonderful opportunity. He came to address a meeting of teachers at Spirit Rock. It was really terrific to have him there. Actually, Sally and I brought down a chair from our house because it was the biggest chair that we could find at the time, and he sat in it for two days. So we've never really cleaned that chair since. Still got the vibes going.

It was kind of interesting. It was fun to watch him with a group of Western teachers. I don't think we used the time so well, but people would give a presentation to him, like a five-minute presentation on how the Dharma was unfolding in the West, and then we'd ask him to respond. And sometimes he'd say a few things about what he thought. But another time, people made this presentation, and he said—oh, we asked what he thought—he said, "Oh, nothing left up here. A few minutes ago when you were speaking, I had some thoughts, but all gone now. But never mind." He just cracked up. He's very funny. He was just really honest and real with us.

So at one point, one of the teachers who had a lot more chutzpah than I would ever have had said, "You know, Your Holiness, as Buddhism is coming to the West, there's a lot of popularizing going on. And as it gets popularized, some of the deeper aspects of the teaching might be getting lost. And you, Your Holiness, are the biggest popularizer of all of us. What advice do you have for us?"

So the Dalai Lama just got quiet and reflected for a moment. And he said, "Some people, you see, call me living Buddha, or they call me the God King. No, I am not. I am just a simple Buddhist monk. Others call me counter-revolutionary, or they call me a wolf in monk's clothing."

But you see, I look back at my own intentions. If my intention is sincere, then that is what is important. How I'm perceived is up to others. I don't care." He said that really emphatically: "I don't care."

That was a remarkable thing to say for somebody who carries the entire weight of Tibetan culture on his shoulders, responsible for all the international relations between Tibet and China and the rest of the world. And he said, "How people perceive me, I don't care." He checks his intention. If the intention is sincere, that's what matters.

This is a powerful statement. If we are in touch with our actual motivation when we act and we come from a wholesome intention, then that's the place we can rest, even if we're criticized. Even if our words land in a way we hadn't understood or expected and the impact is different than our intention, if we're sincere about our intention, we can learn from that. We can acknowledge, "Oh, I didn't know that. Okay, I'll do better next time." But our intention was sincere.

This area of karma is hugely important, which is revealed in the next quote, number sixteen: "Beings are owners of their actions, heirs of their actions. Their actions are the womb from which they are born. Their actions are their friend, their refuge. Whatever acts they perform, good or bad, of those they will be the heirs."

The Buddha is basically saying we've inherited the actions of our earlier self, and whatever actions we do today, we will inherit later on. They're the womb from which we're born. So beings take their nature from the actions they have created earlier. Whatever acts they perform, of those we will be the heirs.

Notice in this passage the Buddha is talking about beings. He's not talking about the five aggregates. Beings, as we've said, is a conventional designation for the assembly of the five aggregates, but it's a conventional term. He's not doing an ultimate kind of pointing, not trying to see emptiness in this passage. He's trying to see the effect on beings.

Westerners often feel resistance to this idea. Perhaps it has to do with our democratic ideals of equality. Maybe we think it puts too much responsibility on individuals for creating some of their own suffering. And maybe this view seems cold, uncaring, or cruel.

But that's not the way the Buddha intended it to be understood. It doesn't mean that beings deserve to suffer. If the Buddha could have taken away the suffering from the most murderous criminal on the face of the earth, I'm convinced he would have done it. You can see that in the way he related to Angulimala.

You probably know the story of Angulimala. He was told by a spiritual teacher—a so-called spiritual teacher—that he could only advance in the teachings if he collected the fingers of one thousand hands from one thousand people whom he'd killed. He had to collect one thousand fingers and wear them in a necklace, a mala, around his neck. Angulimala means "finger necklace."

It's said that Angulimala had killed 999 people, collected a finger from each, and decided the Buddha would be his thousandth victim. The Buddha's friend said, "Don't walk that way, Venerable One. There's a killer out there who wants to take your life and finish his vow." And the Buddha said, "I'm going to walk that way."

So he walked on this mountain path near where Angulimala was hiding. As Angulimala saw the Buddha, he rushed out to kill him, but he couldn't catch him. The Buddha used special powers, and though Angulimala ran as fast as he could, he couldn't catch the Buddha. So Angulimala shouted out, "Stop! Stop!"

And the Buddha said, "I have stopped, Angulimala. Now you stop." Meaning, stop your mind. Angulimala was so impressed that this person wasn't afraid of him that he said, "What's up with you?"

And so the Buddha gave him teachings right there. Angulimala did come from a spiritual background, but he was seriously misguided. So the Buddha gave him teachings and invited him into the order, the monastic order. Angulimala practiced hard because he knew he didn't have a good outlook if he didn't—that was a good motivator. And as it says, in not too long a period of time, Angulimala became fully awakened.

So this is the Buddha's compassion. You can look at the horrors of those crimes. You can look at the terrible karma that Angulimala had created for himself. And yet the Buddha's compassion was: let me free this being. I think this being has potential to wake up. And he did.

Interestingly, as Angulimala continued in his life as a monastic, he would go out for alms and people would stone him because they knew of his prior actions. And Angulimala would come back and complain to the Buddha: "But people are stoning me." And the Buddha said, "You must bear it. This is just a small portion of the suffering that you would have endured if you hadn't become awakened."

So I believe the Buddha didn't want anyone to suffer, regardless of their background, regardless of their actions. But karma is a law. Expecting someone to commit unwholesome acts and not receive unwholesome fruits would be like expecting gravity not to operate. That would be like expecting an apple in late summer to come off a tree and not fall to the ground. If the apple comes off the tree, it's going to fall to the ground. If we do unwholesome actions, there is going to be some result of unhappiness in our lives.

Sometimes people think this is a really heartless view—that it condones heartlessness. Because we say, "Oh, if someone is suffering, well, that's their karmic result. So that's their problem. It's not my problem. I don't have to worry about that. They brought it on themselves."

Well, first of all, we don't know that everything someone experiences is the result of their action. We don't know that. But even if it is, to respond as "it's not my problem" is called indifference. This is the near enemy of equanimity. It's not equanimity—it's closing our heart to them. If our heart stays open, we see the suffering, and compassion wants to relieve the suffering, whatever the source. Just like the Buddha was able to relieve Angulimala's suffering, even though he could see all the unwholesome acts behind it.

So seeing karma does not bring indifference, if understood correctly. We want to alleviate suffering, whatever the source. And often we don't know the source of someone else's suffering.

You can see these fruits of action in at least six different ways. One is before we act, we become aware of the motivation in doing the action, and we can either feel great about it, or we feel a little off about it.

I was on a conference call once with an IMS committee and we were disagreeing a lot about what to do about some particular topic. I was particularly disagreeing with one other person on the conference call. Afterwards, this person sent me an email that I thought was very disrespectful. Other people on the committee had been listening on the call too. My first thought was: I'm going to forward that email to the rest of the committee because it would show how unreasonable they were being and then would undermine their view. I was kind of enjoying the thought of doing that.

Then I realized, "Oh, something doesn't feel right." I thought, "I won't send that email." So I picked up the phone and called the person and we talked it through instead. But I knew that it didn't feel right.

On the other hand, when you're thinking about doing something wholesome, it feels good to think about it. So we feel the effect before we act.

We feel it in doing the action. When you do something kind for someone, who enjoys it more—you or them? When you give a present that really touches somebody, doesn't that feel great? When you do a favor for someone who needs some help, when you help an animal that's injured, it just feels great to do that. So we feel it in the immediate moment of doing the action.

And on the other hand, if someone is harming somebody else, there's harm to them in that very moment as they're committing the action. Sylvia Boorstein has this beautiful phrase: "Anyone causing great pain is themselves in great pain." This is a really good thing to remember. Harm comes out of inner pain, and so we can have compassion there too.

The third way we see the effects of karma is when we remember our past actions. One of the instructions in beginning the loving-kindness practice is to reflect on good actions we've undertaken—things that have helped people, actions that have come out of a spirit of caring. When we reflect on those wholesome deeds, we feel good about ourselves. That sense of well-being then becomes the proximate cause for loving-kindness to arise toward ourselves.

The other side of this in metta practice is that often, as a purification practice, we remember things we've done that haven't been so skillful. When those memories surface, we don't feel so good. We experience the pain of regret or remorse or shame.

The fourth way karma operates is that our actions come back to us in how people relate to us. If we're kind, thoughtful, and caring to others, people are happy to see us and we receive love and care in return. If we're consistently grouchy, critical, complaining, or judgmental, people don't really want to see us coming—they move away or close their hearts to us. Our actions return to us through our relationships quite quickly.

The fifth way is that our actions come back in habitual states of mind. I don't know if you've noticed this during this month of practice—when the mind moves, why does it move and how does it move? Does it seem like a habit? Basically, it moves where we have invested in the past. Where we've put our time and energy and attachment previously, that's where the mind goes when we get quiet and sit.

This insight comes directly from the Buddha: "Bhikkhus, whatever a person frequently thinks and ponders upon, that will become the inclination of their mind. If they frequently think and ponder upon thoughts of sense desire, ill will, and cruelty, then their mind inclines to thoughts of sense desire, ill will, and cruelty. If they frequently think and ponder upon thoughts of renunciation, of kindness, of compassion, then their mind inclines to thoughts of renunciation, kindness, and compassion."

These habits of mind reinforce themselves. They wear grooves in consciousness, and then those grooves play out again and again.

The sixth way the law of karma operates is that results show up in the future in mysterious ways that we can't fully understand or verify.

So what about the Buddha's statement that when you speak and act from a pure mind, happiness will follow you like your shadow, unshakable? One of the basic teachings of karma is that happiness follows goodness. Happiness follows goodness. This is mind-blowing to me—this is a law of the universe.

How does that work? I don't know, but I believe it. When you understand that this is an immutable law for all beings everywhere, it destroys the notion that karma is cold or uncaring or amoral. The connection between virtue and happiness is woven into the very fabric of the universe. It's not a cold, indifferent, amoral cosmos. The relationship between kindness and happiness is woven right into reality itself.

For me, this is what makes the world a warm, caring, and moral place to be—a trustworthy place to be. This law of karma creates that trust.

Now, the Buddha taught that we can't figure out the precise connections between actions and results. He said that anyone who tries to decipher these patterns is going to go mad and experience vexation. He identified this as one of the four imponderables—four topics that if you turn your mind to them, you're not going to figure them out, and the attempt will really stir you up and frustrate you.

The workings of karma—how results flow from actions—is one of these imponderables. The Buddha could see these connections through his powers of mind, but it's not something we can understand rationally. It's too intricate, too complex.

The other imponderables are the range of mind of a Buddha, the power of a concentrated mind, and the beginnings of the universe. Scientists are still working on that last one—they haven't figured it out yet.

We don't know how karmic results manifest, and we don't know what in our life or someone else's life represents a karmic consequence. I don't know if this has ever happened in your circle of friends, but sometimes when someone gets seriously ill, another friend comes along and says, "Oh, that must be your karma." This is a horrible thing to say, because we simply don't know that, and it can't possibly help the person who's suffering.

It's a very unkind and insulting thing to say. So when the Buddha was once asked whether all the pleasure and pain in our life comes from past action, he said we cannot make such a claim. He explained that there are many other causes for the pleasure and pain we experience. These could arise from illness, diet, climate, accidents, or assaults. He said that people who tell you everything comes from past action simply don't know what they're talking about.

So we don't say karma is responsible for everything. It's one of the laws that operates in the universe, but it's not the only law. There are physical laws, biological laws, chemical laws, and perhaps psychological laws also operating, and karma is one among these.

Sometimes we want to examine our present circumstances and wonder whether they came from our past actions. We usually ask this when we're suffering: "What did I do in the past to bring this on?" But we can never assume that our current situation is because of a past action, because we simply don't know.

This would be like using karma as a rearview mirror. Here I am in the present—what was there in the past? We can't see that. The Buddha could see that at times, he said, but we cannot. Whatever story we make up is just speculation. It has no real truth value. It would just be a story we were telling ourselves.

So it's not useful to try and figure out the past cause of our current situation. Where the law of karma becomes useful is in moving forward, because it shines a really bright light on our path ahead. We take it from here onward. Now that I understand, how can I make the best choices possible going forward to create the conditions for happiness in the future? So we use it as a headlight and not a rearview mirror.

Sometimes people will say, "You know, I don't really believe in karma. I know what people say, but I don't really believe in that." What they usually mean is they don't believe in this sixth kind of result—those consequences coming into the future that they can't see or verify. But the first five kinds I talked about are verifiable. You can see those in your life. It's this mysterious one they question: "Oh, I'm not going to believe in that. That's just a theory."

So my suggestion is to hang out with the possibility that it might be true. Over time, you might come to have faith in it. I've come to have a lot of faith in the law of karma. I've observed many people's lives over the course of many years now, looking at them through this lens, and I have developed great faith in it. But we all have to do our own investigation. I'm not telling you what you should believe, but I am suggesting it's worth considering.

And also, don't form the opinion that it's not true, because you don't know that either. If you take up the opinion it's not true, that's part of what the Buddha would call wrong view. So be careful. Keep your mind open and keep looking.

Now let's explore karma and emptiness. When we consider the emptiness of self, at first they seem contradictory. If there's no self, who acts? Who's affected by the results of action? In the Buddha's time, one of the monks asked him this very question. The monk said, "What self then will actions performed by the not-self affect?" And the Buddha simply replied, "You haven't been listening to me." He didn't try to answer it directly. You haven't been listening to me.

But actually, karma and not-self need each other to make sense. They rely on each other.

The first thing we want to examine is whether there's a self in volition or intention. When you undertake an action, is there an "I" inside that's doing that?

So let's take an example of a simple volitional action and look.

I might be sitting in my room in the morning when it's chilly, and later say, "I was cold so I put on a shawl." That's a simple sentence we could say any day of the year and everybody would understand. But when we examine that action in more detail, there's far more happening than meets the eye.

Let's say you're sitting mindfully, present in the moment, and the first thing you notice is a sensation in the body that registers as cold. So it begins with mindfulness of sensation. The cold aspect is felt as unpleasant—there's a vedana to it that's unpleasant. Based on this unpleasant vedana, there's easily a reaction of aversion, not liking the cold.

Based on this aversion, there's some searching. Maybe you feel that the rest of the body is warm, or there's a memory of warmth—so there's a perception of warm. Then perhaps an image comes of the shawl that's right next to you, so a memory arises. Then there's a desire for that warmth, that remembered warmth. Another mental state has arisen. And out of that, the arm moves, picks up the shawl, and places it.

So it's not simply "I was cold, I pulled up the shawl." There was a cold sensation, there was a reaction of aversion, there was desire, there was perception of the shawl. All these things cascaded before that volition formed to make that action happen.

The volition is just one more link in the chain of all those physical and mental events flowing back and forth, eventually reaching a directive from the mind to the arm to pull the shawl up. Volition is simply another impersonal factor of mind, conditioned by all the other things happening at that time. It's born out of that process—conditioned by sense contact and by other mental factors: qualities of aversion, memory, perception, desire, before the volition comes to action, before it actually does something.

So then the question arises: given this mechanical nature of volition and action, is it all determined? It's so conditioned—is it determined? Or do I actually have any free will?

Maybe you never really generated out of your own free will the interest to meditate. It was just the piling up of many conditions in your life.

Here's what I would say in response: Is there free will? I would say that volition is conditioned, but it's not determined. If we said it was determined, we fall into the view of fatalism, which says there's really nothing to be done—it's all going to play out according to some predetermined scheme.

We see that volition arises based on other factors, especially of the mind. If we want wholesome volitions to come, the mind ought to be in a wholesome place. In other words, volition needs to come from a place where it's supported by factors like generosity, kindness, and wisdom. Because if the mind is in a state of greed, aversion, and delusion, the chance of wholesome action emerging from that is not as high.

This is why it's so important as we walk the path to keep the mind in a wholesome place, so that our actions will come from a wholesome place and the actions themselves will be wholesome, bringing wholesome results and happiness.

If there were truly free will, we could all declare, "All my actions will come out of generosity, kindness, and wisdom. All my actions will arise from wholesome motivation." Can you say that? No. Because we still fall into greed, aversion, and delusion, and sometimes we act from those states. Even though we don't want to, sometimes we do, because those are the accompanying mental factors from which volition arises.

This is why walking the path is so important for happiness. We want to make the mental factors more and more wholesome so that appropriate actions will naturally emerge from them.

So this is the first area where self could form around volition. But when we look into it, we really see it's just another impersonal factor of mind arising based on other mental factors present at the time.

What about personality? Sometimes that's really who we think we are. "I'm this kind of person. I'm not that kind of person." We have an image of ourselves.

We have an image of others and what we call their personality. Personality is fascinating because if I ask you to think of five of your friends, I could ask you to describe their personalities, and you could probably do it in a paragraph. You kind of know who people are, right? They show up with some consistency time and time again.

So we say personality has some consistency. Is there a self in there? That's really the question.

If you've been a parent, you really know personality shows up as soon as the child is born. Parents will have two children with very different personalities, and they recognize those personalities when the kids are really young. So there is some consistency to personality, but the way I like to think about it is like a stream.

In some Buddhist schools, there's this concept that beings have or are a mind stream. I think this is a great way to think about it. If you've walked during this retreat around Gaston Pond, you get to one side of the pond and there's a creek, a stream that flows out from the pond. The overflow crosses the road and goes down a little stream.

You could stand by that stream and ask, "What is a stream?" Well, it's not the banks. Really, it's the flowing water. You look at that stream closely—is there anything fixed in a stream? No. A bit of water's here and then it's there. It's always moving, always changing. The stream is never the same for two moments in a row. The water's flowing by and disappearing. So in the stream, is anything fixed? No. That water is constantly changing.

But different streams have different characteristics. The stream that flows out of Gaston Pond is fast, clear, clean. But if you drive an hour to the west from here, you'll cross the Connecticut River. The Connecticut River is very broad, it's brown, it's muddy, and it's slow moving. So there are two streams, but they're very different from one another.

Personality is like that. Personality is a mind stream, but one can be very different from another. In both the river stream and the mind stream, there's nothing fixed. It's always changing, always flowing. In our mindstream, different states circle past each other, one after another, sometimes really quickly, as you all have noticed this retreat. And yet, for each individual, there are similar patterns that come up again and again.

We know some people come across as warm and caring. Some people come across as cool or aloof. Some people are shy. Some are extroverted. Some are funny. Some are serious. We know people by these qualities, and there is some consistency in that.

If I were going to define personality—take it or leave it—I would define it as collective habits of thinking, feeling, speaking, and acting. That's how you know someone. What are those habits for each person that you know among your friends? That constitutes their personality.

Does this remind you of any of the aggregates? Which one? Sankharas, isn't it? Formations. Volitional formations. There's that word volition again. The fourth aggregate is volitional formations. It's more or less the exact same description.

Volitional formations are habitual ways—so far we've mostly said—of thinking and feeling. The speaking and acting come out of ways of thinking and feeling. And in the full definition of sankharas, it includes actions of speech and actions of body. We didn't bring that in earlier because in silent meditation you're not doing much speaking and acting. But in the full definition of sankhara, it does include speech and bodily action. So it's more or less identical to the definition of personality.

There's consistency.

Is personality a fixed thing? If you look at that stream of sankharas, is there anything fixed in there? No. Just like a river stream, just running on, one after the other, after the other, after the other. Yet, in each of us, certain kinds of actions come up again and again and again through the force of habit. But it's not always like that. Even if you have a friend who you think is kind, sometimes they're probably mean. Even if you have a friend who you think of as generous, sometimes they're probably contracted and not so generous.

So the personality is a pattern, but it's not fixed. There's nothing fixed in it. But until we start waking up, the patterns have a certain circular quality. They just keep going around and reinforcing each other. So it's kind of like there's this lake that's been designed by M.C. Escher where the outflow circles around and feeds back into the inflow. And so the same patterns keep going around and around and around, repeating themselves. And that's called Lake Samsara.

So that's our mind stream when we come into the Dharma. When we first meet the Dharma, we've been circulating in Lake Samsara for a long time. And those grooves have gotten worn into our minds, even into our brains. As many people have said, it's not so easy to change one's personality, because of these strong forces of habit in our mental actions.

So we have this quote from the Buddha. And when he uses the word action in this, the word is karma: "Action makes the world go round. Action makes this generation turn. Living beings are bound by action like the chariot wheel by the pin." Beings are bound by karma like the chariot wheel by the pin. That's a strong bond. And that's the Buddha speaking to the strength of these mental habits that we've been cultivating for years, if not lifetimes. We're bound to them. And that's why Dharma practice is so difficult. We're bound to our habits in this way.

It's strong, but it's not invincible. It's not unbreakable. And that's what practice is about. That's what the path is for.

This is a quote from one of my teachers: "The purpose of our Dharma practice is to transform the habits of mind that lead to suffering. There is no other purpose."

And interestingly, Dharma practice uses the law of karma for this transformation. So the path itself is a karmic unfolding. As we practice wholesome mind states, they arise more often. These qualities that you've been generating—of mindfulness, loving-kindness, energy, renunciation, patience, calm, non-identification, wisdom—each moment of one of these is like a new tributary flowing into our stream, flowing into our mind stream. And over time, they start to redirect the course of the stream away from Lake Samsara. And now it's flowing toward the nirvanic ocean.

That's why we practice. We're starting to turn the stream in a different direction. If there was anything fixed in personality, the stream couldn't be turned. But there isn't anything fixed in personality. There are patterns, but nothing is fixed. And so the new intentions start to move it in a completely different direction.

They move it in the direction of liberation. And they can do that because our ignorance is not fixed either. Ignorance is just another changing part of that karmic stream, that mind stream. And as we shift the intentions that are flowing in that mind stream, the mind starts to move in a new direction toward liberation.

So we start to see the mind still a little bit and we look at our situation. We're adrift on this changing sea of circumstances that is life—some pleasant, some unpleasant, some predictable, some completely unpredictable. Where are we going to go? How are we going to go? Where is safety? The only thing we have to steer by is intention. That's all we've got. And the intention is just in this moment.

So practice is always about what's the appropriate intention in this moment that will advance the mind to a wholesome state and move the path forward. That becomes our rudder. That's what we can count on. That's what we can rely on. That's how we steer in this chaotic seeming thing called life. We find that we have a reliable rudder, which is our own intention. And then our life moves in new directions based on our sustained intentions. Our life totally transforms. And I don't just mean our mind transforms—our whole external life transforms also based on our wholesome intentions.

This is another quote from the study guide. It's on page five. This is a wonderful Indian teacher named Srini Sargadatta Maharaj who worked with Westerners in the form of dialogue. He didn't give dharma talks, but people would come and talk with him. And one of his books is on the reading list called I Am That.

In this particular excerpt, a Westerner is in dialogue with Maharaj, who says to him, "Your own will has been the backbone of your destiny." And the questioner says, "Well, surely karma interfered." Maharaj replies, "Karma shapes the circumstances of your life. The attitudes are your own. Ultimately, your character shapes your life and you alone can shape your character."

Your character shapes your life and you alone can shape your character. And the way we shape our character is the intention we bring moment after moment after moment in the direction of mindfulness, loving-kindness, wisdom, renunciation, patience, equanimity.

And then the Buddha said that for the Arahant, there is no more karma. This is very intriguing, mysterious. He didn't fully explain it. There is no more karma. It means the Arahant's not creating new karma. And the Buddha said that such a person has come to the end of karma.

And then the Buddha posed the question: what is the action that leads to the end of karma? And he answered his own question in quote seventeen—I'll let you read it another time—with the Eightfold Path. The Eightfold Path is the action that leads to the end of karma.

So this is kind of poetical, and I don't have the first-hand experience to be able to tell you about, but the way it's suggested to me is that self-centered activity goes out. For one who has awakened, it has gone out. Self-centered activity has gone out. And for those of us who are awakening, it gets less and less. So our action comes from a wisdom that sees the good of ourselves and the good of others at the same time and leads in the direction of non-doing.

The end of karma has something to do with non-doing, at least from a place of center or self. So for me, it has these qualities of resting, not acting, stopping, not fabricating, surrender, allowing things to be as they are. Does it remind you of any meditation practices you've done recently?

So I think part of the beauty and the power of the awareness practices that we've been doing is that we are practicing the end of karma. We are practicing for the end of self-centeredness. We are practicing for the purpose of awakening.

Let's just sit for a minute together. Karma shapes the circumstances, the attitudes are your own. Ultimately, your character shapes your life, and you alone can shape your character.

So there are about twenty-five minutes for walking and then we'll have the last sit with chanting.

> Guy Armstrong offers a profound guided meditation exploring the relationship between conventional and ultimate perspectives in Buddhist understanding. Drawing from his personal experience observing autopsies as a monk in Thailand, he guides practitioners through two distinct ways of viewing ourselves and others: seeing through the lens of personal history with all its conditioning and circumstances, versus seeing simply as body and consciousness existing completely in the present moment.
> The reflection examines how the conventional view—considering someone's background, relationships, health, work, and life experiences—naturally evokes compassion (karuṇā) as we understand the struggles that have shaped them. In contrast, the ultimate view sees only the immediate reality of form (rūpa) and consciousness (viññāṇa), with mental formations (saṅkhāra) arising and passing like ripples on water. This present-moment perspective opens space for transformation and freedom, unconditioned by past patterns.
> Armstrong emphasizes the practical wisdom of skillfully moving between these two ways of seeing. The conventional view supports compassion and understanding, while the ultimate view supports liberation from attachment to personal history. He guides practitioners to recognize that both perspectives have validity and specific applications in meditation practice and daily relationships. The teaching integrates elements of the five aggregates (khandha) and points toward the emptiness (suññatā) that underlies conventional designations, offering a bridge between formal meditation practice and engaged compassion in the world.

This morning we're going to do a guided reflection along the theme of emptiness and compassion. I want to preface it by talking about how this came up for me. Those of you who have read my book know that at one point when I was a monk in Thailand, I got to observe autopsies. I stood next to dead bodies for the first time in my life and watched three different autopsies as the coroner determined what had caused the death of these people.

After sitting through that experience, in quite a sensitive and open place, I went out and caught a bus to return to my monastery. I was really in a different space. As I was watching people—this was in Bangkok in the center of town—I thought there wasn't much difference between those people walking around and the people I had just seen who had died. There was a body, and in the people who were walking around, you could see their eyes were still bright, and there was still consciousness going on.

I thought, there's a body, there's consciousness, and of course there are all the movements of mind—the sankharas are going on. In terms of the three aggregates that we've talked about—body, consciousness, movements of mind—the first two, body and consciousness, seemed so strong and so fundamental that the movements of mind seemed like ripples on the surface of the water, just waves coming and going.

What really struck me was there was a body, which was totally in the present moment. There was consciousness, which was totally in the present moment, just this brightness of people being aware of things. But the mind's faculty of memory means we remember things that happened in the past and based on that we project things that are going to happen in the future. All those memories and projections are happening in the present too.

When I looked at people just walking around Bangkok, I was seeing totally their present moment reality. There's the body and there's consciousness. All the rest were just ripples on that reality.

That's what the reflection this morning is going to be about. It's about seeing people as body plus consciousness and seeing how that feels, then seeing people with a history and seeing how that feels. This will be our exploration this morning.

Please begin the meditation by sitting easily, relaxed and alert. Connect to the body and sitting, settling into an awareness of the body, feeling the heart center, connecting with a sense of goodwill for yourself, for all beings.

Now I'm going to invite you to bring to mind a friend. It could be the friend you used in the brahmaviharas practice. It doesn't necessarily have to be—any friend that you would like to connect with at this point. Let's take a moment and choose someone.

Once you've chosen them, bring them to mind, bring them present with you in this moment. Perhaps see them or say their name.

Because this person is a friend, you know something about their life. I'm going to invite you to reflect on the circumstances of their life and actually what you know of their personal history. As you connect with your friend, you might bring to mind where they were born, how they were raised, what their family of origin was like and how that affected them. Then anything you might know about their movement into adulthood—the period as a young adult is often turbulent. How that affected them.

As they've grown as an adult, any of the major things that come to mind that happened in their life? You might think about important relationships. Have they had a close personal relationship, an intimate relationship? How has that gone? Maybe there's been more than one. How have they gone? What's their current family situation? Are they in a close relationship? What do you know about their parents? Have they had children? How are those relationships for them?

Think about their current health situation. Do they have any health challenges at the moment, either physical or mental? Or are they in very good health? How has their state of health affected them?

Consider their livelihood, their support. What has their work life been like? How have they supported themselves? Has their work been easy and satisfying? Has it been difficult, challenging? How's their money situation? Is it comfortable or is it difficult?

And in all these ways that you've considered your friend's life from early on up until now, can you feel how all these factors have to some extent shaped them? And so considering your friend's overall balance of happiness and sorrows.

And now letting go of this reflection on your friend. Letting go of any thoughts about their past or history. Just returning to the present moment. Feeling yourself sitting easily. Aware of the body or aware of awareness, coming into the present moment.

And now I'd invite you to bring your friend in again. Connect with them, perhaps seeing their image. But this time only see them as a person totally in the present moment. Fundamentally, they are a body plus consciousness. Brightness of awareness, the body, all in the present.

Yes, there are mental states, there are moods and emotions and thoughts. Let's see those as passing ripples on a very large lake. The lake being the body plus consciousness all in the present.

How does it feel to see your friend this way? How does it feel compared to seeing them with all their personal history? Which way does it seem leaves your friend more open, more free, lighter? In which way of looking at your friend brings more compassion, more caring, more humanity?

And now letting go of your friend, thanking them for joining you in the reflection. Coming back into the present moment, just sitting quietly. Aware of the body, the sounds, space, awareness.

And now bringing to mind yourself, connecting with yourself here and now, aware of your heart center, with a sense of goodwill, wishing the best for yourself. And then taking a look back over your life and your situation—your childhood, the family you grew up in, and how that life affected you.

Young adulthood and all the things one goes through then. Relationships, close personal relationships, those with partner or partners, or the absence of them, family, relation to parents. Any children? Any grandchildren? The joys and sorrows with family.

Your own health. How is it now? How has it been over time? Have there been health challenges? How have they felt?

And your own livelihood and support. Any work or careers that you've done. The ups and downs of work life. And your current sense of support financially—how is that for you? Adequate? Comfortable? Or difficult?

And so with this sense of the course of your life, how it has affected you, how things are still affecting you, just a sense of what has made you who you are.

And then letting go of that recollection, letting go of that reflection. Just coming back into the present moment. Just a simple noticing of the body, mood, heart, space, awareness. Just resting in the present moment, letting go of any thoughts of memory or past.

And now again connecting with yourself and maybe seeing an image of yourself or a photograph of yourself somewhere you're comfortable. And this time as you look at yourself, just see body and consciousness. These are the two foundations for our human experience. We're in a body and we're conscious.

Thoughts and moods come and go like waves on a lake. But fundamentally we're body and consciousness totally in the present moment.

And when you see yourself in this way, how does that feel? No reference to the past. No reference to history. Just the present moment reality—body and consciousness.

Compared to seeing yourself with history, which way feels more open, freer, less confined, more available for transformation? And compared to seeing yourself with history, which evokes more compassion, more human understanding, more patience?

And now letting go of that reflection, that investigation, just returning to the present moment experience, sitting quietly, feeling the body, relaxing the body, relaxing the mind. Breathing in, breathing out. Letting the attention be wide and knowing all the sounds that are coming and going.

If the reflections earlier brought up any emotions that are difficult to be with, not so comfortable, just allowing them to be in the wide space of your attention. Not pushing them away or judging them. Just allowing them to be felt in this big space of awareness.

If the emotions are very strong, remember that you can always return to your Vipassana practice. We've trained a lot in working with difficult emotions. Remembering the steps of RAIN: to recognize, allow, investigate, not identify. Allowing the emotion to be there, to do whatever it will do, and knowing that it's held within the vast space of awareness.

And so for the last part of this sitting, just returning to your practice of awareness, or if it feels the mind could benefit from more stability, returning to mindfulness of breath, or one of the Brahma Viharas.

So this reflection, you might say, is the start of our integration practice. We are linking back up into relationships and the wider world and the activity of thought. So I'm curious, in these two approaches, both to your friend and to yourself—one with personal history and one just present moment—did one of them evoke for you a more sense of freedom and openness?

"The latter."

When you just see someone completely in the present moment, body plus consciousness, do you get more of a sense of their ability to move, to open, to change, to transform? Could you get that for yourself as well?

And what about between personal history and body plus consciousness—which evoked more compassion?

"The history."

The history. Is that generally true for people? When we think about people's circumstances and all the events in their life that have led up to their present circumstances, we often feel a lot of compassion for all the ups and downs in people's lives. Sometimes that sense of compassion can be overwhelming and it goes into the near enemy of compassion, a little bit of overwhelm. So we might experience this for our friend, we might experience it for ourselves. If that happens, that's kind of an indication—okay, might be the time to shift out of the personal history and into this other way of looking.

In the whole of the Buddha's teachings, these two ways of looking fall under what I would call conventional understanding and ultimate understanding. Conventional involves concepts. Even to designate someone as a person is a concept. To say there's a being is a concept. There's no being. There's only form, feeling, perception, formations and consciousness. When we say "being," we're already using conventional designation. And then when we review someone's history, that's the creation of memory. So it can really help us understand how someone has lived their life, what's happened to them, all the grounds for compassion.

Is personal history always reliable? The things we fabricate through memory are maybe sometimes true, sometimes really true, sometimes not so clear. So this personal history reflection is useful, but I would say don't believe in it ultimately. Don't believe that you've absolutely got it right. We remember things wrongly about our own past. We remember things wrongly about other people's past. So it's useful to evoke compassion, but hold it with a little bit of questioning.

And then coming back into the present moment and just seeing a body and consciousness, the doors are really open. Anything can happen in the next moment, not limited by personal history or what's gone before.

I actually use this reflection on body plus consciousness a lot. Sometimes for myself, if I feel like I'm getting entangled in something related to the past, I feel like I'm getting captivated by the past, I'll go to body plus consciousness and I'll see it's just an invention. That tie to the past is just an invention. And then I come into the present, everything's open again.

Or when you're with someone else, recognize that you have two ways of seeing them. For those of you who work with people, you can respond either from the point of view of personal history, or you can respond from the perspective that there's just the present.

That reminder—there's just the present—can sometimes really help people come back out of their involvement with their own past. But you have to be careful with it because you don't want to override compassion. Generally, the conventional view supports compassion. The ultimate view supports freedom. As you go back and forth, you realize you have the option every moment to see yourself and to see others in either one of these ways.

This becomes a really interesting exercise. You can view people from either point of view, and they both have their validity, their applicability, reasons to bring them in, reasons not to bring them in. Get skilled in looking both ways. Then you can resolve your own attachment to the past, you can help resolve others' attachment to the past, or you can stay on that level of personal history if compassion is the most important response.

Obviously, the wisdom aspect here is the emptiness aspect. Body and consciousness—that's basically all that's going on. And of course, mind states are there and important, but they come and go so quickly, they're like waves.

Do you have any questions or comments?

Taking the Practice Home

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

> In this comprehensive dharma talk, Guy Armstrong addresses the essential question of how to sustain awareness practice after returning home from retreat. Drawing from his decades of experience as a former Thai forest monk and vipassana teacher, Guy explores how awareness practice reveals "a new room in an old house" - a dimension beyond the familiar territory of object-oriented meditation.
> Guy examines how this practice shifts our understanding from the second Noble Truth (dukkha and clinging) to the third Noble Truth (temporary nibbāna and release), moment by moment. He discusses how awareness serves as an immediate refuge - something "steady, reliable and trustworthy" that feels beyond change. The talk covers practical integration with traditional samatha and vipassana methods, emphasizing the importance of maintaining formal practice while incorporating informal recognition throughout daily activities.
> Offering concrete guidance for home practice, Guy suggests building on foundations of mindfulness of breathing and mettā before turning to awareness, and recommends maintaining two hours of daily formal practice when possible. He addresses common challenges like working with cognitive tasks and finding qualified teachers, while encouraging practitioners to trust their individual experience of this "timeless quality" of natural awareness.

This afternoon I'd like to talk about taking this practice home. Before I get into details of what to do, I want to talk a little bit about this practice as an area for new understandings.

I came into these kinds of practices after I'd been doing Vipassana for about twenty years. I'd been a monk in Thailand and I'd done a number of three-month courses. When I happened upon the awareness practices, it felt like I was exploring a new room in an old house. I was familiar with all the other rooms, and yet there was this one off one of the main corridors I'd never been in before. As I started to know it and get familiar with it, I found that it changed my understandings of a lot of the ways that I'd held practice before.

Some of these we may have talked about in Dharma talks, some of them you may have touched on in interviews, but I wanted to bring out some of the ways that I felt practice changed as a result of learning about awareness and how my understanding of practice changed.

One of the key things for me was that I found a new and immediate refuge. I found something steady and reliable and trustworthy that was in my direct field of experience. The reason it was steady and reliable and trustworthy is that to some extent it was beyond change. It felt beyond change. Whether it is or not, the philosophers can debate, but it feels like that.

In that, there's a way that our center of gravity can shift from centering around objects and what's happening with objects, and even objects of mind. It can shift to this new place in our being that's another dimension. One of the great things about this other dimension is we don't have to produce it. You don't have to produce awareness. It's already here. It's always already here. You just have to tune into it.

We'd say that this dimension of our being, this empty awareness that we come to know as an intrinsic part of us, is an aspect of reality. It's a profound aspect of reality. Düdjom Lingpa, a Tibetan teacher, said that in taking up this practice, one is taking the fundamental nature of reality as the unsurpassable ultimate refuge. The nature of reality is our refuge, and we can touch it here and now.

The second thing that shifted for me is that I really saw the heart of dharma practice. As I talked about the other night, moving from the second to the third Noble Truth, this practice highlights that moment after moment. We're either in the second Noble Truth with craving, clinging and suffering, or we're in the third Noble Truth of temporary nibbana and release and ease.

My understanding of what I was doing in practice started to move to: am I in the second Noble Truth or am I in the third Noble Truth? Am I grasping or am I in empty awareness? If I'm not grasping, then I can be in empty awareness.

This is pointed to by a quotation from the Buddha when he says, "Nothing whatsoever is to be clung to." That's the pith of that quotation. But he goes on to say, one who has heard this has heard all the teachings. One who has practiced this has practiced all the teachings.

This awareness practice highlights this central point again and again. Is there clinging or is there not? That's basically all we're concerned about.

The third thing that it pointed out to me is it showed another kind of path to awakening or liberation. The traditional path of early Buddhism relies upon these four stages of enlightenment, beginning with stream entry, moving through once returner, non-returner, and arhat, that are usually understood as four successive moments at deeper and deeper levels of connecting to the unconditioned element, direct realization of the unconditioned element, responsible for a moment of enlightenment.

This idea of awareness offers another way to freedom because in it there's the possibility of stabilizing. What is suggested here is that we have the potential to stabilize essentially in this area of non-grasping, the third Noble Truth. You may have felt that at different times in the retreat, that it was so clear and so steady that you felt stable in it for periods. There's no reason that with further meditation and further development, that stability can't go on and on.

Now after a couple of hours of talking yesterday, you may feel it's slightly more remote than it was two days ago. Nonetheless, this is a different description of a path to liberation. It may seem more possible for us because we've tasted that stability, and we know we just need to do it more.

Another way that it shows a little difference in the path is our normal understanding of the Eightfold Path is that we build up wholesome moments little by little, over and over, and they lead us closer and closer to the unconditioned, to the realization of the unconditioned. There's this lovely quotation from the Buddha: "Don't underestimate the value of wholesome moments. By the gradual falling of raindrops, a jar is filled." So accumulation of mindfulness moments starts to fill up the jar, and when it gets full enough, it tips into the unconditioned.

This awareness practice, in a way, reverses the process. It almost starts with the unconditioned. And it says, if you can get a little peek of this thing, trust that. Awareness is like the unconditioned.

When we glimpse it, we're almost looking from the other direction. And then we trust that expanding these glimpses wears away the kilesas. Awareness itself is free from kilesa. It's unstained. So when we can rest there, the mind is temporarily purified. That's the temporary nibbana that Ajahn Buddhadasa talked about. As we rest there more and more, the power of our natural state, the power of this free dimension within us, starts to wear down the kilesa, wears down the obscurations.

Another thing that becomes clear from practicing with this for a while is that now we know what to do in practice when the mind becomes calm. I don't know if you've ever experienced this, but this happened to me a lot. I'd be with a practice like the breath or even body scanning, and I'd come into this state of calm where there wasn't much going on in the mind and there wasn't much going on in the body. Objects were really quiet. But then what was I supposed to attend to? I'd gotten there by attending to objects, and then what was I going to do next?

Sally talked about this possibility of samatha without support, which I've sometimes played with in my own mind—the way she described it as being with the stillness itself. So that's one approach. But I often felt I'd get to this open space of calm, and I didn't know what to do. I'd just kind of hang out there, but then my mind would drift because there wasn't really a clear place to land. The breath was really subtle, sensations were really subtle, there weren't many thoughts, and I'd just kind of float away into a little bit of distractedness.

Now when I hit that space of calm, I know what to do. I turn to awareness. It's always there. When the mind is calm, there's that foundation of samadhi that makes it easy to connect. A couple of people have mentioned, either in interviews or questions here in the hall, that when awareness is seen clearly, it becomes a very good focus for attention. It's a very clear part of our experience, and it's still and without kilesa. So it's a very good meditation focus when it's available. In times of calm, I find it's the clearest focus available to me. And because I have interest in it, that drift doesn't set in. It just feels wonderful to be in touch with that quality of awareness.

It's so interesting. Someone said in an interview the other day that they felt a timeless quality in this awareness. When they're with the awareness, it felt like it was out of time. And that's true for something that's not subject to coming and going. The perception of time is basically created by change. And when there is no change going on, time kind of falls away as a perception, as a felt sense. So that means we have discovered an element that is beyond coming and going, and it means it's always there—even in dreams.

I don't know if you've played with this at all, but there's this approach called lucid dreaming where you find your meditation subject in a dream. Awareness can be found in dreams also. It's there too. So wherever you are, awake or dreaming, you can find this focus.

Another thing I learned from being with awareness is I really learned the value of non-doing. In standard vipassana instructions, the direction to connect and sustain—vitaka and vicara—is so much at the heart of our meditation practice. Connecting and sustaining with the breath or sensations. Even in choiceless attention, we connect and sustain with objects as they come up. It's a beautiful practice and an essential part of deepening concentration. But at a certain point, that repeated effort to connect and sustain moment after moment isn't needed.

In some meditation experiences, you'll find the effort will fall away. In vipassana practice as well as the awareness practice, you'll get to a point where effort's no longer needed to be with the present moment. But this practice of awareness really highlights that non-doing with the instruction of resting. Once we get the sense of resting and we have a clear focus—which is awareness—where the attention can go without movement, it really strengthens this feeling, the flavor of non-doing. And in non-doing, the self is really out of the picture. The self has stepped aside, and we're trusting we don't have to do the dharma.

The Dharma starts doing us. It becomes really clear that we don't have to do anything at that point. So there's this beautiful quality of effortlessness, this non-doing that emerges through this practice while still maintaining a clear focus for the attention.

This is the direction that surrender leads to—or that letting go leads to. Letting go guides us into this non-doing. We let go of control, we let things be where they are, as they are, and yet we can still connect to awareness.

This practice also highlights the importance of relaxation. If we're straining, we won't be connected to awareness. When we relax, it's already there.

There's a lovely poem by Angelus Silesius, a medieval Christian contemplative. Of course, he expressed it in theological terms, but listen to the way he describes the divine: "God is a pure no-thing, concealed in now and here. The less you reach for it, the more it will appear."

A pure no-thing—does that sound like awareness? It does, doesn't it? Concealed in now and here. The less you reach for it, the more it will appear.

As we settle into this level of relaxation and opening to what feels like it's beyond change, what seems to be always there, it opens an avenue to devotion. Devotion is sometimes not emphasized very much in Vipassana circles, but it has been a central part of every major religion throughout history.

The Buddha spoke of this after his awakening: "It is painful to dwell without reverence and deference. However, in this world, I do not see another ascetic or brahman more developed in virtue, concentration, wisdom, or liberation than myself, whom I could honor, respect, and dwell in dependence on. Let me then honor, respect, and dwell in dependence on this Dharma to which I have become awakened."

The Buddha is essentially saying that if there is someone more developed than we are in virtue, concentration, wisdom, and liberation, we can honor and revere that person. To "dwell in dependence" means to stay near them and continue learning from them. Fortunately today, there are many beings who are more developed in these ways than we ourselves are, so there are many examples for devotion in the community of senior practitioners.

But we don't have to neglect devotion to the Dharma itself. One thing I've felt, and that I've sensed from some of you in interviews, is a quality of awe and reverence for this awareness and what it opens us to. It's a mystery. How did this awareness arrive in this body? How is it that it can know the phenomena of the world? It can know our own mind. And yet there it is.

When I think about one single element of the Dharma that I can prostrate toward, I think about this awareness—the mystery of this empty awareness that's always available. I can feel that reverence and respect when I turn in that direction.

Sometimes when I chant the refuges and come to refuge in the Dharma, I think about this empty awareness. That's what comes to mind because of its immediate, felt presence and its liberating potential.

This also gives us a sense of where we might incline the mind toward nibbana. We've talked about how awareness, like the unconditioned, may offer a direct link into the unconditioned, into nibbana, through this notion of Buddha nature. As we direct our attention in that way and feel its quality as a refuge, like the unconditioned, it gives us a sense of what we can release into—that which is beyond change.

Finally, it gives us a sense of the primary importance of awareness. In doing object-oriented practices for a long time—breath meditation, choiceless attention, body scanning, emotional mindfulness—we can really think that Vipassana practice is all about the objects that come into our experience, both the physical objects and the objects of mind. But this dimension makes it clear that there's something holding all those appearances, both physical appearances and appearances of mind. That which is holding them—this consciousness or awareness, this empty awareness—is more fundamental and more of a refuge, more important than any of the individual objects. So it can take us away from entanglement with the object.

When we're paying attention to objects all day long, it's hard not to get entangled. But this gives us somewhere else to be that's not entangled. It offers us that kind of different dimension—a primary dimension.

We've talked about this as empty awareness, the union of emptiness and awareness, the natural state. Sometimes it's also called natural awareness. There's a very beautiful quote on the last page of the study guide about the four faults of natural awareness. I need to correct one mistyped word—when we get there, you'll know it.

The Four Faults of Natural Awareness:
So close you can't see it.
So deep you can't fathom it.
So simple you can't believe it.
So good you can't accept it.

The second "believe" should be "accept"—it's so good you can't accept it.

This is what we've been exploring. This is what we've been discovering. It's so close. That's why I want to emphasize again: it's so close. Whatever you've received as your experience through that movement of turning, trust in that. It manifests differently for different people and differently at different times for all of us.

Sometimes it's just very clear recognition of the factor of awareness. Sometimes it's a heightened vividness—you turn to awareness and everything kind of lights up. Sometimes there's a sense of letting go—you turn to awareness and there's a dropping that happens. Sometimes you turn to awareness and there's a stopping. The thoughts stop. The projections stop.

Whatever form it takes for you, trust that. Go with that. That's your individual glide path. It will deepen. In its deepening, it will clarify exactly what the nature of awareness is.

Going back into our daily life, how do we work with this new practice? Formal practice is still really important. Even though this gets into the effortless, formal practice remains crucial. This is from Shabkar, whom we've read a couple of times: "Butter is made from the essence of milk, but if the milk isn't churned, the butter won't form. Sentient beings have Buddha nature as their essence, but if they don't practice, they won't be enlightened."

So we need to keep practicing. In this arena, it means we need to keep turning to and recognizing awareness.

I think this practice is really well suited to informal practice times—off the cushion or off formal walking. It's a practice you can truly take with you out into the world because you don't have to locate your breath. You don't have to feel tingling sensations in the bottom of your feet, or anything like that. You just turn and notice awareness, and it's always there. It's always available.

At the end of one retreat, Mingyur Rinpoche gave direct instruction for maintaining this practice in informal times. He said to recognize it one hundred times a day in informal moments. One hundred times a day. I wanted to take that up as a practice some years ago, so Sally bought me one of those ticket counters—the ones where you check people going through a turnstile. I would try to hit one hundred with that every day. It's not easy, but it really helped keep track.

What I found the best avenue for that was boring meetings.

And being connected to Spirit Rock, I sat through many boring meetings. Every few seconds I could do a click on that counter, and within a few hours I'd reach my hundred. Driving might also provide this opportunity, or walking around shopping, or tending to daily tasks—anywhere you have a little free attention available. One hundred times a day really keeps you in touch with the practice.

When we sit down for formal practice, we often discuss this at retreat endings, and we usually recommend trying to sit two hours a day if you have the time. At this phase of your life, that may seem impossible. There were certainly times when I was working full-time that I didn't feel I had time for that. But as some of us in this room are moving toward retirement territory, this may be very possible. The only reason for not doing it might be lack of commitment, so really consider this deeply. If your schedule permits the possibility of sitting two hours a day, take it seriously.

My teachers told me this. Joseph told me this on my first retreat, and I've tried to maintain this for most of my practice career since then. It's fluctuated depending on my level of busyness, but I find that if I can sit two hours a day, it keeps me basically as balanced as when I emerge from retreat. That practice truly maintains my level of equanimity and equilibrium. Of course, do what you can in that regard. If it's twenty minutes, that's still beneficial and helpful.

Continue to go on retreats, naturally. From the stories of people like Ajahn Chah and Ajahn Mahabua, we know the great masters spent many years in retreat, doing nothing but sitting and walking meditation. That's how they became great masters—that's how the butter gets churned. So do what you can in that regard.

Many people here have done extensive long retreats, so I know I'm speaking to the choir to a certain extent. But I still want to encourage that continuation. I tell myself that every year: Guy, keep sitting long retreats. It remains tremendously valuable for me.

Some have asked where they can do more retreats in this style. It's not easy to find. There's usually at least one retreat a year at Spirit Rock that follows this approach. We advertise it as the Awareness Retreat. Philip Moffitt has been part of that retreat for years, and Sally and I have taught it many times. So there's typically at least one such retreat annually. Sometimes it's part of the Advanced Practitioners Program, and one might need to join that program to access the retreat. But many years, it stands on its own.

Another possibility is to attend one of the longer retreats at Spirit Rock or IMS. These are standard vipassana retreats, but if you want to practice awareness meditation, you can approach your teacher and say, "On this retreat, I want to do this awareness practice. Can you support me in that?" A number of teachers on those retreats could accommodate this. They wouldn't give instructions in the hall, but they could support you in interviews. You could bring recordings of talks from this retreat or other helpful talks and listen to them in the evenings, getting reminded of the instructions while practicing this style among others doing standard vipassana practice.

As many of you know, Sally and I will be offering this retreat again next September—basically the same curriculum, here at the Forest Refuge in September 2020. The application is already available on the website.

There will again be a lottery for that retreat. But we will be doing it again in the fall next year.

So a few words on how to integrate this practice with your existing practices. Sally's just encouraging me to say something about the Advanced Practitioners Program, which she started.

What Sally put together was a series of three retreats over the course of twelve months. One retreat focused on emptiness, one on awareness, and the third on liberation. They're designed for people who have already developed considerable meditation experience plus some study background.

In addition to the three retreats, the whole group—about a hundred people—signs up for the complete program. You form a dharma buddy relationship where you have regular conversations with one other person. There's an ongoing mentoring group where you meet monthly with people in your geographical area or online if you're in a remote location. These groups are led by a teacher, you have a mentor in the program, and there's monthly homework and reading. So it's a very comprehensive package, and for people at your level of experience, it's an excellent program.

The Awareness Retreat got woven into that program, and details are available on the Spirit Rock website. You can search for Advanced Practitioner Program. There's one currently running, and there won't be another one for a year or two. There's still a description you can read that's quite interesting.

Now I want to talk about how to integrate this practice when you go home with your existing practices—vipassana and metta. The basic suggestion is the way we did it here: continue with your foundation practices.

Remember that we first turned to mindfulness of breathing to develop a foundation of samadhi or concentration. We turned to loving-kindness to further open the heart. And on those two foundations, we moved into awareness practice. So at home also, this is a good combination.

You'll see when you get home how this carries forward for you. Everybody's experience is different. One thing I've found is that when I leave an awareness retreat, it's really accessible for a while. Then, as the samadhi drops off when I move back into daily life, my avenue to awareness drops off as well. So I find it's not as accessible a week or two down the road after coming out of a retreat like this.

I find it helpful in my daily practice to support awareness with a samadhi-oriented practice. Breath and metta both qualify for that. As I start a daily sit, I might do a period of mindfulness of breathing, then check to see if awareness is available. If it is, great—I'll just stay with that. If it's not, then I might do some metta practice, because metta is also a foundation of concentration. Then I'll check again if awareness is available. If it is, I'll rest in that. If it's not, I'll stay with one of the foundation practices.

So really go home and see what your experience is. You don't have to be delicate about the awareness practice and say, "Oh, I better not try it now. I'm not samadhi-ed up enough." Try it whenever you have the inclination. But if it doesn't connect, don't take it personally. It could just be that the samadhi isn't there as the foundation.

I've come to appreciate a lot that if awareness isn't available, using the practices that lead to samadhi in daily life is valuable, because I find that's the element that's usually missing. In my daily life, I don't have the foundation of samadhi—settled in the present moment, the steadiness that Sally's talked about—that I do in retreat. So in daily life, I find a samatha practice like breath or metta very helpful. I do a lot of it. And then if I feel the settledness, I'll turn to awareness. If it connects, it's wonderful just to rest.

So I would integrate it remembering the practices you've done on this retreat and using them as you've played with them here, whatever has been helpful for you. And again, trust what you get when you turn to awareness.

It doesn't help to doubt what arises. If you have a sense of a shift as you turn to awareness, trust that. Stay with that. It may not be the perfect union of emptiness, awareness, and responsiveness. That's perfectly okay. Something happened. Some shift took place. Stay with that. Rest.

Especially if you have a sense of resting and being in touch with what's happening—the awareness is functioning to reveal objects, you have present moment awareness, and there's a sense of resting—that's a great beginning. Trust that and follow it.

When you go back into retreat practice, of course you might want to dive back into awareness straightaway. But again, I'd recommend taking a little time in your next retreat, even if it's just a week, to build in a little foundation of samadhi. Spend a few days with the breath, or spend a few days with metta, whichever one steadies you better. After that foundation is there, shift into this other gear and go back into the recognition of awareness.

I want to close with a quotation from the Tibetans. One we've heard before, but it's worth hearing again:

"Don't dwell on the past. Don't invite the future. Don't alter the innate wakefulness. Don't fear phenomena. Apart from that, there's not a damn thing." —Paltrul Rinpoche

Questions and Clarifications

A participant raised an interesting question about reconciling different approaches to practice. She had heard the earlier talk about Ajahn Maha Bua's extraordinary effort—sitting all night, every night, for months on end—and wondered how this aligned with the Buddha's memory under the rose apple tree, where he dropped into a very pleasant state of ease. Could this more relaxed approach also be a path to awakening?

The Buddha's recollection of that memory came after six years of the most intense practice anyone has ever described, including extreme ascetic practices. When his mind was finally turned to relaxation, that was the right balance. Then it could open beautifully to the unconditioned.

Our minds are not as prepared as Siddhartha Gautama's was. For us, effort is needed for most people. But it depends on your motivation and what you're aiming for in your meditation practice.

If you're aiming for full enlightenment, as Ajahn Maha Bua was, going full out is probably most likely to succeed. I think of teachers from the Tibetan tradition—Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche said he had spent more than half of his life in solitary retreat. Yet when I met him, he was very light and open and cheerful, not pressing anybody. But clearly he had been doing that intensive work for years and years.

If you want the highest result, you have to work really hard. But that's not the case for all of us. Many would be happy with a level of harmony, peace, good conduct, harmonious mind states, and good relationships in daily life. That's a noble goal in itself.

This path of achieving harmony through a more relaxed way, still combined with retreat practice and even long retreats, is more realistic for most people these days.

The number of people who are going to go the route of Ajahn Mahabua, even in Thai monasteries, is very small. He's an exception. That's partly why he's a great teacher.

For us as lay people in the West, my view is if you do one retreat a year and keep up your daily practice on a regular basis, you will be well on your way to having a harmonious life with good relationships and wholesome states of mind. That's kind of our recommendation.

But I know I'm also talking to a group where many of you have done long practice and found huge benefit from that. So where there's the inclination to longer retreats, go for it. They make a lot of difference.

Judy's Question: Self-Retreat Practice at Home

I've also done a lot of self-retreat in my home, and I found it a wonderful way to practice when I have the time. Two things about self-retreat that I've tended to adopt and shared with others who found them helpful:

First, make a schedule for yourself. Around a familiar environment, it's much easier to space out and get distracted by email or mail or cooking or anything else that's there in the home environment. So I would recommend making a schedule for yourself that's doable.

When I do a group retreat at Spirit Rock or IMS, all I do basically is sit, walk, sit, walk, sit, walk all day because that's what the group schedule says. I'm carried along by the energy of the rest of the yogis, and that's doable. If I tried to do that at home, I think I would frustrate myself because it's difficult to maintain such a totally intensive schedule on one's own.

So I make a schedule for myself that I feel is doable. For me that involves about six sittings a day, some walking, some yoga. And I tend to study on those retreats—that's when I do my dharma reading, the more challenging dharma reading where the mind has to be slowed down to get into it.

You have to figure out the schedule on your own. See what works for you. See what's doable. But those are the elements I'd recommend: make your schedule, include some walking periods, some yoga or movement, some time for study, and listen to dharma talks in the evening.

Roger's Question: Other Traditions Teaching Natural Awareness

Regarding attending retreats by teachers in other traditions whose teachings are along the lines of this natural awareness—I would recommend it.

The two that I've practiced with are Sotni Rinpoche, whom I've mentioned, and Mingyur Rinpoche. The difficulty is that with those teachers, they teach a lot of different styles of retreats. Mingyur Rinpoche has become so famous in the West that it's very hard to get any personal time with him. His retreats have a lot of people, and only a few retreats in a year will he teach that are open to people like us, where he'll give the depth of instructions in this technique.

So you want to look to see that if you're going to go to a retreat with Mingyur Rinpoche, it includes what's called "pointing out instructions." That means he's going to teach on the nature of mind. The same is true of Sotni Rinpoche, who I've sat with much more. I found him a very reliable teacher, but he teaches many retreats that are not nature of mind retreats. Again, you have to look at the course description and see if it says "nature of mind."

If you have an opportunity to sit with one of those teachers and they're teaching nature of mind and offering pointing out instructions, I think you could find it really helpful.

Michael's Question: Staying Connected During Cognitive Tasks

The question is how to stay connected with this practice while doing more cognitively demanding tasks.

And this is a challenge because if thinking is involved in what you're doing, it's hard to be mindful and think at the same time. The mindfulness of thoughts usually interrupts the flow of thoughts. So for instance, when I'm writing something like a talk or when I was writing the book, I didn't feel it was practical for me to be mindful and write at the same time.

So with that kind of cognitive activity, and this is probably true for a lot of desk jobs, I would just try to come back into my body periodically, regularly, and check that I still felt balanced. I think keeping an eye on when you're involved in work like that is sufficient—is the mind going out of balance? Am I getting involved with grasping, proliferation, unwholesome emotions coming up?

Now, listening to a podcast is in a different territory. It's like listening to a Dharma talk. And I find that in listening to a Dharma talk, I have fifty percent of my attention in the words of the talk and fifty percent on, say, my body. And there's enough processing power to hold them both. So I find that very doable, and this practice would be great for listening to a Dharma talk. Keep fifty percent in the awareness and fifty percent on the content. Not that much gets said in a Dharma talk, really. So I think you could do that.

But other things like writing, where you're really having to think, or an architect planning a building, I think it's much more difficult. And then the important thing is keeping an eye on whether your mind is staying in balance.

The question is how to do the two hours a day. Any way that works for you. For me, it's generally been one hour in the morning and one hour at night. But if you wanted to sit three forty-minute periods, that would also work great. So it's sort of what your time allows and just see how it adds up. And when you sit them just depends on your individual schedule and what works for you.

Actually, for a long time, before I hurt my back, I was sitting two hours before breakfast every day. I'd do an hour of sitting, half an hour of yoga, and another hour of sitting. Other times I'd sit for an hour in the morning and an hour when I finished work in the evening. It just depends. Whatever adds up.

Teachers in our Sangha who would be capable of instructing and guiding in this practice: Sally Armstrong, I think, is pretty good. Joseph Goldstein can. Philip Moffat has spent a lot time in this territory. Adrian Ross has taught these retreats quite a bit.

You know, as Michael was saying, it depends on the flavor, like Andrea Feller and the Utajaneya style. So Sally's bringing up what Michael referred to, the Sayadaw U Tejaniya style. I don't regard it as equivalent to this. All apology to Sayadaw U Tejaniya, whom I respect a lot. It's a different practice. So if the practice you want is knowing awareness or mindfulness of consciousness, Sayadaw U Tejaniya's approach is different from that. So the teachers who teach roughly along the lines of mindfulness of consciousness, I think I've named the ones that come to my mind.

Oh, Suzy Harrington. Yeah, Brian Lesage. Yeah, Suzy Harrington and Brian Lesage are leading the current APP program along with Don Scott. You could get more information from Don about APP.

It's interesting. Robert Reyes' book wasn't on your list of...

So the comment was that Rob Burbea's book wasn't on my list of suggested readings on awareness. There are two reasons for this. One, I haven't read it yet. The second is that my understanding is he focuses more on emptiness than on awareness, so I don't know if he has the kind of awareness approach that we've been exploring this week.

Oh, and the suggested reading list is posted underneath the bulletin board—it's a little half-page list of books. If you haven't picked one up, there's a copy for everyone.

Well, this is about where we were planning to wrap up. So why don't we just have a couple of minutes of sitting together?

Actually, Sally had the brilliant idea to take a group photo. Are you all up for that? She's brought her camera, and we thought we would gather up here because there's a little more light.

I think we're going to need to arrange ourselves in a few tiers to get everyone in the frame—some people standing, some kneeling. For those who have their zabutons here, you can just bring them over and face this way.

So you are now released on your own recognizance. We'll come back here at 7:30 for our course closing together. And remember, silence returns at 5:30, please.

Mindfulness of Breathing

In this foundational dharma talk, Guy Armstrong explores ānāpānasati (mindfulness of breathing), drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10) and Ānāpānasati Sutta (MN 118). He begins by defining mindfulness simply as "knowing our present moment experience," emphasizing how this direct knowing leads to purification and the realization of nibbāna. Armstrong explains why mindfulness of the body forms the first foundation of satipaṭṭhāna, providing stability and grounding for the restless mind.

The talk details the unique qualities that make breath practice so valuable: its autonomous nature allowing deep relaxation, its constant availability, its neutral yet potentially pleasurable character, and its natural rhythm that soothes the nervous system. Armstrong shows how ānāpānasati fulfills all four foundations of mindfulness, from bodily awareness through vedanā (feeling tone), citta (mind states), to dhammā (mental factors) including contemplation of anicca (impermanence).

Addressing common challenges, Armstrong discusses how to work with controlling tendencies, the arising of craving in meditation, and the trap of striving to recreate pleasant states. He offers practical guidance for practitioners who may find breath focus unsuitable due to trauma or breathing difficulties. The talk emphasizes that this ancient practice, used by the Buddha himself during three-month retreats, offers a reliable refuge in turbulent times while developing the stability and compassion needed to serve others.

So it's nice to see you all are still here. First days of retreat are often tough, and especially so when many of you have traveled from across the country. I can tell you from experience, the jet lag lasts a few days, in my case anyway. So it's not surprising if some of you are feeling tired today and took it a little easier on yourself. And of course, those of you who have been practicing, you'll just ramp up and show everybody what the real thing is, right? We're all easing into the retreat now.

Just one announcement before I start. If you haven't seen it yet, we will begin the one-to-one meetings tomorrow. I put a list on the board for the people whom I'll be meeting with tomorrow, so please check that out this evening if you haven't already. We've divided the group into three, so there will be ten people who we'll be meeting with on each of the interview days. It'll become clearer as we go along, but everyone should be seen in the next three days of meetings.

Tonight I'd like to talk about mindfulness of breathing. This is such an interesting topic because it is the one practice—the only practice I know of—that is offered in all the three main meditative schools in the Buddhist tradition. Obviously it's offered in Theravada, it's offered in Zen, both Rinzai and Soto, and it's offered in all the schools of Tibetan Buddhism. I don't know of any other meditation practice that is common to all the major schools. So there's something quite special about mindfulness of breathing.

Within our tradition especially, it is the premier meditation practice over the last 2,500 years. With all the senior Vipassana teachers that I've practiced with and learned from, all of them emphasized mindfulness of breathing. They not only taught it, they made it somewhat central in the way that they taught meditation. So we are in the stream of a very strongly established lineage—many lineages—in practicing mindfulness of breathing.

One of the reasons is because it is such a refuge. When it is undertaken, cultivated, and developed, it is such a refuge. It's really a blessing.

I was just reflecting today that all of us have recently come from the wider world into this very special retreat environment. Coming from the wider world, you all know that a refuge is needed because the winds of samsara are blowing as strongly and with as much difficulty now as ever in my lifetime. I won't go into the details because some of you don't know them, but the level of violence in the country, racially tinged, has continued. The climate crisis that we're facing is not being solved on the level that it needs to be solved at. COVID cases are rising across the country. The war in Ukraine, which I think all of you probably by now know about, is not winding down. And the political world is ineffective and getting more so.

If we look on the societal level, from my perspective, there's not a lot of good news. But if I look on the individual level, I see a lot of good news. I see a lot of growth in the Dharma, both individually in people that I'm in contact with, and in society as a whole. I see it making inroads and becoming more popular. So on an individual basis, there's a lot of hope for us. I feel a lot of optimism about all of you and us finding refuge through these practices.

If we can find refuge and clarity and some stability in a time like this, then I think we're doing well. We're obviously not in the most difficult situation in the world—there are wars in Ukraine and beyond. But given the general lack of stability and the rising level of violence and racism in the country, if we can find some mental stability within that and offer that stability to others in our circles, I think that's a real contribution. So that's something that I think is possible, and it's one of the reasons why I so much appreciate a place like this. Because we can find some peace of heart, peace of mind, and take that back into the world.

Just remember that we're not practicing only for ourselves, but to the extent that we can open and clear our own hearts and minds, that is a very big and perhaps rare gift to be able to take back and offer to the world. So our practice isn't just about getting quiet here, but it's about tapping deep reservoirs of understanding and compassion and then offering those back into the world. It's a refuge that we find and we ourselves can become a refuge to others.

Although as we enter more and more into the silent retreat space, we will probably talk less and less about the specific events of the world, please know that Sally and I are carrying those and care a lot about them. We're not forgetting the role of meditation within the broader social setting that we find ourselves in. The ripples from each of us will go out, have gone out before, will continue to go out, and we never know how far they'll reach. So I hope you'll remember that too—that your practice is to benefit others, and in the broadest sense, to benefit the whole world. May it be so.

In this section of the retreat especially, we are really dropping into a very powerful tradition that's 2,500 years old when we take up mindfulness of breathing. The development of this practice goes back not only to the Buddha's teachings, but to the Buddha's own practice, as I'll mention later. There are two main places that he talked about this in the Discourses.

One is in the cornerstone of the Vipassana world, which is the Discourse on the Four Foundations of Mindfulness, the Satipatthana Sutta, Majjhima Nikaya No. 10. Mindfulness of the body is the first foundation, and mindfulness of breathing is the first part of the first foundation. That's how fundamental it was in the Buddha's teachings.

The second place that you probably know about is Majjhima Nikaya 118, which is the Anapanasati Sutta, the Discourse on the Mindfulness of Breathing, where the Buddha gives detailed instructions on how to practice with the breath for many, many benefits.

The Buddha wasn't keen on giving a huge number of explicit meditation instructions. Despite 45 years of teaching, despite basically 20 volumes of his translated words in English, specific meditation instructions don't occur all that often. And so for mindfulness of breathing to be so central in these two suttas is quite a strong statement. In tonight's talk, I'd like to go into why that is. To get into it, I want to discuss mindfulness in general, then mindfulness of the body, and then some details on mindfulness of breathing and some suggestions.

So the first thing I want to highlight is the question: what do we mean by mindfulness? It's everywhere now in society. Mindfulness-based stress reduction has gone all over the country and in other countries as well, gone into hospitals and therapeutic settings and many treatment facilities. When I was beginning my practice here many years ago, I would never have imagined that there would be a magazine called Mindful. And yet there it is on newsstands. Mindfulness on newsstands. Wow.

And yet, if somebody asked you to define mindfulness, could you come up with something? Let's say your mother or father or one of your kids tapped you on the shoulder and said, "I hear you're doing this stuff called mindfulness. What is it?" I've heard a lot of different definitions of mindfulness, and most of them seem to me a little too complicated.

So I want to read a section from the Satipatthana Sutta, which is the Buddha's main discourse on mindfulness practice. It's in your study guide. If you are interested in following along, it's on page 3, "Excerpts from the Discourse on the Foundations of Mindfulness." I want to read just a few lines from each foundation.

This is from the first foundation on the body: "Breathing in long, one knows I breathe in long. Breathing out long, one knows I breathe out long. When walking, one knows, I am walking. When standing, one knows, I am standing."

Second foundation, which is on vedana, feeling: "When feeling a pleasant feeling, one knows, I feel a pleasant feeling. When feeling an unpleasant feeling, one knows, I feel an unpleasant feeling."

Third foundation, which is on mind or mind states: "Here one knows a lustful mind to be lustful and a mind without lust to be without lust. One knows an angry mind to be angry and a mind without anger to be without anger."

Fourth foundation, which is Dhammas, or I like to translate it as dharmic principles: "If sensual desire is present in one, one knows there is sensual desire in me. If sensual desire is not present in one, one knows there is no sensual desire in me."

These are excerpts from all four foundations in the Satipatthana Sutta. Is there one word that stands out to you in this reading? Yes, "knows." One knows. That's the key, isn't it? To me, this is the operative definition of mindfulness: one knows.

When Bhikkhu Bodhi translated this passage, he used "one understands"—this is Venerable Analayo's translation here. Either way, one knows or one understands, it's a similar pointing. The Pali term that's being translated is pajanati. Pajanati is very closely related to the word sampajanya, which means clear comprehension. So you get that comprehension, knowing, understanding. Mindfulness is connected with knowing and understanding.

Put very simply, and I'd like to offer this as our working definition really throughout this whole retreat—because we'll come back to this a number of times—mindfulness is knowing our present moment experience. The parenthesis is that's in the Buddha's language, which is the six sense bases, the five aggregates. Knowing one's present experience in the Buddha's frame of reference, in the Buddha's foundations.

And I've heard countless lengthy definitions of mindfulness that use terms like non-judgmental and fully accepting and without greed, aversion, or delusion. I think that's gilding a lily. What we really need is this simple understanding: knowing our present moment experience. That's really simple, isn't it? And that's enough. The amazing thing is that it's so simple and it's enough.

For in the same discourse, Majjhima 10, if you want to look again at your study guide, quote number one: "This is the direct path for the purification of beings, for the surmounting of sorrow and lamentation, for the disappearance of pain and grief, for the attainment of the true way, for the realization of nibbana—namely the four foundations of mindfulness." Knowing our experience in the present moment does all of that.

How does it do that? Well, one of the ways we can understand how it does that is to look at the alternatives. What's the alternative to knowing our present experience?

There's a cartoon from The New Yorker that I like. It's in three panels. The first panel shows someone working at their desk on a PC, typing away, reading the screen. And there's a thought bubble above their head that indicates their daydream. The daydream is they're out on a golf course about to drive a ball. The subtext is, "That's really where I'd rather be."

Then the next panel shows the same person out on the golf course about to drive a ball, and there's another thought bubble in their head. That thought bubble is they're at home making love to their partner in bed. Of course the subtext is, "Wow, that's really where I'd rather be."

And then there's a third panel. In this panel, the same person is at home, in bed, making love with their partner. And there's another thought bubble, which is of being in their office, working on their computer at their desk.

These are the alternatives to mindfulness. This cartoon quite succinctly sums up the force of the distracted mind—always somewhere else than where we are. It's not necessarily that where we are is somewhere that's not good to be, but there's this distracting movement of attention that thinks there's more somewhere else. This is the core of restlessness. Restlessness is really thinking there's something better somewhere else and leaning toward that.

So when we're not connected to the present moment, take a look at where the mind goes. The attention goes into these distracting thoughts of past and future and planning and remembering and analyzing and rehearsing conversations and so forth. What I think is sometimes not fully grokked by us in looking at this situation is the impact of those distracting thoughts. Because often in meditation we'll talk about returning from a distraction, bringing the attention back into the present moment. It's just a distraction. It sounds fairly neutral.

But take a close look in your meditation. When one of these distracting thoughts arises, is it emotionally neutral? It's not generally, is it? It wanders off into wanting or regret or blame or resentment or fear or insecurity. It wanders into places that have emotional charge. That's where our thinking is drawn. That's where our thoughts go.

When we come back from a distraction like that, are we generally calmer than when we took off? No. Generally these distracting thoughts stir us up. So it's not just a matter that we're missing the present moment experience. We're giving up a present moment experience, which is generally okay, to get involved in some kind of extended fantasy about past or future that's generally emotionally tiring and stirring.

One of the beauties of mindfulness is that it saves us from those kinds of disruptive and disturbing thoughts and emotions. The Buddha's term for getting lost in these unwholesome thought patterns is ayoniso manasikara—unwise attention. Unwise attention is that which leads into stirring up the unwholesome states of mind. Yoniso manasikara—wise attention—is that which wears down the disturbing states and leads to states that grow in the Dharma, that lead to our happiness and our wisdom. Attention to the present moment is one of those things that leads to our happiness and wisdom.

So mindfulness is making a clear choice moment after moment to be in the present for our own welfare and ultimately the welfare of others. And pursuing the distracting thought trains is a choice to stir the mind up and bring forth unwholesome emotions: shame, blame, regret, worry, anxiety, longing, fear, and so on.

So we are really, as meditators, learning how to choose the wholesome moment after moment after moment with this devotion to mindfulness and this renunciation of all the thought excursions.

Of course, we can't control this by an act of will. We may have tried for a long time. These thoughts will continue to arise, and sometimes we'll jump on the train. But we can tune into how it feels afterwards. When we've been on the train for a while and we come back to the present moment, how has it felt to be on the train? How does it feel to be back here? This is how we learn, moment by moment, what leads to our suffering and what leads to our happiness and contentment.

Within the overall field of mindfulness, the Buddha emphasized mindfulness of the body a great deal. It's the first foundation in the Satipatthana Sutta. In the Anguttara Nikaya, there's one point where there are fifty discourses in a row in praise of mindfulness of the body—fifty in a row! Here's just one:

"When one thing is developed and cultivated, the body becomes tranquil, the mind becomes tranquil, extraneous thoughts subside, and all wholesome qualities that pertain to true knowledge reach fulfillment. What is that one thing? Mindfulness directed to the body. Unwholesome qualities decline and the qualities that lead to true knowledge arise."

I find it really interesting that the Buddha puts so much emphasis on mindfulness of the body because, when you get down to it, our meditation is all about the mind. We're not freeing the body—it's going to do what it's going to do. Our goal is to free the mind. That's why so much emphasis is placed on states of mind: the hindrances, greed, aversion, delusion, craving, clinging, and then the wholesome mental states—the seven factors of awakening, the five spiritual faculties, the brahmaviharas. These are all qualities of mind. It's mental cultivation that we're about.

Why then is there so much emphasis on the body? Here are a few reasons.

Mindfulness of the body has been probably my central practice over all the years I've been involved in meditation, and here's why I've found it so helpful. It's always available. Like it or not, the body's always here, so it often gives a very clear experience that we can pay attention to, and it's very valuable in that way.

Also, the Buddha said if you're going to identify with something—if you're going to say "I am this"—it's much better to identify with the body than with the mind. Why? Because the mind changes so much more rapidly. In the course of a few breaths, you can go from here to around the world, on a vacation, having your baggage lost, meeting your soulmate in a remote airport, and come back to here in a few seconds. But the body stayed right here.

Because of that relative stability—and it's only relative; the body's changing, cells are being born and dying, subject to illness, aging, and death—but relatively, compared to the mind, it's more stable. You feel this in meditation as you sit still, as we sit still in our meditation posture. That stability and stillness in the body transmits something to the mind. It transmits a sense of groundedness.

In a way, what we're doing is taking our seat, and the emotional waves come and go. Sometimes they crash like big breakers against a rocky cliff. Sometimes they're smooth, very pleasant. But we sit through all that wave activity because the body is still. And that says something. It says to the mind, "I can be with this." So the body ends up being, despite its vulnerability and being subject to pain, a grounding place and a source of stability and balance.

Ajahn Buddhadasa, who I spent quite a bit of time with in Thailand, had a nice saying: "Don't do anything that takes you out of the body. Stay in touch with the body all the time."

Now, I want to acknowledge, because it's a reality, that the body may not be inviting at times. If you've had past trauma that's stored in the body, if you have a lot of physical pain, if you have an injury, if you have an illness, it's not so pleasant to bring the attention into the body again and again. Then you'll need to figure out, you'll need to find your way of how to connect with the body at times and how to open to something more neutral—perhaps to sound, perhaps to images, perhaps to space—at other times.

Work with your teacher to find a way to navigate that kind of situation.

But if the body is relatively okay, it serves as excellent grounding. Being in touch with the body also keeps us connected to our emotions. If there's a strong emotion arising, we'll feel it in the body. When the mind is agitated, the body is usually agitated. When the mind is calm, the body is usually calm.

Sometimes we may not be so attuned to the subtlety of emotional movement, but if we check in with the body, we can recognize agitation or calm. Trust that awareness. As the books say, the body doesn't lie. The body keeps the score. It's real.

So when there's agitation in the body, take a look. What's going on in the mind? Sometimes you'll find it's old karma playing out in the body and not actually agitation arising from present-moment mind activity. But sometimes it is present moment. Even if it's old karma, there's often mental agitation accompanying the physical agitation.

So, mindfulness in general, mindfulness of the body, and finally mindfulness of breathing—the primary practice in 2,500 years of Vipassana. "When mindfulness of breathing is developed and cultivated, it is of great fruit and great benefit." This is quote two from the Anapanasati Sutta in your study guide.

Even after the Buddha was enlightened, he kept going on retreat. I find this so interesting. All his afflictive emotions had been uprooted. He wasn't suffering. And yet he still went into retreat, sometimes for three months at a stretch. On one of these three-month retreats, he practiced mindfulness of breathing the whole time. He came out and told the monastics, "If anyone could say of anything that it is a noble dwelling, a divine dwelling, the Tathagata's dwelling, it is of concentration by mindfulness of breathing that one would rightly say this."

That's high praise. If it was good enough for the Buddha for three months, it's good enough for us for ten days.

So why is breath such a useful focus? I want to list several special qualities of this focus.

One reason is that breathing happens by itself. It's part of the semi-autonomous nervous system, so we don't have to do anything to make it happen. That means we can relax. And in the long run, we learn to have that relaxing turn into resting. We can rest in a very receptive frame of mind, let the breath come and go, and provide a clear focus for wise attention.

Breath is always there. You can always find it on a meditation cushion, when walking, when doing the dishes, when eating food at home, preparing a meal—it's always there. So it's a reliable companion.

Another great strength is that it's basically neutral. It's not going to be hugely provoking of desire or aversion. Basically neutral. So it's kind of easy to be with something that's neutral.

But it has the potential for a lot of pleasure. This takes some practice, but the potential is there. The first thing we notice with the breath is when we're in good relationship with it, there's an absence of disturbing thoughts. So there's a quality of peace that accompanies being with the breath.

As we get familiar with the relaxation that Sally was talking about this morning, and the sense of ease and comfort that can come with the breath, that creates a very pleasant feeling. So that's the opening to the pleasure of the breath—that sense of relaxation and ease.

Once we find that in our meditation, that becomes real motivation. We stop resisting the meditation. We know it's good for us, but we don't really want to do it. But when this pleasure element comes in, we kind of want to do it. And that will bring us back more and more to undertaking the practice.

This pleasure is not just a nice feeling—it's onward leading. The pleasure, the Pali term is sukha, which sounds like sugar and has the sweetness of sugar. It's said that this kind of pleasure, which includes relaxation and ease and contentment, is the proximate cause for concentration to arise. And I'm sure you all know how that works.

When you start feeling easy in the moment and can deeply relax into your body and into the present, you don't want to be anywhere else. This habitual restlessness of looking elsewhere for satisfaction or gratification, or to ward off the difficult, can rest, can relax. Just dropping into that ease brings contentment. And it's that contentment that allows the mind to collect and unify the way Sally was describing it this morning in the meditation instructions.

The other thing that is beautiful about the breath is its natural rhythm. When we're learning to let go of past and future and come into the present, letting the breath be natural, letting it come and go on its own, it finds a very easy rhythm. We're not controlling it. In that natural rhythm, we find there's a calm that comes from it. The rhythm itself is calming, is soothing.

I'm speculating a little bit, but I wonder if some of that soothing quality of the breath's rhythm takes us back to being on our mother's chest when we were babies and feeling that rise and fall, rise and fall in that position of absolute safety and nourishment. That's what it makes me think of anyway, back at my mother's breast.

So we want to open up and allow the breath to find its natural rhythm, but that's not so easy. As Sally mentioned this morning, it's always not so easy to relax in meditation or outside. When I first got into mindfulness of breathing, I would notice that I would be controlling the breath more or less all the time. There would be this little signal—it wasn't so much verbal, but it was: now breathe in, now breathe out, now breathe in, now breathe out. I would sort of be telling myself when to breathe in and breathe out, following some rhythm that was an idea in my head.

So it took a while to trust and relax enough to let go of that. In the beginning, as you're with the breath, if you find a little bit of control coming in, don't worry about it. It's something that will fade as the relaxation deepens. You don't have to fight it. Just saying "stop controlling" is just another form of controlling. It'll come with the relaxation.

The other wonderful thing about paying attention to the breath is that it has its own balance. The in-breath feels one way and the out-breath feels another way. So tune into this. This becomes interesting to investigate. How does it feel when you breathe in? How does it feel when you breathe out?

Take a look at this word: ānāpāna—in and out breathing. Pāna is the Pali term. You know what the Sanskrit is? Prāṇa. It's not just a clothing line. Prāṇa is an ancient yogic term that denotes the in-breath, but it has connotations of the life force and energy. What keeps us going is prāṇa or pāna.

You'll feel that as you get quiet. You can feel how each in-breath picks up the energy. You can feel it ripple throughout the body. It energizes. It wakes us up. It lifts us up. And then the out-breath lets it all go. On the out-breath, we empty. Going out into space, the mind settles. Let go. Relax. So the uplift and the out-go are both there in one breath—a beautiful balance of energy.

Another thing that's powerful about mindfulness of breathing is that once we make a commitment to this kind of focus, it very clearly shows us what's not with this focus. As you get connected to the breath and its rhythm, when you go away from it for any period of time and you come back, it's really obvious. It's really clear: I wasn't with the breath. It may be just two seconds or three seconds, but it's very obvious. We were somewhere else for those three seconds.

It's interesting because in doing an open practice like choiceless attention, which we'll touch on later in the retreat, a lot of people love choiceless attention because it's not hard work. Being with the breath is hard work. When we're with choiceless attention, thoughts will often drift through and we won't even notice them. There will often be a subconscious line of thinking that is actually stealing our present moment attention, and we hardly notice because we're just open.

So when we commit to a focus, then what's not of that focus stands out really clearly. We see the mind's movements and we see the mind's habitual tendencies very clearly.

There's something funny I want to share here. Committing to a focus takes some courage, takes some discipline, takes some energy, takes some ardor. Ajahn Suchito made an interesting and rather ironic comment about it. He said anytime you commit to a focus, craving is going to come in. I find this really true, because we're going to find things we like and we're going to find things that are difficult in that focus. I'll touch on that again a little later.

Another beautiful aspect of the breath is that it's the wind element. It's an elemental kind of practice. The Buddha talked about four elements: earth, water, fire, and wind. Here we're with the wind element, possibly all day long. We start to realize the body is made up of the natural elements—of solidity, of fluidity or cohesion, of warmth or coolness, and of movement or wind. We begin to understand the connection between the body and the whole material world. This body has the same elements as the entire material world, and this is our moment-by-moment experience of the wind element.

It becomes interesting to investigate self and not-self with the wind element. When air comes in, it comes from outside, so it's not me. Then it comes into the nose. Is it me yet? It goes into the lungs, and then the oxygen attaches to the blood particles. Now is it me? Okay, now it's in the blood, now it's me. Then it goes to the body, and the oxygen gets used, and then it comes to the lungs again, and then the wind gets filled with carbon dioxide. Is that me? And then it gets breathed out, and then is it not me?

We start to realize we're porous to the world. There's no firm barrier, even between the body and the world, much less between me and not me.

The other beautiful thing about mindfulness of the breath is that the Buddha said it fulfills all four foundations of mindfulness. This is quite remarkable, and I would encourage you to look at your study guide again if you have it, at quotation two on page two.

You know the second foundation is feeling tone. In the bracketed section that's indented in the middle, you'll see a line that says, "I shall breathe in or out experiencing pleasure." So here we have pleasant feeling tone, pleasant vedana, coming as a result of the breath. We're into the second foundation of mindfulness through the breath.

A little further on, you'll see the next stanza: "I shall breathe in or out gladdening the mind." Gladness of mind is in the third foundation. It's a state of mind. It's part of citta. Here, mindfulness of breathing is satisfying the third foundation of mindfulness. What is the mind state when breathing in? What is the mind state when breathing out?

Then in the final stanza: "I shall breathe in or out contemplating impermanence." Impermanence is part of the fourth foundation. It's ground for insight, wisdom. So here mindfulness of breathing is fulfilling the fourth foundation.

All four foundations are complete—can be complete—within mindfulness of breathing. That's a powerful statement.

These are some of the qualities that are so rich about mindfulness of the breath and why it's worth spending ten days or three months practicing, learning, and developing this. There are many ways to approach relating to the breath. Sally gave beginning instructions this morning. We will offer many other alternative approaches over the days to come: where to be with the breath in the body, whether to use noting or counting, whether to combine the breath with different parts of the body. There are many, many ways to approach it.

And all of them are fine in this context. In the context of these ten days of retreat, they're all fine. So we're not going to tell you that you have to practice being with the breath in this particular way, but we hope to offer some alternatives so that you find the way that works best for you.

I wanted to share one rather fun experience I had with mindfulness of breathing a couple of months ago. We were at a friend's house for dinner, and this friend was playing with one of those headbands that acts like an EEG. It monitors your brain waves and transmits the results to your phone. If you get into a certain groove, it can tell whether you're in a calm state, a neutral state, or an activated state. For meditation purposes, this is used to train yourself to be in a calm state.

I had never heard of anything like this—I didn't know there was such a thing. You can buy it on Amazon and pair it with an iPhone or Android phone. So my friend put it on me, turned on his phone, and the other three people sat around watching me meditate for five minutes to see whether I was going to be calm or active or what.

The cool thing about the app—what I thought was cool about it—is that if you get into a calm state, it plays bird songs. The bird songs are such positive reinforcement; you really want to make them happen. So I tried a few different kinds of meditation, and none of them were really producing many bird songs. Then I went to the nose and put all my attention on the sensations in my nostrils with in and out breathing, and the birds just went crazy.

I could sustain it for a while, and the app gave me a score of eighty percent at the end, which was rather gratifying. I could see how something like that could train someone through repetition to really get into a strong relationship—to get into a real groove—with mindfulness of breathing. At one point near the end, a distracting thought came up, and the birds went away. Oh, so disappointing! But I knew what I had to do to get them back.

These kinds of tools are out there, and they can be fun. I wasn't so interested in using it to train my mind because I've practiced this kind of breathing meditation extensively. But it was wonderful to remember what it feels like to really be on, to be in the breath and really give all one's attention to it in the present moment. It did accomplish that.

So those are the beautiful things about the breath. I also want to acknowledge that there are some real difficulties with the breath—some of which apply to all of us, some of which apply to specific situations. I want to mention these briefly and encourage you to talk with us, with Sally and me, if you run into them.

The breath may not be a good focus for everyone. What makes it not a good focus for some people is if there's a history of trauma, injury, or illness in the chest or around breathing. Then the repeated attention to that part of the body or to the breath can re-activate that trauma or past injury. For example, if someone has had asthma in the past and has felt themselves struggling to breathe, then being with the breath in that close way may remind them of the struggle to breathe. It may be counterproductive.

It may be something the person can work through, or it may be that another option would be better for them. This is why it's helpful to talk with your teacher about it. Whether it comes from an illness like asthma or from a past injury or trauma connected with the area of breathing, another focus might be more skillful. Talk with your teacher and see.

As Ajahn Sucitta said, if we commit to a certain practice, we're going to run into cravings. There's a particular name for the craving that comes from meditating: it's called striving. Striving means that you felt something nice in your meditation and you want it back.

Because all the nice things that happen in meditation do pass, right? You know that. No state of mind is lasting. The beautiful states of meditation also pass, but we want them back.

It's very common in doing some days of concentration practice with the breath that you will find yourself in very satisfying states of peace, calm, contentment, settledness, and ease—where the mindfulness is effortless for periods of time. It might be thirty seconds, it might be thirty minutes, but you may find yourself in these situations. And then it will change, as everything does.

The next time you come to sit, you might want it back—quite understandably, you might want it back. Then you might try really hard to make it happen again: "Oh, I can't let these thoughts come in."

I've really got to bear down and not miss a single breath. I'm going to rev up this state of concentration again! Of course, this completely forgets how we got there in the first place – which was by relaxing. We forget that relaxing and accepting was the way into that beautiful state, and instead we strive really hard to reproduce it by working harder and getting tenser.

When I was practicing in Burma with Palak Sayadaw, I fell into this trap over and over. I would go to see him every day in the afternoon for an interview. He knew I was a meditation teacher in the States, so I felt I had a little bit of an image to keep up. But I also had to just be honest with him.

I said, "Sayadaw, I've really found I'm striving in my practice. Do you have any advice for me?"

I thought that after all his years of helping beginning meditators through all the hurdles of concentration practice – deeply committed students from around the world – he would have just the wisest thing to say. So he replied, "Don't do that."

And that was it.

I had to go back to my kuti and find out for myself how not to do that. I got better at not doing it, but it was a lot of learning.

Another way we can get caught is judging ourselves when we're doing a concentration practice. We can get caught thinking we're not doing it well enough. "Oh, I'm not good enough. I was with the breath for a few breaths and then I was away for ten minutes on this chain of thoughts about something that happened last week before I came here. It was ten minutes before I could come out of it and come back to the breath. That's terrible. I'll never get anywhere with this meditation."

Not helpful.

This is a very common thing to have happen for all of us. I've been there many times myself. The first thing that's really out of joint with it is we think we have some idea of how long we should be away. "Oh, if I was a good meditator, I wouldn't be away ten minutes."

Well, how long would you be away? What's the right length of time for a good meditator to be away? Is it like never? No. Is it like one breath? No. I mean, get real.

We have this standard that we think we have to meet, but we have no idea what the standard is or where it came from. It's just replaying our habitual tendency to find fault with ourselves. So beware of that. If it happens to you, ask yourself: what's the right length of time to be away? There's no answer to that.

You are all experienced practitioners. Every one of you has lots of meditative background and experience and confidence. You wouldn't be here if the practice hadn't been of tremendous benefit to you. You wouldn't come for a month. It's been of tremendous benefit, therefore it has already worked, therefore you're already a good meditator.

So take yourself as the standard. "I'm a good meditator and I'm away for ten minutes." Well, that's what happens for good meditators. That's just fine. That's just fine.

The growing freedom is when we realize that we've been away and we make the choice to come back. We say, "That wasn't so helpful. Oh, let me connect again to the present. Let me connect again to feeling the breath." That's where the freedom starts to come.

There's another whole set of problems connected with our relationship with thoughts, but I don't want to get into it – it's a little long for our remaining time. So I'm going to end here for tonight.

And I'll just close with this quotation from the Samyutta Nikaya: "Mindfulness of breathing is peaceful and sublime. It is an abiding in happiness that breaks up and calms unwholesome mental states whenever they arise."

Well, that's our potential.

So let's just sit for a minute together. Let the words settle.

CHAPTER 183

Mindfulness of Breathing Combined with a Body Scan

Guy Armstrong · 49 min

> In this dharma talk and guided meditation, Guy Armstrong introduces a practice that combines mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati) with directed breathing techniques and body scanning. Drawing from the Thai Forest tradition lineage of Ajahn Lee Dhammadharo through Ajahn Fuang to Ajahn Ṭhānissaro, Armstrong presents this approach as particularly suitable for developing samatha (concentration) practice.
> The session begins with establishing basic mindfulness of body, sounds, and breath, then introduces the technique of consciously directing the breath to different parts of the body - from head to feet - while maintaining awareness of how the breath's energy affects each area. Armstrong emphasizes this as a preparatory practice, comparing it to an "aperitif" before the main course of natural breath awareness.
> Referencing the Ānāpānasati Sutta and its instructions on long and short breathing, Armstrong discusses the balance between skillful intervention and natural letting go in meditation practice. He addresses practical questions about breath rhythm in daily life and how concentration can sometimes unearth streams of thought, offering Joseph Goldstein's teaching that "nothing is worth thinking about" during formal meditation practice.

So today in the meditation, we're going to do something radical. We're going to control the breath. This is along the lines of Sally's response to the question yesterday morning about three different ways of relating to the breath. Sally emphasized that especially in doing concentration practice, where the qualities of piti and sukha are definitely to be cultivated front and center, we are going to use the breath in a way that may make the experience of sitting more comfortable.

This is just something for you, again like all our instructions so far, for you to try on and see if you like it. If it doesn't work for you, there's no need to continue it. If it does work for you, it's something you could do in every sitting. I do it quite often in my daily practice and in my retreat practice, because I've found it helpful.

This is not just some new age yoga innovation that we're bringing in and dumping on you to mix traditions. This was taught, I think I mentioned the other day, to Ajahn Thanissaro by his Thai teacher, Ajahn Phuong, who learned it from his teacher, Ajahn

Lee Damodaro. We'll put out a book list at the end of the retreat, and I'll highlight both the books by Thanissaro Bhikkhu and by Ajahn Lee that explain this in more detail and why it's helpful, why it has been passed down.

With that, we can go ahead and move into the meditation. We're going to do the preliminary entry into the meditation the way that we've been doing it, with body, sounds, simple attention to breath, because I think this is just such a useful way to go into any sitting. Then I'll add the instructions for some degree of directing the breath.

Please sit comfortably. Find that balance in your posture of being upright, energetic, alert, and at the same time relaxed, grounded, supported. Become aware of your whole body posture and sitting, as it were taking it in with a glance from the top of the head right through the feet. So you have the sense of the body as a unit, an organic unit. Not so much watching the body as feeling the body throughout. The attention is throughout the body. Sensations are being known.

Then open the attention wider in a 360-degree way to take in all the sounds that are coming and going. Sounds from inside, sounds from outside. If there aren't any sounds at any time, just be aware of the extent of the silence. When a sound does arise, notice that it's heard without any effort on your part. It just arises and hearing takes place. If we just rest with a receptive attitude, all the sounds are heard spontaneously.

Then bring that same receptive attitude back into the experience of the body, taking in the fullness of the sitting posture felt from inside. As you feel the body, start to notice the sensations that are connected with breathing. With an in-breath, certain sensations take place and the body feels a certain way. With an out-breath, different sensations arise and the body feels differently.

Notice that the impact of a breath can be felt beyond the simple areas where you know the air is entering or leaving—nose, throat, lungs. The influence of the in-breath in a way spreads the energy throughout the body. Remember that pana in Pali links to prana in Sanskrit, which is an ancient term for the life force or energy. We can feel that energetic upswelling with the in-breath. On the out-breath, feel some energetic calming or release.

Now let's play a little bit with these energetic qualities. The first thing that I'll suggest you do—you can just try it on—is to take several long and deep in-breaths and relax fully on the out-breath. Try a few deliberately long inhalations, fill the lungs with air. Then consciously let it all go and relax on the out-breath. Breathing in long and feeling the energy rise. Breathing out long, feeling the release and relax.

In your own meditations, if this is interesting, you can keep this deep breathing going for a while. I sometimes have done as much as five minutes at the start of a sit to help with settling. Here we'll make it shorter so that we can play with the other instructions. Take one last big inhale and full exhale.

Now in this next part of the guiding, we're going to take the breath into different parts of the body, covering the whole body in connection with breathing. This is a little bit of a combination of a body scan with breath. Again, this comes from Ajahn Lee.

I'm going to use a term like "breathe into" an area of the body. Of course, we don't breathe in through any other area but the nose or mouth.

But the sense is, as you take an in-breath, direct your attention into the part of the body that I'm going to name. And as you have the out-breath happen, also feel that part of the body. So I might talk about breathing into the head and breathing out from the head. Just take a nice breath in and feel how it's impacting in the head. You almost have a sense that the breath is traveling from the nose or the lungs up into the head during that instruction. And breathing out, it travels down from the head and out through the nose or feeling the lungs.

So we're just playing with this to see how it works, how it's felt, how it changes our energy, our presence, our ease. What will help the body feel more comfortable and more at ease as we begin a period of meditation?

So on the next breath, have the sense that you're breathing into the head. On the in-breath, let your attention cover the whole head area. How is that felt? As the breath comes in, how is that felt in the head? As the breath exits, how is that felt in the head? Breathing in and out through the head.

And then the neck. Breathing into the neck. How does that feel? Breathing out from the neck, how does that feel?

Breathing into the right shoulder and out. It's as though we're rubbing this part of the body with the energy of the breath. The right upper arm. The right lower arm and hand breathing in and breathing out. The left shoulder. The left upper arm. The left lower arm and hand.

The upper half of the back. Breathing into this area and breathing out. Lower half of the back. The hips and touch point of the sitting bones with a chair or cushion. Bathing this area with the energy of the breath. The chest and heart center. The heart center is that area just below the breastbone in the center of the chest. The diaphragm. And the abdomen, breathing in to the belly, breathing out from the belly. In the lower abdomen, breathing in and out.

And now just a brief review, expanding the areas a bit. Breathing in with attention in the head. Breathing out with attention in the head. How is the head touched by the energy of the breath? Both shoulders and both arms. The whole back, breathing in, breathing out. The chest and belly. The hips and lower abdomen. Both legs and feet.

And now again, just taking up the whole body as your focus. Feel the whole body with the in-breath. Feel the whole body with the out-breath. Feeling the energy change. Uplift and release. Invigorate and relax.

And now allowing the breath to be natural and find its own rhythm. You can stay in touch with the whole body if you find that helpful.

Being the impact of breathing in and breathing out. Or if you're more comfortable being in a narrower focus with the breath, that's fine—nose, belly, chest, whatever is most suitable for you. Again, the experience is not so much of watching from above, but feeling from within, feeling the body in breathing.

At this point, feel free to add any of the other techniques we've talked about, such as noting, touch point, counting, or none of them. Just staying with a bare, direct experience of in and out breathing.

This kind of approach of directing the breath, of deliberately breathing in long, deliberately relaxing on the exhale is something that I think is especially suited to the development of samatha. Because when the body can relax more easily, the mind relaxes more easily. The instructions from Ajahn Lee are: do what makes the body feel good in this exercise of breathing.

Now you realize from the point of view of vipassana, this is a very slippery slope. We are not sitting on our cushion just to feel pleasant feelings all the time. That's not the point. We want to develop an equanimity of mind in regard to pleasant and unpleasant feelings. But especially in the preparation for a period of sitting meditation, it can be really helpful to start by being as comfortable as we can, because it really allows the mind to settle.

So I kind of regard this exercise as an aperitif. The main course is just paying attention to whatever arises. But of course, we're doing a period right now of specific concentration practice. So you may want to even expand the use of what I would call this preparatory or entry exercise into a period of sitting meditation, keeping an eye on what allows the body to feel comfortable. And if you can use the breath at times—and I would say in limited times—to support that, then that can be really helpful.

So play with it. In my own practice, I would tend to do something like this in the first five to ten minutes of a forty-five minute or hour-long period. So I would sort of keep it in that section. And then I would just settle into letting things be the way they are, letting the breath be natural.

The reason that part is important: first, to develop equanimity around pleasant and unpleasant. But second, you don't always want to have to be the meditator directing the experience. You want to get to a point where you let go of doing. We're going to see this even more when we get into the awareness practice. The letting go of any form of doing is really important for the self to step out of the way more and more completely.

So again, the reason preparatory is very helpful. Long-term, you want to diminish the doing. But we can learn, as senior practitioners, you can learn to balance these two halves of practice.

So I'll let it go there, and we have a few minutes for questions or comments, if there are any.

"I remember reading about slowing down the breath, like the length of breath, because in modern days we breathe very shallow and faster. And I practiced it. It was really interesting because when I slow down breath, I move slowly. So with my pace of my life, I cannot do that. I feel like I'm unbalanced constantly. So my conditioned way of breathing is breathing pretty shallow and fast. So what is your suggestion to slow down breath but move as fast as I can?"

The question is about the rapidity of the breath. She notices that when she slows down her breathing, it brings more calm. But in the midst of daily life, in the midst of moving faster in activity, it's hard to breathe more slowly.

I find the same. And so I often make a conscious effort in my daily life when I can to slow down the pace of my movement. I have to say that a lot of you did retreats at home during the COVID years—not that we're out of the COVID years, but we're back in person, which is great, a different phase. And one of the things that I really liked about practicing at home is I could go at my own pace a lot more of the time, because I wasn't engaged in so many outside activities.

So that became a lesson for me. It really is helpful to slow down the pace of my movement. It really supports the development of mental calm.

Now, can you slow down the pace of your breathing while maintaining rapid body movements? That's a good koan.

Well, I can't resist passing on a quotation from Joseph—one of my favorites—which is: nothing is worth thinking about.

Now I have to stress that's in the context of formal meditation practice. Obviously in our daily life, you need to make plane reservations or get somebody to water your plants. You have to think about that. But in the context of formal meditation practice, Joseph's bottom line is nothing is worth thinking about, even the most seemingly important things.

There's a quality about the concentrated mind where it can almost feel like it's unlocking chambers in our psyche. It's as if layers of the mind that were previously sealed become accessible, and all this material starts flowing. It can feel very compelling—like "This is the key to understanding my whole life!" But from a meditation perspective, this is actually just another form of mental activity that we can learn to let go of.

What I've found helpful is to recognize that these important-seeming thoughts aren't going anywhere. If they're truly significant, they'll still be available to you after your sit. The concentrated mind has this beautiful quality of clarity and spaciousness, and when you maintain that state rather than getting pulled into the content of thoughts, you actually develop a much more useful capacity—the ability to relate to your mental activity with some perspective.

So my suggestion would be to notice when you're getting caught in the stream, even when it feels very compelling, and gently redirect your attention back to your meditation object. You're not suppressing or pushing away—you're simply choosing where to place your attention. This actually strengthens your capacity to work skillfully with mental patterns both in meditation and in daily life.

The concentrated mind itself becomes a refuge. When you rest there, you're not missing anything important. You're actually developing the very stability and clarity that will allow you to see more clearly when you do need to engage with thinking outside of formal practice.

So I would encourage you, as far as possible, to let the thoughts go and come back to the simple experience of breathing. This will continue to deepen the concentration.

The fact is that as we get concentrated, we become more sensitive. When thoughts do arise, they can have more impact. This is something we'll also explore in tonight's talk. And there is a Dharma talk tonight, by the way. Since it's Sunday, we have our evening teaching. I'm going to speak more about working with thoughts in concentration practice. Thank you for providing such a perfect lead-in to tonight's topic.

Now for some quick announcements. There is indeed a talk this evening. Sally will be conducting the one-to-one interviews today, so those of you scheduled for today will meet with her in the Council House Library.

I don't know if we made this clear at the beginning, but each of us will meet with you once per week for these individual interviews. Today is Sally's day, and she'll meet with a third of you. I'll meet with those same people the next time their interviews come around. The way it works out, everyone will have four one-to-one meetings with each of us over the course of the month—four with me, four with Sally.

We have three Dharma talks per week. This may seem a little light if you're accustomed to normal group retreats, but you all clearly love the silence and know how to work with it skillfully.

Mindfulness of Breathing: 3 Sensations in Inbreath & Outbreath

Guy Armstrong · 56 min

> In this guided meditation and dharma talk, Guy Armstrong addresses one of the most common challenges in ānāpānasati (mindfulness of breathing): maintaining genuine interest in a practice object that can seem neutral and repetitive. He introduces a powerful technique from Sayadaw U Paṇḍita—investigating each inbreath and outbreath to identify three distinct physical sensations such as expansion, pulsing, pressure, or warmth. This investigation cultivates the curiosity and continuity that lead naturally to deeper settling of mind.
> Armstrong offers a nuanced teaching on boredom, defining it simply as "aversion to the neutral," and explains how active interest serves as its antidote. The session includes substantial discussion on the relationship between effort, surrender, and faith (saddhā) in meditation. He explores why the mind sometimes pulls back from deeper states of peace, connecting this hesitation to a fundamental lack of trust in the present moment—a trust that develops gradually through sustained practice as we learn we can meet whatever arises.
> The talk also addresses a subtle but important distinction between meditating on the "concept" of breath versus the direct physical sensations of the body breathing. Armstrong explains how Pa-Auk Sayadaw's approach emphasizes the stable concept or rhythm of breath for samatha development, while vipassanā practice naturally emphasizes changing sensations to reveal impermanence. Both approaches are valid, and practitioners can experiment to find what supports their practice. The session begins with the taking of the Five and Eight Precepts, grounding the meditation instructions in the foundation of sīla.

In the meditation this morning, we'll continue to explore our relationship to breathing. As we've said a few times, one of the key things is finding interest. Because the breath is so neutral and so repetitive, it's very easy to lose interest in it. We have to take some active steps often to keep the interest up. Otherwise, we tip into apathy and boredom.

Let me say one brief thing about boredom. Boredom is merely the aversion to the neutral. That's all it is. Things aren't exciting enough to grab our attention either in attraction or repulsion, so we need to overcome it. The antidote really is interest.

Part of interest is motivation. If we find ourselves becoming a little apathetic, losing interest, then it's time to reflect on what drew us here and to refresh that motivation and keenness of learning to help spark the interest.

This morning I'm going to suggest one more way to encourage interest. This is an instruction Sayadaw U Pandita used to give to the yogis who were meditating with him: investigate the in-breath and investigate the out-breath to find three distinct sensations in each one.

Focus for a while on the in-breath. Just explore the in-breath and see if you can notice three distinct sensations that occur in the process of one in-breath. Make them physical, really bare physical experiences. It could be expansion or contraction or tension or touch or something like that. Don't just say, "Oh, I noticed it was hard." Those aren't physical sensations. Look for direct physical experience.

An in-breath goes on quite a while. An in-breath is not just one thing—it's lots of little sensations. Wherever you're feeling, even in the nose, there are lots of little sensations, definitely in the belly, chest, the whole breath. See if you can identify three on the in-breath. If you can notice those three with each in-breath, that will really help keep up the interest. And then on the out-breath, the same thing: notice three distinct sensations. If you can find them on each out-breath, that will also help with the interest.

This is not something that I'm suggesting you should do at every sitting, to find three or track the three. But honestly, when a yogi would come back to Sayadaw U Pandita and report their three sensations, he'd say, "Good, now go back and find one more. Report that next time." So this is something that can be ongoing, but that's going to be up to you. Play with it and see. I find it really brings my curiosity and the attention right into the direct physical experience.

Be relaxed and comfortable and also upright. When we find this balance in the body through the posture, we're also setting a balance in the mind between being too loose and being too tight—having a certain degree of firmness at the same time as we're feeling relaxation, both in mind and body.

Again, going through these short preliminaries: feeling the whole body posture in sitting, letting go of any obvious places of holding or tension, opening the attention in a wide way to sounds inside and outside to bring in a sense of pure receptivity. And from that place of receptivity, returning the attention to the body and feeling the sensations of breath—again, where it's most comfortable for you or where the experience is clearest. It may be a narrow focus: nose, belly, chest. Maybe a broad focus: the impact on the whole body.

As you start to connect with breathing in and breathing out, first bring attention to the experience of the in-breath. In the course of one in-breath, can you notice three distinct sensations that occur in the process of one in-breath? It can be helpful to name them because it will help with memory—it will help you to remember what you've discovered. So it could be something like tingling or pulsing or pressure or warmth or coolness, expansion, something like that. But having named it once, you don't need to name it every time. It can be helpful in the beginning to name the sensations. Three sensations occurring in an in-breath.

And if you've noticed these three sensations, can you find them on each in-breath? Bring that same attention to detail every time there's a breathing in.

Now turning to explore the out-breath. In the same way, can you find three specific sensations that occur during the course of one out-breath? If you've recognized three sensations that occur in an out-breath in the area where you normally feel it, see if you can find those three sensations in every out-breath. It's a way of bringing interest, and interest brings continuity, and continuity brings settling.

Then finally you can try putting these two together. Recognize three separate sensations on an in-breath, three sensations on an out-breath, breath after breath. It takes quite a bit of attention and interest to sustain seeing that. See if it's possible. See if it helps you stay connected to the bare experience of breathing.

If you find it too complicated, if it makes you think too much or use too many words too quickly, just go back to the basic feeling the in-breath, feeling the out-breath. Then if the interest needs to be perked up, you can try this exercise again.

This kind of investigation, as I mentioned, is not something that you need to do in every sitting. But if you ever find your interest is low and you need to pick it up a little bit, this is one of the ways that we recommend—along with the one Sally introduced yesterday, which was beginning, middle, and end, a way to feel different parts of the breath and bring in continuity. It's helpful to have a few of these little tools because for all of us, the interest in the breath will come and go.

A student asked about the difference between effort, striving, and motivation. She described how in the day, sometimes she drops into a stream and there's a lot of peace—not rapture, but deep peace, and she'll take that. But then she bounces out, and there's more agitation, more easily distracted or looking for distraction. She was thinking about this and realized there's some way you need to surrender into the practice. So her inquiry became about resistance to the surrender—some fear, she thought, of really abandoning herself to the joy. She also noted that when it gets too complicated, it becomes joyless for her.

I had a little trouble hearing all of it, so let me repeat what I understood. She started off framing it as the relationship between effort and motivation and striving. Then she described how in staying with the breath—and it's helpful for her to keep it kind of simple—she's often able to come to a place of peace, and sometimes more joy comes in, but peace is kind of good enough. And yet, once that's there, there's an invitation to surrender and go deeper and really let go. But there's some pulling back from that.

And yet there's something in the makeup of the mind that doesn't quite trust it or isn't quite ready. Honestly, I find it a little bit similar to the quandary of falling asleep at night. You're lying in bed, you know you're ready to go to sleep, and the mind's just a little more active than one would like it to be. How does one move from that activeness to a place of deep rest and sleep? There's an invitation and there's a little bit of still holding back.

I haven't found any way by an act of will to make that transition. All I can really say about it is that the quality of relaxation is what really allows it to happen, and the relaxation is based on trust. This trust in the present moment is something that just has to grow by itself over time.

Trust is a really fundamental topic in Buddhism. We don't talk about it in these terms a lot, but it's one translation of the Pali word saddha, which is more often translated as faith. In a way, it's asking: do we have faith that if we let go completely, there will be a good outcome? That we will be taken care of? That it will be okay?

Honestly, I think all the mind's incessant activity—this restlessness which expresses itself through thoughts and emotional overtones—is really a manifestation of a lack of faith. It's kind of our project to keep the self as comfortable as possible. The mind's main activity with all these distracting thoughts is concerned with what's going to make it safe and what's going to keep the danger away. The only thing that really allows for the release of that is the deepening of faith.

In some ways, it's really learning to trust in the present moment, in our ability to relate to the present moment, no matter what's there. Sometimes there's this concern: if I let go, I don't know what's going to happen, I don't know what's going to come up. One of the virtues of our practice is that over time, we explore almost every corner of the mind. As we sit quietly through months and years of sustained meditation practice, almost every corner of the mind comes up to be looked at. We get more and more confident—oh, I can be with whatever comes. I've been with fear before, I've been with the void before, I've been with anger before, I've been with grief. I can be with it. That deepening trust in our capacity, I think, is ultimately what allows us to let go more and more.

There's one other thing that I think really supports it. In my experience, deepening concentration has really helped. The deepening concentration starts to quiet down the mind's thought excursions more and more. Sometimes they'll just stop for a while. And when the mind has settled to that degree, when the thoughts have settled to that degree, it becomes easier to drop and let go.

But I can't resist bringing in this quotation from Ajahn Chah, which is one of my favorites: If you let go a little, there's a little peace. If you let go a lot—I know you all know this—there's a lot of peace. If you let go completely, there's complete peace.

We approach that—a little, a lot, complete—over the course of our practice. It gets easier.

One other thing I'll say is that for me, the jhana practice really helped develop an openness to that kind of complete letting go. In entering into even the first jhana, one finds that that state sustains itself. That's why it's called an absorption. The effort can really go out at that point. So just another encouragement: if that's of interest, it's a useful avenue to pursue. And having explored that to some depth in the past, this reservation to let go still comes in. So there's no magic cure. But all these elements add up to support it.

Thank you for that question and observation. It's a deep one.

Another question came up about whether there's a difference between mindfulness of breath and mindfulness of the body breathing. For some practitioners, "breath" feels a little bit conceptual, but "the body breathing" is a direct physical experience.

This points to a really interesting question. My perspective is the latter. Feeling the body breathing is what I'm looking for. That's the way I practice and it's the way Sally and I tend to teach.

Pauk Sayadaw's approach is a little arcane, but it's at the center of the way he teaches mindfulness of breath. He says that if you go into the sensations of the breath, from his point of view, you're moving into four elements contemplation, which is his entry into Vipassana. And so what I was instructed was to stay with the breath in the area of the upper lip, but not to feel strongly or directly the sensations in the upper lip. That threw me for a while.

There's a couple who used to practice with Sayadaw—Tina Rasmussen and Stephen Snyder. Some of you may have read their book. Stephen said that the way he eventually came to understand Sayadaw's instruction was almost to visualize a little cylinder right under the nose and to almost visualize the breath coming in and out through that cylinder. Once he had the place, he didn't have to visualize anymore.

The way Sayadaw described it is that in the Samatha practice, one comes to meditate on the concept of the breath—which is exactly what you were saying. The concept of the breath. And so for Samatha, this is a really skillful move. Why? Because the concept is stable and the sensations are changing. This is a really interesting point, and you can play with it if you want.

Now, I found that "concept" wasn't a word that worked for me very well. The way I interpreted Sayadaw's instruction was as the rhythm of the breath. There's this image from the Visuddhimagga—it's from the commentaries, not from the suttas—of mindfulness of breathing as being at one point and having a saw go back and forth across a log. What you're interested in is that point of contact of the saw with the log. That suggested to me the rhythm of the breath. But Sayadaw used the word concept. Your interest is in the concept.

I would say from a Samatha point of view, concept can work really well because it's stable. I found the rhythm works the same way. Vipassana would emphasize the changing nature of the sensations in the body. I find that works well also. So maybe I'm being disloyal, but I tend to teach more on the experience in the body than on the concept, because I find the concept a little hard to grok and to explain. But you could use either one.

For Samatha, that quality will develop more strongly out of seeing sameness. The insights from Vipassana develop more strongly from seeing change—that's what leads into seeing impermanence. But in practicing Samatha, you're not so interested in seeing impermanence. If you can see something that's less changing, that's actually more onward leading for Samatha.

I will leave you all to play with that. If concept works for you, that can be a good way to practice. If the physical sensations speak to you more directly, that's also fine. In my experience, that works, regardless of Sayadaw's instructions.

A few announcements today. The first has to do with the different dialects of Pali that are going on in our group. When we get to the refuges, I don't know if you've noticed, there are different pronunciations happening. I see it as a West Coast versus East Coast thing. On the West Coast, the way we say it is "Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi" with the uplift. At IMS, the way it's said is "Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi."

I don't have a preference personally, but I tend to believe when in Rome, do as the Romans do. Because we're on the East Coast, I'm going to encourage the East Coast dialect. I know the West Coasters will miss the uplift—it's kind of soaring, a little bit like an Adele song. But we're going to go for the equanimity of the East Coast. Actually, I think it's a descendant from Thailand or from Burma that has brought this about. The East Coast is more Burmese, the West Coast is more Thai. So we're going to go with the Burmese pronunciation.

It may be a hard adjustment for the Californians, but I know you can do it.

Now, the good news and the bad news, as you've seen on the board: it's a beautiful day for practice, and it's going to be really noisy. There's a water tank in the garage.

Note: This appears to be the end of the transcript. The final portion contains primarily logistical announcements about noise during the retreat rather than dharma content.

CHAPTER 185

Awareness: Turn, Recognize, Rest

Guy Armstrong · 52 min

> In this foundational dharma talk, Guy Armstrong unveils the central meditation instruction for awareness practice that parallels the systematic approach used in mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati). Drawing on the traditional factors of vitakka (initial application) and vicāra (sustained application), he presents the three-step method: turn your attention toward awareness, recognize its presence, and rest without effort.
> Armstrong shares a powerful teaching story from Dzogchen master Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche, recounted by his son Yongey Mingyur Rinpoche in 'Open Heart, Open Mind.' The simple hand gesture - palm out (looking at objects), palm in (looking at the mind that perceives), then dropping the hands - becomes a skillful means for connecting with inner space and the broad field of knowing.
> This talk emphasizes the crucial difference between effortful concentration practices and the effortless resting in awareness. Once recognition occurs, all volitional activity ceases, removing the self from the equation and allowing natural stillness to emerge. Armstrong addresses practical questions about working with arising thoughts, emotions, and wholesome mental factors like joy and tranquility, providing guidance on when to stay with awareness versus when to attend directly to difficult experiences with mettā or vipassanā techniques.

So good morning, everyone. Would you believe we're almost to summer? It's chilly. So I'm glad people have exercised wisdom and discretion in closing the windows on the side. Feel free to do that with temperatures like they are today.

This morning, I'm going to introduce two important things, so pay attention. First, I want to unveil the central meditation instruction that will accompany us for the rest of this retreat, this section on awareness. It's really the key pointing to how we suggest that you practice when you're doing the awareness practices from here on in. We've wanted to give a little bit of time for your intuition about awareness to build up and offering some various ways in. Today I want to put it into the context of a specific instruction for meditation.

The second thing is that I want to introduce the way of recognizing or finding awareness that has been most helpful for me in all the years that I've been practicing this. So these two things I'll cover this morning.

Let me do the meditation instruction first and then I'll get to the specific approach. I want to refer back to our practice of mindfulness of breathing, which we did for ten days together. The instruction was, once you got settled in your body, to direct the attention to the breath, connect there to see what your experience was, and to sustain the attention for at least half a breath, whatever was comfortable for you, without straining and striving.

So there were these three pieces. We intend to go to the breath, we would connect with vitaka, and then we would sustain with vichara. And vitaka and vichara specifically were the factors that developed the concentration in relation to our chosen focus of breath. Okay, we're all on the same page? Good.

Our chosen focus of attention in this section of the retreat is awareness. You could say consciousness, but whichever. And we talked very early on about how what we're really doing is practicing mindfulness of consciousness, mindfulness of awareness. That is our chosen focus. If it's an element in our experience, we can become mindful of it because we can notice it. So that's our intention, is to direct our knowing to awareness.

The second part is how to connect with it. And this we've given you a few ways already. Asking the question, "Am I aware?" is a way of connecting with the faculty of awareness and just see what comes. Sally led us in choiceless attention and then turning toward the knowing. That was the second way in. I did the meditation on body, space, boundless consciousness. That's the third avenue in. Sally led a meditation on loving kindness, moving to boundless or pervading loving kindness, and then turning toward awareness. And this morning I'm going to introduce one more. And then future days will give other ways that hopefully will lead you to the experience of awareness as a real thing, not just conceptual, but as a real thing in your meditation.

So this part of connecting, the vitaka part with awareness, is a lot trickier than connecting with the sensations of breath. Those things are really obvious and physical and tangible and solid and so forth. Connecting with awareness is a more subtle undertaking. And that's why we have to give a lot of different ways in. I can just tell you, "Feel the sensations of your breath" and you're there, right? But if I tell you, "Notice the broad space of awareness right now," you might connect or you might not. So we offer a bunch of different ways to do that connecting piece.

So this connecting piece is the most subtle, elusive, hard to gain confidence in, in the beginning. Once you've been working with it for a while, then the recognition comes really simply, really easily. But in the beginning, it can be hard to be sure: Is this what they're talking about? Am I really in touch with awareness in this way? So the connecting piece is subtle, sometimes elusive.

And then sustaining—what we've suggested is once you connect with awareness, just hang out there. So in the sustaining, there's not making an effort in any direction. Once you connect, just rest. Rest.

So I'm going to summarize these three steps, which are basically intention, intention toward mindfulness, vitaka and vichara in our normal terms. In relation to awareness, I'm going to sum them up by saying you turn your attention toward awareness using any of these cues that are helpful to you. You recognize it. And this is the moment that's a little tricky and sometimes elusive, but it will come with more and more confidence.

And the third step, in terms of sustaining, you don't do anything to sustain—you simply rest. These are the three words of the meditation instruction that we're going to use repeatedly: turn, recognize, and rest.

This approach is very analogous to what we've done in developing samatha with breathing. Turn is the intention to direct. Recognize is connect. Rest is sustain, but without effort. You sustain just as long as it naturally lasts. It's out of your control, and that's perfectly fine. However long it lasts, that's the right amount.

What did you do when you got distracted from the breathing? Eventually you'd wake up, have the intention of mindfulness, connect, and sustain again. That's exactly what we're going to do with awareness. When you get distracted and wander off into fantasy land, thinking land, planning land—whatever it may be—at some point you'll realize that. You'll come back into the present. At that point: intention for mindfulness, turn, recognize, rest.

In this way, meditation on awareness can become as systematic as mindfulness of breathing. The more we approach it with this pattern—turn, recognize, rest—the more we will stabilize attention in awareness, just as attention eventually stabilized in the breath. It wasn't stabilized all day. It may not even have been stabilized for an hour or ten minutes, but for periods, it became stable. The same thing can happen with attention on awareness.

As we practice this again and again—turn, recognize, rest—the resting will naturally get longer, but you cannot make it longer. If you try to make it longer, you're fussing with it.

There's an important piece here that's different from mindfulness of breathing. Once you have recognized, you stop doing. You stop all volitional activity. Why? Because that takes the self out of it. When we're engaged in deliberate volitional activity, we're introducing a motive. There's a wanting at work.

In mindfulness of breathing, you've all reached points where that volitional activity goes away and you can just rest in the stillness. It may not last very long—for some of you it does—but you've all reached those points where the stillness is self-sustaining and the effort can go out of mindfulness of breathing. There's a joy and delight in resting in that way.

This is a kind of surrendering—any attempt to control, any attempt to influence—and just letting things be as they are. There's immediate freedom in that. Whether you've reached it through concentration on the breath and that factor of stillness comes through, or in this case through the recognition of awareness and the ability to rest in that experience, there's a sense of freedom.

Learn to become familiar with that sense of freedom that is based on non-efforting, non-doing, resting. This becomes a great source of faith—the faith that you don't have to do anything to make things all right. Things are already all right, and you can trust in them the way they are. This is the beauty of resting. This is the beauty of stillness.

When do you need to do something again? Only when you've become distracted. Then attention needs to be recollected, intention toward mindfulness returns. Turn, recognize, rest. Connect with awareness again and sustain by resting, however long it lasts.

Not how long you make it last—however long it lasts.

This completes the first part I wanted to cover: the basic meditation instruction we'll work with for most of the remaining retreat. Turn, recognize, rest.

The second element I wanted to introduce concerns the means of turning and recognizing that has proven most effective in my practice. We've already explored several techniques—body space awareness, metta pervading awareness, the inquiry "am I aware?" These are all methods for turning. But I want to share with you the approach that has worked most powerfully for me.

One of my first teachers in this area was Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche, a Tibetan Dzogchen master who had a small monastery outside Kathmandu, perched on a hilltop. His monastery was called Nagi Gompa. Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche had four sons, all recognized as Rinpoches. One was Yongey Mingyur Rinpoche, who teaches widely today through online and in-person programs. Another was Tsoknyi Rinpoche, who became our first teacher in this kind of practice—both Sally's and mine. He also had two older sons, Chokyi Nyima Rinpoche and Chokling Rinpoche, who live in Nepal.

Though we initially met Tsoknyi Rinpoche, we eventually had the privilege of studying with his father, Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche, at Nagi Gompa.

What I want to share is an account from Tsoknyi Rinpoche describing a teaching he received from his father. This appears in his book Open Heart, Open Mind. Tsoknyi Rinpoche recounts:

"I was able to spend only a few weeks with my father at his hermitage in Nagi Gompa. Near the end of my stay, though, he gave me a lesson in experiencing inner space that I'll never forget.

I was sitting in my father's private room—a small, wood-paneled space with a bed, an altar, and enough room for a few people. The setting sun cast golden-red light through the windows. My father said, 'Look at the area around you with all your senses open, seeing all the objects, feeling all the sensations. Don't block anything. Can you sense that openness, that simple awareness of the things you see and hear and feel?'

I nodded. With the sun setting through windows overlooking a broad valley, the sheer physical warmth of my father's body, and his sweet but penetrating gaze, it would have been hard not to be aware of all the phenomena.

Then he said, 'Now slowly turn that same awareness to the mind that perceives these things openly. Instead of looking at outer space, look at inner space.'

He demonstrated with his hands, turning his palms outward to show how we ordinarily perceive by looking outward, then turning his palms inward to indicate the mind that perceives. Then he let his hands drop into his lap to demonstrate letting the whole effort drop, allowing whatever happened to happen.

In that moment, due largely to the certainty and understanding he had cultivated over years of practice, I caught a glimpse of inner space—wide open and clear, completely beyond concepts or judgments—in which the entire realm of phenomena appear and disappear."

I'd like everyone to open their eyes for a moment. You don't need to mirror this gesture, but you can if it feels natural. Tulku Urgyen turned his palms outward to indicate the mind looking at objects, then turned them toward his face to show looking inward at the mind that perceives. Finally, he dropped them.

This gesture became the primary method I've used throughout years of practice in this style to connect with awareness. I eventually simplified it to using just one hand: look out, look in, drop.

I offer this as another cue you can use if it proves helpful. For years, I hesitated to share this teaching because it came through a specific lineage, and I didn't feel authorized to transmit those instructions. But since Tsoknyi Rinpoche published it in his book, it has become publicly available, and I now feel comfortable sharing it based on his openness.

Let me demonstrate once more: out, in, drop.

Over time, this became increasingly subtle for me—eventually just the gentle turning of the palm would suffice. Later, simply seeing the back of my hand would open that space of awareness. Unlike some other techniques we've explored that involve multiple steps and take time to develop, this method is remarkably immediate.

With this understanding, let us now enter into meditation.

I'll repeat both the steps that we'll be using and suggest this hand gesture to see how it goes.

So again, please sit comfortably. Feel the uprightness and energy in your posture, as well as the groundedness and connection to the earth. Take a few moments to connect with the experience of breathing, feeling in the body the impact of breathing in and breathing out.

Now we can begin to practice with this instruction of turn—meaning turn the attention in the direction of awareness, recognize that awareness is present, and then rest with that experience of awareness.

Try this with the palm gesture that Swami Rinpoche described of his father. You can just visualize your palm facing away, representing our usual way of looking out toward the world. Then turn the hand back so the palm is facing you—the gesture of looking in—and then rest there.

Again: palm out, palm in, and rest.

Once you are in the phase of rest, you don't need to do anything else. Sense phenomena will still be happening. Sounds will come and go. Thoughts will come and go. The presence of a single thought does not have to disrupt the resting. It's only getting on the thought train and riding for a while that is a distraction.

You can notice that a thought can come and go and you can stay in touch with the broad field of knowing. Sensations come and go, sounds, there will be a mood, and thoughts will also be phenomena coming and going. None of that is an interruption to the resting.

Simply rest in a relaxed way, not trying to alter the experience, not trying to make it deeper or stiller or longer. Just open to this broad field of awareness, empty enough to hold all the arisings and their passing.

This field of awareness isn't constructed by us. It's already here. As we develop this practice of non-doing in the resting, we realize we're resting in what's already there—or we could say resting in reality itself. No effort is needed to improve it or change it.

As you rest in this field of awareness, you'll continue to perceive other sense phenomena. Sounds come and go, sensations arise and change, thoughts appear and disappear. You don't need to connect your attention deliberately to those phenomena.

In choiceless attention on changing objects, we would connect the attention to each new predominant experience. A sound would call the attention and we'd go there and stay there for a bit. A sensation would stand out, we'd connect, and the attention would linger.

While you're resting with awareness, all these phenomena will be known. They will appear. You don't need to send the attention there to connect or sustain with them. The attention really stays in the broad field, although other arisings will be known. They are, you might say, left in the background.

If you've become distracted, then you again go through the steps of turn, recognize, rest. Notice that in the turning, there is volition, there is intention, there is effort. This is appropriate, the same way we would bring the attention back to the breath in samatha breathing. We deliberately bring the attention back to awareness in this meditation.

So the turning is a volitional step, and you can use any of the techniques that you found helpful: "Am I aware?" Body space awareness. Meta-pervading awareness. Even if it takes some seconds, your turning step, that's fine. This is appropriate.

Or you can try the palm—palm out, palm in—to connect to awareness. And then once you've recognized, you can rest there, letting go of effort in the resting.

I suggest that you try this as your ongoing meditation practice through the day: this turn, recognize, rest. I want to say just a bit more about each of these steps.

In the turn, this is a technique. Whatever technique helps you get there - maybe it's just saying the word "aware," maybe it's asking "am I aware?" maybe it's the palm turning back, maybe it's going in through metta. Whatever has worked best for you, use that today.

I find in the long run it's helpful to have two or three of these techniques. Because I find I use one for a while, and it's magic. I just... wow, I'm right there. But then the magic wears off. I use it, use it, use it, and the magic of it kind of wears off. And then I need to bring in another one for a while.

So it's good to have two or three backups. And then I use the other ones for a while, and I've taken a break, and then I use my primary one again. Wow... right back there again. So play with this. It's not that one is always going to work super well.

When you get to recognize, here is where you have to really use your own discernment and take what you get. This is as close as I'm getting right now to the experience of awareness. However clear that is, even if it's a little bit vague, you're a little unsure, trust what you get. Use one of these techniques that has been most helpful for you and believe in that.

We each hit awareness with different degrees of clarity and fullness and perception of emptiness in it. So trust what you get when you do that turning with the tool that has seemed to work best for you. For each of us, that's our current vision of awareness, what it is.

And then when you get to rest, let it rest as long as it will. One of Tulku Urgyen's favorite sayings was, "short moments many times." If it doesn't last hugely long, that's okay. However long it lasts, that's fine.

A main factor that will let it last longer is samadhi. As concentration develops in the mind, that stability will carry over into the awareness practice. And that's really why we've done the concentration as a preparation for moving into awareness. The longer it lasts, the more you can feel the richness and the depth of the awareness that's there.

So that's why it's still helpful to do some concentration-style practices, say at the beginning of sits, even in this awareness phase. Or take a whole sitting and go back to breath or metta, really collect the mind, then open up again.

It doesn't really work to try to force the sustaining, to dictate how long it should last. It'll last as long as it does. And what makes it not last? Proliferation, or another term is grasping. Grasping, selfing, fixation, obsession, clinging. This will break up the access. This will block the access to awareness. It's no longer empty. There's a self. There's a strong self there.

So when that's come in, you need to find a way to let go of the holding and then connect again with awareness. So this is the outline of the practice.

Any questions this morning?

Ken and then Lisa.

"When you're explaining the turn, recognize, and rest, you talk about the volitional aspect of that."

"The turn."

"The turn. It seems to me in the turning of the palm..."

That is the turn. That's the technique of turning.

So let me just restate Ken's question if you didn't hear it. Where is the volition in this sequence: turn, recognize, rest? And I said, it's in the turn.

And he said, "But with the palm?" I said, "That's part of the turn." So that's volitional. The techniques for getting there are all volitional. Whether it's turning the palm or going through body space awareness or metta pervading awareness, these are the volitional steps. You call these to mind. You do that. And at the end of the turn, you get something. Whatever it is you get, stay there.

Lisa asked about when resting in awareness sustains for a while, there are arisings of qualities like joy and tranquility and happiness. Other people have reported love and compassion coming in. The question was whether those should stay in the background as well.

This is where the background-foreground distinction might get a little misleading. You will notice them. Anytime you've been developing mindfulness around factors of mind, when factors of mind start arising in awareness practice, you will notice them in the same way you'd notice a sound or sensation. I want to be clear: these are sense arisings. They're very wholesome sense arisings, but they're still sense arisings.

So we basically notice them. It's good to notice them, and it indicates the mind has been trained to be aware of mental factors, which is really good mindfulness training. And we don't mess with them. We let them come when they come. As they fade, we let them fade when they fade.

With the recognition of peace and joy and tranquility, we also know as practitioners that these are really wholesome. It is a wholesome development that these things are arising. This is that quality—the third aspect of the nature of mind that we talked about. There's the emptiness, there's the cognizing, and there's the responsiveness.

As you've entered this field with good concentration and a good degree of metta, that's starting to unlock the heart qualities to really shine out. This is a beautiful happening. So we appreciate that it's there. We understand this is growth—our growth in the Dharma. This is part of the ripening of the responsiveness of mind. But we don't fuss with them.

It's kind of like we've let the Dharma take the lead. It will show us what's there. And those beautiful qualities will just get more and more unlocked and flow as we learn to trust in the resting—natural qualities of mind just coming through. It's good to notice them, just the same way we notice sounds, but we don't have to dwell on them. Come back to awareness itself and rest there. Continue to come back to awareness as the place you rest. And then these beautiful qualities can continue to flower.

Jiyoung asked about holding other kinds of thoughts—maybe some difficult thought or hard feeling. "Should I go back to meditation or vipassana? Going back to awareness sometimes feels..." This is an important point. The question is: when a difficult thought or emotion comes up—one of the hindrances—should one just go back to awareness and sort of leave it in the background, or should one attend to it with metta or vipassana?

This is really a judgment call. Jiyoung's comment was that it feels like just ignoring it is not really taking care of herself, is not really attending to what needs to be attended to. If there's any feeling that what's arising is important enough that it needs to be attended to, then I would move from awareness and meet it with vipassana or metta and tend to it in that way. It is a judgment that each of us makes, and we need to make it out of a real sense of heartfulness: "Oh, this is really calling me."

I need to give attention to this. We work with it through metta or in vipassana with RAIN, the heart of which is this quality of real acceptance. I need to give my attention to it and accept that this emotion is there. It needs to be met, recognized, and honored.

Once we do that for a while, usually our relationship with it becomes clearer and calmer, and we can return to awareness. But if it feels like the hindrance is really strong and drawing us in, then it's good to attend to it. If we don't—and you all probably know this—we run the risk of bypassing. We're trying to use this lofty ideal of open awareness to avoid attending to emotional things that need attention.

When we don't attend to the emotional things that require our care, they end up causing suffering later, not only for ourselves, but usually for others. So it's beneficial to tend to these things when they arise. One of the metrics I always look at is the intensity of it, how strong the emotion is. If it's strong, I tend to think it needs to be taken care of. If it's weak, we can leave it in the background and stay with awareness.

Happy Juneteenth. Today is the day we celebrate the ending of slavery in this country. And happy Father's Day to all the dads out there. Let's include all other parents—happy Parents' Day. Just in recognition of how much each of our lives has depended on the care from others, and we continue, hopefully, to pass that care on. So, happy taking care of one another day.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 186

Tranquility and Insight

Guy Armstrong · 50 min

> In this dharma talk from a concentration retreat, Guy Armstrong examines the two primary outcomes of meditation development: samatha (tranquility) and vipassanā (insight). He explores how unification of mind leads to happiness and contentment (sukha), which naturally reduces distractedness and supports present-moment awareness. Drawing from the Majjhima Nikāya, Armstrong discusses the Buddha's own awakening experience and how concentrated mind becomes the foundation for wisdom to arise. He distinguishes between ordinary concentration and sammā-samādhi (right concentration) as described in the Noble Eightfold Path, emphasizing that liberation requires concentration supported by all path factors. The talk includes practical guidance for maintaining samādhi while transitioning into awareness practice, covering techniques like returning to one's meditation anchor, continuity of mindfulness, and skillful attention to sense experience. Armstrong shares insights from his own practice with Burmese meditation master Pa-Auk Sayadaw, illustrating different approaches to using breath meditation for developing either tranquility or insight.

The subject of the talk tonight is tranquility and insight.

I want to say first that I've really been touched coming into this retreat to feel the atmosphere that you all are holding. Normally when I come into a retreat, I feel like I'm more settled than the meditators are. Coming into this retreat, I get the feeling you all are more settled than I am. So I'm one of the people coming from outside who's probably going to stir you all up with my worldly energy. I've just really appreciated the people I see walking slowly and sitting quietly. The whole retreat feels very settled in to me at this point. So it's a lovely atmosphere to come into.

You all have been practicing unification of mind for ten days. As I'm sure you know, that's a synonym, probably the most frequently used synonym for the factor of concentration or samadhi. Often when I teach these retreats, I call them concentration retreats. But in some ways I think the language of unification might be more helpful for people. There's something about concentration that seems to evoke striving, as though we have to reach a certain level and qualify to get our gold badge for being a concentration yogi. But actually what we're doing in practicing for concentration is we are collecting the attention and unifying the mind, usually around a chosen focus.

In your case, for most of you, it's the breath. For some, it might be body or sounds. This concept of a primary anchor really supports the collecting because in every moment, we kind of know where we're meant to be. What that does is highlight the times when we're not there. When we don't have a chosen focus, we just assume meditation's going great, and we don't notice how many mind moments we're spending away from the present. So choosing this anchor is very helpful. It does collect and unify the mind.

When the Buddha talked about meditation, he talked about two primary outcomes that happen as meditation develops. One is tranquility, and the other is insight. In Pali, these two are called samatha and vipassana. Both are really important, and in fact, they really influence and strengthen one another. As tranquility develops, vipassana comes more alive. As vipassana deepens, it leads to a tranquilizing of the mind. So the two work well together.

Tranquility is closely related to concentration and unification. When the Buddha described meditation progress, he said that tranquility leads to happiness. Do you feel that? As you've gotten more tranquil, more settled, have you felt a growth in happiness? That's the first immediate benefit of a practice that aims for this factor of samatha.

As you've gotten happier, do you find that makes the mind less distracted? It can, because we're finding that there's fulfillment in the present moment. This term sukha, sometimes translated as happiness, can also be translated as contentment. It's one of the jhanic factors that I think Winnie probably talked about last night. This term for contentment really says, the mind says, "Oh, I'm quite happy where I am. I don't have to reach out to the past. I don't have to reach out to the future for something different." So it really calms those restless movements into past and future. That's what allows the energy to collect into the present moment, that lack of distractedness.

With that base, we can choose or not to direct the attention to wisdom. That's what's indicated by the term vipassana or insight. Insight is really for the purpose of developing greater understanding or wisdom and is primarily about what leads to happiness and what leads to suffering. That's what we want to learn. We're here not for meditative gymnastics. We're here to find out how to bring greater happiness and less suffering into our lives and the lives of those that we touch. It's really wisdom that leads to that understanding.

So tranquility by itself, concentration by itself is very good, but it's not the end of the road. You see this in the life story of the Buddha. You've probably heard that his first two teachers, when he left home and was wandering for six years, were concentration adepts. They trained him to two deep places in what are called the formless attainments.

These are states that are beyond the four jhanas, continuing to develop into areas called formless attainments, sometimes called formless jhanas. They're deep states of concentration. The Buddha's first two teachers taught him the attainment of nothingness and the attainment of neither perception nor non-perception.

Actually, I shouldn't call him the Buddha at this point. He was the Bodhisattva—he had not yet awakened. He was on the path to awakening, truly the Bodhisattva. And so the Bodhisattva was invited to teach with these two concentration masters, the most deeply experienced meditators he could find in India at that time. And he said no. He said, "I'm not really interested in that because it doesn't go all the way. It takes you to a place of great concentration and peace, but it's temporary—it fades."

This is really the limitation of concentration attainments. They're temporary because they're conditioned and they will always fade. I'm sure that's not disillusioning news for you at this point, but they will fade. However, they still have an important role to play in the overall development of the path.

It's interesting because I don't know exactly how the Buddha came to benefit from those practices, but I believe that he did. Later on when he was meditating, he recollected an experience of the first jhana, which is a lower attainment than either of these, and he was able to access that quite easily. So I suspect that the concentration states he'd reached early on in his wandering supported his ability to reach the first jhana and then to open beyond that.

So he reached deep states of concentration, but it wasn't yet what we would call right concentration or samma samadhi. And that's because it wasn't yet surrounded by the factors of the Eightfold Path. There's this beautiful description in one of the discourses where the Buddha says, "What is noble right concentration?" Notice there's a distinction from just concentration. "What is noble right concentration?" And he says, "Unification of mind, equipped with right view, right intention, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, and right mindfulness." Do you recognize this list? It's the Eightfold Path.

So concentration becomes right concentration when it's supported by the other factors of the Eightfold Path. When it's not supported by the other factors, it may be concentration, but it's not the concentration that leads to liberation. You all, having practiced before, understand concentration as being supported by the other factors of the Eightfold Path, and that's what allows it to be liberating—right concentration.

But somehow the Buddha took this skill, which he had developed early, recollected through the first jhana, and then opened up into the greater possibilities of awakening.

I want to point out this book while I'm speaking. I suspect many of you know this—it's called the Middle Length Discourses. The Pali name is the Majjhima Nikaya. It's a collection of the Buddha's discourses that are middle length. There's another collection called the long discourses, and then other collections that are shorter discourses. This is middle length.

If you were going to take one book to a desert island, this would be a good one to take because it contains all the core teachings in depth of the Buddha, in one handy volume. It's really a great treasure for all of us. I sometimes do retreats at home, and when I do a retreat at home, I add in an element of study. Last winter, I reread this book. I'd read it twenty years ago and reread it while I was on retreat. It was very touching because I discovered a lot of things on the second reading that I hadn't discovered when I was younger.

One of the questions I was looking to understand is: in his discourses—and these are a very representative range of teachings that he gave—how often did he talk about liberation? What I found was that in almost every discourse in this collection, there are 152 of them, in almost every discourse he talked about liberation. So it's clear that this is really the heart of the message that he wanted to present. And in about half of those discourses, he talked about concentration because he considered it such a fundamental base for the development of wisdom, for wisdom to arise. He was talking about concentration all the way through these 152 discourses.

So I'll just read one passage which...

continues to strike me and move me. He's talking about the night of his awakening.

And he says, "When my concentrated mind was thus purified, bright, unblemished, wieldy, and steady, I directed it to knowledge of the destruction of the taints."

The taints is one of the terms that he uses to describe unwholesome states of mind, the states that cause us suffering and torment us. "I directed it to knowledge of the destruction of the taints. I directly knew as it actually is: this is suffering. I knew as it actually is: this is the origin of suffering. I knew as it actually is: this is the cessation of suffering. I knew as it actually is: this is the way leading to the cessation of suffering. I knew as it actually is: these are the taints. I knew as it actually is: this is the origin of the taints. This is the cessation of the taints. This is the way leading to the cessation of the taints. When I knew and saw thus, my mind was liberated from the taints. When it was liberated, there came the knowledge: it is liberated. I directly knew the holy life has been lived. What had to be done has been done."

The Buddha's account of his own awakening under the Bodhi tree, based on the concentrated mind being bright and purified.

And I like this term, "wieldy," because when the mind becomes concentrated, the wieldy part means we can direct it where we want it to go. In the Buddha's case, this was to the destruction of the taints, which was ultimately liberating. At other times, he directed it to the recollection of past lives. He directed it to seeing beings dying and being reborn according to their past conduct. So there are different ways that it can be directed. This is really the fruit of the cultivation of concentration, of samadhi.

So I started off talking about tranquility and insight. Tranquility is a different term. The Pali is samatha. The term for concentration is samadhi. It sounds like they should be related, but the words aren't really related. But they are similar in meaning. So people will sometimes talk about samatha practices. They'll sometimes talk about samadhi practices. And they tend to use those, a little colloquially, interchangeably, synonymously. The words are different, but people describe the practices somewhat the same.

So as the mind becomes tranquil, it does become concentrated—less distraction. And then when it becomes unified, that's when it's said to be concentrated.

So I've been looking for a long time for a good definition of concentration overall and came upon one that's from the Samyukta Agama. The agamas, you may know, are collections from early Buddhism from a slightly different tradition. They were passed on in Sanskrit and then translated into Chinese. So the agamas generally have roots in the Chinese translations, but they come from early Indian Buddhism, just a different school than the Pali school.

So I think this is a really nice definition: "What is right concentration? It is reckoned to be the establishing of the mind in the absence of distraction. It being firm, collected, tranquil, concentrated, and mentally unified."

I like this because it pulls together all the ways that we think about concentration and the ways that we talk about it. So look into your own experience with each of these. The absence of distraction. Was that in your experience when the mind was concentrated? Firmness. Did you feel there was a strength, stability when you were concentrated? Collected. Collected into the present moment. Tranquil. So the element of peace is there.

Concentrated and mentally unified—all these qualities are joined together in this definition. What I appreciate about this description is that these are all experiential terms. Concentration isn't just one thing; it has all these different aspects. As we become more familiar with it, we can tune into all these aspects and start to recognize the concentrated mind by these different flavors. The more familiar we become with this state and feel all the different ways that it comes to us, the more our access to it will grow.

Some of this may have been explored in previous retreats, so please bear with me if there's some repetition.

I want to mention something important from my experience: there are times in practice when the mind is fairly concentrated, but it's not tranquil. Concentration and tranquility tend to go together, but sometimes you can be in a concentrated state and be impacted by a very strong experience, causing the mind to become stirred up.

This happens classically when the understanding of impermanence really ripens and comes front and center in meditation. Deep insights into the profound truth of impermanence are often unsettling. The mind can become anxious and stirred up, but this only happens from a place of concentration.

Another place this can be seen is when coming out of a period of stillness and returning to activity. Your friends who left the retreat today likely experienced some concentrated mind meeting the outside world, which probably led to some stirring up. Concentration meeting activity sometimes results in a loss of tranquility—not surprising.

I want to address something about tranquility in relation to healing. I've found, and many people I've spoken with have found, that the experience of retreat and the deepening of meditation can be profoundly healing for different psychological states we've grown up with in our conditioning.

People who have experienced trauma—whether from early childhood, accidents, injury, or abuse—carry that deep injury in their body and mind. It leaves a mark. Many come to meditation retreats like this as a way of healing from that injury, and we've found it very effective in doing so.

If you look into the Buddha's teachings, however, he doesn't explicitly address this kind of healing. He compares himself to a physician, saying the illness we all have is greed, aversion, and delusion, and the remedy is the Eightfold Path. He does see himself as a physician healing the suffering of the world, but these specific kinds of patterning or mental habits that we develop from injury aren't directly addressed in the teachings that I've found.

What does point to this, I believe, is the development of samatha. When the Buddha talks about developing tranquility, he speaks of it in both bodily and mental terms—and when I say mental, I include the heart. In the discourses, the word citta refers to both mind and heart.

What has been stored in the mind-heart and what has been stored in the body tends to be agitating when trauma is at the base. As tranquility develops, it can only develop if that agitation can come to the surface and be somewhat released. So I read in the development of tranquility a real pointing to the activity of healing in our meditation practice.

You can feel this. When the mind becomes collected and the body is settled, it feels like a whole, healthy, or healed place. You can check this out in your own experience.

This quality of samadhi is somewhat contagious. You're all picking it up from each other as these days go on. I'm coming in and picking it up from you, and the new yogis who will be joining us in a couple of days will come in and pick it up from you as well. It's a very shared, communal experience as we develop it.

This became really clear to me some years ago when we had a visit at Spirit Rock from Thich Nhat Hanh. Sally and I live near Spirit Rock, so we've spent a lot of time there teaching and serving on the board. When Thich Nhat Hanh came, it was quite popular—we had about a thousand people come onto the land for this day-long event. A thousand people don't even show up for Jack Kornfield, but they showed up for Thich Nhat Hanh.

It was an outdoor event, as we couldn't hold it inside. This was actually before the current meditation hall was built. The meditation hall, if you've seen Spirit Rock, sits at the top of a hillside, so the land slopes away.

There's a creek that runs down to one side of the meditation hall, and then the land slopes up above the creek. Both above the creek and on the other side are hills, and the creek runs down the middle.

So we set up a platform for Thich Nhat Hanh to speak on the far side of the creek, and then the meditators filled in the hillside that's now below the meditation hall. We were mostly sitting, some were standing, and a thousand people fit on the meadow.

He sat on the platform, his voice amplified. Maybe the Buddha could talk to 500 people, but I don't think Thich Nhat Hanh could without amplification. As he talked, I felt this spell of samadhi settling over everybody on the hillside. His body language and speech came from such a place of stillness that everybody felt it. A thousand people just settled as he was speaking.

Then, in the afternoon, he led a walking meditation. There's a path that goes from near the meditation hall to the end of the property, just a dirt trail. He took everybody who wanted to go—at least 500 people joined the walking meditation to the end. There was this very long line. There's still a photo of that somewhere at Spirit Rock. It was very beautiful. But you could just feel the impact of his samadhi in his speech and through his body. It was very tangible.

When we think about the development of samadhi, as you know, ten days here is a lot of work. I trust that at this point you feel it's all been worth it, because there's more work to come. But the work that's to come, I think, is easier than the work that you've done so far. You've done the hard work.

I want to talk about two benefits of the work that you've done. One is when that tranquility develops, when the concentration develops, it feels good, doesn't it? To me, this is one of the most striking and immediate benefits of Dharma practice.

I was at a board meeting yesterday, just down the hill. There were about fifteen of us in the room and another seven or eight online. We did one session in the afternoon that was more about personal sharing to get to know each other better. I was in a group with three other board members, and at some point I posed the question—I was just curious getting to know them—what really drew you into meditation? How did you get so committed to this practice and this center?

One of the other people in the group said the same thing that I said, which was that in our first retreats, we experienced a level of peace that we'd never known was possible. It was so satisfying and rewarding and fulfilling that it changed our lives. My friend said it transformed his life, that experience on the first retreat. A lot of it was because of that degree of peace.

When you feel something like that—maybe that resonates with your experience—it becomes a beacon. It says, this is what the path has to offer. For myself, I wanted to bring that more and more into my whole life. Not just a rare occasion on a cushion in the middle of a long retreat. But if the mind can go there, why not bring it more into life? So that became very motivating for me.

One of the things I noticed as the years went by: I came to greater and greater levels of that peace. The depth of peace available through our practice, I think, is truly unlimited. Unlimited. So that has always been an encouraging and motivating sign for me, the discovery of this incredible peace that I didn't know about before.

That's the first benefit. It feels good and it's inherently satisfying. But the second piece is, it doesn't stop there—it leads on to insight.

This degree of peace and concentration becomes the best foundation for the mind to wake up. And of course, this is where the wisdom comes in.

When the Buddha talked about these two factors of samatha and vipassana, he didn't ever say, "Now do this practice and you'll develop samatha," or "Do this practice and you'll develop vipassana." The way he presented it, in my understanding, is that mindfulness leads to both samatha and vipassana, which I think is true.

But over the centuries, different commentaries and traditions started talking about specific practices: if you want to develop concentration, do these practices; if you want to develop insight, do these practices. There's a fifth-century meditation manual from Sri Lanka called the Visuddhimagga, which has greatly influenced our tradition. So many meditation instructions and details are laid out there that are still carried out today. It's really been kind of a guiding light in some schools of our tradition.

In that section on developing concentration, the author, Bhikkhu Buddhaghosa, talked about forty different objects for developing concentration, of which the breath was one and the Brahmaviharas were another. The others included things like kasinas, which are colored discs that one then visualizes and focuses on; recollection of the Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha; reflections on death; reflections on a corpse. There are many ways to unify and concentrate the mind.

But here at IMS, we tend to use two: the breath or loving-kindness practice of the Brahmaviharas. We regularly teach in the long retreats, both here and at Spirit Rock, for those who wish months or six-week stretches of concentration on those objects. Very, very fruitful for the people who engage.

So now having developed this base of concentration through this past week of retreat, we can use that to open up to vipassana. The awareness practice that we'll present is a form of vipassana practice. That means we want to be guided as we move into the second half of your retreat by wisdom. Insight and wisdom, of course, are almost synonymous. We want to let that take the lead.

But we want to continue to support the collectedness of mind. As we open up—I mentioned this afternoon that we'll be opening up to a wider field—we don't want to allow that opening to completely undermine our steadiness. That's why we will be opening up gradually and encouraging you to carry along some practice with your anchor, even as we move into the second part of your long retreat.

So we'll take, to some extent, as best we can, some of that concentration with us as we turn to vipassana and wisdom. Of course, we'll give more details as we go.

The breath is one meditation that can be clearly inclusive of both tranquility and insight. The Buddha gave one famous discourse on mindfulness of breathing, which is also included in this volume of the Middle Length Discourses, called the Discourse on the Mindfulness of Breathing, the Anapanasati Sutta. In one section of that, he talks about using the breath for tranquilizing the mind and for concentrating the mind. So the instructions are right there for breathing for both tranquility and concentration.

In another section of the same discourse, he talks about using the breath to contemplate impermanence. You can sort of see this because the breath is always changing, isn't it? Sensations are changing, it's coming and going. No two breaths are really the same when you look closely at them. So if you turn to an approach of investigation with the breath, it could lead into more insight, more wisdom.

When practicing—this is my experience—when I'm using the breath and practicing for samatha, I approach it one way. When I use the breath and I'm developing it for vipassana, I practice a little differently. I'm going to say a little bit about this because it might be relevant for you.

In practicing for samatha, I find it helpful to see the sameness in breath after breath, to see the commonality in breath after breath. One of the ways this may be expressed is that one keeps the attention steady just on one area of the body. In keeping it on one area of the body, there's a kind of ongoing focus that one can connect with and even emphasize. I'm just going to perceive that one area. Yeah, I could feel the breath up, I could feel the breath down. But as I'm practicing samatha, if I'm experiencing it mostly in the chest, I'm going to play with keeping my attention kind of in that area and see where that leads.

The image that's used—I think this is from the Visuddhimagga—is of a saw going across a log. The idea is the saw goes back and forth, but it's always contacting that one point where the wood is being worn away. That's kind of what the breath is like. It's coming and going and coming and going. And yet if we leave our attention at that one area, that provides a sameness of focus that gets reinforced breath after breath after breath. That's what can help the mind to unify—that sameness.

If I'm using the focus on the breath for vipassana, it's more helpful if I notice the change.

Not the sameness, but the change. Within one breath, there are many different sensations. We often speak of feeling the breath in the abdomen as though it's one unified thing, but if you truly examine the experience of breathing in the belly, you discover countless little sensations flickering and shifting with each in-breath and out-breath.

When using the breath for vipassana, I want to observe all those changing sensations because the impermanence becomes so vivid and clear. I want to notice how one breath differs from the next, really increasing the degree of investigation that characterizes vipassana practice.

This distinction was brought home to me quite powerfully through direct experience. I've always enjoyed investigation—it's naturally appealing to me. But when I began using the breath for samatha, I had to shift that investigative tendency somewhat.

In the early 2000s, I traveled to Burma to practice with Pauk Sayadaw, a renowned meditation master skilled in both concentration and vipassana techniques. I sought him out specifically to learn his concentration methods, which people found remarkably helpful and powerful.

As I settled into practice, Sayadaw knew I was a teacher in the West. Whether he had particular expectations of me, I'm uncertain, but I definitely harbored expectations of myself—a desire to match whatever he might expect. These subconscious pressures can dominate our practice sometimes.

I found myself falling into striving. The way I understand striving is when we apply the force of craving to meditation states, trying to reach them through sheer force of will. That was certainly happening. I'd experienced some settling and desperately wanted to maintain and deepen it, so I was working very hard with a definite element of craving.

What does craving do? It creates tightness. I found myself getting tight, but what's the key to concentration? Relaxation. I wasn't being relaxed at all.

During my daily interview with Sayadaw—he kept close tabs on my experience—I reported, "Sayadaw, I find myself striving." As a very experienced and knowledgeable meditation master, I expected him to offer three or four skillful suggestions to help me move out of striving.

He simply looked at me and said, "Don't do that."

That was good advice, though I had to return to my little hut and figure it out myself. What I discovered was that I needed to readjust my understanding of right effort. I saw that right effort couldn't be focused on achieving a particular result—it had to be focused solely on the immediate experience.

This became my understanding: if I'm seeking an outcome, it becomes striving. If I'm simply interested in the present experience, it's not striving. Right effort means directing attention to the present moment with interest and curiosity.

Feeling quite proud of this insight, I reported to Sayadaw the following day: "Sayadaw, I took your advice. I went back, investigated deeply, and came to a new understanding of right effort in this practice. It really helped eliminate the striving."

He said, "Too much thinking. Just stay here."

He dismissed all my investigation and said, "Just focus on the breath at the upper lip. That's all you're supposed to be doing."

This gave me a completely different approach to meditation than I'd known was possible. I took the advice, and it worked.

One crucial lesson from that instruction and experience was learning I could simply stay here even when hindrances arose. As a trained vipassana meditator, it was almost a religious conviction that when a hindrance emerged, I had to approach it with mindfulness. The RAIN acronym was deeply ingrained in my meditation habits, and I believed that failing to approach hindrances with RAIN meant I was truly failing the practice.

But Sayadaw said, "Just stay here."

I began experimenting with that approach when hindrances appeared, and I found I could actually do it. I could maintain attention here while letting the hindrance run its full course in the background. Thoughts, emotions, and body sensations would continue, but I didn't need to engage them. I could keep attention anchored here, and while the concentration didn't necessarily strengthen during the hindrance, it didn't weaken significantly either.

And so it became a whole other option for me in meditation—I didn't have to go to the hindrance. But I should say, this was after I had been meditating for probably twenty years in the vipassana tradition, and I was very familiar with how to work with hindrances. If someone tried to apply this instruction as a new meditator, very likely there would be a kind of aversion to the hindrance, using the breath as a way to get away from it. That would be a form of bypass that wouldn't be so helpful.

But I was familiar with what the hindrances were. I knew how to work with each of them. From that place of some confidence, I could leave them in the background. This is something we may talk about more when we get into awareness practice. Because sometimes in awareness practice, the wise thing with hindrances is to let them stay back and keep the focus on the chosen area, which is the awareness itself. So we may bring that in later. I mention it now so that it may be helpful later on.

Another thing the Buddha said about these two—samatha and vipassana—that I found really helpful: I had thought only insight could liberate us to any significant degree. My practice was always devoted to the development of wisdom, with concentration as support. Then there's this very short statement that I found fascinating in the discourses where the Buddha says samatha is for the abandoning of lusts, and vipassana is for the abandoning of ignorance.

So we're not totally liberated until ignorance is abandoned. That's why wisdom is necessary, vipassana is necessary. But if we could abandon lust—and this doesn't just mean sexual desire; the Buddha uses lust, the term raga, in a broader sense to mean any form of desire, usually sense desire—but if we use the tranquility we develop through concentration to let go of wanting, that is a form of liberation in itself. It's not thorough, it's not complete, it's not final, but it's a form of liberation. I found that really interesting and encouraging.

I want to close with some really practical guidance. We're moving into a different form of retreat over the next two days and more in the days after that. But I really hope you will all keep an eye on this factor of samadhi as the retreat moves on and keep nurturing it. The instructions will provide some support for samadhi. We'll make it very explicit what the support for samadhi is in the awareness practice. But there are ways you can also benefit the maintenance of samadhi in other very practical ways. So I'm just going to name a few.

You may have been practicing with these already during this retreat, and I hope you'll continue. One is to return with some regularity to your anchor. As we move into a more open practice, we often say space leads to spacing out. So as you open up and let go of the primary anchor, it's easier to become distracted. Keep an eye on that. When the distraction is getting bigger, don't hesitate to come back to your anchor and recollect. Continue your relationship with your anchor. Come back regularly and maintain that.

Using specific techniques with the breath can be really helpful. During this retreat, was there instruction in noting practice with the breath? No. Any instruction in counting? No. Both these little verbal additions can really help develop the quality of concentration. You may have used them in the past. Maybe something you want to refresh your connection with. They can be useful tools for strengthening the samadhi as we go forward with the breath.

The counting practice is not just for beginners. When I went to practice with Sayadaw U Pandita in Burma, he gave me the instruction to use counting. He told me to count breaths one to eight over and over and over. While I was with him, I did it in every sitting, and I found it was really helpful. It really did strengthen my continuity in the present moment. It let me know when I was drifting out. We're not going to teach that here, but if you've had prior experience and feel like picking it up, that's not bad.

The third principle, which I'm certain was discussed in the previous retreat, is the most important single element: maintaining continuity of mindfulness throughout the day. This means sustaining awareness through your sitting periods, walking meditation, meals, showers, service practice, and time in your room. The more you can strengthen this moment-to-moment presence, the more it will support the stability of tranquility.

I'm already witnessing this quality in our group through your natural inclination toward slowing down. When I arrived at the retreat, this was the first thing that struck me—how many people were moving slowly and mindfully. This quality truly communicates to others and preserves your stability of attention.

Another valuable practice is using the walking periods for formal walking meditation. This serves the cultivation of continuity. Often we discover that when the sitting ends, we suddenly remember we need to return to our room to wash socks. This takes us to the other side of the building, where we spend thirty minutes on this task. With only fifteen minutes remaining, we might think we don't need to walk and instead sit down to watch the sky.

If you haven't established the habit of maintaining continuity through formal walking, I encourage you to experiment with periods where you do a sitting, followed by a complete formal walking session, followed by another sit. Observe the impact this has on the continuity of your mindfulness through these three periods.

Guarding the sense doors provides another powerful support. Sometimes teachers interpret this as meaning "don't look"—approaching the dining hall while guarding the sense doors means avoiding looking around. However, this isn't what the Buddha intended. What he taught about guarding the sense doors is to remain careful of any reactive formations that arise when you're engaged with the senses.

For example, when you're looking, notice if wanting arises. Is there liking? Not wanting? Disliking? These reactive patterns are what we want to guard against. It's not about whether we look at one another, although we don't recommend making eye contact. Rather, as you're looking, observe what the mind is doing in response to what you see.

Another possibility you've likely been exploring already: as your practice becomes more energized and continuous, you may discover that physical energy increases, allowing you to extend your daily practice hours. This could mean rising a little earlier or staying up later. You might find you need less sleep than when you began the retreat. By extending the hours, mindfulness has greater opportunity to flourish.

These are all potential ways to continue strengthening the factor of concentration. I wouldn't mention these to beginning practitioners just arriving, as they can lead to striving. But since you've all already settled into the rhythm, these are subtle refinements. If something interests you, choose one element to explore. I wouldn't recommend implementing them all simultaneously, as that can become overwhelming. Select one, experiment with it, and see if it proves beneficial.

I believe this covers everything I wanted to share this evening. It's about 8:20, leaving forty minutes for walking meditation—the schedule you've maintained these past days. We'll offer longer Dharma talks once our retreat fully settles. For today, we'll conclude here.

There will be a sitting at nine o'clock with chanting. If you have the energy, please join us. We'll be chanting Imaya Dhammanu this evening. Feel free to join our choir.

Rest well, and we'll see you in the morning. Sign-ups for individual meetings with the teachers tomorrow will be posted after this sitting, so you can check the board if you're interested.

Have a blessed evening.

CHAPTER 187

Morning Instructions

> In this dharma talk from a retreat for experienced students, Guy Armstrong guides practitioners through the development of choiceless attention, a meditation technique refined by the great Burmese master Mahāsi Sayādaw. This approach represents a significant opening of the field of mindfulness, moving from focused breath awareness to whole-body breathing, then to sounds, and finally to complete openness where attention naturally moves from object to object without deliberate direction.
> Armstrong explains how this practice differs from more restrictive meditation techniques by allowing practitioners to be mindful of anything arising in experience - breath sensations, sounds, thoughts, emotions, or body sensations. The teacher emphasizes the particular value of this approach for laypeople, as nothing falls outside the scope of meditation practice, making it highly applicable to daily life. He introduces the distinction between attention (the spotlight quality that highlights objects) and awareness (the intelligent knowing quality), setting the foundation for deeper awareness practices to follow.
> The guided meditation progresses systematically from breath awareness to whole-body breathing, then incorporates sounds before opening to choiceless attention. Armstrong concludes by pointing toward awareness of awareness itself - noticing the wide extent of phenomena and the awareness that encompasses them. This session serves as preparation for the more advanced awareness practices that will unfold throughout the retreat.

Good morning, everyone.

I hope things are going along relatively smoothly for you, and I hope you're enjoying the spaciousness of a half-empty center. There's something quite nice about it. Maybe we should keep the retreats this size—though then we'd have a big budget deficit, and people wouldn't benefit.

You probably know that today is the opening day of the second retreat, so things will get busier later on. I'll talk about that more in the announcements. But we still have almost a full day to continue developing the stability you've been cultivating.

This morning in the instructions, we're going to continue opening up the field of mindfulness. Yesterday, Jaya spoke about extending from a small area of the breath to feeling breath in the whole body, and then allowing the attention to open wide to sounds. Unfortunately, that's when the fire alarm went off, so we hope that's not a curse for today.

Now we're going to extend into the whole field of what we call choiceless attention—a meditation technique that really allows us to be mindful of anything in our experience. This approach was developed by Mahasi Sayadaw, a great Burmese master of the last century. I think it's an outstanding approach to meditation because of its inclusiveness. Many other meditation techniques are more restricted in what they eventually allow us to pay attention to. Mahasi Sayadaw's instructions allow us to pay attention to anything in our experience and use that as a base for mindfulness.

This is so helpful for us as laypeople in carrying the practice back into our daily lives because nothing is outside the scope of our meditation.

Let me say a couple of words about choiceless attention. Some teachers call this choiceless awareness, but I think the proper term is choiceless attention because what we are going to do is unhook the attention from our anchor—which for many of you is the breath, or maybe body or sounds. We're going to unhook from whatever anchor that is and just open up to see what's here, then notice where the attention is drawn. We let wherever the attention lands become the new focus for meditation, the new focus for mindfulness.

I'm going to invite you right now—eyes open or closed, it doesn't really matter—to tune into this quality of attention in your immediate experience. Notice: with all the things present in this moment, does attention tend to stay with one thing all the time? Or by its natural inclination, is it moving from one to another to another?

I'll pause the speaking and let you examine the movement of attention in your experience.

Did anybody have an attention that didn't move? Even when we're being very close with the breath—when I'm being very close with the breath—I still notice my attention will make little darts off to body sensations or sounds, even in the middle of following two breaths.

This attention is a very active element that moves on its own for reasons that are conditioned, but not purely volitional. We're not choosing where the attention is drawn—it just goes there. This is why we call this choiceless. We're not directing the attention to an anchor or any part of the body or anything in particular. We're allowing it to go where it will go, and then making the mindfulness established there.

This is a beautiful practice. It brings in this sense of real openness and naturalness. It's also challenging because without an anchor that we come to again and again, it's easy to let thoughts come in and take us away. As you're practicing with choiceless attention, which we'll introduce in a few minutes, notice if it's leading to more distracting thoughts. That can be a helpful time to come back to your anchor. Restabilize the attention, and when you feel present again, allow the attention to open wider in this choiceless way.

You can probably see how this style of practice would lend itself to noting. As I was sitting in the quiet a few minutes ago, I would notice where my attention was landing: it went to seeing, then to body sensation, then to in-breath, then to sound, then to noticing a mood. All these elements of our experience can get touched on.

In Mahasi Sayadaw's instruction style, he would suggest putting a soft mental label that names where the attention is landing. It can be really simple—we don't want to get into a lot of thinking. Just as I went through: you could notice a sensation, notice a sound, notice an in-breath, notice calm, notice agitation, notice a thought. Whatever the experience is in the moment, we connect with that, become mindful of it, and if you find it helpful, you can name it. This isn't a noting retreat, so we're not emphasizing this, but you're encouraged to play with it if it might be of use.

This is one step along the way to the awareness practice that will unfold a little later. This opening and allowing all the sensations and phenomena to come in is on the way to the complete opening we'll be doing.

Let's begin the meditation practice.

Please sit comfortably and find in your posture the combination of uprightness and alertness, and also ease and relaxation and the groundedness of connection to the earth. Have a sense that the body can rest on the foundation of the sitting base, and the spine can express that upward movement of alertness.

As you settle into the experience of the body sitting, begin noticing the movement of breathing. You may notice at first where you've been with it for the last ten days. If it's like that, then take the time to let the attention settle and stabilize in that area where the breath is felt most clearly as a way of collecting and unifying the mind.

Then, as one step in the direction of opening the attention, allow it to expand to include the whole body: taking in the head, the shoulders and arms, the back...

The chest and belly. The hips and legs.

And now see if it's possible to feel the whole body as a connected unit. This is what we sometimes call taking the body posture as an anchor—just sitting, being mindful of the whole body in this posture. See if it feels comfortable to have opened the attention that far. If not, you're always free to return to the breath in a smaller area. Feel free to return to the anchor.

Now with this attention on the whole body, notice where you feel the impact of breathing throughout the body. When there's an in-breath, how far throughout the body can you feel the effect of breathing in? When there's an out-breath, how far throughout the body do you feel the impact of the out-breath?

In this kind of exploration of whole body breathing, it's most helpful if you have the sense of feeling the body from within, from inside. Sometimes in giving instructions for mindfulness of breathing, we might have the sense that there's an observer in the head looking out or down at where the breath is being felt. But in this meditation, it's more supportive if you can feel the whole body as a unit and then just feel each in-breath and out-breath. Some people express this as letting the mind drop into the body.

We don't need to force the breathing. If we just relax into the body, the breaths will happen by themselves.

Now taking the openness a little further by bringing the attention to sounds. At this point, let the attention become very wide, open, spacious. Just notice all the sounds that come and go—the sound of my voice, sounds of one another, hum of the machinery, sound of traffic, nature. There's no need to send the mind out in search of sounds, but rather if we rest within the body in the center of all sounds, then they're heard without any effort. It's like we're sitting in a concert hall with a very open and receptive attitude.

If this degree of openness is uncomfortable in any way, if you feel you're losing your ability to be present, then just come back to your anchor—breath or body. Let the attention become simpler and resettle. But if it's comfortable being with sounds in this wide, open, relaxed way, then we'll take it one step further and just ask: What else is here? What else can you notice within your experience right now?

Are there sensations connected with breathing? Other sensations in the body? Probably some coming and going of thoughts, which we just allow to arise and pass away. And some emotion or mood is here—could be restlessness, could be wanting, could be contentment, could be ease, could be aversion. Just notice that a mood or emotion is always present in some way, sometimes subtle, sometimes bigger.

Now we'll move into the formal meditation with choiceless attention. Start to notice in each new moment: of all the focuses, of all the phenomena in your experience, where is attention landing right now? Can you be mindful of that? Can you relate to that as a focus for meditation? In this new moment, where is the attention landing now? And now?

Is it possible to notice for each new moment what is being focused on with this spotlight quality that attention gives? What phenomenon is being highlighted?

As you begin to settle into this practice, it would be fine if you notice something every few seconds—every three, four, five seconds, a noticing of the attention. Sometimes it may stay with the same object over that period; that's fine. But as we make this noticing a little more frequent, we find it helps to steady the mind in the present moment and continues to build up the quality of concentration even though the object is changing.

Play with this and see if it's something that might be helpful as a step toward openness. If it feels too spacey, too ungrounded, anytime just return to your anchor. Restabilize until you're ready and interested to open again. If you find the mindfulness is not really steady in following the attention, then it can be a good time to return to your anchor and re-stabilize in the present.

In this last part of the sitting, we want to explore this openness from a little different angle. So once again, connect with this sense that the attention can be very broad, wide, open—openness to sounds, to the breath, other sensations.

In this last part of the sitting, we want to explore this openness from a little different angle. So once again, connect with this sense that the attention can be very broad, wide, open—openness to sounds, to the breath, other sensations, thoughts and emotions.

Have a sense of the width of all the phenomena in your experience. Sounds can be very far away and still heard without effort. Sensations are more immediate. Do you have a sense of how wide your experience is? And can you place the attention on noticing that? You could say the extent of phenomena. Just rest the attention in noticing that wideness.

Sometimes when the hall is quiet, we talk about noticing the extent of the silence. Can you notice the wide extent of phenomena and have a sense that the attention can rest in that noticing?

As you're noticing that wideness, then ask the question: Is there awareness there? In noticing the extent of phenomena, is awareness present? If the answer to that is yes, let the attention rest in noticing that awareness.

If you can, you can notice that this awareness—this wide awareness—includes all the phenomena of the senses, but it's not limited by them. It's wider than any one phenomenon. This is a step in knowing the awareness of awareness itself, and this is the direction we'll be heading in the next few days.

So if you find this approach helpful—either the choiceless attention or the extension to the wideness and the awareness—feel free to start bringing it into your meditations. If you find that the sense of space leads to spacing out, come back and reestablish the connection to the present with your primary anchor. Just bring it in a little bit at a time as it feels of interest and attractive to you.

We have a little time for questions. This morning we're going to do questions through the microphone so everyone can hear.

"Hi, thank you for the practice today. I have a question regarding the difference between awareness and attention."

This is a question about the difference between awareness and attention. In the next few days we're going to be introducing a lot of vocabulary that may be new for you in terms of meditation instructions, and this is an important one.

Attention is the factor of mind that highlights one of the objects of our experience, one of the elements. So it moves around—everybody has attention all the time when we're awake. It's always moving to something or other. In every moment, it's that settling or highlighting of one aspect of experience.

Awareness is a quality of knowing what's happening. There's an intelligence in the awareness that isn't there in the attention. Attention can be quite mechanical. Turtles have attention—they may notice seaweed, they may notice humans floating in the water, they may notice their babies. But that attention is just happening on its own. The awareness has an aspect of intelligence similar to mindfulness. We'll draw that out more.

"In this context, when thought arises, if there's awareness of thought, is it appropriate to see that as an object or is it better to drop it?"

The question is: when a thought arises, is it useful to see that as an object or just to drop it? It depends what meditation style you're practicing at the moment. If you're practicing in a samatha style, where you're intending to develop concentration through single-pointed focus like the breath, it's more helpful to just leave the thought in the background. You recognize the attention has gone there, but we don't go so far as to pick it up as a meditation object. You just notice it coming and passing through, but you're not interested.

"In this case, it's choiceless, so I'm not picking it up and I'm not..."

In the state of choiceless awareness, you want to notice it as a meditation object. You let it continue its course.

You allow it to continue its course, and you're just aware of it, and that's okay. Yes, you allow it to continue its course, but often the influence of mindful attention on a thought will mean it has a shorter lifetime.

One of the powers of bringing mindfulness to the area of thinking is that when we notice a thought, it tends to get a little more shy and wants to run away because it's embarrassed at being seen. It's like when there are cockroaches in your kitchen and you turn on a light—they run for the corners. Thoughts are a little bit like that.

But yes, in choiceless attention, you want to notice the thought and make it a focus for mindfulness, which means, as Sally was using the word last night, we connect the attention to it with mindfulness. We sustain it for the duration of the thought. And when the thought passes, the attention is unhooked and free to move on to the next focus.

I think that's all we have time for in terms of questions because we have many announcements this morning.

Today will be an interesting day. We have about fifty people arriving this afternoon who will join you this evening. As Sally said, we are all going to regard them with great openness, metta, and affection. That's our practice for today. It may be a little bumpy at times.

The schedule is getting complicated today because of the two groups. Just as it was a little complicated on closing day, it's going to be a little complicated today. Let me walk through the morning and afternoon schedules.

This morning we're starting the practice meetings with you all. We're beginning with group practice meetings, and today we'll see about two-thirds of you. That list is on the board, so please check to see if you're being seen today. If we don't meet with you today, we will meet with you tomorrow. After that, the rotation will be that we'll meet with the new yogis on the next day, and then we begin individual practice meetings the day after that. So each of you in this period of time will have one group meeting and two individual practice meetings as this retreat unfolds. We're starting with the groups today and tomorrow for all of you, so please check the board.

This afternoon's schedule is where it gets a little complicated. There will be the usual sits at 2:00 and 3:30, and the practice leaders for those sits will be as normal. Then at 2:45, we have to do a sound check. The teachers have to do a sound check in here for the online version of the event. So at 2:45, it's going to get a little noisy in here. We'll be mumbling things into the microphone so the online people can check our sound. I would suggest walking at 2:45 today.

At 3:30, there will be a sitting—a silent sitting. We're asking the managers to communicate to the incoming yogis to bring their belongings into the hall during walking periods only. So during the 2:45 walking and the 4:15 walking, the new people may be coming in to put their things down on a spot. If you normally sit during those times, just know that it could be a little bit noisy. But there shouldn't be talking, though there may be a little traffic. During the sits at 2:00 and 3:30, those should be quiet.

Then dinner. The way the schedule is set up, you all will be having dinner from 5:00 to 5:30, and it will be in silence. Hopefully that will protect you over the mealtime. At 5:30, the arriving yogis are welcome to have their dinner, and that will be talking. So I would encourage you to eat quickly and get out, keeping things as silent as possible. The meditation hall will always be in silence, apart from the sound check, so this is always a good refuge.

At 6:30, there is a scheduled sitting, and there will be a practice leader in here, but the sitting will be short—only twenty minutes, so the bell should be rung at 6:50. Then you have a walking period because the course opening manager's talk is going to happen in here at 7:00.

One of the blessings of being a continuing yogi is that you don't have to attend the opening manager's talk. You already know the territory—you're already living it. But there is one piece I do want to mention: if you happen to have reclaimed your cell phone after renouncing it at the beginning of the last retreat, there will be another opportunity for renunciation tomorrow morning, Wednesday. I think you get double the merit for renouncing it twice, which has great appeal.

Tomorrow morning we'll have a cell phone renunciation ceremony during the morning sit. You're welcome to participate. There will be pouches again, and you're invited to label your device, place it in one of the pouches, and the managers will collect them for safekeeping.

There is an affinity sit this evening—please check the board to confirm which group. The affinity sit will happen with a flexible ending time, and everyone will reconvene here at 7:20 for the retreat opening, which is marked on the schedule.

So the flow will be: at 6:30 there's a sitting for those in the hall, followed by a walking period. Those attending the affinity sit can stagger your timing and return here at 7:20 when we'll all be together for the course opening. There will not be a late-night guided sit tonight since the opening may continue until close to 9:00. After sitting for an hour and forty minutes, we're not asking you to sit from 9:00 to 9:30—you're on your own after that. If you still have energy at 9:00, you could do walking practice or return for more sitting, but the formal schedule today ends at 9:00.

Any questions on logistics? It's a lot for me to keep in mind, so I can imagine it's challenging for you as well. Check the notice board—everything is posted on the schedule.

Finally, I want to offer a fuller introduction to Christina, whom we're very happy to have with us. This is Christina Barre. She lives in Canada but teaches often in the States. Sally and I have known her for years, both as a yogi and student, and she brings many wonderful qualities to the teaching role. She completed her four-year teacher training this year, guided by Marcia Rose, Sally, and myself. She is now a full teacher and works in that capacity at retreats at Spirit Rock and elsewhere.

We're delighted that she's agreed to join us as an assistant. It's somewhat of a drop in her pay grade, but she's interested in this material, so it's an opportunity for her to both learn and serve. Once the new retreat opens fully, she will sit in on our interviews from time to time and will offer sign-up interviews, generally in the afternoons, beginning tomorrow. Any of you are welcome to sign up. Christina will also be teaching, probably offering a couple of the Brahma Viharas later in the week, so you'll hear her expression and get to know her better that way.

Christina, thank you for joining us. We're truly happy to have you.

So we're at 9:30, time for walking. I hope you have a very rich day and can stay stabilized, finding your way amidst all the comings and goings. This is a good kind of day, especially in the afternoon, to practice in your room or outside—to remove yourself. You know the value of seclusion. The Buddha said there are these roots of trees, there are these empty huts. That's the kind of day this can be—a roots of trees kind of day.

So please practice well, and we'll all return to silence this evening at 7:00.

So be well, and we'll see some of you in interviews soon. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 188

The Nature of Awareness, Part 1

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this foundational dharma talk, Guy Armstrong begins an exploration of awareness practice for experienced vipassanā meditators. Drawing from the Buddha's teaching on totality—the six sense doors and their objects—he explains how consciousness (viññāṇa) functions as the knowing faculty that reveals all sense experience. Armstrong distinguishes between standard vipassanā practice focused on objects and awareness practice focused on consciousness itself, explaining how consciousness lacks vedanā (feeling tone) and thus freedom from the reactive patterns of greed, aversion, and delusion.
> The talk explores consciousness as the fifth aggregate and references the Suññatā Sutta (MN 121) where the Buddha gives direct instructions for mindfulness of consciousness. Armstrong draws on teachings from Ajahn Chah, Upāsikā Kee, and other masters to illustrate how awareness practice offers an "inward staying, unentangled knowing" that includes all phenomena without getting caught in their pleasant or unpleasant aspects. He addresses the subtlety of this practice, comparing consciousness to a mirror that reflects without preference, and explores the relationship between awareness and emptiness (suññatā), showing how this practice naturally leads to insight into anattā (not-self).

Are you ready for a ride? I hope so, because tonight we are making the transition into the awareness part of the retreat. Often these are new kinds of instructions for Vipassana meditators, even seasoned Vipassana meditators. So it may be unfamiliar territory and a little bit of an adventure. But I hope you will take it in the spirit of exploration.

There's a new land that we can explore for some of you. Some of you are familiar, but it'll be a new land for some. And there aren't crocodiles, there aren't alligators or tigers, so it's a safe place. But the best way to approach it is with a spirit of some playfulness. One of the reasons is it's always good not to be too serious in a new style of meditation. The second is it's not possible to be super precise about awareness. It's a big field and it's largely an opening to a mystery. And we're not going to solve the mystery tonight or maybe thoroughly ever in our practice. So have a sense of just open inquiry and exploration, please. And if there are things that don't connect, try and let them just wash over.

We talked about this a little bit a few days ago in the middle of the transition into this retreat, but I'd like to review it right now with everyone. You're sitting here. Let's say your eyes are open. They don't have to be, but let's say your eyes are open. And I want to ask you to look at your experience just in this moment and see what's here. Sally pointed to this a bit this morning in the meditation on choiceless attention.

What's present in your experience right now in kind of general categories? If we want to look at a list of what we might pay attention to, what things should we put on that list? So if your eyes are open, there are sights. If your ears are working, there are sounds. You have a body, so I'm assuming there are sensations. If you're practicing eight precepts, there might not be much of a taste. If you weren't, there might be a little taste from dinner. There could be a smell. There's not much of a smell in this room, but there could be. There are thoughts and there's some mood, right? Might be background, might be a strong emotion. Some kind of emotional tone in the mind.

Is that pretty much it? That's pretty much what's here, right? Does it ever change very much from that? That's kind of it, isn't it? All this fuss about what we call life comes down to these six things. Sight, sound, smell, taste, sensations, thoughts and emotions, which we'll pair them as mind objects. They're only ever these six things happening. And that's what all the fuss is about.

So the Buddha pointed to this really directly. There's this wonderful discourse he called the discourse on totality. And he said, what is the totality of things? Listen, attend carefully, and I will teach you the totality. That's a pretty strong statement. You know, Einstein never said that. Freud never claimed that. Marx never claimed that. And here's the Buddha 2600 years ago: get ready, here's the totality.

It is simply the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and sensations, the mind and mind objects—thoughts and feelings. If anyone were to proclaim a totality beyond this, that person would be speaking of something outside their knowledge. So this is kind of it.

But I want to point out a little wrinkle in the Buddha's statement, a little different from what we were talking about. We were identifying what's here as sight, sound, smell, taste, sensations, thoughts, and emotions. But the Buddha put something else in this list. He put in the eye, the ear, the nose, the tongue, the body, and the mind. You have a sense of why he might have done that?

How would this read differently? How would this feel differently if what he said is the totality is sight, sound, smell, taste, sensations, and mind objects? Would there be something missing for you in that understanding?

Yes, because it requires sense bases to generate those things. If the Buddha had expressed it that way—as just these six things—we would think they're not dependently arisen. They're just kind of there all the time. But by including the sense organs, he's showing that all the phenomena of our experience depend on us having these six sense organs. And that depends on us being in a body.

So he's really showing the link between the body, the sense organs, and our experience. This is a really crucial part of the teachings. We wouldn't be having these experiences if we weren't in a body with functioning organs.

Let's look at a simple example included in this framework: the ear and sounds. There's a sound. I'm going to assume that you have a working ear, and so you could hear that sound. The ear and sound are a pair. And now I want to ask, does the mind play any role in that experience?

If your mind was turned off, would you be having that experience? No. So the mind is right there with it. This is the third piece. If the mind wasn't there, we wouldn't be hearing that sound. There is something in the mind-body relationship—the mind needs to be present for us to experience.

There's one particular aspect of mind that lets this happen. In the Buddha's language it's called vijñāna, and the translation we use is consciousness. So we are conscious beings, we are sentient beings, and that means we can have experiences based on our senses. As we explore awareness, we're really exploring consciousness.

The way that we use awareness in this retreat is more or less synonymous with consciousness. Now some teachers use awareness to be synonymous more with mindfulness. If you followed the teachings of Sayadaw U Tejaniya from Burma, who has a book called "Awareness Alone is Not Enough," he uses awareness more to mean mindfulness, sati.

But in this retreat, we're going to use it more or less as a synonym for consciousness. So we're going to introduce new vocabulary over this week. But of all the terms we introduce, the most important one is consciousness, vijñāna, the way the Buddha understood it. If you can get a sense for what this consciousness is and what it does, that will really steer you in the right direction to awareness because they're almost synonyms.

A little bit more about this controversy: Should awareness mean mindfulness or should it mean consciousness? Different teachers have different opinions. We're going to use it as consciousness.

You can see how this separation comes about, because the English word "aware" is a very rich word. Like if I asked you, "Were you aware of the thunder last night?" And you'd heard it, you'd say yes. And I'm really just saying, "Did you hear it?" Were you conscious of the thunder? Yeah, I heard the thunder, I was conscious of it.

But if I ask you, "When you spoke to me this morning, were you aware of your motivation in speaking?" Then this becomes more like mindfulness. Are you tuned into the intention, the feeling, the emotion that was behind your speech? That's more like mindfulness.

So awareness in English can go in both directions. And the difficulty is there's no Pali word that needs to be translated as awareness.

And that's why we can make up whatever meaning we want. Some people make up the meaning of mindfulness, and we're going to make up the meaning of consciousness. So just so that part is clear, we're not using awareness to mean mindfulness.

Consciousness is the single most important term that we're going to introduce. It may be new vocabulary for some. This term vijñāna is pretty central in the Buddha's teachings. It's the fifth aggregate. The five aggregates are a way of describing the makeup of a human being. Basically, there's a body, there's feeling tone, there are perceptions, there are mental formations—again, thoughts and emotions—and there's consciousness. That's what makes up a human being. It's like the description from the totality of the six senses, but organized a little differently. It covers the same territory, organized a little differently.

The five aggregates are intended to describe what a human being is. If you thought you were actually a person, no. You're really five aggregates. And there are these beautiful stories about Mara—you know who Mara is? He's sort of the tempter who comes and tries to lead good meditators off the path in the Pali Canon. Mara is coming a lot to the bhikkhunīs at the time, the nuns, hardcore practitioners. And he's trying to get them to think of themselves as persons. And they go, "No, Mara, there's no person here. There's only the five aggregates." And Mara goes, "Oh, the bhikkhunī knows me." And Mara slinks away defeated by the bhikkhunī's wisdom.

So the fifth of the aggregates is consciousness. It's a really integral part of what makes a human being. In fact, if you think about the three most fundamental things in being a human being, there's a body, there's consciousness, and there are emotions. In the Abhidhamma, the classification is more threefold. Rather than five, they kind of combine feeling and perception into mental activity. But these are the three fundamental parts.

It's interesting—you can look at yourself and you can look at friends or fellow yogis and think, "I'm not seeing a person. I'm seeing a form. I'm getting a sense of their emotional activity. And I see their consciousness." That's what's real. This assumption of selfhood is like the assumption of personhood. When we want to see clearly, we see this makeup, and consciousness is a central ingredient. We're conscious.

The Buddha talked about this in many discourses, but here's a simple example. This is from a famous discourse in the middle-length sayings called the Honeyball: "Dependent on the eye and visible forms, eye consciousness arises. The meeting of the three is called contact." This is what gives rise to a moment of experience. A visible form, the eye is working, and eye consciousness arises. In the Pali Canon, when the Buddha talked about vijñāna, he usually used it to mean one thing: sense object known through one sense organ. So the visible form known through the eye with eye consciousness. We'll talk about that and then we'll expand it.

Do you get a sense of what this consciousness thing does? One of the ways to think about it is the use of the term unconscious. And I don't mean in the Jungian collective sense, but I mean when we go through periods where we're not conscious, what's that like? I think about things like—reflect on your own experience—deep sleep, if you've ever fainted, if you've ever been in a coma, which hopefully you haven't, or if you've ever been under general anesthesia for a surgical procedure.

Do you have any clear memories of those times? Do you remember what it was like to be in deep sleep? Remember what it was like to be under general anesthesia? No, there's kind of nothing there, right? As far as we know, that unconsciousness means there was no activity. Or another way I would say it is there was nothing happening for us. I mean the body was still going, but the mind was not checked in as far as we know.

No trace of the mind being checked in. And that's the factor of unconsciousness.

So consciousness is when things are happening. Consciousness is the faculty we all have that allows stuff to happen. And that's all that it is. Consciousness allows stuff to happen in our experience. You might say it illuminates our experience, it brings it forth, it reveals it, it shows the world to us because we're conscious.

This is a very specific meaning of consciousness in the Buddha's language—vijñāna. It's not about consciousness raising. It's not about having a friend who has a really evolved consciousness. No. It's just that we're conscious of sights and sounds and smells and tastes and touch and mind objects. It's really simple. It's really basic. There's not even any particular intelligence in it.

Turtles are conscious. Flies are conscious. Mosquitoes are conscious. They have to be or they couldn't find their food. So it's really simple and it's not particularly intelligent.

This mental aspect of vijñāna is there with everything we experience. It's what brings our experience to light, what makes things happen in our world. Consciousness expresses as knowing stuff—not conceptual knowing, but knowing the elements of our sense experience. That's what it does. That's its activity. That's what we all have. And all sentient creatures have this.

In this retreat, the aim is to explore this element of consciousness. That's what we're after. We want to understand how it is in our experience. This is not an intellectual description from a neuroscience point of view of how it arises or anything like that. It's experiential—how does it feel? That's what we're going to explore through the awareness practice, using awareness more or less as a synonym for consciousness. And I'll get to the detail of that in a minute.

Consciousness is really subtle. I have a friend who practiced in Burma for years, intensive practice for a couple of years straight with Sayadaw U Pandita. At one point he'd been doing vipassana and then he'd done metta and concentration and all that. Then Sayadaw U Pandita gave him the instruction to practice with the blue kasina for concentration. It's one of the standard concentration objects.

The instruction was: first you get a blue disc to sit in front of, and the color blue kind of imprints on your mind. Then his meditation instruction all day long was visualize blue. That was it. Would you like to do that practice? That's a kind of bare practice. That was his instruction—visualize blue all day long. That's pretty subtle.

Consciousness is even more subtle than that. So as we get into it, it's so subtle that sometimes it's elusive as a meditation focus. It's always happening, but sometimes it's elusive to connect with.

You probably know the story that after the Buddha's enlightenment, he was debating whether to teach or not. And he was inclined not to teach. The reason was, he said, "This Dhamma that I have discovered is profound, subtle, and difficult to understand. So I don't think anybody will get it, so I'm not going to bother."

Thankfully, a deva came down and said, "Please, there will be people who understand." And so the Buddha said, "Okay, I'll teach." Thank goodness.

It was a close call, and we're still benefiting.

So this Dhamma that he discovered is profound, subtle, and difficult to understand. This talk tonight—I'm not going to claim it's profound or subtle, but it may be difficult to understand. So if it is, don't worry. We have a whole week for this exploration. You don't have to get it all tonight. And we're going to do meditations tomorrow morning that will give a way into the experience, hopefully a clearer way into the experience.

So tonight what I want to do is lay a conceptual foundation for what we're going to be exploring through the meditation.

Awareness, I said, is synonymous with consciousness, but consciousness is just the knowing of one sense object, like consciousness of a sound, or in this moment if your eyes are open, consciousness of the sight that you're seeing.

But I want you to open your attention up right now, in the way that Sally was instructing us this morning, in a wide way. Can you feel that as attention opens up, it can include sound, can include seeing, can include body sensations, can include thoughts, and can include your mood? Can you have a sense that all that can be in your broad—we'll call it awareness?

These things, in our experience, don't just show up one sense door at a time, right? As I'm speaking, can you feel your body? As I'm speaking, can you see the statue behind me? So our immediate experience is that these can all be present in a moment—sights and sounds and sensations, thoughts, emotions.

We're going to use the term awareness for the consciousness that opens to all these things in a broad space. So consciousness is just one sense object in one moment. Awareness is this broad field that everything can happen in. Can you get a sense of that? Good. And again, we'll bring it out more in the meditation tomorrow.

A sense consciousness, just connected to one thing, will arise when the sound arises, and when the sound passes, that sense consciousness will be gone. Clearly impermanent. But awareness has this quality—I think Sally may have pointed to this—always there. Somehow this big field in which things keep showing up, always there.

So it's not immediately obvious that this awareness field is subject to coming and going. That's part of the exploration that is interesting. Because in the Pali Canon, there's only one element that's not subject to coming and going: Nirvana, the unconditioned. It's the only thing the Buddha talked about that is beyond impermanence.

This makes an interesting possible connection. The awareness isn't coming and going. Nibbana isn't coming and going. Are they related? Not going there tonight, but it's part of the exploration. I hope you get interested in questions like this, because Nibbana is a transformative element in a meditator's experience. It's the single most transformative element. This is what enlightenment is based on. And when there is the direct realization of Nibbana, the mind is purified in a way that doesn't happen through any other cause.

So this question of nibbana, the unconditioned element, is a really important one in the field of meditation in the teachings of the Buddha.

What we're going to practice is looking at consciousness itself, or awareness itself—more or less the same.

Can mindfulness relate to anything in our experience? If it's in your experience, is it possible to be mindful of it? When the Buddha laid out the four foundations of mindfulness, every part of our experience is included in that. So then the question is, can we be mindful of consciousness? Can consciousness come under the umbrella of mindfulness?

And did the Buddha tell us to do this? Or are we just importing some sort of fanciful ideas from Vedanta or Tibetan traditions? Are we just sneaking in stuff that really isn't part of the Buddha's lineage? We're not.

Because in the Four Foundations of Mindfulness, in the fourth foundation—the dhammas—the Buddha gave us clear instructions to be mindful of all five aggregates. So there's the clear instruction to be mindful of consciousness within the Four Foundations of Mindfulness.

And there are even clearer meditation instructions in one of the discourses in the Middle Length Sayings. It's Majjhima Nikaya 121, the lesser discourse on emptiness. In it, the Buddha gives very clear instructions on how to approach mindfulness of consciousness. It's clear that this is what the sutta is aiming at. We're going to do a simplified version of that tomorrow morning in the meditation.

So we have these two places in the Pali Canon where the instruction is definitely to pay attention with mindfulness to the experience of consciousness. The Buddha told us to do it. It may not be easy, but this is what we're going to embark on for this week.

Why? Why should we bother? I'm quite happy with the breath. If I get tired of the breath, I can go to choiceless attention, I can connect with everything in the universe. What's the problem? Why would I want to look at consciousness, or as we're calling it, awareness?

The question I would ask in response is: Is there any limitation in a meditation focused on objects? Is there anything that might be less than ideal when our meditation focus—the focus of mindfulness—is sense objects?

Basically, even in choiceless attention, we are coming quite close in contact with all the sense objects of our experience. Certainly in mindfulness of breathing, we're very intimate with the breath. And even as we expand that to the other senses through choiceless attention, we're coming very close, really connecting with each of the new arisings that is part of our experience. So we're close to objects.

Is there any downside to that? Are objects always pleasant? Are sensations always pleasant? Are thoughts always pleasant? Are emotions always pleasant? No. And yet our meditation is about getting very close to all those experiences. That's what standard vipassana does.

The standard vipassana instructions, as I feel them, always involve us with pleasant and unpleasant aspects of our experience. And if you know something about the Buddhist teachings, this element of pleasant-unpleasant is called the feeling tone, or vedana—the second foundation of mindfulness, and an important link in the chain of dependent origination.

If the experience is pleasant, the mind has a habitual reaction to it, which is to hold on. If the experience is unpleasant, the mind has a habitual reaction, which is to push away. If the experience is neither pleasant nor unpleasant—neutral, in shorthand—the mind has another tendency which is "who cares?" So it's delusion. It doesn't connect. It doesn't take the pain to connect with neutral experience, because it's not going to bring joy and it's not going to bring pain. I can overlook it. And we do that with people in our lives as well as sense phenomena. Somebody's not important to us? Why bother?

These are the reactive formations of the kilesas: greed, aversion, and delusion. As we get closely connected with sense objects, we are closely connected with feeling tone, which is the basis for the reactive formations.

The interesting thing about consciousness, if we take it as a meditation focus—I don't want to call it an object because it's not a thing, but it can be a focus—is that it doesn't have feeling tone. Consciousness does not have the quality of vedana. You can't even say that it has neutral vedana. It just doesn't have vedana. That's not part of its makeup.

Why is that? Because consciousness doesn't have a flavor of its own. It reveals the flavor of every element that it knows or presents, and it itself doesn't bring anything to it. It's like clear water.

You can put lime juice in clear water—it tastes like lime. You can put tomato juice in clear water—it tastes like tomato. You could put gasoline in clear water—it tastes like gasoline. Don't! Because clear water doesn't really have flavor. It'll take on any flavor, but it doesn't have its own flavor. Consciousness is the same. It doesn't have its own flavor, but it will pick up the flavor of whatever is in front of it.

The way consciousness works is like a mirror. It simply reflects what's there. If something beautiful comes in front of a mirror, it will reflect that. If something unattractive comes in front of a mirror, it will reflect that. The mirror doesn't care—it has no preference. The mirror itself doesn't have a feeling tone; it will just reflect whatever is brought to it. Consciousness is the same.

If we can establish a connection to consciousness, we have stepped out of the whole realm of feeling tone into something that's free of that. In being free of that, we are free of the reactive formations. That's the power of awareness practice. That's the potential freedom in finding the ability to connect to awareness in your direct experience. And again, this is not an intellectual exercise. This is something you can feel for yourself, and the freeing nature of it you can feel for yourself. This is what the exploration is intended to reveal.

We step out of the area of feeling tone and the grasping aversion that goes along with it, but we're not cut off because awareness includes all the arisings. We're not cutting them off. We're just putting our focus somewhere else—somewhere that's not caught up with greed, aversion, and delusion. And that's the freedom of it.

If we need to relate to something beautiful or something unattractive, we can do that. We can switch our focus from awareness to the object. We can relate to hindrances. We can relate to the beautiful sunset. We can relate to people. No problem. We just move out of that focus and back into the focus on our direct experience. We can go back and forth easily. So we're not cut off. This is not a way of withdrawing from the world. But it is a way of withdrawing from entanglement with the world. That's the promise of this practice.

I want to read a quote from one of my favorite Dhamma books of the last few years. It's called Pure and Simple from a Thai laywoman teacher named Upasaka Kee. She taught from the 1950s well into the second half of the last century, and her teachings have been collected into this book. They're really wonderful, straight and deep Dhamma teachings, so highly recommended.

This is a quote from Upasaka Kee. She's talking also about this tuning into awareness: "The mind that's aware of awareness doesn't send its knowing outside this awareness. In other words, an inward staying, unentangled knowing, all outward going knowing cast aside."

I'm going to read that again because there's a lot in here. The mind that's aware of awareness—so you've taken awareness, taken consciousness as a focus, being mindful of consciousness, mindful of awareness—doesn't send its knowing outside this awareness.

In other words, you stay connected there. All the phenomena of the world are coming and going, but you don't get involved in them. You know them, you're not cut off, you can connect if you need to, but from a meditation point of view, you don't have to. You know they're there, and you can rest in this awareness.

Doesn't send its knowing outside, meaning it doesn't go to objects. In other words, an inward staying, unentangled knowing. When we stay with the awareness, we aren't getting entangled in the sense phenomena that through their pleasant and unpleasant aspects bring about greed, aversion, and delusion. So we found a place of relative freedom. An inward staying, unentangled knowing. All outward going knowing cast aside.

Here outward going also includes things like body and thoughts and emotions. Even though those seem very inner, the way that Upasaka Ki is using them, they're taking the attention out of awareness back into the realm of sense objects. You get a sense of this? An inward staying, unentangled knowing. This is the promise of the awareness practice. This is where it can take us.

Now I want to explore this consciousness a bit more. We want to get in touch with awareness, but it's a little tricky because it is very subtle. So right now I'd like to ask you, can you feel one in-breath? Just drop into your body wherever you've established a good relationship with the breath. Can you feel one in-breath? And one out-breath?

And now I'd like to ask the question, in this moment, are you aware? And this aware can be bigger than one in-breath. Can you connect with that sense of being aware right now? If you ask yourself that question in the middle of a meditation, sometimes it can make a little shift. Oh, I'm aware. It's kind of opening to the wideness of it. You can play with that.

Sometimes it's not so easy to connect with or find this awareness. And why is that? Because awareness is what's holding the objects. So just like the hand can hold this striker, this hand can hold this glass, this hand can hold the paper, but the hand can't hold itself. In the same way, consciousness can know all the different objects, but it can't grasp itself. First, because consciousness is not an object like the other objects that we can simply pick up. And second, because it is very subtle. So it's a little hard to locate, but are you confident that you have consciousness? I hope so. So it is here, it's active, it's functioning, and we can't quite grasp it.

Ajahn Chah talked about awareness quite a bit. When I think back over the history of IMS and Spirit Rock and the lineages that are still active and embodied in our retreats here, there are two Asian masters who for me stand out above all the others. That's Mahasi Sayadaw from Burma, whom we talked about a little bit with Choiceless Attention—he developed that technique. And the other is Ajahn Chah from Thailand, great master of the last century. Both of them created, through their students and their followers, probably hundreds of monasteries and retreat centers. I would say this center would not be here if it weren't for Mahasi Sayadaw and Ajahn Chah, both.

Interestingly, both of them came and led retreats here in 1979. It was so extraordinary that we had both of them in the same year. Mahasi Sayadaw was first in the spring, and then Ajahn Chah came in the summer. They knew of each other, I doubt they ever met, and their approaches were quite different. So Mahasi Sayadaw was the one who developed choiceless attention and also the very slow walking style. I'm sure you all have either practiced it or seen it—the style of lifting, moving, placing in walking meditation. It's a real support for developing strong samadhi, which is why he taught it that way. But Ajahn Chah's approach was really different.

He encouraged people to live a simple life in the forest and let mindfulness grow gradually through lifestyle, connection with the Sangha, and simplicity. It was a very different approach.

When Ajahn Chah came here for his first and only visit, there were many students who had practiced in the Mahasi Sayadaw tradition. In the afternoons, they would be out on the front lawn practicing the slow walking meditation—lifting, moving, placing, lifting, moving, placing. This was not a practice you would see in Ajahn Chah's monasteries, where the emphasis was on being natural, though being natural for a long time in the monastery setting.

Ajahn Chah would go out in the afternoon and walk around. He'd approach people doing this formal walking practice and say something to them in Thai. Then he'd walk on, and at another spot, he'd approach another meditator and say something in Thai. In the evening, people asked Jack Kornfield, who was translating for him, what Ajahn Chah was saying when he went up to the walking meditators. Jack said Ajahn Chah was telling them, "I hope you get well soon."

That's probably what this center looks like to people driving by from the town of Barre—what kind of asylum are these people running?

Ajahn Chah's practice was very deep. You may know he spent seven years wandering alone in the forests of northeast Thailand. That's where his teaching came from—that depth of practice and understanding. He came and shared that wisdom, spawning so many great disciples. The lineage continues today, including Jaya, who is a descendant of Ajahn Chah's teachings.

Regarding awareness and how difficult it is to find, Ajahn Chah said, "You're riding on a horse and asking, 'Where's the horse?'" Because it's right here. There's nothing more fundamental than awareness. It's right here.

This is from Ajahn Sumedho, a chief Western disciple of Ajahn Chah: "It's just like the question, can you see your own eyes? Nobody can see their own eyes. I can see your eyes, but I can't see my eyes. I'm sitting right here with two eyes, and I can't see them. You can see my eyes, but I cannot. Looking in a mirror, I can see a reflection, but that's not my eyes—it's a reflection of my eyes. But there's no need for me to see my eyes because I can see. It's ridiculous, isn't it? If I started saying, 'Why can't I see my own eyes?' you'd think Ajahn Sumedho is really weird."

It's similar with awareness or consciousness. It can't grasp itself, but we know it through its functioning. It's always revealing things to us, so we know it's here. How do we find it? That becomes the puzzle, the exploration.

There's another quote I really appreciate along these lines. There was a writer who lived in Hong Kong, an Englishman named Terence Gray. He'd obviously been deeply influenced by Zen or Chan—probably Chan. He wrote several books consisting mostly of pithy aphorisms, very direct Zen-like pointers. It was clear he had some kind of insight, realization, understanding, which he expressed through these aphorisms.

Interestingly, he wrote under the pen name Wei Wu Wei, which in Chinese means "acting without acting" or "doing through non-doing"—a profound philosophical point in both Taoism and Zen.

Here's his instruction regarding our question: "What we are looking for is what is looking."

That's it. What we are looking for is what is looking.

At first, when I read that, it just sounded like a paradox. I thought, "Well, that's never going to work." But then I simplified it into a single meditation instruction or pointing. I would just drop the phrase into my meditation: "What is looking?"

And that became very powerful for me because it just put me immediately in touch with this quality of awareness. So we may drop this in to a sitting. You're also welcome to play with it. What is looking? Boom.

So this awareness or consciousness really is the knowing of the sense experience. That's what consciousness does. It knows sense objects in the simplest possible way. It's like, the consciousness is just awareness, and then thought comes in and says, "That's a bell," or "That's a C sharp," or "That's the bell to end the meditation"—but that's conceptual. The awareness is before any thoughts come in, before you've recognized it as a bell or anything. That's what consciousness is revealing: these bare, simple elements of our sense experience.

So Joseph Goldstein has played around with this stuff a lot. And you know how when you're doing walking meditation, it's probably happened to you—it's certainly happened to me—there's often a sense that there's an observer up in the head looking down at the sensations in the feet and legs. And that's kind of how we track the lifting, moving, placing. So there's a very dualistic setup: observer here, sensations down there.

That observer up there is totally unnecessary. And the thing is that it can create a kind of tension. The maintenance of the observer is extra. There's not really any observer there. There's observing, but there's no one there. And so Joseph found that he could short-circuit that kind of duality with the phrase, "Sensations are being known."

So you're just walking, feeling the sensations in the feet and legs, and you just drop in the phrase, "Sensations being known." And then they're just arising in space, not distant from the eyes. The eyes don't need to see it. Just sensations arising in space.

So "sensations being known" can be really helpful. The passive voice is kind of what does it. It takes the doer out of that situation. Try this in walking. Play with it: "Sensations being known." See if you like it.

This passive voice is kind of interesting in other settings too. We could take an action like this: "The bell is being struck." Then we could ask, "Struck by what?" Struck by the striker. We could say "The paper is being cut." Cut by what? Cut by the scissors. And then we could say "The face is being stroked." Stroked by what? Stroked by the hand.

Then we could try "Sensations are being known." Known by what? Could you feel a shift from asking that? What is doing the knowing? Investigate.

So the first answer that comes usually when I ask that question in a smaller group is consciousness: known by consciousness. But the way I understand it, consciousness is the knowing. Consciousness is the activity that reveals. If consciousness is doing the knowing in the simplest way, then you say "known by what," or you could say "conscious by what"—is there something more fundamental than consciousness that's underlying it, giving rise to consciousness?

That's a little bit of a stretch, right? But some Buddhist traditions have said yes, there's something more fundamental than consciousness that gives rise to this impermanent sense consciousness. Something more ongoing.

You know how awareness always seems to be there? Maybe there's something more ongoing, not subject to arising and passing, that is doing the knowing, that is giving rise to consciousness. We'll explore this a little bit in another talk. But I find this a fascinating question of metaphysics—what's really here? What's here in the depths? So we'll talk about that, just as another way to play.

I like this question for a couple of reasons. One, if you felt a little bit of a shift when you asked that question, what it indicates to me is the power of curiosity. It's just wonderful when we don't know something but we want to find out in our direct experience. It kind of brings all the mental energy and interest right together in the moment, and that's a powerful force in the mind. When you really want to know something with all your heart, I've seen that the mind has a way of finding out. If you keep watering that question, watering that inquiry...

And then the other thing is that asking a question like that puts the mind into a very right place for insight. The interest is there, the humility is there to say, "I don't know, but I'd like to know."

There was this wonderful Zen teacher from Korea named Seung Sahn Sunim who established a center in Providence, Rhode Island and developed a lot of disciples and teaching. I think Jon Kabat-Zinn from MBSR and Larry Rosenberg from CIMC both got their start with Seung Sahn Sunim—a powerful teacher. And one of his key meditation instructions was: "Only keep don't-know mind."

Isn't that a wonderful instruction? He wasn't telling you what you were supposed to believe or know. He said, "Just keep don't-know mind." And then when you look at things, it'll be fresh and new. And that's where insight comes from.

So we can look into a question like: Is there anything underneath consciousness? And if we look in a fresh and open way, we may find something, or we may find an absence of something. To me that's really interesting.

I want to go a little bit further. We talked about how this kind of awareness that can include all our sense experiences is broad, includes everything that arises. Is there anything stuck? When you tune into that wide awareness, is there anything stuck or fixed in it? Is everything coming and going? All the sense phenomena coming and going?

Then could there be a self in there? No. Not if there's nothing fixed.

So exploring this factor of awareness is a direct link to the insight into not-self, the insight into anatta, and that means it's empty. The way that Buddha used the term emptiness—its most fundamental meaning is absence of self. So opening up to awareness, the insight into not-self comes for free. It's kind of part of the whole experience.

And then there's another way that it's empty: Can you find a shape for awareness? Can you find a color? Not really. So it doesn't have a structure. It's not a thing. It's insubstantial, and that's another aspect of emptiness. There's nothing fixed in it, no particular shape. It's a lot like space.

Think about the space in this room. There's a lot of space in this room, right? There's a lot of stuff in this room, but there's also a lot of space. There's always room for one more person to come in, more room for one more zabuton, one more zafu, and so forth. But there's a lot of stuff in here.

It was originally empty. When we moved into IMS, this room was empty. There was actually a little different setup, but it was empty. And then over time, all this stuff was brought in: chairs, zafus, zabutons, statues, railings, platform, window shades, Kuan Yin statue—all of that came in later. But everything that was brought in could be taken out, right? Because the basic space was empty to start with and it could be empty again.

Within awareness—each of our personal awareness—there's a lot of stuff that's like the furniture in this room. The furniture in our awareness is stuff like habits of mind, karmic patterns, attachments, and forms of suffering. None of that stuff is intrinsic to awareness, but we've brought it all in through the habits of a lifetime and through the ways that life has shaped us. So it's kind of crowded. Our awareness has gotten kind of crowded.

But because its basic nature is empty, all that stuff can be taken out. And then the awareness returns to its original empty nature. And that's the project of our Dharma work: to take out all the karmic patterns, all the obsessive, compulsive nature of thoughts and emotions, all the unskillful habits of mind. It's all been brought in, can all be taken out.

So this is where we're headed. We see the possibility. With seeing the empty nature of awareness, now we just need to do the work.

I think I'll stop here for tonight. I'll just close with a very short quote from Huang Po, who was a great Zen teacher many centuries ago: "Buddhas and bodhisattvas together with all wriggling things possessed of life, share in this great nirvanic nature of awareness."

So let's just sit for a minute together.

And from the Thai Master, Ajahn Buddhadasa: "We should call the mind emptiness, but because of its awareness, we call it mind."

Thank you for your attention. We have about thirty minutes for walking, and then we'll have, again, the close of the evening with chanting. And are people free to leave after the chanting? Free to leave after the chanting. Free, free, free at last.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 189

Instructions: Energetic Impact of Breathing

Guy Armstrong · 50 min

> In this instructional dharma talk, Guy Armstrong provides detailed guidance on selecting and working with meditation anchors, particularly focusing on breath awareness as taught in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10). He explains when the breath may not be suitable as an anchor—such as when it leads to excessive striving, triggers memories of breathing difficulties, or connects to past trauma—and offers alternatives like whole-body awareness and sound meditation.
> Armstrong introduces a comprehensive approach to breath meditation that emphasizes feeling the energetic impact of breathing throughout the entire body rather than watching it from outside. He suggests using the Thai meditation syllables 'bud-dho' to maintain present-moment awareness and occupy the verbal mind. Drawing from traditional samatha practice, he explains how to cultivate a receptive attitude toward the breath while maintaining the relaxed alertness necessary for deepening concentration.
> The talk includes practical guidance for walking meditation, emphasizing continuity of breath awareness throughout formal and informal practice periods. Armstrong concludes with instructions for individual practice meetings, encouraging students to share their leading-edge experiences and best sittings as indicators of developing mindfulness and presence.

Good morning everyone.

Today we'll continue working with the anchor, and I wanted to say just a few words about choosing an anchor. For most of us the anchor is likely to be the breath, and it generally works well for most experienced meditators. But I wanted to mention a few situations where it might not be the right choice of anchor, and then it's helpful to find another anchor.

As Sally talked about yesterday, anchors are really helpful because they give us a place to come back to when the attention has drifted away from the present moment. When we return to the present, we know where the attention can land next. That steadiness and continued connection to that chosen focus will really help to collect the mind over time. So we really recommend at this point in the retreat choosing an anchor. For most, the breath will work well.

But there are a few situations where the breath may not work so well. One is if it leads to a lot of striving. Striving in this context is where we really crave for a particular meditation outcome and tie it to an idea of how we should be relating to the anchor, the breath, moment by moment. This can put too much intensity, too much force, too much willpower on the connection with the breath. For the mind to settle naturally, there has to be a relaxed relationship with the breath. If there's too much forcing or trying too hard, that will actually block the concentration from deepening. So for those for whom striving becomes a really big aspect of relating to the breath, it can be helpful to choose another focus.

Another area where the contact with the breath may be difficult is if there's been a history of difficulty in breathing. For people who had asthma as a child, connecting with the breathing process itself may feel like a struggle. Breath may still not come easily, and it can remind us of that prior difficulty and bring up a sense of conflict or lack of ease. Then breath may not be the best focus.

Another situation could be if there's been an injury or trauma to the chest or belly—part of the breathing route—earlier, and the connection with the breath brings up memories of the trauma. This came to light when I was interviewing someone on a retreat a couple of years ago. They mentioned that every time they finished an exhale, fear arose for them. So it was uncomfortable paying attention to the breath because at the end of the exhale, fear came up. I thought this was unusual because normally on the exhale, people connect with relaxing.

So I asked them, "Has there ever been an injury or trauma connected with breath?" They said yes, there had been. They were a trombone player, and at one point in their twenties, they were playing the trombone very enthusiastically, blew out too hard, and one of their lungs collapsed. When the lung collapsed, they couldn't get enough breath. You can imagine if you're in a situation where you can't get breath, there's a kind of panic that comes in. After breathing out, they couldn't get breath back in. So that pattern reestablished itself in attention to the breath. Every time they exhaled, there was a subconscious fear that arose, and they weren't aware of the source of it. They had never connected the difficulty in breathing with that experience when they were younger.

So I said, "Okay, when the fear comes, just be with the fear. It's natural, it will pass." They did that—mindfulness of fear—which eased the problem, and then they could be with the breath quite easily.

So in those instances—really strong striving, prior difficulty with breath, or trauma or injury to an area where the breath is being felt—you may need to look to another anchor.

Sally suggested two possibilities yesterday. One is the body posture. This is a very good anchor in meditation. The sense of ourself in sitting, letting the full attention fill the whole body and getting a sense of the body as a connected unit. There's a section in the Satipatthana where the Buddha says, "Or else one simply is mindful to the extent there is a body." So in that way, just sitting and knowing, "Oh, there is this body"—full awareness of the whole body.

Another good anchor is sounds. In a place like this meditation hall where it's very quiet, sometimes that can bring its own challenge, but then one can become aware of the extent of the silence. Sounds are a very useful anchor for some people because the spaciousness of the whole hearing environment gives a sense of ease and relaxation.

I'll give instructions this morning related to the breath and just mention the other possible anchors as we go.

So beginning in the meditation, please sit comfortably. Have a sense that the posture combines these qualities of uprightness. Feel how the spine can be lengthened.

Sometimes an image that's helpful is imagining a thread from the ceiling to the top of the head. The top of the head is being pulled upward, lengthening the spine. At the same time, there is the pull of gravity, the downward pull of gravity and a heaviness that lets us drop into the sitting base—the hips and legs. So we're moving up toward the sky and settling down to the earth.

Begin with the attention spread throughout the body, feeling that the body posture is pervaded with our attention. This particular form of paying attention could be one of our anchors—mindfulness of the whole body in sitting, mindfulness of the body posture.

As we sit with this sense of ease, allow the attention to open in a wide way, noticing all the sounds that come and go: the sound of my voice, sounds of one another, sounds of the building, any sounds from outside. In this meditation on hearing, let the attention be purely receptive. The attention is resting and then open to the appearance of any sound in any direction.

Notice we don't have to send the mind out toward a sound. As we simply rest in the center of all the sounds, each sound will be heard spontaneously without any effort, with this receptive attention.

Bring the attention back into the sitting posture, mindful of the whole body in sitting. Let go of any obvious areas of holding—relaxing the forehead, letting the eyes be soft, the jaw not clenched, the shoulders dropped, and the belly soft.

As we let the attention fill the whole body, notice the impact of breathing. Again, rest with the receptive mode of attention. Just feel what happens with an in-breath, wherever it's felt in the body. When breathing in, how does the body experience change? It's not so much that we're watching the breath from above, but rather we're feeling the breathing happen from within.

Let the in-breath feel full. Especially early in the retreat, it can be helpful to have this broad view and notice the energetic quality of breathing. How is an in-breath felt energetically throughout the body? Then bring similar attention to breathing out. What happens in the body when an out-breath takes place? How is that felt throughout the body? Let the out-breath be a full out-breath. What's the energetic quality of that out-breath felt from within the body?

Keep this receptive attitude and just be interested in the impact of each in-breath and each out-breath. Let the breath take a natural rhythm, letting the breaths be full. How does that feel?

Sometimes it can be helpful to associate a brief syllable with the in-breath and a brief syllable with the out-breath. This helps remind us to stay present and helps occupy the verbal part of the mind. In Thailand, the two syllables used for this purpose are "buddho." Budd on the in-breath, ho on the out-breath. Buddho is just another version of Buddha.

As we remind ourselves with these two syllables, we are also reminding ourselves of this refuge—of the knowing of mindfulness, the understanding of mindfulness, the wakeful quality of mindfulness. You might play with this in this sitting, feeling the breath throughout the whole body with the note of budd on the in-breath and ho on the out-breath. See if this is helpful for you. If not, feel free to drop it.

As you're connecting with the breath, you may find that your attention very naturally settles in a smaller area than the whole body. Many of us have spent years practicing with the breath in the belly, in the chest, at the tip of the nose or upper lip. If that's the case and your attention naturally wants to land there and settle there, that's fine.

This whole body breathing can be helpful to bring in a broader perspective. Sometimes it helps connect with a sense of ease, but it's also fine if the attention naturally lands in a smaller area and the breath is felt there with the same receptive attitude, allowing the rhythm to be natural and the breath to be full.

As you feel the breath within the body from inside, allow it to take its natural rhythm. Just start to tune in: is there any point at which this rhythmic breath has an effect of calming, of soothing, of softening the body and mind? If so, appreciate that and see if there are any factors that help that calming to take place. How is it that the breath in its natural rhythm might exert its calming influence on body and mind?

In your sitting practice today, please do experiment with the breath as an anchor. See if it's going to be suitable for you. The broad perspective of feeling the breath in the whole body that I introduced this morning is really helpful to guard against striving, because the bigger space just takes off some of the pressure and intensity and leads into that ability to relax. So you can play with this frame of the whole body.

Sometimes the degree of openness leads the mind to drift a little more easily. In that case, it could be helpful to use the syllables "bud-dho." Or if you like, let the breath rest in a smaller area if that's more comfortable for you. Either of those is fine. And again, feel free to explore the other anchors of the full body posture or sound if you find that more conducive.

In the walking practice today—I think Sally alluded to this yesterday—as you're walking back and forth on your chosen walking path, the main focus will be the experience of the body in walking. Again, you might experiment with feeling the whole body in walking, where the more intense sensations may be in the legs and feet but you can still keep that frame of the whole body. If the attention becomes more scattered, you might find it helpful to narrow the focus a bit.

Then see if in the walking you can start to bring in some connection with the breath. Because we are doing a practice focused on tranquility—samatha—in this first part of the retreat, the normal instructions for samatha practice with the breath are that you stay with the breath all day long as the primary object. That's really challenging, especially at the start of a retreat. But see if you can start to bring in, during the walking, a connection—an ongoing connection with the breath as an element in your experience.

It may be that at this point most of your attention is with the movement of the body, legs, and feet. But see if you can start to bring in a regular noticing of breathing while you're doing the walking meditation. As time goes by, that continuity with the breath that goes from sitting into the next walking will help retain that connection in the next sitting. So the connection with the breath will get stronger over the days the more that we're in contact with it. See if you can start to just bring that in during the walking as a regular element.

Any questions this morning?

A student asks about tension in the abdomen area. If it's just tension that might come and go, then it's nothing really to worry about. We just notice it as one of the elements of the experience. If it feels like it's connected with some old injury or trauma, then it might be helpful to place the attention somewhere else—specifically in the chest or perhaps the nose.

But if it's the kind of tension that comes and goes throughout the day or from day to day, then I wouldn't worry too much about it. Just meet it with a sense of acceptance. You might notice from time to time the feeling tone of it. Tension is usually a little bit unpleasant, so notice the unpleasant feeling tone. Notice if there's a mental reaction of aversion, of disliking. If so, just be with that with some degree of allowing—"Okay, don't like it, but here it is"—and allow it to be present with the overall experience. If the mind starts to become too fixated on it, then it might be helpful to place the attention in another part of the body deliberately. Otherwise, it's just an aspect of the experience.

We're going to begin the individual practice meetings this morning, so I wanted to say a little bit about that. It's really a chance for us to hear how the retreat is going for you, how the meditation practice is going for you. At this point in the retreat, there may not be very much dramatic going on because most of you have just arrived. Some of you have been here for a while, so there may be a little more that's up.

You might just give a little bit of thought before you come in to the meeting about what you'd like to share. It doesn't have to involve a lot of rehearsal. When we rehearse, it's along the lines of "I'm going to say this, and then they're going to say that in reply, and when they say that, I'm going to..." That doesn't really usually unfold that way. But just think a little about what you might like to share about your experience so far.

It could be fairly simple—just settling in. Some of you have been practicing for a while and there might be some detail in what's happening for you. So you could give us an account of your general experience of being in the retreat, especially if you're just settling. If more is happening in your practice, it's helpful for us to know what's happening at the leading edge.

What you're kind of up to, and gives us a sense of how you might develop from there. This is quite helpful to know in some detail as part of your report.

Generally, it's a description of the best sitting. Best meaning not necessarily most pleasant, but where you have been most present—where the mindfulness has been strongest. Whether the experience is pleasant or unpleasant isn't so important, but how have you been present for the experience?

And then tell us a little bit about your walking meditation: how that's going, how present you feel, what's helpful in walking, what's not.

So you might begin with a little bit of report on how things are going, and then any specific questions that you have about how to practice, how to meet a certain situation, how to practice with the conditions you find yourself in. Share anything that's been difficult, and also anything that's been going well. Meditation teachers like to hear what's going well for you, so don't scrimp on that part.

That's a general outline: overview of your experience, details of a good sitting in the last couple of days, any particular questions, any challenges that are up.

We have fifteen minutes per person, so if you'd help us keep an eye on that time. I haven't quite looked in the library yet—hopefully there will be a clock that can face you and a clock that can face me so that we can keep on track. We have a very full morning. Oftentimes we'll see ten people between now and lunch, so it's helpful for us to keep on track so we can all go to lunch—the most important part of the day, right?

I think that's all for now. One announcement: the affinity sits will begin today. The six-thirty sit in the Council House Library will be the BIPOC affinity sit. All the members who identify as BIPOC are welcome to attend, though not obligated. It's optional. Whichever group you're in, you're welcome to attend. It's nice to show support for the other members of your community, but don't feel obligated. If your own practice schedule inclines you to sit somewhere else, that's totally fine.

So we have another beautiful day of practice, although a little cooler than yesterday. I hope you'll enjoy it.

May will be sitting in on the individual meetings this morning, if that's comfortable for you. Again, it's a real contribution to her learning and her training, if that's okay with you. But if at any point you'd prefer to have just a one-to-one, let us know, and May is happy to step out.

A beautiful practice day. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 190

Facing Our Fears: Living With A Courageous Heart

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines our tendency to live in what he calls the 'body of fear' - a habitual state of contraction and resistance that separates us from direct experience. Drawing on Buddhist psychology and the Buddha's own journey of sitting under the Bodhi tree, Armstrong explores how courage emerges not from the absence of fear, but from our willingness to stop running and face what frightens us with presence and compassion.
> The talk addresses how fear signals the boundaries of what we find acceptable, and how spiritual freedom comes from gradually relaxing these boundaries. Armstrong guides listeners through understanding that all beings are naturally wired for fight-or-flight responses, but suffering arises when we become identified with this protective stance. He emphasizes that true refuge lies not in avoiding fear, but in developing the capacity to belong fully to each moment.
> The session concludes with a guided meditation practice for working with personal fears, using breath awareness to cultivate the 'courageous heart' - a quality of presence spacious enough to include fear without being overwhelmed by it. Armstrong draws on teachings about loving-kindness (mettā) and the fundamental interconnectedness that the Buddha taught as antidotes to the isolation that fear creates.

So it's nice to see everyone tonight. The dharma talk is entitled "Living with a Courageous Heart," and I was just reflecting on why I chose to speak on this topic this week. I realized that both in my own life and in the lives of many people I know right now, there's scary stuff arising. I mentioned that my dad went through surgery recently, which was really quite frightening. I have a number of friends who are facing different challenges—whether it's somebody sick in their life, a divorce, or just different life circumstances—having to find a way to face these difficulties and let that too be the path. So it's in that spirit that I'll share some reflections.

Let me begin by having us reflect on something we're very habitual about. With the stresses of the day, if we check out what's going on in our bodies and minds at any juncture where stress seems to face us—whether it's a work demand, a deadline, being stuck in traffic—our bodies, before we even know it, tighten up. Our minds start speeding up and our hearts contract, or else they really numb out.

This has been called the body of fear, and my sense is that's a very apt description. This body of fear is sometimes very subtle, where our being, our awareness, rather than being open and inclusive, has tightened and tightened, and we're just busily planning how we're going to move through—how to get through the day, which is a sad comment.

If we honestly investigate the root of any difficult experience, we'll find fear. We'll find this sense that we're approaching life like it's an adversary, on some level like we're having to meet up with something difficult that's dangerous and at best unpredictable. So we resist.

I was watching how I was moving through the heat these last couple of days. I noticed at first, every time I felt the blanket of hot air, there was this place in me that was just grumbling, sweating, and really being dramatic about it. Then I realized that was happening, and I decided, "Okay, heat meditation"—just sitting, just feeling it. Hot, sweating, nauseous, whatever, but just being with moment-to-moment experience. It was revealing to see what a habitual reflex it was to have this kind of complaint in my system. I mean, it's just weather.

One teacher described this body of fear as if we're entering this earth wearing a space suit. I think this metaphor works well because this body of fear, this space suit, is meant to help us navigate through difficulties, to get more of what we want and to avoid what we don't want. It's fight or flight—that's what this space suit does. It's basically designed to avoid direct contact. It's a kind of covering, an armor, to avoid direct contact with the elements. The presumption is that life's too much.

Whether the stresses are huge ones—like someone we love could die—or little ones like being late for something, there's a sense that we need a buffer so we don't have to feel the enormity of what we're feeling inside. What ends up happening is that there are not so many moments that we put down this space suit, that we relax this body of fear and directly relate to the sensations, the sounds, to our breath, to each other.

The problem is not that a space suit or body of fear emerges. It's that we become identified with it. Our whole life becomes organized around those defensive patterns. So it's our habit to buffer ourselves.

I was talking about this with a friend a few days ago who called describing some things in the newspaper. Because it was all so overwhelming, it was so hard to really open and feel what it meant—the realness of the people suffering—she was describing how it's just impossible not to look at it like it was a story. So we were talking about that, and then she ended up emailing me these verified newspaper headlines of the year:

"Something went wrong in jet crash, experts say."
"Police begin campaign to run down jaywalkers."
"Prostitutes appeal to Pope."
"Plane too close to ground, crash probe told."
"Astronaut takes blame for gas in space."
"Man struck by lightning faces battery charge."
"Typhoon rips through cemetery. Hundreds dead."

Probably each one of us here knows what it's like to cognitively register huge, enormous suffering. We laugh about a jet crash headline, and yet we know that it's just really hard to get it, to really register what it means when people are suffering. So we feel we have to wear this space suit.

And then the question we're going to approach is: How much do we really have to?

And how do we learn to let go some and let this world in?

But first, let's acknowledge that all life forms, by the nature of being life forms, have this fight or flight response, have a body of fear. All life forms are wired to register where threats are and to contract and to defend.

It's really interesting that when sensory experience is registered in our body minds, it first is registered in the emotional centers of our brain, the amygdala, and then the cerebral cortex. In other words, we make meaning—cognitive meaning—after our body has already registered its fight or flight response. So it's our basic wiring to fear and to contract.

We sometimes think that there's something wrong with us when we feel fear. In fact, we almost always do. When fear arises in our body, we think there's something wrong with me. We think it's somehow something missing or defective. I like this quote from Scott Peck: "The absence of fear is not courage, but some kind of brain damage."

So fear is a basic survival system. It's a painful feeling in the body, and it becomes suffering if we get identified and organized around it. If rather than just recognizing, "Oh, fear," and feeling it and being with it, we do whatever we can to run away from it, to contract against it, to try to get rid of it, to numb, to control things, what happens? It turns from fear to suffering.

This is Kafka: "You can hold back from the suffering, from the pain and fear. You have free permission to do so, and it is in accordance with your nature. But perhaps this very holding back is the one suffering you could have avoided."

Now this is really the core message that the Buddha was teaching 2,500 years ago—that we have this conditioning to hold back from life. And it's not that we're bad, it's not that we're wrong, but it's our capacity to realize that and to cultivate a sense of presence. It's our capacity to realize we're holding back and let go of resistance and let life in.

And so that's what I'd like to explore more fully tonight: how, when we realize that this body of fear is doing its thing, we realize we're tight, we realize our thoughts are racing, we realize that we've defended against each other and the life around us—how do we recognize that and relax the grip a little and let life in?

Now here is a classic story. Once there was a man who got so upset by the sight of his own shadow and was so unhappy with his own footsteps that he tried to run from both. But each time his foot hit the ground, he realized he was still taking a step. Equally disturbing, he saw that his shadow never once fell behind. Not about to give up, he ran faster, faster, faster, until finally he dropped dead. What he never grasped was that by stepping into the shade, his shadow would vanish. By simply sitting down, there would be no more footsteps.

Like the man in the story, we're afraid of what lurks in the shadow. We're afraid of change. We're afraid of the unknown. We're afraid of our imperfections. We're afraid of our mortality. And so what we do from this fear is we try to get away from it. We keep running.

And we're aware that running hurts us. We're aware that when we get caught in our addictions and our avoidant behavior, when we armor our heart, when we get intellectual, we kind of know. We know that we're in our strategy for avoiding things. But we do it anyway. It's such a deeply grooved habit.

We run daily. Each of us is trapped in reactivity. I can, at the end of any day, just look back and see huge swaths of time where I was in some trance, where I thought I was there, but I was actually trying to be busy and feel good about myself—just lost, not really present.

Real safety, the real refuge, lies in our willingness to not run away from ourselves. That is the refuge. To not run away. To stay. To just show up for this moment. And there's a wonderful question that you can ask yourself that can bring you right back here: "How can I belong to this moment?" If you see you're running, "How can I belong to this moment?"

This is the essence of meditation. We're in training to realize how this body of fear is doing its thing, sense our muscles tightening, sense that we're pushing away life, that we're lost in these ideas and concepts. And then have that willingness to come back, to stop running.

to rest in what's true.

It's also the motif in the mythology of the Buddha that he too ran. I mean, it's a given we're all running, we're all trying to protect and defend and grasp and so on. And he spent a number of years practicing austerities, a kind of striving towards spiritual accomplishment. And then, this is the centerpiece of the Buddha story, he stopped running, he stopped doing. He sat down under the tree of enlightenment, the Bodhi tree.

So that's our practice. It's really a practice of just stopping the doings and being with what is.

There's an irony that frequently people will turn to meditation as a way to reduce tension and stress, and as a way to find peace, without realizing that in the long run, while it does do that, the training itself is one of touching whatever's there. So for many people, there's kind of a surprise of sitting down and expecting to find some calmness and really getting in touch with the agitation that they've been running from. And then the learning or awakening is that by relating wisely to that, there's a deeper peace than could have been imagined. But it's not by getting rid of it.

Any true journey of awakening, of opening, is going to take us to the boundaries of what are familiar. It's kind of like getting in this small boat and setting out to sea on this kind of exploration or adventure to realize who we really are, and having all the fears that we're going to fall off the end of the earth or the fears of what weather systems might stir up the seas or how we might get becalmed and lose all our steam and everything possible that can arise that's in our psyche. All the fears and hopes and sadnesses and excitements and longings—that's what we are game to connect with, that we're willing to touch if we're sitting down and meditating.

So in a way, I look at it like it takes an enormous courage to even be willing to sit down a little and be with ourselves. Now there certainly are ways of what we call meditating where we're just trying to aim the mind elsewhere and go into a trance, but that's not the kind of meditation I'm talking about. I'm talking about a mindfulness practice whose commitment is presence with what's real. Any genuine commitment to that will lead us to the edges of what we've been accepting.

We all design our lives to be as comfortable as we can. I mean, it's part of our wiring. We try to make our worlds safe and predictable, and we try to avoid things from changing, because most of us don't want change. We hold on tight to how it is. We have a million arguments on why that's good. We try to keep certain people in our life and certain people out and certain feelings there in us and avoid other feelings. We try to keep the air conditioning on when it goes over a hundred. So we all are doing that to some degree, trying to make our lives comfortable.

And yet, because there are shadow parts of the psyche that have been pushed away, it's part of the exploration to go to that edge and begin to include what we've been excluding or keeping out.

Fear signals the boundary to what's acceptable. And as one teacher, I think it was Joseph Goldstein said in one of the first retreats I was at, that to the extent that there's a boundary of what's acceptable, we're not free. Do you understand that? If there's a boundary and outside that boundary is the realm of unacceptable, we're not free. Because we're always avoiding, contracting against, resisting a part of life. One way of understanding spiritual life is to relax that boundary, kind of play the edge and keep opening to the places that we have been habitually avoiding.

Jack Kornfield describes fear when we're hitting that edge like this little light bulb that goes off and says in our minds, "about to grow, about to grow."

It takes a lot of energy to keep pushing away the unacceptable, pushing away our feelings of vulnerability, our loneliness. Loneliness is a big one. We do a lot not to feel it, to push away intimacy, to push away change. Everything is changing and yet we try so hard to nail it all down.

So staying put, facing fear, is really the only chance we have to become intimate with this life and to really touch freedom. Yet it's really hard to do it. It's all our wiring not to.

So let me ask you to reflect on something, if you will. Just take a few deep breaths and close your eyes, if you will.

Our habit is to avoid what's dangerous or risky or scary, but each of us has had times where we haven't done that, where we've been courageous. So I'd like to ask you to reflect on something in your life that you consider courageous that you've done. It might be an internal way of facing things or a behavioral way, some experience of your life where you felt that you were courageous.

Including as you reflect what you were facing, what you had to face and deal with, and the fear or the insecurity that might have brought up. What made it possible for you to be courageous in this instance? What motivated you? What allowed you to face your life? To stop running.

You can keep considering this, but please open your eyes if you will. And just to invite anyone that might have connected with that, what you noticed, what let you be courageous? What was it?

These are remarkable insights. When someone shared that seeing "the larger picture" enabled their courage, and another spoke of an "overwhelming desire to heal," we glimpse the profound motivations that draw us toward presence. Sometimes courage emerges because we recognize that "there's no other choice"—we find ourselves at a threshold where the only path forward is to remain present with what is.

The awareness that avoiding presence creates more suffering becomes a powerful teacher. One person beautifully described recognizing their pattern of dissociation—how they would "separate and become a guru" to avoid vulnerability—yet found the courage to return to embodied presence. This recognition of our habitual escapes, without judgment, is itself a form of courage.

What's particularly moving is how many responses pointed toward connection as the source of courage: a sense of connection with the divine, the support of sangha, the feeling of being held by something larger than our individual struggles. These reflections reveal different dimensions of what allows us to meditate—what enables us to face life directly despite our deep conditioning to flee.

Notice how many pointed to a compelling quality, a genuine longing to be present fully. This isn't forcing ourselves into mindfulness, but rather responding to an authentic pull toward wholeness. There's often a readiness that emerges, a confidence that we can meet whatever arises.

It takes courage to meditate. Every moment we choose to stay present with our experience—whether it's pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral—we're cultivating this courage. We're reinforcing our sense of the bigger picture, our connection with something sacred, our interconnectedness with all beings.

The word courage comes from roots meaning "greatness of heart"—cor, the heart. True courage isn't the absence of fear, but rather the willingness to keep our hearts open even in the presence of fear, uncertainty, or pain. This is the courage that allows us to stop running and face our lives with compassion.

That our longing, our heart's longing to be free, to know truth, to feel love more fully, will end up inspiring us to be courageous, will bring us to meditation, and will have us go beyond our habitual way.

Now, as we know, because our conditioning is strong, we need to intentionally cultivate those qualities of heart and cultivate this capacity to relax the body of fear. So let's explore how, when we're in the grip, when you're facing the big stressors, how do we begin to tap into the courage, tap into the understandings that were just brought up so beautifully here?

I find it instructive to sense, well, if I was relating to a frightened child—just consider this: if you're with a child that's very, very afraid, how would you relate to that child?

"Kindness." "Protectedness." "Patience." "Honoring." "Allowing." "Soothing." "Love."

It's a question to ask yourself. If you really imagine this vulnerability within you as deserving of these qualities of attention, how would you relate? Because when we're in the middle of fear, we usually lock into "something's wrong with me." And we get kind of hard-hearted towards ourselves.

The way that many of us were brought up was that when we got frightened, we were penalized for it. We were put down for it or punished for it. Or else, for some of us, our fears were fed. We were told what a dangerous world this is. "Be careful—something's gonna go wrong any moment. You'll get hurt if you try to do that. People get hurt. You can't trust anyone."

And then for many, our fears were negated. We were told, "Oh, there's nothing to be afraid of. You don't really feel that." If we were sad or grieving or whatever, they were disregarded. And then we grow up with this kind of sense of not really knowing what we feel, or sensing it but denying it.

Somebody sent me this story. This is a woman struggling with a fear of loss of mental capacity. For a lot of years she felt like it was happening, but she didn't want to admit it to anybody. But now she and a lot of her peer group are passing around stories about loss of mental capacity. And this is one of their stories:

Three older ladies were discussing the travails of getting older. One said, "Sometimes I catch myself with a jar of mayonnaise in my hand in front of the refrigerator and can't remember whether I need to put it away or start making a sandwich."

The second lady chimed in, "Yes, sometimes I find myself on the landing of the stairs and can't remember whether I was on my way up or on my way down."

The third one responded, "Well, I'm glad I don't have that problem—knock on wood." As she rapped her knuckles on the table, then she told them, "That must be the door. I'll go get it."

That was her example of denial.

So there are several messages we get around fear, and then what we end up doing is that's how we treat our own fearful inner self. We put ourselves down for feeling afraid, deny that there's a good reason—say, "No, there's no good reason, I shouldn't be feeling this"—or we feed it: "Yep, things are really all going to crash around me in a moment." Rather than what you just described—soothing, comforting, protective, present—we end up either feeding or denying fear.

So what is this most kind of enlightened response to fear? How do we discover that kind and wakeful presence when we're in the grip?

We start with recognizing that it's happening. Really developing this sensor where there's a place in us that recognizes the body of fear. The body of fear is almost always there unless we're quite free, but it tightens, it contracts, it gets more consolidated. Having this place in our awareness that starts recognizing when our heart's getting harder or number, our body's getting tighter, and our mind's getting busier.

It helps to name it. "Fear" is one of the good ones to name. "Fear, fear." The little ones, the big ones.

What we'll be doing as we close tonight is a meditation on fear. So I'd like to invite you to reflect for a moment. You might not be aware of the subtle times your body of fear comes together, but reflect on a place in your life where you'd like to have more courage, where you are aware of getting caught inside fear.

For some it's situations where you might be rejected or abandoned, seen as stupid. For some it's a situation where you're afraid of failing or making mistakes. For some the fears are around our bodies—getting sick or gaining weight. For some it's around money.

For some it's around senility. For some the suffering, fear of suffering of our children. Choose, if you will, a place in your life where you know the body of fear contracts and imprisons you. Your awareness becomes very caught or identified. A place you'd like to have more freedom, more courage.

As a way of establishing a relationship with this place of tightness, we begin by just acknowledging it, in some way just bowing to it, just respect, okay, this. And as we finish tonight and go through these different steps, you can keep coming back to this place and sensing how you can relate to it.

Because we're often taught that it's bad for us to be afraid or something's wrong with us if we're afraid, we don't often acknowledge just how real it feels. Now that doesn't mean the story about the fear is real. It doesn't mean that in fact we are going to fail, that our story is accurate. But the feelings—the fear of failure, the fear of being unworthy and rejected, the fear of loneliness, the fear of what will happen if people see who we are—that fear feels very real.

I had a client some years ago who had a very great fear of any attractive woman. He went through life and when he found a woman very attractive, he got very scared and couldn't act like who he was. He felt like he just contracted. It took him months to even say that out loud because he thought it was such a stupid and ungrounded kind of fear to have in this world. What was really amazing was that the most liberating part of therapy for him was simply coming to terms with the fact that this fear was a real and painful experience in his body-mind. The fear was real.

As he said, "Okay," and he kind of bowed to it, he said, "Okay, this is real, this fear is there," he was able to start working with it. The first step to letting these fears, this body of fear, unwind itself is to acknowledge its presence. There's a quality of respect and acceptance. It's not like accepting fear means that you're accepting that you're always going to be fearful. It's just that this moment there's the ache, squeeze, tightness of fear.

So we begin with that and again just notice where your body of fear gets tightened around a particular situation. Just let yourself acknowledge the realness in a respectful way. One Zen master, when asked how he related with fear, said, "I agree, I agree." It's like saying, "Okay, this is here."

Once we have acknowledged the realness of this moment's feeling of fear, we then, as the Buddha did, pause, stop running, and face the fullness of it. This is the meditation of sitting down in the shade, being receptive to the unknown, the discomfort.

This isn't easy. This is where we actually have to train ourselves because there are so many parts of our life where we've got such a studied way of acting quickly, reacting, judging, that for us to stop and really feel in that pause, really connect with our experience, is difficult.

This is Pema Chödrön: "When we protect ourselves so we won't feel pain, that protection becomes like armor, like armor that imprisons the softness of the heart. We do everything we can think of not to feel anything threatening. We try to prolong feeling good about ourselves. When we breathe in pain, when we breathe in fear, somehow it penetrates that armor. The way we guard ourselves is getting softened up. This heavy, rusty, creaking armor begins to seem not so monolithic after all. With the in-breath, the armor begins to fall apart, and we find we can breathe deeply and relax. A kindness and tenderness begin to emerge. We don't have to tense up as if our whole life were being spent in the dentist's chair. When we breathe out relief and spaciousness, we are also encouraging the armor to dissolve. The out-breath is a metaphor for opening our whole being."

So this natural breathing in life—feeling what's there, breathing out, making space—is our way of pausing and relating directly to what's here.

What this means for most of us is that we have to let go of the busyness of our mind. And that in itself is a training. It's our biggest form of armor. The more we stay lost in planning thoughts and worry thoughts, the less we are asked to actually feel what's happening. We use our thinking as a defense against the intensity, the vibrancy of the elements.

So usually to do this breathing in and feeling fully, breathing out, making room, we first have to realize all the stories that are going on and just relax the grip of them some. "Okay, thinking, thinking, stories, stories," and then just feel into our body.

You can do it again and again, even this moment. Just sense whatever ideas are in the mind. Just note, "thinking, ideas, stories," and then again sit down into the body, breathing in, receiving this life fully, whether it's pain or fear, our interest, our sleepiness, our numbness, just feeling exactly what's real.

This is sitting in the shade. This is how we stop running. And then we breathe out and sense the space it's all happening in, letting it float, letting it be there.

Let me share a story with you. This was a teacher from India who described his experiences with fear, and I thought it was a wonderful description.

He said he was determined to get rid of his negative emotions—this was in the 1960s that he started practicing. He struggled against anger and lust, he struggled against laziness and pride, but mostly he wanted to get rid of his fear. His meditation teacher kept telling him, "Stop struggling, stop struggling, just let it be." But he just took that as another way of explaining how to overcome his obstacles and kept on trying to get rid of fear.

Finally, his teacher sent him off to meditate in a tiny hut in the foothills of the mountains. He shut the door and settled down to practice. When it got dark, he lit three candles. Around midnight he heard a noise in the corner of the room, and in the darkness he saw a very large snake. It looked to him like a king cobra, and it was right in front of him, swaying.

All night he stayed totally alert, keeping his eyes on the snake. He was so afraid he couldn't move. There was just the snake and himself and the fear. And then there was just fear and fear and fear.

Just before dawn, the last candle went out, and then he began to cry. He cried not in despair but from tenderness. He felt the longing of all the animals and people in the world. He knew their alienation and their struggle and their fear. All his meditation thus far had been nothing but further separation and struggle, trying to get rid of parts of life.

Now he accepted—really accepted wholeheartedly—that he was angry and jealous, that he resisted and struggled, and that he was afraid. He accepted fear. He also accepted that he was precious beyond measure, wise and foolish, rich and poor, and totally unfathomable. He felt so much gratitude that in the total darkness he stood up, walked toward the snake, and bowed. Then he fell sound asleep on the floor.

When he awoke, the snake was gone. He never knew if it was his imagination or if it had really been there, and it didn't seem to matter. As he put it at the end of this talk describing his experience with fear, that much intimacy with the real experience of fear caused his dramas to collapse, his sense of separation from the world to collapse. Finally he was able to connect directly with life, to belong fully to his life.

I love that story because, as is so true in the Buddha's teachings, the very arising of what's difficult is also the ground of our freedom—that by facing fully the intensity of fear, by really allowing ourselves to belong to fear, we end up belonging fully to life. By facing death, we awaken to live our moments completely.

And this belonging is the antidote, in a sense. The deepest fear is one of severed belonging. The deepest fear is of disconnection. So whatever allows us to begin to establish a connection with life gives us room in our hearts for fear.

One way is, as I've been describing, to connect directly with the experience itself. There are other ways, though, of also cultivating the heart so we feel a sense of belonging and we have room for fear. In fact, the Buddha's first teaching in response to fear was a loving-kindness meditation. He told the monks that surrounded him at that time—this was his quote: "Our fear is great, but greater yet is the truth of our connectedness."

It's so beautiful. Our fear is great, but greater yet is the truth of our connectedness. This is one of the lines from the scriptures that many people know and that becomes more and more real as we live our moments—that we see these weather systems of fear, this body of fear contracting, but discover more and more that what's most true and real is a sense of belonging to the world that allows us to have room for fear.

So this is the refuge that the Buddha talked about. If we're lost in fear, to find what we belong to. We find it through mindfulness by relating directly to the experience of fear. We find it as we cultivate the heart with practices like loving-kindness.

Any moment that we extend care to another being or to a part of ourselves reestablishes a sense of connectedness—even if we're doing it mechanically. Even if it's mechanical, just the fact that we had an intention to try comes from a part of our heart that cares. Any extension of care reestablishes connectedness.

In a moment of fear, if we just bring to mind what we most deeply cherish, just bring that to mind and just feel even a little bit of the warmth of caring, we're on that pathway back into belonging, back into a sense of wholeness where we can include fear but not be driven by it. That is the meaning of courage, that greatness of heart.

Let's take a moment—what we'll do is work a little bit with the fears you've identified.

Bringing this meditation practice to hold that fear, we'll begin by simply establishing the presence that comes from feeling our bodies and feeling our breath.

Sense what area of fear is asking for attention in your life—what circumstances bring up fear. Pick one area. Some will be able to evoke the realness of the feeling of fear more than others. Not to worry, but just include awareness as well as possible of where you'd like to have more courage.

Let the situation be as real as you can. Visualize the circumstances if possible. If there are others involved, see who's there. Sense what's most difficult and feel what that's like in your heart. When you feel like you've connected with what brings up the body of fear, just let go of the story and simply feel what's there. Very present.

Feel where the fear lives so that as you breathe in, there's a willingness to feel what has been avoided. Agree to feel what's there. Regardless of what you're feeling right now—fear, numbness, tiredness, happiness, whatever it is—let the in-breath be one of touching what's real. We breathe in and touch what's real. We breathe out and offer it space—that bigger picture, that open awareness.

Breathe in and connect with what's there. Breathe out and offer space, kindness, care. If it feels like too much to breathe in and feel, sense that all of nature and all of the loving energies of the universe are there to help receive it. Breathing in, there's room for this. Breathing out, offering care.

The Dalai Lama told one very frightened man that if he couldn't hold his own fear, just sense he was held in the heart of the Buddha, the lap of the Buddha. Let this fear be held by the beloved—breathing in, feeling fully, knowing there's room. Breathing out, offering care, space, establishing an intimacy, a realness with what's true inside you. Rather than running, we sit in the shade of this tree of enlightenment, this wakeful, caring presence.

Now bring to mind someone in your life that you know struggles with something that scares them, that contracts them. Everyone that we know struggles with fear, but bring to mind one person who's dear to you, so that you can breathe in on their behalf. Breathe in and sense the fear, the struggle, the pain. Breathe out and offer them your prayer, your compassion.

Let others come to mind, continuing to breathe and feel that as you breathe in, you breathe in the fear, you breathe in what has been resisted, and you breathe out offering kindness for the benefit of others.

Include in your awareness now the sense of all those that have gathered here—that each one carries their share of fear, each one wants to be happy and free—so that you breathe in and sense that you're breathing in for each of us. As you do, bring to mind faces and a sense of some of the people here that can make it more genuine for you. Breathing in, feel that you're breathing in for all of us, including the parts of the shadow, the difficulties. Breathe out and offer that space and that care that is the freedom of our courageous heart.

The only thing great enough to awaken through fear is the power of the heart. Our fear is great, but greater yet is our connectedness.

So we close chanting Om again as we did when we opened. Feel free to let your voices mingle and harmonize as we chant six rounds.

[Chanting: Om, Om, Om, Om, Om, Om]

May our attention and our prayers be of benefit to all beings. May all beings awaken. May all beings be free.

CHAPTER 191

Refuge in Calmness

Guy Armstrong · 48 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines what it means to find genuine refuge in calmness amid life's inevitable uncertainties and challenges. Opening with a powerful teaching story from Zen master Eiken Roshi about difficulties that persist throughout life, Armstrong invites us to consider what inner shift would allow us to embrace each moment with balance and grace, regardless of its content.
> Drawing on the Buddha's teaching that "all things arise because of conditions," Armstrong explores how our attempts to control the uncontrollable create additional suffering. Through stories including the Chinese monk who responded "amazing" to both praise and blame, and Milarepa's practice of building and dismantling towers, he illustrates the art of non-dwelling and non-attachment. The talk emphasizes developing loving acceptance that embraces every moment without distinction, learning to touch all experiences with calmness rather than aversion.
> Armstrong offers practical guidance on withdrawing the fuel of reactive thinking, cultivating patience ("the long enduring mind"), and discovering spaciousness that isn't dependent on particular mind states or experiences. This teaching reveals how authentic refuge isn't found by escaping difficulty, but through our willingness to be present with whatever arises, transforming our relationship to uncertainty itself into a source of peace and understanding.

This evening I'd like to speak about finding a refuge in calmness.

Some years ago, Eiken Roshi, a very wise American Zen teacher, was leading a retreat. On the second evening, he came into the hall to give the evening talk and began by saying, "The difficulties you are experiencing now." And then he stopped.

There was a very pregnant pause. The students suddenly looked very hopeful and alert. You can appreciate, even on the first evening of a retreat—never mind the second evening—the kind of space you can be in as you begin a retreat, where it seems that every hindrance that's ever been written about is occurring in your experience. The kind of space when you've perhaps completely forgotten why you ever wanted to come on retreat. The kind of space you can be in where it feels like this retreat is going to last for the rest of your life, and your body and mind is shouting at you.

So this pause seemed very important. What was he going to say? Was he going to offer some kind of magical solution or a shortcut through all of the challenges? Was there going to be good news about the ways in which the obstacles were going to disappear? Or maybe he was just going to announce a side trip to the beach?

But he began again and said, "The difficulties you are experiencing now are going to be with you for the rest of your life."

It's a wonderful line—not a statement that's intended to depress you or lead you to a state of despair or feel that everything is hopeless. But it is a statement that invites us to reflect a little bit upon our relationship to this moment and to many moments in our life.

What if this were true? What if it was true that the difficulties you are experiencing now were going to be with you for the rest of your life? What would be asked of us? What kind of inner shift or change would need to take place in our heart and mind that would allow us to turn towards whatever is present in this moment, no matter how difficult or painful or challenging?

What kind of shift would have to happen that would enable us to embrace and to hold this moment as it is, with calmness and balance and grace? What qualities of heart and mind would we need that would allow us to befriend and to learn from and open to whatever is happening right now for us in our experience? What would be needed to allow us to be with what is without rejection or judgment or fear, and without the thoughts that are always relying upon the promise or guarantee that a better moment is on its way?

What kind of acceptance or compassion would we need to bring to this experience, to our lives, so that we would feel that we are no longer just swept away by the many challenges we meet?

Many times we find ourselves in the reality of situations that we don't know when or if they will ever end—illness, sometimes a breakdown of our bodies, sometimes difficulties in our relationships, sometimes conflicts that have seemed to go on in our lives for a very long time, sometimes feelings within ourselves that are hard to accept. Many of us have these corners, these places in our lives where the truth is that we don't know if or when they will ever end. They are not something that is unique to retreats.

There's a wonderful story about a monk who lived in China near a small village, living a very simple life, yet with a very close relationship to the people in the village. In times of prosperity and peace, the villagers would have great affection for this monk. They would visit him and express their gratitude and appreciation for his presence and the sense they had of how he was protecting them and guiding them in their lives. In the midst of all this praise and affirmation, the monk would say to them, "That's amazing."

Then, of course, things changed and there was poverty and conflict in their land. The crops failed and the villagers went to the monk and said, "You're really a useless monk. You failed us. You betrayed us. Whatever happened to these powers you used to have? You may as well disappear. You're no use to us." And he answered them again, "That's amazing."

Then, of course, things changed again. There was once more peace in their land and harmony in their village and prosperity. They went to the monk to beg his forgiveness for the ways they'd abused him and reviled him, saying they hadn't really meant it, that it was all just due to the stress of the moment, and that they really did appreciate his presence. And he answered again, "That is amazing."

This story is about balance.

We live in a very agitated world, a very restless world, a world that sometimes seems exceedingly chaotic with extraordinary levels of disharmony. We live in a world that is constantly changing and unpredictable. It is hard to find anything that is guaranteed. At times, the agitation we see in the world around us feels like a mirror of the turmoil and turbulence we also experience in our inner world.

Consider the changes we go through in a single day. You've probably tracked that today. Our feelings can change so quickly. Times when our sense of excitement turns to total boredom. Where what we love in one moment we can hate in the next. We can be desperately waiting and wanting to go and sit in one moment, and in the next we can be thinking of the countless ways we may be able to avoid it. We see at times our happiness turns to sadness.

Even in our world of thoughts, you may have noticed today, thoughts that can seem so convincing and real in one moment—you may have had a little storm of obsession at some time today about some disaster or other—so convincing, and we've forgotten them by lunchtime. We see the changes, the unpredictability of the life of our bodies, the way in which our health can turn to illness, from strength to weakness so unpredictably.

Within this world of change and turbulence, it does often feel that there is nowhere to rest, nowhere that is truly a haven, a sanctuary, a refuge. At times, it feels that there may be so little that we can rely upon anywhere.

What we discover in our lives and in our meditation is that we are not in control. We discover this over and over. We seem to get somewhere in our practice, a moment of calmness, a moment when we have relief from the endless commentary. We feel that we're arriving, we're finally making some progress, and the next moment it disappears.

We tend to be rather slow learners around this issue of control. Slow to get the reality that this is an undeniable truth in our lives, that we are not in control. Sometimes we are slow in learning that our attempts to control the uncontrollable and to grasp the ungraspable actually creates for us yet more fear and turmoil and struggle.

What meditation does is teach us about our lives. It teaches us about the nature of uncertainty. Do you know what the next thought you will have will be? No. Do you know what the next feeling that will arise in you will be? Can you choose it? No. Can you say to yourself or give instructions to yourself, "Oh, yeah, it's time for a little bliss. I'll have that now"? Or can you say to yourself, if an angry feeling or a thought of anger comes, "No, not today. I'm not up for this today," and it's just going to disappear?

Do we know what the next moment will bring for us, whether it's going to be some delightful body sensation, an ecstatic mind state, or will it be a burning resentment and doubt? We don't know. This state or this experience you are in right now—do you know when it will end, if ever?

There are real limits to our willpower and control. Sometimes we come on retreats and we think this is the right time for resolving this particular issue in our life or making this decision, and it doesn't even arise. Sometimes we come on retreats thinking we've resolved all those issues and made all those decisions, and countless ones arise.

Not knowing, uncertainty—this is the truth of our lives. And what do we do with that space? How do we respond? It is certainly one of the most challenging spaces to be with.

This illusion of control or being in charge is one of our most highly prized treasures. And often we don't want to see what an illusion it is. Recently in Time Magazine, which tends to be one of my major sources of information, I read that we have a new word for delusion, and it's called being "reality challenged." But sometimes around this issue or question of control we are indeed reality challenged. We don't want to see it as an illusion.

That is actually the nature of delusion, that we don't want to see something as being an illusion. Because to see this whole notion or issue of control as being transparent would actually really challenge and threaten perhaps many of our positions and strategies that we hold onto so desperately in our lives for safety and identity and security. We really hold at times very close to our hearts the desire to be able to say, "I know something," or "I am something," or "I have something."

I wonder if you've ever found yourself curious about the commentary that goes through your mind in a day. Have you noticed today as you walk around this place how many words we have, how many descriptions we create? Sometimes it feels almost automatic, even compulsive, to offer a little commentary about everything. The world is not inviting it, and yet we find a certain security in being able to say, "I know something." These are our attempts to make the unknown familiar to us.

Recently I watched a wonderful documentary about someone who wanted to explore what it felt like to spend time in solitude in the Arctic. He was taken by dog sled to a place far beyond any human habitation and left there with a tent and supplies—everything he needed to survive. The arrangement was that a helicopter would come every few days to bring him supplies, and he had his own video camera to film himself.

On the first day, he was speaking to the camera about how humbled he felt, how awed he was by the vastness of this space. He talked about looking out and seeing no fences, no boundaries, no marks of it belonging to anyone. He spoke about that sense of wonder, the universality of that space.

A few days later, when the helicopter crew came to deliver supplies, he started complaining about them walking on his snow. After they left and returned the next time, they were surprised to see that he'd erected a fence of tape around his tent and made himself a yard.

This seems ridiculous, but I hope we can smile at our own behavior when we come on retreats. Sometimes we arrive at this universal space—one of the blessings here is that it really doesn't belong to anybody and belongs to everybody. Yet it's not unusual that after a day or so, we start becoming territorial. "That's my walking space." "What is that person doing sitting in my favorite chair in the dining room?" "What happened to my mug—my favorite mug that should be waiting for me on the shelf?"

We begin to mark out our own little spaces. We want that sense of safety and control. Sometimes this includes wanting very definite ideas about who we are, even though the truth is that those very definite ideas become the very definite traps we fall into in our lives.

We have such a vast vocabulary about ourselves: "I'm angry, I'm sad, I'm a good yogi, I'm a terrible yogi, I'm old, I'm young, I'm loving, I'm aggressive." We also have all these appendages about what we have—our possessions, our experiences. They become like treasures that we hold very closely.

What is happening in that movement within us is often that we are looking for a refuge. We are looking to grasping, to holding, to be our refuge—to provide sanctuary for ourselves in a changing and uncertain world. We believe perhaps on some level that grasping and holding will protect us, will provide a safe haven, until we look more clearly and deeply and see that our grasping is also subject to change and offers no protection against uncertainty. Often we are looking to grasping and holding to provide something that is impossible for them to do.

Underneath those movements of grasping lies that longing in us to find a refuge—a very genuine, heartfelt longing to find a place of ease, a place where we can simply be. Yet we sometimes become confused about how that refuge will come to us. I think we become confused because of fear and anxiety.

When we feel disconnected, separate from the rhythms of life and from life's truth, when we feel out of touch with the nature of life and ourselves, we often feel anxious and fearful. So we see the refuge we're looking for—that refuge of calmness—as somehow a destination we'll arrive at when we've found something reliable, when we reach a place where we won't be disturbed or challenged anymore. We come to believe that our refuge relies upon getting rid of the difficult, the sorrowful, and the disturbing.

There are obvious problems with this belief. The most obvious is that our refuge becomes endlessly separate and apart from this moment, a destination we feel unlikely ever to reach.

This search for a sense of refuge is worth reflecting on. A true refuge, a refuge of calm abiding—if it is genuine, if it is authentic—cannot lie as some future destination. Instead, that refuge will be found in the way we are present in the midst of the challenging, in the midst of the uncertain, in the midst of the difficult. Our refuge will not be found when the difficult or uncertain ends, but through our willingness to open and learn to find balance in all the moments of our life.

The fear and anxiety evoked in us through encountering the uncertain and changing is not something to run from. Fear and anxiety can be friends and allies. They can teach us and inspire us to look more deeply, to discover and question what a true refuge is, what an authentic refuge is. They invite us to ask ourselves: Is there a way we can embrace all the rhythms of our lives—change and uncertainty, praise and blame, gain and loss, success and failure? Is there a way we can embrace all of this without ever losing our sense of balance?

It seems to me that this exploration is really at the heart of every spiritual journey. This path is not all that concerned with having profound states of concentration or dazzling experiences or arriving at some ideal destination. Rather, this path is actually concerned with turning towards ourselves and turning towards this moment. This is also the greatest challenge of this path.

Think about what is happening here for you. We have a body. Sometimes our bodies are complaining, sometimes they're distressed. This is happening to our bodies throughout our lives. We are faced with a mind that at times feels riotous and unsettled, which can feel full or feel very heavy—this mind is a companion all through our lives. We are faced with a whole range of feelings: joy and happiness and peace, but also feelings of sorrow, of rejection, of negativity. This is the whole range of feelings that we meet in our lives.

We are faced with moments where there feels to be little reliability—when calmness gets swallowed by agitation, when a moment of peace is followed by a moment when we feel that every single thing is wrong. These moments are not unique to retreats. They happen in our lives, they happen in our meditation, they happen to all of us. How do we respond? How do we respond to these moments?

Sometimes our response takes the form of trying to jump into the next moment. When we are faced with the disturbing or the difficult, we think, "How can I get away from this? When is it going to be over? How can I make it end?" Sometimes when we're faced with the difficult, our mind might take the twist of trying to figure out where it came from. Where did these feelings come from? Where did these thoughts come from? Why are they here? What have I done to deserve all this?

We see that many of our ways of responding to the difficult are ways that actually invite a storm of stories, a storm of thinking about what we are experiencing—a storm of thinking that involves strategies about how to fix it, how to move away from it. We tend to see moments of challenge or difficulty as obstacles, as bad signs that somehow reflect on us badly. In those moments of difficulty, we are inclined to think in terms of failure, of being a spiritual disaster. And so we look for refuge in their endings.

Sometimes we are successful in trying to turn away and divorce ourselves from what is happening in the moment. Sometimes we can go to sleep, eat something, invite some really intriguing fantasy in, or get involved in some juicy planning session. Temporarily it seems to remove us or distance us from that which challenges us. But is it peaceful? Is it actually a refuge of calmness of being? Or is it simply a postponement and an acceleration or a reinforcing of fear? Will we say at the moment of our death, "I don't like this, I think I'll turn on the TV"?

In these moments of change and challenge, aversion and avoidance and numbness don't rescue us. Very often a very deep change, a very heartfelt change and transformation, a shift in attitude is called for if we are truly going to learn the skills and the art of being with, of turning towards what is actually happening in every moment of our lives. A very deep shift in our hearts is needed if we are really going to find a refuge within ourselves and in the midst of all that is occurring. And it is possible for us to do this.

One thing we can be sure of is that we are not going to find that sense of refuge, of calm abiding, within the contents of our minds, our feelings, or our bodies. We are not going to find a refuge within the variety of thoughts or images or memories or sensations or likes or dislikes.

What happens when we do that? What happens when we get so entangled in the contents of what we are experiencing? We very rarely find calmness. Instead, more often what we find is agitation and busyness. We find ourselves in that very familiar position of always trying to fix, trying to alter, trying to control, trying to make things different—always in the position of the doer, operating according to our likes and dislikes. We're looking for the perfect experience, and for us, that means the undisturbed experience. But sadly, it's like the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow.

You know, I think it's so interesting to track this in our meditation. Sometimes we perhaps, on the first day, feel very dull or very agitated. And we really think, "Aha, this is no good. I've got to get somewhere else." So we struggle with it and work with it. And maybe we get rid of it. For a moment we're happy.

But then we think, "Well, is this peace? This is kind of boring. Something else should be happening. This is not quite satisfying enough. Surely I ought to be having a really profound experience here. And then I'll be content."

Sometimes in our practice we really need to find and nurture and develop the trust and patience to let go of the contents a little bit. It's okay if there's dullness. It's okay if there's agitation. It's okay if there's aversion. It's okay if there's resistance. It's okay if there's fantasy. This doesn't mean that we're necessarily reinforcing these states or buying into them or inviting them to linger forever. We're not making this into some sort of permanent home. But it is as it is.

There's another way of being where we're not quite so entangled with our judgments and evaluations around that content. We're perhaps looking to discover a little bit of a vaster, bigger, more heartfelt space to rest in that is actually so allowing of all that content—a way of being present where there is spaciousness, where there is clarity, that is not dependent on the what of what is happening.

There's a wonderful story of a Tibetan yogi called Milarepa who, as the story goes, trained initially to be a sorcerer and inflicted much harm through black magic. Beginning to feel tremendous remorse and suffering over his actions, he decided to travel a new path. He went to find a teacher and found the teacher Marpa, saying he wanted really to let go of the suffering of his life.

Well, Marpa didn't just instruct him to find his zafu and sit down and meditate. Instead, he got him building towers. Single-handedly, he would instruct Milarepa to build these huge towers out of stone. Imagine—it's not easy work. So Milarepa would do this and build these towers. And every time, just as the tower came near completion, Marpa would come along and say, "No, Mila, that's not quite what I had in mind. That's not quite where I meant you to build it." Then he would have to tear down the tower and go and start over again, building another tower. And again, just as it was nearing completion, Marpa would come along and say, "Too bad, Mila, really, again it's not quite what I wanted."

This was his practice: building towers, taking down towers, building towers, taking down towers. There's something that happens through that kind of practice. It's about patience. It's about being with just what is. It's really about not being so concerned with the towers or stories that we construct and build, but with that quality of being that is so unconditional.

This is a very profound breakthrough in meditation—learning what it means to be with what is. To have the patience and the openness and the balance where our sense of being is really not so dependent, not so reliant upon the what of what is happening.

Now, what are the qualities of heart and mind that really are a shift? What really allows us to find this quality of spaciousness and refuge within our own capacity to see? One of those qualities is a loving and compassionate acceptance that embraces every single moment without distinction.

As long as there is aversion, there is separation, distance. Think of that here. Perhaps you felt aversion today towards a sensation in your body, or towards a mind state that's arisen, or towards another person, maybe towards yourself just generally. What happens when there's that aversion? We feel very separate. We don't want to be with. We don't want to be close. We want to be distant.

And yet also, what is one of the ingredients, one of the primary characteristics of that feeling of separateness?

Wherever it occurs in our lives is fear. We fear that which we feel separated from. It feels like an enemy, like an opponent. And sometimes we very much preserve separation through resistance and through judgment. These are almost like the servants of separation, our resistance and judgment. They serve to keep us apart.

And there is a real art and a real skillfulness in actually learning to let our judgments and resistances be. You don't have to do anything with them. You don't have to make them into something different. You don't have to make them better. You don't have to make them more spiritual. You don't have to get rid of them. But to learn to let them be.

And how do we do that? By not fueling them. The primary fuel for judgment is thought. Thought that is charged with feelings of aversion. It is the fuel that makes them continue.

A lot of this practice is about learning to withdraw blame. To learn to allow all things to be as they are. Loving and compassionate acceptance does not mean a kind of blindness or condoning, but it does mean a willingness to allow and to listen. Sometimes that loving and compassionate acceptance means a simple willingness to stay present with whatever is happening just as it is.

Think of having a thought of anger, for example. Maybe someone's crossed your walking path today. And that thought comes up. Maybe they've done it before, which is even worse. That thought comes up, "Oh, they're like this. There's such an insensitive person, such an unmindful person." Now in this context, that thought is often followed by another thought, which says, "I am so judgmental. Why am I so judgmental?" The aversion keeps it going, doesn't it? It keeps the thinking going. It is the fuel.

Now what happens if we just, instead of fueling it, let it be. Just let it be. Stay simply present. There is no fuel. There is no foothold. We learn to be present in a loving and compassionate way, which actually liberates all things. It liberates all things to unfold. It liberates ourselves to unfold.

If you think of the seasons of nature—summer and winter and autumn and spring—we wouldn't think that it would be a path of wisdom to shout at winter and say it should be summer. We wouldn't think it would be a path of wisdom to go outside today and say, "Why are you cold? It's the middle of summer. You shouldn't be cold." It is as it is, isn't it? It is as it is.

It is somewhat similar within ourselves. The Buddha once said that all things arise because of conditions. All things arise because of conditions. This is a wonderful pathway for withdrawing blame. All things arise because of conditions.

Sometimes due to our own conditioning, our mind and heart has been shaped in particular ways. Sometimes through that shaping there are thoughts and feelings that arise that may be angry, that may be unkind, that may be reactive. It is no wisdom to shout at them and to say you should be different. There is a wisdom in appreciating the roots and the history of those thoughts and feelings. Appreciate that all things arise because of conditions.

But there is also tremendous wisdom in really appreciating the way that we cultivate the shape of our own heart and mind in this moment through how we are present.

Through how we are present, we are actually transforming the shape of our own heart and mind so that it owes itself not so much to history or conditioning, but rather finds its form rooted in attention—in a loving, caring attentiveness, in acceptance and in being present. A different climate of heart and mind emerges that frees our own inner seasons to unfold.

Discovering a refuge in our lives, a place of calm abiding, also asks us to cultivate the art of non-dwelling, of non-stickiness, of not taking hold of anything. We learn this art in our meditation by returning over and over to the simplicity of this moment, the simplicity of one breath. We are actually learning one of life's most important arts—the art of non-stickiness, the art of non-dwelling, the art of allowing all things to be.

We can see there actually are many options in our lives. Sometimes we sit and walk here in retreat, and especially in the beginning, it seems like there are so many thoughts—countless thoughts. Sometimes it seems there are so many places we could become entangled, and do get entangled. Sometimes we want to struggle with that mind. We don't need to struggle with it. We're not trying here to have a particular kind of mind or a perfect mind. What we are actually trying to develop is a more intuitive way of seeing and contacting and connecting and understanding through being simply present.

That connection with the more intuitive way of seeing is really nurtured through non-dwelling. But this takes a commitment on our part. There's a lot of juice in those stories and thoughts—a lot of juice. It takes a true commitment to say, "Let it be. In this moment, let it be." Come back to this simplicity of direct connectedness and trust that through that, the intuition and understanding we so much seek will be found.

Meditation is about learning to touch all things with calmness—learning to touch all things with calmness, our thoughts, our bodies, our feelings. As we learn to touch all things with calmness, everything begins to settle, begins to slow down a little, begins to become more visible to us. In grasping hold of nothing, we are also not grasped.

Patience is a big part of this. Sometimes in the Tibetan tradition they call it the long enduring mind, which sounds a little difficult or unpleasant, but it's about patience—about patience, acceptance, being with. It means not thinking about results or completions or arrivals, not thinking about how much nearer we're getting to our destination or how much we're progressing or how much we've gotten rid of or how far we have to go.

It means that there's really only one moment that we need to attend to and only one moment that asks for our care—and that's the moment that we are in. In actually providing and offering that care, we also find our refuge in that moment. A refuge of calmness, a refuge of balance, and a refuge of understanding.

Thank you.

If we have a couple of moments quietly together.

May our beings live with calmness.
May our beings live with balance.
May our beings live with understanding.

CHAPTER 192

Our Karma Is Our Dharma: Family Course 1997

In this dharma talk from 1997, Guy Armstrong presents the profound teaching that "Our karma is our dharma" - how our life circumstances, particularly family life, become our spiritual practice. Drawing from his own experience with a household ant invasion, Armstrong demonstrates how mindfulness (sati) transforms mundane moments into opportunities for insight and awakening.

The talk explores three key Buddhist teachings through the lens of householder practice. First, mindfulness as a "non-judging, non-manipulative, non-grasping" orientation to the present moment that creates space for wisdom to arise naturally. Second, impermanence (anicca) as taught through raising children, who constantly remind us to let go and accept change. Armstrong weaves in poetry from Kahlil Gibran and others to illustrate how children teach us the practice of letting go "in the midst of deep love." Third, interconnectedness (pratītyasamutpāda) revealed through observing our children's development, which mirrors the evolutionary stages of all life.

Armstrong emphasizes that householders during the Buddha's time achieved full enlightenment "right in the midst of it all," and encourages practitioners to see every moment - whether sitting in intensive retreat or dealing with household crises - as equally valid opportunities for awakening. The talk concludes with the vision of becoming a "wise baby" - maintaining the complete presence of children while developing the mature capacity for understanding that leads to liberation.

Our life is really our practice. It's truly nothing other than this. Whether we're sitting for days on end in an intensive meditation retreat, or we're practicing in the midst of our family life, in the midst of our work life, in the midst of our play life—practicing in the midst of all the many and varied aspects of our life as a householder, which may or may not include periods of formal sitting meditation practice as well.

It's said that during the time of the Buddha there were many householders who became fully enlightened right in the midst of it all. We might not hold out for this possibility, or we might not hold on to this possibility—at least not too tightly. But we certainly do wake up over and over again in hundreds of small and bigger ways as we deepen in our relationship to our life as our practice. It's an inevitable fruit of this intention of ours to make our life our practice. Our karma is our dharma, actually.

One of the primary means, the primary skills—a particular quality of mind and heart that provides the ground for awakening, provides the fertile ground for insight to blossom in moments of our life—is what's called mindfulness. It seems now that mindfulness has become quite a commonly used word. In an intensive retreat I sometimes refer to it as having become a household word. How fortunate for us that it's a household word.

What is it really? What is it? And what is it that makes mindfulness a spiritual practice—this very incredibly powerful, helpful, and protective skill?

Mindfulness is a non-judging, non-manipulative, non-grasping or non-clinging, non-rejecting orientation to the present moment—any present moment. It's also meeting the moment with interest, with energy, meeting the moment with an interested curiosity.

So what is it that makes this flavor of meeting the present moment a spiritual practice? When we're so present in this way, there's an openness. There's room. There's a great spaciousness of heart, great spaciousness of mind, even if just briefly. There's a calmness. There's a spaciousness. And in this, there's room for clarity to arise, for insight, for true understanding to arise, which in a truly mindful moment is actually inevitable. It will arise.

Wisdom quite spontaneously arises. We don't have to do anything to make it happen. Wisdom, true understanding, isn't very far away at all. In fact, it's right here. It's ever present. It's not something we have to go after. It's not something we have to attain. In a sense, all we have to do is create the right conditions for this very natural occurrence to just simply happen. One of the primary occurrences is the development of a mindful attention—a mindful attention to the moments in our life, any moment in our life.

It's not just in intensive retreat time that we develop mindful moments. Right in the midst of any occurrence, any situation, and sometimes in the most unlikely, seemingly mundane occurrences, with mindful attention, with a presence, a mindful presence, deep understanding can arise—or a strengthening, a broadening, an expanding of understandings that have already come to us.

I sometimes think of mindfulness as magic, actually, but not the kind of magic that the magician performs that takes us into the illusion and sweeps us into it and holds us in it. Rather, it's the magic of mindfulness that takes us out of the illusion, out of the delusion, right directly into the midst of reality. It sometimes feels like magic when this happens, when we see so clearly and when we're no longer caught in the veils of illusion.

Just recently, last week actually, I came home to my house up in the mountains in Taos about four o'clock in the afternoon after a busy day, ready to settle down and prepare a Dharma talk for our Thursday evening sitting group that night. I was in the house for a few moments and I heard what sounded like rain coming down the heat stove pipe. There weren't any clouds outside. I looked out—there wasn't even a cloud over my little house. But it sounded like rain coming down my heat stove pipe.

I busied myself with some things, and in a few moments I noticed that there were dozens of small flying red ants beginning to cover the carpet in my house and cover the floor. They were coming out of the heat stove—dozens of them, and then hundreds of them, and then it seemed like there were thousands of them. My carpet was a kind of pulsing...

aliveness of red ants. It was quite amazing. Thoughts, of course, started coming very quickly. What to do? I have a Dharma talk to write, and these ants are here, and I can't write my Dharma talk, and how am I going to get rid of them?

Maybe I'm going to be eaten alive in my own house. Anger arose at the ants for taking up the time and the space that I was supposed to be preparing this inspiring talk for students that night.

At some point I noticed that the ants were in this great vibrating swarm covering my carpet—literally thousands of them, I think. I didn't count. They were moving towards the light, moving in the direction of the windows and the doors. This was interesting to me because they couldn't see, but they had a sense.

At one point, I started feeling very much in the minority. There was just one little me, this little person, and thousands and thousands of these ants. Fear came up. I thought, I'll have to leave. That was the point where I thought, maybe I'll get eaten alive in my own house. The mind is pretty tricky, actually.

All of this was happening very quickly, and I thought, I can't kill these ants. I just can't do it. In fact, the thought of it and seeing the life force there on my carpet, the thought of killing them all made me nauseous. So I knew I couldn't do that, but what to do?

I called my landlord and reached her on the phone. She said that the same thing had happened to her last spring. The ants make a nest in the stovepipe, and on a nice warm summer day after a rain, they hatch. You know how anthills are—there are thousands of ants in an anthill. They come down the stovepipe and also go up the stovepipe, and they came into the house out of all the openings in my wood stove. The thing to do was to close up the stove with saran wrap and tape.

So I busily set myself to doing that. But I also needed to get rid of them. I didn't know what to do because I couldn't kill them. So I decided to vacuum them up. I vacuumed them all up. It took a couple of hours. The whole thing took about two and a half hours. I vacuumed them all up and then took the vacuum cleaner bag outside and opened it up and let them go into where they really wanted to be anyways, out into the open, natural world.

At the end of the two and a half hours, it was time for me to leave for my sitting group. And I hadn't written a Dharma talk. But it occurred to me somewhere along in that process that my karma was going to be my Dharma that night—that this whole experience would be the perfect thing to take to the students, which I did, and which I'm bringing here now.

There was an incredible amount of understanding and insight that came in the midst of all of this strange phenomena happening in my life—strange and seemingly quite mundane phenomena.

When the ants were moving towards the light, that very innate, very deep instinct towards staying alive, I could feel it. I could feel it in their movement and in their very intuitive sense of moving towards the light, towards the outside. And I could feel that in my heart, a kind of tug, a kind of quivering in my heart of knowing that too, knowing that same feeling, not different from what was happening with this pulsing life on my carpet.

I also felt, off and on through that couple of hours, the preciousness of human existence—kind of two aspects of that. One is that we really are a rare species. If you think of how many just ants there are in the world, let alone other insects and other creatures, there's not very many of us humans. We're a pretty rare species in this world. And I was really feeling it quite graphically in the midst of my living room as being a minority among thousands.

The other aspect of precious human existence that came up for me was a very ancient teaching that I remembered again about precious human existence, which I'd like to read to you. It said that

Those who have a precious human existence and have the opportunity to practice the Dharma in this precious human existence are as rare as daytime stars.

There's also an ancient teaching story that I remembered in the midst of this that speaks to me deeply. It says that if all the world were water and a golden ring were thrown upon the water to be blown about by the winds, a blind turtle, surfacing once every hundred years, would put its neck more easily into that ring than you would obtain a precious human existence.

And so now that we have obtained this precious human existence, to not set out on the path of practice that leads to freedom would be more wasteful than a poor man who finds a house filled with precious jewels and who didn't do anything meaningful with them but just frittered them away.

The first precept of not killing was very potent for me that afternoon during those hours with the ants. The Dharma talk that night was very lively and pertinent in many ways for the people attending. My karma became our Dharma that night, thanks to the ants, and thanks to the magic of mindfulness right in the midst of it all.

One of the most potent pieces of practice that we're given in our household life—and very powerfully through our children—is the teaching and practice of impermanence, which is really the bedrock of the Buddhist teachings. This was the initial insight that impelled the Buddha to leave the palace where he was born and raised, in search of a path to enlightenment.

In our formal meditation practice, we learn to see and surrender to the fleetingness of the moment—a breath, a thought, a sensation in the body, a feeling arising and changing and passing again and again. Our children are such wonderful teachers for us in this seeing and surrendering to change. We keep learning over and over through our children, with our children, to just let go, to let go so that their ever-changing nature may unfold.

Our children continuously remind us to loosen our mindset about who we think they are or who we think they should be or who we think they could be. They continually remind us to pay attention when we get stuck or when we forget, as they just continue becoming who they are.

My youngest son, who today is thirty years old, used to look me right in the face and say—nicely, or at least fairly often nicely—"Mom, you don't have to say that," or "Mom, you don't have to do that." He was my mindfulness bell many times as he was growing up. It surprised me, usually surprised me and woke me up. Occasionally he still does this to me in a very similar way—telling me to stop, pay attention, see who he is now, and then now, and then now, and to wake up to the present moment just as it is.

Kahlil Gibran said, "Your children are not your children. They are sons and daughters of life's longing for itself. They come through you, but not from you. And though they are with you, yet they belong not to you. You may give them your love, but not your thoughts, for they have their own thoughts. You may house their bodies, but not their souls, for their souls dwell in the house of tomorrow, which you cannot visit, not even in your dreams. You may strive to be like them, but seek not to make them like you. For life goes not backward, nor tarries with yesterday."

This process of bringing children into the world and then raising them has seemed to me over the years basically a process of letting go—letting go in the midst of deep love, letting go in the midst of the heart of compassion, letting go with the very natural and growing wisdom that inevitably arises in and out of our intention to make our life our practice.

This is a poem by a man named Red Hawk. It's called "The Wheat Farmer Says Goodbye to His Only Daughter":

His heart cracks like parched earth to see her go, but he is not free enough to weep. So he walks with her this evening out in the summer wheat where the stalks beat softly. Suddenly in his fertile anguish, his heart blooms. And like the last mad king of wild wheat, he grabs his child and twirls her. Through the sea of grain, he whirls her. She holding tight, he boldly dancing in the moonlight. When at last they fall, he is winded and amazed. On his knees, he embraces her. And then she takes her leaving, like a wild wheat flower dancing, waving in the softly breathing wind. He watches her go, weaving, moving slowly through the moonlight. And he fingers ripened grain in calloused hand. There's just one thing to do now that his daughter is departed: to harvest cleanly and without regret. In this way he pays homage to the precious seeds he planted. One blooms by rooting and one by blowing away.

The potency of practicing impermanence is immediately accessible in our life as householders in an endless array of ways when we pay attention in any moment. All the changes in daily life—many of which we may have subtle or perhaps strong resistance to—reveal that much of the time we're actually practicing permanence, not impermanence. Much of the time we want everything to stay as it is, to continue as we know it, or to become the way we want it to be. So often we believe that we have control and that things will always remain the same or do what we want them to do.

But this belief is really only make-believe. As we begin to see more clearly, we discover that belief has little or nothing to do with reality. The tighter we grasp onto our beliefs, the more limited our life becomes. We often construct our lives on this flimsy, rickety foundation of make-believe—made-up beliefs built upon assumptions, sometimes misinformation, opinions, ideas about this and that—and we hold on quite tightly.

In reality, the very fabric, the very essence of life is change. So why do we fear and resist this perfectly natural phenomenon? Why do we struggle against change, the beginnings and endings, the births and deaths? Why can't we surrender to the truth of the moment? Why do we resist and fear so much of life?

Without impermanence, there would be no life. As Thich Nhat Hanh teaches: "If there is no impermanence, the grain of corn will remain a grain of corn forever, and you will never have an ear of corn to eat. Impermanence is crucial to the life of everything." So instead of complaining about impermanence, we might say, "Long live impermanence! Thanks to impermanence, everything is possible."

Can you imagine if nothing ever changed? It would be the most incredible nightmare. Looked at from this perspective, impermanence is actually an amazing natural marvel. All life on the planet is changing all the time. All life is dying in the same volume as new life is arising—the new life that brings such incredible joy and delight each spring, the new day that greets us each morning when we wake up.

William Blake wrote: "He who binds himself to a joy does the winged life destroy, but he who kisses the joy as it flies lives in eternity's sunrise."

As we look more closely at our own process—particularly at a time like this when there is more time and support to do so—as we explore more deeply by simply being with things as they are, we might begin to see that we've been living under what one teacher called an "assumed identity." The assumed solidity of our body and thoughts, the grasping and trying to hold onto these ephemeral thoughts, feelings, emotions—all these habitual fixations that we live with and believe and call our own, call "me," call "mine"—that we think define who we are.

As we practice formal meditation and live with mindful attention, we begin to see and experience more directly that things aren't necessarily as they appear—or at least as they have appeared until now. We begin to experience the whole thing as process happening, as changing sensations, changing feelings, as various manifestations of energy with different qualities, flavors, textures.

Again, our children are among the very best teachers in this respect, as they quickly manifest changing emotional states within just a few moments—changing likes and dislikes in the space of a breath.

As we deepen in our acceptance and understanding of change, of impermanence, our relationship to all forms, both inner and outer, begins to change. What might be a compulsive, addictive grasping—trying to hold onto the passing show—begins to loosen its strong attraction. Trying to control what is actually uncontrollable, this ongoing miracle of constant change we call life, begins to soften. We open our hands, so to speak.

We begin to see how excruciating it is to grasp so tightly. The fear underneath the impulse to control—the fear of being in and with life—begins to relax and open. The fear begins to weaken and fade as we surrender, opening to and surrendering more deeply to the truth of the moment. Now we're practicing impermanence.

Many of us have at times had a very strong identification with our face and body, how they looked when we were younger. My mother, who is eighty-five years old, sometimes stands next to me looking in the mirror—not as a planned event, but it just happens. One time we were looking in the mirror together at ourselves and each other, and she said, "I see an old woman. It's so strange."

And she kept repeating over and over again, "It's so strange, I see an old woman." Then she said, "I've changed so much. It's so strange to see." And then, "I've changed more than anybody. It's so strange." She said, "It doesn't match how I feel inside. It's so strange. So strange."

But what is strange? Stranger than what? This is life—life being lifey, life doing what it does, life doing its thing.

Have you ever stood in front of a mirror and looked at your face quite intently for a long time, just focused your attention on your face? If you do, it keeps changing, just keeps changing. Whose face is this? Who is this face? Who sees? If you've never tried it or if you haven't done it for a long time, try it sometime.

In our life, our life is practice.

Another potent teacher—of course there are many—is the world of nature. A number of years ago I was here at the Meditation Center in the midst of a long retreat. This happens to be a story from a long retreat, but it could be at any moment in any of our lives, being outside and paying attention.

I was sitting out back watching the grasses. It was late fall and things were changing quite rapidly. I was watching the grasses, and over days particular blades of grass even—you know sometimes when you're on a long retreat you can get fixated on certain things. So I was watching these blades of grass changing. They were changing color, losing their color, changing shape, curling over, drying up. Just watching this happen in an intent way over the days.

Are we different than this? Really, are we different than this? No matter how much moisturizer we use, no matter how many vitamins we take or how much healthy good food we eat, no matter how much exercise we do, our skin dries out, our body changes shape, our hair loses its color. No matter how hard we try, we just don't stay young. This mass of skin and bones has its schedule to keep and there's absolutely nothing we can do about it.

This is from very wonderful Kalu Rinpoche, no longer alive—although he actually has been reborn: "We live in the illusion and appearance of things. There is a reality. We are that reality. When we understand this, we see that we are nothing. And being nothing, we are everything. That is all."

In our commitment and intention to make our life our practice, as our karma becomes our dharma, and with a deepening acceptance of the natural wonder of change and impermanence, this quite naturally leads us to the reality of interbeing, as Thich Nhat Hanh calls it. The reality of interconnectedness. The reality that we truly are everything. That as José said the other night, "I am because you are, you are because I am."

Again our family practice. Our children are such strong teachers.

We know from photographs taken of the development of the fetus in the womb that a baby—that each of us in the womb—goes through the various stages of evolution as cells multiply and develop into the human form. When my children were born, after they were born, as they were going through their developmental stages out of the womb, I found myself quite fascinated, quite amazed actually, as they again reflected the evolutionary stages of life on the planet.

I found myself calling them little fishy as they were lying on their bellies making swimming movements. Then they became little lizards or little snakes as they were squirming along the floor. Then frogs when they first began sitting hunched over in their round baby bodies. Then they turned into four-leggeds—the slow moving kind at first, then into the speedy agile four-legged creatures.

And then finally they stood and moved into the upright, two-legged world of human beings. I actually hadn't paid very much attention at all to this process until I'd had my own children. I'd never really noticed it. This intimate observation and relationship, this connection to a process that is truly much, much bigger, much broader than what was taking place with my own children, was in moments an incredibly expansive, inclusive and awakening experience.

There's nothing left out, nothing left out in our family practice. Life is our practice, as long as we're willing to keep engaging and opening to the gifts.

Just a few weeks ago, I was teaching a retreat in New Mexico. A grandmother in her mid-sixties came in for an interview. In her work life, she's a high-powered politician in the Texas legislature. She told me that during this past year, a new grandchild was born into her family, and so she went to visit the family very soon after the birth took place. Her son and daughter-in-law let her hold the baby for almost the entire four days that she was visiting, and she cried actually for a good part of those four days with the baby in her arms. Her son thought something was wrong, but she assured him that, in fact, everything was quite, quite okay.

She told me that she had forgotten the incredible purity and the complete presence of the very young. She hadn't experienced this for a long, long time in her life in the political world. Her heart was simply opening again. She was crying tears of deep joy, touching this essentialness, this pure beingness, touching again what's sometimes called our original face. The baby was a reminder, a heart opening.

And along with this, there was an arising of the heart of compassion in her—compassion both for herself and for others. For how far away we can get from this, from this profound connection. How swept up in other important business we so often are.

This is from a Tibetan song of enlightenment called "The Flight of the Garuda":

"Knowing that this state is within oneself, how amazing that one searches for it elsewhere. Although it is clearly manifest like the radiance of the sun, how amazing that so few see it. No matter how much happiness and sorrow is experienced, how amazing that it is never impaired or improved in the slightest. This self-awareness is naturally free from the very first. How amazing that it is liberated by just resting at ease with whatever happens."

Our karma, our family practice, our commitment to relating to our life as our practice, and our children being maybe the strongest, most powerful teachers that we will encounter—this is our dharma.

I sometimes think of awakening as becoming a wise baby. The complete presence that babies, that very young children have in the midst of whatever is taking place inside them and around them. It's a pre-verbal, non-conceptual, total presence. Can we be so present, even for just a moment?

Granted, new beings don't have the capacity to understand conceptually. But we do. In our maturing selves, in any moment of pure presence, we have the capacity to understand, not out of our intellect, but the spontaneous intuitive wisdom that arises quite naturally if we're present in our lives with a mindful attention, present with a non-judging, non-manipulative, non-grasping or non-clinging, non-rejecting orientation to the present moment.

Maybe as we wake up, we become like a wise baby.

I'd like to close with a poem called "Hokusai Says." Hokusai maybe you know is the Japanese painter who painted that huge wave, great big wave that is pretty well known, pretty popular. This is a poem by Roger Keys:

"Hokusai says, look carefully. He says, pay attention, notice. He says, keep looking, stay curious. He says, there's no end to seeing. He says, look forward to getting old. He says, keep changing, you just get more who you really are. He says, get stuck, accept it, repeat yourself as long as it's interesting. He says, keep doing what you love. He says, keep praying. He says every one of us is a child."

Every one of us is ancient.
Every one of us has a body.
He says every one of us is frightened.
He says every one of us has to find a way to live with fear.
He says everything is alive.
Shells, buildings, people, fish, mountains, trees—wood is alive, water is alive.
Everything has its own life.
Everything lives inside us.
He says live with the world inside you.

He says it doesn't matter if you draw or write books.
It doesn't matter if you saw wood or catch fish.
It doesn't matter if you sit at home and stare at the ants on your veranda or in your living room, or watch the shadows of the trees and the grasses in your garden.
It matters that you care.

It matters that you feel.
It matters that you notice.
It matters that life lives through you.

Contentment is life living through you.
Joy is life living through you.
Satisfaction and strength is life living through you.
Peace is life living through you.

He says, don't be afraid.
Don't be afraid.
Look.
Feel.
Let life take you by the hand.
Let life live through you.

Let's sit together for just a moment.

CHAPTER 193

Seeing Deeply Into Experience

Guy Armstrong · 47 min

> In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines how to work skillfully with the varied experiences that arise in meditation and daily life. He addresses the tendency toward complacency during pleasant experiences and reactivity during difficult ones, offering practical guidance for breaking free from habitual patterns of response.
> Drawing from the traditional teaching of the seven factors of enlightenment (satta bojjhaṅga) - mindfulness (sati), investigation (dhammavicaya), energy (vīriya), joy (pīti), tranquility (passaddhi), concentration (samādhi), and equanimity (upekkhā) - Armstrong emphasizes the importance of cultivating all these qualities rather than focusing on just one or two. He illustrates his teaching with a story about responding to workplace anger with unexpected generosity, demonstrating how we might move beyond familiar reactive patterns.

> The talk particularly emphasizes the value of 'not knowing' as a practice - learning to rest in uncertainty rather than immediately seeking solutions or explanations. Armstrong suggests that sometimes our greatest insights come from experiences we barely notice at the time, highlighting the importance of bringing full awareness to ordinary moments. He concludes by reflecting on joy and happiness as essential aspects of practice, cautioning against an overly serious approach that neglects the natural contentment and wonder that can arise from dedicated dharma practice.

The theme for this evening's talk is working with experience. In the flow and course of our days, the range and type of experiences that arise can vary considerably from one person to the next. These experiences can be pleasant, unpleasant, or somewhere in between.

Sometimes in the areas of pleasant experience, there's a certain kind of comfort that accompanies it. One flows quietly and easily through the day, but we don't notice when this is occurring. There can be a certain complacency in being in that kind of relative comfort zone, not realizing that in moving from sitting to walking to standing, eating, and listening, there's a fairly uniform level taking place as we go from one posture to the next, one moment to the next. Consciousness becomes quieted by that condition.

The general perception and thought that may arise regarding oneself in those times is that it's okay, it's nice, but really nothing is happening. For others moving through that field of pleasantness, there can at any time be a severe disturbance to that experience. One's mind is shaken up and begins to latch upon something—which we have been talking about over these days together. In that latching upon something, tension emerges from mind and body, along with the relationship to what's occurring.

When our experience is flowing along and then breaks, some reactivity comes, some tension comes, and it generates agitation within ourselves. With this agitation, we want to follow as clearly as we can: What do we typically do when we feel agitated? There's the agitation and the outflows from it, and the thinking can be, as it has always been, the means for getting over it. This can be all too typical. Sometimes it runs into doubt, into forms of escape, trying to see someone to solve it for us, thinking that we should be able to handle this all by ourselves.

When something impactful is going on, it will enliven other typical patterns that we have. We want to be noticing and aware not only of the agitation but what typically goes along with it—what is typical. If we recognize what is typical as unsatisfactory, then change in other ways and expressions will be necessary, sometimes going against the whole uniform way of relating.

To give you a small example: Yesterday evening, as I do on my visits here, I went to the Cambridge Insight Meditation Centre to give the evening talk. After the talk, during the question and answer period, one person said that she had felt angry all day. When asked why, she explained that she had engaged in a task at work, expecting that her colleague would want her to continue, but he had changed his mind and said no. She couldn't think of a reason why he should refuse her assistance or cooperation. She felt disappointed, hurt, and ultimately very angry with him, considering all the time, energy, and attention she had given to their previous project together.

So there's memory arising—we had worked on this before. From the memory came satisfaction in what was done. From the satisfaction came an expectation of renewal and continuity. When renewal and continuity weren't forthcoming, this affected her feeling inside. She felt agitated about it, angry. The anger was being carried around and directed at him. There's an impact process: effect and end result is feeling angry.

We explored this for a few minutes, and I asked her what she was going to do about it. She gave the usual responses that people often make in these matters—accepting, not judging—the typical Buddhist solution to everything. Sometimes one has to look completely around the other way. So my suggestion, in looking completely around the other way, was: Why not give him a gift? This is totally opposite to what the mind is doing.

She said it could feel manipulative in the face of all this, and I said, "Well, we've got between now and tomorrow to see through the manipulation and then give him a gift." Of course, we want to know what gift you're going to give him.

There's movement going on, a sequence, a typical way of looking at a situation. Then there's actually looking and asking ourselves: Could I go completely in an unfamiliar way, looking at it in a way which I've never before considered in my life? In the wish to arrest the mind, to allow something quite unusual from within to flower, we may find ourselves in that tension, in that difficulty, in that lack of acceptance, in agitation, unable to come up with an awareness or flash of insight or inspiration that totally goes against the familiarity of the mind.

But maybe in the tension and agitation, with some willingness just to stop and say, "I don't know what to do with this, but this certainly isn't the answer. This certainly can't go anywhere. I've been along this road so many times before"—in the conviction and determination to say "don't know what to do with this," not looking for some smooth operators like ourselves to give out a few pacifying solutions like "watch your breath for a little bit longer" or "send a bit of metta," but actually firming the mind up and saying "I don't know what to do with this."

Repeating that to oneself and bringing some conviction to it may generate just a little bit of space. We only want just enough to see if something can come out of that not knowing we've made for ourselves.

In a way, we make a kind of error of judgment and perception in these things. When something is tense and agitated and reactionary inside, when we're feeling irritable and hostile and negative, we all too quickly want some information, something to do in order to diffuse what we are doing with our mind, to bring in something else to help diminish that which we don't like. Of course, that resource and tool can obviously be useful and beneficial, but sometimes we look at ourselves and say, "I keep on doing that. I'm constantly looking to the books, constantly looking to methods and techniques, looking to instructions or guidance or wise advice, looking for a solution in some way or other."

Maybe we have to say to ourselves much more often: Here it is. This is what's going on. Pleasant, unwelcome, unwanted as it is, I don't know what to do with it. All I can say of myself is simply that I just don't know. Keep that steadfast, keep that clear not knowing there, and just live with it. Live with it. Whatever that burning issue might be, whatever it is will change. Things will be different. Life will go on, or one's life won't go on, but change will change.

The fretting and all that goes along with it, the attempt in this problem-solving mind where we keep thinking problem solving, improvement, problem solving—the culture's obsessed with it. Turn the attention away. Don't look for problem-solving devices. Stay steady with full, clear, unashamedly not knowing.

In attending to meditation, attending to mind and body, and finding a space that is opening and insightful to circumstances, there are also the beneficial experiences that arise. In association and contact with beneficial experiences—and Sharda was touching on this yesterday evening—there are two or three factors that deserve noticing and attention.

In the tradition, the Buddha has wisely spoken of seven factors of enlightenment, a skillful means for us to check in with ourselves: How's our relationship with each and every one of these? The first one is awareness itself, mindfulness. Those periods where we're just going along through the day can well be a kind of general mindfulness, a general consciousness from one situation to the next. But with that, to safeguard against any complacency that can occur, it's bringing the fullness of attention—as much as one can muster and draw out of one's cellular life—to clearness, to feeling, to sensing, to knowing clearness, to being extremely clear.

That might just be for one or two moments or minutes in the course of a sitting or walking, as if it was the last minute, as if there was nowhere else to go, as if nothing whatsoever could come out of it. Therefore, the clearness itself would have to be fulfilling unto itself, without any promises or additions or extra benefit in some future time. It would be it, without anything else.

We may well need this so that we're not just going mindfully through the day, but generating those moments and times where that clearness and firmness exists, where not a single sinew or cell of one's body intentionally moves. As the old monks of the tradition have said many times for many generations: When the little finger just moves for a moment, it disturbs the world of ten thousand things. One little movement affects everything everywhere.

Sometimes in our utter stillness, in our presence and transparency of our whole being, there's a clear seeing. It would be a pity, in such a privileged opportunity as we have here, to go mindfully through the day and misunderstand going mindfully through the day for the great value of one single extremely clear moment in which there's not a thought taking place, not an involvement with anything of the self taking place, no looking for anything, no reaching out for anything, no expectation of anything. Our whole existence has come to one complete halt in the moment, and nothing is going to come out of it because this is it.

That can occur and happen for us in different times, in different moments during the day. One may say the thought arises during the time, immediately afterwards: "I can't see the point. I can't see why I should just have one single clear moment. What am I going to get out of it? What good is it going to do me or the world?" Sometimes the thought arises simply because it doesn't know how to relate to that kind of expansive and firm and decisive awareness—that it could make a difference to our life in ways that all our trying to organize it and have it straight and okay and orderly and as we would wish cannot. All the wishes that go along with that—the wishing may be no substitute for that kind of presence, making possible a glimpse of something that just being quietly mindful through the day may not give us.

In the flow and rhythm of the day, questions arise too, some from the small groups and one-to-ones, in terms of insight into all of these things. It can be that we don't always know in the moment, in the occurrence, what actually is insight, what insight is actually arising. In the seven factors of enlightenment, the second one is enquiry and investigation. If in the flow of our day, in our meditation—whether one's first time on a retreat or one is well seasoned and exposed to all these areas—if it's quietly going along and one says in that quietness, "Well, nothing much is happening, just going through the day," then it might well be quite necessary to generate some focus of interest, to draw out of oneself some exploration that really begins to sharpen one's attention up.

That can obviously take different expressions and different forms. When it's a matter of the heart in the sitting, what shows? The initial response of the mind might be, "God knows, I've no idea."

But one asks oneself again in the sitting, impeccably not doing anything for any one self or other: what shows the love?

This might manifest in taking the walking meditation and walking up and down. In this practice, outwardly one is going nowhere—just walking up and down. To anybody traveling from Petersham to Barry along that road, who have watched for the last twenty years, this appears a really bizarre group because they're walking up and down and going nowhere. The same disturbing thoughts can obviously arise in one's own mind.

But then the teachings speak to this. One of our dharma teachers in Germany titled her book from the text: "Being Nobody Going Nowhere." One might walk up and down and generate the enquiry: what is the significance of this? Not just taking it as some nice little phrase about non-self, but actually absorbing the significance of being nobody and going nowhere. Learning to live with it, walking up and down again and again until something starts moving inside, something begins to show and stand out.

If one does this, of course there's going to be risk. There's risk that you might get some insight. There's risk that you get agitated. There's risk that you might start thinking about all your roles in life and who you really are and what you really should be doing and where you're really going. That's the chance. If you invite one thing in any enquiry, one might end up faced with precisely the opposite of who am I and where am I going—forgetting that the original question was being nobody with nowhere to go.

In the movement of walking up and down, or in the sitting, for some the process of meditation without introducing any reflection or enquiry is sufficient unto itself because one senses it. One senses the importance of keeping faith with meditating, keeping faith with clear awareness, keeping faith with the practices in a focused and dedicated way. This includes acknowledging periods of just mindfulness and acknowledging periods when agitations come and what's typical in those agitations.

But as I said, if it feels like a little drift—comfortable, rather nice, not extending oneself too much, always faithfully going for a second and third bowl of food, always leaving it to the last possible minute to walk into the meditation hall and being the first through the exit when the bell goes—all of this can help preserve the status quo of the comfortable self.

Sometimes we need to say to hell with this comfortable self. It's sowing the seeds for its opposite, because only wisdom gives comfort, only wisdom generates contentment of being. Sometimes we must say: rather than just going nicely and sweetly, let me extend. I want to know the immeasurable and really taste the sweetness and loveliness of it. Then I may have to extend myself a little bit from the finite towards the immeasurable.

That might include extending the sitting time, shortening the sleeping time, eating less food, staying up later. I won't be the first in meditators' history to have done that. In that extension and expanding out, there could be risk—risk that you hate doing it, risk that you feel even more agitated than before, risk that tiredness brings boredom and apathy, risk that you feel you're not getting anywhere and all the doubts arise. That's the risk if you extend.

But equally important, there is also the possibility that in taking the step and the risk, one does start opening out. One does break through. One does have a different sense of things. It might be that the barrier to that is actually much thinner than what one thinks. Sometimes just one precious single consolidated moment helps to show a wider sense, helps reveal that mind is a lousy reference point for knowing the truth of things because the mind keeps measuring—and therefore not a very good vehicle for knowing that which can't be measured.

With the areas of insight and understanding, there can appear to be significant time lapses between one and the other. What I mean is that in the course of hours and days here, experiences are going on. Some of them, as we talked about earlier in the enquiry, seem to matter more than others. We think that in certain experiences there's conviction, and we can feel quite assured about it. Meanwhile, something which was hardly noticeable, which we barely picked up on if at all, seems totally irrelevant, utterly inconsequential. When we were there, we didn't give it a moment's thought.

Some things we gave a great deal of thought, feeling, and experience to—from situations with the body to states of mind and emotions. Something else was so far on the periphery of consciousness that we weren't turning attention to it, even to the point we didn't notice it at all.

But in the very nature of things, in the very unfoldment and scheme of things, what consciousness may determine and thought confirm may not be the truth—the actual reality of what proves to be significant. There can be, as I say, that passing moment hardly noticed if at all, and then days, weeks, months, years later it suddenly strikes one what that was, what had occurred, what the significance was, what the benefit was. That doesn't even have to come from any experience of oneself—it can be what somebody else said passing by in a small group meeting, or just something which one noticed for a moment outside.

So the function of awareness and enquiry, bringing the two together: if you and I are willing as much as we can to bring awareness to the ordinary and everyday, not only does it give us the chance to see and connect and be clear about now, but it's generating myriad conditions for a constant flowering of understanding—constantly being touched with existence. If you and I are as transparent as we can be—which means the diminishing of ego—if you and I are as transparent as we can be, we'll keep reflecting and mirroring life. We'll keep feeling the extraordinariness of it, the miracle of it, the expansiveness of it, the incomprehensibility of it.

That's why we keep bringing awareness, keep ensuring that there's the wish and determination to make genuinely clear moments for us. Then inner life becomes a mirror for it—a mirror for what keeps going on around. There's a transparency which is so transparent, it takes birth, death, ageing, sickness, death, and doesn't make such a thing about it.

All of this looking as we look into ourselves and deeper, the taking of risks in some of the ways I've just been speaking about—one important feature, certainly mirrored again in the seven factors of enlightenment, is the importance of happiness and joy, these qualities of the heart.

Quite often, and perhaps if there is any imbalance here it can be in an exaggerated way, we speak about the significance of equanimity—that steadfast present between the field of pleasure and pain, to be steadfast in the face of both. This means not constantly pulling oneself into the pursuit of pleasure and having and ownership which goes along with that, and not constantly living in aversion and fighting with pain. To find that steadiness between these two extremes, these two poles.

But it would be a pity and unfortunate, from our own capacity as human beings, to lose access to a great wellspring of joy and happiness. Sometimes criticism comes that there can be too serious a focus in these kinds of teachings. Sometimes when people are coming off the street, perhaps on their first retreat, arriving a day or two late, having never been inside this situation before—somebody else urged them to come and they think what was their motive in trying to get me here? Obviously their real motive was to get me out of the house for a week. The eyes look around and say, "Oh what a grim lot they all are. Obviously it's just a place for people who are utterly antisocial, a place suitable for misfits." One sometimes looks around and wonders.

All of this is the way the eyes interpret the perceptions. In that interpretation—both of oneself and others—generalisations can get made. But that interpretation may not reflect with accuracy the inner experience of people. A number of people in these situations do experience great love of the situation, and that brings great joy and happiness. There's not a single thought running in the mind from one day to the next wanting to be anywhere else, wanting to be doing anything else.

One knows the resource of the place, the sanctuary of the situation, the blessing of the occasion. Happiness flows in the heart with or without knee pains, with or without back pains. Therefore, a factor of an enlightened life is showing itself—happiness and joy just being in this world, going nowhere and being nobody, but opening to great love.

Others, equally dedicated to the Dharma and practice and teachings, will look at themselves and recognise the importance of equanimity, the importance of being clear, of generating time for some deeper enquiry inwardly and outwardly. But actually, the joy and happiness doesn't flow—it doesn't flow easily, doesn't flow freely in that respect. There is the contentment of being that can take place, and that's its own quiet and sublime joy, of course. But for some, we need to give the heart a little bit more opportunity to flow.

The traditional way this has been endorsed and encouraged is by reflections on the Triple Gem—the Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha: the three gems of existence—awakening, the teachings, and the sangha of men and women of practice, past, present, and future. There's something beneficial in those kinds of recollections of how much dedication and love and commitment the generations of people on this earth have shown, doing exactly as we are doing as the living generation. I want to feel happiness at just participating. Or the recollection of a joyful communication with another, or the lovely things of nature which are there—all of that can help nourish and bring joyfulness and happiness into the heart.

All of that belongs and is integral to this whole body of teachings. It would be a pity really if some of those factors of awakening and enlightenment were being nourished but others were being neglected. Some people are very strong on mindfulness, no question. Sometimes we hear emphasis on the first factor—being mindful, being aware, paying attention moment to moment—and sometimes strong recollection and enquiry, but they may be undernourished and neglecting the joy of the practice, the contentment of it, the energy of it. Or maybe neglecting the equanimity.

From the standpoint of practice and our commitment to it, we need to attend to ourselves in such a way that we ask: in those areas of the factors of enlightenment, am I neglecting some? Am I putting too much on one or two at the expense of the others? Because the teachings never encourage that. It's a very wide, broad body of teachings, and it would be a terrible pity when—as is the danger—it gets reduced down to being a mindful human being as some kind of demonstration of what the teachings are about.

The teachings are about liberation. They are about awakening every factor of the whole being for that liberation and enlightenment.

All of that is included and very much embraced in the processes of what we are doing here. In the climate of sitting and walking, we don't get complacent, we don't drift, we don't just feel agitated and complain to ourselves about what's around us. We see the agitation, we see the relationship to it, and we dig deep.

If that digging deep means saying "I don't know" and just staying with that—knowing that the mind doesn't have the answer and the relationship of reactivity is no answer—we don't know. Right, we don't know, and we'll stay with that and see what comes from it.

So if one just takes some of those threads and themes which I have spoken about this evening, practice never gets boring. Never. It doesn't get dull, doesn't generate apathy, doesn't generate drift. One sees, my goodness, so much challenge to existence, so much challenge to the whole being. Those factors of enlightenment, the self and the I and the my which we have spoken about—all of it, tremendous grist for the mill.

Surely the application and exploration of all of that—what greater respect can a human being pay to herself or himself than to explore the full awakening of one's whole being? What greater act could one do than that?

Even in the most difficult times, let's never forget that the greatest act of kindness for humanity and for existence is to be so utterly conscious of it. This is the most significant thing we can do as we live and breathe.

May all beings live with awareness. May all beings live with realisation. May all beings discover a fulfilled life.

Let's have a couple of quiet minutes together.

Thank you for listening.

Never gets dull, doesn't generate apathy, doesn't leave us adrift. And one sees—my goodness—so much challenge to existence, so much challenge to the whole being there. And those factors of enlightenment, those constructions of self and I and my which we have spoken about—all of it, tremendous grist for the mill.

And surely, the application and the exploration of all of that—what greater respect can a human being pay to herself or pay to himself than to explore the full awakening of one's whole being? What greater act could one do than that?

And even in the most difficult times, let's never forget that the greatest act of kindness for humanity and for existence is to be so utterly conscious of it—this is the most significant thing we can do as we live and breathe.

May all beings live with awareness. May all beings live with realization. May all beings discover a fulfilled life.

So let's have a couple of quiet minutes together, please.

CHAPTER 194

Dharma in the Workplace

> In this pioneering dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines how to bring Buddhist practice into the workplace through the lens of the Noble Eightfold Path. Drawing from his experience as both a dharma teacher and former Microsoft employee, he explores three key areas: ethical conduct (sīla) including right speech and right livelihood; meditation practice incorporating formal mindfulness breaks and loving-kindness (mettā) during meetings and commutes; and wisdom (paññā) focusing on right intention and freedom from the eight worldly concerns of gain/loss, pleasure/pain, praise/blame, and fame/disgrace. Armstrong addresses practical challenges like difficult colleagues, workplace conflicts, money and ambition, and finding service within corporate environments. He emphasizes that the workplace offers a rich laboratory for dharma practice, testing our ability to embody compassion and wisdom with people we didn't choose to spend time with. The talk includes guided discussion on integrating formal sitting practice during workdays and cultivating the 'bodhisattva spirit' of listening and supporting colleagues while maintaining healthy boundaries.

Good morning. I'd like to welcome you all to this day at Spirit Rock on Dharma in the Workplace. This is the first time we've offered a day on this theme, so from my point of view, the whole day is quite experimental, and we'll just have to see how it goes. But I'm really happy to see you all today.

I found myself filled with enthusiasm as I prepared for this day, because it's a topic I care deeply about, yet I've never really had the chance to explore it with others. I think this could be an interesting opening day for me and hopefully for you as well.

My name is Guy Armstrong, and I'm one of the teachers here at Spirit Rock. I also have a background in various kinds of work, some completely unconnected to Buddhism or dharma practice, which I'll get into shortly. One thing I particularly appreciate about today is that there aren't many opportunities when these two realms can come together—dharma and our relationships in work. Sometimes I wonder if they're meant to be together at all.

I was watching the televised proceedings on C-SPAN this week of the Senate Judiciary Committee conducting an investigation called "Competition in the Computer Industry." The proceedings were chaired by Senator Orrin Hatch, a Republican from Utah.

Three prominent computer industry figures appeared on the panel: Bill Gates of Microsoft, Scott McNealy of Sun, and Jim Barksdale of Netscape—companies currently locked in bitter rivalries.

Basically, the entire hearing was designed to put increasing pressure on Microsoft, which was the real thrust of the proceedings. A federal antitrust investigation is running concurrently. You begin to wonder if concepts like right speech and truth-telling have any place at all in our public forums. The committee chairman, who is very anti-Microsoft, said with complete seriousness, "This proceeding today is not directed to be critical of any one company in particular." Yeah, right. Then Bill Gates, called upon to defend Microsoft's business practices, replied with equal seriousness, "No, Microsoft does not have a monopoly in PC operating systems." Yeah, right.

Often in the world of work, and certainly in public discourse, there's just a parrying of words where truthfulness—and what dharma really means is truth—doesn't seem to have a place to play. So it may be difficult for us to bring these two worlds together.

I also read a story recently in the Wall Street Journal about entrepreneurs who had made hundreds of millions of dollars in various startup ventures, again in the computer industry, claiming that their interest in work wasn't about money. Not about the money. But then they quoted a venture capitalist connected to one of these startup firms who said, "Oh, well, yeah, the idea is first we do an IPO"—an initial public offering—"so the stock options of all the employees become valuable and they get rich. Then the next step is we aim to get bought out by a larger company through merger and acquisition. They buy us and our stock goes up further, so we get a double pop." Yet the heads of these companies are saying this isn't about money. Excuse me.

In my work life, apart from the dharma teaching I began in 1984, I've also worked as a computer programmer. I worked as a teacher overseas in the Peace Corps for two years in Malaysia. I helped run a small alternative school in Palo Alto in the mid-seventies when such things were quite trendy. What worked best about our school, I'm somewhat sorry to say, was its name: the Renaissance School for Creative Unfoldment. We didn't quite live up to the potential, but it was a great name.

My most recent job outside the dharma world was five years with Microsoft, which I started in technical support because I enjoy introducing people to computers. I moved naturally into sales and then into sales management. That's my most recent experience, and it happens to be with the company currently under federal scrutiny.

I still carry this bag from my Microsoft days—it's my low-cost briefcase. I was reflecting that very much like the company, it's actually held up quite well. It's ten years old now, but it's starting to get a little soiled. That's happening to Microsoft as well, so it's very fitting.

What I'd like us to explore today—and there are many different ways we could approach this issue—is different from some possible structures. This is not a corporate workshop on how to practice mindfulness in the workplace, although we'll certainly touch on that important aspect. I'm not a management consultant, so I won't try to advise people on the best ways to deal with employees or how to establish enlightened HR policies. I don't have any David Whyte poems to read, so some of you may be very disappointed and want to leave right now.

But I am primarily a dharma teacher, and what I'd like to discuss today is the life of work viewed from the perspective of dharma practice, specifically for people committed to following the Buddha's teachings through the Eightfold Path. I think this is a very fertile field for inquiry and investigation. All of us, having been practitioners for some time, have much to share from our own struggles and efforts to bring these two worlds together.

The day will combine some teaching from up front—I do have several things I'd like to share—but I also want to allow plenty of time for discussion, both in our large group where we can all listen to each other, and in different small group formats where you can speak more personally with one another, hear each other's challenges, and express your own. Since all of you have made different tracks and developed various understandings and pathways in this field, we can learn from one another.

So this is a day where I intend to learn a great deal from you, as well as hopefully sharing some of my own thoughts.

I'd like to just get a feel for the group to begin with. I'm curious, because people can come into these questions from many different angles. How many of you are currently involved in the world of business? How many earn your livelihoods there? Great. So it looks like somewhere between a third and a half of the group.

How many of you are in some form of administration that involves service or nonprofit? Good. How many of you are doing direct service work, like teachers or therapists? And how many of you are people who, in your work, work with your hands? Good. I'm thinking of people like builders, carpenters, fine artists, craftspeople, cooks, gardeners, body workers. You are a lucky group because you actually get to use your work as mindfulness practice. That's a rare category.

The so-called information workers find it much harder to combine work directly with practice. If you're sitting in front of a computer screen all day or your main task is intense interactions with other people, it's challenging to make that strictly a mindfulness practice, although we'll talk about ways to bring the Dharma into that work as well. But for people who actually work with your hands, it lends itself very well to practice.

Developing Dharma in the workplace is no different than developing Dharma in all of our life. We shouldn't compartmentalize or separate these two realms, and we shouldn't imagine that there's a magic bullet for bringing Dharma alive in work any more than there's a magic bullet for bringing Dharma alive in all of our lives. The Dharma practice of our life is a lifelong project. If you believe the teachings of the Buddha on rebirth, it may be a project of many lifetimes. At any rate, it's not a small-scale endeavor. And bringing Dharma alive in the workplace is no different.

I actually believe that our aspirations and goals in the workplace should be no different than our goals in our whole life—which is that we would like to embody in our work our deepest human potential for awakening, for living with true wisdom and compassion. These are the standards and goals that I think we should be aiming to bring into our work as well. I really don't see any difference between the two. As the day goes on and we talk about these issues in more detail, hopefully we can get a flavor of why that is.

Just as practice transforms our daily life, our everyday life, so practice also ought to transform our work. And if it doesn't, then it may not be working—the practice may not be working.

In my own life, I've experienced a tremendous change in my relationship to work. The first job I had when I got out of college was in 1969. The Vietnam War was going on, and I took a job with Shell Oil in Houston, Texas, as a computer programmer. I was doing Fortran programming on a large mainframe. I absolutely hated it. I hated the work. I was stuck in a small office—a private office that didn't have any windows. Even the door didn't have a window. I was basically cooped up in that office for eight hours a day reading manuals and writing programs.

I didn't have a heart connection with anyone else who worked there. I was starting to get interested in Buddhism and the whole field of psychology, and at Shell Oil in 1969 in Texas, I couldn't find anybody else who shared these interests. I felt very isolated and was miserable. That was the beginning of my work career.

Later in my career, I was working at Hewlett Packard in California. There I felt much more connection with people and much more openness from the company.

During my hippie phase, I had very long hair and a beard, and I'd come to work at HP in jeans. That was perfectly fine with the company. One Halloween, when everyone dressed up in costumes, I wore a business suit—that was my costume that year. I felt like bridges were beginning to be built.

However, even at HP, I still felt overwhelmed and fearful in my work setting. The corporation seemed too large and impersonal, and I felt lost within it, very exposed and at risk. Looking back now, I see that this was mostly a function of my own psychology at the time.

In my latest position at Microsoft, I felt I had matured enough to play a constructive role in the office. I was able to help other people who felt threatened, vulnerable, or at risk by being a sympathetic ear, a supportive presence. In my personal trajectory, I can see my situation evolving from isolation and fear, from feeling overwhelmed, to feeling —not in charge, because it's too volatile a company—but comfortable. I could provide stability and lend an ear to others in the organization.

This illustrates how, as we mature as people, we have the opportunity to bring a different spirit to our work. Practice should aim at moving us along this kind of continuum.

I'd also suggest that the workplace may be the richest area in which we can test our dharma understanding and apply it. In our families and personal lives, we have considerable choice about who we're with and how we spend our time. While we don't choose our children, there's usually love there to begin with. With partners and friends, we can tailor situations to suit our preferences better.

In the workplace, those choices are taken away from us. We can end up spending quite a lot of time with people we might never have wanted to walk through the same door with, much less spend eight hours a day alongside. The workplace, for most of us today, is our primary community.

It's rather unsettling that our society, through the Industrial Revolution, has structured itself so that our community is not where we live. Throughout human history for the last million years, our community has been the people near whom we live, who work together with us to survive, who become part of our extended family, and with whom we share our whole lives from birth to death. The Industrial Revolution has changed all that. That kind of community has been largely destroyed for most of us.

For most of us now, the people we spend the most time with, whom we interact with most frequently, are often the people at work. The real test of our dharma practice becomes: Can we bring our understanding, kindness, and compassion into those relationships? It's challenging precisely because we don't have the element of choice.

The main thrust of dharma practice in our life and work is to take the self-centeredness out of our existence. In brief summary, that's what dharma practice is all about—removing this self-centered attitude that believes my needs and wants should be the center of my universe. As we release this self-centeredness throughout our lives, we open to greater compassion and kindness.

The work setting is no different. It is entirely possible to approach our work with less self-centered investment. When we do this, we become a much cleaner vehicle for the dharma. Those in direct service know this firsthand—when we aren't so present as a "self," something else can come through us that can genuinely help people. But for anyone in a life of relationship, the opportunity for service exists by being less self-oriented in our views.

Krishnamurti offers this comment about love, which I think applies equally well to work relationships: "Love in relationship is a purifying process as it reveals the ways of the self. Without this revelation, relationship has little significance." I feel this is very true of our work relationships. If we're not using our work situation to illuminate ourselves—to reveal our clinging, grasping, and identification—then work has little significance beyond survival.

It's essential to begin inquiring in the work setting: What is this revealing about the ways I'm holding on, the ways I'm bound?

The Buddha gave us three main areas of the Eightfold Path through which to examine this question, and this is how I'd like to structure our exploration today. The Buddha divided the Eightfold Path—this path to awakening—into ethical conduct (sometimes called virtue), meditation (which involves effort, concentration, and mindfulness), and wisdom or understanding.

I'd like to examine our relationship to work and our workplace environment through the lens of these three areas: ethical conduct, meditation practice, and wisdom. Any approach to work that doesn't involve all three areas will be incomplete. We need to look closely at how each impacts our work.

I've structured today around giving a short talk on each topic—virtue, meditation, and wisdom—as it applies to our working life. After each talk, we'll have time for large group discussion, followed by specific questions for small group investigation. We'll break into groups of five to seven to share our understanding, then reconvene to hear what emerges. Throughout the day, we'll include sitting periods to allow us to come to greater stillness and depth, so these issues can resonate more deeply within us.

Are there any questions or comments about the day so far? We'll explore each area in much greater detail, so if you have specific questions about mindfulness, for example, I'd ask you to hold them for now.

But any questions about the basic themes?

"I have more of a comment. I haven't attended one of your sittings before, and I'm delighted to have an experience with someone that doesn't start from a psychology background and has come to the dharma, having started from the technical world."

"Okay. So it's very interesting."

"Okay, thanks. Yeah, I feel a deep relationship between my love of science and my love of the dharma, because I basically feel that what the Buddha put out was the science of happiness. He just laid out very clearly: if you want to be happy in a wise way, here are the steps to take to do it. It's empirically verifiable, and each of us is our own laboratory for doing that."

"Thanks."

"Any other comments, questions? Okay, then I'd like to begin the day actually with a period of sitting, hopefully to allow us all to settle in a bit. And this will be about a 30-minute period of sitting meditation. I'll give some brief instructions because the day is open to those who haven't had meditation background. Let me just ask, are there people here who haven't had meditation instruction at Spirit Rock before? Okay? That's great. So I will give meditation instruction through this period."

Another aspect of ethical conduct is right livelihood. This is another way that the Buddha framed it. Unfortunately, the teachings of the Buddha aren't a great amount of help in this area. The Buddha was largely teaching monks and nuns. They have a very different form of livelihood. It's called begging. Now, if any of you want to learn how to be good beggars, the Buddhist texts provide great instruction. But the Buddha didn't envisage job titles like multimedia graphics engineer or substance abuse counselor. So he didn't have many discourses on those kinds of livelihood.

Here's what he said about right livelihood, just to give you an idea: "And what, friends, is right livelihood? Here a disciple, having abandoned wrong livelihood, earns his living by right livelihood. This is called right livelihood."

Okay? Have you got that?

Now, there are certain things that the Buddha defined as wrong livelihood, specifically trading in weapons, trading in living beings, trading in meat or fish, slaughtered animals—because the spirit of that goes against the first precept, which is not killing—trading in drugs and intoxicants—not pharmaceutical drugs, not medically alleviating drugs, but intoxicating drugs—and trading in poisons. Those are considered to be wrong forms of livelihood, or any livelihood that transgresses the precepts.

So I think for ourselves in the modern world, there are other issues about right livelihood. I think one of the big ones is: is this the right work for me? Is this the job that lets me flower as a dharma practitioner and as a person? Is it a job that contributes to my unfolding? It's a big question. Does it contribute to the well-being of myself and others? Or is it taking away? Is it a job that's injuring my well-being and injuring the well-being of others?

A question that comes in often for practitioners who are committed to the path of dharma is: do I need to be involved in service work? Because a lot of jobs aren't directly in service work. When I was selling Microsoft software, I mean, for God's sake, what difference does it make if the customer ends up running Microsoft Word or WordPerfect, right? I'm not making anybody's life better. I'm carrying out the aims of a business whose aim is to make money.

So, is it important for a dharma practitioner to be involved in a job that's directly service-oriented? And I think that's a big question. I think it's a question each person has to answer personally. So I don't think there's a blanket answer.

For myself, I found a service component in my life through going through different jobs. At one part of my life, I was doing part-time work as a computer consultant and part-time work as a dharma teacher. Other times, I've been full-time in one or another, a service job or a computing job. And that was the way that I brought it into my life, and that was okay for me. But it's a question I think everybody needs to look at for themselves. And I would recommend that people find a way to serve, even if it's not through their livelihood.

But those are some of the things I thought we could discuss when we come back.

That's basically all I wanted to say about ethical conduct. Any questions or comments?

[A participant shares a story about witnessing unethical decisions at work]

Well, I actually didn't know about the sexual component until months later. Mostly what I saw was a bad decision taking place. I also realized that if I had tried to do anything about that bad decision, nothing would have come of it. I would have created tremendous trouble for myself, and the outside situation wouldn't have changed at all.

My manager actually did hurl himself at that wall and created many enemies among those supporting that decision. He ended up leaving the company under a cloud—and since I'm not mentioning names, I'll tell you he left behind 10,000 options in Microsoft stock that today would be worth $28 million. I calculated that yesterday out of curiosity. I'll tell him that next time I see him—Spirit Rock says don't worry about it.

When you were talking about how sometimes we don't intervene out of our own timidity, what I've noticed is that we have that anxiety, we don't intervene, and later when things escalate or continue, we're so enraged when we do intervene that we do it with blame and charge. That's hard to remember when you're faced with the fear.

Yes, that's an excellent point. Often when the issue first arises, it may appear smaller, and we think we can let it pass. But we accumulate a charge around it, and when it becomes a bigger problem—which most problems do if they're not addressed—both our charge and the stakes are much higher. Thank you for that insight.

[A participant asks about engaged Buddhism vs. monastic practice]

You talk about service and making that choice. With respect to being engaged Buddhists, isn't that a choice? One option is sitting in a monastery meditating. The other is engaging, getting out in the streets, practicing business, participating, really showing that Buddhism and the Eightfold Path can be practiced in an environment of greed and everything else.

I definitely believe that. The business world particularly needs more examples of spiritual business. It can make a real difference, and finding that service component in a business job is important for practitioners.

But can't that happen through the person's individual integrity—just having that quality, with people looking up to them knowing they're practicing that way?

Yes, it definitely can. I also think that most businesses, certainly publicly owned ones, have a bottom-line commitment to making profit for shareholders. The overt, stated aim isn't necessarily aligned with service goals. As someone working within that organization, one of our goals isn't explicitly service-oriented—it's to help the company make money. So I see a blend there. It's important to respect the company's orientation while also finding our own service meaning within that framework.

When I'm talking about the individual—the leader of the company being able to engage people in day-to-day business—doesn't that provide great service?

Yes, I think it does. An individual at any level, whether CEO or someone at the bottom of the hierarchy, can manifest that integrity and commitment to ethics in ways that make a very strong statement in the world—and that's an important statement.

[Another participant interjects]

I think one has to be careful when talking about profit for shareholders or stakeholders, because that becomes political economics rather than substance. There's nothing wrong with making profit for shareholders, especially if it provides hundreds and thousands of people with right livelihood.

I don't feel bad about that at all. I'm not opposed to the basic capitalistic direction of our society or companies making profit. As you say, it provides many benefits to workers, their families, and creates positive ripple effects. At one point, my division of Hewlett-Packard was moving to Oregon...

At Hewlett Packard, I was invited to relocate when my division moved to Oregon. One statistic they shared—though I can't verify its accuracy—was that every job they brought to Corvallis would create five additional jobs in the local economy. That's truly beneficial.

This raises an important question about service. We tend to view service as external—the forms our time takes or what we actually do. Through my years in business while attempting to maintain spiritual practice, I discovered that service actually emerges from an internal process: how we address conflicts and paradoxes, how we find peace within ourselves, then transform the patterns present in mass consciousness. This is where true service occurs, rather than appearing to do something serviceable while acting relatively unconsciously.

Certainly, many people in so-called service jobs may do more harm than good. I'm reminded of Angela's Ashes, a remarkable book I recently read. A poor child growing up in impoverished Ireland during the 1930s encountered teachers—who were supposed to educate and nurture young people—who were so harsh, abusive, and dismissive that it's surprising they didn't completely crush his spirit.

A participant shared: "Practicing these precepts, I find it very difficult to protect myself from the demands of people around me who just want me to 'get on with it.' When I need to sit with a decision or watch things evolve, there's a whole way of communicating required. The challenge is dealing with a world of people who want you to go, do, decide, be, get it over with, and move to the next thing. For me, one of the largest challenges is learning to say 'not yet.'"

This touches on how we influence those around us and what kind of influence we can realistically have. We must be realistic that we may not always change the outcome of decision-making processes, including their timeframes. We can certainly voice our call for deliberation and request more time for reflection—this is usually beneficial—while recognizing that sometimes compromise is necessary and we may not always succeed.

Don't think you're having no influence if decisions don't go your way. Simply requesting a more deliberate pace may influence the process in ways that don't appear as outright wins but may slow things down somewhat. It's still worth continuing. In this way, you're like a brake pad on a spinning wheel. You might get worn down through repetition, but the brake pad is an essential part of any organization.

Another participant observed: "When you mentioned timidity, I was struck by that. I work in a public library as a manager, and while this has nothing to do with libraries specifically, timidity is very powerful because risks are perceived as so great. The threat of risk becomes a significant problem, and timidity plays too large a role. Courage doesn't blossom as you wish it could."

There's tremendous inertia in the status quo. Anyone who begins bringing interpersonal relationships into the light of awareness in a workplace introduces a threat for many people, because there's often an unspoken agreement not to discuss interpersonal dynamics in business or work settings. It's inherently risky.

After our break, I'd like to explore the second part of the Eightfold Path: meditation. This consists of three components—right effort, right mindfulness, and right concentration. Rather than detailing each aspect extensively, I want to focus on formal and informal practice in the workplace, as both can be tremendously helpful.

How often have you heard meditation teachers offer instructions like this: "In the middle of your workday, take three minutes. Stop what you're doing, sit there, and breathe." Many have heard such guidance, and nearly as many have tried it. But how many make this a regular part of work life? Only a few hands.

I believe this can be genuinely important in work life. When examining work settings, we need to cultivate the quality of right effort more than we currently do. Consider the difference between forty-five minute meditation periods you've experienced, or day-long retreats, or intensive seven-day silent retreats. The unique element in formal practice is this continual return to the present moment.

That we have the intention and we remember to do that again and again and again. It's that coming back that does the work. That's what starts the process of change.

What happens when we get involved in a work day is we forget to do that. So our work day is not meditation because we're not bringing in that moment after moment effort of coming back into the present moment. The best way to make your work day more of a meditation day is to do that more often—just to remind yourself in more moments to come back to the present and feel what's happening.

A real support for that can be just taking a three-minute break in the middle of a busy day: putting the phone down, not looking at the computer screen, closing your eyes, and just being with your breath for three minutes.

Now why, among all these smart people who have heard this instruction so many times, are there only two people in this room who do that? I'd like to suggest it's because of two reasons. One, we forget. Number two, when we stop in the middle of a busy work day, the experience isn't always so pleasant. Because what we find when we stop is we run into that mind that has been cranked up. We feel the thoughts going through so rapidly. We feel the agitation in the body. It's not a place we're comfortable hanging out.

That's been my experience. We don't like to sit in that place of suffering, which is self-created. We have generated that suffering through our own rapid-fire thinking and acting and behavior.

So a couple of things to say. One is, how's that thinking ever going to unravel? How's that pressure ever going to release unless we stop and give it time to vent? If you take the time and actually sit through it, whether it's three minutes at your desk or half an hour when you come home from work—you may come home from work and that same thing's still going on and you think, "Geez, I've wasted this whole sitting period. I've done nothing but think for the whole thirty minutes."

It's not a waste. The nice thing is that's the mind releasing its pressure. That's what it needs to do sometimes—just release. So the beautiful thing about taking that time when you come home from work is then you can go into the evening and some of the steam has been let out. Similarly in the workplace. If you just take a few minutes and realize you're just going to be letting some of the steam off, you're not going to have that profound samadhi experience that you had on the sixth day of your last ten-day retreat at Yucca Valley, where the body dissolved and there was just light throughout your field of vision. That's probably not going to happen. But in stopping, you let some of the steam out, and that's useful.

The other thing that's important about that stopping is we actually feel what we're doing to ourselves with the pace of our work. The Buddha said on a number of occasions, "There is one thing, my friends, that keeps you bound. That is the not seeing of suffering." When we don't see the extent to which we induce our own suffering in the workplace, we don't have any motivation to change it. If we're going to be serious about taking a more balanced approach, being kinder to ourselves, being a little bit slower in our pace, we have to see the suffering that comes from the push. And the best way to do that is to be right there in the middle of it.

So when you take that three-minute break—and now I know everybody's going to go incorporate it—when you take that three-minute break, don't have the idea that you're going to have three minutes of calm, but be willing to experience whatever is there. That's what's in the moment. If you have the idea you're going to go into three minutes of calm, forget it. You're just going to be really frustrated. But that's not what mindfulness is about. Mindfulness is not about having my three minutes of calm. Mindfulness is about feeling what's real.

And what's real in this moment is this agitation that's a leftover of the pace. That's what we want to connect with. That's what connects us to the present moment. That is the truth of that moment. So just go ahead and experience that. That's okay. It's going on subconsciously anyway. So I would encourage you to take those moments both as a break and as formal mindfulness practice.

The other thing you can do in the workplace is start to bring formal practice into periods that are not particularly productive. How much time do you spend in meetings just sort of wishing that that person would finish up their rambling harangue and get on with something needed? During that time, you could be doing something actually useful, which is you could be doing a metta practice. The practice of loving-kindness, of directing thoughts of well-wishing to yourself and those around you, is terrific meeting practice. And believe me, you can do plenty of it and still hear every word that's going by. We've got that much bandwidth. And it really can change the flavor of your participation in that meeting.

Otherwise, it might just be totally dead time. You can do a practice when you're waiting in a queue. You dash out at lunch to do errands and find yourself waiting at the ATM, at the dry cleaners, or in the supermarket. You can practice there—perhaps standing meditation where you feel your feet on the ground and connect with your breath, or metta in those spaces.

For a long time, I had a lengthy commute when I was working at Microsoft—about an hour and a quarter each way. When I was a sales rep, it wasn't such a bad deal because I'd be out with clients during the day. But as a manager who had to be in the office more, going to the same place every day, it was a long drive.

For a while, I tried doing mindfulness practice while driving. I wasn't very good at it. I couldn't really keep my attention on my arms or stay with my breath. But what I found I could do much better was metta practice—the loving-kindness practice of sending wishes to people around me. In the Bay Area, there were always people around me, no matter where I went.

Ordinarily I'd be bugged by the guy in front of me going too slow, or the guy behind me wanting to go too fast. One thing I noticed: in any driving situation, I was the only person who wanted to go the right speed. Everyone else was too fast or too slow. The right speed for me is about ten miles over the posted speed limit, and I was apparently the only person at that speed. So everyone else was basically an irritant—either in my way or trying to get me out of theirs.

Doing the metta practice really changed my attitude. I highly recommend that practice to you.

When you walk from your office to the photocopier, you could take that as your one time each day for walking meditation. Don't try to do walking meditation everywhere you go—you won't enjoy it enough to sustain it. But pick one path you traverse repeatedly and say to yourself: "When I walk this path, I'm going to do walking meditation." That means simply experiencing the feeling in your feet and legs as you walk. That becomes your project during that time.

Finding little ways to bring practice into the work situation brings more reminders of the life of Dharma and adds that much more calm and attention to our experience.

But I feel by far the vaster field of practice in work—and probably the more important area—is in the realm of relationships: relationships to others and relationships within ourselves.

What normally happens in the workplace is that some communication—whether a phone call, meeting with a colleague, something a client says, or whatever—triggers reactions in us. These reactions are often difficult to be with. It might be fear, feeling belittled or embarrassed, anger, or desire. You walk down the hallway and somebody says, "God, I can't wait to tell you! The boss just came in and gave me a ten percent pay raise." And you know your pay raise was six percent. You're supposed to be happy for them. So desire might arise—wanting a pay raise yourself.

These qualities are an equal part of the meditational work, and probably the more profound part of our meditational work in the work setting.

There are many teachings from all the different Vipassana teachers about how to relate with anger, desire, and fear. I'm not going to cover that basic ground today—it's very important, central ground, but you can get that from many other places. What I want to encourage you to do is take that as part of your meditation practice. Really learn how to work with the experiences of these difficult emotions, which in the classical tradition we call the hindrances—the forces that oppose clarity. These forces arise again and again in work settings and in our outside life.

The question is: do we have the courage to be with these states of mind? It's difficult to be with the agitation of the fast pace, perhaps the restlessness of that. It's also difficult to be with these emotional states. I want to encourage the development of what we might call courage—the willingness to feel them.

That's all it starts with, is just the willingness to feel them. Or what Chögyam Trungpa, the Tibetan teacher, called fearlessness.

So I'd like to read you a little bit from Trungpa. This is from a book called Shambhala: The Sacred Path of the Warrior, on relating with fear and fearlessness.

"Fear has to be acknowledged. We have to realize our fear and reconcile ourselves with fear. We should look at how we move, how we talk, how we conduct ourselves, how we chew our nails, how we sometimes put our hands in our pockets uselessly. Then we will find something out about how fear is expressed in the form of restlessness. We must face the fact that fear is lurking in our lives, always, in everything we do.

"On the other hand, acknowledging fear is not a cause for depression or discouragement. Because we possess such fear, we also are potentially entitled to experience fearlessness. True fearlessness is not the reduction of fear but going beyond fear. Unfortunately, in the English language, we don't have one word that means that. Fearlessness is the closest term, but by fearless we don't mean less fear, but beyond fear.

"Going beyond fear begins when we examine our fear, our anxiety, our nervousness, concern, and restlessness. We must look into our fear and look beneath its veneer. Meditation is the tool for doing that."

And the meditation that we learn on our cushion—that lets us contact those feelings as we're just sitting—is the same mind that we then want to take into the workplace. We want to feel the fear when it arises and to know it as fear, to feel the anger when it arises and know it as anger, and to let ourselves feel that as part of ourselves, not to disown it or say it shouldn't be happening.

Let me back up for a moment. When I first was working in the corporate world, I didn't have the support of meditation. I felt often overwhelmed. Of course, what I felt overwhelmed by were my own feelings. That's all that can really overwhelm us. It's not what the external situation is, but our response to it.

As I gained more stability of mind through meditation, I no longer felt overwhelmed in those settings. And it was because one of the primary things that meditation develops is the quality that we call samadhi. Samadhi is usually translated as concentration. This is a little bit misleading. In the West, when we say concentration, we mean, "I'm going to focus on this and I want to ignore everything else." There's an exclusive sense in the way we use the word concentration.

But samadhi doesn't have that exclusive sense. Samadhi, as the Buddha talked about it, means a mind that is whole. It means a mind that has become collected in its attention and in its energy. And when the mind becomes collected, then it has tremendous strength. It has firmness, it has steadiness, it has stability.

So when, for instance, you sit down and try to pay attention to your breath, sometimes you'll find you're able to connect with quite a few breaths in a row. Sometimes you'll find you're just with one breath and then the mind is away. With one breath and the mind is away. This quality of being able to keep the attention where you want it is a sign of increasing samadhi. That's how you can tell when it's there. But the felt experience of it is that the mind feels very strong and stable.

And it's that inner strength that lets us be in a difficult environment where our emotions are being stretched and not feel like we're victimized, not feel like we're being overwhelmed by it. So in these three areas of ethical conduct, meditation, and wisdom, if in the workplace the primary feeling is one of vulnerability and fear of being overwhelmed, then the element that needs development is samadhi. And that's through the formal practice of meditation. That's what can give that kind of strength.

One of the aspects of samadhi, when it's well established and the mind becomes strong, is that this factor actually prevents difficult states of mind from arising or arising with any real strength. It's said in the classical tradition that samadhi suppresses the hindrances. So when that stability of mind is there, the upsets can't enter. If they do arise even, they can't really grab hold and dominate.

So that's one aspect—the formal practice. And then there's the informal practice: through moments of mindfulness or metta, being with the hindrances, being with the difficult emotions in all their forms, the effort of coming back together.

The other thing I think it's important to talk about—and I heard this topic in a couple of the small groups—is the whole area of simplicity. What is the balance in our life between work and practice? How much time do we give to one? How much time do we give to the other? Do we have the idea that we can enter into an eighty-hour work week or a hundred-hour work week and come home and be well balanced? Because I question that.

I think that for many, many years these teachings were preserved by monastics, by nuns and monks who led very, very simple lives, and that was for a reason. I think there's a reason that perhaps the Dalai Lama doesn't have a wife, three kids, two cars, a big home in the suburbs, and act as the head of a large corporation.

That's not to say that as laypeople we can't work with these practices, but I think as laypeople it's really important that we take a look at the balance in our lives between work and practice.

In our terms, I would talk about this as simplicity, and it doesn't have anything to do with being poor. It has to do with having enough leisure time that your mind can actually settle. Whether it's settling through formal practice or whether it's settling through doing things that you enjoy, not so important. But finding some leisure time so the mind can settle a bit.

In the classical terms, this quality is talked about as renunciation. And the purpose of renunciation is not some moralistic ideal that being poor is better or having no relationships is better. It's a way of keeping the mind less cluttered. Because when the mind is less cluttered, it can penetrate more deeply into life, and it can grow wisdom more easily. So it's a question that every person needs to look at and discover for themselves. Different people have really different tolerances for complexity than other people.

This is some advice from the Dalai Lama. It's from a book called Awakening the Mind, Enlightening the Heart:

"Practicing the Dharma does not mean you have to give up your profession or do away with your possessions. There are various levels of practice according to individual ability and mental disposition. Everyone cannot renounce the world and meditate in the mountains. This is not practical. How long could we survive? We would soon starve. We need farmers to grow food, and we need as well the support of the business community. People in all trades and professions can work honestly and conscientiously without contradicting the Dharma. In this way, they serve the community and help the overall economy. I usually advise people to devote half their time to the affairs of life and half their time to the practice of the teachings. This, I think, is a balanced approach for most people."

Wow. I usually don't advise people like that because I'd probably be laughed off the podium, but this is advice from the Dalai Lama. It's not to say that each of us has to do that, but it just might be an encouragement to look at where we've drawn that balance line in our life and think about other ways to approach it. Fifty-fifty. What would that look like in your life? Could you even imagine that? That's a challenge.

So there's something of a question about how do you make the trade-offs in your life between practice, your spiritual life, and your work commitments. And then also, of course, in that same level of importance come the family commitments. How do you balance those three? It's a difficult question.

When I was working at Microsoft, I got two weeks of vacation a year. And the first time I got my first week of vacation, I went on an intensive retreat. I signed up for the old students' retreat at Santa Sabina. I was going to do a week and then come back all charged up. I got about three days into it, and I realized that after that pressured life I'd been living for about the past year, I didn't want a bunch of bells telling me what I had to do that day either. And just going through this very demanding schedule with all these people around and queuing up for food, that was not what I wanted.

I put my retreat practice aside for five years. And I'm a retreat junkie. I'm a big-time retreat junkie. I love life in retreat. I've spent probably three years of my life in retreat over different times. I put it aside for five years because it wasn't what I wanted in my two weeks of vacation a year.

So one of the ways we can make this balance is by doing work for a while really full on, and then doing Dharma for a while more full on, or moving into a less work, more Dharma kind of balance. So it's not that we have to establish this fifty-fifty balance today, but to give some thought to how in our life we can find ways to bring in the Dharma practice more, ways to bring that balance about.

I think that's all I want to say right now about meditation as it relates to the work environment. Again, the important pieces are balance between spiritual life and work life, formal practice in the work setting and finding ways to do that, and the informal practice of relating to our own inner life, our own emotional life.

Questions or comments?

"I have a question. When the Dalai Lama is saying fifty percent work and fifty percent practice, by practice does he mean formal meditation?"

Well, the way he understands it, I think he said practicing the teachings. So I think for him, study is also a way of practicing the teachings. Meditation practice is another way.

Hearing the teachings is another way to practice. So I think all of that would come into it for him.

"But not some kind of incorporation practices?" someone asked.

He doesn't mean that necessarily. No, I think it's fine to separate the work life over here and the practice life over here. It's a formal practice. Well, study comes under that also, or hearing the teachings.

"In the work life, is that where we include family?"

No. That's why—sometimes family is hard work, but that's why I added that on as a third category. When I talked about establishing balance, I think the balance really comes between family life, work life, and practice. So there's even more complexity. And that's why I say I don't think you should think of applying this as if 50% of every day has to be practice.

Nancy wanted to comment since the issue of daily stopping had been raised. "It turns out Mary and I both started doing it during a period of great difficulty," she said. "Actually, it was a dharma teacher who suggested I get a watch—you know, the sound on the hour. Which is usually the bane of my existence, people who don't turn off their beeper watches! But what surprised me was that you said you find you have to be with uncomfortable feelings. What I also found was often there weren't uncomfortable things. I had this idea that my life was very stressful, but when I actually stopped and checked..."

I think what we're going to do is skip the small discussion groups on formal meditation. I don't know how much there is to say about that anyway, and spend just a few more minutes on that topic in the large group.

One thing I wanted to mention is for people who work with your hands—you can actually use virtually all of your work time as formal meditation practice. The way to do that is just keep your attention in touch with the sensations in your body as you're working. Stay in touch with your arms and the sensations in your hands, and let that be your primary focus of attention.

So if you're doing bodywork on a client, if you're doing carpentry, if you're doing gardening, you need to give a little bit of attention, obviously, to the task, but there's quite a bit of free attention that you can put in a formal meditation direction. This is highly encouraged, and it's something you can also use in meetings—just keep the attention focused in the body.

What I thought might be interesting to talk about now is putting together the first two things we've covered—right speech and right action and ethics in general—with these difficult emotions that come up in the workplace, which is the field of meditation. Let's talk about a question that often comes up: How do we deal with a difficult person at work?

Almost everybody I talk to has one somewhere—one of these difficult people. For myself, I had a manager who I felt was being very restrictive. I had gotten an email from a friend at corporate asking about what kind of computers I thought the technical support people in the field sales offices needed. So I wrote back a long email saying, "Well, I don't think our current specs are entirely adequate, and this is what I think the spec should be for our computer systems." I sent that back to this person, and they sent it around to a few other people.

Somehow my manager got copied on that email. The decisions on computers were made at a district level, but based on corporate recommendations. My manager thought that I was being insulting to her specifications and support. So she called me into the office, read me the riot act, and said, "Don't you ever send email to that person again. I don't want your comments on this office going out across this whole corporation."

I tried to explain that I was simply answering a mail that someone had sent me, but she didn't see it that way at all. I got so angry. I held my temper and bit my tongue, but I said what I felt about it—that I thought it was unfair, that it was very important for us to communicate with our peers. She wouldn't have any of it.

So I left the meeting very angry. I went to the basement parking garage and just stormed around up and down the aisles for a while, really angry. When I calmed down enough to come back in, I just picked up working again. But I had a very rocky relationship with that person for quite a long time from my side, mainly around this incident.

Looking back now, I think there was a trust issue there that I just didn't see at the time. I didn't see, "Oh, she doesn't trust me." Looking back, I could see some earlier incidents and now I understand. But for a long time, I just did not have a good relationship with this person.

We all probably have stories like that.

So I'm wondering—I'd be interested in hearing from people who have had difficulties with coworkers, with managers, perhaps with customers, about how you found skillful ways to deal with those situations. Any stories to share?

A participant shared: "I was thinking about this earlier, so I might as well tell this story. I work for a woman who is verbally abusive. She never really took off after me, but she would target our secretary quite a bit—we share a secretary. She would be sarcastic, critical, just use that cutting tone of voice.

When I first started working there, I thought, 'Oh my gosh, what am I going to do about this? I can't just ignore this. I have to do something.' But I was also new in my job and wasn't sure how to go about giving that kind of feedback to my boss.

What I decided to do—and it took a long time for me to decide—was to support our secretary in strengthening her own response. When she would complain to me about the boss, I would say, 'Well, have you thought about just saying, "Don't speak to me that way"?' I also decided to be a model, so any time this woman would start that tone with me, I would stop it right there.

It's been five years now, and it almost never happens anymore. I don't know whether I had anything to do with that, but certainly I think everybody's a little happier in that situation."

That's beautiful. It makes such a difference. You can just imagine how the secretary would feel going home after a day like that—she could be devastated for days. That kind of intervention sounds really skillful and seems to have made a real difference in people's lives. Thank you.

Another participant offered: "I was just writing down descriptions of a man I worked for for a couple of years. He was restrictive, punitive, dismissive, unresponsive, uncooperative, and unsupportive, among other things. It was really, really difficult for me. I tried every skillful means I could think of, and nothing worked. I just wasn't at a level to deal with it at all, so I suffered.

During this period, I was doing a lot of driving and had some tapes from Carolyn Myss. She had this one tape where she discussed the function of Judas in Christianity. Her conclusion was that Judas was responsible in a way for the Savior, because he had to die to be resurrected. She said that if there's a really, really terrible person in your life, thank that person as your savior.

That was the only thing I could think of doing, so I did it. It was incredibly transformative—it just changed everything. Every time he did something horrible, I didn't say it out loud, but I thanked him internally. It was always an internal response that helped me, and eventually it helped me right out of there. When I got out of there, I was done. I had taken what I needed to take and gotten what I needed to get."

That's beautiful. These two different responses really show the two avenues we can take in working with difficult people. One is direct outer communication; the other is inner transformation. Sometimes it may be helpful to do both. Sometimes there may only be one avenue open to us. I think there are some difficult people in work situations you simply can't talk to.

That's been my experience. And to try to would only compound the problem. So then if that avenue is closed, then the inner transformation is the only one.

The kind of gratitude that you're feeling is exactly the way the Dalai Lama talked about feeling toward the Chinese who came in, killed hundreds of thousands of monks and nuns, tortured people, reduced the Tibetan population from about seven million to six million in the years of their occupation. And the Dalai Lama says something like, "We need to be grateful to our enemy." He used that word—it's a strong word—because they teach us patience. He said, "How else would I have learned patience if it hadn't been for the presence of my enemy?" That's a very difficult kind of appreciation to come to, but if you can find that or develop that as a way of practice, I think it can be really powerful.

Thank you.

There's another situation where you don't necessarily have to deal with it alone. I had a new manager at a time when I was very depleted, and she was the opposite of help because she didn't know anything. She was also extremely anxious, so instead of being supportive at least emotionally, she was adding to the burden by micromanaging and saying things that were so ignorant they felt insulting. Luckily I had one other person that I could go to.

I was in very bad shape emotionally—kind of a combination of my work situation and that person—and I had somebody that I could tell the truth to. I really felt psychologically that this was character stuff with this person, and I saw absolutely no chance for help. But the good news is we had a healthy person that I had talked to, and he did research among all the people that were working for this person and found that my feelings were universal.

What is amazing is that I was dead wrong about this person's ability to change. She was tasked with talking with all of us about what our needs were, and I was pleased that I could tell her the truth compassionately. And this woman meets all my needs now. It's like a miracle to me. That doesn't mean I think she's perfect—she's a human, and she could be better in some things. But as far as really being a support and being a strategic resource at times, she really is. It's amazing.

That's terrific. Well, it sounds like a healthy organization in some ways. So looking for allies, especially people with influence and willingness to use it. That's a beautiful story. Thank you.

Others? Yeah, Nancy?

I have worked with someone for years, and he and I have had a pattern of conflict for years. For a long time he could do nothing right in my mind, and probably I the same. At one point I was doing an explicit practice of generosity every day—doing something generous.

One of the things about him that bothered me is that he speaks at length. It takes him half an hour to say good morning. So he started this one day, and I said, as my practice of generosity—I kind of thought through my schedule, and I said, "I can stay here until he finishes." And I listened.

There had been a meeting that I had heard about, and I had already heard the other side of the story, and he had, in my mind, done his usual screw-up. He started telling me about the story, about the meeting. He told me about the meeting. He told me the background of the meeting. He told me the background of the background, and he finally got to how hurt he was at all of this. Suddenly he was a human being. All of these years I had kept him as a bad guy, and suddenly what I heard was different. So I couldn't hold him at a distance anymore.

Then he did something that I actually did appreciate. I ran into him in the stairwell and without even thinking of it I said, "I really appreciate what you did."

Well, we now talk. And he doesn't talk at great length. He was disrespectful of everyone, including me, or so I thought. He is now much more respectful. I think it was this mutual disrespect that was feeding one another.

One of the things that irritated me is that he would do things—I thought he had very bad judgment—and then I would have to kind of backpedal and resolve the problems he had created. The other day he called me and said, "I'm thinking about doing this. What do you think?" That's fantastic.

It brings up a few different thoughts. For me, there's this lovely saying by Lao Tzu in the Tao Te Ching where he says, "If you want to shrink something, you must first let it expand." That really seems true with people who have a compulsive need to talk. As you say, what I've noticed is a lot of those people feel very isolated. It's a way of making some kind of connection or putting their story out. If you do give it the space, it takes away some of the need for that to happen. That's beautiful.

The other thing that I really appreciate in your story is the connection to the humanity. A lot of you probably know that when we do the loving-kindness practice, we start with the people that we feel close to—ourselves, friends, loved ones—and then we move to people we don't know, and then we move to people that we have a difficult time with. We call them, classically, the enemy or the difficult person.

One of the things that the metta practice does as you develop it is help you see—you can't do the metta practice without seeing what's lovable in each person. That's basically the focus of the metta practice. You just find out what's lovable in the person and therefore why you can feel friendly toward them. So even in doing a difficult person, we're almost forced to see, oh, what's likable in that person in doing the metta practice? How would this person's mother see them, for instance? I think that's a very skillful thing to do with someone who's a difficult person at work. Just to keep in mind: where's their humanity? How would this person's mother see them? It can really change our relationship.

Thank you. Any other difficult person stories?

Those were all really terrific. They all illustrated something different, and the movement within each one was actually inspiring. Thank you.

"How long did this take? The conflict? Or the whole episode, the whole situation, until it started to change?"

"It was over a period of months from when that first conversation where I really listened."

That's wonderful.

So I thought I would talk now a bit about the third area of the Eightfold Path, which is wisdom in the work situation. Then we will move into some group discussion and small discussion groups.

There are two aspects of wisdom in the Buddha's teachings. The first is right view, or sometimes called right understanding. The second is right intention, or motivation, or aspiration. It's like the attitude underlying our actions. Why do we do the actions we do?

I think that first it would be appropriate to talk about right intention in relation to our work. It poses the basic question: why do we work? I think it's really important that that intention in us be understood clearly because it's really the background for everything we do at work.

In the teachings of the Buddha, this quality of intention or motivation is so important because it is the seed of karma. When the intention is wholesome, then it's said the action that comes from it is wholesome, and the results of a wholesome action are wholesome in our lives. If we can set our intention straight in the beginning with an action, then it unfolds in a wholesome way, and the fruits of that action come back to us in a wholesome way. So this really is the nub of it.

Tibetans have a saying that everything rests on the tip of motivation. This is true in work as well.

Before we answer that question, I just want to step back once more and examine why we practice—to find a fundamental direction for motivation in our lives.

There's a beautiful saying of the Buddha that you've probably all heard: "Not to harm others, to help others if you can, and to purify the mind—this is the teaching of all the Buddhas." These three aspects—not harming, helping when possible, and purifying our own minds—form what I consider the basic aspiration and direction of dharma practice.

When I think about right intention as it applies to work, I connect it to these three areas: not causing harm, helping when we can, and using work to purify our own hearts.

Some motivations that come to mind fitting this wise intention include providing the requisites for ourselves and our families. The requisites in the Buddhist sense are clearly defined as food, clothing, shelter, and medicine—the four things the monastic community was always meant to have access to. These are wholesome motivations.

Our motivation might simply be that we enjoy the work—it allows us to use our talents and brings us joy. That's wholesome. It might be directly because we believe we can benefit others or the world through our work, embodying this attitude of non-harming and helping.

This points to one of the real benefits I see in the work arena. I've known many people, including myself, who have tried to avoid work at various points in their lives. Sometimes people avoid the work arena for many years because the conflicts they feel around it are too intense. But what people miss when they do this is the opportunity to develop confidence and self-esteem. The workplace can actually be excellent ground for developing trust in ourselves.

Confidence is sometimes discussed in Buddhist terms as trust, sometimes as faith, and I believe all these qualities come into play when we develop ourselves through work. It can be an arena where we genuinely develop deeper faith in life and in ourselves. And faith is what truly allows for surrender.

These are healthy reasons for engaging in work. What are some unhealthy ones?

Basically, when the project of self or the project of ego becomes involved in our work situation, motivation can go astray. The reason becomes not the wholesome ones we've mentioned, but rather using work to aggrandize our sense of self or inflate the ego in some way. You've surely seen this in people who take jobs as a way of defining themselves—as they grow in status or power, their ego becomes grander and grander, and they become increasingly difficult for those around them.

This represents the kind of unhealthy work motivation. When we use status, power, or wealth to build up or inflate our sense of self, it only creates more separation. It prevents us from seeing interconnectedness and builds separateness instead.

Of course, dharma practice can be used in the same way. "I'm a practitioner" or "I'm a Buddhist, therefore I'm better than non-practitioners, or better than non-Buddhists." But hopefully, within our meditation practice are the tools to see through that kind of pride, to see through such comparisons. In the work world, however, those tools of questioning, investigation, and paring away the unwholesome aren't usually built in. We have to do that work ourselves.

The Buddha identified eight concerns that tend to move the mind in an unhealthy direction, which he called the eight worldly concerns. These are distinguished from right intention or right motivation—they're the ones that lead us astray. The eight worldly concerns come in four pairs: pleasure and pain, loss and gain, praise and blame, and fame and disrepute.

There's nothing inherently wrong with any of these experiences. We all experience the alternation of these qualities in our lives. It's not that we've gotten life wrong if there's blame, if someone criticizes us, if there's pain in our experience. These things naturally rise and fall for all of us. But when we become attached to these as the primary direction of our lives, our motivation veers off course.

These things come in the process of living, arising naturally through the development of our livelihood. Sometimes they manifest on a tremendous scale. Someone mentioned recently that Bill Gates is now worth $45 billion given Microsoft's current stock prices—$45 billion! Yet he maintains it's not about the money.

These material circumstances are not inherently wrong, but clinging to them, being driven by them, or becoming obsessed with these results brings suffering. When we become tied to these outcomes as proof of our life's worth or validation of ourselves, we suffer as a result.

I find it helpful to keep the eight worldly concerns in mind, regularly checking how much I'm being driven by praise or blame. Am I pursuing something because I want personal glory, or because I genuinely want the outcome itself? Am I investing in work that lacks inner meaning but promises wealth? Or am I following what I honestly love, remaining open to whatever material results may come?

In this way, if you set your direction in life as following the Buddha's teachings—not harming others, helping when possible, and purifying the mind—this orientation itself becomes a safeguard against being consumed by the eight worldly concerns. But frankly, without this kind of spiritual or at least humanistic foundation, it becomes very difficult not to be consumed by these concerns.

You can observe this dynamic in Silicon Valley. The enormous wealth generated by high-tech startups reveals an interesting pattern. One report I read noted that people who have become wealthy through entrepreneurship in our generation have contributed less to charity than most previous generations. Perhaps this is because they're still young and haven't reached that stage of giving yet. Still, there appears to be much wealth pursued for its own sake—for enormous houses, multiple cars, and private jets that go far beyond what is needed.

Having a Dharma orientation while living in the world means, though it's become a somewhat trite phrase, being in the world but not of it. The societal mainstream is essentially fabricated out of these worldly concerns. To work and play in the world without being dominated by these concerns requires a different strategy altogether.

Letting go of the eight worldly concerns is essentially releasing our clinging to ego. If our work truly involves reducing the element of self and self-concern in our lives and livelihood, then these eight concerns are precisely what draw us back into the constellation of self within the work environment. They serve as invaluable pointers for keeping our motivation pure and direct.

This is a lifetime practice, not something accomplished overnight. Our motivation purifies just as all other aspects of the Eightfold Path purify through practice. Just as mindfulness purifies, wisdom purifies, and ethics purify, so too our motivation and intention become refined as our Dharma practice develops.

There's another aspect of wisdom—right view—that I wanted to mention. I try to carry an attitude, one I've heard expressed often today, that in work settings, people are more important than organizational goals. While people serve as the means of an organization, I believe they are more valuable than the ends themselves.

When I worked at Microsoft, I wasn't particularly overt about being Buddhist. Instead, I tried to tune into everyone's well-being. I would go out of my way to visit people at their desks, checking in on how they were doing with their work, listening if they had complaints about their manager or difficulties in their home life. I knew something about the personal lives and relationships of those who worked for me, considering this an important part of being present there. I wanted everyone to feel there was a sympathetic ear somewhere in that office.

Interestingly, during my time there, virtually no one showed much interest in meditation. I developed good friendships at Microsoft, but at most, I managed to bring two people to hear Jack speak on a Monday evening, and that was about it. Yet I was deeply touched because after I left, once three different couples learned what I was doing five years later, they asked me to perform their weddings. This felt like a sweet acknowledgment of the connection we had formed.

Another wholesome intention you can bring to the workplace is what I call the bodhisattva spirit—being present to listen to people's difficulties, to discover where people are struggling. This can become a profound motivation and intention for being there.

Great teachers are described as wish-fulfilling gems who bring to each person exactly what they need. Imagine what a blessing it would be if such a wish-fulfilling presence existed in a workplace. When there's one person in an organization whom everyone genuinely appreciates, this creates a tremendous unifying force. This is one way to build authentic teams—the reason leaders can be so vital to organizations. When everyone loves one person, it draws the entire group together. Love possesses this naturally unifying influence.

What can we cultivate in our workplace relationships to bring forth this quality of love? When this presence exists, it can genuinely transform the workplace, even if we're not the designated leader or manager. Can we embody the bodhisattva spirit in our place of work? Can we be there to love other people and listen compassionately to their difficulties?

The only thing that limits our capacity to be bodhisattvas in the workplace is our own development. If we're unable to love our colleagues fully, it simply means we haven't yet learned to love enough ourselves. This becomes our practice then—to grow sufficiently so that we can genuinely love the people we work with.

Let me now address some specifics around the eight worldly concerns, beginning with money, which has surfaced several times this morning. Money is such a charged issue, perhaps even more so in our culture because we have such abundance.

First, I want to clarify the Buddhist attitude toward money. There's potential for confusion here because Buddhist monastics—nuns and monks who are often held up as ideals of practice—take vows of poverty and celibacy. This might lead people to think that being a poor Buddhist is somehow better, that having resources is spiritually suspect, and that having absolutely nothing would be ideal.

The Buddha established monastic life as a way to allow total focus on Dharma practice. For some, this is a beautiful lifestyle. But for most of us in the West, that path isn't unfolding naturally. Most teachers and practitioners today are laypeople.

The Buddha spoke very differently about money with laypeople. He taught that wealth is the result of generosity—there's a karmic connection between generous acts we've made in the past and the abundance we experience today. He said there is great value in having wealth if it's used to enrich the Dharma. When wealth serves positive ends, it becomes a very positive force, creating opportunities for generosity that benefit both giver and receiver.

The relationship between monastics and laypeople was deliberately structured so that monastics depend on lay support. In our Theravadan tradition in countries like Thailand, monastics cannot keep food overnight. When I was a monk, if I wanted to practice in remote places away from villages and working people, I couldn't do it because I would starve. The Buddha designed this system so that monks and nuns must live near villages to collect their morning meal through begging. Thus, monastic survival depends entirely on the wealth and generosity of surrounding communities.

Spirit Rock exists only through the generosity of many people—some without much money, some with moderate means, and some who are wealthy. This center stands here because we've been blessed with generous gifts from people across the economic spectrum.

The Buddha emphasized maintaining proper perspective on money. As he taught—and I'm paraphrasing since I don't have the exact source—"Of small concern for a practitioner is an increase in wealth. Of great concern is an increase in wisdom. Of small concern is a decrease in wealth. Of great concern is a decrease in wisdom." In the Buddhist tradition, wisdom is often called the true wealth of a practitioner.

Money raises countless questions in relation to work. How much is enough? How much do I need? Will I run out? Am I getting what I'm worth? Is someone else earning more than me? What should I do with the money I have? How much can I spend on personal pleasures? How much should go to other causes, to helping people, to charitable purposes? There are so many misconceptions and intense feelings around money that clarity becomes difficult. Yet as one of the eight worldly concerns, it requires careful monitoring.

Another particularly interesting concern involves responsibility and fear of failure or blame. This surfaces frequently in work because we're essentially paid to take responsibility. You don't hire someone unless you're giving them a chunk of work for which they become accountable.

How does that feel? When you're responsible for a major piece of work, what arises? It can feel like a real burden because if we fail, many people will know. Success or failure often becomes quite visible. Sometimes we avoid additional responsibility simply to avoid increased visibility.

I definitely felt this way at Microsoft. The path was open for me to advance higher on the corporate ladder, but I chose not to pursue it. The higher you climb, the more visible you become.

And the more visible you are, the more praise and blame you get. I was quite comfortable with my current level of praise and blame. I wasn't making a lifelong career out of it. To a certain extent, I actually hid in the organization for a while because I didn't want to deal with any more praise and blame.

This was probably a reflection of both my wisdom and my fear. Maybe I would have grown more if I'd been in a more visible position—I don't know. But I think it was both those qualities operating in me.

The bottom line, the way to be free in this area, is something that Krishna told his charioteer Arjuna in the Bhagavad Gita: "The way to freedom in this world is to act without attachment to the fruits of your action." This is a deep spiritual teaching. The way to freedom is to act without attachment to the fruits of your actions. This is really difficult to carry out, but this is another way of saying that the eight worldly concerns shouldn't drive us.

This is, in many ways, the essence of right effort. In our work and in our dharma practice, in our meditation practice, we want to pay attention, but then we don't know what will result. We have to pay attention and just trust that mindfulness leads to wholesome states. But we can't force that. In our work also, we make our right effort, but we really can't control the results.

When I was a sales rep, I used to get nervous before some presentations because there was potentially a lot of money on the table. If the customer bought from us, it could mean millions of dollars of income, and a lot of it might be influenced by one or two presentations. If we lost it, it would be clear—I was the account rep, I lost the account. So I felt that responsibility.

But what I started to realize is I couldn't control the outcome of the customer's decision. All I could do was do the best presentation that I could. The way I really got that lesson was from sports. I play tennis, and it's really clear—some days I can go out and be playing really well and still get beaten because the other guy is just too good. So I go into a match realizing I can't control whether I win or lose. The only thing that's under my control is whether I play my best game.

This has been a really helpful reshaping of right effort for me—just to play my best game. If I win, that's great. If I lose, that's too bad. I can't control that. But what I can do is play my best game. And if I play it without fearing the result, it goes better. I play better. I present better.

I think about this a lot at Spirit Rock. Deborah Urban is with us today—she's just joined staff as our development director, and she has the lofty assignment of trying to fundraise the rest of the money we need to finish the meditation hall, which you probably saw up there on the hill at lunchtime. We've got about another $1.3 million to go, hopefully by the end of this year.

Organizationally, Deborah has some responsibility for that. But if Deborah felt that she had to control the outcome of making sure we got that money, she'd probably go crazy. So I want to say publicly, Deborah, you don't have that responsibility. Deborah's responsibility is just to identify the best means for us to try and raise the rest of that money and then to implement a plan. But we can't control what happens with that plan. Maybe we'll get the money, maybe we won't. If we don't, we'll borrow it. It's okay. It just means people will pay a little more for retreats than they would have. But it really is okay.

If we can just have that attitude that we do our best and we can't control the outcome, it's a way to be more comfortable with responsibility.

Another area where a lot of ego gets tied up is ambition in work, which is basically the ego investment in recognition and being rewarded with money and title and so forth.

When I went to work for Microsoft, I made a vow to myself that I wasn't going to get my ego involved in my work. I was just going to go in and do the job, and I wasn't going to get caught up in the office politics, or whether I got a promotion, or whether I was getting paid enough. I knew it was enough money to keep me alive. I wasn't going to get involved in praise, recognition, rewards, awards, and so forth.

I succeeded for about six months. And then my ego got totally involved. I could see myself really wanting to be recognized and wanting a good review. We had performance reviews every six months and they were numerical, so I knew exactly where I stood. I wanted the highest percentage increase that would be based on that numerical rating each time, and I wanted awards at sales meetings and things like that. So it snuck in even though I was trying to be aware of it and didn't want it to happen—that level of ambition.

All I could do then was watch it with perspective. And that's okay too. If we can watch that stuff with perspective, we don't have to be ashamed of having an ego. In case you haven't noticed, the whole world does, except for maybe the Dalai Lama and a few other people. So it's not shameful to have an ego.

How can you be in sales in that type of environment and not get caught up in that thing when they have the big board showing who sold what this month? That's a horrible job not to have that. I couldn't. That's the simple answer. I couldn't. I'm sure the Buddha could have, but he probably wouldn't have bothered.

The more we understand that those things don't ultimately matter, the more freely we can play in that world. I knew people who were freer than I was about that stuff, and they hadn't even done meditation practice or even psychotherapy. I respected that a lot.

This ambition is really always focused on my pursuits and interests and self-concern. And ultimately, that's suffering. That's why clinging is suffering. Shantideva, who was an eighth century Indian teacher, said, "All happiness in this world comes from desiring others to be happy. All unhappiness in this world comes from wanting only myself to be happy." So this ambition stuff is usually only about myself. But when our interest is in really the welfare of others too, that's when the potential for happiness really grows.

I mentioned the person that I knew, my friend and manager who left Microsoft basically out of ambition. He had had ambition for promotion to the next level, and when it was thwarted, he got so upset he left, and left behind what turns out to have been $28 million.

Someone I know was married to a short man. He actually was a very ambitious person. He graduated from the Naval Academy and became a commercial airline pilot, then went to work as an executive for GE and started up General Electric China back in the late seventies. They moved to Hong Kong for a few years while he was heading up that operation. His wife didn't like traveling. She didn't like being the corporate wife. She didn't like that he was away all the time. She didn't like having to move every few years so he could get another promotion.

At one time she said, "God, if he'd only been a couple inches taller, he wouldn't have had to go through all this." It was just a quick quip, but it's a pointer to the fact that this kind of ambition often comes from personal insecurity. It's often a lack of real fulfillment that makes us invest in things like title and status and power over other people, as though because we have the ability to tell other people what to do in the workspace or to allot them their percentage raise, it makes us a better or more important person. It's a fundamental illusion.

I think I'll stop there. I had a little topic on competitiveness, but we'll maybe let that come out in the discussion.

I'd just like to close by reading a quotation from Chuang Tzu, who was a Taoist master of 500 B.C. A lot of you have probably heard this before. It's called "The Empty Boat," and in many ways it's a beautiful model for living in the world.

"If a person is crossing a river and an empty boat collides with his boat, even though he is a bad-tempered man, he will not become very angry. But if he sees someone in the other boat, he will shout at him to steer clear. If the shout is not heard, he will shout again, and yet again, and begin cursing, and all because there is somebody in the boat."

Yet if the boat were empty, he would not be shouting, and he would not be angry. If you can empty your own boat crossing the river of this world, no one will oppose you and no one will seek to harm you.

So I thought what we could do is just open up to some discussion in the large group first. Then we'll probably take one more break and come back. And I think some small groups might be interesting to discuss some of the issues that we've touched on, like money, ambition, self-esteem, and so forth.

So comments, please.

"Your comment about not controlling the outcome, I find that a wonderful thought, but it seems like in the workplace it's really difficult, because basically all evaluations, and even if you're in charge and other people are looking at you to see what you're doing, it's pretty much based on action. And Spirit Rock sounds like a wonderful employer, but other places aren't. But I'm just wondering how you realize that, how you think one can realize that in the context of what the work world tends to be like."

I think that the outcome goes best when we're not attached to the result of it. It's the same in meditation practice. Meditation practice is such a deep teaching on this very topic, because if you approach your meditation practice with a specific goal in mind, you're going to be frustrated again and again, because meditation practice unfolds according to the ripening of the individual process.

So, for instance, people come on a meditation retreat, they think that they're supposed to come to greater peace, and after three days they find their mind is going crazy. And that's the good part. And then after four or five days it's dredging up the most terrible memories of anything we've ever done or said to someone in our life. And after six days it's unfolding this deeply held grief or some sadness that we've carried with us since we were ten years old that we didn't even know was hiding there. And it feels anything but peaceful.

So if we come into that meditation experience thinking that the outcome should be peace, we're going to be frustrated. If we surrender to the process and stay with it, with that good intention, then eventually there's this huge clearing out and there's a great deep level of peace that's accessed and that's touched and that becomes really available to us. But we have no control over when that happens.

In the workplace, obviously we have much closer control and more immediate results, but we really can't strictly determine what somebody around us is going to do in response to what we do. And so all we can do is do our best job. But if we do our best job and the goals have been set reasonably, then the best results will come. So I think that element of surrender is really important for anyone who's in a work setting as a way of doing their best job. And when you do your best job, you have the best chance of getting the best results.

We do take responsibility in our workplace for not having gotten the results, and I think that's entirely appropriate. But we also have to understand with wisdom the interdependence that means that we can't control it entirely. For example, Kofi Annan goes to negotiate a truce with Saddam Hussein, and he does his best effort, but he can't control the outcome of that. He has the whole responsibility for the peace of Iraq riding on his shoulders, but he can't control the outcome. But he just goes and does the best job he can. And in this case, fortunately, the outcome came.

So I don't know if that helps. There has to be the sense of responsibility, but underneath it, we have to know with wisdom that we're not totally in control of anything, not even our own health.

"I'm just curious, what happened to the manager that left Microsoft?"

Well, he actually, it was a sad story actually because he went to a few different companies that didn't seem quite the right fit and is still in the high tech industry and still in sales. He was a vice president at a fairly well known software company for a while, but that ended up in difficulty. And so he bounced around a bit. I think it was very unsettling to his confidence the way that that story happened.

"Could you comment briefly on the distinction between right effort and right action?"

Right effort and right action. In terms of the Eightfold Path, right effort is really defined in psychological terms. It's defined as what we do to bring about more wholesome states within our own hearts and minds and what we do to decrease the unwholesome states within our hearts and minds. Right Effort is directly connected with the meditation practice and the mindfulness practice and awareness.

I'd say the link is that when we have purified the heart more and we can see more clearly, then our intention becomes purified, and it's through the link of right intention that our actions become pure. So right action is kind of what we do in the world in relation to others, and it's purified by a clear seeing and then traveling through this vehicle of wise intention.

"How do you, or how does one come to terms with, say, the difference between how much money somebody makes and what they do in terms of its value to society? You've got that athlete who tries to kill his coach and he's worth millions, and then you've got Mother Teresa. And then the people that seem to be money magnets who really are mean or abusive people that really don't have a whole lot going on for them, yet they always seem to have plenty of money. And then you have bright, articulate, attractive people that have a lot of stuff seemingly going for them. They have trouble getting jobs or getting really well-paying jobs or seem to always be underpaid."

I mean, if money's energy, why is it not flowing toward what's righteous almost?

I wish I knew. I share your dilemma. There seems to be a lot of injustice in the world around this issue of money. I'll tell you basically the answer that one of my Tibetan teachers gave to me. When a similar question like that was asked, he basically said, "This is samsara, and we don't expect things to work right in samsara."

It's not a cynical answer, but in the teachings of the Buddha, the world is deeply troubled. The world is not in good shape in the eyes of the Buddha's teachings. There is a tremendous amount of blindness going on in the world. As you can tell from the wars and the corruption and the fighting and the greed and so forth, there's a tremendous amount of blindness going on. That blindness expresses itself in human suffering. So there's also blindness in the consumer society.

As long as the larger mainstream society is not driven by a deeper underlying motivation for the liberation of heart and mind and the welfare of all sentient beings, there are going to be huge injustices. I think that the road to smoothing them out is twofold. I think it's interaction through people who are interested in transforming their own consciousness, and I think it's through outer action of social activists pointing out the failings of the society at large to do what's needed in areas that need to be attended to. But there's clearly no quick solution, and I think there's a lot of injustice in the world today.

"Doesn't karma play a large role?"

Say some more.

"I believe that people come in with a particular dharma that's based on whatever karma they've had in previous lives. And some people are not here to make money right now. I mean, that's just not their dharma. They have other things they have to learn. Other people make enormous amounts of money, and they have things to learn from that. There's a balancing of the scales. I think we tend to look at things over such a short period of time. I mean, a lifetime is no time in the scheme of things."

This is definitely within the teachings of the Buddha. It's very clearly stated that people carry with them into each life the mental tendencies that have built up through their actions, based on their intention, in past lives. And so people come into this life with different propensities.

The Buddha said, I think I mentioned earlier, that one of the prerequisites for abundance was generosity. He said that people who are kind in their relationships to living beings are blessed with long life. And he made a number of comments around karma like that. So that's certainly one explanation. That's one possible explanation for all the discrepancies of talent, of welfare, of wealth, of health that you see around the world.

"And yet also we hear the stories so often of those good Samaritans who risk their life to help someone, and their life gets cut short. And we also hear the term, why did he or she have to go? He was such a good human being. It's a hard one to... We never know. People like Martin Luther King being killed so young, John Kennedy, Princess Diana. We never know why. And it's one of those mysteries that we know we're exposed to also."

Nancy?

"Could you say something about being the bodhisattva of the workplace and balance? When we're already trying to balance work and not work and various aspects of work, and then in most workplaces there is so much need and so few people filling that role that if you step in, then it becomes a bottomless pit."

Good question. I think you have to bring a sense of balance to that as well. And it's clear that if you want to devote some time in your workday to listening to other people, there's going to be a price to pay either in the quality of your own work or spending more time on your own work. So I think it's just another of the things you have to balance.

I think you have to learn in the work setting when to say no to people. If somebody drops by for a chat, being able to set time limits on it. Being able to tell people that you'd love to talk to them but you can't today. Getting sort of time management rules, you might say, within your bodhisattva relationships. But I think you just have to manage that like all the other tasks. You know, I just kind of saw it as one other task on my to-do list and I had to prioritize it and give it time within my other tasks.

Yes?

"That makes me think about a workplace where there are a variety of competencies, a variety of energies, and a variety of willingnesses, so that some are there a whole lot more than others, and they're all expecting, or they're all perceived as the same or equal. And so that really does have a... I mean, something really does begin to erode..."

for those people who are contributing more while others contribute less. The confidence in the whole workplace begins to deteriorate.

Well, in the places I've worked—which have been both for-profit and non-profit operations—I actually found that the for-profit organizations had much better performance review systems than the non-profit places where I've worked. I strongly endorse performance review systems, and I think numerical ratings are excellent tools.

When we're clear about expectations and honest about performance, it serves everyone. It protects those who are giving their all from burnout and resentment, and it offers those who aren't fully engaged a chance to either step up or find a better fit elsewhere. This kind of clarity isn't harsh—it's actually compassionate, because it prevents the slow erosion of trust and effectiveness that happens when standards become unclear.

The bodhisattva path requires us to be skillful in how we work together. This means being both generous with our energy and wise about sustainability. It means creating systems that support genuine contribution rather than just good intentions. When we bring this level of discernment to our spiritual communities and workplaces, we create environments where the dharma can truly flourish—not despite our human limitations, but through our honest acknowledgment of them.

This is how we practice the middle way in our everyday working life: neither burning ourselves out in misguided service nor withdrawing from our responsibilities, but finding that skillful balance where our efforts can be both sustainable and genuinely beneficial.

Trust & Courage

Guy Armstrong · 59 min

> Guy Armstrong offers a heartfelt exploration of trust and courage as essential qualities for spiritual development, particularly during times of transition and uncertainty. Drawing from the Buddha's teaching on the five spiritual powers (saddhā, vīriya, sati, samādhi, paññā), he focuses on confidence/faith and energy/courage as foundational elements of practice.
> Armstrong weaves together diverse wisdom traditions, sharing Hawaiian kapuna teachings about respectfully entering sacred spaces, personal stories of spiritual awakening in the Philippines, and insights from monastic tudong (wandering) practices. He distinguishes between "bright faith" - the initial inspiration that draws us to practice - and "verified faith" - the deeper trust that emerges from direct experience of the Dhamma's fundamental truths.
> The talk emphasizes practical approaches to cultivating trust: slowing down, embracing silence and solitude, letting go of comparing mind, and taking refuge in the present moment. Armstrong explores how understanding impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and non-self (anattā) through direct experience develops the verified faith necessary for sustained practice. He encourages practitioners to trust their organic unfolding, like fruit ripening on a tree, rather than forcing spiritual development through willpower alone.

I'm not sure how many of you are new today who have just come in to do the last six weeks, but whoever you are, I'd like to welcome you to this sacred space that you're entering into. It's very fortunate that you have come into this place, this sacred space, this exquisite silence that has been prepared for you. Those who are here have, in a way, worked very caringly to prepare this space, this place of practice. And so we welcome you with a lot of metta into this place, and acknowledge that it's a great time of transition for you and for those that are receiving you.

In the islands where I come from, in the Hawaiian islands, there is what we call a kupuna system. It's a system of respecting our elders, having elders in the community that continue to teach the younger ones. It's quite a beautiful way that they've preserved in all of the islands. The schools, the elementary schools, actually hire the older people in the community—the older Hawaiians and the Chinese and the Portuguese and the Japanese—and they have them come and speak to the children about the old ways, the way of respect for the land, the aina, for the elders, for a way of life that has held together a community.

One of the great kupunas of Hawaii, her name is Hana Viri. We called her Nana as an endearing way of addressing her. She was actually the godmother of my youngest daughter, Therese, who I speak of a lot. Therese couldn't be born until she had a Hawaiian name, and it's just kind of a little side story. I was carrying Therese for an awfully long time, past her due date, and Nana had not called yet to give the Hawaiian name. I called Nana and she said, "It hasn't come yet to me." So finally Nana called and told me what her name would be, which is Ihilani, Heavenly Splendor. And that night Therese was born. Nana told me that she would be born that day.

So they're quite powerful beings and they're simple. Many of them haven't even gone or finished elementary school. But they're simple in their ways and their understanding runs deep because of their simplicity.

What Therese learned, one of the lessons Therese learned from Nana and that I learned from Therese and from Nana, is this: when you are going to a new place, when you're going across a threshold into a new place—and mostly in Hawaii it's referred to when you go to the ocean or you go to walk in a bamboo forest or you go to swim in one of the waterfall pools or you hike in any one of the craters—before you enter the place you must stop and really be careful and be quiet and pause and really feel the new place, the new space. The Hawaiians have a way of saying that you ask permission if you can enter that place, that new space. And so then you say, "I enter this place with respect."

So I think this is what is important when we enter a new space, not only for the people who are new, who are coming in new, but for the people who are already here. We're entering new spaces. We're opening to new places in our hearts and in our minds. It's important to enter with respect, to really pay attention at those places, those thresholds that we cross over.

When I traveled quite some years ago, I traveled to China and went to a place called the Forbidden City. This is the old palace grounds of Beijing. Many of you might remember this if you saw the movie The Last Emperor. It was filmed in that place called the Forbidden City. I noticed that at every entry level, every entryway to a new place, a new hall or palace or pavilion, they had these foo dogs—these dogs that were kind of part dragon looking and part pit bull looking.

I asked once, "What's the significance of these dogs or these symbols?" To make a long story short and putting it in a way that I felt was appropriate for my own life and my own practice, they're a symbol of and a sign and a reminder of paying attention when you come to a place of transition, paying attention when you cross a threshold and remembering that you're entering into new ground—to leave whatever is old behind and to enter with kind of empty hands and an open heart. The dogs, the foo dogs, are there to remind us of that, to wake up, to pay attention.

So tonight I wanted to choose a subject to speak about that could speak to everyone, whether you're just coming in or you are continuing on your journey here. So I chose the topic of trust and courage.

Usually when choosing a subject to speak about for a Dhamma talk, I try to see for myself what I need to learn, what I need to pay attention to, what I need to look into to remind myself of, and how can I bring these ancient teachings that I revere so much alive through my own experience. How can I share that with you? Because I know your time here is really precious. So how can those teachings have meaning for us in this day and age, in this 20th century?

Just reflecting again on the major transitions that we make while we're here in practice. Here it's the halfway mark and it's the beginning for many of you who have just come in. For myself and also for many of you, it's a time when our bodies are changing and aging. It's a time in my own life when this year I'll turn 50. It's when my relationship to career, to an old career is ending and more work in the community, offering of my services in the Dharma, is happening. It's a different relationship as mother, as the children leave. And so it's a time of major transition and a time when a lot of trust and courage is needed. There are so many beautiful openings that can come from this time.

I feel that I'm blossoming in a new way, in a way I've never felt before. And in that aspect, it's kind of exciting. But the difficult part is that sometimes I'm overwhelmed with a great deal of doubt about how I can make it through—about how I can make it through being away from home or being away from my children, or just getting through a sitting or getting through a dharma talk. Will I be able to open? Will I be able to give and to share?

So faith in myself, trust in myself and in my ability to open, can seem like it happens so slowly, almost imperceptibly. And having trust in that kind of imperceptible, slow opening is really important on the way, on our path.

I used to have a lot of brazen courage, a lot of bold courage to do the things I needed to do in life—to raise kids by myself, to send them to college, to continue on with the spiritual path while doing that. And a lot of times I felt like my boldness came from not knowing, or from a sense of innocence, or maybe even ignorance. I used to be told a lot that I was saved by my own innocence, by my own ignorance, by my own stupidity. It kind of helped me get through.

But now that I've lived a little bit of life and my eyes are more open, I'm not willing to go through my spiritual life with that kind of brazen boldness, with that kind of energy. It takes a gentleness now, a trust and courage that I never had before—a willingness to allow my heart to open slowly and to enjoy the path, the opening, to savor each moment along the way. Because there's so much learning that comes from each moment of opening.

So I began to wonder: how could I fit these two aspects or these two qualities that we need in our spiritual life into the teaching? In reviewing the five of this and the three of that and the seven of this, I saw that there are two powers that are pointed out in the teachings, and they're part of what the Buddha called the five spiritual powers. These five we are speaking of during this retreat.

The first one is confidence or faith. Another way of saying that might be trust. The second is energy, and that could be translated into courage—the courage to bring forth that trust and to use it in our life, in our spiritual awakening. The third is mindfulness, which we talk about every day in the instructions and which is interwoven within everything we speak about here. That's the core of our practice. The fourth is concentration, and the fifth is wisdom—all of which we're touching upon as we do the practice here.

We've all heard this term: leap of faith. In the past, this kind of faith seemed to me like something associated with leaping and not looking—just kind of taking off on a path or on a journey and not knowing where we're going with our eyes closed and kind of blind. But as we go along and we see more things along the way, as we get older, our energy and time are precious commodities and we can't do that anymore. We used to be able to make mistakes and to kind of backpedal a lot and then begin again. But now it's important to walk the path more carefully. It's not a time for wasting.

Recently I was inspired by a writing or an account of a five-day journey by a group of nuns. This is called a tudong—I'm not sure where the accent is. But it was written by Sister Jitindriya of England, and it really touched me, some of the things that she said. I'm pretty sure it would be okay with her if I read some of her writing to you, so I'm going to take the liberty of doing that.

It was a journey that she and some nuns took from the Amaravati Monastery in England to a place called Devon, and it took a long time. I'd like to tell a little bit of this story or weave it in because it relates in a way to our own inner journey, and also because we're just always trying to find ways of keeping you awake during a dharma talk.

Because it can get pretty boring to talk about the same old things all the time. I know sometimes stories are completely unrelated to what we're talking about, but it really helps.

This is part of what she says, and it talks about what this tudong journey is:

"The journey wasn't all inspirational by any means. In concept and theory and philosophical retrospect, yes, perhaps, but the nitty-gritty of it at times was quite challenging, physically, mentally, and emotionally. But then that is what this kind of walk, or tudong, is all about. It's a kind of stripping away of the usual comfort zones that one can retreat into so as to contemplate the sense of insecurity that is thus laid bare in the face of the unknown. This is much of what the monastic training is about—to train the mind to be more fully present with life as you experience it in the raw, creating the possibility for direct insight into the true nature of things. In doing so, one notices how habituated the mind is to control and manipulate circumstances in an attempt to not have to feel the natural pain and insecurity of life."

So she went on this journey, and she and the other nuns stayed in all kinds of places, all kinds of situations.

They never knew what they were coming up against or coming into. They let it be unknown, just as every moment is in our practice, if we allow it to be—not expecting or hoping, not carrying the past into the present or projecting the future into the present.

They stayed in barns and sheds and open fields, on beaches and back lawns, and even a cricket pavilion. They never knew where they were going to land. The food was quite unpredictable. They depended on the kindness of others for their sustenance, and sometimes they didn't have very much. A kind of trust had to develop in their own ability to keep their hearts open and to connect with the kindness of others as they went along on their journey.

Sometimes the landscape was beautiful and comforting. Sometimes it was difficult and challenging. Sometimes it was warm, sometimes bitterly cold.

Here also we have this opportunity to allow these comfort zones to be stripped away so we can open more and more into the unknown—those places where we have felt a lot of diversion in our life, places we went to for comfort, perhaps reading or writing or acting out in certain ways. We begin to see that we can let those go as we begin to trust our inner journey more. Attachments begin to get stripped away, or at least we see them more clearly. We may go through grief, fear, blame, shame in our practice—really come up against them and let them go. Preferences—we begin to see how they run our lives and how we can let go of how we want it to be. We can let go of the projections of how we thought it would be.

She continues: "The idea of going on tudong conjures rather romantic and inspirational images and feelings, for me at least. But reality is never contained or represented fully in ideas and perceptions and remains always unexpected and unknown."

There's a place in the Sutta Nipata that offers this beautiful phrase: "Let there be nothing behind you. Leave the future to one side and grasp not at what remains in the middle."

Can we do this in our practice? Can we allow this leaving behind, this not projecting onto the present moment what we want it to be? When we're on this journey through this sacred terrain, what is tremendously helpful is to drop all of our expectations, to have this willingness to have empty hands and not bring into the moment what we think we need to bring in from the past.

There's a beautiful poem by David Whyte called "Tillico Lake":

"In this high place, it is as simple as this. Leave everything you know behind. Step forward to the cold surface. Say the old prayer of love and open both arms. Those who come with empty hands will stare into the lake astonished. There in the cold light, reflecting pure snow, the true shape of your own face."

How can we do this? One thing that we can let go of, whether we're coming into this retreat new or have been here for six weeks already, is to be careful about the comparing mind. This mind brings in the old, and this is Mara in the moment—the tempter that keeps us from being present. When we compare this moment to a previous practice or discipline or experience, we bring the past into the present moment. It's helpful to simply notice comparing mind, let it come and let it go, not getting lost in the content of it.

So how do we cultivate this trust, this confidence, this faith?

Slowing down helps—for those who are new and for those who have been here. Just slowing down from where you've been before really helps. Taking one breath, one moment, one step at a time.

Having a respect for the power of silence, for the power of inner solitude—this is an immeasurable benefit. Sages of old, women and men of all time, have used the power of silence and solitude to help them see more clearly, to come to this clear lake and be able to see their face clearly, their true nature clearly.

Wherever you are in the practice right now, see if you can take a next step towards even more solitude, even more silence—whatever that next step is for you. Perhaps it's bringing in your reins a little more, slowing down, not needing to write as many notes, not needing to connect with others in the various ways we find ourselves needing to connect because of loneliness or whatever our habit pattern is. Reading, writing—these may have helped us this far along the way.

But see if you can let it go for a while. See if it brings you a deeper sense of silence, inner silence, a deeper sense of inner solitude. Just see for yourself.

Often all of us want to connect with that place, and we don't know how to connect with that place of inner silence. We don't see that it's mostly some practical steps that we can take to do that.

I found in a new book of Mary Oliver that I just got, a poem that she wrote about stars, and it has to do with letting the words of our mind go:

Here in my head, language keeps making its tiny noises. How can I hope to be friends with the hard white stars whose flaring and hissing are not speech but a pure radiance? How can I hope to be friends with the yawning spaces between them where nothing ever is spoken? Tonight at the very edge of the field I stood very still and looked up and tried to be empty of words.

So can we bring ourselves to this new place, the place that Mary Oliver calls the edge of the field? Can we come to this new place and be very still and be empty of words? Can we take that next step in our practice, on our path? Can we trust ourselves enough to do that? Only you know the answer to that. Can you dig deep down to that place of deep trust in yourselves to find that you don't need those places where the words meant so much?

It's usually at this place, at the halfway mark, where there's a lot of papañca around the understanding of no-self—which is completely ironic, because it goes against the understanding. It's kind of funny that we want to understand it with words and we want to know the big picture of it in a macroscopic way. But really we can only understand it in a microscopic way. The true understanding of no-self comes from a moment-to-moment experience, and this is the only way it can be understood deeply.

So can we let go of the words, let go of the questions, and just be with the experience of it, whatever it is?

What can we do to allow a gradual unfolding of this Dharma in us, of this bud in us, of this potential for awakening in us?

There's a way in our practice where there's a ritual that we take sometimes, and it can have an ever-deepening meaning for each one of us—and that is the taking of refuge in the Buddha, in the Dharma, and in the Sangha.

For me, taking refuge in the Buddha really means taking refuge in that potential of awakening that lies within this mind-body continuum, and really taking refuge in the pace at which that opening takes place. Taking refuge in the unhurriedness of it, the organic opening of it, being able to open in our own unique way.

Once when I was in a retreat with Munindra, it was, I think, one of my first ten-day retreats, if not my first ten-day retreat. And it was a retreat that was very, very challenging. All of a sudden new understandings came that were never there before, and many kind of psychedelic experiences came. It was like I was open to a whole new world, and it was kind of shocking in a way.

About the eighth day of the retreat, Munindra was kind of pushing me to keep going and inspiring me to stay up all night and keep practicing and keep practicing and keep practicing. So I just kind of followed his advice and did what I could. But I didn't feel like I was getting anywhere at all. I was kind of stuck in the same place over and over again in this sort of very psychedelic, blissful place.

So I went to him towards the end of the retreat, and he simply said, "When the fruit is ripe, it will let go of the tree." And it gave me this image for the rest of my practice—that it just takes place in its own time, the ripening of this fruit. You can't be in a hurry.

This is from The Findhorn Garden, a writing from a book about the Findhorn Garden:

Flowers unfold slowly and gently, bit by bit in the sunshine, and a heart too must never be pushed or driven, but unfold in its own perfect timing to reveal its true wonder and true beauty.

So can we have this kind of trust? Can we surrender to this? Can we take refuge in this trust to unfold in our own way, in our own organic way, ripen in this way?

It's said that trust or faith is like a seed. It establishes itself firmly in fertile soil, and it's up to us to make that soil fertile, to give it the watering, the sunshine it needs. But we can't push the growth of the bud from that seed.

Faith has a characteristic of venturing beyond, of aspiring beyond. And so if you look at a seed, if you reflect on a seed and how it comes, there's energy that kind of bursts forth and cracks open the shell and allows what's inside that seed to venture beyond into a whole new world. This is what faith is like.

There's what is called bright faith. In the beginning of our practice we have what's called bright faith. And I'd like to talk about my own development of faith, because it's not a very interesting story, but we just hear so many great stories about the Buddha and about the nuns and monks in the monastery and even mythological stories, and it's kind of hard to relate sometimes because we're just wiping runny noses or changing diapers or the oil filters on our cars. It's not very romantic, but yet we all have the same kind of homing instinct that the Buddha and all the nuns and monks of old had—this instinct to really feel connected with all of life, to know the truth deeply, to understand a peace and happiness that's beyond the peace and happiness that we know, to experience emptiness or nothingness in a courageous way.

So for each one of us, this opening to trust and courage may be different and yet the same.

My own journey on the spiritual path began about twenty-five years ago. When somebody today asked me, "Well, what brought you to the path?" it is easy for me to say that suffering brought me to the path. Dukkha brought me to the path.

And for all of us, this is what brings us here. Suffering is a heavenly messenger to many of us.

When I was young, eighteen years old, I was married into a wealthy family. To make a long story short, it was an arranged marriage where my mother betrothed me to a man I had known for only eight days. It was okay with me simply because I was ignorant at that time, and I wanted to get away from my family. So I said yes.

I went into this marriage, into this political wealthy family in Manila, and I came from a very poor family—lower middle class. When I entered this new family, I was surrounded by wealth, but all around me was poverty. It was an eye-opening time because I got to ride in a Mercedes Benz in the back seat with a driver who carried a .45 revolver because he was also my bodyguard.

My father-in-law was in the government realm, so I was appointed to a high-ranking position in the Central Bank of the Philippines. I would be driven to work every Friday just to collect my paycheck—I didn't have to actually work. I'm giving you this picture of how it was.

When I first entered this family, I would try to sit in the front seat, and my in-laws would say, "No, this is not proper." I would try to say thank you to the help—I had a driver, a gardener, and six maids—and they would say, "You can't say that. You only say 'well done.' You never say thank you." It was a very new world for me.

So I'd get in the back seat, and the maid would give me, on literally a silver platter, tea and food for the journey, because the traffic in Manila is outrageous and it could take a long time to get to work. Sometimes we'd get caught in traffic jams, and if there was no traffic jam and there was a policeman at the intersection, if he saw my car—because it had a license plate signifying I was from a certain political family—the policeman would stop all traffic so my car could go through.

Here I was, very young, not knowing what was going on, and I would see along the way beggars and desperate-looking old men and women, young boys and girls, very young prostitutes, and little children who I heard would rent babies to carry so they could show them at car windows and you would take pity on them and give money.

I struggled with whether to give or not to give. One time I put my hand out to give some money and they were so fast—they would rip your hand open, and by the time I could get my hand back in the car it would be full of scratches.

This situation really opened me to the dukkha of the world. There was such a disparity between where I sat and what I saw that it ripped my heart out. I tried everything I could to help. I worked in an orphanage, but it didn't assuage my heart.

I was a practicing Catholic at the time, and I would go to church to say novenas, repeating prayers over and over again. I felt like one of these impossible cases. In the Catholic tradition there's a saint you pray to for impossible cases—Saint Jude. I would literally sometimes crawl in the cathedral from the back to the front, because this was the way things were done. I would do anything to know the truth of life. I really wanted to understand.

There came a point when I started taking yoga classes. They were offered at an Eastern Indian home. When I went in and saw their altar, it had many different things—Hindu symbols, and also the Buddha sitting peacefully with a smile, and Christ on the cross. When I looked at those two, I knew what my choice had to be. I didn't want to crawl through the cathedral anymore.

And I wanted to know that place where that smile came from on the Buddha. I wanted to know that place in my heart, not in a church. And I wanted to find the trust to do that.

To make a long journey short, I ended up having this great experience. Near our home was the marketplace where the cooks went to market. They came home one day and told me of this great sight they had seen near the marketplace, and they asked me to go with them. So I went along with other members of the family.

We all went over there and came to the place where plenty of cars were parked. It was kind of like an old village town. We parked the car and went along the pathway that wound around to this place where we could see many people milling around from a distance. It was pointed out to me that in the area above some palm trees, there was this light up above. This light was there in broad daylight, so it couldn't have been a projection of anything because it wasn't projecting onto anything. It was in space.

We came around the corner and I looked up, and I saw an apparition of a woman—a very beautiful woman who looked quite angelic and translucent. She was wearing robes and kind of floating in the sky. I'd never seen anything like this before. Quite a few others were there, so it wasn't a hallucination. This was real. This woman had hands and face you could see through, and her gown was blue and white. They said it was the Blessed Virgin, Mary. She was looking around, turning her head. I think out of shock I fell to the ground and was on my knees looking up.

The words she spoke to me at that time—not out loud, but I felt them—were: "What are you doing here?" I took a long time to answer that question and eventually left the Philippines.

What that apparition was to me, what it instilled in me, was this tremendous bright faith—this faith to believe in the unknown, in something I had never experienced before. This kind of trust to open to what I could never have thought I would have opened to before. It touched in me a place of courage that I could open to, to take steps that I needed to take on my path.

Sometimes each of us on our journey gets this bright faith, or is encouraged by an experience, a book, a person, a place, a reading maybe, that helps us to keep our way, to shine a light on our path. But it's not enough. At some point that light isn't bright enough when we come to a place of real darkness. It's where we need to look to our own experience, where we need to go to a place where we can open to what is called verified faith—faith that comes from our own experience, faith that can depend on our own ability to maybe see the laws of impermanence, to experience the ever-changing moment to moment, to open to that vulnerability that comes with opening to dukkha. A kind of faith and trust that comes from allowing ourselves to open to that deep vulnerability of our hearts that's called dukkha.

And aligning ourselves with those truths—with the truth of impermanence or anicca, the truth of vulnerability or dukkha, and the truth of insubstantiality, the conditioned nature of life that we often refer to as no-self or anatta. Allowing ourselves to align with those truths. This is the threshold that we come to in our practice. Can we let go of that faith that held on to a person, place or thing and align ourselves with the new truths that we are now experiencing—the truth of impermanence, of vulnerability, of no separate self?

So much faith and trust comes in our ability to let go. Not let go in a forceful way, but let go because it's going. We see it going. How can we hold on when we see it going? Suzuki Roshi says, "True renunciation is not giving up things of this world, but knowing that they go away." That's what true renunciation is.

Sometimes faith is not only surrendering or taking refuge in the Buddha, not just taking refuge in our potential to awaken, but it's taking refuge in the Dhamma, in the Dharma. And what does that mean? Not taking refuge in this big Dharma, this big law, this big understanding of what the Buddha taught. But if we can take a look at it as taking refuge in this moment, in this very moment, surrendering to how things are right now, right here and now. This moment is what is true, whatever is in this moment. It could be anger, it could be grief, it could be rage, it could be shame, it could be doubt. Can we take refuge in that, in that Dhamma, in that moment? It's from that kind of taking refuge in that moment, surrendering to that, that the courage comes to continue. When we can just allow ourselves to go one moment at a time.

There have been many times in my own practice, and that I hear from those I speak with, that our ability to keep going comes from taking one step at a time—literally. During walking meditation, I have found myself unable to look at the end of the path I was walking on. If I was taking fifty paces, I wouldn't even look that far ahead. I would focus only on the next leaf or the next rock, giving myself the intention to be as mindful as possible from here to there—just really short distances, taking refuge in small pieces at a time.

Sometimes when we practice this way, it unleashes tremendous energy that we can ride. We discover that by committing to take one mindful step at a time, we often go much further than expected. The very act of focusing on one step with complete awareness generates momentum that carries us forward.

True faith is verified faith. It unleashes incredible power, energy, and courage—bringing forth the strength to keep us moving, to keep us going. This requires a particular kind of quiet effort, the effort that emerges from courage itself.

I recall a beautiful teaching from the writings about Don Juan that spoke of effort and the energy we invest in our practice. It was one of those Zen-like teachings that cuts straight to the heart: "It's up to you. You can take the energy that you have and put it into complaining or blaming, or you can put it into your practice, into liberation. It's up to you."

When you notice yourself blaming or complaining, you can remind yourself: "Can I put this energy into liberation instead? Into taking the next step with mindfulness? Into taking the next breath with mindfulness? Into opening to this anger or blame with mindfulness?" The choice is always ours.

This choice, this humility that opens us to such possibility, is truly rare. Yet we all possess the ability to make it.

Sister Jetindriya's writing concludes with these words: "The journey is not really finished."

And indeed, it never is. Each moment offers us a fresh opportunity to take refuge, to surrender, to find the courage to continue—one breath, one step, one moment at a time.

CHAPTER 196

Karma, Forgiveness & Equanimity

Guy Armstrong · 55 min

> On the final evening of a mettā retreat, Guy Armstrong explores forgiveness as essential to developing true equanimity—the foundation for authentic loving-kindness, compassion, and sympathetic joy. Drawing on the Mettā Sutta and teachings on karma, he addresses both "great forgiveness" (accepting life's inherent suffering) and personal forgiveness of those who have harmed us.
> Armstrong shares personal stories illustrating how understanding karma helps us see that everyone "couldn't be better" given their conditioning and circumstances, while still taking appropriate action to prevent harm. He explores how we stay imprisoned by our own grudges, and how moments of clarity can instantly transform our relationships. The talk culminates with a reading of the Mettā Sutta, demonstrating how deep equanimity naturally gives rise to boundless loving-kindness.
> This dharma talk offers practical wisdom for practitioners working with resentment, anger, and the challenge of maintaining an open heart in the face of life's difficulties. It shows how true forgiveness emerges not from condoning harmful actions, but from clearly seeing the karmic conditions that shape all beings' behavior.

Here we are tonight on the last night of Metta Retreat. Someone said in an interview this morning, "I'm really, really hoping that you're going to talk about forgiveness in your talk tonight." So I was really happy to be able to say, as a matter of fact, I am.

It's not only always appropriate to talk about forgiveness, but it's particularly appropriate because it's really a linchpin key to the very heart of what we are doing. We talk about metta—benevolence or friendliness practice—that comes from that great balance of mind that enables us to meet each moment and each person as a friend.

Carol spoke last night so eloquently of being able to respond with the greatest depth of compassion only when we have the balance to hold suffering in our view and in our hearts without flinching from it and without aversion. And we are able to respond most fully to other people's good fortune with absolute sympathetic joy only when our hearts are balanced in enough equanimity so that our joy for them is not tinged and tainted with envy or jealousy or grasping.

So we need to talk about that great equanimity which is really the foundation of friendliness and compassion and sympathetic joy, and the way in which forgiveness is a key piece of that great equanimity.

Think about Carol's example of her friend who wakes up every morning and says, "Wow, this is the best day yet." Imagine getting up in the morning and saying, "Wow, thanks—another day to see the goodness of life." To do that truly with an awakened mind, you really need to have such spaciousness of mind that could hold the difficulties and the pain of life in it and still be able to say this. You would need to have the heart to open to all that pain, not drown in it. You'd need to be able to see your own situation and the situation of other people with tremendous clarity—really to see clearly the ubiquitous nature of suffering, our own and other people's—and to be able to do it with enough balance to have the power to respond with bodhicitta, with really the impulse to be of service, to address the great suffering of the world. And begin to see the possibility of service as happiness and generosity as happiness.

The great forgiveness—we'll start with the great forgiveness and then work down to the little personal forgiveness—is to be able to forgive life for being just what it is, so painful for everyone, sooner or later, not in the same amounts. The truth is that some people, for reasons of karma—we all have different rows to hoe and different amounts of difficulty. But everybody has difficulty.

I heard a story about a woman whose death remark—as death remarks of Japanese Zen teachers often are their final teaching—was apparently said as her final last breath remark: "Thank you very much. I have no complaints." Imagine being able to do that.

I had a friend who died about twenty years ago now. He was in his forties when he died. He died of a cancer very rare in men. He had a wife, he had children, he had a very flourishing career. He did everything he could to treat his illness, every possible treatment that was available. And he died. He wrote a letter to be sent to all his friends after his death, and one of the things he said in the letter in describing his life is, "I would have wanted more, but I never wanted other." I thought that was marvelous.

Sometimes when you listen to that, you think, "Well, didn't Bill want other? Didn't he want to get well from his illness?" He certainly did. And he did everything that he could to get better from his illness. So not wanting other doesn't mean not having aspirations. Doesn't mean non-acting. Doesn't mean not being patient. It doesn't mean being passive in the face of whatever is happening. It means doing whatever you can do, seeing whatever you've got, and then not wanting other, because that's really the refuge of a balanced, equanimous heart.

It's really a place of great wisdom to be able to say: Things are what they are for reasons far beyond our ability to figure them out. Certainly life gets lived through us. We aren't helpless in our lives. We make decisions in every moment, hopefully in moments of clarity, in a skillful way, and we make decisions that influence our life and have tremendous influence on the lives of the people around us and ultimately, I believe, on all life. But we're not in charge. There's a way in which knowing that, there's a place that we can rest in the middle of a life of difficulty.

with a certain balance around the difficulty.

I was going to Spirit Rock to teach one day, somewhere in the last year or two, and I was arriving for class in the morning, hurrying because I was almost late. Down the path came another person who comes to class quite often, so I know her by name. I said, "Hi Rose, how are you?"

She said, "I'm fine."

Then as we were hurrying in together, she said, "Well actually, you know, I have this difficulty happening, and this other little problem in my life, and I have this other problem with my son. But actually," she said, "I'm fine."

After we had sat that morning—because I had a sense of what Rose meant—after we'd sat together, as is our habit every week, I talked about meeting Rose outside. I told exactly the same story I just told you now. We talked about that sense of being able to say: this is what's happening, this is what's true, this is painful, this is not so painful, this is more painful, this is pleasant, and I'm fine. I'm really fine.

I'm reminded of my grandmother who used to say, "My arthritis is giving me a lot of trouble, my knee hurts, I haven't had a letter from my cousin Sophie in a long time. And I myself am not too good." There's a sense that I myself could be good or not good, fine or not fine, and people understood what she meant.

When I told that story about Rose's remark, Gwen made a comment that has gone down in Spirit Rock history as Gwen's remark. I said, "You know, maybe we should have as a password here: I'm fine." Like clubs and secret societies have passwords they say to each other—the secret hand sign or handshake or secret word. We said, "How about we'll have a password here at Spirit Rock, and the password will be 'I'm fine.'"

We all thought about that. Then Gwen made her remark, which has gone down in history. Gwen said, "When people ask me, 'How are you, Gwen?' I say, 'I couldn't be better.'"

That is always true for all of us. Always. If we could, we would. Nobody purposely suffers. They don't get up and say, "I'm feeling great, but now I'm going to mess up the day." Nobody purposely does that. We couldn't be better, any of us.

It is really that awareness that everyone is always operating at whatever level of clarity they have—sometimes not much, sometimes unskillfully, sometimes unwholesomely, sometimes in a way that creates great deal of pain for other people. But they couldn't be better. That doesn't mean the behavior is okay. It just means they couldn't be better. It's really the clue to being able to forgive people.

This moment in which we couldn't be better, we can be different. The next moment can be different because if this moment is one of clarity, we can make a judgment that will make the next moment better. We can make a judgment in a moment of clarity that changes this moment completely and our reality completely from here on. In fact, that's what we're hoping to do here this week.

I really think of this practice as transformative in the deepest sense and in ways often that I feel are heroic and monumental, like changing the course of the Mississippi. But we can do it because we really have that possibility in moments of profound clarity to choose differently and live differently and have a different reality.

But this moment, as it arrives, is the child of everything that ever happened—always. We say, as part of the equanimity reflection, every individual is heir to their own karma. I think about that a lot, about what it means. Every individual is heir to their own karma.

In my mind, I don't hear it with a sense of "we deserve what we got." We got what we got in a lawful way because of everything that's gone before.

I was teaching in Grand Rapids, Michigan, sometime a year ago. At the end of the retreat workshop that I taught there, someone said, "You know, there's a person in our community that you haven't met yet. There's Arnold Boorstein. He's 86 years old. You should meet him. Maybe he's a relative of yours. It's not that common a name."

So I sought him out, and we talked a little bit.

We determined that we were not relatives—his family came from northern Germany, while my father-in-law's people were French. He was 86 years old, and when I asked if he had been born in Germany, he said no. His father had been born there and come to the United States, but Arnold Borstein himself had been born in Grand Rapids in 1906.

"That's really interesting," I said. "All the folks I know came to this country, got off the boat, and stayed in New York. Nobody moved. They maybe moved to New Jersey if they were adventurous, but nobody moved to Grand Rapids. How did your father get to be there?"

"Well," he said, "my father actually came to New York and stayed there a while. He and a cousin went into business, but the business failed. So they were thinking of something else to go into business doing together, and the cousin said, 'Let's go into the pickle business in Chicago.' So he said okay. The cousin went to Chicago first, and then my father got on the train to join him to open a pickle business. But he had to change trains in Detroit, and in Detroit, he got on the wrong train. He got on the train to Grand Rapids."

He arrived in Grand Rapids in mid-afternoon on a Friday, alone in a new city on a new street, not knowing anybody. He walked down the main street and saw a store that said "S. Cohen and Son, Men's Haberdashers." He went in and said, "Listen, I'm new in town. I just got here. I don't know anybody. Do you know any family that would invite a single Jewish man home for Shabbat dinner?"

So S. Cohen took him home for dinner. In the home of S. Cohen, having arrived there a week before, was S. Cohen's niece from Europe. Arnold Borstein's father married her and lived the rest of his life with her in Grand Rapids. And Arnold Borstein was born there.

If Arnold Borstein's father had gotten on the right train to Chicago, he would have had a whole different life—not his children, not his grandchildren, not his story.

When I think about this, I realize we are all, all of us, all the time getting on the train for Grand Rapids. Every single thing we do, every decision we make, is another train to Grand Rapids.

I told that story to my friend James, and he said, "I think it's wonderful that story happened in Grand Rapids, because that's like what life is—it's a river that's one long Grand Rapids."

When I see clearly, in the moments that I see clearly, I recognize that for me to be here in this moment, every single thing in history has had to happen. For me to have my children or my grandchildren, for you to be here, for anything to be what it is now, everything else has had to happen.

Sometimes people say, "Well, wait a minute, what does your life have to do with Marco Polo establishing a trade route to the Orient?" I don't know, but I think it has something to do with it. Who knows what those trade routes to the Orient did about commerce in Europe, about the business affairs of people in Europe, which caused different people to make different decisions about where to live, how to marry, when to emigrate, when to do what.

There are such things as proximal karma and distal karma. Marco Polo is probably very distal to my personal karma, but nevertheless, when I realize this, I really am awestruck. Had I gotten on one plane later, or turned the corner ten minutes before, or married Arnold Schwartz instead of Seymour Borstein—that's proximal karma—but everybody's life would be different.

We really get this on some level. So then it's hard to realize why we don't forgive people for being what they are. It makes so much sense to do it if we realize that people who do hurtful things are in pain. Everybody knows that people who do hurtful things are in pain. Happy people don't do hurtful things. It's so sensible to think that.

Why aren't we compassionate? Why don't we right away respond with great compassion? Why don't we forgive them? Sometimes I hear people say things like, "I'm never going to forgive so-and-so as long as I live."

I'm never going to give them the pleasure of the satisfaction of my forgiveness. As if the other person gets better from us forgiving! It is actually we who stay locked in a prison of discontent, in a prison of tight heart when we don't forgive. And yet we imagine that we somehow are causing... First of all, we imagine that we're causing pain to the other person by not forgiving them, and we imagine that the sense of pain we're causing them is making us happy, but it's not true. Vengeance is sweet? It's not true. Vengeance is terrible, and it's painful.

It takes some deeper understanding, though, because it makes sense to forgive, and yet we remember who offended us and who hurt us. We keep a little list, even though we know it's tedious.

When we listen to the Metta Sutta, it's so beautiful: "May all beings be happy, whatever their living nature." The Metta Sutta doesn't say how to love everybody. It says take care of everybody, love everybody, wish everybody well. It's very beautiful. And it's a little bit like the Nike ad—it says "just do it." It doesn't say how to do it.

So I think we need another sutta called the "no-grudge sutta" or something—how to do it. That might also shed some light on how we can work with those tightnesses in our own heart that have not yet relaxed.

I think that we don't forgive because we've been either frightened into a guardedness of the heart or saddened into a hardened heart. I think that's what happens.

Sometimes people will say, "I'm not frightened, I'm angry legitimately because I see injustice. And my anger causes me to address it." My father used to say, "I need my anger because it keeps me active for social justice." And I would agree with him. I would say, "I think you're half right. You need it as an alarm bell to tell you something's not right. And then you need to act. But when we act clouded with anger, we don't act well and we don't act wisely. We need it as mindfulness. Wake up. This isn't right. I have to fix it." And then we have to act out of clarity.

You know, the things that people worry about sometimes is that forgiveness might mean excusing or condoning or justifying or actually becoming friends with people who are hurtful or dangerous. And it doesn't mean any of that. It means seeing things clearly and responding to them wisely. That space of wise forgiveness comes out of clarity—seeing not through a veil of anger. Sometimes it means seeing our own shadow. Sometimes we're afraid of seeing our own shadow.

I had a ten-year grudge. It was the longest grudge I had, I think. I had a letter once from someone accusing me of something that so offended me. I remember telling people twice in my life I've had a rage. I'm not a very wrathful person—I come from mild-mannered people. I have other problems, but wrath is not my main problem. And I tell people I had two rages in my life, one other and then this one.

So I got a letter that accused me of something, and I just was filled with rage. I could not... it was terrible to me that this person had accused me of this, that, and the other thing, for which I felt wrongly accused.

By the way, Shantideva, in Chapter 6 of the Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life—the chapter called Patience—teaches that when someone challenges your good name and you feel offended and anger rises, you should reflect in the following way: Is that person right? If they're right, you should be grateful to them because they're pointing out something about yourself that you could improve or fix. Since our intention in life is to be as good as we can be, we should be grateful and think of them as teachers. And if they're wrong, what's the problem? Forget about it.

I didn't do it that well. I had a grudge for ten years.

Now, it wasn't a terribly debilitating grudge because I didn't think about it every day or nurse it daily. I don't run into this person very often—I live in the same county, and sometimes our paths cross, but not much. But for ten years it was more a story of how I couldn't let go of that grudge. I would tell my friends, "I can't believe that so-and-so said this about me. Can you believe it?" Ten years.

Sometimes we'd be on the same program, even on a panel together, and I'd think, "Uh-oh, I'm going to meet so-and-so there tonight." We were certainly always civil to each other, but I always couldn't see this person without thinking of what they said about me and having my grudge come up.

Then one night, fully ten years later after the event, I was driving to a gathering where I knew this person would be. Who knows why—perhaps it was enough clarity of the moment, the position of the stars, enough reflection, a moment of grace—but I had a really clear moment while driving along. I thought, "Well, I'm going to see so-and-so here tonight." Instead of the story coming up about "How could he have said that about me?" I thought to myself, "He was right, what he said about me. He was right. It's a piece of my shadow that I didn't want to see."

So I came to that place and met him. I said, "I'm really glad to see you." I felt really glad to see him. He said, "I'm really glad to see you," and he looked like he was. We finished the evening and he said, "Can we have lunch?" We made a lunch date.

We have become good friends, good colleagues, really study partners, spiritual friends to each other. I love him. He had health problems last year. I worried so much for him. I prayed so much for him. We've become quite close.

In the course of our becoming close, there was a long time before we actually spoke about the event that had happened. We would speak about it in veiled ways when we left each other after lunch. He'd say to me or I'd say to him, "I'm so glad we're friends." He'd say, "Yeah, it's really wonderful. I'm really glad we're friends." It was a code.

Finally, after a long time, I said, "I want to tell you the story of the event, because we have to talk about it sometime." I said, "I just would like to tell you how I felt when I read that letter. I read the letter, and I felt the rage, and I felt so inflamed that you had said that about me. So offended. It hurt me so much. It was very hard for me to think about." I told him the whole story about all the times I'd met him over the years, how that story always came up.

I said, "On that night when I said to you, 'I'm really happy to see you,' I had been driving to the place, and on the way, in a moment of clarity, I realized that what you said about me—you were right."

He said, "No I wasn't. I wasn't seeing clearly."

I was not understanding where you were at that time. I should not have said what I said in the harsh way that I said it. It was inexcusable of me to have said it in that way. I was not seeing clearly. Please forgive me."

It's quite extraordinary, the amount of happiness that this one friendship has brought to my life. And it's one where we see each other every month or two for lunch—it's not a big piece of my life. But the healing that happened and the learning that I did from it is a very big piece of my life.

It's really important, that awareness of when we hurt people. It's the only thing that really can be happening there—it's the fruit of that moment, the accident of the karma of that moment.

There's a very important passage in the book of Deuteronomy that instructs the Israelites about building cities of refuge. It says there ought to be cities where people can go to be protected from the angry kin of those they may have hurt, perhaps even killed, accidentally. The example given is if you were chopping down a tree in a forest with another person and your axe handle flew off and struck this other person and killed them, it would certainly be an accident. But their family, in moments of great grief and confusion, might come after you and kill you in return. So cities of refuge are for people to go "until the heated hearts of the family, of the hurt person, can cool down."

When one first hears that story, you might say, "Well, that axe handle flying off was an accident." But I think about this: everything is an accident of karma—of when we were born and who brought us up, our circumstances, our nervous system, our systems of self-control, our ability to see clearly, our needs to take care of ourselves that have somehow emerged from our viscera.

If we go back to Gwen's great wisdom: I couldn't be better. No one can be better. That doesn't mean we don't have to be careful and take action to preserve and protect people who can't control themselves so they don't hurt others. It just means we can see it as the accident of the karma of their lives rather than something they meant maliciously.

Sometimes you say, "Well, people meant to do it. They purposely did it. They premeditated it." That was also an accident of their karma—also a sadness. It's still important not to let a person who does that sort of thing do it freely. It's important to figure out how to stop those people from doing harm. It's important to figure out how to do it without hatred, understanding that everything is an accident of karma.

The Dalai Lama says everybody wants to be happy. Sometimes it expresses itself in a tremendously tragic and unwholesome way. When the mind is clear, we see that everyone is who they are and everything is what it is because of everything that's happened in the whole of creation, forever and ever since the beginning. And then we can take every step we can to take care of everybody, but with forgiveness in our hearts and compassion in our hearts.

A year ago I had the great good fortune to be invited to Dharamsala to a conference with twenty-five other Western dharma teachers to meet with the Dalai Lama. It was a tremendous honor to be invited and a tremendous trip to take. Among other things, I learned something about moments of seeing clearly in which it becomes apparent that the balanced heart really recognizes that everybody is just who they are because of circumstances, and everyone is lovable.

The trip to Dharamsala—if you haven't done it—is very difficult. You can't fly directly from San Francisco to Delhi; you have to go San Francisco to Frankfurt, Frankfurt to Delhi. Then from Delhi, we took a night train, which is a whole other experience in India. Carol talked a little last night about the difficulty of conveying in words the enormity of the Indian experience. The night train from Delhi to Pathankot is twelve hours—an extraordinary journey in very close quarters. Many of us who could meet in Delhi traveled together to Pathankot.

Then there's another four hours in a taxi cab from Pathankot to Dharamsala. Those of you who have ridden in an Indian taxi will know that's an extraordinary experience—seriously, seriously life-threatening. Your attention becomes very, very high.

The entire trip was marked by this heightened state of awareness. The level of prayers happening was extraordinarily high throughout the journey.

So we arrived, and by the time you reach Dharamsala after such a pilgrimage, it's such an altered experience just to have made this trip. And then suddenly, here you are in Dharamsala, which really is, in certain ways, a very poor Indian village. It's not magical in the way you might imagine a Shangri-La sparkling kingdom. It's not that kind of beautiful—it's simply a poor Indian village.

On the other hand, it's situated high in the Himalayas, breathtakingly beautiful in the mountains. From our window in the hotel where we stayed, you could look down on the roofs of different monasteries and see monks walking back and forth in walking meditation. It was deeply inspiring to be there.

And so here you are, suddenly at the end of the world, in another world entirely. We had seven days to be there, with only the middle days designated for meetings with the Dalai Lama. We had three days where our group was going to meet—just the twenty-six teachers who had come together to develop our agenda for what we would discuss with the Dalai Lama when we met him.

Not all of us knew each other. Perhaps half of that group I had never met before. There were teachers from all three traditions of Buddhism. I knew some of the people there, but certainly not all of them.

On the very first morning of our meetings together in preparation, my friend Jack Kornfield, who was moderating our session, gathered us all in a great circle. He said, "Well, why don't we go around the room and introduce each other?"

You know how these introductions usually go: my name is so-and-so, I live in such-and-such place, and this is what I teach, or whom I teach. But Jack didn't ask for that. Instead, he said, "Why don't we go around the room and say our name, and then share what is the greatest spiritual challenge facing us now in our lives, in our work, and in our teaching? I'll go first."

That's about the most serious question a person could ever be asked, and deeply personal. There's no fooling around with that question. He said, "I'll go first," and there wasn't even a question of who would go second. He announced he would begin, then pass the microphone to the person at his left. You couldn't even decide when your turn would come—it was simply starting, and you were in line.

There's a kind of sharpness that comes in the mind, or perhaps a surrender, when you know there is absolutely no way out of this situation. However challenging it might be, I found myself thinking, "Uh-oh, I don't know these people. How do I know if my spiritual dilemma will measure up to theirs? Will they approve of me?" In a certain way, I was the new person, since some of them had been to Dharamsala before and I hadn't. What if this, what if that?

But there was no room for such thoughts. We were in Dharamsala. You couldn't easily escape from there. The chips were down—it was one of those situations where you couldn't decide when to speak. Ready, set, go.

There's a wonderful kind of surrender that happens because there's nothing else to do. Clearly you're going to tell the truth, because there's nothing else possible.

Now, I must tell you something about this circle of twenty-six people—Jack and Sharon and myself and twenty-three others, many of whom I didn't know. There were people I knew and liked tremendously, people I knew and liked somewhat, people I knew and felt neutral about, and there were two, possibly three—two and a half people—with whom I didn't feel exactly on the same wavelength. Over the course of our time together in the dharma world, they had offended me at some point, and I had them on my little grudge list in my little heart. We were all very cordial to each other, but they weren't the people I chose to spend time with.

So here I was, looking around the room: good, good, good, good, ugh, good, good, good. You see the different faces and feel the response of your heart—how it opens toward the people you love and closes toward those you don't love as much.

But here came Jack with his question: tell the biggest spiritual challenge of your life, ready, set, go. He began and told his truth. The next person spoke and told their truth. Then the next person told their truth.

Meanwhile, I realized that whenever it reached me, I was going to have to tell my truth without worrying about what anybody thought, because worrying was impossible. I couldn't tell anything but the truth—here I was.

A wonderful kind of expansive surrender happened, truly a place of equanimity—an unusual, wide-awake, alert, bright, relaxed equanimity.

This person spoke, this person spoke, this person spoke, and then came one of my people—someone I didn't have such good feelings about. As he told his story, I realized it was as if I had never met him before. I was not meeting his sharing with all my accumulated stories about the times he had said things I didn't like, or when I took offense, or what he had said about me.

I listened without a story. Because when the heart really rests and the mind is truly clear, you listen without a story.

So he was just a person telling a story of struggle, the same way as everybody else had struggle. Because everybody's story is one of struggle. The very question itself—the biggest spiritual challenge of your life—already indicates struggle. People are going to tell you what their difficulty is. This person says, "This is my difficulty," and that person says, "This is my difficulty," and another says, "This is my difficulty."

And there was this person with his difficulty, and I was hearing it the same way. He had become a new person. Then there was the other person with her difficulty, and I was hearing it plainly. I realized as it was happening that it was happening, and I was so thrilled because I knew that I was free. In that relationship, that peace had returned.

With both of those people, I hung around afterward. We actually spent a lot of friendly time together and turned out to be very nice people. Sorry I had missed them before. I can't even remember who the half a person was—it got better. The half must not have been so significant. I remember the two clearly, and I remember that we spent a lot of time together. One of them I don't see at all now, simply because of where we live, but the other one I see quite often. We've really become good friends.

This happened, I think, because of the absolute surrender of the mind into a space of balance, which was necessitated by the location and the circumstances, and by the clarity of mind brought on by both the pilgrimage and the importance of paying attention. Everything had moved in the direction of attention, and everything had moved in the direction of surrender. You can't be in India without surrendering to begin with, and to undertake this whole journey in that group—the combination allowed me to see clearly and to absolutely forget. I would actually have a hard time remembering the stories of the offenses if I had to think them up.

When the mind is clear, it becomes so expansive. Everyone is just who they are. As a matter of fact, we begin to appreciate everybody for being exactly who they are. It's amazing how everybody is so completely themselves. It's awesome that you're you, not me. I look at different people living different lives and think, "Look how life is moving through that person. That's so amazing." It's remarkable that life comes through each of us so differently.

So we have the possibility of really respecting those karmic differences in all of us that make us uniquely ourselves—with our own name and our own story and our own way of being. And at the same time, when the mind is clear, we see how pervasive suffering is. No matter how unique our story, suffering is truly pervasive. It's the story of experience.

When we see from a place of equanimity and clarity how pervasive suffering is, it calls forth from us a vow to impeccability. When we see the pervasiveness of suffering—in myself, in others, all around us—we must not add one more drop of pain to an already very painful experience for all of us. This makes me understand better the Bodhisattva vow: "Although suffering is endless, I vow to end it."

I have a friend who's a Dominican nun, a member of the Dominican Sisters of San Rafael. She's been my friend for twenty-five years, one of my spiritual companions. She taught me a prayer that speaks to me deeply about being able to use insight to balance the recognition of suffering with clarity about the extraordinary, incomprehensibly profound truth of our interconnectedness. The prayer is: "May I be filled with that sense of awe that opens my capacity for loving."

So tonight, since we are ending this metta retreat, I thought we would sit for a little while, and I would read you the Metta Sutta.

Let's sit.

"This is what should be done by those who are skilled in goodness and who know the path of peace: Let them be able and upright, straightforward and gentle in speech, humble and not conceited, contented and easily satisfied, unburdened with duties and frugal in their ways, peaceful and calm, wise and skillful, not proud and demanding in nature. Let them not do the slightest thing that the wise would later reprove."

Wishing in gladness and in safety, may all beings be at ease. Whatever living beings there may be, whether they are weak or strong, omitting none—the great or the mighty, medium, short or small, the seen and the unseen, those living near and far away, those born and to be born—may all beings be at ease.

Let none deceive another or despise any being in any state. Let none through anger or ill will wish harm upon another. Even as a mother protects with her life her child, her only child, so with a boundless heart should one cherish all living beings.

Radiating kindness over the entire world, spreading upward to the skies and downward to the depths, outward and unbounded, free from hatred and ill will. Whether standing or walking, seated or lying down, free from drowsiness, one should sustain this recollection. This is said to be the sublime abiding.

By not holding to fixed views, the pure-hearted one, having clarity of vision, being freed from all sense desires, is not born again into this world.

As we conclude this metta retreat together, may the seeds of loving-kindness we have planted continue to grow and flourish. May the practice of metta become not just something we do in meditation, but a way of being in the world—radiating outward from our hearts to touch all life with boundless compassion.

Thank you for practicing together. May all beings be happy, may all beings be free from suffering, may all beings live with ease.

CHAPTER 197

The Spiritual Warrior

Guy Armstrong · 45 min

> In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong explores the timeless question of how to relate wisely to life's enormous energies while staying true to what we most cherish. Drawing on the archetype of the spiritual warrior found across wisdom traditions, he examines how we can cultivate the balance of qualities that allow for genuine freedom and awakening.
> Armstrong describes the spiritual warrior as embodying three essential capacities from Hermann Hesse's Siddhartha: the ability to think clearly (seeing what is), to wait (the power of pausing rather than reacting), and to fast (letting go of what binds us). These qualities form the foundation of meditative awareness and allow us to transform our basic life energy from destructive patterns into wisdom and compassion.
> Through storytelling and personal reflection, the talk addresses how fear often prevents us from opening to life's fullness, and how cultivating courage - not the absence of fear, but the willingness to face it with presence - becomes the path to fearlessness. Armstrong emphasizes that what makes us willing to meet our edges is ultimately love: our care for truth, for awakening, and for life itself. He concludes with the understanding that the mature spiritual warrior's aspiration is comprehensive - that all circumstances serve awakening and all beings be included in our hearts.

One of the great and perennial questions on all paths is how do we relate wisely to the enormous life energies - the creative ones, the destructive ones, the confusing ones? How do we find some balance in the midst of it? And how in the midst of all of it do we stay true to what we most value? Rather than getting yanked around, do we have that quality of remembering so we really live what our hearts most genuinely cherish?

The word bodhisattva, as many of you know, means awakened being. And we are all bodhisattvas. We're all awakening. It's our nature to awaken. The bodhisattva embodies a balance of qualities. In the classic spiritual texts, they're called spiritual faculties. There's a number of them, and these qualities allow that expression of freedom which is our nature.

Last week, the talk was on the power of wakeful relaxation, which really is one of these faculties - the capacity to find tranquility, to relax into experience, so that rather than fighting what arises naturally in our awareness, there's a willingness to be with. There's a willingness to experience fully what's happening. So there's a real transformative power to that.

There's also a potential shadow side. Sometimes in service of relaxation, or we think we're relaxing, we're actually dulling out, trancing out, turning off the switch. We're not there experiencing in an alert way.

One of the balancing qualities that the Buddha talked about that is part of our development as awakening beings has been described archetypally as the spiritual warrior. This archetype exists in many spiritual traditions and describes that capacity to courageously face our lives and to be wholeheartedly committed to living our path, however we describe our path. It's that wholeheartedness of resolve and commitment that really lets us go for it in a sense. This is the energy of the bodhisattva. This is that energy that really allows for fully living.

The description that I can best put on this energy is that it's our life force. It's that basic will to live, that will to thrive or to be fully. It can be used to create and destroy civilizations. It can be used to heal, to repress, to work hard with, to strive, to awaken, to liberate. It can go in many different directions. It's the energy behind the flower that's blooming or the dog that's barking. It's basic life energy.

What determines which way this energy goes, what happens out of it, is really our intention. It's our aspiration. As you know, we have many layers to our intentionality. Some of them are that we want to be safe, so we have the intention towards safety, to defend ourselves, to have more pleasure in our lives, to be respected, to be recognized. We can put our energy behind any of those areas of motivation.

It's said that when the spiritual warrior is mature, their aspiration is that of the bodhisattva - that all circumstances may serve to awaken. The aspiration is for freedom of the heart and mind. What that means is that the entire energy of awakening is towards that. When the warrior is instead in the grip of greed or hatred or delusion, energy is quite destructive, as you know.

I'd like to read you a little story. Once upon a time, there was an elderly king, a kind and generous ruler of a peaceful and prosperous land. He was greatly loved by his people for his kindness and his wisdom. He was approaching his 80th year. His wife had long since died and his only son had been killed in a recent accident. He had no heir, so he had to decide to whom to leave his kingdom, who would he pass on the wisdom of his long life and all his worldly wealth.

He decided to look for a suitable heir among his people, and although it was against all precedent, he was a very good-willed king and decided he'd invite all interested people from the lands to his castle to see who was to be the next heir. He looked forward to the day with happy anticipation.

In the early morning hours of New Year's Day, which was the day he chose, people started flooding in. They arrived from near and far - women, men, rich, poor, young, old, learned, illiterate - and all were warmly welcomed by the palace staff and invited to the royal bathhouse to rest, relax, and clean up in preparation for meeting the king.

They were invited to soak in perfumed baths and offered fragrant lotions and oils to smooth their skin. Masseuses came to ease stress and tension, hairdressers to provide new hairstyles and trim beards. Now groomed and washed, they went into a huge wardrobe room where each selected a new outfit in which to meet the king. In his great kindness, he wanted everyone to have an equal chance in terms of how they appeared.

Relaxed and happy after the luxuriant bath, the applicants were beside themselves with excitement when they saw the dazzling array of fashionable clothing offered to them. Each tried on many different outfits, like children trying on make-believe costumes, preening before mirrors and each other, asking and giving advice, especially with accessories and shoes. When each finally settled on the outfit of their choice, they were taken into the palace banquet room where a lavish feast awaited them—a smorgasbord with every food and delicacy imaginable. Everyone wanted to taste every dish, so there was much bustling back and forth. No one wanted to miss out on anything.

While feasting with gusto, they were serenaded by musicians. During dessert, there were games of chance and a tantalizing array of prizes. This was followed by a mesmerizing magic show featuring the king's finest wizards.

It was at this point, after bathing, dressing, feasting, and being entertained, that the applicants were to begin going upstairs, one by one, to the king's chambers for their interview with his majesty. But the magic show was so spellbinding that not one of them could pull themselves away. They remained glued to their seats, completely entranced.

Meanwhile, the king was upstairs happily anticipating the appearance of the applicants. The appointed time came and he heard no footsteps on the stairs. Still, he waited patiently. No one appeared. Finally, as the sun moved close to the horizon, the king summoned his chief minister. "Where are the applicants? I'm eager to find my heir."

The minister looked sheepishly down at his shoes, visibly distressed. Clearing his throat, he spoke haltingly: "I am sorry to have to tell you this, your majesty, but they've all gone home. They've taken their new clothes. They've stuffed their pockets with leftovers from the feast. They've taken the prizes. They even took the soaps and lotions from the bathhouse. They've all gone home."

The king's hopes were dashed. He had no heir. Turning, he gazed silently out the window at the rolling hills and valleys of his beloved kingdom. His eyes filled with tears.

Satiated with food and drink, excited by new clothes and amusing prizes, mesmerized by music and magic, the people had completely forgotten why they came to the king's palace in the first place.

This is really the story of us all. There's not one of us that does not get waylaid. We know that. Sometimes we stay on track, but so often we get carried off into the preoccupations that really hold sway over us. We all get carried off. We get involved with planning and controlling and defending and trying to get through the day and make this happen and that happen, and we do disconnect from what most matters to us. And then we remember with a bit of sadness or angst that we missed many moments.

As we mature and wake up more and more, as we practice remembering on the path, what we're remembering really is what matters. We're remembering how much preciousness there is to a moment of real presence, to connecting in a heartfelt way with someone else, to really being here to live this life. We remember more. And this is the main attribute of the spiritual warrior—this quality of remembering what matters, coming back home again and again, remembering more and more moments.

In Jungian archetypes, the king-queen represents the awareness of it all, the mindfulness, the holding of the realm, containing and holding the realm in heart and mind and awareness. I love this description written by Jack Kornfield: "To take the one seat, to become the king or queen, to reclaim our Buddha nature, is to sit in the midst of experience just as it is, and to have our eyes open and our heart open."

In any moment we do this, it opens a whole new possibility—the possibility that we bear witness to, that we experience the unspeakable sorrow and beauty that makes up life.

This is a description of our awakened awareness, the king-queen quality. The spiritual warrior is in service of this. This is who and what the allegiance is towards of our basic energy.

Now, there are several qualities of awareness that are cultivated to allow the spiritual warrior—this part of our being—to really align ourselves, to remember, to be here for our lives. And they're described beautifully by Herman Hesse in the book Siddhartha. Many of you have probably read it, so to remind you: at one point he writes, "Siddhartha had three powers. He could think, he could wait, and he could fast."

These three qualities are really the grounds of a meditative mind. So let's look at them one by one.

He says he could think—he could see clearly. See clearly, be here for what is. To live with a totality of attention. So there's an awareness of posture. There's an awareness of sound. There's an awareness of mood, there's awareness of what is going on in this world. To see clearly means we're aware of our habits, of where we get stuck. To see clearly means we're aware of our potential, our capacity to really live in an open-hearted way, to be wise. So this is one of the qualities of a meditative mind and of the spiritual warrior—this clarity of seeing, this awareness, this attention that's right here and now, awake and alert.

The second quality: Siddhartha could wait. Now waiting, what does that mean? To be able to pause. The power of not-doing. That takes the quality of wakefulness where we're not carried off in our reflex and reactivity, but rather letting go of that and just being patient, silent, non-reactive. Discovering in that place, in that space of silence and quietness, the wisdom and compassion that can really guide us. That's where it comes from—learning to pause. It's a real power, and it's one that takes training, as you know. We tend to lean forward into our life and just roll along. To stop, to pause, to wait.

So Siddhartha could think. Siddhartha could wait. The third: he could fast. Now this is the one that gets most misunderstood, so I'll take a little time with it. Fasting—and it's also described in the classical texts as renunciation—means letting go of what binds us, renouncing or letting go of what keeps us small. Letting go of our habits of overwork, our habits of passivity, of overeating, of exploiting others, of controlling, of judging. Whatever it is that we're doing that gets in the way of full open presence, we gradually, as we can, let go of.

When we begin to realize our capacity for full presence, it becomes clearer and clearer how our habits of holding on or resisting keep us distant from ourselves, from each other. We start seeing the limiting beliefs we have about ourselves: "I can't do this," "I'm not good enough"—the steep self-doubts. That's part of renunciation: to not be so invested in, to let go of these ideas we have that keep us small.

Chögyam Trungpa writes, "What the warrior renounces is anything in her experience that is a barrier between herself and others." What do we do to push off others, to keep others out of our heart? What we're letting go of is contraction, is the small identities that stop us from realizing our Buddha nature. And in the letting go, we're freed up to live in the creative current of life.

So actually, renunciation is the pathway to a real creative, active participation. Because we have let go of all the constraints. Fasting is a way of saying, giving up all that takes us away from life—non-clinging. The attitude, it's the willingness to be here. This is the attitude of the spiritual warrior, this real willingness to say yes, yes to this life, to become part of the stream of life.

Now, meditation practice is really training in these three qualities: in seeing clearly, in pausing, in this kind of letting go into the flow. As an example, the one we're most familiar with here in our practice is frequently that thoughts come up. And what happens? The first part: to begin to see clearly that it's happening, just to recognize, "Okay, thinking." In the moment of seeing clearly, we're not so identified.

And then what? We pause. We just rest in that space of awareness. Just let be. Get quiet for a moment. See what's there. There's then the third: this letting go back into the flow, letting go of the grip of the thought, back into the flow of the breath. Our sounds that come and go are if there's a strong mood that wants our attention. We come back to what is.

By letting go of this identification with the waves of thought over and over again, we begin to see that we've been living in wave ideas and we haven't been connected to this ocean, this boundlessness of being which is our nature. So we really are practicing letting go into the totality. As we practice this letting go, we have available the full expression of life energy. It's access to a real boundless kind of creativity and loving. So that's the resolve of the warrior, to keep seeing what's happening and loosening the grip and opening back into the flow.

Now what stops us from doing that? What stops us from this letting go into it all? What most people find when they begin to investigate, when they look closely, is that our tendency to keep holding tight, to keep leaving, to getting lost in the past and the future, is very driven by fear. There's a real fear of opening to the mysterious and enormous energies of life just as they are. We want to in some way control it, hold it at bay.

There's a fear to let go into life, to really just sit down in our bodies. I mean, just try it. Just really letting go and sit down in it all. And we begin to, but then we recontract very quickly. Unconsciously, there's a continuous effort to kind of keep our fingers on the knob and the dial to control pain and pleasure. Fear is what stops and freezes this energy towards awakening. It's said that in order to be with life, we have to be willing to face this fear. That the source of courage of the spiritual warrior is this willingness to open to fear. Are we willing?

So our practice starts with seeing where we are meeting our edge. And we each have those places in our life where we've gotten very habitual to avoid something. Places where we don't let ourselves really get close to other people, where we get very defended or armored, places where we are not willing to take a risk creatively or in work. We're not willing to show vulnerability. We're not able to really face the parts of ourselves or other people that frighten us. We all have those edges, every one of us.

And this willingness to face fear is really a willingness to stay there and to see what happens. Again, Chogyam Trungpa, who writes a lot about the spiritual warrior archetype: "Acknowledging fear is not a cause for depression or discouragement. Because we possess such fear, we also are potentially entitled to experience fearlessness. True fearlessness is not the reduction of fear, but facing, going through, and beyond."

Now, going beyond fear again, does not mean that the sensations of fear just disappear. Rather, going beyond fear means that we have shifted from feeling the victim of, the one who is afraid, the one who is a small, endangered self. We've shifted from that into the awareness that recognizes fear with compassion, with presence. Do you understand that shift? The fear can still be there, but our sense of who we are has expanded. There's room.

This happens more and more as we are willing to be with what we've habitually avoided, resisted. Gradually we soften, we open, we shift in our sense of who we are. But it takes a willingness.

So the question is, what makes us willing to face what's difficult? What makes us willing to be with pain, to open to shame, to touch into the ocean of grief, to be with other people's grief? What makes us willing?

"Our desire to awaken," one student responds. Beautiful. "Wanting a higher and better quality of life," offers another. "Compassion," says a third voice. Yes, compassion.

Compassion emerges as another gateway to willingness—having compassion for ourselves and others makes us willing to face what we might otherwise avoid. Someone noted that fighting against our experience simply doesn't work; resistance only creates more suffering. The desire for freedom itself becomes a powerful motivator, as does simple curiosity—that natural interest in exploring what lies beneath the surface of our habitual patterns.

Each of us finds our own flavor of what makes us willing to practice. We're all on this path in our unique way, yet something is making us willing to face what our conditioning would normally have us turn away from. To practice mindfulness is to be willing to meet life in a more unconditional way, and there's enormous power in this willingness.

This willingness generally expresses itself in two fundamental ways. The first is care—we care about life itself, about waking up, about being real and honest with what is. We love life so deeply that we want to experience it fully, even in its painful moments. The second quality is interest, born from our love of truth. Part of our love for life is this insatiable desire to know, to understand what this mysterious existence is really about.

There's no way to truly understand, no way to really know what this is all about, no way to live fully or open our hearts completely except by facing each moment as it is. And so, gradually, we learn to put down our armor.

It's profoundly ironic that the spiritual warrior—this archetype we find so compelling—actually refers to one who has the courage to disarm, to become vulnerable. We see this pattern repeated throughout history in all the great stories of heroes and heroic acts. This willingness emerges from deep caring, from love for something or someone greater than our small concerns.

Consider the myth of Camelot, where knights undertook extraordinary quests inspired by love for the lady of the court. Think of mothers performing superhuman feats to protect their children, or the countless beings throughout history who have fought for freedom in various forms. What enables these transcendent acts? We move beyond our usual preoccupations with personal pain and pleasure because of this great love—for life, for truth, for something that matters deeply.

Take a moment to reflect on where this quality shows up in your own life. What are you truly dedicated to? Who are the people, what are the activities or causes that evoke your deepest commitment? Where have you felt that sense of the spiritual warrior's resolve—that willingness to put everything on the line for what you care about?

For some, this dedication flows toward the path of awakening, toward the Dharma itself. For others, it's devotion to a relationship, to parenting, to creative expression, to service in the world. Where have you experienced this quality of resolve? How has this kind of dedication energized you, allowed you to let go of smaller concerns and open to something larger?

It's valuable to recognize and affirm this beautiful part of ourselves. By sensing again and again what we truly care about, we activate and energize ourselves on the path. This caring isn't something we need to manufacture—it's already present, waiting to be acknowledged and honored.

Sometimes, as was mentioned, it's the great life events that crack us open—the traumas and dramas, the births and deaths that awaken our heart and deepen our resolve. Learning that someone has cancer, losing a job, the birth of a child, spiritual breakthroughs or sudden insights—these experiences can instantly awaken the caring that's already within us. They don't create something new; they simply remove the veil that was covering what was always there.

We get shocked into being more here.

I'd like to share a personal experience from the last few days that speaks directly to this. About three days ago, a friend of mine committed suicide. I'm very close with his wife and family. His son is one of my son's best friends. This has created ripples of suffering touching many lives.

Yet witnessing how people have responded, how they've risen to the occasion—probably everyone here has lost someone close or knows someone who has—reveals such depths of compassion. It's as if when people are finally compelled to feel grief fully, so much falls away. There emerges this profound potential to be utterly real, to give freely, to sacrifice willingly. And this truly arouses resolve.

For me, it's inevitable that seeing a precious life end, facing death directly, makes me more resolved to love well and to live my moments fully. This speaks to one of the great universal teachings found in almost every tradition: that death and impermanence can be our teacher, moment by moment, because everything is going, everything is dying. Today is almost gone, our bodies are aging, for many of us our children are growing up, the seasons are changing—it's all moving so very fast.

Our response can either be to put on blinders or to look directly into the face of this impermanence, this dying happening all around us, and really cherish our moments. To truly value this one and this one.

The shaman Don Juan writes: "Without the awareness of death, he would be an ordinary man involved in ordinary acts. He would lack the necessary potency, the necessary concentration that transforms one's ordinary time on earth into magical power."

This is the heart of the spiritual warrior—this cherishing of life and having the courage and resolve to really show up for it, to be here for it.

In the most mature awakened bodhisattva, the spiritual warrior, this loving becomes unconditional. This resolve becomes comprehensive. All situations, all circumstances serve to awaken—the driving back and forth to places, the petty tasks, the big obstacles, the people who annoy us. Everything serves awakening. Every being is included in our hearts.

I mentioned earlier that this will to live, this quality of intentionality, often gets wrapped around our fears and wanting, which is quite natural. This has been called the shadow warrior. It's really the same energy as the mature spiritual warrior—still that will to live, to thrive—but it becomes contracted around wanting and fearing.

What do we do with this? This shadow warrior has been the cause of wars throughout history, of violence. It's the cause of destruction and sickness, of disease inflicted upon the earth and environment. How can we work with this energy in a way that transforms it, so we can manifest as mature warriors?

To awaken and heal, we start right where we are. If we find ourselves in the grip of the shadow warrior—of anger, of wanting to hurt or destroy or accumulate—if our energy, our intentionality is locked in contraction, we start there. Our practice, as always, is to bring the same clear seeing to what is arising.

Anger. See it clearly. Pause. Have commitment enough to simply pause and let it be, and let go.

Letting go of anger doesn't mean pushing it away. It means seeing the stories we've wrapped around it and allowing the energy to be there without identifying ourselves as "the angry person." We are the awareness that includes it.

The more moments we bring these qualities of clear seeing, of pausing, of opening, the more moments we touch our true nature, our free nature. The shadow warrior transforms into the mature warrior through kind attention, through opening to the vulnerability that drives him or her, to the soft spot, to being tender with that soft spot—the fear, the wanting.

This is the training we're engaged in. We train in concentration, in mindfulness, so we develop that muscle, that capacity, that strength. Then when we get caught, we can notice it. There's no shame, no judgment—just "Okay, caught, caught in this energy"—and see it clearly.

I began tonight with the story of those people who went to the castle and forgot why they were there. It is our nature to forget. Each of us, every day, gets pulled off track. This always happens. We forget. It's also natural that as we practice mindfulness, we remember more and more.

As this basic quality of the spiritual warrior begins to flower, we find ourselves present and knowing what we love, living what we love, living our moments fully.

The Buddha, toward the end of his life, taught that fear and insecurity are great—these are the energies that drive the shadow warrior. Fear and insecurity are great, but greater yet is the truth of our connection. Greater yet is the power of love. This is our Buddha nature: each of us has this power of awareness and love that can transform and awaken our hearts.

When we get little glimmers—through sitting, we get glimmers in nature, with loved ones, we get glimmers through our losses—these moments can serve to deepen our commitment, our resolve, because we realize how much we cherish this life. Like the bodhisattvas of the ages, we remember that we're really here for only one purpose: to wake up, to live it fully, and to love fully.

I'd like to close with a short poem:

To be of the earth is to know the restlessness of being a seed, the darkness of being planted, the struggle toward the light, the pain of growth into the light, the joy of bursting and bearing fruit, the love of being food for someone, the scattering of your seeds, the decay of the seasons, the mystery of death, and the miracle of birth.

Let's take a few moments to sit in guided meditation. As a way of establishing presence, connect with the aspiration of your heart, what brings you here, what you most wish to guide your life. Let that be your prayer for yourself in this moment: "May I awaken, may these moments be wakeful." Whatever words, whatever flavor matches for you.

Now take a few moments to relax your body, your heart, your mind. Make room for whatever arises in awareness. Meet whatever arises with interest, with care. See clearly what's true. Pause. Let go into the stream of experience again and again.

As a way of anchoring, if your mind is busy, simply steady yourself with the breath, with sound. Then open to whatever calls your attention with this clear seeing.

Let's close with metta meditation. Sit comfortably, taking a few moments to feel your heart, feel the breath at your heart.

I'd like to ask that we bring our prayer and care to the family I described earlier. Hold in your hearts, in the space of heart, the sense of these beings who are going through so much loss and pain. Alden, Hedda, Jane, Will. May these beings and all their relations be held in the great compassionate heart of wisdom. May they be soothed. May they discover some peace, some understanding, some freedom.

Now take some moments in silence to bring into your heart whoever in your life needs some healing, needs some kindness. Sense their vulnerability. Sense where they're tender, and offer your care.

Finally, let us open our prayer to include all beings. May all beings be held in this great space of compassion. May all beings touch peace. May all beings awaken and be free.

CHAPTER 198

The Courage To Live Your Aspirations

Guy Armstrong · 56 min

> In this inspiring dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the essential role of spiritual aspirations in our practice and daily lives. Drawing from the Buddha's teachings on the four conditions necessary for nurturing dharma aspirations - suitable environment, good companions, self-regulation, and wholesome karma - Armstrong explores how to maintain the transformative energy of retreat practice in ordinary life.
> Armstrong distinguishes between ego-driven goals and authentic spiritual aspirations that arise from our deepest wisdom. He emphasizes that true aspirations are not about becoming something new, but uncovering and embodying what we already are beneath the layers of greed, hatred, and delusion. The talk weaves together practical guidance on establishing daily meditation practice, working with relationships as dharma practice, and maintaining the precepts as a foundation for ethical living.
> With characteristic warmth and humor, Armstrong addresses the courage required to live authentically, sharing personal stories and teaching anecdotes that illuminate the path from aspiration to embodiment. He concludes with Śāntideva's Seven Branch Prayer, a profound expression of bodhisattva aspiration that extends our practice for the benefit of all beings.

Over the last ten days or two weeks that we've been here, we have heard a lot about what the full potential of our lives is. During this time we have been making a conscious effort to awaken, to come out of the dream or the fog-like state that we often live in. And even though at times the steps may feel small, each step is a step towards freedom.

By doing this practice, we have been nurturing our commitment to awaken—a commitment to living our lives in alignment with our hearts' and minds' deepest wishes. Soon we'll be faced with leaving here, and it's important to look at how we can continue to nurture this commitment. How can we take this practice and what we've been doing here and first let it become a support in our daily lives, and then let it become the way in which we live our lives?

When I first began doing this practice, the main criterion for me was that it be a practice that assisted me in my daily life, that brought some clarity to the situations I encountered. Tonight I'd like to speak about extending this practice that we've been doing here sitting on the cushion and extending it into our daily lives.

I'd like to begin by speaking about the seed itself—the seed of aspiration or the knowing or sensing of the full potential of life. It's so vital to our practice and how we live our lives. It can at times be extremely energizing and helpful to our practice to reflect on why we practice and what it is that has so inspired us to come here. What are the deepest aspirations of our hearts and minds?

By doing this we allow these aspirations to become a strong motivating force in our practice and in our lives. In understanding what is motivating us, we can come to see how to nurture this. Then these aspirations become something that we can use daily in our life. When we're faced with making a decision, it can be a reference point. For myself, having the aspiration to awaken, I can look and see: in a moment where I need to make a choice, will this help me to awaken, or is it based upon greed, hatred, and delusion?

I'd like to say a little bit more about the word aspiration itself, because it sometimes has funny connotations in our society. We live in a culture that's very good at setting goals. We may have a lot of training in how to reach these goals, and oftentimes these goals are something that we've intellectually decided upon. They may come out of cultural norms in our society and our desires, and may be related to a career path. It could be as if we pick out something that we want to do in life and then decide, no matter what, that's what we're going to do.

So often this is based upon some external kind of fulfillment, and the mind becomes constricted around the goal—what we want to achieve. In a sense it's a closing down of the mind and losing any sense of what's skillful or unskillful.

I'd like to share a story about one aspiration that is based on external fulfillment. Apparently there is an award that is given out each year called the Darwin Award, and it's given to the person who did the gene pool the biggest service by killing or injuring themselves in the most extraordinarily stupid way. This is the story about the winner for 1997.

His name was Larry Waters of Los Angeles, and he's one of the few Darwin winners to survive his award-winning accomplishment. Larry's boyhood dream was to fly. When he graduated from high school, he joined the Air Force in hopes of becoming a pilot. Unfortunately, poor eyesight disqualified him. When he was finally discharged, he had to satisfy himself with watching jets fly over his backyard.

One day Larry had a bright idea. He decided to fly. He went to the local Army-Navy surplus store and purchased forty-five weather balloons and several tanks of helium. The weather balloons, when fully inflated, would measure more than four feet across.

Back home, Larry securely strapped the balloons to his sturdy lawn chair. He anchored the chair to the bumper of his Jeep and inflated the balloons with the helium. He climbed on for a test while it was still only a few feet above the ground. Satisfied it would work, Larry packed several sandwiches and a six-pack of Miller Lite, loaded his pellet gun—figuring he could pop a few balloons when it was time to descend—and went back to the lawn chair. He tied himself in along with his pellet gun and provisions.

Larry's plan was to lazily float up to a height of about thirty feet above his backyard after severing the anchor and after a few hours come back down. Things didn't quite work out that way. When he cut the cord anchoring the lawn chair to his Jeep, he didn't float lazily up to thirty feet or so. Instead, he streaked into the LA sky as if shot from a cannon. He didn't level out at thirty feet, nor did he level off at one hundred feet. After climbing and climbing, he leveled off at eleven thousand feet.

At that height he couldn't risk shooting any of the balloons lest he unbalance the load and really find himself in trouble. So he stayed there, drifting, cold, and frightened for more than fourteen hours. Then he really got in trouble. He found himself drifting into the primary approach corridor of the Los Angeles International Airport.

A United pilot first spotted Larry. He radioed the tower and described passing a guy in a lawn chair with a gun. Radar confirmed the existence of an object floating eleven thousand feet above the airport. LAX emergency procedures swung into full alert and a helicopter was dispatched to investigate.

LAX is right on the ocean. Night was falling and the offshore breeze began to blow, carrying Larry out to sea with the helicopter in hot pursuit. Several miles out, the helicopter caught up with Larry. Once the crew determined that Larry was not dangerous, they attempted to close in for a rescue, but the draft from the blades would push Larry away whenever they neared. Finally, the helicopter ascended to a position several hundred feet above Larry and lowered a rescue line. Larry snagged the line and was hauled back to shore. The difficult maneuver was flawlessly executed by the helicopter crew.

As soon as Larry was hauled to earth, he was arrested by waiting members of the Los Angeles Police Department for violating LAX airspace. As he was led away in handcuffs, a reporter dispatched to cover the daring rescue asked why he had done it. Larry stopped, turned, and replied nonchalantly, "A man just can't sit around."

This is not quite the kind of aspiration that I'm talking about.

When I'm using the word aspirations, I often think of the energy of rising up—rising up to inhabit our full potential, the qualities that we inhabit in doing so. It's not a state of becoming but an embodiment of that which we aspire to. We don't become more loving—it's not a creation—but through the purification of our aspirations we may embody love more deeply. It's not about reaching out to be something, but rather revealing that which is already there, which has only been obscured. In this way it is a realignment of our lives to be in accordance with the deepest level of our being.

Another way that helped me to understand aspirations is the way Hozan, the Zen master that I sit with, used to speak of them. He often talks about uncovering our deepest vows. This has seemed to me to be really true—that as I sit and meditate, there is a sense of uncovering that which has been covered. It's covered over by habits of mind, emotions that carry us away, or thoughts that we get lost in. Essentially they get covered over when we identify with something in a way that starts to create a small, separate self.

Through our practice we're able to see through the delusion of these states, to become less enchanted by our desires. In letting go or simply not being moved by them, our deepest vows become revealed.

It's crucial that we nurture these aspirations, or they become some ideological concept that can drive us crazy as we fail to live up to them. In this way they become just another way to beat ourselves up, to tell ourselves that we're not good enough. They become that brutal "should" in our mind that we have a way of torturing ourselves with.

At the beginning of this year I was in Northampton, and as I was walking down the street there was a street musician there. In his box he had a sign that said, "May your suffering last as long as your New Year's resolutions."

When our New Year's resolutions become that brutal "should," we lose our inspiration. Or else we may just leave these aspirations to wither and die, and we begin to listlessly move through life, shying away from anything that may awaken us.

Growing more and more numb to life itself, this disconnection from our deepest aspirations can lead to states of guilt and remorse—feelings we may not fully face until the time of death arrives. Then we might look upon our lives with profound sorrow and despair.

Just recently, a friend of mine who works in hospice care shared a particularly moving experience. A woman came into the hospice after sixty-five years of marriage, and as she was about to die, she told her husband that in all those decades together, he had never been able to show his affection to her. Now, facing her death, he was completely present for her and couldn't stop expressing the love he had carried all along. In some way, he was very fortunate to have this opportunity.

Many times death comes without our knowing it's about to arrive, and we don't have those final moments to express what lives in our hearts. But hopefully we can learn to be connected in such a way that we don't need to wait sixty-five years to offer our love.

Both Carol and Sharon have spoken about how important our intentions and actions are, about the law of karma, and how what we direct our minds toward is what we will bear the fruits of. If we keep looking toward unwholesome, habituated patterns of greed, hatred, and delusion, this is what we will come to bear the fruits of. But if we can realign our hearts and minds with that which brings us closer to freedom, understanding, peace, and harmony, that too is what we will bear the fruits of. This obviously makes it very important what we incline our minds toward.

We can look right now into our own hearts and minds to see what it is that we aspire to, what's meaningful to us. And we can be honest with ourselves. There's no right answer. Each person's expression is probably quite unique. And yet when we look into our spiritual journeys, there's probably something quite universal in our ultimate aspirations.

In our own language, we may find something like a desire for greater happiness, peacefulness, understanding, or the aspiration to be liberated—to be free. It's important that we let the voice be our own, not what we think we should aspire to. It needs to be something that speaks to us in our own language.

Recently someone expressed it to me as "getting out of their own way." It can be something very simple. As Sylvia mentioned the other night, the Dalai Lama says, "My religion is kindness." A simple statement, and yet when we look at what kindness truly is, it's not simply being nice to someone. True kindness requires that we live deeply, that in a simple moment of kindness we bring to bear the qualities of wisdom, love, compassion, and equanimity. It requires a full presence of being.

It may be that our aspirations are not immediately apparent. It may take some time to understand what is fully motivating us. We can be so used to listening to the chitchat of our minds that we fail to give the heart space to listen from an intuitive level. Rather than forcing some outside concept, we can silently listen within. Through our practice, we begin to allow the spaciousness in which our hearts can be heard. We can then begin to live our lives from this place.

For years, I would usually begin my sittings by saying, "May I be liberated for the benefit of all beings." There were many times when this seemed very dry to me, and I would wonder, "What's my problem? Don't I want to be liberated?" Then one day I noticed that even though there was some dryness with these words, they directed my mind to this place of intuitive knowing. There was a felt sense there—maybe there were no words to express it, but it could be clearly attuned to.

There's a quality of courage that is needed in moving toward our aspirations. We need to move beyond the inertia that sometimes settles into our lives when we fall into sustaining the status quo. We need to move beyond our self-preserving tendencies and be willing to stand naked in the light.

I know there have been many times in my life when I came directly into contact with the feeling of smallness, when I was faced with a situation that challenged me deeply. One such time, I was involved in a meditation center and had only been there a very short period when I was asked to manage the center. It was a big job with a lot of responsibility, and I remember so clearly how I would have this feeling of just being a very tiny little person in a very big job. There were times when I wanted to crawl back into my hole, times when I didn't like what I had to do. In many ways it forced me to let go of my preferences. This was possible through remembering what it was I was doing and why I was doing it. By keeping in touch with what was motivating me, I had a bigger picture than just being involved in satisfying my preferences.

I suspect many of us have at various times in our lives been put in positions where we really felt challenged. There's no question that it's a challenge to wake up out of our habituated patterns—they've been around a very long time. Sometimes it's seemingly more comfortable not to try than to try and feel as if one has fallen short.

I know when I was a child, I would often begin things and then the fear of failure would stop me. It was as if I was afraid that if I tried, I might discover that I really was no good—or discover what my shortcomings were.

During my teenage years, there were two people who really inspired me to have courage in following the aspirations of my heart. I came into contact with these two people at a very difficult time in my life. I had become very disillusioned with the world and all its seeming injustices. I was quite angry and felt quite alienated. At that time I was having trouble going to school—I would walk up the steps to the school each day, and then a part of me just couldn't face it again.

And so I would go and I would sit by the river. And it was a very pretty river with lots of trees around it. And yet in the background was the city was right there and the hum of the city. As I sat there each day, just watching the river flowing and the comings and goings of the life there, there were these two people that were frequently there.

By the standards of society, these people would probably be termed failures. One of them was a bag lady, and the other was probably something we would call a bum. The bag lady would come every day and she would pick up treasures that she found that other people had discarded. The bum would come in his ragged clothes and he would just sit on this bench and he would bring with him a bag to feed the birds. He'd sit there and he'd feed the birds for hours, and sometimes people would come along and he'd just have a chat with them.

What I really started to sense from these people was that they had some kind of peace and tranquility. They had something which I didn't see in a lot of the other people around me. I just looked at them one day and I thought, "If this is the worst that can happen to me, what do I have to lose?" I felt in some way that they were my own heavenly messengers, that they brought to me a message of having courage to begin to understand life, to follow my heart.

Aung San Suu Kyi, the Burmese woman who's been the leader of the Democratic Party in Burma for a number of years, was once elected to rule her people, but she was never allowed to do so because of the military regime there. She spent many years in house arrest or having very limited visitors being able to come and see her. Around her, people were subject to immense suffering, torture, and death. And during this time, she's never stopped by her fear. She says about fear: "Fearlessness may be a gift, but perhaps more precious is the courage acquired through endeavor. Courage that comes from cultivating the habit of refusing to let one's own fear dictate one's actions. Courage that can only be described as grace under pressure." And for those of you who know her, you probably realize how much she really is a symbol of grace under pressure.

So often our deepest aspirations get covered over by our fears and beliefs about ourselves. If we're in any way harboring a belief that we're not good enough, each time that we acknowledge our aspiration, we're also facing this underlying belief. So working with our aspirations, we also have to work with the compassionate heart. It does no good to beat ourselves up over and over again for believing that we're unworthy. But through the understanding we gain in our practice, through seeing deeply into the way things are, we no longer have to believe our beliefs. They're simply a case of mistaken identity. In this way we can see that it needs to be a combination of recognizing and acknowledging our deepest aspirations and using the practice to realize them.

For example, if we have the aspiration to be loving and then a moment later someone makes us angry, we could start to believe that we're really an angry person. Yet if we continue to be with the anger and see through to its impermanence, we can see that it's just the passing state and not who we truly are.

We also need to learn to work with our aspirations with wisdom, or they become our bondage. If we're not careful, we can end up with a compulsive, striving energy. If our aspiration is to be free and we are grasping at this, then we have only cultivated the habit of attachment. We are moving into the world of becoming, leaning into our aspirations in a way that constricts the mind around a fixed idea. It can be a very noble aspiration, and yet if it strengthens the idea of self, it will only cause more suffering.

We can see this in "I want to awaken. I want enlightenment." Nobody becomes enlightened. Enlightenment is. Nobody becomes awakened. Awakening is.

When we end up tightening the mind around our fixed ideas, we actually end up causing harm to ourselves and others. I know there's been times in my own life when this aspiration hasn't been done so skillfully. Some years ago I was living in a spiritual community, and for the most part it was an extremely happy time in my life. I felt like I could really dedicate my life to that which I believed in. I worked wholeheartedly in this community, but then something got caught up in the wholeheartedness. There became identification with the work that I was doing, as if through doing this work I was proving myself, I was creating some sense of self-worth.

There was an endless stream of work, and I started to find it difficult to say no to it. I became known in the department that I was working as "deva slava," or divine slave. I really ended up pushing too hard, working too hard, and harming my body in doing so. This was just because there wasn't skillful means in the holding of my aspiration. I wasn't bringing in the wisdom.

But it's natural that through our practice our aspirations become purified. We may have very noble aspirations and our means are still clouded by delusion. We begin to see how not only do we have aspirations but we have ideas about how aspirations will play out—some sort of agenda. And this is suffering.

An example of this is that as we sit, we may have ideas about what good practice looks like. We may think that when we are clearly seeing the arising and passing away of our experiences, that this is good. As we sit longer, it may begin to happen that things begin to move faster, and we begin to only see the endings of things. It has that sense as if everything's slipping away, that there's nothing substantial to hold onto.

But the truth of it may be that our practice is going to a new level. Yet by wanting what we consider to be good experience, we start cutting ourselves off from the way things are unfolding.

One of our jobs in practice is to learn to hold both our deepest aspirations in a way that energizes our practice and still have acceptance and surrender to the unfolding of our paths or the unfolding of the Dharma. It is the holding of two sides of a coin. We point ourselves in the direction of our aspirations, and then with wholeheartedness and dedication we simply do the best we can, responding to life as it is through skillful means.

Nyanaponika Thera talks about crossing the ocean of life. He says, "To cross the ocean of life and reach the other shore safely, skill is needed in navigating its currents and cross currents. In adapting oneself to those inner and outer currents, however, one must always be watchful. The currents can be powerful at times, and one must know when it is necessary to resist them. Sometimes right effort has to be applied to avoid or overcome what is evil and to produce and preserve what is good. At other times it is wise to restrain excessive and impatient zeal and revert to a receptive attitude, allowing the process of inner growth to mature at their own rate. By wisely directed adaptation, we can learn to give full weight to both sides of every situation, to the duality in our own nature and in the objective circumstances we face. Only by confronting and understanding the two sides within one's own experience can one master and finally transcend them."

Learning to recognize when our zeal becomes unbalanced—we experience it in our practice when we are pushing too hard to get somewhere, perhaps wanting some painful state to be finished with, noting it so it will disappear. We need to open and accept that which is, and our aspirations give us the energizing quality to do this. In the heat of the pain or the difficulty, we can simply remember why it is that we are doing this.

The Buddha spoke very simply about how to nourish our Dharma aspirations. He said there are four qualities necessary to do so.

The first of these conditions is being in a suitable place to live—a place that allows us to step out of the busyness of life. It's a place of refuge, of seclusion, a place where we have a sense of safety. It needs to be a place able to support a wholesome lifestyle where we can live ethically. For many of us as householders, it may not be that our house is totally silent, but it can be a place where we can work and share intimately with others, where we can respect others and feel respected by them. It's a place where we can begin to engender the qualities of love and compassion.

The second condition is to associate with good people. I'm sure we all know the difference between being with people who are on a destructive path and being with people who have like-minded aspirations. When we're with people who live carelessly, it's easy to fall into step with them—we may not want to make waves, or we simply begin to have our mind clouded by what they're feeling or acting. But when we keep company with good friends, people who inspire us, it really helps to give us support. These people can help let us know when we're getting off track, when we're starting to do foolish things, and they often bring great inspiration into our lives.

When I was practicing in Burma, I was sharing a room with a Swiss woman who had ordained as a nun. She had such strength and commitment to her practice that each time I walked into the room where she was, I was reminded instantly to be more mindful, to be present, simply by her presence. I'm sure we've experienced this support as we sit here—in times of great difficulty it's been the people sitting around us that have really helped us hang in there with it.

Sometimes I think we tend to overlook that taking refuge in the Sangha is the third of the Triple Gems, so it was obvious that the Buddha placed great importance upon this. It's really helpful, just in the same way that we've come here together to do this retreat as a sangha, to have some form of sangha in our daily lives. Perhaps we are part of a sitting group, gathering together regularly with our peers. In this way we can get strength from them, and it can help to provide steadiness and inspiration.

Some of us may find we're living in an area where there aren't so many practitioners. It might be helpful to find people we can communicate with, even from a distance, where when we're in a time of struggle, we can simply call them up and get some form of reality check, some form of inspiration.

Oftentimes in coming together as a sangha, there can be difficulties. It's not always easy. But instead of waiting for the perfect Sangha, we can use the situation we're in to further our practice, to use it as practice. In the same way that we've been working with difficult states here, we can work with difficult people within our Sangha. Here we may have found that if it's not one thing, it's another, and at home we may find if it's not one person, it's another. We can simply learn to work with these situations.

The third condition the Buddha spoke about was being able to self-regulate and guide our lives. This involves living in alignment with the truth, the teachings, the Dharma, and using our practice to do so. This is about the energy and effort we put into our practice. It's about being able to accept whatever limitations we may have.

We so often want to be the invincible ones, but these bodies, minds, and energy all have their limitations. It's learning through skillful means the times to move like a warrior and the times to simply sit and breathe gently. It's about finding what supports the continuation of our practice and having the energy to do so.

This might mean making a commitment to sitting on a daily basis. It might require getting up a little earlier or going to bed a little later, or asking for support from family members to help care for our children to give us this time. The length of time can vary for each one of us according to the conditions in our life. It's far better to choose a time that is realistic than to day after day not be able to stick with your commitment.

A few years ago—quite a few years ago now—I made a commitment to sit for two hours a day: an hour in the morning, an hour in the evening. Then one day I had a very busy day, followed by a dinner party, lots of conversation, and a few drinks. When I got home, I hopped into bed. Just as I was about to doze off, I remembered I hadn't sat.

I dragged myself out of bed and went to my cushion. I sat there for that hour, bobbing and weaving, imagining how I could curl up on my cushion, totally fantasizing about being asleep. If we looked at this on the level of what constitutes good practice, we'd probably think, "Why bother?" And yet, here I am many years later, and out of all the sittings I did in that period, this is the one that really sticks out in my mind. It does so because it truly was honoring my commitment, hanging in there with that commitment even though it was difficult.

This also brings up the point of not judging our sittings. As we move back into daily life and it becomes more hectic, we might find—if we sit at the end of the day—that we're just replaying the day, that there are lots of thoughts, maybe obsessive planning for the future. At that time, this was what my sittings often looked like. Yet just by continuing, it wasn't long before I started to feel a little more spaciousness in my life during chaotic moments. I wasn't quite so quick to retaliate with anger when things happened that I didn't like.

Sitting is not the only way to continue our practice. We've worked extensively with walking during this retreat, and walking can continue to be a strong anchor in our lives. We do a lot of it, and we can simply let that be a time of practice. IMS is full of hallways, and through my daily life, I'm often moving through these corridors. So I started making it a practice to remember each time I hit a hallway to walk—to simply walk.

I've also found that when walking down a busy street with many things to do, if in a moment I can just remember that what I'm really doing is walking, I can feel this great weight of the world drop from my shoulders, and I'm simply walking. It's certainly easier said than done—the remembering is the difficult part. I used to judge myself fiercely for gaps in mindfulness, noticing each time how long it had been since I had forgotten. Then one day I shifted this to celebrating the remembering, and suddenly there was joy and delight, and once again the opportunity to be present.

Strong emotional states can also become a reminder or wake-up call. When anger arises, we can take a momentary look at what this feels like—not being swept away by the anger, but instead exploring the state both in mind and body. If you happen to be in a phase where you're experiencing many strong emotional states, you might pick one of them and work with that—maybe a state such as blame. Each time you hear in your mind that you're blaming someone or blaming yourself, just let this be a reminder to look within and see what's happening.

Relationship has also been a strong component of my own practice, serving both as a mirror to cultivate mindfulness and as a practice of loving-kindness. At times the mirror can be difficult to look at. People closest to us often trigger responses that normally don't get touched, and we can use these moments to understand what we hold onto and how we get hooked.

Having a partner inspires me to move toward living from a place of less grasping, clinging, and desire for control—moving toward a place where love is unconditional. This means letting go of the expectations I may have of wanting my partner to be a certain way, respecting him in his own process. Sometimes respecting someone we love's process can be quite difficult. When they're in pain and suffering, can we simply be there for them without trying to make things right? Sometimes I've found it easier to sit with my own pain than to feel it in others. It often brings up feelings of powerlessness, feelings of futility. So I'm learning to be with these feelings while still honoring my partner's space.

One of my favorite lines that I've ever heard Sharon say, which she writes in one of her books, is: "To love someone is to be totally present for them." Relationship has been for me one of letting go over and over again—beginning to see how attachment kills the potential for love, having the courage to love with nothing to hang onto, knowing these conditions are impermanent and loving anyway, using relationship both as purification and as offering.

Also in our daily lives, we can work with honoring the precepts, taking them to heart—not blindly following them, but letting them be an alive, vital element in our lives. We can learn to work with them in a way that brings reverence and sacredness to life, respecting and caring for ourselves and those around us. There may be one of the precepts in particular that we feel drawn to work with. I'm sure the precept around false speech could keep us busy for many lifetimes, and we'd still have more work to do.

We can discover where we draw our lines. We use the precepts to become more aware of our intentions and motivations, and to be honest and intimate with ourselves—using the precepts as our foundation for living and relating with the world, cultivating thoughts and actions that come from a place of non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion.

The fourth condition that the Buddha spoke about was previous good work or actions. This returns us again to the law of cause and effect. It's said to be a rare and precious opportunity for one to be able to hear the Dharma. If we look around this world at the vast array of conditions that one can be born into, there are many different lives we could possibly have without having this possibility of hearing the Dharma.

And then it's considered even more rare and precious to be able to practice the Dharma, even just to be able to sit here right now. At this time there are still monks and nuns who live in Tibet in monasteries, and they don't have the same opportunity for practice due to the conditions that are present. So all of these conditions can help to remind us of the laws of cause and effect.

In order to grow a garden, certain conditions need to be present. In order to come to understand our own hearts and minds, certain conditions need to be present. When we look at these conditions that are necessary, it may come to mind that something in our lives might need to change in order to support our heart's deepest wish. This can be scary, and yet if we let the practice guide us, what we find is that we are simply letting go of that which is not serving us. In this way we begin to simplify our lives.

I know there was a time in my own life when the practice really began to affect the way that I lived, and I no longer had the same interests as many of my friends. Some of my friends found this quite difficult, and some of them started to fall away, while others became more interested in what I was doing. At this time my husband Edwin was not meditating, and he would watch me day after day as I would go and sit. Then one day he decided to go to a retreat with me, and since that time he's become very inspired in his own practice, even to the point of spending time ordained as a monk.

Yet there was a point when I was not really sure how this was going to affect our relationship. I would go away for months at a time to practice, and I would imagine that during that time he would fall in love with another woman. And yet in my heart I knew that I had no choice but to meditate. I could feel the effect that it was having on me. It took courage to do that, and it felt like a risk. And yet I found that there was the faith and the courage to do that, made possible through the practice itself. The practice itself had this sense of guiding me.

The interesting thing about the aspiration to awaken is that as it is combined with the growing wisdom from our practice, it keeps returning us to the moment, to the here and now. We realize the possibility of awakening is nowhere other than right here.

In the very first retreat that I did with Hogen-san, a Zen master, he introduced me to koan practice. He describes koan practice as being the ultimate question which in itself is an answer by which one can cut off one's own karmic ego head and be born anew. So the first day that he gave a koan, I was very excited, and I was sitting with my koan, and then bingo, there came an answer. So excitedly, I hurried off to his room to tell him. I gave him my answer, and he got this very puzzled expression on his face, and he says to me, "What was the koan that I gave?" As I repeated it to him, he gets another puzzled expression and he says, "No, I never gave that koan." So I sheepishly exited from the room.

The next day he gave another one, and I felt very determined once again. When he said it, it sounded so profound, and so I thought, "Yes, I'll sit with this question." I was sitting there, and after a period of time, I realized I'd forgotten all about the koan. Then I realized I'd forgotten even what the koan was. So I once again went sheepishly back to his room, and I told him what had happened.

He looks at me, and he ever so slightly rolls his eyeballs. Then he says, "Just go and sit perfectly." I listened to this. I took it in. Then I was a bit puzzled. I said to him, "You know, you've just given me a future." He gets a very puzzled expression. He says, "What? How did I do that?" I said, "Well, if I'm going to go and sit, it's going to take some time to sit perfectly."

Then all of a sudden in the room there were just these two blazing brown eyes penetrating into me. And he said, "Perfection now!" I bowed and left the room.

So this is a poem by the Buddhist nun Rangetsu:

First steps on the long path to truth.
Please do not dream your lives away.
Walk on to the end.

Having the courage, the patience, and the perseverance to continue on our way, moment by moment allowing the inspiration and the energy of our aspirations to guide us to freedom. It is our heart's involvement in our practice, letting ourselves be wholeheartedly engaged in waking up moment by moment.

His Holiness the Dalai Lama, in his teaching about aspiration, says: "We must have a pure, honest, and warm-hearted motivation. And on top of that, determination, optimism, hope, and the ability not to be discouraged. The whole of humanity depends upon this motivation."

Remembering that what we do in this life affects the world. What we hold as dear to our hearts has the potential to touch the hearts of others. We can let our aspirations be not just for the benefit of ourselves, but for the benefit of all beings.

Just in closing, I'd like to read an expression of the aspiration that has really touched me very deeply.

And this is from Shantideva. It's called the Seven Branch Prayer:

May I be a guard for those who are protectorless, a guide for those who journey on the road. For those who wish to go across the water, may I be a boat, a raft, a bridge. May I be an isle for those who yearn for landfall, and a lamp for those who long for light. For those who need a resting place, a bed. For all who need a servant, may I be a slave.

May I be the wishing jewel, the vase of plenty, a word of power, and the supreme remedy. May I be the trees of miracles, and for every being the abundant cow. Like the great earth and the other elements, enduring as the sky itself endures, for the boundless multitude of living beings, may I be the ground and vessel of their life.

Thus, for every single thing that lives, in number like the boundless reaches of the sky, may I be their sustenance and nourishment until they pass beyond the bounds of suffering.

So let's sit quietly for a moment.

CHAPTER 199

The Five Hindrances

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

> Guy Armstrong offers a comprehensive exploration of the five hindrances (pañcanīvaraṇa) as taught by the Buddha - the mental forces that obstruct meditation and cause suffering in daily life. Drawing from the Satipatthāna Sutta (MN 10), he explains how these hindrances of sense desire (kāmacchanda), aversion (byāpāda), dullness and drowsiness (thīna-middha), restlessness and agitation (uddhacca-kukkucca), and doubt (vicikicchā) operate as "imperfections of the mind that weaken wisdom."
> Armstrong details three traditional approaches to working with hindrances: developing mindfulness to recognize them clearly, cultivating concentration strong enough to suppress them temporarily, and ultimately uprooting them through deep awakening. The talk focuses primarily on the mindfulness approach, offering practical guidance for meeting each hindrance with awareness rather than resistance.
> A key teaching tool introduced is the RAIN technique (Recognition, Acceptance, Investigation, Non-identification) developed by Michelle McDonald. Through personal anecdotes and retreat stories, Armstrong demonstrates how mindfulness allows us to "develop wakefulness in the middle of confusion" rather than trying to eliminate difficult states. He emphasizes that these hindrances are workable through understanding their nature, examining the stories that sustain them, and learning to relate to them with wisdom rather than being overwhelmed by them. The teaching concludes with Rilke's poetic reminder: "Let everything happen to you, beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final."

The other day when I was at home, I had an experience that I wanted to share with you. It's a pretty ordinary experience, one that I imagine you have all had at different times.

I was working at my computer, typing up a proposal for a new program here at Spirit Rock. As I was working on it over a couple of hours, I found myself getting more involved in the subtleties of it. Without really noticing it, I was starting to get worried about how this person was going to feel about this, how that person was going to take it. Am I offending somebody if I say it this way? Am I not offending somebody if I don't say it this way? I was getting tied up in the details of the project I was writing about without really being aware of it.

Over time, my mind just got into that kind of tight, constricted, tense, narrow place that I often get into around computer work. Then I decided to step out and get a breath of fresh air, so I walked out my back door. I live in Woodacre, so I see some of the same things that you see here. Just stepping out into that scene, my mind changed totally.

There was the freshness of the air. The breeze was bringing all the grasses and the trees to life with their movement. In just a minute, my mind opened and filled with that beauty of nature, the majesty of the scene, and the great space of it. That change happened in probably less than a minute.

This is what I thought was significant: how quickly the mind was able to shift from that narrow, tense kind of small mind worrying about me and my relationships to this very big, spacious kind of nature mind that the physical openness touched off. What struck me was the contrast because those two came so close together.

I realized that this is really what we're learning to do in our meditation practice. We're learning to go from that small and narrow and self-centered point of view to a more spacious and open and allowing kind of mind that we all know and we all have access to, because it's an intrinsic part of who we are. It's not something special we have to fabricate through extraordinary techniques, but it's something that you know, something that I know.

What we do in meditation is start to learn better and better how we move from that narrow, constricted self place to a bigger, open, more spacious, natural place. There was a Tibetan teacher named Yeshe Khen Rinpoche who put it like this: "The purpose of dharma practice is to know the nature of the non-deluded mind and to understand the workings of the deluded mind."

The very purpose of what we're doing is to know the nature of the non-deluded mind—that is, this open mind of wisdom and peace that we all have access to, that we all know. And then also to understand how the deluded mind works.

This is a pointer to our meditation. We have two tracks that we're learning in this retreat, in every retreat. One is to learn about this natural, open and free way of being. There are many ways to describe it, but one nice way is the set of qualities that James talked about last night: the five spiritual faculties of faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration and wisdom. The Buddha said that when those come together in our mind, when they grow into ripeness and maturity, they end in nibbana. They lead to nibbana. They merge into nibbana, the unconditioned, the state of complete release and freedom. This is a beautiful way of thinking about the qualities of the awakened mind: the five spiritual faculties.

The Buddha also had many pointers to the nature of the deluded mind—the ways that we get caught, the ways that we fall into seeing wrongly, and therefore the ways we fall into suffering. Lists you may have heard of include the taints, the defilements, the fetters. But the one that I want to talk about tonight is the list that he most often used for meditators.

He said that when you take up the practice of meditation in an active way, there are five forces that come up that oppose the deepening of practice. These are the forces he called the five hindrances. He named them as sense desire, aversion, dullness, restlessness, and doubt.

I want to talk about all of these in detail tonight. I also want to talk about them in general first. As we talk about some of the various facets of desire and aversion, I think you'll see that these are the forces that cause most of the suffering in our lives. They are not just meditators' problems. They are everybody's problems. They don't just happen in retreat. They also happen in daily life. But in retreat, we have the chance to really learn about them closely, to see how they work quite intimately.

The Buddha said that these are the forces that are the imperfections of the mind that weaken wisdom. So not only do they cause us pain and suffering, they also obstruct the development of our practice and the unfolding of our wisdom. They block us from going deeper until we learn how to work with them and relate to them.

In this teaching of the five hindrances, there's a good news and bad news scenario. I'll give you the bad news first: these things are no fun.

They're not easy to work with. They do plague us quite often. When you start to look closely at these forces, you'll see they're coming in again and again and again, moment after moment after moment, basically any time that you don't feel settled and peaceful. Did you have any moments of that today? Maybe one or two. So in those one or two moments, you were making acquaintances with the hindrances. Anytime the mind is unsettled or not at peace, one of the hindrances is active and at work. So they are very frequent visitors.

The good news is that all these states are workable. And because they're causes of suffering, in coming to understand them, there's tremendous potential for liberation in our formal practice and in our daily life. Everywhere that we're caught by one of these forces of desire, aversion, confusion, we can learn how to free ourselves from it and extend that freedom anytime we meet that hindrance. This is one of the great strengths of our Vipassana practice.

In all the different kinds of spiritual work that I've looked at and all the different kinds of psychological work that I've explored, I don't know any practice that addresses this situation as effectively and as directly as our Vipassana practice. We can find the tools through mindfulness to get really pretty immediate results in learning to work with these troublesome states of mind, and then take those tools from our formal practice back into our daily life. This is really what I want to talk with you about tonight.

There are basically three main strategies in the world of Buddhist meditation for working with the hindrances. We're going to focus in this retreat primarily on the first one, but I just want to mention the other two.

The first is that we develop mindfulness in relation to these states of mind. As the Buddha said in the Satipatthana Sutta, the Sutta on Mindfulness: "A practitioner understands when there is sense desire in the mind—the practitioner knows there is sense desire in me. Or when there is no sense desire, she knows there is no sense desire in me." And so on for the other painful states of mind. The key is knowing when they're present and knowing when they're absent. We come to know them really well through meeting them again and again. And as we know them well, like knowing the personality of a neighbor next door who's a little hard to get along with, we find ways to relate that we don't get into so much conflict with them. And that's the growth of wisdom.

The second avenue through meditation is that we develop enough strength of concentration—this collectedness of mind around a subject like the breath, for instance—that we're so involved and connected with that experience, the mind is completely given over to that experience of relating with the breath. There's no room for the hindrances to arise. So in strong states of concentration, the hindrances simply do not come up moment to moment. This is a possibility. It's not that remote for you. Sally and I taught a concentration retreat here two weeks ago where we just did seven days of practice focused on the development of concentration alone, one of the five spiritual faculties. And it was pretty amazing how many people in those seven days were able to touch that kind of state where the concentration was strong enough that the hindrances simply weren't arising. So that is an avenue that's open. We're just not focusing on that this week, but it's another possibility.

The third avenue through Buddhist practice is that eventually, as we touch deeper and deeper states of awakening, the hindrances become uprooted through that awakening itself. Basically, through the realization—the direct realization of the unconditioned—those forces can be eliminated from the mind forever so that they don't arise again. It's unlikely that's going to happen this week. But if it does, please let us know. We will rejoice with you. But just to know, that is a long-term possibility. That is the place the Buddha lived from. In the life of the Buddha, after his awakening, the hindrances were no more a factor. But that's a real human possibility through this practice. It takes a lot of dedication.

So the first step in working with the hindrances is mindfulness. That means basically to know what we're feeling when we're feeling it. This is not as easy as it sounds. So I'll just tell you a story from an earlier retreat.

I was on a six-week retreat a few years ago. I was fairly settled in—a couple of weeks into the retreat. I'd established my rhythm: sitting and walking, sitting and walking. I was getting pretty settled. I thought I was pretty continuously mindful. Sitting ended, it was time for a walking period, so I got up quite mindfully, walked to the back of the meditation hall, lifting, moving, placing with every step, and went to my walking path. Lifting, moving, placing, very steady, and I noticed somebody's in my walking path.

A reaction started. "How could they do that? I've been walking there every day for the last two weeks. What are they thinking?" Lifting, moving, placing, lifting, moving, placing. "Did I cut in front of them in the breakfast line this morning? Is this their revenge?" Lifting, moving, placing, lifting, moving, placing. "Maybe they just haven't been paying much attention over these two weeks and they're really spacey and not very developed in their practice." Lifting, moving, placing.

So I walked to another place fairly near my old one. I wanted to show up and make sure they knew I was there. I did my walking, and about halfway through the period—twenty or thirty minutes in—suddenly I noticed: I'm irritated.

I thought I had been so continuously mindful, and the irritation had just snuck in. I didn't even know I was irritated. I was with lifting, moving, placing, but I completely missed what was going on in my mind, which happened to be the predominant experience I was having at the time.

This is the way the hindrances work. We may have our mindfulness radar up, and they fly in underneath. They slip in and we're so involved with the situation that we forget to see: this is actually what I'm feeling. They're sustained because we believe in the situation and our story about it.

My story was: I'm right, this is my walking path, they're wrong, they shouldn't be walking there. Because I never questioned that, I was just glued to the hindrance of irritation.

When I finally saw—oh, I'm irritated—then I could step back a little bit. I could see: oh, this is irritation. Now I can start to relate to it. As soon as I could relate to it, there was a little bit of space in the mind. In that little bit of space, I wasn't completely attached. I wasn't enmeshed. I could question the story and say: that walking path does not have my name on it. I did not buy that piece of land. It really is whoever gets there first. I could let go of the story and let go of the irritation.

One of the things I want to mention about the hindrances is that each one comes with a story. If we believe in it, it sustains the hindrance. When we take away that story, the hindrance basically can't support itself for very long. These hindrances are really a combination of an emotion and a belief about a situation.

The key point is: rather than turn my attention to that other walking person, I needed to turn the attention back on my own emotion. Then mindfulness could become established. We name it, we know it's there, and then we go to feel it directly in the body and in the mind. This is the activity of mindfulness.

The first of the five hindrances the Buddha talked about is sense desire—the tendency of mind that wants a pleasant experience. It's natural enough throughout the day. If we're sitting, walking, eating, or lying down, we want the experience in our senses to be pleasant.

It shows up a lot on retreats, especially in the early days. We may miss our friends or partners or family, and when we think about them, there's a kind of longing that comes up. Or maybe in the middle of a very long sitting—somebody said they had a forty-five-minute sitting the other day that felt like an hour and a half—we might be fantasizing about a vacation we'd like to take or did take. Something pleasant comes in that offers relief from the uncomfortableness or boredom that's crept in.

Or there could be an attraction to someone on the retreat. You start to feel: there's somebody special here of the gender I'm attracted to. Every time they walk close, it's like confirmation that you're soulmates. This is a past life connection coming to fruition in this sacred spiritual setting. "I know it's meant to be." The attraction just gets stronger and stronger.

We have a name for that: the Vipassana Romance, or the VR. It can take up a lot of mindfulness cycles, believe me.

When we look at all these different kinds of desire and start to feel into how desire feels, there's always a kind of bittersweet quality to it. There's an element of comfort because the object is a desired one.

It's something beautiful. And bringing in that something beautiful, there's some kind of solace that the heart takes from that. But if we look a little closer, a little deeper, we also see that along with it, there's this element of not being fulfilled. Always with desire, there's a piece of frustration because we don't have the thing. If we had the thing, we wouldn't be wanting it. Do you ever find yourself wanting a hand at the end of your arm? Probably not, because we already have it. What we want are the things that we don't have. And so desire always comes with unfulfillment, a kind of frustration.

This came up really strongly on a retreat a few years ago. Sally and Franz and I and another friend were leading a retreat in Italy. We had a lot of fun because the Italian people, at least I found on that retreat—very much like the image we have of Italians—are very open about their emotions and quite fluent with their emotions. They're not afraid of emotions, really. So they would come into interviews and talk very openly about what they were feeling.

This one very nice looking young man came into an interview on about the third day of the retreat and said, "I'm just not settling down into the retreat. Just not connecting. I've had other retreats. They've gone better. This one, I'm just really not getting into it." This was all through a translator, but the message was clear.

I said, "Well, tell me a little about what's going on. Why are you here?" He said, "Well, this is our vacation time. This is August. In Europe, everybody tends to go on vacation in August. Some friends asked me if I'd like to go to the Caribbean with them for a beach holiday. So I had to decide between that and this meditation retreat. Well, I actually wanted to go to the Caribbean, but all the flights were sold out. So I couldn't go to the Caribbean and I came on this meditation retreat instead."

He continued, "But now that I'm here, I'm wishing I were in the Caribbean. My friends told me there are so many beautiful girls in the Caribbean. I wish I were there."

So we talked about desire and how when desire is present, we can't really connect with what is present. It really blocks us from the moment. The interest in the breath is pretty low when the mind is on the beautiful women of the Caribbean.

I said, "I don't really think that the retreat is the problem, but maybe the problem is you're just thinking all the time about the Caribbean. What would it be like if you just dropped those thoughts for a little bit and just came into this present moment?"

He said, "I don't know, but I'll try."

A few days later, he came back for another interview and he'd completely turned that corner. In letting go of the thoughts of being somewhere else, he was able to just settle into the moment, which was not a problem. The present moment is usually not a problem, but desire makes something else look more attractive.

A friend of mine who is of a greedy temperament, a desirous temperament, says that he has this question that he asks himself often when he's feeling this kind of desire, longing to be out of the moment. He asks, "Is there anything truly lacking in this present moment? Is there anything truly lacking?" And when we come into this present moment, we usually see it's fine. It's complete. We can be happy here. We can be accepting here.

Sometimes as the retreat goes on, the force of desire starts to turn itself to the retreat experience because this becomes our life. We sort of move out of our outer life, and to some extent, we forget about it during these days. Our being, our life, our daily routine really becomes focused here, and then what becomes important are things like what's going to happen for lunch, what's my next sitting going to be like, is somebody going to close the door really loudly in the middle of the night tonight or flush the toilet by my bed—things like that.

So desire often builds around the circumstances of the retreat. In particular, desire can attach really strongly to a good sitting—what we call a good sitting.

We have a sitting where we're present, we feel at peace, connected, alive, awake, and calm. And that is such a pleasure, such a joy. That becomes the thing we most want to have. So we get very enthused. We go out for our walk and can't wait to come back in for the next sitting because we're going to have that experience again. Can't wait to get back to it.

Of course, what happens when we want it? Poof. Goes away. Maybe the next sitting is full of tension or wandering mind. And we're caught trying to get back. So start to notice if that kind of desire is coming in to repeat a meditation experience. Sometimes that's the only kind of desire that's really between us and the present moment. And if we can see that as a fairly subtle kind of desire and let go, we can be right back here again, right back in the calm and centeredness.

So I start to notice in myself if there's a kind of strain in my body, that's trying to lean forward to some kind of concentrated state or some kind of peaceful state. And I detect it in my body first, some kind of tension or strain that's like leaning forward, trying to make it happen, trying to make the meditation come back. And that becomes my cue. Oh, that's desire, that's wanting. Then if I can see it, it's a little easier to let go.

This is the force of wanting or desire.

The second of the hindrances is the force of aversion, sometimes called ill will, generally a state of negativity or of disliking. But there are many, many forms of aversion. We can discriminate between lots of different shades of this hindrance. There are states of anger, hatred, impatience, fear, sadness, grief, judgment, guilt, blame, resentment, depression, despair, resistance, and conflict that are all just forms of aversion. There's more, but I didn't want to bore you. It's a big one, isn't it? Occupies a significant portion of mental terrain, this force of aversion.

And we might say that the basic sense of it, when we're in this mind state of aversion, there's a kind of friction with everything that happens. And nothing is quite satisfying because it's not quite good enough. It's not quite right.

There's a story from the time of the Buddha. He was standing with a group of monks in a clearing in the forest. And he asked the monks, "Did you see that jackal? It ran out of the forest and it stood in the clearing for a minute. And then it ran out of the clearing and went into the underbrush. And it lay down in the underbrush, but it didn't stay long and it came out of the underbrush and walked into the hollow of a tree. And it stood in the hollow of a tree for a while, but it didn't stay long and it took off and it went into a cave. It lay down in the cave, but it didn't stay long and it ran off into the forest again. Wherever it went, the jackal wasn't comfortable and it blamed its discomfort on the forest, blamed it on the clearing, on the underbrush, on the tree hollow, on the cave. It blamed it on its sitting. It blamed it on its standing. It blamed it on its walking. It blamed it on lying down."

He said, "But monks, the problem was with none of these. The problem was that jackal has mange. The mange is the problem. And that's why the jackal was not comfortable anywhere."

The mind of aversion is like that. When we are caught in this sense of negativity and it's just a state of mind, nothing satisfies us. The meditation hall doesn't satisfy us, the walking path doesn't satisfy us, the lunch doesn't satisfy us, our fellow meditators don't, our teachers don't, everything doesn't work. But the real source is that mind state of aversion.

One of the ways that this often gets expressed in meditation retreat is with the sense of physical pain. We're sitting and a strong sensation develops in the knee or the back or the ankles or the shoulders. And in reaction to that pain, the mind becomes very averse. There can be different states of aversion and reaction. Sometimes we just get annoyed.

Sometimes we get fearful. Sometimes we simply dislike it. Sometimes we can become resentful. But in the instructions as James gave them today, we're guided that if there's discomfort, we should make that the object of meditation. We let mindfulness settle there and feel into that area of physical pain.

I'd also like to suggest that we examine how the mind is relating to that physical pain. Say there's simply physical sensation present. Can we be equanimous with that? Can there just be the experience of physical pain, or do we have to spiral into a reaction of aversion?

Take a look. If we go into the reaction of aversion—which is a kind of tightening of the mind—what happens in the body? When the mind gets tight, the body tends to get tight as well. And as the body tightens because of the aversion in the mind, what happens to the pain? It increases. As the pain grows stronger, what happens to our level of aversion? It cranks up another notch.

We find ourselves caught in this feedback loop. The physical pain intensifies, then aversion arises. That makes the physical pain more intense, which makes the aversion more intense. How do we escape? How do we find freedom in relation to that?

It's not so easy to change the physical experience. You've probably tried. I certainly did for a long time. But can we start to influence our mental reaction? Suppose instead of tightening with aversion, we were able to soften the mind. We were able to simply accept, stay calm, and recognize that physical pain is present without getting freaked out about it.

In the softening of the mind, that can lead to a softening of the body. This doesn't necessarily mean the pain will disappear, but if anything will help the pain to ease, that softening attitude will. So we work with seeing the reaction of the mind in relation to the pain as much as with the pain itself.

Here's where the meditation can establish itself. Can we be with the pain from a place of softness, acceptance, and allowing? This is tremendously helpful with unpleasant circumstances—to work directly with softening and allowing.

A classical antidote for the mind state of aversion is loving-kindness. As Sally led the meditation today, developing that heart of friendliness—even when you generate it with yourself or a benefactor—when the heart is in that place of friendliness, everything looks a little softer. Everything appears a little rosier. That friendliness spills over to the knee pain or the difficult person in our life, creating a softness of mind that can hold difficult experience with greater ease.

Within the retreat setting, another way that aversion manifests is through our tendency to judge. We may notice that we judge other people when we walk into the dining hall, or we observe how somebody's sitting or walking and find ourselves judging them. But often one of the most painful forms of judgment is the one we direct against ourselves.

I think we're especially vulnerable to this as retreatants. We've let go of our friendships. We've let go of our family. There's nobody around to tell us every day, "I love you. I care about you. You're important to me." We've entered into a solitude that is important and significant. But in doing that, we become vulnerable through this loss of affirmation—this loss of love, really. Then it becomes much easier to be hard on ourselves or to feel isolated, as though people don't care for us.

This hit me very strongly during one of my early retreats. I was practicing in England on a month-long retreat, and I was starting to have all these doubts about myself and harsh judgments about my personality. I went to see my teacher for an interview that day, feeling quite embarrassed about this. When he asked how I was doing, I said, "Oh, I'm just having some difficult thoughts," hoping we could let it go at that.

Okay, that was pretty honest—I'm having difficult thoughts—but he didn't let it go. He said, "What kinds of thoughts?"

Oh, I said, well, kind of aversive thoughts. And I thought I'd get out of it that way. He said, "What kinds of aversive thoughts?"

So I had to be honest. I said, "Well, I'm feeling like I don't like myself very much and like nobody else likes me either." I felt very vulnerable in saying that.

And he just stood up very straight and he looked at me and he said, "You're not seeing things the way they are. Your problem is you don't accept yourself. You need to work on self-acceptance."

That became my theme then for a few years in practice—this seeing of the self-judgment and the pain it was causing me made me want to find a way to work with it. And I took the direction, a more positive direction, of working to accept myself. It became an important practice for a few years.

After I had ordained in Thailand—I ordained as a monk—and I was going from the city monastery where I ordained out into the country to a forest monastery to do a three-month retreat period, I stopped over in another city in a monastery where there was a Western monk who'd been in robes for quite a while. I kind of appreciated his having been down the road before me. He was a great guy. I really came to admire him a lot. I thought his lifestyle was very sane.

He'd take his mornings for his own practice and he had a really nice hut in this monastery. He looked out on a little pond. It was very peaceful. He'd been in robes for ten or eleven or twelve years at that point. His meditation was well developed and he had a lot of peace, also a lot of loving-kindness. People just liked hanging out with him.

So in the afternoon, he would be open to visitors. And people would come and talk with him. Thai people would come and talk to him about their family situation, difficulties with their sons and daughters, questions about their meditation practice, and he spoke fluent Thai. Westerners would come who were passing through Chiang Mai—was the city where he lived—and he'd give them instructions and get them started on the path of meditation practice. And everybody just liked hanging out with him.

The next morning we got to go out on alms round together. You know probably that the way Buddhist monks collect their food is by going with a bowl and basically begging. They show up and in cultures where it's understood, people come out onto the streets and put food in their bowls.

So I got to go out with this monk on his usual alms round. The first thing I noticed was how big his bowl was. I mean, I had a modest little bowl that my preceptor had given me, and it held what I needed to eat. His bowl was not much smaller than our meditation bell, and he had a girth to match. He was what we call a well-supported monk.

So we head off down the tracks near the monastery. And as soon as we get near some shops, a lot of people are out on the streets. And I found out it's because they know he's coming. He has very close connections with the people around, and they support him really well. So they were out there putting a lot of food in his bowl. And because I was behind, they put a lot of food in my bowl.

And then we also—it was his custom—there were two novice monks, younger men who had not yet reached the age where they could ordain fully, who were traveling along behind us. And I was going, what are they here for? Because the novice monks don't go on the alms round. They're fed by the monastery.

So we'd walked down this block and up the next block. My bowl was overflowing. His bowl even was full. And then we duck into an alley. He calls the novice monks over. They open their robe, and each of them has a big plastic bag hanging off their shoulder. So we take our packets of food, put them in the plastic bags.

They fold up their robes, and we go on another block of alms round. We fill the bowls again. So we had way more than we could eat. We took it back to the monastery and shared it with the other monks, nuns, novice monks, and lay people who were there to eat. Everybody had a great feast that basically came about because this monk was so well-loved. He had so much metta and connection to the people that everybody just wanted to give to him.

When we were back at his hut just chatting and getting to know each other a little bit, he told me something that really surprised me. He said, "You know, it wasn't always so easy for me, my meditation practice. I spent the first nine years that I was in robes working on my self-hatred. Nine years."

But out of that, he had developed this huge loving heart that touched everybody he came in contact with—a great spirit of generosity, giving, kindness, and availability for people. All of this emerged out of nine years of practice working with his own self-hatred. So he had a strong case of it, but what I really want to emphasize is that it's workable. It's possible to transform these very deep personality patterns through the openness of the practice, through the skillful use of meditation.

In working with self-judging, don't feel like you have to get rid of the judging thoughts. The big part of it is seeing them clearly and not having to believe in them. Most of them are rubbish, frankly. Most of those judging thoughts, if you look at them closely, are rubbish. They'll say things like, "Nobody loves me, nobody's ever loved me." The basic storyline is "I'm not a lovable person. No one could ever love me." It's just not true. You can look in your life and see people who have cared for you. That story is simply not true. But we can just let the thought be there and take it more lightly.

Joseph Goldstein, one of our teachers, says that what he does when he hears a judging thought is add the phrase "and the sky is blue." So it becomes: "Nobody will ever love me, and the sky is blue." That just lightens it up so he doesn't have to take it so seriously. That's a nice way to work.

Over time, what offsets this sense of self-judgment is feeling our own goodness and trusting in our own goodness. In loving kindness practice, the proximate cause for metta to arise is seeing what's good in someone. When you can tune in to the good in somebody, that feeling of metta comes spontaneously, comes naturally. When you can see the good in yourself, that feeling of loving kindness for yourself comes naturally.

The more we gain that conviction that James was talking about in our own essential goodness—which is no different from the goodness of one another, no different from the goodness of nature, no different from the goodness of the Dharma—then we know we can trust. Then we know the judgments aren't really true. This conviction grows more and more with the practice of loving kindness.

The other three hindrances I'll be briefer with. The third is one we've referred to a few times already: dullness and drowsiness. The old Victorian phrase that was first used to translate it was sloth and torpor. I like it. It kind of conveys the massiveness of it, the weight of it. I also like that phrase because it reminds me of the first meditation center I lived at, IMS on the East Coast. In the early days, we had a maintenance crew who were not exactly known for their work ethic, and we gave them the names Mc-Sloth and McTorpor. It reminds me of the innocent days of retreat centers.

So this is the third day of the retreat. I'm pretty confident you all have had a good, healthy exposure to sloth and torpor at this point. Often in the first few days of retreat, there's a lot of sleepiness, a lot of drowsiness, a lot of dullness. You can't really connect with the object, can't connect with the breath. There's a fog surrounding you. The storyline in sloth and torpor is not so critical, but if there is one, it's something like, "Nothing's worth doing. I can't be bothered to do anything." We just kind of get bowed under the weight of the heaviness of mind and body.

So the antidote is energy. Whatever will pick up your energy at that time—that's what will break through the drowsiness.

So we often recommend the usual things: sit up a bit straighter, open your eyes, take a few deep breaths. All those things will bring in more energy. If you're still feeling sleepy, stand up right where you are. Do the meditation in the standing posture. It's harder to fall asleep standing up—still may be possible, but usually the good news is that after about the third day, that fog starts to lift a little bit. We get a new source of energy, and usually it's not nearly as much of a problem.

If sloth and torpor continue to be a real problem after three days, then I start to get curious. Is something being covered over with that dullness? Because sometimes dullness can come down like a curtain because there's something we don't quite want to see. So then I get interested: what was there before the dullness came? But it may not be so heavy from tomorrow onward. That's my wish.

The fourth hindrance is called restlessness and agitation. Often it feels like the first days of the retreat just alternate—sloth and torpor one sitting, restlessness and agitation the next. So here the mind is too stirred up. There's an abundance of energy. We can't focus because there are too many thoughts, too many bodily sensations, too many feelings. Everything's all stirred up. The breath gets lost. It's kind of like trying to pick a straw out of a hurricane—you can't find it.

In restlessness and agitation, again, we want to simply open to feel what that feels like. It's not a pleasant experience. And sometimes the storyline is maybe something like, "I can't stand this. I can't stand it. I have to get up and run away." But in fact, you can stand it. And we do stand it, if you notice. We'll be sitting there thinking, "I can't stand this. I can't stand it another minute." But we keep sitting and we do stand it. So that's helpful, just to know that we can endure this restlessness and agitation. Just feel it. The body feels stirred up, the mind feels stirred up, the emotions feel stirred up, but we can know that for an experience. It's okay.

We might think that the way back to calm is through getting really narrow with the breath again. "When I was narrow with the breath, I was calm. Let me get narrow with the breath again." But sometimes that's just too tight. It's like trying to take this hurricane and put it into a really small box—the box gets really rattled.

So maybe what's more skillful at that point is to let the mind get really, really wide and have the sense that you just want to enfold all this energy in a very broad attention. So sounds can be a really good object here. The sense that you want to let the mind get really wide and let the wideness bring in the calm so that the hurricane is held within a really big space. So try working with that really wide mind, working with sounds as an object when you feel really stirred up. When you go out to a walking period, you may want to take a little bit brisker walk and kind of use up some of that energy. Paradoxically, that may calm some of the energy down in the next sitting.

And the last of the hindrances is the hindrance of doubt. James talked about this quite a lot last night, about how we doubt our ability to do the practice, we doubt if it's the right practice, we doubt the teachings, and how faith is really the antidote to doubt. In the long term, that's really true. The storyline in doubt is maybe something like, "I can't do it. I can't do it." There's actually a really deep spiritual truth in this particular storyline.

The acronym RAIN offers us a profound shift in how we relate to difficult states. Rather than the futile attempt to banish our hindrances, RAIN invites us to meet them with the very awareness we seek to cultivate.

The A in RAIN stands for acceptance. This doesn't mean that we like what's happening or that we think it's good. It means that we allow it to be present without adding the extra layer of resistance. We don't fight with what's already here. There's a quality of non-violence in this acceptance, a recognition that what's arising has already arisen, and our resistance to it only creates more suffering.

This acceptance requires tremendous courage. It asks us to stay present with discomfort, to not immediately reach for our habitual strategies of escape or control. In this allowing, something remarkable begins to happen. The grip of the hindrance starts to loosen naturally, not because we've forced it away, but because we've stopped feeding it with our resistance.

The I stands for investigation. Having recognized and accepted what's present, we now turn toward it with curiosity. What does this anger actually feel like in the body? Where do I sense this anxiety most clearly? What thoughts arise with this doubt? We investigate not to analyze or figure out why we're experiencing this, but to know it more intimately, to understand its texture and quality.

This investigation is infused with kindness. We're not interrogating ourselves harshly, but approaching our experience the way a loving friend might—with genuine interest and care. We might notice the temperature, the density, the movement or stillness of the emotion. We might observe how it changes as we pay attention to it.

The N represents non-identification. This is perhaps the most liberating aspect of the practice. We learn to see that we are not our anger, we are not our doubt, we are not our restlessness. These are temporary visitors in the vast space of awareness. They arise, they're known, and they pass away. We are the knowing awareness in which they appear and disappear.

This non-identification doesn't happen overnight. It's a gradual recognition that what we are is much larger and more stable than any temporary state of mind or emotion. We begin to taste the freedom that comes from not taking everything so personally, from not believing that every thought and feeling defines who we are.

When we practice RAIN, something beautiful occurs. We discover that the very qualities we're seeking—awareness, compassion, equanimity—can be present even in the midst of difficulty. We don't have to wait for the perfect conditions to be awake. We can be awake right here, right now, with whatever is present.

This is the true transformation that meditation offers us. Not the ability to live a life free from challenges, but the capacity to meet whatever arises with the full presence of our awakened heart and mind.

So as we practice this, we're practicing wisdom, which is the fifth spiritual faculty that James talked about last night. We're bringing that awake quality into the moment.

The A stands for acceptance. We want to drop any idea that this shouldn't be happening—"I'm going to resist this. I don't want to feel it. It freaks me out. I shouldn't be feeling it." And we shift instead to an attitude of allowing and acceptance. It's okay. It's happening. It's part of our human nature. We move into a model of allowing it to be.

This is hard to do. It's a real challenge within the practice. Fear comes, our first reaction is more fear: "I can't handle this. I don't know what will happen to me if I open to it." But we just find more and more trust to allow it. And this is developing the first factor of the spiritual faculties, the quality of faith or trust or confidence.

And then we stay in contact with that allowing attitude. We keep feeling it. We feel it in the body, we feel it in the mind, and it takes a steadiness of attention to stay in contact. This is the quality of concentration, the fourth of the spiritual faculties that we're strengthening and developing.

The I stands for interest or investigation. It's a factor of curiosity that I think Sally talked about and James also mentioned. What is this thing called fear? Have we ever really gone into it? What is this phenomenon? It's so powerful, but have we ever taken time to really observe it? What does it feel like in the body? What does it feel like in the mind? What kind of thoughts come along with it? How does it make us act? How does it make us speak when we're in an afraid space?

We can learn about all of that. It's really the learning of these states that takes the mystery out of them. When we take the mystery out, they don't have the power over us. We establish the power of understanding. They no longer have that kind of power. So this is the quality of mindfulness, this going into and experiencing, and also of energetic effort. This is a very good use of effort. So these are the third and second spiritual factors. How do I investigate? How can I turn my attention to get curious about it?

The last part of the acronym, the N in RAIN, is non-identification. We don't claim this as I or mine. So think about it. When you're feeling angry, normally we'll talk about it as "I am angry." What would happen if you turned that around and just said, "Anger is arising, anger is present now"? There's a lighter kind of quality to that because the I and all that story doesn't get so hooked in.

This is an interesting one to practice with. If we can leave out the words I and my, then we see it's just an emotion arising. It'll last a while and it'll pass away. This is an emotion that is shared by everyone in this room. Everybody knows fear. Everybody knows longing. Everybody knows self-judgment or blame. So it's not a personal thing. It's not my fear or your fear.

It's just fear. We all share it, so we don't have to claim it. And then it can just do its own thing. It arises, persists, and it passes away. It's part of the whole human package, which we all have.

Then we start to see that we're waking up in the middle of these most difficult parts of our life. The most difficult areas of our hearts and minds, we don't have to close down around. We can have the strength, we can have the courage to open up and feel them and just let them be the way they are. And in that, we find there's a tremendous new freedom that comes.

We don't have to stay away from any corner of our mind, but we find we can go into every part of the mind and understand it. And then wisdom becomes, you could say, the master of the situation, the mistress of the situation. Not that we're the victim so much anymore, but wisdom becomes the master or the mistress of the house.

And we see that these are just forms of energy arising, persisting and passing. And if we don't invest in them, if we don't resist, if we don't cling, if we don't fight, they have their own lifespan.

Look at children. Kids can be playing happily away, laughing and delighting and totally into a game and the companionship. Then they'll squabble about who got the prize or who didn't get their turn on the board. And they'll get really angry and fight. And then the anger will just take them over. But they're not afraid of it. They'll just kind of go into it and act it out. And then, boom, it's over. And then they're back and laughing and playing and having fun again.

Kids have this openness to their emotional life, a trust in it, no reason to be afraid that we can also refine. So we just let these emotions come. We learn to feel them. We learn we don't have to act on them. So this gives us the confidence to let anything happen in our meditation. We don't have to hold back from any corner of our minds, of our hearts, of our practice.

I just want to close with a poem by Rainer Maria Rilke. This is from a book called The Book of Hours. The image in this poem is before each of us comes into the world, the Creator takes us by the hand and says a few words to us before launching us on the journey of life.

"God speaks to each of us as he makes us, then walks with us silently out of the night. These are the words we dimly hear: Go to the limits of your longing. Embody me. Flare up like flame and make big shadows I can move in. Let everything happen to you, beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final. Don't let yourself lose me. Nearby is the country they call life. You will know it by its seriousness. Now, give me your hand."

Let's just sit for a minute. Let everything happen to you, beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final.

CHAPTER 200

Death and the Three Characteristics

Guy Armstrong · 48 min

> Following the death of his sister, Guy Armstrong offers a profound reflection on mortality through the Buddha's teaching of the three characteristics (tilakkhana). Drawing from personal experience and the wisdom of forest masters like Ajahn Buddhadāsa and Ajahn Chah, he explores how understanding anicca (impermanence), dukkha (suffering), and anattā (non-self) can transform our relationship with death and life itself.
> Armstrong examines how our search for security in relationships, possessions, and even spiritual states inevitably leads to disappointment because everything is subject to change. He discusses how our clinging to the impermanent creates dukkha, and how the investigation of anattā - the sense of self we take for granted - reveals the luminous awareness that remains constant through all experience. Through vivid analogies and stories from his monastic training in Thai forest monasteries, he shows how these teachings point toward the "deathless" - that which is beyond birth and death.
> The talk culminates in recognizing our fundamental interconnectedness and the spacious awareness that holds all phenomena. Rather than something to fear, death becomes understood as part of the natural flow within an undying vastness. This dharma talk offers both comfort for those facing loss and profound insight into the nature of existence itself.

As a staff, we just completed a Passover dinner a little early since the sun is just setting. And this is also Good Friday. So I'd like to wish all of you a happy Passover and happy Good Friday. These are holidays that celebrate freedom and the oncoming of resurrection. It seems very fitting that we're here together coming to greater freedom.

I think most of you know that I joined the retreat a little late because of a death in my family. A week ago today my older sister named Judy died. She was someone who was really special to me and to many people. She had a really big heart, a big laugh, and was someone who has always been kind to me and who has enriched my life forever. I'd like to dedicate this talk tonight to her memory.

Jack talked last night about the mystery that we all swim in—the mystery of our existence. Death is such a part of that mystery. It is such a mystery in itself. It shocks me every time that someone close to me dies. How can that person have been here and now not be here? Where did they go? As my other sister said when we were at Judy's house, it just doesn't register. It's so hard to comprehend.

Who dies? Or what dies? What happens after death? What's this separation of the spirit and the body? How can it be that I will die? And what will that be like? There's a huge mystery and because of the mystery there's a sense of fear of the unknown. And so our lives as humans are connected with a fear of dying.

It was interesting—there was a survey that was taken some years ago about what people are afraid of in this country. Fear of death came in at number four. I thought that was pretty interesting. Number one was fear of public speaking. I don't know about you all, but personally I'd rather be here tonight.

Maybe to some extent we're not prepared for death because we're not fully prepared for life, because we don't fully understand what it means to be alive. I'd like to suggest tonight that death is a mystery that takes place on several layers. At the core of life and death are mysteries that we will never solve, that we will never understand. There is a mystery intrinsic to existence. I mean, why is there something and not nothing? It's baffling.

But I feel that one or two of the outer layers of this mystery that death represents for us can be better understood than they currently are in our culture. Our culture has not given us the deepest wisdom to understand the issues of birth and death. Over my time of practice, death is still very much a mystery to me, but a little less so than it was in the beginning. My fear of death is still present, but a bit less so than it was at the beginning. At times, in my life and in my practice, death seems to me sometimes just like changing the channels, just switching to a different frequency.

In this evening's talk, I'd like to talk about unwrapping a little bit of these outer layers of mystery around birth and death. I'd like to talk about it in terms of three aspects that the Buddha talked about as very central to his teaching and to an understanding of life. He called these the three characteristics of existence. He described that all existence, all human existence is colored by three facts. I think of these as the facts of life for grown-ups. They are impermanence, suffering, and no-self, or selflessness. This last is a concept that causes the most confusion when we tend to present it in retreat, so I'll leave that for the last. But I want to talk about all three of these aspects tonight. They're often known by the Pali terms that the Buddha talked about them in: anicca, dukkha, and anatta.

The first of the three is impermanence. Just to give you a sense of the Buddha's own importance that he attached to the concept of impermanence, he said this: "Foremost among footprints is the elephant's." Isn't that a nice line? You can tell he lived in a little different time than ours. "Foremost among reflections is that on impermanence." Foremost among reflections.

The implication is that if there's anything you want to hold in your mind and turn toward from time to time to reflect on and grow in wisdom from, it is the reflection on impermanence, of change.

In retreat, this becomes one of the most remarkable features of our experience, as several people have already commented. Everything changes, and nothing lasts very long. We're crippled by pain in our back as we sit on the cushion. We stand up, and it goes away. We have a sitting of incredible dullness and drowsiness, and the next period there's great clarity. Then we rush back into the meditation hall only to find great agitation, then more clarity, then anger, and so forth.

I hope you don't think this is going to stop at some point during the week and you're going to land in mindful clarity for the rest of the retreat. I hate to disappoint you, but it's probably not going to happen. I asked someone today how their retreat was and he just looked at me for a minute and said, "That's a really hard question to answer. How do you single something out from this changing experience to highlight? There's really nothing to highlight."

Just to prepare you for your re-entry into the world, a lot of people are going to ask you how your retreat was. You're going to have the same problem that fellow had today. So I have one recommendation—an insider tip for you. All most people want to hear is you say, "It was great." They'll go away happy, and you don't have to think about it very hard. We usually save that tip for integration day, but I'm giving you advance warning.

In this way, our retreat is a microcosm of our life. We look over our entire world, the entire field of our experience. What lasts? What have you found in your life that lasts?

We are so vulnerable as human beings because of this fact of death. Everything that lives is vulnerable to death in any moment. Out of that vulnerability, we all come to life with a great longing for security, for safety, for finding a place of rest and comfort. When we grow up as children, we tend to look for that very much in our parents. To some extent, as children, parents are necessary to satisfy that. Yet that relationship is probably not totally satisfactory for most of us. Certainly by the time we become teenagers, most of us are glad to make the move away from that relationship to more independence.

Often it seems we try to recreate that relationship through our intimate relationships or marriage, looking for another form of security. Sometimes we have to learn about this tendency the hard way.

I came to a meditation retreat a number of years ago—a two-month intensive retreat. As I entered the retreat, my partner at the time stayed behind because she was getting involved in a different spiritual practice, a different spiritual scene. I thought as I left and came into the retreat, "Gosh, I really feel good about this relationship. This relationship is really the bedrock of my life in the world." Bad thought. I should have known when I said that to myself that meant trouble.

So nature set out to prove me otherwise. I came out of my two-month retreat feeling very open and very vulnerable. I'd practiced really intensively—worked hard to get my sleep down to four hours a night and about eighteen hours a day of just sitting and walking, with very little time for meals and personal hygiene. A very effortful retreat.

After two months, I came out and called my partner, only to find that she had become very involved during my time away with a guru. The other spiritual scene she was involved with centered around this guru. It was a relationship in which, if I were to be catty—which I don't mind being in this situation—I would say there was room in his concept of relationship for only one love, and that was with him.

I felt the connection with my partner really fading as I understood the nature of the relationship she was becoming involved in with this other teacher. When I began to understand it, I felt like the bottom dropped out of my world. That bedrock I had been taking for granted dissolved into what it had always been—spaciousness. It was very upsetting to me. I went through a month or so of incredible turmoil and fear because of the security I had invested in this relationship and adjusting to this possible change.

As it turned out, when I came back home and we had a chance to reconnect, she rethought her relationship to her guru and eventually left him. I've observed that scene over the years, and every single relationship that has come into that scene has broken up.

So I felt that my perceptions were accurate and it was not just a case of fantasy on my part.

We look for security in so many places. We look to parents, we look to intimate relationships, we look to all the objects that the world provides—money and possessions. You've probably seen those bumper stickers or license plate holders that say, "He who dies with the most toys wins." Maybe it's a Bay Area thing, but I see those a lot. We seek security through career, through some kind of status or title or power. But in today's economic times, these things are very tenuous—money and career and status. They can go away overnight.

We invest in memories or our anticipations for the future. We look for a lot of security in this body. It seems to be a constant through our life. It's always with us. We look for health, we look for a certainty there. And this too is subject to change. Certainly at this time in my life, I'm very aware of the process of aging.

This came to me actually about ten years ago. I considered myself to be a fairly young man at the time. I was at a talk with my wife, and at the end of the talk, she and I were chatting at the back of the hall. I went away to talk to someone else, and someone who was sitting beside her turned and said, "Who was that man?"

She said, "What man?"

And he said, "That middle-aged man you were talking to."

And I was shocked. I had a few of these gray hairs back then, but I considered myself really very young. I sort of added up the years and thought, "Oh, I could be halfway there." Okay, middle age was upon me, so I started to deal with my own aging.

I have a friend who started to go quite bald in his early twenties, and he said for him the hardest thing about it was when he washed his face, because when he got to his forehead, he didn't know where to stop.

So there's aging. And in our relationship with the body, of course, finally there's death. The end of aging is death. And that marks the separation from all that we've come to know or depend on.

We look to many things in this world for refuge and for security, but every single one of them is subject to the law of impermanence, is subject to change. It's just a matter of time.

The Tibetans have a formulation of this, and they say that impermanence has four ends: The end of birth is death. The end of gathering is separation. The end of accumulation is dispersal. And the end of building is destruction.

So in every aspect of our existence as a human being, we're confronted by change. We're confronted by beginnings and by endings.

Some of us catch on to this fact and we come to meditation practice. And perhaps in coming to meditation practice, we may be looking again for some ultimate security, for some lasting mental state or place of rest. So we come to a retreat like this. And what do we find? More impermanence.

The breath comes and goes. Sounds arise and vanish. Body sensations arise and glimmer and pass away. Feelings succeed one another like the wind. Thoughts come and go in a torrent. And as we become more in touch with our body, even what we thought was solid sometimes can seem to be dissolving, as some of you have reported in interviews. So we find it difficult through our meditation practice to find anything here that lasts also.

The Buddha advised his nuns and monks to live very simply and to practice in the middle of nature. This was one of the constants of his advice. He advised them to live in, as the old texts say, remote forests and jungle thickets. So if you can find any of those, highly recommended. To live at the foot of a tree or in a cave.

One of the beautiful things about practicing in nature is that nature is always showing impermanence.

That's one of the great gifts of this facility and the closeness of the desert. The wind is always changing. The light is shifting. The clouds come and go. Animals appear for a moment and then disappear back into their holes or trees. We glimpse an owl or a tortoise or a snake just briefly, and then it vanishes. Other creatures die and leave their bones to become food for others. Living close to nature, we begin to really feel this impermanence right to our bones. It becomes part of us because we realize that we are part of nature.

Nature is not a place we go and visit on holiday or a backpacking trip. We discover that nature is within as well as without, and all of nature is characterized by impermanence. Even ideal situations change.

One of the beauties of practicing in Asia is that one has the opportunity to live still very close to nature for an extended period of time. For that reason, I went to Thailand and ordained as a monk and spent a year practicing mostly in two different forest monasteries. The first one I practiced in was in the north of Thailand near Chiang Mai, and I had what seemed like the perfect situation—really one of the best practice situations I've been in.

Because I was a Westerner, I was given the best hut in the monastery. It was across a stream and then up a path that dead-ended. The stream was at the base of this beautiful canyon, and the river ran through the bottom. From my hut, I couldn't see another person or another hut. And the teacher there didn't speak English, so I was really left on my own just to do my own practice of sitting and walking, which I did day after day for several months. I thought, this is really the perfect spot.

But I had made a commitment to spend another period of practice time at a monastery in the south of Thailand, so I knew that I had to leave this place soon. As time came to leave, I became very clingy. I didn't want to go. This is just perfect, I thought.

Then the rains came. And when the rains came, the river right outside my hut started to pick up volume. The roar of water began to sound day and night. That was okay for a while, but then the river started to sing a song. And the song it started to sing was Bob Dylan's "Subterranean Homesick Blues." From an album I had bought seventeen years before, I was able to recall every single line of the song. At that point I became glad to be moving to another monastery.

All of our experience in any dimension we look at is just rising and passing. This is one of the reasons we invite you to look at your experience with some precision and in some detail—to convince yourself that there's nothing in the whole field of your body and your mind that's static, that's not subject to this law of change.

When I went to the other monastery in the south, that monastery was called Wat Suan Mok, and the abbot was Ajahn Buddhadasa, who is one of the probably greatest Thai meditation masters of the second half of this century. He passed away last year, unfortunately. But while we were there, the Westerners had the chance to meet with him once a week. He spoke quite good English and would give us teachings directly in English. There was a group of just about seven of us Westerners there, so we had quite a lot of intimate contact with him.

His recommendation, his meditation instructions for us in that period were like this. He said, "Okay, consider one of the senses. Consider the sense of sight. For the sense of sight to arise, there have to be three components. There has to be a visual form, something to see—a person, a thing, an animal. There has to be a functioning sight organ, or the eye. And then visual consciousness arises as the impact of those two."

So in any moment of seeing, there is the visible shape, the sense organ of sight or the eye, and visual consciousness. These three things in relationship to sight are called the sense bases of seeing, or in Pali, the ayatanas. That's the sense of sight. The same schema gets replicated for the other five senses—the four senses of the body and the sixth sense of the mind. So we have the senses of seeing, hearing, touching, tasting, smelling. And then in Buddhism, the mind is considered a sixth sense, the cognition of all the mental states—the emotions, the images, perceptions, intention, and so forth.

So the approach he advocated was to not grasp either end of the snake, but to see the whole snake. To acknowledge that both pleasure and pain exist, that they're both equally transitory, and to relate to them in a way that doesn't involve clinging to one or pushing the other away.

This teaching points to a fundamental misunderstanding we have about the nature of happiness. We often think that happiness comes from getting what we want and avoiding what we don't want. But the Buddha's teaching suggests that this very approach—this constant reaching and rejecting—is what creates our suffering.

Think about it: when we're grasping after pleasant experiences, we're already in a state of dissatisfaction. The very act of reaching implies that we don't have what we need right now. And when we're pushing away unpleasant experiences, we're in a state of resistance, which is itself a form of suffering.

The Buddha described this pattern as tanha, often translated as craving or thirst. It's this deep-seated tendency to always want things to be different from how they are. We want pleasure to last longer, pain to end sooner, and neutral experiences to become more interesting. But this constant wanting keeps us in a state of agitation, never quite satisfied with what's actually happening.

In meditation, we can observe this pattern very clearly. We sit down with great intentions, hoping for a peaceful, concentrated experience. But maybe our mind is restless, or our body is uncomfortable, or we're feeling sleepy. If we're trying to grasp onto some ideal meditation experience, we immediately create suffering for ourselves.

Or perhaps we do have one of those wonderful sittings—clear, spacious, filled with ease. If we try to hold onto that experience, to make it happen again next time we sit, we've already lost it. We've turned a moment of natural peace into an object of desire.

This is why the practice isn't about having particular kinds of experiences. It's about learning to relate differently to whatever experiences we're having. Instead of immediately evaluating them as good or bad, desirable or undesirable, we can learn to meet them with a quality of open awareness that doesn't immediately reach for or push away.

The Pali term for suffering is dukkha. It's usually translated as suffering, but it had a broader range of meaning in that time. It meant not just direct suffering, but the unsatisfactory nature of phenomena, the unreliable nature of phenomena, because none of them can provide what we're really looking for, which is a lasting peace and a lasting happiness.

Suzuki Roshi, a Zen master, put it this way: "Without accepting the fact that everything changes, we cannot find perfect composure. But unfortunately, although it is true, it is difficult for us to accept it. Because we cannot accept the truth of transiency, we suffer. So the cause of suffering is our non-acceptance of this truth. The teaching of the cause of suffering and the teaching that everything changes are two sides of one coin."

So until we learn to let go completely, until we are really completely free of clinging, suffering is an inevitable part of life. It's just one of our realities.

As we meditate, we open more and more to the wholesome states of mind—to mindfulness and concentration, to compassion and joy and metta. But in that opening, we also open more and more deeply to suffering, to the pain of life.

This is a quote from an Indian teacher named Nisargadatta Maharaj. He worked in dialogue with people, and this is a dialogue that he had with a Westerner.

Maharaj said, "The essence of pleasure is acceptance. Whatever may be the situation, if it is acceptable, it is pleasant. If it is not acceptable, it is painful."

The questioner said, "Pain is not acceptable."

And Maharaj said, "Why not? Did you ever try? Do try, and you will find in pain a joy which pleasure cannot yield, for the simple reason that acceptance of pain takes you much deeper than pleasure does. The personal self, by its very nature, is constantly pursuing pleasure and avoiding pain. The ending of this pattern enables you to return to your real nature, the source of all happiness and peace."

The Buddha talked about this fact of change and suffering as an inspiration for his practice when he was still seeking, when he was still the Bodhisattva. He put it this way: "Suppose that I, who am subject to decay and death, were to seek my happiness in that which is also subject to decay and death. Would that be for my benefit and welfare?" His answer was no.

He said, "But suppose that I, who am subject to decay and death, were to seek my happiness in that which is beyond death, in the deathless. Would that be for my benefit and welfare?" And he said yes. And that really became the thrust of his practice—to discover that which is beyond death, that which is the deathless.

The third of the characteristics of existence that the Buddha talked about is what he called anatta, which we translate as no-self or selflessness. This is a little bit nuanced, so I'm not going to go into it so deeply, but I'll just say that it's a root question of our meditation: the question of who am I or what am I? What is this thing I call myself?

Most of our thoughts and feelings and actions revolve around this central concept of I. But do we really know what it is? Let me ask a couple of questions. I want to take a look at how we use the language around I and ask you some questions that shouldn't be too difficult.

How tall are you? And what color are your eyes? Everybody get those? Good.

Now, when I ask, "How tall are you?" I would answer, "I'm 5'10"." What does that really mean, "I'm 5'10""? Are my thoughts 5'10"? Is my happiness 5'10"? I'm really saying when I answer that, the body is 5'10", and I am the body, right? So here we're identifying I as body.

Okay, I'm the body. If that's true, suppose you cut your hair and it falls on the floor. Is that you lying on the floor? Hmm.

What about the other question? What color are your eyes? I'd say my eyes are brown. This is a little different.

Now I am someone who has eyes. I have brown eyes. Hmm, they're my eyes. Well, now I seems to be someone who stands apart from the body and owns it. I'm the owner of the body.

We do the same thing with feelings. I could ask you, "How are you?" and you'd say, "I'm happy," or "I'm sad." So are you your mind? Or I could say, "What are your feelings in this moment?" You can say, "Well, I'm dealing with my feelings of happiness or fear or whatever." So are you something separate that owns those feelings?

This is interesting. Sometimes we feel ourselves to be mostly an observer. We're sort of located in this space in the center of our head behind the eyes, and we kind of collect information through these two sense organs that work like a periscope—you know, that stick out and gather information and send the data back to the real self. Who's the observer? So is that what you are? Are you the observer that's in the middle of your head? But have you ever looked there to try to find you there?

It's all very curious. And the more we look, the less we find. So what it points to is that although we think we know what this "I" is, when we look for it, nothing there. Nothing there.

And the Buddha said that this sense of "I" is just a fleeting sense. It's just something that arises in the moment. But there is no solid entity called "I." There is no one to whom all this is happening. There is no owner of this body and mind and of this consciousness.

Similarly, all the things we experience that we call "mine"—there's no owner, so they're not really mine. We experience a pain and we think, "my knee." We experience a thought and we think, "my thought." Misleading. When we see clearly, we just see pain. We see anger. We hear sound. We see sight. We see thought. The "my" is extra. The "I" is extra.

So what's the true nature of the world? What are things really like? The Buddha talked about the truth of impermanence, suffering, and non-self. He put it in those ways because we tend to see in terms of permanence, happiness, and self. He's trying to correct a misperception—our misperception of the world.

When we begin to see in terms of impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and no-self, we start to see things more as they are. In doing that, there's a degree of freedom that comes. But it's not the final freedom. It's not the last or greatest freedom possible.

These three characteristics are really just doorways for seeing more deeply what our true nature is, how we're really put together. They encourage us to let go, not to hold so tight. And as we let go, we can inquire into that experience.

So in this very moment, in any moment, what is your experience when nothing is being taken hold of? When there's no clinging to body sensations or sounds, to sights, to thoughts, to feelings, to breath. When there's no clinging anywhere as "I" or "mine"—what is your experience? What is left when clinging goes?

We start to see that as the objects come and go in our field of experience, what remains constant is our capacity for awareness.

Over the course of these days, you've had so many different experiences. If you look at the thread that links them all together, don't you find that there's a thread of awareness through all of them?

Suzuki Roshi talked about this capacity for awareness as what he called big mind—this vast and limitless space of awareness in which all the objects of the world are arising and passing. It's empty, like space is, but it also has the capacity to cognize, to recognize.

This was brought home to me in a really direct way. One of the interesting things about being a monk is that you're allowed to observe autopsies. Traditionally, in the Buddha's time, the meditation was on funeral grounds, charnel grounds, where bodies were left to decompose and decay. Part of the training of a monk or a nun was considered to be to sit with those bodies and observe their decomposition. Today, monks are encouraged to observe autopsies.

When I was spending time in Bangkok, I had the chance to do this at one of the hospitals in the center of the city. It was extraordinary—it had a very profound impact on my understanding. I walked out of about an hour and a half of watching two or three different autopsies, which I had never seen before. I had never even seen a dead body up close.

I walked out into the street, and as I was waiting for the bus, I was watching the people pass by on the sidewalk by this big parade ground in Bangkok. And I saw them entirely differently. I didn't see any solid personality there. I saw walking corpses—corpses that were animated just with this spark of awareness, this spark of spirit.

When I thought about it afterwards and tried to understand what I had seen, what I felt I had seen was what we really are: this sensing organism with memory. When we come fully into the present moment, we are just alive to each moment of sense impression.

Seen in this way, we start to see that that spirit—whatever we want to call it—that brightness, that luminosity that shines through each other's eyes, that luminosity in us, holds the entire world. And in that luminosity that holds everything, we recognize a new relationship to life. We recognize that we are interconnected with everything that is. Thich Nhat Hanh's word for this is interbeing. That world is our reality. We are that world. Just as I am your reality now as I speak, you are my reality as I speak to you.

In this, the division between what we consider to be self and what we consider to be other starts to break down. There's an image from the Huayan school of Buddhism, a Chinese school, called the Jewel Net of Indra. The image is that the universe is a vast net connected by strands throughout the entire universe. At each intersection of two strands, there's a gem. Each gem is different—some are diamonds, some are emeralds, some are rubies, some are big, some are small. But each gem has the capacity of reflecting all the other gems on the net. Each gem reflects the totality of the universe.

This is a description of our situation. Each of us holds the cosmos. And in that holding, we are the cosmos. We are the entire universe, each one of us.

That sort of interpenetration wouldn't be possible if there was anything solid in us. It would put up a barrier, put up an opacity. We can interpenetrate because we're not solid.

The Diamond Sutra put it this way: "Thus shall you think of all this fleeting world—like a star at dawn, like a bubble in a stream, like a flickering lamp, like a flash of lightning in a summer cloud, an echo, a mirage, a dream."

So as we sense this lack of solidity, we find we've jumped out of the plane, we don't have a parachute, but we start to realize there isn't any ground either. There's nowhere to crash. And so we can let go. We can trust in our flight. We can trust in that unfolding.

We start to see that what there really is is the constancy of our big mind—this luminous emptiness that holds the universe, that holds all phenomena. It holds the arising and passing of all that is. This is our reality: this luminous emptiness and the ten thousand phenomena. And in the middle of all that vastness, we find birth and death.

But birth and death aren't the whole show. They're only a part. They're just a part of the comings and goings within that vastness. And that vastness itself is beyond birth and death. That vastness is undying and contains all the comings and goings. And this is the greatest mystery—that vastness and how it is untouched by all the coming and going.

I'd like to conclude with a poem. It's called "The Snowstorm" by Loren Eiseley, a naturalist. It's a little bit long, so if you'd like to get comfortable in order to listen, please do.

"It is the first and last snows, especially the last, that blind us most," Thoreau once said. And I wonder what he possibly could have been thinking, since snow is always with us and keeps falling in its proper season, the generations accepting it without first or last, save perhaps this: There is a single snow which a child stores in his memory—the first snow when he falls in a drift, the first snow that reveals secrets, like the flake on his sleeve, always to be remembered because it brought knowledge of crystalline perfection, infinite diversity to be tasted with his own salt tears—the immeasurable prodigality of the universal worlds in which we are lost, the first and blinding snow of childhood.

Second, the view from the farm window, the last, with the black guest waiting at the door and outside falling and falling across corn shocks, wheat stubble, plow land, the whiteness of the void. Lucretius must have so seen his atoms, created out of them a world. A wind whipped the flakes aside, perhaps—a snow flurry that conceived a farmhouse kitchen and a stove made fields.

Look, can you say I am not composed of snowflakes? My eyes are filled with them. They are falling faster now. Suppose I go outside and join them. Could you say that I was even here? No, no. The first blindness is to see the ultimate, minute perfection. That is the illusion of the water drop. The second is to believe the black guest at the door.

My friend, there is only the blindness of a million years of snowfall, and you and I race, race, discoursing as we fall. Do not bother to throw up the window. Snow is already blowing. The room is disassembled. Our substance, the room's substance, is snowflakes. We are falling apart now. We have reentered the eternal storm.

Let's sit for just a minute.

Accepting Life's Characteristics

Guy Armstrong · 49 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong guides us through the Buddha's teaching on the three fundamental characteristics of existence that we must learn to accept. Drawing from personal retreat experiences and traditional Buddhist wisdom, Armstrong explores how impermanence (anicca) permeates every moment of our experience, how our resistance to change creates suffering (dukkha), and how our sense of self (atta) may be more elusive than we imagine.
> Armstrong skillfully weaves together teachings from the Fire Sermon and insights from masters like Ajahn Buddhadasa and Ajahn Chah, showing how our constant search for security in an inherently changing world leads to disappointment. He examines how we seek safety in relationships, possessions, careers, and even our bodies, only to discover their unreliable nature. Through vivid analogies - from the Buddha's comparison of grasping to holding river grass in a flood, to the modern parable of the movie "Groundhog Day" - he illustrates how radical acceptance offers the only true refuge.
> The talk emphasizes how precise mindfulness practice reveals the moment-to-moment arising and passing of all phenomena at the six sense doors, leading to the profound recognition that there is nothing solid to grasp. Armstrong concludes with the liberating paradox that by fully accepting life's inherent uncertainty and selflessness, we discover an unshakeable peace that doesn't depend on controlling our experience.

You don't need to anymore. This is what it's like. It's sweaty, it's noisy outside, and you feel uncomfortable all day. So, you don't have to go.

I asked someone in an interview today how their retreat was going. And the person just sort of looked at me for quite a long time before they answered. I knew when I asked the question that that's a tough question to answer. What do you say—twenty-five words or less—how has your retreat gone? Nevertheless, I appreciate that each of you every day try to answer that question for us and do a pretty good job. Be prepared that when you go home you're going to get this question. People are going to say, "How was your retreat?" And what do you say?

If you say, "I was really happy all the time," well, that's not quite it. If you say, "Boy, I really went through a lot of suffering," that doesn't cover the times when everything was so beautiful and you were glowing. So I'll just give you a little tip. This is what I've worked out. I just say, "It was great." And that's all people usually want to know. End of conversation, so just a little tip ahead of time.

But the reason it's so difficult is that our experience keeps changing. We go through all these swings of mood and different body feelings and different degrees of concentration and being distracted by thoughts and spacing out and hurting and feeling wonderful. This changing experience of the retreat is really one of the most noteworthy features of the whole experience. Nothing in our experience lasts very long in this setting.

Sometimes you can be very happy about that. The concentration is totally shot in a sitting and your mind is all over the place. You can tell yourself, "This too will pass." Then the next sitting is very calm and wonderful, and you're really with the breath. You can also tell yourself, "This too will pass," and you'll be right.

The Buddha made a comment in one of his discourses where he said, "Foremost among footprints is the elephant's." I love this phrase. It's not something you'd hear from a teacher today, typically, but it was a reality for him and the monks and nuns back then. They were living in the forest and there were elephants and tigers and all sorts of things. It was part of the beauty of the old talks—you really sense how close to nature the people lived back then.

"Foremost among footprints is the elephant's. Foremost among reflections is that on impermanence." So he was pointing to the fact that if we want one topic always to remind ourselves of in any situation of life at any time, it is this fact of impermanence, of the changing nature of our experience.

The retreat is sort of a microcosm of our whole life in that way. We've become familiar with the changing experience here, but it's really no different in the world. I think that as human beings we tend to recognize that at a very early age. We tend to recognize that we're vulnerable. We realize that our death could come at any time and that there's a longing in us for a sense of security and safety in this uncertain world.

As we grow up, we tend to latch on to different things or people to try to bring about that safety that we really crave. We all have a very deep longing for safety and for security. So we start out as a child, and the safety really comes from our parents. We grow up and over time that becomes not safety but a hell of its own in certain ways. And so we make our break for independence to grow up as adults. We may try to find some of that safety again in an intimate relationship with a partner. We may find too that that has its own risks. Sometimes life shows us that in the hardest way possible.

I went to do a retreat one time, quite some years ago, a two-month retreat in Massachusetts, and I left my partner behind. We were in a committed relationship, and at that time she was not interested in going for a retreat. In fact, she had connected with a different spiritual teacher. She wanted to do her practice, and I went off to the retreat to do mine. As I entered the retreat, I thought, "This relationship is really the foundation of my life."

I should have known then I was in trouble.

I got out of the retreat and spoke with my partner by telephone, discovering that in the spiritual scene she had become involved with, she had grown very committed to this guru. I'll try to observe right speech here, though I may not entirely succeed. My opinion was, and remains to this day, that with this particular guru, there was only room for his students to have one love relationship—and that was to him.

As soon as I heard of her deepening commitment to this person, I felt the floor drop out from under me. I felt that bedrock I had counted on had just completely vanished. This brought up for me a whole swirl of anxiety, fears, uncertainty, pain, and suffering through what I experienced as the loss in that moment of the certainty of that relationship which had become so important to me.

To make a long story short, when we got back together, my partner—I shouldn't say saw the error of her ways—but saw more clearly some of the drawbacks or limitations of that particular scene, left the guru, and we resumed our relationship. So everything had a happy ending.

But it made very clear to me how much I had invested in that relationship in the way of security, because when it was gone—when I felt it was gone—the fear came up so strongly.

This is not to say that we shouldn't form relationships. When we do form relationships, there is apt to be a certain investment, because we care. We care for the other person. We care for our connection with them. But we must be aware that in our constant search for security, we may tend to put some of it in that kind of longing.

Commonly we turn for security to outer things like money or possessions or a nice home or our career or some kind of title or status that comes with that. And with the economy and the situation it's in today, we all know how uncertain these kinds of securities are.

We put our security often in the body. And we come into a situation like this and we see how the body can become a source of some discomfort, some anxiety. And of course, looking around the room, many of us are going through a relationship to the aging process. I know I certainly am.

It started for me quite a while ago. I still considered myself quite a young man—this was about ten years ago—but I was already starting to get some of these gray hairs. I was at a talk at a monastery in England with my partner, and I got up and walked away to talk to someone else. Someone next to her said, "Who was that man?" And she said, "What man?" And he said, "That middle-aged man you were just talking to."

When she told me later, I was really very shocked because I hadn't in the least thought of myself as middle-aged. But actually, I was about thirty-five at the time, and I thought, well, that's about halfway through the three score and ten, so I guess I am. And I started to relate to my aging process.

A friend of mine began to go bald when he was in his twenties. He said that for him, the hardest thing about it was washing his face. He said when he got to his forehead, he didn't know where to stop. I'm glad he had such a sense of humor about it.

So we look at many things in this life for a sense of safety, a sense of comfort, a sense of security, sensing our vulnerability as people. We're all in the same boat with this.

In Tibetan Buddhism they say that impermanence has four ends. They say that the end of birth is death, the end of gathering is separation, the end of accumulation is dispersal, and the end of building is destruction. These are sobering reflections.

We realize that our own death could come at any time. The fact of our death is certain. The time of our death, completely uncertain. And so we're extremely vulnerable in this situation. We realize that. We're not dumb.

We start to realize that we come to meditation practice because religions have traditionally been the refuge for people with these kinds of questions and these kinds of concerns over the ages. And so we may come to meditation looking for some ultimate form of security through our experience here.

But we come into a retreat such as this and we find again the truth of impermanence. Our experience is always changing. The breath comes and goes. The body feels great one sitting and is full of pain in the next. Sounds are appearing and disappearing. Thoughts are the most transient phenomena of all. Have you ever tried to really grasp a thought and find out what it is?

It's so fleeting and subtle, as are our mind states. We look more closely into the body through the meditative process and we find that the bodily sensations themselves, where we thought there was a solid chest or a solid leg, we find there are only sensations arising and passing, sort of like points of light, as one teacher said.

One person came into an interview yesterday and said, "I'm starting to touch non-being." He said that when he was with his experience, his body was no longer there. So the bodily sensations become so subtle that at times we can't even touch the body. In meditation vocabulary we talk about this as the sense of the body dissolving in our experience. It's a phenomenon that many meditators have reported.

So we continue to look more and more closely. As Silvia said in her talk last night, becoming calm is the first step. Once there's a degree of calm, we don't just rest there, but we start to look around and see what we find, see what that calm mind can point out to us.

We stress in our meditation instructions some precision in noticing. We encourage you really to pay attention to the details of your experience, and it's for a reason. The very first day of interviews, someone came to the group meeting and posed what I thought was a really great question. The person said, "I'm really interested in opening my heart. Why are you giving us so much technical information on how to be with the process of breathing?"

This is a great question. I think everybody, I hope everyone in the course of their meditation experience has investigated and come to some relationship to this question. We really want with our practice to open up to the whole breadth and width of life, to touch the depths of life and to investigate all the questions that life presents. So why do we start with something as tiny and seemingly insignificant as our breath? And why do we put emphasis on noticing the beginning, the middle, the end, and the gap, and refining the attention there?

Part of it is so that you can begin to see very clearly for yourself this fact of impermanence on a moment-to-moment basis. When we investigate our experience in as much detail as we can bring to the looking, we see that even in a moment it's changing.

It's not just that it changes from the course of the morning sitting to the evening sitting, but if we really look closely, our experience is undergoing change in that very moment. There is no moment when everything is static.

When I was a monk in Thailand, I practiced for a while with Ajahn Buddhadasa, who was one of the greatest meditation masters in Thailand of this century. He passed away last year, unfortunately. But we had the opportunity to meet with him for evening talks and discussions, just a handful of the Westerners who were at the monastery over this period of several months.

One of the instructions that he gave us in our meditation went like this. He said there are six sense doors—the five physical senses of sight, sound, touch, smell, and taste, and then the sense door of the mind with the images, the emotions, the intentions and the thoughts that pass through. In each case there is a sense organ. For seeing, the sense organ is the eye. And then there is the sense object or the sight that arises at that sense door. And then finally there's the sense consciousness.

So for each of the senses there are three of what are called the sense bases: the organ, the object of the sense, and the consciousness related to that sense. With the eye, it's the eye, visible sights or forms, and then eye consciousness or seeing that actually arises. So we have six senses times three of these sense bases, or eighteen sense bases altogether.

He said, "Take those eighteen sense bases and for any experience you have in one of them, look at its origin, its nature, its arising and its passing." So he wanted us to look at eighteen times four phenomena with all our sense experience. In any moment that we're having experience, he wanted us to see one of these seventy-two aspects and to investigate our experience fully until we had convinced ourselves that there was nothing else going on but these seventy-two things arising and passing.

So we bring a precision into our awareness, not necessarily to that level. Let me give you an example. In that hearing, there is, first of all, the object of the sound, which is the striking of the cymbals. If you didn't have ears, you wouldn't be able to hear it. But because there is the object, which is the symbol striking, and you have ears, then hearing consciousness arises. So those are the three sense bases associated with this experience.

Now we could take any one of those. Let's take the hearing consciousness. We could look at its origin. It has a moment of arising which is conditioned by the striking of these objects. It has a nature, and that nature is just the quality of the sound. There's a certain pitch and a volume to it, and it has a moment in which it comes into being, which is its arising, and then it has its passing away.

So for the hearing consciousness, those are the four items to investigate. But we can apply that to any aspect of our experience. When we do, we find that all our experience at any of the sense doors is just arising and passing in this moment. There is really nothing solid to hang on to, even in one moment. Not just that your experience changes from one sitting to the next, but even in one moment, your experience is constantly coming into being and passing out of being at all the different sense doors.

Now you may feel this is a terrible tragedy, that nothing lasts. But it's really not good or bad. It's just the way life is. It's the reality of life. It's the truth. It's the law of how things are. Our entire field of experience is constantly arising and passing away.

The Buddha had an analogy for this. He said that if we try to cling to something in this field of experience, it's like a person being swept away by a river. They're in a raging river and the current is carrying them downstream, but there are grasses growing on the bank. They reach out and try to hold on to one clump of grass, but the current is too strong and it comes out in their hand and they continue to be swept away by the river. He said, that's what we're doing in our search for security in trying to hold on to what is inherently changing.

Another of my teachers, Joseph Goldstein, had an analogy that he said, it's like you jump out of the airplane and you find yourself falling through space. You realize that your experience is dissolving beneath you and it's like you're falling through space and you forgot your parachute. This is a little bit the experience when we first start to touch that sense of impermanence in the moment, moment by moment. This analogy goes on, but we're going to leave you hanging for a while without that parachute.

So this transitoriness leads into the next of what the Buddha called three characteristics of this life. He said there are really three things you need to be aware of if you want to see this life clearly and deeply. The first is the truth of impermanence. He said the second is the truth of suffering—that as long as we're looking for security by holding on to what changes, we're going to suffer.

You can look at this in two ways. First of all, you can take a look at the pleasant experiences of our life, which is normally where we hold on. When something is pleasant, we hold on. But when it passes, then we tend to hurt. You can see this very clearly here.

You come in for a sitting and the mind is still and settled. You're really connecting with the breath. There's a great deal of peace, discovering that calm. You go out for a period of walking. You hurry to come back in because now you've mastered the meditation, and you know you're going to pick up where you left off. And you come in. It's not there anymore. The mind is very active. The body has all kinds of energy going. There are thoughts and feelings. Where did the calm go? And we tend to suffer through the loss.

On the other hand, if we have a painful sitting, then we suffer directly. So if there's pain, we suffer. If there's pleasure and we cling, we suffer when it changes.

Ajahn Chah, another of the great Thai meditation masters of the last fifty years, said that it's like grabbing hold of a snake. If you grab the head, then it bites you directly and it hurts—that's the painful end of the snake. But if you grab the tail thinking you're going to miss the head, then sooner or later the head whips around and bites you, and you suffer then too. So if we grab at this life, we end up suffering. It seems to be what happens. Even pleasure can become a seed for later suffering.

The term that I'm calling suffering, the Buddha used the term dukkha. This is a Pali word that has not only the sense of suffering and mental anguish, but also just the sense of unsatisfactoriness or unreliability. We could say that there's an unreliability to life because we want security. We want there to be some reliable and lasting source of happiness and safety and security in life.

And yet the fact is that the world is unreliable in this sense. There's nothing in all the objects of our experience that we can guarantee will always give us that.

There was a monk staying at a monastery in Thailand called Wat Khao Tum—this means Temple of the Cave. After he died, people went into the cave and found out that he'd painted all sorts of wonderful paintings on the wall. One of the paintings was of a person in a monk's robe with a big smile on his face, and underneath was the inscription: "Oh, what joy to discover that there is no happiness in this life."

That's quite paradoxical, but what he really meant was there is no lasting happiness that we can hold on to, so we don't need to try. We can just surrender ourselves to being in this moment. We don't have to try to find something that's going to last.

Suzuki Roshi, the founder of San Francisco Zen Center, put it this way: "Without accepting the fact that everything changes, we cannot find perfect composure. But unfortunately, although it is true, it is difficult for us to accept it. Because we cannot accept the truth of transiency, we suffer. So the cause of suffering is our non-acceptance of this truth. The teaching of the cause of suffering and the teaching that everything changes are two sides of one coin."

This fact of unsatisfactoriness can seem kind of discouraging when we first start to connect with it. It doesn't hold out a great deal of promise on the surface. And yet this fact of unsatisfactoriness can be a tremendous inspiration to our practice. When we begin to see the truth of it, a lot of our outer-directed activities start to acquire a new perspective. We can approach our outer life without so much grasping, without so much longing for security, and the outer life lightens up, takes on a quality of being more playful, ultimately more happy.

But it also points us toward a different direction in our search for real happiness. The direction may be more inward.

So the Buddha said: "There is one thing, O monks, the not-seeing of which keeps you bound to suffering, keeps you bound in unhappiness. What is that one thing? It is the unsatisfactory nature of this life, the unreliable nature of this life."

The third of the characteristics that the Buddha talked about is probably the most mysterious of all, and in some ways the most difficult to talk about and hardest to understand. He called it a teaching on selflessness, sometimes called no-self. In the Pali language it's called anatta.

I don't want to spend a great deal of time on this third aspect tonight because it is quite subtle and difficult to understand on first hearing. But I will just say this: that the Buddha basically calls us to question this concept of "I" that we carry.

In some ways, it's the most natural and central part of human life, the sense of I. The Plains Indians had a name for the North Star, which was "Star that Stands Still." That's what they called it because all the other stars seemed to revolve around it. Well, that's a little bit like what our concept of I is for us. We sort of think that the I is the star that stands still in our center and everything else revolves around that.

And yet it's quite interesting because if you actually look for this star and try to find what it is that makes up you, it becomes vaguer and vaguer. The harder you look, the harder it is to find.

So let me ask you two questions right now that might point to some of this. I'll just ask you first: How tall are you and what color are your eyes?

Okay, everybody get those? Good. We're on the right track.

When I would answer the question of how tall I am, I would say I am 5'10". And normally we don't think twice about that, right? Well, is my breath 5'10"? Are my thoughts 5'10"? Are my feelings 5'10"? What's 5'10"? Isn't it just this body? So here we're expressing the idea: I am this body. I am 5'10".

What about when I asked you what color your eyes were? Did that seem jarring? No, that's a normal question. And you would say, "My eyes are brown."

Now I'm not my body—I'm someone that owns those eyes. Hey, those are my eyes. My eyes are brown. So which is it? Am I the body or am I something separate from the body that owns the body? Maybe we're not so clear on this I.

What if I ask you how you're feeling right now? Are you happy or sad? Light, or heavy? You might say, "I'm happy in this moment." So, are you your emotions? But another time we might talk about "my joys and my sorrows." So, are you something separate from your emotions that sees them, observes them, and owns them? Which is it?

Sometimes it seems like the most deep sense of I that we carry is this sense of being a separate observer. It's like I'm right in there behind my eyes, and I look out, and I can send my vision all around, and I'm observing through this sort of periscope. And that's what I really am—what's behind those eyes. So you can search and see if you find something there. Good luck.

What I would say is that we aren't really clear on this sense of I. And what the Buddha said is that it's really worthwhile looking at the question because all of our life revolves around this pole star of the I. Almost one hundred percent of our thoughts and concerns and activities revolve around this sense of I. And yet we don't really know what it is or if it is. Am I or am I not?

When I was practicing at Ajahn Buddhadasa's monastery, we would go out every morning on alms round. This was a traditional way that over the past twenty-five hundred years monks have collected their meals. They go out with a begging bowl and pass through villages and houses. And when people feel to, they come to offer food as the monks pass by.

We had a particular route that we followed every day. We left the monastery about six in the morning and walked for about a mile and a half down a dirt road. Then we walked across the dikes between rice fields to houses of farmers that were actually out in the rice fields themselves.

This was a very, very beautiful walk because it was summertime. The young rice had been planted the month before and was starting to grow up with that fresh green of growing things. The sun was just coming up and streaming over the rice fields, reflecting off the water. We'd just be walking between these stalks of waving rice, going up to villagers' houses.

At each house, a couple of people would come out—one or two people—and put some food in our bowl. There wouldn't be a word exchanged. There would be no eye contact. We never even got the opportunity to say thank you. That's just the custom in that country. Their support for those who meditate is such that they have a joy in offering. Then we would go on to the next house, come back to the monastery, get some more food from the monastery kitchen, and eat our one meal of the day at about eight o'clock.

I was walking this path with a friend who was another Western monk. It was just the two of us on this particular route every day. His name was Vasudhachara—that was his monk's name. We were starting to walk out from the monastery and Vasudha was walking in front of me because he was a senior monk. He stopped dead in his tracks and turned around to me. He said, "Guy, the ego is just friction." And then he turned around again and walked on.

I had quite a long time to contemplate this profound statement, because the rest of our walk continued in silence for about an hour and a half. So I pondered what Vasudha had said: "The ego is just friction."

Now, in Buddhist terminology, this word ego is simply another way of referring to our sense of self, or the sense of "I." We all carry this sense of ourselves, and we refer to that experience by the term ego. So I began to think deeply about this insight.

For those who may be interested, Vasudhachara eventually disrobed and returned to the States, where he now teaches meditation in Seattle under the name Rodney Smith. We've maintained our friendship over the years, and some of you may know Rodney. He teaches on the West Coast and also in Barre, Massachusetts.

This observation is truly fascinating: the sense of self really is a form of friction. We can discover this for ourselves in our sitting practice. From time to time, there's some sense of friction present—is that a fair statement? If you reflect on your meditation experience, you'll likely find there's some quality where the inner wheels seem to be rubbing up against something, creating friction through the process of our thought patterns, emotions, and feelings.

If we look closely into that expression of mind—which sometimes seems to be in incessant movement—we discover that this movement is generally directed toward trying to make things more pleasant for ourselves. We want to arrange life in such a way that we bring the pleasant into our field of experience while keeping the unpleasant at bay. If we examine the movement of our thoughts closely, this is generally the underlying trend.

We constantly find ourselves expressing preferences—liking this and not liking that, hoping for this and fearing that, trying to maintain this state and prevent that state from arising. There's this ongoing manipulation of both our outer situation and our inner situation, attempting to make everything conform to what we perceive as pleasant.

In this constant movement to change, we tend to resist what is. We resist what is actually here and now. I'm sure you've all had the experience of being in a beautiful spot in nature—by the ocean or in the mountains—and yet finding yourself caught in this incessant movement of thought: thinking about the situation at home, what you're going to say to your partner, what happened at work the week before, how you're going to fix that problem when you return, how you're going to raise your children not to be as obstreperous as they seem to be turning out to be.

And in the middle of that mental conflagration, you might suddenly stop and say, "Wait a minute. I came here to be in a beautiful spot. I don't have to think about this now." When you open your mind, there's the beauty—the light on the ocean, the flight of a seagull, or the sun setting on a mountain peak. You open your heart to that beauty, just in that moment, and the experience is completely different, completely transformed through the dropping away of that self-concern and the simple opening to be with what is.

This same process occurs not only in beautiful natural settings, but right here on your cushion. As I'm sure you've experienced many times this week, you find yourself caught in some storyline about an outside situation. Finally it passes, and you come into contact simply with the breath. How relaxing! How peaceful! What calm! What delight! Just to come simply into this moment without resistance.

So we can ask ourselves: Where does this resistance come from? Why can't I always be in this state of acceptance and openness? When we begin to investigate, we see this is exactly the Second Noble Truth that the Buddha taught, which Sylvia mentioned a few nights ago—the truth that the cause of our discontent is wanting or craving. This constant movement, moment after moment, of wanting something else is precisely what prevents us from simply being here, now, and open to what is.

After the Buddha became awakened, his first discourse was on the Four Noble Truths. His second discourse was called the Fire Sermon. I'd like to read you a passage from the Fire Sermon. It begins like this:

"O monks, everything is burning. And what is the everything that is burning? The eye is burning. Visible shapes are burning. Eye consciousness is burning. The ear is burning. Sounds are burning..."

Auditory consciousness is burning. And he goes through each of the six senses. Burning with what? Burning with the fire of craving. Burning with the fire of hatred. Burning with the fire of confusion.

What the Buddha taught was that when we are involved with grasping, with this constant movement to make things better or make things right, we get caught in suffering. But he also taught how to find a place of coolness, how to find a place of stillness where the fire is extinguished, where the sense of burning goes out.

In our meditation, we begin to find that place of stillness through acceptance. Simply through accepting the way things are in this moment, we begin to find that place of coolness. And this place of coolness is one that is not based on grasping. It is not based on acquiring or sustaining or perpetuating. It is simply based on the resting that we find in a full acceptance of what is here and now.

We could call this state of mind a radical acceptance because it's so complete. It goes to the root of what acceptance means. It's radical because in that moment we've stopped trying to shape or mold our experience to any degree at all, in any direction at all. And in that radical kind of acceptance, there's a very deep stillness that is very refreshing and very healing. It's a stillness that undoes a lot of conditioning, not only the personal conditioning of this lifetime, but even that old, old tendency to grasp, to crave, to make things different.

This process is described in every spiritual tradition, and they just have different names for it. In Vipassana, we tend to call it acceptance. If I were a Hindu bhakti, I might talk to you about surrender. If I were a Christian, I might talk about dying to the small life and being reborn to the eternal life. If I were a Taoist, I might talk to you about non-interfering. But all of these are pointers to the same process, which is letting go of wanting and simply opening to the truth of this moment, to what is.

There was an Indian teacher named Nisargadatta Maharaj who lived in Bombay and died about ten years ago. He taught through dialogue. He didn't give long Dharma talks, but when someone came to meet with him, he would just talk with them about their questions. So one Westerner came and he told this Westerner, "The essence of pleasure is acceptance. Whatever the situation, if it is acceptable, it is pleasant. If it is not acceptable, it's painful."

The questioner replied that pain is not acceptable. And Maharaj said, "Why not? Did you ever try? Do try and you will find in pain a joy which pleasure cannot yield for the simple reason that acceptance of pain takes you much deeper than pleasure does. The personal self by its very nature is constantly pursuing pleasure and avoiding pain. The ending of this pattern is the ending of the self. The ending of the self with its desires and fears enables you to return to your real nature—the source of all happiness and peace."

This theme of acceptance is becoming so popular that Hollywood is starting to pick up on it. You know something's made the mainstream when you see it in big-budget movies. The one that particularly struck me over the last couple of years was Groundhog Day. The premise was that Bill Murray found himself in a situation visiting this small town on Groundhog Day, where the groundhog popped up, and found himself repeating the same day over and over and over. There was nothing he could do to move beyond that date. Every night he went to sleep, and when he woke up the next morning, it was still the same day, he was in the same bed, in the same town, and the same events started to repeat themselves throughout the day.

It started to drive him crazy. He tried everything he could do to get out of it. He even tried suicide. So he killed himself, but he woke up the next morning back in his bed with the same events of the same day going over and over. He finally realized, "Hey, I can use this. There's a woman I'm really attracted to. I'll get to know what line really turns her on and she'll fall in love with me." So he started to try to manipulate the situation to find his pleasure from it, to see what he could get from it. But fortunately or unfortunately, nothing worked.

All his stratagems backfired and he found himself waking up in the same day again and again. He finally became very despairing. He completely despaired of ever changing it, and he actually gave up hope, completely gave up trying at that point.

And it was at that point that everything changed for him. When he settled into that day, just being that day, with all its ordinariness and predictability, beautiful things started to happen for him. He actually developed compassion for other people. And he started going around town fixing all the things that he knew were going to go wrong for other people on that day. And from that heart of compassion he actually discovered a real sense of love for another person and his heart really opened in a new way.

Now on one level this is just an entertaining Hollywood film. On another level it's a beautiful parable about the teachings of the Buddha. Because the way I read it, Bill Murray was imprisoned in the cycle of existence known as samsara, where we are repeating over and over again our birth and our death time after time. In a way, we're trapped in this endless cycle of becoming.

But when he gave up and accepted it just as it was and brought to that a feeling of compassion and love, the total experience was different. He found his freedom within that cycle and his heart flowered and he no longer resisted. And by the way, when that happened, the day turned over to the next day. So he truly was out of the cycle.

So this quality of acceptance, although it's a simple term and points to a simple truth that we can use every day, has a very deep meaning and a very deep significance. Part of what we need to accept are these three characteristics: the fact that life is changing, is unreliable, and that the sense of self is vague and perhaps illusory and can be questioned. Maybe there's really nothing there that we can call an I.

As we accept this truth, we find a peace in the moment that's not dependent on grasping, that's not dependent on carrying over, that's not dependent on holding onto. And it's a peace that's accessible in any moment when we come to that full acceptance, when we open our heart and don't look for anything beyond.

I'll just close with another quote from Maharaj, who echoes some of this feeling. He says that wisdom tells me I am nothing. Love tells me I am everything. And between these two poles, my life flows.

Let's sit for just a moment.

CHAPTER 202

Accepting Ourselves

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> Guy Armstrong offers a layered exploration of acceptance as both a practical life skill and a gateway to the Buddha's deepest teachings. Beginning with a personal story about camera batteries failing during a scenic flight, he examines how small disappointments reveal our patterns of resistance. Armstrong then delves into the crucial work of self-acceptance, particularly relevant in Western culture where many lack traditional spiritual grounding. He addresses how meditation practice invites us to embrace the full range of human experience—both blissful and difficult states—without judgment.
> The talk explores the unique contribution of samādhi (mental unification) as a healing quality that naturally softens difficult emotions through inner peace and stability. Drawing from his time as a monk in Thailand, Armstrong shares the profound teaching that "the ego is just friction"—pointing to how our sense of separate self creates constant mental restlessness. This connects to the Buddha's foundational teaching in the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta on the Four Noble Truths, where craving and resistance to present-moment experience create suffering.
> Armstrong distinguishes between healthy engagement with life's challenges and the deeper spiritual acceptance that leads to liberation. He concludes by addressing practical questions about anger and finding balance between inner work and outer activism, emphasizing that true acceptance doesn't mean passivity but rather responding from wisdom rather than reactivity.

I'd like to talk this evening on the theme of acceptance. It's a theme that I often get reminded of, and because I've given a talk on it, I feel like I have to practice it.

It came up for me this past week, the first really beautiful day that we had after all the rains—I think it was last Wednesday. A good friend of ours called up in the morning and said, "Would you like to go flying today? I think it's going to be really clear. The rain's just ended. The sky's going to be crisp, really good visibility." So he booked a plane out of Petaluma, and my wife Sally and I went up with him.

We flew for about an hour and a half. We went over Point Reyes and then came back over Black Mountain, flew over Nicasio, and took a photo of a friend's house. The highlight of the trip was going to be flying over Woodacre where we live and taking some photos of our house from the sky, and then flying over the Spirit Rock land because we'd always wanted some aerial photos of Spirit Rock. Sally and I are both on the committee that's designing the new buildings up here, and we'd like to see from the air how they're located.

We were incredibly happy to be up there. It was a really clear day—you could see for fifty or sixty miles. We flew over Nicasio and were heading to Woodacre when the battery in my camera died. I had brought two spares, so I was feverishly unscrewing the little button on the bottom with a penny I'd pulled out of my pocket, meanwhile trying to keep my headset on and talk to the pilot.

It turned out my camera has two batteries in it, so I popped them both out and put the new ones in and screwed it back together. It didn't work. I took them out again, and I noticed we were flying over my house. Well, I hoped Sally was getting some photos with the other camera, because I wasn't. I tried putting the batteries in again, and I noticed we were over the Spirit Rock land and I wasn't getting any of it. The batteries still didn't work. I did it a third time.

My friend circled over the area twice, and all the time he was circling, I was messing around with these batteries. By the time I got the batteries in, he said, "Well, we've only booked the plane for an hour, we have to go back." So that was the highlight of my trip over Woodacre—fumbling with the batteries.

I started to get really frustrated. I could just feel this impatience and frustration and disappointment and anger coming up. Then I realized I could either make a scene about it or I could accept it. It was such a beautiful day and the flight back was so pretty that I decided to accept it. I'm glad that I have to talk about this from time to time because it really makes me more interested in trying to live it. But it's a lesson that I'm learning and working on all the time.

I'd like to talk about this theme of acceptance tonight. For me, it's one of the central themes of the Dharma. It's a really simple word, and we all go through little situations like that one all the time in our lives where we can open and accept something disappointing that's happened, or we can really work ourselves into a bind about it. That's the superficial level of the meaning of acceptance. But acceptance also has a depth to it that goes right to the very heart and core of the Buddha's teachings.

I want to talk about several different layers of this quality of acceptance. I want to talk first about the whole process of coming to terms with and accepting ourselves, which is a big area for acceptance. I want to talk about how it's a pointer to the heart of the Buddha's teachings. And then I also want to talk about the larger picture, which is an acceptance of life.

This question of self-acceptance is obviously a key one in our society, as you can tell by the popularity of somebody like Woody Allen, who's sort of the apostle of self-doubt, or Groucho Marx, whose famous comment was, "I wouldn't like to belong to any club that would have me as a member." There's also the popularity of books like I'm OK, You're OK, which was one of the very first pop psychology bestsellers.

Looking around the room tonight, I can see that many of us are of a similar generation where one of the things we have to work with in self-acceptance is relating to our aging. It's something that I've been working with for some years. I was just at a gathering, sitting with my wife, and got up and strolled away. This was quite some years ago—I still thought of myself as a young man. Somebody next to my wife said, "Who is that man?" She said, "What man?" They said, "That middle-aged man you were talking to." I had not thought of myself as middle-aged at that point.

This awareness of aging forced me to confront something fundamental about human experience. I was about thirty-five at the time—Oscar Wilde once observed that thirty-five is such an attractive age that London society is full of ladies and gentlemen who have, of their own free choice, remained thirty-five for years.

A friend of mine began losing most of his hair in his mid-twenties, which can be particularly difficult when you're young and single. He told me the hardest part was washing his face—when he got to his forehead, he wasn't sure where to stop.

We all must reckon with our aging, with the reality that our bodies become less reliable and perhaps less beautiful than they once were. This is simply part of what we must accept as human beings.

As human beings in the West, I believe we face a unique challenge. We may be among the very few cultures in human history that has grown up without a strong spiritual center to society. Only in the last century or so has the rise of scientific rationalism truly undercut spirituality as a central organizing factor in European civilization.

This shift has had tremendous consequences. We've grown up in such a secular way that many people now doubt there is any wisdom in the creative force of the universe—believing instead that we are merely the outcome of some random chemical combination of molecules. This prevalent worldview is profoundly heartless.

This fragmentation—for scientific materialism captures only a fragment of life—has left its mark on our minds, hearts, and spirits. When Mahatma Gandhi was asked what he thought of Western civilization, he replied that he thought it would be a good idea.

D.H. Lawrence, one of my favorite novelists, came to America in the 1920s and lived in the Southwest, spending several years near Taos. He said this was when he felt most connected to religion in his life. Lawrence observed that Americans—meaning European Americans—were profoundly affected by the size and openness of the landscape in their westward movement. Yet while settling it, they broke the land, and something in them was also broken by its vastness and emptiness. American men, he noted, had lost their warmth and affection for one another, now living isolated and lonely with no real sense of community. This was in the 1920s.

Growing up without the support of a rich and integrative spiritual culture, I believe we encounter more difficulty than many in accepting the fullness of what it means to be human.

All human beings across time experience a range of feelings. We know the positive emotions—joy, happiness, enthusiasm, excitement. We also know the difficult mental states of fear, shame, anger, guilt, depression, and sorrow. We all know this whole spectrum.

Yet depending on our upbringing, we may have vastly different relationships to how we hold this complete range of human experience. I believe we've reached almost a crisis point in America where so many people find it extraordinarily difficult to accept this full spectrum of human capabilities and experience. Too many of us remain caught in judgments about which emotions are acceptable and which are not.

This represents one of the key thrusts of meditation practice: allowing us to explore all corners of our experience so that we come to know all corners of our minds and hearts—the light as well as the dark—and truly come to terms with the range of what we find there.

Meditation practice is not a path that carries us over difficulties to some remote pot of gold at the end. Meditation is a practice that takes us directly into the whole range of our human experience. Sometimes meditation brings very blissful, uplifting, joyful, life-giving, heartful experiences. Sometimes meditation brings us face to face with the most difficult parts of ourselves—raw experiences of fear, sorrow, loss, grief, anger.

We need to develop kindness in holding all of this. Even after years of practice, I continue finding areas that surprise me or trigger reactivity.

I was doing a personal retreat one winter in New York State not long ago. I had a little cabin in a beautiful part of the state, on the edge of the Catskills in farming country. I spent two months there alone—October and November. A friend brought me food once a week, but apart from that, I saw no one for those two months.

I looked out over about a hundred acres of land that opened onto rolling hills and farmlands beyond. I could literally see for hundreds of acres without encountering another soul.

And I was just carrying on my practice of sitting and walking day after day in silence. October, with the weather turning and fall colors blazing, was quite beautiful. Then November came. November in upstate New York is the start of winter, at least it was that year. For about two weeks there was rain and hail and snow and high winds, and the skies were gray for two weeks straight. I did not see the sun.

I got frustrated first because I couldn't do my walking meditation. Like a foolish Californian, I'd forgotten to bring boots. I thought the first snowfall would come around Thanksgiving. All I had were tennis shoes and sandals. Finally, to do my walking meditation, I would tie little plastic bags around my feet with string—little produce bags—and go out and walk. But they wouldn't last very long. On the days it was raining or snowing, I really couldn't go out at all, so I felt quite confined.

It was getting quite dark. I was starting to feel lonely and sorry for myself. All of a sudden, I just wanted to be out of there. I'd had enough of this retreat.

There's a classical term for this experience in meditation practice. It's another of the five hindrances called doubt. The essence of doubt is: what on earth am I doing here? Some of you may have asked yourself that at Spirit Rock from time to time.

Doubt was coming up strongly for me. Since I talk about it, I thought I should know something about it. So I said, "Well, let's look at this. What's this doubt about?" I looked more closely and waited until the next time it came. What I saw was that just before the doubt came into my mind, there was an experience of real loneliness and despair at the situation—just being all by myself in this gray climate, being cold, not being able to walk. There was this self-pity and despair that I just couldn't stand. As soon as it came up, I wanted to escape.

Actually, for me the doubt was more about escaping what I was feeling than about it not making sense to be on retreat. When I understood that, the doubt went away. I thought, "Oh, that's what I have to do. I have to come to terms with that despair, which is still a part of me." When I realized that, the doubt was gone and I was back with despair—and that was real progress, I can tell you. It was a step in the right direction.

If we can't accept ourselves, if we have some idea that some parts of us aren't okay, then our inner life becomes quite tangled. We create a complicated web around our feelings because we're trying to allow some—the good ones—to come. We want to open to the positive things in life, but we don't feel we want to open to the difficult things, the negative side. We get in this habit of trying to support half of our emotional life and suppress the other half. The only thing this leads to is deadness. We deaden our vitality when we do that.

We also create this division. We live life in a split way where there's a judger on one hand and the doer or the be-er on the other hand. The judger is always passing comments: Are you being acceptable or not? Is what you're feeling okay or not?

The interesting thing to investigate about that sense of judger is: where does it get its opinions? It's really founded on nothing. That judge is just a fragment of our belief system. One thing you can always be sure of is that the judger does not have the whole picture. That fragment does not contain the whole picture of the human being. Because it's an incomplete view, it's not reliable. But because there's that constant sense of tension, of judgment, we can't relax. We can't feel comfortable. We can't really come to a deep sense of inner peace.

If we can't accept ourselves, then we always look for acceptance outside of ourselves. If we can't love ourselves, then we need that affection and approval to come from out there somewhere. So we're always looking for it from others. There's this underlying sense of need in our relationships.

But here's the thing: if we really don't believe we're acceptable, we also don't believe the affection when it comes. The world is sending all of us messages of affection and caring and love all the time. Day after day we're getting those messages from friends, family, co-workers, sometimes from strangers. But if we have the view "I'm not lovable," we'll block them. Rather than change our view, we'll actually perceive that no one likes us or that no one cares for us. So even though the affection may come, it doesn't satisfy. We can't let the affection really sink in because we feel that it's just a matter of time before we get rejected.

I was on retreat once in England with a person who was really my primary teacher for years and years in my practice, an Englishman named Christopher Titmuss. We were practicing on this hillside right near the border with Wales, just a few miles up from where Wordsworth wrote "Lines from Tintern Abbey." It's one of the rainiest parts of a very rainy countryside. My difficult retreat experiences, I should have learned by now, have to do with weather. I was going through another period where in about three weeks the sun was out about twice.

I came into an interview with Christopher and I had not been feeling good about myself at all. Especially during my walking meditation, a lot of thoughts and feelings came in about not liking myself. I told Christopher that I was having kind of a hard time and he said, "In what way?" I said, "I'm having some difficult thoughts." I kind of hoped he'd stop there. And he said, "Oh, what kinds of thoughts?" I hadn't known Christopher for very long at that time and I didn't know whether I could really open up to him. But I told him what was going on with me and he very compassionately said to me, "You don't accept yourself. You have lots of good qualities, but you don't accept yourself."

So I took that as my theme for my meditation for the next few years in my practice. I had to come to understand—I had to figure out for myself—what did it mean then to accept oneself? In Buddhism there's not supposed to be a self, is there? So what was I supposed to accept? That confused me for a while. I kept sort of waiting, thinking maybe I was going to come across in one of my meditation periods some inner entity, some little guy that I just had to wrap my arms around and then it would be all okay. That sounds kind of facetious, but in a lot of ways I think sometimes there's the expectation in our meditation practice that we'll have some kind of peak experience that will make all the difficult stuff go away—that we'll enter a period of everlasting light and bliss, sometimes referred to as the enlightenment retirement option.

But I think that it's a little bit of a misleading figment to think that way. One of the things that the Buddha said about this practice, one of the ways he described it, is that it's a gradual development. He said it's like the ocean floor sloping away from the shore of the land—it slopes away very gradually. So even though very interesting and intense and mind-opening and fresh, insightful moments do occur in this practice without a doubt—transformative moments—the idea that there's all of a sudden going to be a sudden switch from this mixture of light and dark into all light is misleading. This mixture will be with us for a long, long time, and the way that we work through it is just greater and greater self-acceptance.

What I finally came to in my understanding of what self-acceptance meant for me is it didn't mean finding any one thing that I had to accept. It meant being willing to accept my experience moment after moment after moment through all the changes that it went through. So it meant being willing to accept a moment of knee pain, being willing to accept a moment of fear, being willing to accept a moment of real opening and happiness, being willing to accept a moment of sadness or grief or a feeling of loss. I think this is a much better metaphor or model for our development in meditation—that we just develop a growing capacity to open more and more fully with more and more of our heart really being there to all the range of our experience, which is always changing.

Meditation also makes, I think, a unique contribution in the area of self-acceptance. A lot of what I've just talked about we could also find through psychotherapy. A lot of good therapists use similar language and point to a similar approach. But there's another, I think, unique contribution of meditation, and it has to do with what I'd call a very healing quality of mind, which is the quality of samadhi.

Samadhi is a Pali term, a term in the language that the Buddha taught in. It's usually translated as concentration, and it's one of the factors of the Eightfold Path, along with mindfulness and wisdom and effort and understanding. So it's a key term within the whole range of the Buddha's teachings. But samadhi, when translated as concentration, to me has a sense that we have to focus our attention down and be with just one object. When I say I'm concentrating, I usually mean I'm trying to pay attention to this and I don't want to hear that.

But samadhi doesn't have that flavor of exclusivity. Samadhi has a concentration flavor more in the way that frozen orange juice gets concentrated—it throws out the dross and retains the essence. I think the better word to translate samadhi is unification of mind or wholeness of mind.

So we can have this wholeness of mind, for instance, by being with the breath fully. That has the aspect of concentration. When I can be fully with the breath, then my mind is unified around a narrow object, a narrow focus, and samadhi is developing. The mind is coming together.

But we can also have that wholeness of mind with the attention very wide open. Some of you, I know, like to practice meditation with sounds. It gives a very expansive quality to the awareness and offers a kind of relaxation, especially if the sounds are natural. One can be with sounds that exist in a 360-degree field around us, where the mind feels very whole and very unified.

When the mind gets unified, it gets strong. It becomes stable and calm. This is the great value of this quality of samadhi. With that sense of strength and wholeness and stability comes a sense of well-being—experienced as peace, calm, rest, relaxation. As that sense of stability and peace grows in meditation, it becomes a very strong factor for mitigating or easing the painful states of mind and the painful experiences of life. We find within this quality of samadhi a place where we can rest.

As the meditation develops over time, that state of samadhi becomes more and more our natural resting place. One teacher explained it like this: In the beginning of practice, it's as though we're pushing a ball up a hill. We push the ball up the hill and get to the top of this curve where it can rest for a moment. In the early days of practice, we feel that we connect with the breath for a few breaths at a time, and we get a sense, a taste of that peace, of that unification of mind, of that calmness. But very easily, a few thoughts come along or some sounds disturb our concentration, and the ball slides off quickly to one side or the other.

Over time, that U-shaped curve flattens out. It gets easier to get the ball to the top where it rests, and when it rests there, it's not so pitched or sloped. It rests there more easily and for longer periods of time. As the practice continues, this curve actually inverts and goes the other way. The natural state of mind, after some time, becomes this resting in samadhi, this wholeness, this peace.

It still gets disturbed. Events come along—thoughts, emotions, mood swings, outer circumstances, situations—and we get flung out of that sense of peacefulness. But we develop this growing ability just to let the mind settle by itself, not to stir it up further, and it comes back to its place of rest again.

This place of rest has a very healing quality. It has its own sense of well-being that starts to soften the edges of difficulty. Without even doing anything with our difficult mind states—without doing anything with our fear or shame or grief or anger—they start to be worn away. This sense of peace begins to wash away many of the difficulties we may have experienced. I think this is a unique contribution that meditation has to offer to self-acceptance.

I also wanted to talk about the deeper dharmic theme of acceptance. I'd like to tell a story from when I was a monk in Thailand. I was practicing at a monastery in the south of Thailand, right out in the country—a forest monastery. The abbot was Ajahn Buddhadasa, one of the great Thai meditation masters of this half century.

I had a little hut out in the forest. There were about eighty acres of forest and about eighty huts scattered throughout. Living in my simple hut, I couldn't see another person. It had just been carved out of the rainforest, and animals would pass through my clearing. Monkeys would swing overhead, and I could carry on my sitting and walking in this rather idyllic spot.

Every morning at six o'clock, a friend and I went out on what's called alms round. The tradition of Buddhist monks—and also the nuns when that order was alive, when that lineage existed—was to live on food donated by lay people. This tradition continues to this day.

We would leave the monastery at six in the morning with our begging bowls and head off down the road. We had a certain route we traveled every day, involving about a twenty-minute walk until we reached the farming area where the rice fields were planted. This was early summer, so a crop of rice was just coming up. The villagers we visited had their houses located out in the middle of the rice fields.

So we would walk on the dikes between the fields of growing rice, which were flooded, of course. We'd walk over these dikes and come up to one of these houses dotted around the area. The villagers knew that we'd be coming about that time every day, and one or two people would come out from each house, standing at the end of a lane or a dike from their house. We'd walk up. It was all done in silence. We'd simply take the lid off our bowl and they would put in the food that they were offering, close the lid up without saying a word or even making eye contact, then we would go on to the next house.

So we'd pass about six or seven houses to get our morning alms round, and then we'd walk back to the monastery. It took us about an hour and a half altogether. But it was a beautiful way to start the day.

I would go out with a senior Western monk who had been at the monastery longer than I had, whose name was Visuddhachara. Because he was a senior monk, he would always walk in front of me. So we would walk for most of the hour and a half in silence —I would walk behind him, he'd walk in front.

We were going out of the monastery one day on our traditional alms round, and Visuddhachara stopped dead in his tracks, turned around to face me. In a very intense way, he said, "Guy, the ego is just friction." And he turned around and kept walking. I, of course, followed him.

I had quite a long time to contemplate what Visuddhachara had said because our walk was about an hour and a half and most of the rest of the time was in silence. So I just thought: the ego is just friction. What did he mean by that? I actually came to a real appreciation of what Visuddhachara was pointing to in that statement.

By the way, for those of you who don't know him, Visuddhachara is now a lay person again also, living in the Seattle area and teaches meditation. His name is Rodney Smith. We're still good friends and still stay in touch.

The ego is just friction. Well, ego in a Buddhist context has a specific meaning. It means the sense of I. It doesn't mean a puffed sense of pride. It means the sense of I, or the sense of our self, oneself, as a separate entity—not a part of the whole, but a separate solid thing that kind of experiences the world. So it's in a way a center. We kind of make the ego a center of our existence.

A lot of the teachings of the Buddha encourage us to look closely at this sense of I, to see if it's real or not. Because it's such an easy thing for us to talk about—this really is the center of our life, the sense of I. Our thoughts and actions and wishes and hopes and fears all revolve around it. But the Buddha said when you look for it, it's very hard to find. It's very hard to discover what this sense of I comes from or where it is.

So the sense of I is just friction. We might notice this kind of friction sometimes in our meditation practice, because this sense of self, of separate self, often expresses itself through constant movement of mind. I'm sure you didn't have that experience tonight, but some people who meditate have that experience. They come to sit, and instead of being with the breath through forty-five minutes, as I'm sure most of you did, it's generally the case we can be with the breath for a few breaths, and then the mind goes away into thoughts—thoughts of the past, thoughts of the future, plans, hopes, fantasies, expectations, desires, fears.

This constant movement and the emotions that come with it create this sense of unrest in us. It creates a sense of constant restlessness, and that restlessness carries with it a sense of not being fulfilled, of needing something else, a sense of insufficiency. When we're caught up in that effort, we really lose touch with the present moment.

I'm sure this has happened to you many, many times. You'll go out—it's a beautiful day like this past week has been. You'll go out to the beach or climb a hill at Point Reyes or some beautiful viewpoint and you'll just want to enjoy the scenery and the spectacular view. Perhaps you're up on Mount Tam. Rather than being with the view, all sorts of thoughts and images and emotions just keep flooding through, keep flowing through. You'll be dwelling on some situation with your partner or your children or your work or something that's coming up tomorrow. You forget why you're even there. You forget why you've come. All of a sudden a little light bulb goes off and you go, "I don't have to do this right now."

And you're right back there in the moment, with the beauty of the sunshine, the sun on the waters, the sound of the wind, the flight of a bird, whatever it may be. You're back connecting with the beauty of the moment as it is unfolding fresh from the emptiness of creation. So in that letting go of our self-concern, our self-interest, we can come back into this broader picture because life is always unfolding right under our nose. And all we have to do to contact it is to let go of this stream of self-interest.

Some of you may remember this quote from last week from a medieval Catholic poet named Angelus Silesius, who said, "God, whose love and joy are present everywhere, can't come to visit you unless you aren't there." So he's pointing in the same way, to the same phenomenon, that when we can let go of self-concern, there's an openness to a much bigger picture that's always emerging fresh.

Well, the Buddha was pointing to this kind of restlessness when he gave his very first discourse after his awakening. It was a discourse on the Four Noble Truths. The first truth is that there's unhappiness in life. The second truth is that the source of our unhappiness is wanting, is craving, is this restless sense of insufficiency that's always looking to be filled from something outside, from something other. And this is really where that sense of resistance comes from—this constant craving that feels like it's never enough. And so in indulging in that, in giving our attention to that, as we do much of the time, we lose touch with the truth, the living, breathing truth of this present moment. And it's being in that full presence in this present moment that we find our freedom, that we find our happiness.

The Buddha went on to say in his second discourse, which is called the Fire Sermon: "Friends, everything is burning. And what is the everything that is burning? The eye is burning. Visible forms are burning. Eye consciousness is burning. The ear is burning. Sounds are burning. Auditory consciousness is burning," and so on through the other senses. "Burning with what? Burning with the fire of craving. Burning with the fire of aversion. Burning with the fire of confusion."

So sometimes when the attention is quite subtle in our meditation practice, we can actually experience this relentless movement of thoughts and feelings as a kind of burning, a kind of restlessness that when we give ourselves over to it completely, it really erodes our inner peace. Peace is a natural state of mind when we don't interfere. But this constant doing that we're involved in—plotting for the future, regretting about the past—is a way of continually disturbing our essential peace.

When we start to accept, deeply accept, then we put an end to that constant churning, that constant restlessness. And this is really the teaching of the Buddha on the third noble truth, that the end of this restless craving is the end of sorrow, the end of unhappiness. And he equated it with this place he called nirvana, or this understanding that he called nirvana. So it was about finding an ultimate kind of peace, an ultimate kind of rest.

So we could say that this is a kind of radical acceptance that we come to in our practice, that we discover, where the mind finds its bearing in a way that isn't moving to any object whatsoever—is not moving to hold onto, is not moving to push away, is not disturbing that deep, deep peace. And this is a very healing and refreshing place in practice.

So this kind of radical acceptance wears away, washes away centuries of conditioning, lifetimes of conditioning, years of conditioning—the legacy of our upbringing, legacy of our parents and their parents before them, and even this movement of restlessness which has gone on, according to the Buddha, since beginningless time. All get washed away in this deep, deep rest.

This is really an aspect of all major spiritual traditions. In the Hindu bhakti path, you might call it surrender. In a Christian path, you might call it dying to the small self and being reborn to eternal life. In a Taoist path, you might call it non-interference. In Vipassana, we're rather more prosaic, and we call it acceptance. But it's really the same pointing.

I'd like just to close with a quote from Nisargadatta Maharaj, who was a Vedanta teacher of this century. He said, "The essence of pleasure is acceptance. Whatever may be the situation, if it is acceptable, it is pleasant. If it is not acceptable, it is painful."

And this questioner said to him, "But pain is not acceptable."

And Maharaj says, "Why not? Did you ever try? Do try and you will find in pain a joy which pleasure cannot yield for the simple reason that acceptance of pain takes you much deeper than pleasure does. The personal self by its very nature is constantly pursuing pleasure and avoiding pain. The ending of this pattern is the ending of the self. The ending of the self with its desires and fears enables you to return to your real nature, the source of all happiness and peace."

So we'll close there and open it up for comments, discussion, questions, anything that anyone would like to share. Sometimes I can't see so well in the back because it's a little dark. So if somebody's got a question in the back, you might just feel free to speak up.

The question of balance between contemplative practice and engaged action touches the heart of spiritual life in our modern world. I've found that my own path has naturally organized itself into three distinct modes: periods of intensive meditation practice, often in solitary retreat; work to sustain myself materially; and service to others. Rather than trying to juggle all three simultaneously, I've taken chunks of time to focus deeply on each aspect. This approach has worked for me, though many practitioners successfully integrate all three elements into their daily lives.

What I've observed, both in my own experience and in the lives of many fellow practitioners, is that authentic inner work naturally leads you back into engagement with the world. The spiritual journey seems to move in organic cycles—periods of turning inward for contemplation and retreat, followed by a natural impulse to take whatever wisdom or understanding has emerged and offer it back to the world. These alternating rhythms of withdrawal and engagement appear to be an essential pattern in mature spiritual development.

This cyclical movement requires deep listening to the authentic call of each moment. Sometimes the pull toward solitude and inner work is stronger; other times, the world seems to be calling for our active participation. Neither withdrawal nor engagement is superior to the other—they are complementary aspects of a complete spiritual life.

It might appear that meditators are turning their backs on the world when they enter retreat, but Joseph Campbell's profound work in A Hero with a Thousand Faces illuminates the deeper pattern at work. Campbell identified what he saw as the one universal myth present in human consciousness: the journey of the hero or heroine. This archetypal journey follows a clear sequence—withdrawal from the ordinary world, the discovery of extraordinary inner resources, and then the return to share that discovery with others.

This same pattern emerges in the lives of the great spiritual teachers throughout history. The Buddha's six years of intensive practice before his awakening, followed by forty-five years of teaching, exemplifies this rhythm. Christ's periods of withdrawal into the desert, followed by his ministry in the world, reflects the same archetypal movement. The contemplative journey is not an escape from responsibility but a preparation for more effective service.

The wisdom tradition teaches us the art of acceptance and inner peace, while our Western heritage offers a strong foundation in activism and social engagement. Rather than seeing these as contradictory approaches, we have the unprecedented opportunity to discover their synthesis. This integration requires wisdom—the same wisdom captured in that familiar prayer about having the courage to change what we can, the patience to accept what we cannot change, and the discernment to know the difference.

These cycles are a really natural part of an ongoing spiritual life, requiring us to listen deeply to ourselves and feel which direction more strongly draws us at any particular time.

It sometimes looks like meditators turn their back on the world by going into retreat. But Joseph Campbell wrote this beautiful book that many of you probably know called A Hero with a Thousand Faces, which traces the archetype. He says there's one myth in human consciousness, and it is the myth of the hero or heroine. What that myth is about is withdrawal from the world, discovery of extraordinary resources, and then a return to the world to share that discovery. This is really the archetype for the life of Christ and the life of the Buddha, and many other myths around the world.

So I think one really has to listen inwardly to see where the call is. Because our culture is so outward oriented by our history—the West does not have a history of going inward apart from some very few contemplative traditions—I really encourage people where there's the urge to look within to follow that. Follow that and trust in that because it will lead you back. Don't worry about turning your back on the world for a limited period of time. Trust that call, and then when you come back, you'll have more to share. It's worth the journey.

Question about anger: Would you have anything to share to help us with dealing with accepting anger?

Anger is one of the things we do have to come into great acceptance with. It's one of the most difficult emotions we experience. In my mind, there are the big four—they aren't the classical hindrances, but in my view of meditators, the four that catch people are anger, fear, grief, and wanting. Anger is one of the big four, and it comes up on retreat and off retreat.

I think there are two things we really need to distinguish with anger. One is feeling the emotion in and of itself—this is the realm of meditation practice—to become comfortable with our experience of the emotion of anger.

The ways that anger manifests: first is that mental feeling, however you describe that for yourself—the hostility or aggression or resentment or whatever. There's a mental tone to that, an emotional tone. The second is the way you feel it in the body, because strong anger has a strong impact in the body. I feel it particularly in the chest, the neck, the head. So really come to let yourself feel those body sensations.

The third way anger manifests strongly is in thinking. Often the thoughts are about: "They shouldn't have done this to me, why'd they do this to me, they had no right doing this to me, and what I'm going to do to them is..." So all the thoughts are going on at the same time.

To become aware of those three aspects of the experience of anger—that's the constellation. It's the thoughts, the emotion, the body sensations. That's what in meditation we have to come to really open to and let ourselves feel without the judgment that it should go away or that it shouldn't be there. That's the belief that really interferes with the quality of acceptance.

So it's really helpful if we can bring an attitude like we're observing any other part of nature. Emotions are part of human nature. Can we bring that same kind of eye that we would have coming across a bobcat in the wild? Can we bring that same kind of awareness to the nature of anger when it comes?

This is what meditation practice is ideal for if you have a quiet period to do that in. The difficulty with anger is we often feel it and have to relate at the same time, and that's what takes a lot of skill. The more skill you can acquire in just being with anger in a quiet way—sitting on your cushion, alone, in nature, whatever way you can experience it in solitude—that's a very helpful foundation for acceptance.

Acceptance takes some of the element of conflict out of anger, brings in more spaciousness, and gives us a foundation so we can still relate in a way that's not so controlled by the anger. So the difference is that we want to accept the experience of it. We don't necessarily want to act directly out of it because that can be destructive for others as well as ourselves.

I find the growing ability to accept it, just for what it is, gives me a spaciousness that means my speech and my actions aren't so controlled by the anger. I can maybe think a little bit about what a sane person would say in this situation before I put my foot in my mouth.

Response from participant: One tool I've used to free me from my anger a little bit is to have the understanding that much of my anger is self-centered fear. When I relinquish my grasp, when I surrender myself, then I don't get trapped into the self-centered fear, and therefore anger is easier to release.

Beautiful. The observation was that when he realizes his anger has its root in self-centered fear, it makes it easier to let go of, and I think that's true and a very helpful insight.

Thanks.

I often find what's at the root of my anger is a feeling that I'm invisible. Somebody has done something to me that shows lack of respect because they haven't even seen me. And it brings up a fear that I don't really exist. That's kind of the root fear for me.

Okay, let's close with just a minute of metta meditation to close the evening.

For this metta period, I would like you to bring to mind a difficult aspect of your life. It could be a person. It could be part of your own experience. It could be a situation. It could be a group of people. Bring to mind some difficult aspect of your life.

Let yourself feel for a moment the difficulty that this brings you. And hold the situation, the person, the aspect in your mind with an image or a sense in your body, your thoughts, whatever's helpful.

And in this case, we'll direct the loving kindness to ourselves in relation to this situation. In contact with this, may I be safe and protected from harm. May I develop a sense of peace. Even though it's difficult, may I find within me the capacity to accept this difficulty. Even though I might normally contract, may I allow myself to hold this situation and let my heart be fully open. May I live with peace. May I live in happiness. May I live in freedom.

Just a couple of short announcements to close. Next Monday, the sitting will be led jointly by myself and Fred Wapipa. Fred is a wonderful Native American teacher who lives in the area. I'll be doing the meditation, basically the silent part. Fred will be doing the talking part. That's the way I like it.

Sylvia's class will happen this Wednesday, although Sylvia's out of town. Someone will be leading it. I'm not sure whom, but someone will be there.

And I just wanted to mention something about our family program. For those of you who are not aware of it, Spirit Rock does have an ongoing program for children, really of all ages. We're thinking about now starting a program, a special program for teens, separate from the younger children. And we're really working to make Spirit Rock a place where children of all ages will feel at home, will feel that it's their spiritual home from a young age.

So we will be inviting children to come from time to time from the family program, which meets in the dining hall on a Monday night, and interact with the group here. And, of course, the invitation is always out for children to take part in the meditation periods and the Dharma talks here of a Monday evening.

Okay, hope you have a good week.

Just one comment. We do sell cookies on Monday evenings that support the children's program, and if somebody left their black pocket knife on the cookie table this evening, I have it. So thank you for all your support, and see me afterwards.

Thanks for coming, and good night.

CHAPTER 203

Relating Wisely With Anger

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines anger as one of the fundamental kilesas (mental defilements) and hindrances in Buddhist practice. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching in the Simile of the Saw, he explores how anger often masks deeper feelings of hurt and existential fear of not being seen or acknowledged. Armstrong presents a three-phase approach to working with anger: examining the original incident and questioning whether others truly 'make us angry,' staying present with the intense bodily and mental experiences of anger itself, and finding skillful means to communicate about anger when necessary. He emphasizes the Buddha's guidelines for right speech - speaking what is true and useful - and quotes the teaching that one should speak 'in due season, in truth, gently, to their profit, and with kindly intent.' The talk balances acknowledging anger's destructive potential with recognizing its occasional usefulness in confronting injustice and breaking through oppression. Armstrong advocates for a 'long-enduring mind' approach, recognizing that freedom from anger develops gradually through the stages of awakening, with loving-kindness (metta) practice serving as a powerful antidote to aversive mental patterns.

Anger is a very powerful force. It has a tremendous impact on our own bodies and minds, and it also has a tremendous impact in the world. Anger possesses an incredibly destructive power. We need only look at situations like Rwanda, Bosnia, Northern Ireland, and the Middle East to see the effects of anger that has been clung to and cultivated for generations upon generations of people and the tremendous destruction that follows.

In our own personal lives as well, anger is a force that has tremendous power and impact. We find evidence of this all the time in the daily newspaper. If you read the San Francisco Chronicle, every day there seem to be reports of homicides and assault and armed robbery and burglary, and it gets pretty depressing. That's why I like to pick up the Point Reyes Light, which is the newspaper of West Marin. It covers this valley and the towns like Point Reyes Station and Inverness, and I read about the kinds of things that anger leads people into here.

This is a report from the sheriff's calls in Dillon Beach. These are the kinds of things that the Marin County sheriffs get involved with: "A man returning to his home in Tomales got in a traffic dispute on Oceana Drive with another driver who flipped him the bird. A deputy was called and determined that no crime had occurred." This is one of the things I like about West Marin—the anger sort of seems manageable out here.

Just to give you another sense of what people get up to out in West Marin, this is from Marshall: "A citizen reported two men parked beside Highway 1, quote, 'snorting something into their noses,' unquote. They replied to him that they were merely picking their noses." And if you believe that, we have a bridge to sell you.

But anger is a tremendously powerful force. When it's present in our lives, when it's strong, it really forms a dark cloud in our mind. It can create difficulties in our relationships and in our personal life. It's a force that's really important to deal with.

Classically in Buddhism, anger is listed at the core of what are called the kilesas, or these fundamental distortions of mind, one of which is aversion or the sense of disliking or hating. Anger is really one of the key expressions of that mode—one of the kilesas. It's also listed in the hindrances, the classical five hindrances of meditation practice, also under aversion.

When the Buddha talked about ways of becoming free, he said that there are ten fetters that bind us as ordinary people in this world. The one who has come to full awakening has destroyed all of these ten fetters, has slipped the noose, as it were, of these ten restrictions. One of the ten fetters is ill-will or anger. In traditional Buddhism there are said to be four stages of awakening, four levels or degrees of freedom. Only at the second stage does one start to really get some relief from anger, and only at the third stage—which is right before total freedom, which is the fourth stage—does one become free of anger.

I think it's important when we start to work with anger to have an attitude that's been described as a long-enduring mind, because anger has that quality. It is a long-enduring emotion. If we approach it with the attitude that it shouldn't be there or that we want to get rid of it, we're only going to get more frustrated and more angry with ourselves. We need to find a way in our practice to learn to relate to anger that is not coming from a place of wanting to be rid of it, because we are not going to be rid of anger, most of us, for quite a long time.

One of my friends went to a very highly regarded Tibetan teacher, one of the senior lamas who came over from Tibet in the late fifties and who's very well respected and teaches on the West Coast. He had sat a couple of retreats with this Rinpoche and developed a good connection with him. He went and formally requested if he could be this teacher's student. This is an old man in his sixties with a beard and all the respectful signs of age. This teacher thought for a minute, looked down at my friend, and said, "Okay. I'll be your teacher, but there's one thing you have to know about me first. I still get angry."

I thought that was really beautiful, actually, that he had the humility and courage, from the sort of revered position that he was in, to say that to someone who was coming as a new student. It just points to the fact that it's not an easy thing, even for those who have practiced many years, to be free from anger.

The Buddha talked about the importance of working with anger under the precepts of right speech—that not speaking harshly is an important part of the Buddhist path. When we speak harshly, we cause pain to others, and we end up causing pain to ourselves.

For many years in my practice, I thought there was one relationship that was exempt from the precepts, and that was the relationship with my partner, or my wife, or significant other. Growing up, I had a lot of stormy relationships. For those of you who are interested in astrology, my moon is in Scorpio, and when I tell that to people who are into astrology they sort of go, "Oh, you poor guy." I don't know that much about astrology, but it indicates that the emotions are not always the easiest place to hang out.

I've had a lot of stormy relationships in my past, and I always thought it was okay to get angry at my significant other. It took me a long time of practice to realize that the precepts actually do apply to our partners as well. I think that's why this relationship is such a fertile ground for practice.

There's always more to work with there.

So, it's really important to take some care with anger, but at the same time, we don't want to get too uptight or judgmental about it. If we develop a really condemning attitude toward anger or a judgmental attitude, we end up trying to repress it or make it go away. And that simply doesn't work. So it's a very delicate balance and a delicate dance that we need to find out how to do with anger.

When I was thinking about how to sum up the dharmic perspective on anger, this is the kind of summary that I came to in my own mind: embrace the feeling and guard the action.

What we want to do with the experience of anger is to really open fully to the experience of it, to our feeling. That means, as we discussed in the meditation tonight, becoming really clear on what the feelings are in the body that anger brings up within us, what the mental tone is in the mind, what kind of thoughts go along with anger, and how it makes us want to react—to unsheathe the claws, or to go on the attack, that urgency of action that anger seems to propel us into. And as far as possible, not to act through our speech and through our physical actions in such a way that we give unrestrained vent to that feeling.

So this is our koan of anger: to embrace the feeling and guard the action.

Because if we simply blindly react from the feeling of anger, all we're doing is strengthening that conditioning. Every time we give expression through our speech or through our physical acts to a feeling that's in our mind, we are deepening that karmic groove. Karma and volitional action are really synonymous—they mean one and the same thing. When we do an action from a wholesome motivation like generosity, kindness, or compassion, we deepen that groove. When we do an action from an angry place, we deepen the groove of anger.

So in addition to deepening the groove of anger, we also put it out into the universe in a way that the universe will eventually reflect back to us. The skill around working with anger is to allow ourselves to feel the feeling very fully, but learn to develop this really spacious container for it through our meditation practice so that it doesn't dominate our behavior. That's essentially the direction we want to take with anger, and that's really why I think it's a lifetime of practice.

In this we have to come to what's at the heart of the paradox, at the heart of spiritual practice: this combination of complete surrender to the feeling and a very careful vigilance around the actions. There's this balance of letting go and control that we have to find with anger. It's like walking the edge of a razor.

Padmasambhava, who brought Buddhism into Tibet, put it this way: "Although my view or my understanding is as expansive as the sky, my actions as regards cause and effect are as fine as grains of barley flour." That's the kind of approach we need in our meditation. We need to develop this vastness of view, a meditation that can hold everything that arises within ourselves and within the world. And then from that vastness of view, we need to take really great care with our actions, not to hurt others and not to hurt ourselves.

This kind of approach, as it's practiced within a community, creates a safe kind of space where each of us can really flower. That's why the practice of the precepts within a community like the sangha, within a spiritual community, really creates the ground from which each of us can open and flower, because they create a space of safety.

Recognizing that it's not easy to do, even for practitioners of a long time and even for teachers of this stuff—because, of course, the only thing we're doing in the teaching role is reminding us of what we all know and all have heard—I do want to tell you a funny story from a retreat that I was on with Sasaki Roshi. He was one of the great Zen masters of our time, who lives in America in a place called Mount Baldy in Southern California. This was in the late seventies.

One of the healthy things about our community is that we're very open to practicing with other teachers, other Buddhist teachers and non-Buddhist teachers alike. At this time, I was living at a meditation center in Massachusetts. About ten of us from this meditation center went to sit a retreat, a seven-day retreat with Sasaki Roshi, in a very strict Zen style.

He worked in the koan method, and he would give us these baby koans because we were beginning students. We would have to go to him four times a day—he saw every person four times a day to give him our answer to the koan. The grown-up koans are questions like, "What is the sound of one hand clapping?" Our baby koans were much simpler. Nonetheless, those of us from a vipassana background did not have any foot up in this particular practice. Our mindfulness practice didn't give us any clue about how to answer a koan.

So we were just, most of us, going crazy trying to deal with this question. My question was, "How do you realize Buddha when you hear this sound?" And I had to go in four times a day to present my answer. I have never felt like such a fool in all my life. I didn't have a clue what I was doing.

Well, there were not only senior vipassana students on that retreat, but some of my vipassana teachers were on that retreat. I'm not going to name names, but I know that they were even more frustrated than I was. So one of them, after several days of just being humiliated in this practice, got so fed up and so frustrated...

Can I ask first, are there any children under sixteen here tonight?

This Vipassana teacher was so upset at this point—so frustrated and so angry. He didn't know what else to do. He picked up the bell that was sitting in front of the Roshi, rang it in front of his face, blew out the candle and said, "Fuck this!"

But Sasaki Roshi was not a great Zen master for nothing. He simply sat there in his imperturbable way, picked up his bell—which he rings when he signals the interview is over—rang the bell and said, "Not the answer."

The dance of anger, even for Vipassana teachers. And names shall go unnamed here. This is all confidential.

So, working with anger in our own life. I wanted to go through the exercise with you of actually calling forth an experience of anger so that we could really take a close and kind of analytical look at our experience of anger.

In our life, usually something happens quite abruptly that throws us into this state of anger. Something arises that we weren't expecting. Someone says something unkind to us. Someone cuts in front of a line at the supermarket. Our partner criticizes us in a way that we don't think is fair. Our boss lays some expectation on us that doesn't seem appropriate to us. And immediately, almost without noticing what has happened, we find ourselves sometimes in this very intense state of anger.

I want to just look for the time being at personal anger or self-centered anger. We'll come back a little later to anger on behalf of others—anger based on injustice. But I want to just look right now at our self-centered anger that often comes up so quickly.

The first thing I want to ask is, when you take a close look at what has happened in that moment before the anger gets full-blown, is there any feeling before the anger comes? Someone tonight mentioned hurt, and I think that's a very good observation. Often there's a sense that we've been hurt by someone's not considering us, not being thoughtful, not being kind to us. And that causes a hurt. Very often it's as though we can't let ourselves feel that hurt because it makes us too vulnerable. It's too close to the quick. And we often move into anger as an escape from feeling the hurt.

Sometimes it's just useful in the middle of anger to reflect: Is there some hurt underneath this that I need to go back and get in touch with? I think that's one answer that's very, very close to the heart of things—that often anger is a refuge from hurt.

The other thing I'd say is that I notice for myself that even before the hurt, there's a fear that is associated with anger. And for me it has to do with the fear of not being seen. I find I get angry when somebody does something like cutting in front of me at a line or not acknowledging some piece of work I've done—I feel they haven't seen me. And in some ways, particularly with things like being cut in front of, it's as though I question for a moment whether I'm there or not. Have I just become invisible? Couldn't they see I was standing in that line?

I think there's something very real in that fear of not existing. Because, you know, in a way, we don't exist. We don't exist in the way that we take ourselves to—as a solid, separate individual. There is a body. That's true. But when you look within the whole mind-body process for something solid, there isn't anything there.

There's just the flow of changing phenomena—thoughts and feelings and sensations. So I think in some way we all know that this breeds insecurity. We don't really have any solid core to hold onto as a human being. That's the way it is for us as human beings. And so this not being seen reignites that kind of existential fear of not being.

Anyway, that's something I tap into and that I get in touch with when I feel that I've been overlooked. That's also another seed for me of anger. So it's useful to tap in with those to know that anger is not always the bottom line, that sometimes it's a reaction to something else.

When the anger comes, normally I find that it starts as quite a swirl. And a couple people mentioned tonight delusion, confusion, losing our sense of ourselves in their experience of anger. And it's important to recognize that there's often a real confused quality in the experience of anger.

I'd like to break that down a little bit. Because I think that there are—what's confusing is that there are several things going on in anger on a few different levels. And we get confused because we aren't clear in our intention which one we're going to relate to first and which one we should relate to first.

So just in the discussion tonight, people reported body sensations of constriction, of tightness in the chest, the throat, the hands, the gut. Those are certainly there. People reported emotions of a feeling of wanting to attack or aggressiveness. People reported lots of different thoughts coming in, running through the mind—she did this and they said this to me, and then what am I going to say to them next time I see them? So there are these three levels of the sensations, the feeling, and the thoughts that are all going on at the same time.

If we can develop a real interest in this whole phenomenon and realize that this play of anger is just a part of human nature, then maybe we can start to look at it with the eye of a naturalist and really want to understand how it works. Because once we understand its mechanism, it takes a lot of the power out of anger.

Nisargadatta Maharaj, this great Indian teacher, said, "Of what we understand, we are the masters. Of what we do not understand, we are the slaves." So if we can bring that kind of understanding into anger, we can find some clarity and find our own power within it.

What I'd like to talk about are what I see as three phases that we get into with anger. These are the phases, first, that we run over and over the original incident—as to why they did that and what could they possibly have been thinking of and they shouldn't have done that and I was right and they were wrong. We run over the original incident again and again.

The second thing is we've got a very intense experience going on in the mind and body. It's intense emotionally. It's intense physically. And we need to relate to that in a very direct way.

And then the third thing that's going on is we have to figure out what in the world we're going to say to that person the next time we meet them.

So we run back and forth between these three phases of the incident—the past, the present, and the future of the whole chain of anger. And what I think is really important to do is to look at each of these three times separately. Because they each need to be related to in a different way.

The first thing we do typically, if we're not coming from a very conscious place, is to say, "That person made me angry." And we assign all the responsibility for our anger to their action. And I wonder if that's really an honest and accurate appraisal. I wonder if it's really accurate to say, "They made me angry." We certainly tell ourselves that. We're often very fond of telling the other person that. But I wonder if it's really true.

Just to cast a little question: in remembering a time when—as you looked back on the meditation tonight—an incident that made you angry, let me ask, was there ever a time that somebody did a similar thing and you didn't get angry? Can you ever remember a time that something like that happened and you didn't get angry?

If it doesn't work for that particular incident, maybe on your way home, think about another incident where you reacted with anger and you blamed the other person and see if in that case there was another incident where you didn't get angry.

I think that probably all of us, if we look at it, can see that sometimes we get angry and sometimes we don't. Sometimes we're feeling very spacious and contented and happy and mellow. And we can just see—we may see really clearly—oh, that person did something inconsiderate. They were rude. They were thoughtless. They may even have been cruel. But I don't have to get angry because of it. I don't have to take up anger because of what they did.

So I think it's really important to question that assertion that the other person made me angry and see if perhaps that action, unskillful though it may have been, thoughtless, impolite, inconsiderate, is not the sole cause of my anger. That was a contributing factor, but my own state of heart and mind is another contributing factor. And if we start to see in that way, maybe we can find that we have some freedom in relation to anger.

Maybe we can find that somebody can do something thoughtless. It's not to deny that people do thoughtless things to us, but that there might be another response possible, another response available to us than anger.

The Tibetans say that if we want to walk on this earth, there are lots of sharp points —thorns, rocks, gravel, bees. We have two possibilities of walking on this earth without getting hurt: We can cover the whole earth with shoe leather, or we can put shoes on our own two feet.

The stance of expecting that the rest of the world is going to become perfect so that I'm not irritated is like trying to put shoe leather on the earth. But if we find a way in our practice to deal with our own anger, to accommodate our own responsive anger and to take responsibility, that's a way of putting shoe leather on our own two feet and has a much better long-term prospect for success.

So one of the things I would distinguish between is the unskillful action that someone else has done and our response to it. And see that those two aren't necessarily so tightly coupled.

I'll give you an example of the extreme of the Buddha's teachings in this area. This is from a sutta called The Simile of the Saw. The Buddha said, "Even if bandits were to meet you on the road, hold you down, and sever you limb by limb with a two-handled saw, one who gave rise to a heart of hatred towards them would not be carrying out my teaching. Now this is how you should train yourself: We shall abide compassionate for their welfare, with a mind imbued with loving-kindness, abundant, exalted, without hostility or ill will, extending over the all-encompassing world."

This is serious practice. And it's not to say that we're going to be there. But you can imagine in the situation where Jesus was being nailed on the cross, that Jesus might have had that kind of attitude to the men who were driving the nails into his hands and legs: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." That is a possibility within our human potential.

Ajahn Jumnian, who is coming here in July—a Thai teacher who's a lot of fun—said the last time he was here, "I haven't had anger for 25 years." That's a wonderful testament to his practice. He's done a lot of metta practice.

So phase one relates to the source of the incident: Can we decouple the person's action from our response of anger?

Phase two concerns the present: How do we relate to the experience of anger in the here and now? We want to get in touch with how it feels in the body and take those body sensations, unpleasant as they are. Everyone who talked described senses of constriction, tension, stiffness, tightness, closing, contracting. This is not a pleasant state of mind. But take those sensations themselves for the focus of the meditation. Go right into that feeling.

If you're getting angry in your daily life situation—at work, with your partner, with your children, wherever it happens—see if you can just take a minute's breather and go right into those very sensations. Ground the awareness in the body. This is the very best place to ground the attention in daily life mindfulness practice. Connect directly with those sensations. See if you can bring that sense of open, accepting, allowing softness into the meditation at that point. If we can open to those feelings, then they stand the possibility of flowing through, of passing through.

Get in touch with what that tone is in the mind. What's the feeling of anger as a mental state, as a mood? Somebody mentioned a fiery kind of quality. There's a sort of burning that goes along with anger.

And then, what is the impact on our thinking? There's a certain kind of thought that tends to come up with anger. Somebody mentioned earlier feeling righteous. Don't we think thoughts about how they were wrong and I was right? The more we think those thoughts, they're actually quite addictive, aren't they? People mentioned also—and I really appreciated this—it's fun to be angry. So really, if you really want to be free of anger, start to tune into how enjoyable it is to be right. Because that's what sustains our anger.

When we put those thoughts of blaming the other and making ourselves right, we add that to the anger, and each thought is like a log that we toss on the fire. Want to stoke the burning? Keep fueling it. Think more about them being wrong and me being right. So that increases the burning, it increases the pain, it increases the conflagration. The more we keep thinking, the more we burn and the more we suffer.

In that state of anger, we may want to hurt the other person, but take a close look. Who's suffering in the moment?

We are, because the state of anger is a painful state. It's a state of contraction, of suffering, and we're suffering with it. So we start to realize that we're actually caught in a bind. We enjoy the pleasure of being right and making the other person wrong, but we're perpetuating our suffering at the same time. And so we start to see that we're in deep conflict with ourselves at that point.

It's only the sensing of that pain that we cause ourselves that gives us the trust or courage to let go. It's as though we've grabbed hold of a stick that's on fire and we're holding on to it for dear life—the torch of our self-righteousness. And the only thing that will make us let go of it is when we realize we're burning our own hands. Then maybe we're willing to put it down.

So it's important to be with our anger that clearly, that we can see that conflict within ourselves, that we can sense the pleasure of the anger and also sense the pain. Sensing the pain is what encourages us to let go.

Then the third thing that we need to give some reflection to is what do we say to the person when we meet them next? And this is sometimes the most difficult area. Finding skillful means to communicate about anger is really, really hard. We've run the whole gamut in our experience of not saying anything, and that didn't feel so good, of just blasting the other person with our anger, and that usually doesn't work so well.

So how do we find a way to be honest about our anger and to do it in a way that really works to create a win-win situation where we feel better after the communication and the other person does too? The Buddha's main guideline for right speech is to say what's true and what's useful. We really need to look at our communications about anger in that light.

In my experience, it's generally not so useful just to blast the other person with the full force of our anger. Number one, they can't hear it. They become defensive. They close or they get angry back. And the communication gets really deadlocked. But it's often really important to communicate that we are angry, that we feel anger, and that it had to do, at least in part, with something that they did. Sometimes it's really important for that to be said and heard.

So the art, then, is to communicate the fact of our anger in a spirit that doesn't communicate the harshness of the anger. I think I mentioned this a few weeks ago—Suzuki Roshi said that if you're angry with somebody, what you should say is, "Oh, I'm so sorry, but I'm angry with you." That's great. That's beautiful, if you can do that. But for us mere mortals... not always possible.

So we do the best we can. That's the important thing. Our good intention is what's really important in our communication with anger. If we come from a place that's as good an intention as we can bring to that moment—I want to communicate because I care about this relationship. I want to clear up something that is a barrier between us. I want to keep our relationship clean and clear and straightforward. I want to clear what's happened. I need to tell you that I feel angry about something—we communicate with as good an intention as we can bring into that moment. And that's the best that we can do.

And we trust in the practice that as time goes by, as we work with this practice of anger and become clear in ourselves, our intention will also clarify. As time goes by, we find we can bring more and more skill into that communication, more and more clarity, more and more kindness. We can actually bring the spirit of metta into the communication about anger. And that's really a transformative intention.

Again, one of the Buddha's guidelines: "One who is about to admonish another must realize within themselves five qualities before doing so. In due season will I speak, not out of season"—that is, at the right time and place. "In truth will I speak, not in falsehood. Gently will I speak, not harshly. To their profit will I speak, not to their loss. And with kindly intent will I speak, not in anger."

This again is a high standard for communication, and it's also to acknowledge we're not going to be there right away—but to realize that our intention is to move in that direction and to get more and more skillful in that kind of communication.

Okay, so that's some of the difficulties with anger. When is it useful?

When is anger useful?

In confronting injustice, anger can be a terrific motivator. It can really lend that energy of determination to take action through political channels, social action, environmental action. So very, very helpful energy, again, if we can learn to bring the spirit of metta into the actual work.

Anger is a really helpful movement coming out of oppression. Whether one has been oppressed because of social conditions such as racism or sexism, or personal conditions such as an oppressive relationship, or whether the oppression is internal, coming out of one's own tendencies toward fear and depression, anger is a very useful breaking through of oppression. So it's highly valuable for people who are suffering either inner or outer oppression. It's only an interim step—not to get stuck in that feeling of anger, but to realize that it's a very valuable breaking through because it breaks up that oppressive pattern.

It's probably really useful also in parenting teenagers. I haven't been a parent, but I used to teach teenagers, and I just know that sometimes one had to pump up the volume to get the attention. It just happens. One time Ram Dass asked his guru, Neem Karoli Baba, if it was ever appropriate to use anger in teaching the dharma. And Neem Karoli roared at him, "No!" Make of that what you will.

In terms of our practice, mindfulness is a great ally in dealing with anger, becoming mindful of the sensations, of the mental tone, and of thoughts. It's really our first line of alliance. But metta is also a terrific practice, the practice of loving-kindness. It's an excellent practice if you're one who is of an angry temperament, an angry or aversive or critical temperament. Metta is an excellent practice for softening that kind of personality, and I speak from experience with this.

I'll close with a quote from Milarepa, who was doing a lot of solitary practice and dealing with his demons like anger and fear and pride and so forth. He said, "After battling with these demons for many years, I developed a great heart of compassion for them. I decided to offer them my body, which I had learned by then not to cherish so very greatly. Finally, I put my head in the mouth of the demons, and when I did, they all turned into rainbows."

May all your demons turn into rainbows.

Now let me open it up if anybody has comments, anything you'd like to share, or anything you'd like to ask.

Yes, please.

[A participant asks about the expression of anger, noting that sometimes meditation feels like holding it or releasing it, and wondering about how to verbally express anger.]

Yes, the question is about the expression of anger. The comment is that sometimes she feels she has to sit with the anger for some time before actually verbalizing it. And I think actually there's a lot of wisdom in that. I think sometimes if you feel that you're in a real state of confusion with anger, sometimes the wisest thing is not to act then and there, but to actually take it home and live with it for some time. It may be a few hours, sometimes for me it's been days, until I really become clear what action I want to take to express it.

And the expression can take many forms. Sometimes it can be writing a letter. Sometimes it can be as simple as a phone call. Sometimes you really need to meet with the person and say it face to face. Sometimes, despite all our good intention, there's still quite a lot of charge that comes when we communicate the fact that we're angry, and we really have to not be judgmental about ourselves about that. Realize that we're in a learning process. We're practicing how to express it cleanly. And realize that the anger may come across as well, the force. But it's really important to express clearly at times to the other person that you're angry and that you feel that they acted in an inappropriate way.

[The participant clarifies that she's asking about expressing anger to get it out of the body.]

Ah, in expressing to get it out of the body, sometimes that can be helpful to scream or shout or stamp around or shake. Sometimes just rocking with the force of anger can be really helpful.

So if any of those approaches prove helpful for you to let the energy flow through, by all means, embrace them as part of your meditation practice. Sometimes it's not necessary with anger, but if you feel that physical expression gives you space or relief from holding too tightly, feel free to stomp around the house or shout or scream—whatever needs to happen. The purpose is to let the energy flow through and clear.

Donna offered a beautiful parallel: "It's like when you feel deep pain and hurt and let yourself cry—just letting it move through you instead of holding on to it or trying to make yourself big enough to contain it."

Marshall shared an insightful observation about using anger to intimidate, particularly when avoiding something another person is saying or bringing to his attention. "I use it to intimidate," he said, "and it's always to cover up a hurt." This reveals how anger sometimes serves as our best defense—a good offense protecting us from a sense of vulnerability.

Chris raised an important concern about physical expression potentially deepening grooves of anger rather than creating space around it. He had observed people in workshops who beat pillows and engaged in similar practices, only to find their anger patterns seemingly reinforced rather than released.

This touches on a crucial understanding. I don't believe that purely physical expression—pounding pillows, stomping, or shouting—is what ultimately frees us from anger. While these practices can serve as skillful means to let energy move through, what truly liberates us is that movement of heart that opens to the anger itself.

If we regard expression merely as another technique to eliminate anger, it won't lead to genuine freedom. Approaching it as just another method to "get rid of" our emotions misses the deeper point. What actually frees us is understanding anger so completely, developing such a spacious and accommodating quality of mind, that we simply allow anger to arise and pass away naturally, as all emotions do.

Within Western psychology, we often trap ourselves between two alternatives: repression or expression. We feel we must either hold emotions down or let them out—these seem like our only choices. The meditative path offers a middle way between repressing and expressing. It allows us to contact emotion directly with awareness and mindfulness.

Ultimately, it's this contact between emotion and clear seeing that liberates. This is what allows emotion to reveal its inherent impermanence. All emotions naturally want to dissolve and pass away. We simply need to offer them full, undistorted attention. Nothing can cling in the light of complete mindfulness. When we bring that quality of awareness to bear, emotion naturally dissolves back into the emptiness from which it arose.

This is the heart of the meditative approach to anger. Physical expression can be helpful if it opens up the energy, making it easier to bring clear mindfulness to what we're experiencing. But the real transformation happens through that direct, intimate contact with whatever arises in consciousness.

Barbara shared another layer of complexity: during a period of great sorrow in her life, she found it much easier to be angry than to cry. This speaks to how emotions can mask one another, how sometimes we unconsciously choose the more familiar or seemingly manageable feeling over what lies beneath.

Yes, that element of shock and disbelief is quite common. It can indeed shut down our thinking processes and leave us operating from pure reactivity. Often that reaction of shock or disbelief does come in and then plunges us into a state of confusion. I think it is very helpful to take a breather before responding, if you have the luxury to do that, and kind of let some of those cycles move through. It's usually not that easy to bring clarity into the first few minutes—sometimes the first few hours—of anger. But if you have the ability to just step back a bit and get in touch with your own feelings and what's going on, then often it's easier to respond later.

One thing about that element of shock and disbelief that I often reflect on is how closely anger can be linked with humor. Because anger comes about because somebody's doing something that's not appropriate, and humor comes about because somebody's doing something that's incongruous or not appropriate. And if you can ever look at an angry situation and see the incongruity in a funny way, it's tremendously powerful for defusing the situation.

Kelly?

"I found that metta practice is very useful in terms of lowering my level of anger. But the way you describe this meditation—that all emotions want to pass—don't you find that metta, loving-kindness, is one that doesn't pass? It seems to not pass. It seems to build."

Well, that's beautiful. The comment was that most emotions seem to pass, but metta seems to build. I think looked over a long period of time, metta does build if we practice it. But if you look at closer periods of time, I think you'll see that metta has its cycles like all the other emotions. There will be times when it's strong in the day, and then there will be times when it's weak. Some days it'll be strong, and some days it'll be weak. So I think metta does have the property of coming and going like all the emotions do, but we do strengthen it over practice.

But there's one other thing I'll say. Someone who is very clear and well-developed, like for instance the Dalai Lama, seems to have an almost perpetual metta presence about them. The way that I understand this is that metta is actually part of our deepest nature. To me, the two fundamental aspects of this true nature, which we talked about last week, are wisdom and love—or sometimes it's called intelligence and compassion. I think that's part of the deepest aspect of us as human beings. I think it's part of that in us which is indestructible.

So the more the other stuff gets cleared out and that light shines, that light doesn't have comings and goings. It's indestructible, and the coming and going is not part of its property. What tends to happen is that clouds drift over and obscure the wisdom and love. So we experience metta coming and going because the clouds are still drifting in front of us.

But I think you're right that for somebody who is very, very clear, metta can be an almost constant companion because it's part of our deepest nature.

When we have cleared away the obscurations—those clouds of confusion, fear, and reactivity that drift across the sky of consciousness—what remains is this fundamental goodness. The love and wisdom that constitute our true nature are not things we have to manufacture or create. They are what we discover when we stop covering them up.

This is why the practice of loving-kindness is not about forcing ourselves to feel something artificial or imposed from outside. Rather, it's about removing the barriers that prevent our natural love from flowing freely. It's about recognizing what has always been there, waiting to be uncovered.

For those who have done the deep work of clearing away these obscurations, metta becomes less of a practice and more of a way of being. It arises naturally from the space of clarity and openness that has been revealed. This doesn't mean such practitioners never experience difficulty or challenge, but rather that their fundamental orientation remains rooted in love and wisdom.

This understanding can be both inspiring and relieving for us as practitioners. We don't have to create love; we simply need to discover it. We don't have to become someone else; we need to uncover who we truly are. The path of dharma is ultimately a path of revelation—revealing the light that has never actually been extinguished, only temporarily obscured.

CHAPTER 204

Relating Wisely With Fear

Guy Armstrong · 53 min

In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines fear as one of our deepest psychological conditionings and offers practical guidance for relating to it with wisdom. He explores how fear always connects to thoughts about the future, creating unnecessary suffering through our mental projections - what he calls "drawing pictures of tigers" that frighten us. Armstrong discusses the intimate relationship between fear and clinging (upādāna), noting how our attempts to find security in impermanent things perpetuate the very fear we seek to escape.

The talk offers two complementary approaches to working with fear: the traditional Vipassana method of gentle acceptance and mindful observation of fear's three components (bodily sensations, emotional tone, and thought patterns), and a more direct "warrior" approach that involves courageously confronting fear when gentleness alone proves insufficient. Drawing from forest monastery traditions where monks meditated in charnel grounds and near tigers, Armstrong emphasizes that avoiding fear only strengthens its conditioning.

Throughout, he weaves together insights from Buddhist psychology with practical meditation guidance, showing how fear blocks our natural capacity for love and openness. The talk concludes with Chögyam Trungpa's teaching that true fearlessness comes not from the absence of fear, but from the willingness to open our hearts completely to our experience, developing what Armstrong calls "bravery mind" - the courage to be present with whatever arises.

I'd like to talk this evening about discovering a wise relationship to fear.

To start, I'd just like to ask each of us to reflect for a moment on whether there's ever been a time in our life as adults when we felt free of the influence of fear for a short period of time. And what did that feel like?

Blissful. Free. Spacious. Serene. Natural. Sleep.

This last response reminds me of a statement I heard from Manindraji, one of Joseph Goldstein's first teachers, who said that sleep is the ordinary person's greatest pleasure—perhaps because of that freedom from fear.

There's a wonderful quality in our life in the absence of fear, a really delightful quality. I think this serves to show by contrast the sort of shadow that exists in our life when fear is present—how fear casts a cloud of darkness over our being, over our mind, over our life, over ourselves, even when many of our fears are really unnecessary or unfounded.

We react to the whole range of fears. We react to really little fears: Do I have enough gas to get home? Is there Häagen-Dazs still left in the freezer? How can I do this seminar when I have a run in my stocking?

Then there are the middling levels of fear—things like the fear of public speaking. Someone took a poll a few years ago and found that the fear of speaking in public was actually the number one fear among Americans surveyed. The number one fear in this country was fear of speaking in public, while fear of death was somewhere down on the list like number four. Personally, I'd rather be here tonight.

There are the fears that come up around job interviews—ever feel your stomach turn to jelly before going for a job you really want? Or fear of confrontation with a co-worker or manager?

And then there are the really big fears, the significant fears we confront in our life: the fear of serious illness, the fear of loneliness, the fear of death—our own or of those we love. One of the greatest fears adults have is probably the fear of harm to their children.

Fear is one of our deepest psychological conditionings, such a strong force for most of us. When it's present, not only does it cast this dark, oppressive cloud, but it brings about a contraction we feel in the body and mind that blocks our unfolding. When Jesus talked about not hiding your light under a basket, the basket most of us hide our lights under is the basket of fear. Fear keeps us constrained and small and doesn't allow our inner beauty to come out and flower.

That flowering begins to take place as fear lifts, as this contraction starts to unfold for each of us. It's really the pathway to love.

Gerald Jampolsky is a teacher and healer many of you probably know. He created the Center for Attitudinal Healing, and much of his work was inspired by A Course in Miracles. He wrote a book that was his interpretation of A Course in Miracles, titled very suggestively Love is Letting Go of Fear. There's a deep truth in that. When the cloud of fear lifts from our being, we find ourselves automatically in the state of love. It's not like we have to get rid of fear and then find love. Love is the natural state when the mind is not clouded by fear.

This is really a key to our opening, a key to spiritual unfolding—being able to work with fear.

Fear is also closely tied to other root emotions. We talked last week about working with anger, how sometimes underlying anger can be the fear that I don't exist. When you don't acknowledge my existence, I start to become afraid that maybe I'm not visible in this world, maybe I don't exist. That seed of fear triggers aggression and hatred and acts of unkindness, war, and revenge.

Fear is also closely related to desire. If you look at the way our minds move and what disturbs our peacefulness, typically the mind swings between two poles: wanting what we like and not wanting what we don't like. One movement we call desire, the other we call fear. They're really closely tied.

And you'll notice that any time you really want something very much, very badly, if you look underneath, there's a fear of not getting it. So fear always accompanies wanting. And at the same time, if you look at why we want a lot of the stuff that we do, it's based on insecurity. And this is really a key in looking at fear.

We really have to acknowledge that as human beings, the situation of our lives is uncertain. Nobody is guaranteed security on this earth. Any of us could die as we drive out of Spirit Rock tonight. Any of us could wake up in the morning feeling ill and find that we are in touch with the beginning of an illness that will take us directly to our death. That can happen to any of us at any moment, young or old. And so for us as human beings, life is inherently uncertain. That is a fact. That's the truth.

Recognizing this inherent uncertainty, we tend to look around the world for something to make us feel safe, something to bring that security back. And so we tend to latch on very early on to our parents, later on to friends, partners, and significant others. We tend to find our security with possessions, with money, with status, with a job title. We tend to find some security in a self-image that we believe ourselves to be a certain way and that that lasts over time and seems to give us something to fall back on. We find security in views and opinions: "I believe the world is like this. I don't believe the world is like that." And to each of those areas we cling to some extent.

One of our greatest forms of clinging is to the body itself. As long as the body is somewhat healthy and reliable, we feel safe. And yet that can be jeopardized in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye.

So in coming to understand fear, we need to look into the nature of clinging and the effect of clinging. If I'm afraid, if I feel my vulnerability in this world and out of fear I pick up something that makes me feel secure, what happens as long as I hold on to that thing? Look what we're perpetuating. As long as I'm holding on to something, on some level I know that that thing I'm holding on to is itself precarious—whether it be another person or possessions or a big bank account or whatever. Anything that we hold on to is also subject to impermanence.

And so somehow we know that this thing can pass away. And so in holding on, we are afraid to lose this because if we lose it, we think the fear will return. So as long as we hold on, there's actually a fear involved even in clinging. Because on some level we know that this can pass. So in holding on, in the very act of holding to something for security, we're also perpetuating fear. So it doesn't turn out to be the satisfying answer. It doesn't turn out to be a final answer either. So fear and clinging really go together. They're intimately connected.

And one of the useful things about fear is that whenever we feel fear, we can use it as a pointer and say, "Well, what is being held to?" And we're all holding in many different ways. Actually, as long as there's a sense of a separate self, there is some clinging going on. The sense of separate self, or the sense of I, or ego in Buddhist terms, is formed by holding. These two are virtually synonymous in Buddhist thought—the sense of I and the sense of holding. So as long as there is a sense of I, on some level there is holding and the operation of fear.

And the only freedom, final freedom from fear, comes with letting go of this sense of a separate self, realizing our deep, deep connection to the whole universe.

The Buddha put this very succinctly when he said that wherever there is clinging, there is trembling in the mind. And this image of trembling or wavering is one that he used over and over again to pinpoint the location of fear. Ah, in one who is holding, the mind is not steady. The mind is shaky. There's trembling.

So one of the things we want to come to understand with fear are the mechanics of it. How is it triggered? How does it really operate? One of the things that we noticed in doing the short guided meditation this evening on fear is that fear is always connected to some thought about the future. And it's important to see the arising of the thought and then the emotion that trails in its wake, as it were. There's some thought about the future that we don't like and then fear comes, that emotion of fear.

This has been compared in the Zen tradition to an artist who draws a painting of a tiger, a very lifelike painting of a tiger, and when he's done drawing it, he steps back and looks at it, and he becomes frightened. And that's what we do in our minds all the time.

We draw these pictures of tigers, and then we react - how scary! That's why Mark Twain observed that "the worst things in my life never happened." Krishnamurti, this great Indian philosopher, put it very succinctly when he said that thought breeds fear. Thought breeds fear.

This is a profound pointer because what it means is that life is not inherently frightening. Life is not frightening. Life may be uncertain. It may be unpredictable. There may be an element of the unknown or an insecurity inherent in existence, but it doesn't mean that we have to relate to it with fear. Fear is the product of thought projecting into the future a fantasy of its own making, of its own creation.

So we can learn through our meditation practice to start relating wisely to this projective quality of mind. Our mind has incredible projective strength. We actually, when we start to look closely, project out of our thoughts and imaginings the whole structure of the world. And that includes the structure of what we take to be myself. It's all a fabrication of our concepts.

In meditation, more and more we can let go of that unnecessary addition and just rest directly with the bare experience of the present moment. And that is a pathway to freedom - just resting with the natural state of things as they are in this moment without introducing past and future. Then fear doesn't find a foothold and we're simply at ease just as things are unfolding here and now.

So how can we work to start relating wisely with fear? Well, the first thing to say is that it's our tendency to want to avoid situations that bring fear up. We don't like the experience of fear. And so in our lives, we tend to weave a path through life so that this emotion doesn't arise very often. For the most part, if we could live our lives and have it never arise again, that would really be ideal for most of us.

Fortunately, it doesn't work that way. It can't work that way. If we just keep avoiding difficult situations that bring up fear, actually we only strengthen its conditioning. It strengthens that groove in the mind that says fear is really something to be avoided. But actually it's not - it's just a paper tiger. And we need to come to terms with that paper tiger through our practice. If we take the risk to start exploring fear, then we may find a way to go beyond it.

This is a time-honored tradition in Buddhist practice, this experience of confronting fear. From the very early days of the Buddhist teachings, the Buddha would often direct his nuns and monks to go do their practice in the charnel grounds - in places where bodies had just been left out in the open for animals to feed off of them, for birds to peck them for sustenance. And it was considered a very great place to meditate because it would bring up fear for people. It brings up the fear of our own mortality when we see other bodies decaying. Great meditation practice.

Ajahn Chah's teacher was a very fierce monk in the forest, a teacher named Ajahn Mun. Ajahn Chah, for those of you who don't know, was Jack Kornfield's first teacher in Thailand. He passed away a number of years ago. But his teacher was Ajahn Mun, who was born in the early part of the 1900s and was a forest monk, very ascetic.

When Ajahn Mun's monks or nuns had malaria - which is a dreadful disease; if you've ever had malaria, you get wracked with this fever that's over 100 degrees, chills and shaking, extremely unpleasant, all you want to do is curl up and wait till it passes - Ajahn Mun would make his monks and nuns meditate a full schedule during the day, even with malaria. "It's just sensation. Don't worry. Keep sitting." He was very fierce.

One of the things that he loved to encourage, particularly his monks to do, was to go sit out in the forest where they could hear the sounds of tigers roaring. In the early part of this century in Thailand, that was not hard to find. You go out in the forest, sit down for a while, and you could hear tigers roaring. And the closer, the better. So this was serious advice. He would make people sit out where there were tigers nearby and meditate all night long, just sitting out in the forest. And that brought the fear right to the surface.

None of this five-minute imagining of some visualized situation. So this direct confrontation with fear, even though it's the last thing we want to experience, is actually a blessing in our practice. Because as we start to understand fear and relate to it directly with wisdom, there's the possibility of going beyond it—the possibility of not being so limited by fear.

So in our meditation practice, we really want to open to this experience, not to brush it aside and say, "Oh, that's just anxiety, let me get back to a place of calmness," but really to take the opportunity to see: "Oh, anxiety. Oh, nervousness. Oh, fear, trembling, panic. Let me taste this. Let me see what this is like."

So we start to explore how it feels in the body. For each of us the sensations may be a little bit different—we all have our individual physical reaction to fear—but we begin by becoming familiar with our own experience. What is it in my experience? Where do I feel this fear in the body?

As several of you commented earlier, it can be in many places. You can feel a tightening in the neck, constriction around the heart, tightness in the abdomen, maybe sweating under the arms. What I find sometimes with fear is that I get a sense of flutteriness all over my body. My body becomes very light. It's as though a breeze could blow me away because it's become so soft and shaky.

Are there any of those sensations that you can't tolerate? Look closely at those sensations and see if you can just accept them and meet them just as they are.

Then we look into the feeling tone in the mind. And again, as several of you commented, there's this sense of wanting to escape, wanting to flee, a panic sense of being trapped. I think that kind of characterizes for me the sense of fear—that I just want to move away. It's a sense of wanting to move away from something. If we look closely at what we want to move away from, sometimes it's just fear itself. We become afraid of fear itself, and that's what we want to flee.

So just noting that sort of tone in the mind. Can we tolerate that? Can we bear that emotion of feeling like we want to run away, feeling like we want to flee?

And finally, the influence of thoughts. Noticing—and this is a really important insight—that fear is always related to thoughts of the future. Because what that says is the present isn't so bad. It's not the present that we're really concerned about. It's not this moment. It's the next moment. What might come after this?

So if we can just take our pointer from that: don't worry so much about the future. Come back to the refuge of the present moment. Then that's where we can find some sense of ease, some sense of rest.

So these are the three components, again, as we looked at with anger, that we want to become familiar with: the sensations in the body, the mental tone or emotion, and the influence of thoughts. And of course, the more thoughts about the future we think that are difficult, the greater the stimulation of the fear is likely to be. So the fear breeds the thoughts, and the thoughts in turn react to create greater fear.

The comment was that fear may be related to the past. And I think that's very true. Often our sense of the future is connected with the past. And particularly if there's been a trauma in the past, it may have left a sense of fear. So there are actually two issues here. It's a good point.

If there's been trauma in the past—let's take the case of a young child who's undergoing physical abuse as an example of severe trauma—the child is fearful in that state, perhaps, of being killed. And so the emotion of fear gets locked in at that moment because the child doesn't know how to relate to the fear with wisdom. It gets locked into the body through the contraction of fear, and we experience it as adults once we start to open to our body sensations, to our memories, to our thoughts and so forth. So there can be a residue of fear that's come from the past.

But the nature of fear itself, whether it's what the child felt at that time or what we imagine as adults, is related to a fear of what's going to happen—the fear that if this abuse continues, I'll be killed. Sometimes we take the past and project it into the future: "Oh, I was rejected by my parents in the past. Therefore, I'm not lovable. I will be rejected again."

So often the past leads through the present into the future. But this is something worthwhile to investigate. See that relationship of the future with fear.

So we look at all these components and we ask, can I be with the bare experience of fear? Because mostly what happens when fear arises, we feel more afraid. We don't want to experience the fear directly, but we lock into a feedback loop with fear. The first wave of fear makes us more afraid, and the fear amplifies, and we search for some escape. And so we never come to understand the experience of fear as it is.

And it's the experience and acceptance of fear as it is just in this moment that is freeing. Because we start to see, I can tolerate these body sensations. I can tolerate this panicky sense of being trapped or wanting to flee. I can tolerate these thoughts, these imageries about the future. I can tolerate all of that.

So in our meditation practice, we don't try to get rid of the fear. We don't try to push it away or suppress it. We open to it and see if we can really accept it. And if we can really open to the fear and accept it, what we've done is we've made our home, we've found our refuge again in the present moment. And there is an ease and a sense of safety in that.

So in a sense, what's required at this point is that we take our focus off the future. To some extent, we have to be willing a little bit not to be so concerned about what might happen tomorrow in my job interview. We need to be more interested in what's happening right now. And how can I relate to this moment of my experience with wisdom and discover my freedom in relation to this moment, just as it is, this moment of fear?

It's a little bit like that statement of FDR's, "We have nothing to fear but fear itself." I'd give him about 70% from a Dharma perspective on that. But it's a pointer anyway. For a politician, it's a pretty good Dharma talk.

So actually having fear come up in our meditation practice or any time in our life when we can give our full attention to it is actually a blessing. Because it's only through this intimate contact with fear that we can start to understand it. In understanding it, we can open to it and accept it. And in accepting it, fear starts to lose its power. We no longer have to stop doing things because we think we're going to feel fear when we do them.

You know, when you think about trying to meet somebody new or asking a new person to do something with you and there's this momentary hesitation of fear, how much of it is because we don't want to go through the anxiety or the discomfort that that action brings up in us? A real space of freedom and spaciousness opens when we're willing to experience the fear around our actions. We can go ahead. So what if I feel afraid or nervous doing that? I can handle that. I know this guy fear. I've accommodated it. I've understood it. I can let it be there and I don't need to let it change my actions.

So in accommodating fear, we actually create a lot of space around it. And it no longer has such a power to dominate and control and rule our lives in that way. And with that spaciousness, we can act more from clarity. One of the worst things about fear is we're such fools when we act from fear. We do such stupid things, all of us—me included—when we're afraid. You know, we snap at people, we get defensive, we project onto people. Developing through meditation some spaciousness around fear, we can let the fear be there and not be so shaken by it and act somewhat from clarity, somewhat from wisdom.

So you'll notice sort of a common theme in relating to fear as in relating to anger, as we talked about last week. And the guidelines for both of them really are to embrace the feeling and guard the action. Really open fully to the feeling, whether it be anger or fear. Let yourself feel it directly. And take some care with how you act. Because if you act directly out of just a reactive state, being controlled by the emotion, to some degree you'll be strengthening its conditioning. The more awareness you can bring into your actions, even while you're feeling the feeling, the more you'll decondition the arising of that emotion. And that's another step toward greater freedom from it.

There's another approach with fear that I want to mention. I'm always a little reluctant to go into it because it's a really different approach than our sort of usual Vipassana—you know, be spacious, be accepting, open up, be gentle. And this approach with fear involves quite a lot of firmness.

And I think we've all had the experience where fear arises and our immediate impulse is to do something to escape it. Get up and walk around, or distract ourselves, or somehow avoid it. But he was taking the stance that, no, I'm going to sit right here with this until it's finished. I'm not going to be moved by it.

There's a wonderful story from Tibet about a woman named Machig Labdron, who was a great Tibetan yogini. She was practicing in a cave, and she was visited by demons—terrifying apparitions that would appear to her during her meditation. And her initial response was the traditional one: she tried to get rid of them, to push them away, to protect herself from them.

But eventually she realized that this approach wasn't working. So she changed her strategy completely. When the demons appeared, instead of trying to get rid of them, she would say, "I see you. I know what you are. You are my own fear. And I'm not going anywhere. If you want to stay, fine. If you want to go, fine. But I'm staying right here."

And she took it even further. She said to them, "In fact, not only am I going to stay here with you, but I'm going to feed you. I offer you my flesh, I offer you my blood, I offer you everything I am." And when she took that stance—when she completely stopped fighting the fear and instead offered herself to it—the demons disappeared.

This is the same kind of warrior energy that sometimes we need to call up in relationship to fear. It's the energy that says, "I'm done being pushed around by this. I'm done being controlled by this. I don't care what you do to me, I'm staying put."

But this approach requires some discernment. It's not appropriate in every situation. If you're new to meditation practice, if you're not well-grounded in mindfulness, this kind of confrontational approach with fear might not be skillful. It could be overwhelming.

But if you've been practicing for a while, if you have a good foundation of mindfulness and concentration, and you find yourself in a situation where fear just seems to have gotten a stranglehold on you—where the gentle, accepting approach just isn't making any headway—then sometimes this warrior approach can be exactly what's needed.

The key is to bring that energy not from a place of hatred or aversion toward the fear, but from a place of, "I refuse to be diminished by this. I refuse to let this limit my life or my practice."

It's like saying to fear, "You know what? You've been the host long enough. Now I'm reclaiming my seat."

Of course, you have to remember this is the same man who vowed that he would die under the Bodhi tree if he didn't get enlightened. So there was extraordinary courage there to begin with.

There's a wonderful story of a modern encounter with a Japanese Zen teacher written by Lawrence Sheinberg. He recently published a book called Ambivalent Zen, which tells about his studentship under a Japanese Zen teacher in New York City. An excerpt appeared in The Sun magazine last month, and the book is also available online.

This Zen teacher is wonderfully innocent and idiosyncratic, as many Zen teachers are. He has his own approach to the English language, which is often charming. Lawrence would often begin sentences to his teacher with phrases like "I'm worried that..." or "I'm afraid that..." And this was his teacher's response one time:

"I said, Larry-san, why are you always afraid? Forty-five years old, talk like baby. What do you think? Zen about quiet mind? Relaxation? No, no. Zen about bravery. Zazen mind, bravery mind. Must bravery, Larry-san. Must sincere. Must bravery."

That's good advice for all of us: Must bravery.

Sasaki Roshi is another great Zen master—I think I've mentioned him before. He's in the Rinzai tradition of Zen, which is the fierce, warrior-like Zen tradition. He wrote in a book once about his retreats where you meet with him for interviews four times a day. You're supposed to answer these koans, which are very puzzling and stumping. He said he felt like a fool meeting with him every time—he didn't want to go. But Sasaki Roshi would say, "Don't be cowardly. When you come for an interview with me, prepare to kill or be killed."

So, bravery mind. Vipassana teacher interviews are not like that—that's how I survived in this practice!

Let me close with a statement from Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche in a lovely little book called Shambhala about working with fear and working with fearlessness. Sometimes we think that fearlessness is the opposite of fear—that fearlessness comes when fear has gone away. But Trungpa says it's not like that. He says fearlessness is really the state of being able to be open to our fear.

"True fearlessness is not the reduction of fear, but going beyond fear. When we relax with our fear, we find sadness, which is calm and gentle. This sadness comes because your heart is completely exposed. There is no skin or tissue covering it. It is pure, raw meat. Real fearlessness is the product of tenderness. It comes from letting the world tickle your heart, your raw and beautiful heart. You are willing to open up without any resistance or shyness and face the world. You are willing to share your heart with others."

So we have a few minutes left. If anyone has any comments about fear, anything you'd like to share, any questions, anything you'd like to talk about, please feel free.

"Two different things. One is sometimes I'm not sure if it's fear or excitement. The other situation is sometimes the body sensation and the fear is telling me I have to move away from the situation, and it's the correct decision to make."

Good point. So how do you know those things? Yes, good questions.

The first comment is that sometimes fear is very close to excitement. I think that's true—sometimes something that's about to happen evokes mixed feelings, and the mind goes back and forth between success and failure. "Oh, is this going to be great, or am I going to fall on my face?" Sometimes we have both reactions to the same situation.

It's interesting to start looking at excitement from a meditative frame of mind. When you really encompass either fear or excitement with a very spacious meditative mind, you see that both are just energy. The way the energy gets colored has much to do with our thoughts or beliefs. When we can relate to it just on the level of energy, it takes away much of the added charge. Again, it returns us to a sense of freedom. So yes, they are really close at times.

The second comment—sometimes it's absolutely true that situations are not safe and we need to respect that feeling. Sometimes fear is a good pointer that we need to move away, and that's wisdom. That's really seeing what's skillful in a certain situation.

The encouragement to confront our fear isn't an encouragement to put ourselves in situations where our life is actually in jeopardy or something really unfortunate might happen to us or those we care about. We really want to use discriminating wisdom to know when to move away.

I think there's no rule of thumb to tell when to avoid situations and when to stay present. We have to make an appraisal of the seriousness of the threat. You don't want to walk in certain parts of New York City after dark alone—that's just reasonable precaution. But you also don't want to avoid things that would be wholesome in your life because of fear. We have to find that balance. I don't think there's a formula.

Another point about recalling fear—about ninety-eight percent of the fears I've had have been apprehension about things I thought were going to happen, and very few have turned out to be what I thought they would be. When you try to recall something you were afraid of in the past, you know what it was. Unless it really was fearsome, by that time it's academic. It's not like anger, which you can remember forever.

This is true. In my experience, the twenties and thirties were times of much more anxiety than my forties have been. When I look back to all the fluctuations my mind went through in my twenties and thirties, I think, "What was the point of all that?" Everything turned out fine, but when we're younger we don't know it's going to have a happy ending.

If you want to cultivate fear for practice purposes, it may be necessary to think about things that have yet to happen. Sometimes I say with meditations like this, it's like those TV commercials: "Filmed on a closed course with professional drivers—don't try this at home." These meditations on fear and anger aren't meant to be done at home very often. It's just to get in touch with the sensation.

I was wondering about the whole notion of avoidance. In the past when I've experienced a fearful situation, I realize I'm feeling fearful. Then the fear is so unpalatable that I force myself through it and do what I need to do. In a way, it's avoiding—I mean, it's going through the fear, but afterward I feel good. Really, it's almost like I just don't want the fear because it's so unpalatable that I push through it. I'm not sure if that's avoiding it. In a way it is, because I don't want to deal with it, so I just go through it.

The comment was that sometimes fear arises, the experience is so unpalatable, and we act really quickly to get to the other side, to complete the situation, to get through the fear. And I think that happens all the time in the world. Something comes up that we have to do, it doesn't feel comfortable, we sort of plow ahead and we do find ways to kind of block out the experience of fear by focusing on what has to be done. And it serves to get us through the situation in the world.

But I think it is a kind of avoidance of the fear itself. Sometimes in the world we just have to do that. Sometimes if you have to make a sales presentation to 500 people and your manager is sitting at the front table keeping an eye on how you're doing the presentation, it can bring up nervousness, but you've just got to perform at that point. So there are times when you just have to go ahead and do that.

But if you have the luxury to be still and be with yourself for a while, the more attention you can give to that bare experience of fear, the more palatable the experience becomes. And that's really what starts to decondition the fear response. If we can be okay with feeling the fear, it really starts to lose a lot of its charge. Fear becomes not such a big deal.

And to tell you the truth, the aim in our meditation practice is to develop a degree of spaciousness and a degree of equanimity that fear can arise and be present and we literally don't care whether it's there or not. That's the degree of equanimity that we want to find through our meditation practice. And it's not to say that we can find that in every situation then for the rest of our lives, but we want to know that that's possible. We want to know, and usually it's through our meditation practice or through an experience where we feel pretty strong and centered, that fear can be there and we really don't care. It's fine for it to be there. Just as good for it to be there as if it weren't there.

The question is, is that courage? I think it takes courage to let the fear be there with that much openness. So courage is kind of the other side of this fearlessness or opening to fear. A lot of courage is required.

There's another thought I just had, which is that a lot of times I will create situations that will put me in fear because I'm in a boring routine. So I create fear as a way to entertain myself. I hear a few rumblings around the room. It sounds like you're not the only one with that entertainment device.

Well, it's really interesting to look at this in relationship to a 45-minute period of meditation practice. And you kind of realize each of us has two choices. We can just be with the coming and going of the breath. But after a few breaths, that gets kind of boring, doesn't it? Or we can divert ourselves with all sorts of thoughts. And some of the thoughts are going to be positive and some of them are going to be negative and some of them are going to be exciting and some of them are going to be fearful.

But I think it's really interesting to tune into the fact we have an appetite for this stimulation. And it's our appetite for this stimulation through our own thinking that blocks us from resting in the peace of the moment. Because frankly, to tell you the truth, most of us find peace boring. And so, honestly, we are all choosing moment after moment to be entertained by the flow of thoughts with their ups and downs and the positives and negatives, rather than to rest in peace, because peace is always accessible. It's always here, and we turn away from it. It's a great insight.

In the light of what you just said about getting to a point possibly where one wouldn't care whether or not fear is present, I was just thinking about the other thing you said about coming to a point of not being able to tolerate the fear and having anger saying, fear out. Would you say that that's just a possible technique on the path towards getting to where you don't care whether fear is present or not?

I basically see the anger as a kind of temporary way through that kind of breaks the grip. It's really important to break the grip when a pattern has really set in. And then once the grip is broken, then you still need to go back and accept fear with that total equanimity. And that may take years. For me, it was sometime after that before I could be that equanimous with fear. It was probably a couple of years later before I could be really equanimous with fear. But for me, it broke the grip. And so it was a temporary helpful thing.

One aspect concerns what I would call chronic fear or chronic anxiety, chronic anger. The second involves when these emotions come from other people—for example, a person who is chronically angry that you must deal with, which naturally creates a situation where you may find yourself chronically fearful of how to handle that relationship. So it isn't just about working with your own emotions in isolation; you're dealing with another person as well.

The question addresses both chronic fear or chronic anger and the habitual pattern of fear that arises in response to someone else's chronic anger. This is remarkably common in our culture—perhaps in all cultures—this tendency to become afraid when someone directs anger toward us. It's a deeply ingrained conditioned response.

Yet in most cases, this fear isn't necessary. For the most part in our society, people aren't going to physically harm us, damage our property, or threaten our safety simply because they're angry with us. So there isn't necessarily any real threat when someone becomes angry with us, yet we instinctively respond with fear.

One participant offered an important observation: "Often the fear and the anger arise when you feel caught in someone's judgment. It's not that you're invisible—quite the opposite. It's as if you're being seen, but only through a particular lens, a distorted perception of who you are."

This insight points to something crucial. Even when anger comes with direct personal condemnation, I would suggest that responding with fear remains a conditioned reaction that isn't necessary. Consider this: even if someone thinks I'm the worst person in the world, why must I fear that possibility? If I know myself well—my motivations, my intentions, the reasons behind my actions—and their perception doesn't align with truth, why can't I simply rest confident in my own understanding?

And if what they're saying does contain some grain of truth, why should I fear seeing that truth clearly? This inquiry leads us into deeper territory—questions about self-image, our desire to appear a certain way to the world, and how threatened we feel when others don't perceive us as we wish to be seen.

I suggest that much of this particular kind of fear stems from clinging to self-image. This doesn't mean such patterns are easy to work through or become free from—they're deeply embedded in our conditioning. I certainly include myself among those who struggle with these reactions. But these patterns are workable. They can be investigated, understood, and gradually transformed through patient, mindful attention.

The key lies in recognizing that beneath our fearful reactions often lies another form of clinging—attachment to how we want to be perceived, to maintaining a particular identity or image. This clinging, like all forms of attachment, creates suffering. Yet when we can see it clearly, we create the possibility for greater freedom.

Healing and Freedom

Guy Armstrong · 49 min

> Guy Armstrong examines the twin aspects of Buddhist practice that draw most practitioners to the path: healing from suffering and the aspiration for complete freedom. Drawing on classical teachings about the kilesas (mental torments) and the five hindrances, he explores how contemporary practitioners work with anxiety, low self-esteem, trauma, and other forms of psychological suffering that characterize our current cultural moment.
> Armstrong discusses how mindfulness naturally leads to healing through its quality of non-adherence—nothing sticks to pure awareness. He emphasizes that we don't "do" the healing ourselves; rather, mindfulness by its spacious nature illuminates and releases whatever it touches. The talk moves from addressing personal healing to the ultimate goal of Buddhist practice: complete liberation or nirvāṇa, which the Buddha described as "the unshakable deliverance of mind."
> Using vivid analogies and personal stories from his time as a monk in Thailand, Armstrong encourages practitioners to examine their deepest motivations and consider whether they're content with the "twigs and branches" of spiritual benefits or are willing to seek the "heartwood" of absolute freedom. This dharma talk offers both practical guidance for working with difficult emotions and inspiration for the highest aspirations of the spiritual path.

James talked the first night we were here about the importance of reflecting on our motivation for being here, what brought us here. This reminded me of a situation I witnessed at the gym a few months ago.

I had been going to the gym over a couple-month period just to bring back some muscle tone. I'm certainly not a serious weight builder, as you can tell by my physique—and it wasn't much better back then either. I've always tended toward the wimpy end of the male spectrum. I would just do a few rounds on the Nautilus machines and some sit-ups.

But I'd look at the other half of the gym where all the free weights were, where the serious guys worked out. I'd watch them lifting these huge barbells racked with weights on both ends, and I was in awe.

One day, two teenage guys walked into the gym. They were probably sixteen or seventeen and even skinnier than me. They went straight to the free weights section. They were buddies, and one would lie down on the bench while the other would, with all his effort, lift one of these huge barbells loaded on the rack above him. His friend would lie there with his thin little arms—just like mine were at sixteen—and with all his effort, he'd press it up as high as he could go. He could barely get it up there, and then his friend would help him bring it back down.

They were so into it, and I eavesdropped on a bit of their conversation. One was saying to the other, "Boy, did you see Lance in here the other day?"

Lance is kind of the hero of the gym. He's about six-foot-five and built out of brick. He came over to work with me on a machine one day, and I put my hand on his shoulder and thought I was touching concrete. Lance is incredible. At the very front of the gym, the advertising poster shows Lance in one of his entries into the Mr. America contest. He's really heavy duty.

These two teenage guys were saying, "Did you see Lance the other day? He pressed 515 pounds." That was an astronomical number to me, and probably to them too. But I could tell that something in them was really inspired by Lance pressing that amount of weight. Lance had become their ideal in the endeavor of bodybuilding and weightlifting. I could tell they were going to keep pumping that iron as long as they could until they felt they'd gotten a little bit closer to where Lance was.

I mention this because it really brings out this factor of motivation. I was impressed by their motivation. Even though it wasn't my motivation, I was impressed that it was theirs, because they had an aspiration to move toward that starry ideal that Lance represented for them. I could tell that their whole path of bodybuilding was going to be way different from mine. Two months later, I dropped out of the race. I'm sure they're still going on.

This factor of motivation or aspiration has a profound effect on our spiritual life. It points us toward some distant star or distant wish. In some ways, the farther we set our aim for that distant wish, the higher our trajectory will be over the course of our path.

I'd like to talk tonight about two of the common aspirations or motivations in spiritual practice. Basically, as I see it, most people come to practice either to reduce our suffering or to increase our happiness—sometimes both. These are the two primary motivations for people.

In looking at these two, we can divide them, for the sake of discussion, into the areas of healing or reducing suffering, and freedom—increasing our happiness. Tonight I want to talk about these two aspects of our spiritual practice: the aspect of healing and the aspect of freedom.

We've been talking throughout—all of us have talked about—how if we can come into the present moment with that full attention of mindfulness, without greed and aversion and delusion, there is a moment of freedom. There's a moment of that spaciousness.

But as Silvia said in her talk last night, sometimes it's not so easy to come out of our own personal history and our own personal suffering. For that reason, healing occupies a really important part of this journey for many of us.

Classically, the difficulties that people find in their meditation are described in terms of the kilesas...

a term in Pali that's often translated as defilements. I actually don't like that translation very much. A lot of the Buddhist texts were first translated into English during the time of Queen Victoria, and the terminology still carries a bit of the Queen's English upon it. This word "defilements" is one of those words.

Originally, the word kilesa meant "torment of mind." Another way we can think of it is as a bias of mind or a tendency of mind that takes us away from clear seeing. Mindfulness really represents that clear seeing of things as they are. The kilesas of greed, aversion, and delusion represent a movement away—a tendency away from clarity. And they bring their own forms of suffering.

You might notice in your practice which of these tendencies is most predominant for you. When your mind slips out of balance, what direction does it go? Does it go to wanting, to some form of desire, some projection of what's incomplete and needs to be fulfilled? Or does it move in the direction of aversion or negativity with all its different flavors—the flavors of disliking, of judgment, of criticism, of anger, of fear? Or is it in the direction of delusion, of not seeing clearly, of a kind of veil of ignorance or dullness around our contact with the world?

Each of these three tendencies is its own strategy to make us happy. We follow it because we think it will bring happiness. The strategy behind greed is: "I'm going to draw in all the pleasant stuff. And if I keep the pleasant stuff coming and I'm full enough of it, I won't ever have to feel the pain of life."

The strategy in aversion is rather to push away what's unpleasant. We aversive types—and this is my type, this is where I get fixated—try to keep ourselves safe by blocking out whatever might be threatening or unpleasant.

The deluded type has a way of dealing with pleasure and pain by insulating themselves from the fluctuations of pleasure and pain. The deluded type clouds their contact with the world to keep everything at a safe distance. There's a little bit of haze or spaciness in between. Deluded types are usually very genial people. They're lovely to hang out with, and they're said to be the best traveling companions. Because you wind up in a new city somewhere and check into a hotel room and say, "Which bed do you want?" And the deluded type says, "I don't care. You pick." So that's lovely. If you're thinking about traveling, they're highly recommended.

The greed type, of course, will say, "Well, that one's by the window and it has a nice view. I want that one." And the aversive type will say, "Well, this one's right by the door and you'd keep walking in and out all night and wake me up, so I don't want that one." So they both have preferences.

It's interesting to note that this kind of classification has really been in the Buddhist texts for hundreds of years. Around 400 in the Christian era—I'll just notice that Buddhists don't say Anno Domini, AD. We don't say 400 AD because that's not particularly our lord. What you tend to say is Christian era, CE. So you might start to see that coming in more and more.

Around 400 in the Christian era, this monk in Sri Lanka named Buddhaghosa put together this thick volume of all the practices and understandings that were current at that time. This was less than a thousand years after the Buddha died, so it was still almost fresh in people's minds. And he's actually the one who first put down on paper this sort of psychological classification of greed types, aversion types, and delusion types.

Let me read how he says you can tell yourself. He says you can tell by your step, for one thing. "The step of one of greedy temperament is confident and graceful. The step of one of aversive temperament is rigid. And that of one of deluded temperament is muddled. Likewise in sitting."

He says you can also tell when you go to bed. "One of greedy temperament spreads his bed unhurriedly, lies down slowly, composing his limbs, and he sleeps in a confident manner. When woken, instead of getting up quickly, he gives his answer slowly as though doubtful. One of angry temperament spreads his bed hastily anyway. With his body flung down, he sleeps with a scowl. When woken, he gets up quickly and answers as though annoyed."

One of deluded temperament spreads his bed all awry and sleeps mostly face downwards with body sprawling. When woken, he gets up slowly saying, "Hmm?" You might check this with your roommate on the last day—not yet, please.

Well, one has to take some of these old texts with a grain of salt, a healthy grain of salt. It reminds me of a comment that someone made about channeling—you know, channeling where a human being receives words from a being who has died and is on another plane. The comment was, "Just because they're dead doesn't mean that they're smart." We might even say the same about the venerable Bhikkhu Buddhaghosa.

So a classical way of describing the kinds of difficulty, the kinds of suffering that we're liable to, is in view of the kilesas. And becoming familiar with our own tendencies of mind is part of self-knowledge. We all have these tendencies.

Another way that they've been described classically is through the hindrances, as Carol talked about a couple of nights ago—the hindrances of sense desire, of aversion, of dullness, of restlessness, or doubt. You can start to see the influence of the hindrances as well in your meditation practice and the suffering that they bring.

But frankly, I feel that our times call for different terminology than the classical ones. Maybe it's the age we live in. Maybe it's the culture that we're in today. We live in unusual times.

Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche, who was one of the great bringers of the Buddha Dharma into America and founded Naropa Institute in Boulder in the early seventies, was talking one time about the similarity of the Buddha Dharma coming to Tibet and the Buddha Dharma coming to America. He said when the Dharma came to Tibet, it was in about eight or nine hundred of the Christian era, and it migrated up from India. He said it came into a country that was absolutely wild and quite barbaric. The population was sparse. There were not many cities. There were a lot of people living a nomadic life. Bandits were absolutely rife throughout Tibet. Anywhere you traveled, you were in danger of your life and your possessions. And there was no established religion like Buddhism or Hinduism. The Bon religion was there, which was quite shamanistic. You had all these old guys probably hanging out in caves with hair down the middle of their backs, practicing white and black magic all over the place. It was a wild country. And morality was unheard of at that time in a formal religious way.

Trungpa said that actually lent a certain vitality to the Dharma that flourished in Tibet. He said it actually provided very fertile ground. And he went on to say that the same barbaric situation exists today in America. Because of that, he was very confident that American Buddhism was going to have a lot of vitality.

So having grown up in this, shall we say, less than fully civilized era, we've all been affected by that. There's a sort of fragmentation in our culture that we've all come under the influence of.

For myself, when I first came into practice, the overriding difficulty that I had to deal with was fear and anxiety. I was sort of a survivor of the sixties. One of my main gurus at that time was Timothy Leary—"turn on, tune in, drop out." I followed his advice, to excess. So I sort of emerged from the sixties with a lot of confusion. My adherence to the precepts was, shall we say, less than ideal. I had a lot of confusion and unhappiness and fear when I came into the practice. For many years, that's what I worked with. The bliss of concentration was not for me for a long time in practice.

Other people experience in their practice a great sense of worthlessness or coming into contact with low feelings of self-esteem. This seems to be really widespread in our culture today—that we just don't feel that great about ourselves by and large.

The Dalai Lama was meeting with some Western teachers, as he does every year. In fact, Sylvia is just back from a recent meeting with him. Maybe we'll talk about it later. This question of worthlessness came up and how to help people work with this feeling. The Dalai Lama couldn't get a handle on what this feeling was. I mean, this is a man who has had such a sense of grace and self-acceptance for his adult life. This is a man who can go into Madison Square Garden in front of 15,000 people giving a serious tantric initiation.

This happened once. He climbed up onto the platform that had been built for him, felt that the cushions were quite soft, and in front of 15,000 people, bounced up and down a few times like a little kid, just to get the feel of the cushions. He was so comfortable with himself, so relaxed.

He couldn't understand what this feeling of low self-esteem or worthlessness was about. And yet, for many of us, it's a striking feature, especially of our retreat practice. We may walk around for days just not feeling very good about ourselves. We compare ourselves with other people who seem to be practicing much better and sitting much more still and walking much more slowly and eating much more mindfully. We feel we'll never measure up on the scale of the good meditator.

Another of the strong characteristics that we see in retreats is the legacy of childhood abuse and the feelings of hurt and shame and betrayal that this leads to. These are probably some of the most difficult experiences that meditators can deal with. I've been really impressed at the number of people, both men and women, who out of that background have come into intensive meditation practice and really come to grips with the legacy of that kind of upbringing.

During the three-month retreat every year that Carol helps to teach in Massachusetts, there are always a number of people who come on that retreat from this particular background of abuse. It is absolutely awesome to hear some of their stories and the amount of courage and dedication and commitment that they have to go through essentially the same atmosphere that we've gone through together these five days—they go through for three months, carrying all the pain of those memories, and yet working through the practice of meditation to heal those wounds. Some very impressive healing has been done in that context. Tremendous courage for those women and men.

Self-hatred is another pattern that comes up often for people. It's sort of an amplification of the low self-esteem, and many people suffer from this.

When I was a monk in Thailand, I had just ordained and was on my way to a practice monastery in the north of Thailand near Chiang Mai. I stopped at a monastery in Chiang Mai that had been founded by my preceptor and hung out there for a few days—a little bit of a break in the travel. There was another Western monk staying there, and I liked this guy immediately. He had a big physique, kind of built like a bear, and he was somebody you immediately felt would take care of you if there was any problem. He had this wonderfully friendly vibe—he just radiated warmth and metta. The Thai people really liked him too. He had been in robes for something like fifteen years and spoke fluent Thai.

In the mornings, he would carry on his own practice in a little hut by a pond—a very beautiful setting. In the afternoons, he would receive visitors, Thai people and Western people impartially, about half and half. The Thais would come and tell him their problems in meditation or their life and he would counsel them. Westerners would come and he would give us instruction in meditation. He was a great guy.

When he went out for his morning alms round, he had a begging bowl that was enormous. I've never seen an alms round like this guy had. He would go out and it would soon be full because the people nearby the monastery knew him and they all loved him. They'd just line up out on the streets to give him food every morning. It got to where he had to actually take a couple of the small novices with him and they'd carry plastic bags. When his bowl was full, he'd take the food out of his bowl and put it in their plastic bags, and they'd put the plastic bags under their novice robes and keep walking behind him. So he had this little entourage every morning for his alms round.

He came back and would share the food out with the other monks and nuns who maybe weren't so fortunate in their alms gathering. But I noticed that he still ate quite enough himself—he was well taken care of.

When I came to talk to him about his practice, he said that for the first nine years that he was in robes, all he was doing was working with his self-hatred. For nine years. And yet the product of it, the fruits of that work were so clear.

He had such a big heart and such understanding and love. Everybody loved the guy. Everybody who met him. He was a beautiful example.

So some of the other common things that you might find as you start to practice and start to touch your own personal hurts and personal history are feelings of depression or loneliness or despair, or a sense of alienation—of not fitting in this world or this culture—of disconnection, of having your heart closed, of having a numb heart, of having a broken heart, of feeling some shame, an embarrassment even about being here.

All of these reasons for our suffering are workable with our Dharma practice. The beautiful thing about this mindfulness practice is that it can go to any level of the mind or body. Absolutely anything that is capable of being experienced, of being felt, is capable of attention. So we can take our mindfulness into absolutely any level of our existence and apply it there.

For some of us, the healing takes the form of healing in the body. This is another area I want to spend a few minutes on. Often the emotional patterns actually show themselves first in the body. What happens is that as the awareness is sustained over a period of days, it starts to penetrate different parts of the body.

Generally what's happened is that through our life, with our unconsciousness and not knowing how to work with our emotional life, events have come along that we haven't fully accepted, haven't fully allowed. We've held those emotions down and they've gotten locked in the body—maybe feelings of fear or anger or shame or hurt, grief, whatever.

Often those areas that have been held for a long time are first experienced as numbness. We actually direct our attention to that part of the body and don't feel anything. As the days go by, the awareness starts to have some effect and we may start to feel a little bit of ache or tension in that area. As we continue to just give a soft kind of attention, that pain may become very, very visible. Particular areas where you're likely to feel that kind of stored tension are the back, the shoulders, the neck, the chest area, the abdomen.

As the awareness penetrates and softens in those areas, sometimes they will open up and release whatever has been held there. Sometimes the release is just a physical energy. Sometimes it comes with a strong emotion. Sometimes with the emotion may come a memory of some event or image from the past. Whatever the experience is, it's simply to keep giving that really soft and kind attention throughout the process.

As the release takes place, then some clearing happens—some clearing of long-held accumulated material, both psychic and physical. And as it clears, our whole experience of life becomes lighter, a little bit freer.

It requires some finesse in working in this area. It requires a kind of combination of a lot of courage, a firmness of intention and resolve, and also a lot of gentleness—to really be gentle with yourself in working with those areas of holding.

When the release happens, it can feel really chaotic. The physical energy gets released. Sometimes there's a lot of emotion, a lot of thoughts, and you feel like you've gone backward in your practice. Somebody came into an interview today and said, "Gosh, I feel like I've gone backwards. The first few days I was getting settled, and now it's just all gone. Mindfulness was settling, I was feeling stiller, and then boom! I've lost it. I can't get it back."

Often that's a sign that the meditation is progressing just right—not that you've lost anything, but that you've touched that deeper level and some unfolding is happening. And that's really a healthy and healing part of this practice. So not to become discouraged. It's actually a sign that things are opening and that you can trust in that. That's something really to welcome.

There's another level to working with pain that I wanted to share. This is a quote from Nisargadatta Maharaj, who was an Indian teacher of Vedanta. He died about ten years ago. He said, "The essence of pleasure is acceptance. Whatever may be the situation, if it is acceptable, it is pleasant. If it is not acceptable, it is painful."

The questioner, the person in dialogue with him said, "Well, pain is not acceptable." And Maharaj says, "Why not? Did you ever try?" He said, "Do try and you will find in pain a joy which pleasure cannot yield, for the simple reason that acceptance of pain takes you much deeper than pleasure does. The personal self by its very nature is constantly pursuing pleasure and avoiding pain. The ending of this pattern is the ending of the self. The ending of the self with its desires and fears enables you to return to your real nature, the source of all happiness and peace."

With all this emphasis on healing and talk of healing, sometimes this retreat atmosphere takes on a little of the flavor of a ward somewhere. I don't know if you've ever just taken a look outside during the slow walking as though you'd come in off the street—it looks a little at times like a bit of a mental asylum here.

Jack's first teacher was an old Thai monk named Ajahn Chah. The first time he came to the States, I think it was in 1980, he came to Barre, Massachusetts, where the Insight Meditation Center is, and he taught a retreat there in this fashion, which was not at all his fashion. His style of working was just to have people live a very simple life in the forest—do your work, do a little bit of sitting, live in community, be mindful, live in nature, be simple—and five years later things start to happen. Because we're so American, we're hell-bent on speed, and we have these jam-packed ten-day retreats.

So he came to one of these and helped to lead it. In the afternoon one day, he was walking around the grounds, the front lawn, people were doing their slow walking back and forth very nicely, and he would walk up to each person and say a few words in Thai, give the person a big smile, and then walk on. At the end of the day, someone asked his translator what Ajahn Chah was saying to people. And he said, "Oh, he was going up to everybody and saying, 'I hope you get well soon.'"

I hope we all get well soon. We can all use it.

So what's mindfulness in this healing process? We've been talking for about five days, really non-stop, about mindfulness. How does it relate to this process of healing?

Well, what happens ordinarily when you're in the middle of a meditation period and some strong emotion comes? Something difficult—anger or fear or embarrassment or something like that. What's a normal reaction? Often don't we resist? Don't we find ourselves resisting? We didn't come here to suffer. This is not what I want to be doing. This is not it. I came here to get peaceful, so this is the wrong thing. Go away.

And somebody in an interview the other day said that it's kind of like when that kind of emotion comes and there's resistance, it's like being in a room where a young child is pounding on the door and wants to get in. And you don't want to let the child in, so you keep the door shut. And as long as the door's shut, that child's going to keep pounding, and your peace is disturbed. So finally you get the idea, "Oh, I'll open the door." So you open the door, and the child comes in and plays quietly. Conflict gone.

I thought that was a really beautiful analogy to the process of not resisting that strong emotion. When we can really open to it with mindfulness, we find that the energy kind of drains out. Often with our resistance we feed that energy. When we open to it, the energy goes out of that difficult emotion and into the seeing. It goes into the mindfulness and into the clarity. So in that way we find a new relationship in our emotional life. We don't have to get free by getting rid of. We can get free by changing our relationship to our experience.

So this is really a key. As we do that, we find that emotions start to clear themselves out. We don't have to force the healing. It happens naturally. And it's not to say that through this we get rid of anger, we get rid of fear, we get rid of desire, but rather they start to re-find their natural balance. Just like a child goes through so many emotions during the course of the day, but they can just let them flow through. When we're not fixated on our past, we can do the same. So the emotions start to clear up and start to wash through us. And in that way, we come to a balance in our emotional life. Still have the light and the dark, but they start to assume a more natural balance for us.

So this is one of the great healing properties of mindfulness.

And an interesting question comes in at this point. And that is, do we think, in doing our meditation practice, if healing's a goal for us, and it's a very wholesome goal, do we think that we're doing the healing? Do we think that we're doing this meditation practice in order to carry out our own healing? This is kind of an interesting question.

I'd say that's not quite the right understanding. If we see the healing as primary and the mindfulness as secondary, or just a tool, the mindfulness can become a tool to the healing—a little bit we're putting the cart before the horse.

And we could say the same thing about using mindfulness to reduce stress. It can be used to reduce stress, but again I'd say that we're perhaps putting the cart before the horse.

I'd say that there's another way to look at this process of healing in relation to mindfulness. The quality of mindfulness itself is so spacious, so vast and so pure that nothing sticks to it. Mindfulness has this quality of non-adhering. So whatever mindfulness illuminates can be released. Anything that mindfulness has the power to illuminate, it has the power to release.

Through mindfulness, as we pay attention to all our experience, everything that we've ever held becomes available for release. That may start with our bodily tension. It may go on to our stored emotions, to all the conditioned patterns of feeling and ways of reacting that we've built over the years. All the ideas we've built about ourselves that we've fabricated out of concepts and held onto for many years can come up and be let go of. And our views about the world and everything in it.

By its very nature—not by any working at it or application or functioning of it—by its very nature, mindfulness leads to letting go. It is simply too spacious to hold on to anything. And then when we let go, we're able to live much less burdened, much more lightly. We travel much more simply on this earth through letting go of what we don't need, of what's just a carryover from the past.

Suzuki Roshi put it this way: "Those who know this state of spaciousness will always be able to dissolve their problems through constancy."

So this gets kind of interesting. There is this wonderful part of ourselves called mindfulness and it has these qualities that can be very useful. In the beginning we kind of get more interested in the objects that the mindfulness shines on than we do in the mindfulness itself, because it has a utility for us. But as time goes by, meditators generally find that they start to get more interested in the mindfulness itself than in any of the phenomena that are being illuminated.

It's like we had a light and we shine it all around and we get fascinated by what it picks up—this stack of papers and that stack of papers and the clock and the bell. And we never stop to look back at the light. At some point, we usually get interested in looking back at the light and wondering, what is this thing? What is this amazing thing called mindfulness?

The Buddha actually talked about mindfulness as the link to nirvana, or the link to the unconditioned. In the Four Noble Truths that I talked about the other day, the Third Noble Truth is that the end of suffering is in the end of craving, a state that the Buddha equated with nirvana—the unborn, the undying, the unconditioned.

And he said about it, in a dialogue with someone who came to visit him, this man came up and said to the Buddha, "There are these five senses—the senses of sight and sound and smell and taste and touch. Where do these five senses come together? What's the resort of the five senses?" And the Buddha said the five senses come together in the mind.

The man thought for a moment and said, "Well, where is the resort of the mind? What holds the mind?" And the Buddha said, "Awareness is the resort of the mind."

"Okay, what's the resort of awareness?" And the Buddha said, "The resort of awareness is freedom."

The guy said, "What's the resort of freedom?" And the Buddha said, "The resort of freedom is nirvana, the unconditioned, the unborn."

The guy said, "What's the resort of nirvana?" And in one of the very few instances of humor in the whole of the Buddha's teachings, he said, "This is going too far," and he stopped the man.

But it's very interesting because awareness is right in the middle of that chain, from our sense experience to the unconditioned. And it plays that kind of role.

It's always a little dangerous to talk about nirvana because immediately people start thinking about enlightenment. And it seems like when we think about enlightenment, we all go a little bit crazy. And so I always hesitate to bring the word up or to use it.

This kind of craziness really came through in a book that I read recently. I don't know if any of you have discovered this young writer named Mark Salzman. He wrote a book called "Iron and Silk," which was about learning martial arts in China. He's a really wonderful writer, and he's just written an autobiography of his childhood. He grew up in a suburban setting in Connecticut.

And he calls his book Lost in Place: Growing Up Absurd in Suburbia. So I knew this was a title I could relate to.

He starts off in the first chapter by saying that when he was thirteen years old, he saw his first kung fu movie. Before it ended, he decided that the life of a wandering Zen monk was the life for him. He announced his willingness to leave East Ridge Junior High School immediately and give up all material things, but his parents did not share his enthusiasm. They made it clear that he was not to become a wandering Zen monk until he had finished high school. In the meantime, he could meditate down in the basement.

So he immersed himself in the study of Chinese philosophy with the kind of dedication that is possible only when you don't yet have to make a living, when you're too young to drive, and when you don't have a girlfriend.

He says he turned their basement into what he thought a Buddhist temple should look like. He marked off boundaries with candles and set up a shrine. He outfitted the shrine with objects from a cookware shop—the only store in town that carried oriental gifts—a bamboo placemat, a package of chopsticks, a sake cup which he turned into an incense burner, and a plastic Chinese kitchen deity with the character for "tasty" painted on his stomach.

He goes on to say that the trickiest thing was what to do about his hair, because real Zen masters shave their heads, as anyone knows who has watched the Kung Fu series on television. His father had never liked his long hair and had often said that he wished he could shave it all off. So he went directly to him and asked if he'd like to have a wish come true. His father's response was to raise one eyebrow, which he understood from experience to be a no.

As an alternative, he ordered something from the back of a comic book called a "surprise bald head wig." When it arrived by mail four weeks later, it turned out to be a disappointment. It was floppy, dimpled, and a sickly gray color. Nonetheless, he tucked his hair up underneath and wore it proudly for his meditations. His sister Rachel, two years younger than his younger brother, thought he looked like a giant fetus.

So we don't want to dwell too much on this enlightenment stuff. But nonetheless, in practicing mindfulness, we're really doing something more profound than it may at first appear. We're really activating that link to our deepest nature, to our truest nature.

I wanted to read you something from The Questions of King Milinda, where an awakened monk named Nagasena went to visit this king and the teachings were conducted in question and answer fashion. This is one of the books outside the core Buddhist teachings that's central to our tradition. I'm going to read a passage about nirvana, but I'm going to substitute the word "mindfulness" because I think it still works well.

It says, "Mindfulness shares two qualities with water. As the lotus is unstained by water, so is mindfulness unstained by all the defilements. As cool water allays feverish heat, so also mindfulness is cool and allays the fever of all the passions. Moreover, as water removes the thirst of humans and animals who are exhausted, parched, thirsty, and overpowered by heat, so also mindfulness removes the craving for sense pleasures, the craving for becoming, and the craving for the cessation of becoming."

This is really in the direction of an unlimited freedom. Mindfulness leads in only one direction, and that is a freedom that doesn't have any limits.

In moving in that direction, one of the concepts that comes up for us that we may want to let go of when the time is right—not before—is the concept of healing. Because as long as we are fixed with the concept of healing, we sustain a view that something's wrong, that something's broken, that we're broken, that there's something wrong with us. And that belief that there's something wrong with us really undermines a lot of our confidence.

I wonder if fundamentally anything can go wrong with us. I wonder fundamentally if anything has ever gone wrong with us. And I wonder fundamentally if anything can go wrong with life as a whole.

There's this wonderful Native American teacher who comes to Spirit Rock named Fred Wapipa. In doing a sweat lodge with him last summer with James and a few other people, Fred started off by telling us that in his language there was no word for hope. He said there's no word for hope because we know that everything's all right. Just as it is, everything's all right.

So I wonder in our meditation practice, where can we touch that level of faith? Where can we find that kind of trust? And are we prepared to find it? Are we prepared to keep looking in our practice until we find that absolute trust that brings that unlimited kind of freedom?

The Buddha said that the spiritual journey is a journey that brings many benefits. He said it brings the benefits of being respected by those who value wisdom and compassion. It brings the benefits of outer harmony. When we live a life that's grounded in the precepts, we establish harmonious conditions with the other people that we live with, with all the creatures that we interact with. It establishes the conditions of inner harmony, which are really synonymous with healing. Healing is really the work to come out of discomfort and into greater harmony in ourselves. It establishes the conditions for coming into great insight, understanding, knowledge, and vision. It's really what each of you are talking about when you come into the interviews every day.

And yet the Buddha said that if we stop at that point in our spiritual journey...

We're like someone who has gone into the forest intending to build a house and coming to a great tree in the forest, needing the heartwood of that tree to build their house. If we stop with respect, with outer harmony, with inner harmony, with knowledge and with insight, he said it's like somebody who's come to this great tree and gone away with the twigs and the branches, leaving the heartwood standing.

What he said is that the heartwood of the spiritual life lies in this complete freedom. I'll read you the passage: "So this holy life, my friends, does not have respect or outer harmony or inner harmony for its benefit or knowledge and vision for its benefit. But it is the unshakable deliverance of mind that is the goal of this holy life, the heartwood of this holy life, the end of this holy life."

So I wonder if we can keep looking at our motivation from time to time, keep checking and see if we have that kind of aim in our spiritual journey. To see if that's the trajectory that we envision for ourselves. Really to come away from this path not with the twigs and the branches, but with the very heartwood of a complete freedom that's unshakable.

I'd just like to close with a little poem from Rumi. It's called "Tending Two Shops." He says:

"Don't run around this world looking for a hole to hide in. The only real rest comes when you're alone with God. Live in the nowhere that you came from, even though you have an address here. You have eyes that see from that nowhere, and eyes that judge distances, how high and how low. You own two shops, and you run back and forth. Try to close the one that's a fearful trap, getting always smaller. Checkmate this way. Checkmate that way. Keep open the shop where you're not selling fish hooks anymore. You are the free-swimming fish."

Let's just sit for a minute.

CHAPTER 206

Mettā & Concentration

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

> In this comprehensive dharma talk, Guy Armstrong delves into the profound practice of mettā (loving-kindness) and its intimate connection with concentration. Drawing from the Mettā Sutta and traditional Buddhist teachings, he explains how mettā begins with simple moments of human warmth and connection—the "friendly heart" that wishes others well. Armstrong illustrates the practice through vivid metaphors, comparing the initial effort of mettā phrases to making fire without matches, where persistent gentle effort eventually kindles the flame of love that can grow into the Buddha's "immeasurable deliverance of mind."
> The talk explores how mettā practice works through three components: phrases, imagery, and feeling, which together compose the mind stream in wholesome ways. Armstrong discusses the jhānic factors (vitakka, vicāra, pīti, sukha, ekaggatā) that develop with deepening concentration, showing how the unification from both mettā and samādhi support each other. He emphasizes finding the balance between active effort in generating loving intentions and the receptive surrender that allows mettā to flow naturally.
>
> Throughout, Armstrong weaves together insights from forest tradition masters like Ajahn Mun and contemporary teachers, alongside poetry from Rilke and Rumi, demonstrating how mettā transforms our perception of the world and integrates all aspects of our being through the power of love. This practice, he explains, doesn't just develop pleasant states but fundamentally shifts how we see and relate to all beings, ultimately pointing toward the boundless heart that recognizes no separation.

Mettā & Concentration

I'd like to talk about the quality of mettā itself, and then discuss some of the mechanics of the mettā practice—how it ties in with the factor of concentration, and how the technique works in combination with vipassana to provide the unfolding of this path.

I was teaching a mettā retreat fairly recently, and I'd been talking for about a day and a half. During an interview group, somebody asked me, "What is it we're doing here? Could you put it in a few words?" The way I summed it up, and the way I often think about this practice, is that it's really a practice of bringing forth the friendly mind or the friendly heart that's already within us.

We already have these qualities of friendliness, of mettā, within us. All we need to do in the practice is uncover it and bring it out in each moment. The more moments that we bring this friendly mind out, the more moments it will arise spontaneously in the future. It's just like mindfulness in our vipassana practice. Each moment of mindfulness sets the condition for the arising of another moment of mindfulness. So we're strengthening that quality in the mind and in the heart simply by practicing it, by bringing forth this friendly mind more and more frequently.

We can sometimes think of mettā in very exalted terms. Certainly if you read the teachings of the Buddha, his words about mettā are very exalted. We can get the idea that if we're not feeling boundless and unconditional love, we're not experiencing mettā. This is one extreme of the development of mettā, and I think it helps if we lower our expectations a little bit for what mettā is.

Mettā has a very wide range of feeling, and it just starts with this little flicker of human warmth and connectedness. Just this friendly spirit that sees another person and says, "Oh, I want you to be happy. May you be healthy." Just that little flicker of connection and caring that can come so easily in a moment is really the heart of mettā. Our practice is to acknowledge that moment after moment. Out of that little beginning, that humble beginning, all the power and depth of our practice grows.

Mettā is said to be a happy practice, but in the first few days of retreat, you might not all agree with that. It's also a lot of work. Especially in the beginning, it can feel like you're really cranking with the phrases. The first time I did a mettā retreat, I thought, "This is supposed to be happy?" Those first ten days were more work than I'd ever done in vipassana. But it does get easier.

This reminds me of when I was a Boy Scout and had to earn a merit badge by building a fire without matches. I'm amazed that the human race has gotten to where we are now, when for millions of years we didn't have matches. To earn the merit badge, I got a flat piece of wood and made a little round hole in the center, then shaved some very dry wood shavings into that hole. I took a round stick, put it in the hole, and could either twirl it really fast with my hands or use a little bow with string wrapped around it to turn the stick back and forth.

My hands would get raw and chapped, the stick felt rough, and I didn't believe there was ever going to be a fire that way. Despite the fact that humans still walk the earth, I didn't believe it was going to work for me. Then, sure enough, a little bit of smoke curled up from those wood shavings. I kept twirling and the smoke turned into just a little tiny flame. I could put a little tiny twig into that flame and it would burn a little bigger, then a bigger stick to burn brighter, until I could light the bonfire we'd made.

Our mettā practice is just like this. The phrases are twirling the stick. In the beginning, it feels mechanical and rote. You may think nothing's ever going to happen and your hands may feel chapped. But sooner or later, this little tendril of smoke curls up—that's this first feeling of connecting with another and wishing them well. That's the first tendril of mettā. As you keep twirling, it can build into this huge blazing bonfire that the Buddha described as an immeasurable deliverance of mind.

There is tremendous potential in this practice, even though it starts from very humble beginnings. One aspect that's really inspiring to me is that all the people I've talked to experience it from these humble beginnings and then describe its transformative power. Three of us in a group this morning who have been practicing mettā for a few years all voiced very strongly how much they felt this practice had transformed their whole lives within just a few years. There is incredible power and potential here—really transformative power.

Part of the beauty of this metta practice, part of what I love about it, is that it cuts through our habitual emphasis on self, on ourselves. An Indian teacher named Shantideva, who wrote the definitive manual for bodhisattvas, put it this way: "All happiness comes from thinking of others. All unhappiness comes from only thinking of myself." So in this practice we learn how much happiness there is in thinking of others and including ourselves in that as well. In our practice we add just a subtle little touch of self.

The practice starts from just causing to arise again and again this intention, this subtle intention of happiness for others and ourselves. And after that we can surrender. We just generate this little bit of connection and then we can surrender. We start with beings where it's easier to feel the connection and then work up, as you'll see over the course of the retreat. The general rule is that we pick the subject where the metta flows most easily. We spend our time with those beings who evoke that friendly mind in us.

So the practice is not particularly about clarifying all the relationships in our life or making sure that everyone in our life gets a healthy dose of our metta during these seven days. We have plenty of time for that later. It's rather to see if we can learn how to contact this heart of friendliness and bring it out and begin to let it flow.

There's a poem from Rilke that expresses a little bit of this feeling. This is from Rilke's Book of Hours, subtitled Love Poems to God. He wrote these poems beginning when he was twenty-three, particularly moved by the traditional religion he found in Germany. Every poem has this spiritual strain to it. This translation is done by Joanna Macy and Anita Barrows, both Buddhists, who bring that background into their translation, which I think is lovely.

Rilke writes: "I believe in all that has never yet been spoken. I want to free what waits within me so that what no one has dared to wish for may for once spring clear without my contriving. If this is arrogant, God, forgive me, but this is what I need to say. May what I do flow from me like a river, no forcing and no holding back, the way it is with children."

That sense with our metta practice of no forcing and no holding back really describes the feeling when that friendly heart starts to come out, starts to be available. And we may need to stay with one particular subject for quite a while if that's where the metta is flowing. You may need to stay with yourself, your benefactor, a good friend, a pet, a child, or an animal. I heard of one meditator who actually stayed with themselves for three years of practice and was unable to generate loving kindness for anyone else. For three years they practiced metta for themselves, and then at some point the door opened and other people could begin to be included. So it's a really individual practice—find where that friendly heart comes out for you.

But in its development, the feeling of metta can be boundless. The Buddha often talked about it as a boundless practice, and it's boundless in two ways. One is the extent or the range of beings to whom we can direct our loving-kindness. As you've gotten a little feeling for today as we've moved beyond just one friend, many friends are out there accessible to us through our loving kindness. As you've done the walking practice, probably you've directed it to birds or the frogs that you hear croaking toward nighttime or just the different people who are walking by during the retreat.

The Metta Sutta from the words of the Buddha expresses this kind of range really clearly. He says of one who is practicing loving kindness: "Let them think, may all beings be happy and secure. May their hearts be wholesome. Whatever living beings there may be—weak or strong, tall or middling, short or large, without exception, seen or unseen, dwelling far or near, already born, or yet to be born—may all beings be happy. Just as a mother would protect her only child at the risk of her own life, even so, let the wise cultivate a boundless heart towards all beings. Let their thoughts of boundless love pervade the whole world, above, below, and across, without obstruction, without hatred, without enmity."

Metta can really be felt and directed in a very universal way. Sometimes we forget this. The Buddha reminded us that it is hard to find a being who has not been your mother or father in some past life. This is an extraordinary reflection. Imagine if you looked around the room and could really realize that every person here has parented you in another life, has cared for you when you were unable to stand or walk or feed yourself. This is what the Buddha said the case actually is. Imagine if we loved every being that we met. What would that feel like? It would be like living in a heaven realm. Often in Buddhist traditions they talk about the pure land, and sometimes it's seen as a place that one aspires to for rebirth.

But the pure land is the place where we can love every being that we meet, and it's available here in this life on this earth.

The second way that metta is boundless is that there's really no limit to its development within us. The Buddha called it an immeasurable deliverance of mind and refers to it in the terms that he uses for liberation. In metta there are the depths of freedom.

It's extraordinary to meet beings who have developed this beyond what we might think is possible. There's this wonderful Thai monk who comes to Spirit Rock every year named Ajahn Jumnian. I know some of you have met him. Usually you just mention his name and a few people in the room start smiling. He is a master of metta practice. He's about sixty years old and has taught metta for many years and has practiced a lot of metta himself. You just feel the joy in his being. He's such a delight to have there.

He's very low-key and an easy teacher to have. We ask him what he wants to do on any day and his first response is, "Is there anybody who wants to listen to the Dharma?" And if there's anybody who wants to listen to the dharma, we take him down and set him up front in the meditation hall. He's sort of the dharma fountain style of teacher. You set him in the front of the meditation hall and he can talk dharma all day long. As long as there are people to listen, Ajahn Jumnian loves to talk dharma.

We'll ask him things like, "Well, do you want to go see San Francisco or the Golden Gate Bridge?" He'll say, "Hmm, is there anybody who wants to listen to dharma? If there's anybody who wants to listen to Dharma, I'd rather talk Dharma. If there's no one, I could sit here. I'm very happy sitting here. But if you'd like to take me to San Francisco, I'd be happy with that too." Whatever he does, he's happy. It's unconditional. It really is.

When I was in Thailand waiting to be ordained as a monk, a friend who spoke good Thai took me across the river north of Bangkok and we walked through the jungle for a ways and visited this Thai monk named Ajahn Sanong. He's not very well known and he doesn't speak English, so he's not someone I ever practiced with, but he was a fantastic person to meet.

The story was that he had done a lot of practice in cemeteries. This is a traditional Buddhist practice to conquer our fear. We live right in the middle of the dead, and it really makes us confront our own fear of death. So he'd done a lot of cemetery practice, and he was very fearless. He'd also done a tremendous amount of metta practice. You could just feel that radiating from him.

I was actually embarrassed to be in his presence. His eyes had sort of this laser beam of love just staring out and it would zap you when he looked at you. I kind of felt like he had x-ray vision and all my impurities were just shining out to him. And so I was a little shy around him. But what an extraordinary quality of mind through the development of the metta practice.

Metta, when it's developed, brings a really deep sense of contentment. When the metta is present—I'm sure you've already experienced this to some extent—we can really rest. We can really stop searching, stop looking for anything else. Because as the Buddha said, this is one of the most sublime states that there is. Why would we want to look any further? It is so sweet.

One of my Tibetan teachers is a lama named Sokyni Rinpoche. He's considered to be the third in his line of reincarnate lamas. You probably know how the Tibetan teaching system works—they replace themselves after they die. He's considered to be the third in his line. The first Sokyni Rinpoche was a practitioner who put in a lot of effort in East Tibet. And this is Sokyni Rinpoche III. There was a poem by Sokyni Rinpoche I that had a line I really like. It said: "There is nothing else to search for. Rest in your natural face."

When we contact that feeling of metta, we have the feeling of coming home. We know we're there and we can rest in that. That is our natural face.

That is our own home. And it's utterly wholesome. There is nothing to doubt or mistrust or be worried about in the feeling of metta. You can completely trust in that feeling. Because it's so wholesome, it utterly blocks the arising of the unwholesome. The difficult states of mind that we encounter simply cannot arise when metta is strongly present.

Vipassana is supposed to be the insight meditation, but there's actually quite a lot of insight in the metta practice too. When we start feeling this kind of love for ourselves, for others, it affects the whole way we see the world. It changes our perception.

A friend of mine was recently talking with a teacher and describing some experiences. The teacher said, "Well, you know, experiences in meditation are of two kinds. There's one kind that has to do with different mental states, and there's another kind of perception." The experiences that come from a shift of perception are actually the more transformative.

The metta practice causes a shift in our perception of the world. We actually see things differently. We feel things differently in our body when metta is present for us. It's extraordinary because we can have this feeling of metta for one person—ourselves, a benefactor, or a dear friend—and when that feeling fills our heart, the whole world looks different. This is the magic of the practice. We generate that flame, we find those sparks around one person, but it changes our relationship to the whole world.

In other traditions, there's a lot of emphasis placed on the element of devotion. The Christian path, if taken up as a path of contemplation, is basically a devotional path, often toward Jesus, toward Mary, or toward the saints. In the Hindu tradition, there's a long-standing tradition of bhakti yoga, a devotional path within Hinduism. In some of the Buddhist traditions, there are also strong devotional elements. One of the foundation practices in some schools of Buddhism is called union with the teacher. One visualizes either the Buddha or one's teacher or teachers. In that visualization, one comes to hang out with them so closely, so intimately, that one begins to feel their qualities as one's own qualities. There's a union. You might almost say there's a kind of Vulcan mind meld that takes place.

You may have experienced this because our benefactor practice is a little like this. When I first did the metta practice, I did it in a six-week retreat, and I spent the first three weeks with my benefactor. At the end of the three weeks, I was told to move on to a good friend, and I was actually a little reluctant to go because I had chosen one of my Dharma teachers, and it was like having darshan every day. It was just hanging out with this loving, wise, free being day after day for every waking hour. It was terrific.

At times, I had a real sense of merging with that person. Someone in the group reported this today also—that one of the persons they'd chosen for their metta practice, they had a sense the person was no longer out there, but had come right inside them. That was my experience also, strongly with the benefactor. In feeling their good qualities, I realized that I couldn't feel those qualities unless they were also in me. Being with the benefactor, we as it were absorb their love, their wisdom, their kindness, their freedom just through that intimacy of contact.

More and more we find as this friendly heart emerges that this warm and close and intimate feeling develops with the rest of the world, sometimes in ways we don't quite expect. I'd been doing the metta practice for a while at my first retreat, and I was standing outside doing walking meditation, as many of you were today, and directing it to people who came by. Out on the street, there was a guy driving a garbage truck. It was somebody who in my normal life I wouldn't have come in contact with. Most garbage truck drivers don't come on retreats like this. But I looked at that guy and I just wished him happiness and I felt so much love for him. I felt like he could have been my brother. There was no division between us.

These kinds of strange connections pop up with the metta practice. Part of what's happening is that there's a unification going on. With devotional practices and with metta practice, the quality of love begins to unite the mind. It leads to oneness. It leads to merging.

There's this lovely quote from Nisargadatta Maharaj that some of you heard in the last retreat where he says, "Wisdom tells me that I am nothing. Love tells me I am everything, and between the two, my life flows." That's sort of our vipassana practice—wisdom tells me that I am nothing. Love tells me I am everything.

Within our tradition, Vipassana tells us we're nothing, and metta tells us we're everything. It unites us with the whole world. It melts the barriers that we've constructed through making distinctions. At times when I was practicing metta, I couldn't tell the difference between my mind and my body. I sometimes wasn't quite clear about what was inside me and outside me. And there was a way in which it became very clear that even though we're separated, our bodies are separated by physical space, we're actually both here now. For me, you are here now. And there's a way in which for you, I am here now. And that sense of space as a separator goes away and space becomes more an area in which we can feel our connection, through which we can relate.

We have a deep longing for this kind of relationship with the world, for this experience of oneness and connectedness with the world. It's as though in the metta practice we're unfolding some deep parts of our nature that we've forgotten about. We knew this way of being as children, if not since, and we long to find it again, to touch it again.

Another poem from Rilke expresses some of this: "I'm too alone in the world yet not alone enough to make each hour holy. I'm too small in the world yet not small enough to be simply in your presence like a thing just as it is. I want, in the hushed moments when the nameless draws near, to be among the wise ones or alone. I want to unfold. Let no place in me hold itself closed, for where I am closed, I am false. I want to stay clear in your sight."

Staying clear in the sight of God is a good description for our metta practice. This kind of unfolding brings a real sense of wholeness to our being. It brings a huge degree of integration because in the light of love, the parts that we had found unacceptable now become acceptable. The parts of ourselves like fear, anger, grief, shame, or guilt that we have pushed aside or pushed down can be accepted, can be owned, can be integrated in the light of love. So there's a tremendous amount of healing through the metta practice.

You might say that the early stages of Vipassana practice dissolve us. We see the constituent parts. As the Buddha talked about, we see the five aggregates. We break ourselves down into body, feelings, perceptions, mental formations, consciousness. We see that there's no solid core or solid center holding it all together. But the metta practice puts us back together. The metta practice integrates all the pieces through the influence of this love or friendliness.

So metta is said to be cohesive like the element of water. You know how when you spill water on the ground, it puddles together, it coheres. If you drop a glass and break it, it shatters apart. So like water, metta brings things together. And also like water, metta is sweet and wet and juicy. It's kind of the juice of our practice. And sometimes Vipassana—a number of people have said in interviews and groups—the Vipassana practice can sometimes feel a little dry, a little like our heart isn't fully engaged. Metta is the complement that brings out that heart warmth.

Another way to say it is that the Vipassana practice reveals emptiness and metta fills it with warmth. Another of my teachers said, "Compassion is the juice of emptiness," or "Metta is the juice of emptiness."

Some people say that metta develops naturally with Vipassana and I think there's truth in that. I think that it does to some extent. One of my teachers said early when I asked him about that, "Love is the child of freedom," saying that the path to love is to discover freedom, and then love unfolds. I think there's truth to that, but my personal point of view is that for different people, the love dimension unfolds in different ways. And for myself, I felt that I needed kind of a booster shot, which is what the metta practice has been for me, to really open the heart side of myself. And that although the heart side was opening to some degree, with the metta practice it has opened a lot, lot more. It's been a really powerful adjunct to Vipassana. So everyone can decide for himself or herself. But this heart quality of the metta is a really sweet quality in the spiritual life. And when it's missing, when it's not there, somehow we don't have the ability to touch others as deeply.

The unification of the metta practice is one of its strongest features. And what's particularly powerful about the way that we practice here is that the unification of the metta is supported by the unification of the concentration. So I want to talk a little bit about the concentration aspect of our practice.

Basically, the concentration means to gather in the attention that we're normally dispersing. Throughout a normal day, we have lots of thoughts, lots of feelings, hopes and fears and likes and dislikes sort of constantly running through. And all of those sort of random, chaotic thoughts and feelings really disperse our energy. They take the energy and feed it in a lot of different directions. With our practice either of Vipassana or of metta, we start to gather that energy back and direct it toward an object.

In vipassana to the breath, in metta to the phrases. There's tremendous power when we collect this kind of energy. When you hear stories of yogis who have developed amazing powers of mind, it's through this gathering of energy.

There's one teacher that I think about named Ajahn Mun. Ajahn Mun was a Thai master in the early part of this century, and he was Ajahn Chah's teacher. He was a very, very strict forest monk in Thailand. A lot of you, I know, have been suffering with colds and coughs this week. At Ajahn Mun's monastery, even if you had malaria, you were expected to do a full schedule. So I don't know if you've had malaria or known anyone who has—it's a terrible disease. You're wracked with fever. You get chills and shaking. And Ajahn Mun expected his students just to keep sitting the full schedule. So he was very, very fierce.

One of his favorite practices for students was to send them out in the forest where the tigers roared. At that time in Thailand, there were still lots of tigers around, and he felt that was really good for working with fear. Very good practice.

Well, Ajahn Mun had developed some of these powers of mind that come with strong concentration, and it was said that he could read people's minds. It's one of the powers that's said to come with concentration. So he'd be with his assemblage of monks, giving instructions, giving a meditation talk, and all of a sudden he would stop and he would say, "Someone's having lustful thoughts." And he would sort of sweep the audience with his gaze. I mean, in any assemblage of celibate people, chances are someone is going to be having those kinds of thoughts, so he could have been right anyway. But you can imagine how you would feel if you were such a person. I thought about doing that tonight, but I didn't want to embarrass anybody, so I didn't.

So that's one of the powers of mind that comes from the development of concentration. Another yogi who had great abilities in this direction was Dipa Ma, who I'm sure you've heard Sharon talk about. One of Sharon and Joseph's early teachers, someone who I had a chance to spend a little bit of time with. Seemingly a very simple and humble woman, but incredible powers of mind.

Someone asked Dipa Ma once what was in her mind and she said just three things: concentration, peace, and metta. Wouldn't it be nice to inhabit a mind like that? Goodness.

Dipa Ma had developed some of these powers that come through concentration and she was said to be able to recollect her past lives. In Buddhism, that's one of the things in Asia that's quite taken for granted, that we have had past lives. And Dipa Ma was said to be able to recollect them to the extent that she could travel back in the sequence through her past lives, remember the life when she lived in the time of the Buddha, and listen to the Buddha give discourses. So if you keep practicing your metta, see, they say these things happen.

So for us, maybe we won't recollect a past life in the time of the Buddha, but we can still benefit from this concentration. We're building the concentration every time we return to the phrases or to the image of the metta practice. This is the focus for us. This is our chosen object. In coming back again and again and again, we're developing that quality of concentration.

What happens as the concentration develops is that our attention becomes steady and stable. Instead of flitting off here and there, to the past and the future, all over the map, we find the ability to stay with our chosen object for longer and longer periods of time.

In vipassana practice, we use this stability primarily for insight. It's not considered that crucial an end in itself. We use it toward the end of understanding, of seeing things as they are. And it's like if you were on a carousel and you're going round and round and round and a friend came up and held out a newspaper for you to read. They came up to the edge of the carousel and they held out a newspaper for you to read. Could you read it while you were going around on the carousel? Not very well. And that's what our normal life is like. We're stuck on this carousel. Sometimes it feels more like a hamster cage of thoughts and hopes and fears and likes and dislikes. And we're trying to read the news. But we're going around too fast and we can't quite read the news.

When the carousel slows down and we come to a stop in front of the newspaper, ah, then we can read it. And what does the news say? The news says things are changing. Nothing is permanent. Nothing is stable. That's the news we need to read.

And we're trying to read the news. But we're going around too fast and we can't quite read the news. When the carousel slows down and we come to a stop in front of the newspaper, ah, then we can read it. And what does the news say? The news says things are changing. Nothing is permanent. Nothing is stable. That's the news we need to read.

So curiously enough, in our vipassana practice, the real purpose of stability is to see change, is to see impermanence. But in the metta practice, we see stability as an end in itself. You could say in a way it's one of our goals in the metta practice to develop that steady attention that is known as concentration because that also unifies the mind. That also brings the mind together and collects it. So the unification of concentration strongly supports the unification that comes from the metta. They both support one another. And that's why this is such a powerful integrative practice. Both practices together are working to bring the mind to a point, to make it one.

Of course, the stability is also impermanent. There will be times when you're really focused on the phrases, on the image, when everything seems steady and you can sustain the attention all the way through a sitting or a walking, and then the next sitting it may all dissolve, and more thoughts and energy and feelings are just flooding through you. That's okay. Metta practice, like vipassana practice, has these cycles of stillness and activity, stillness and activity.

We could say that in our vipassana practice there is no goal, in the near term at least. There's this goal of full enlightenment, but that might not happen this week for all of us. So the rest of us have to think about a more immediate situation. And this fact really came home to me during the three-month course I was just sitting, which Sharon and Carol were both teaching. And Sharon said something a couple of times in the hall in the morning that really stuck with me. I'd heard it before, and I probably said it before, but there was something about the way she said it and the timing that went very deep for me.

And what she said was, people were asking questions about difficulties, and she said, "It doesn't matter what you're experiencing. What matters is whether you're aware of it." And this is in the context of vipassana practice, of teaching vipassana. It doesn't matter what you're experiencing. And I reflected on that during the day, and I thought, that is really radical. I mean, I spend most of my life trying to make myself feel certain ways and not feel other things. And here's Sharon telling me, all that doesn't matter. What really matters is whether I'm aware of it or not.

It was a beautiful pointing to the direction of freedom because the liberating factor in vipassana practice is awareness. Awareness, you might say, points to the unchanging in the middle of all the sea of change. Because vipassana is the foundation of our metta practice, we do this metta practice in the context of our vipassana practice, we can also say that that's true here. In a very bottom line way, a very fundamental way, it really doesn't matter what we experience here either. All the difficulties that come, all the ways that the mind gets distracted, the struggles with the mind states and moods and emotions of fear or anger or self-doubt or critical judgment—those are actually all fine because we hold that within the overall context of our whole journey. Whatever arises is okay. It's acceptable.

At the same time we are practicing metta and we are practicing concentration, so you could say when we look at the metta practice alone, we could say within that we have some goals—the goal of bringing forth this friendly heart, the goal of unifying the mind. And because we have these goals or sub-goals, you might say, we can get ourselves into some trouble. It can be a little tricky to work with goals.

First, because both these goals are impermanent. Whatever is of the nature to arise is of the nature to pass away, as the Buddha said. So we find the heart doesn't always stay open. Sometimes it's open and sometimes it closes. Concentration can be there in one sitting and gone in the next. And we start to realize that these are somewhat impersonal factors that are really beyond our control. We can set the conditions, we can lay the groundwork for the metta and the concentration arising, but we can't actually make them happen. They have their own natures and our body and mind has its own nature. Sometimes they come together, sometimes they don't.

So we really need to have that understanding of change and impermanence in relation to both these sub-goals that we work with. And we have to learn how to make a full effort and not be so concerned about the immediate result. This is really a trick. This really takes some craft and some skill.

I'm going to steal a story that may have been told in the last retreat because not many of you were there. And that is about a young karate student in Japan who wanted to learn to be really good in the art of karate. And so he journeyed to find the greatest teacher in the country. And he went up to the teacher and he said, "I want to be the greatest karate student in all of Japan. How long will it take me?" And the teacher said,

"Ten years." The student said, "Ten years? I'll work twice as hard as all your other students. Then how long will it take me?" The teacher said, "Oh, in that case, twenty years." And the student said, "Twenty years? No, no, no, you don't understand."

I'll work night and day. I'll train at every available waking moment. Then how long will it take me?

And the teacher said, "Oh, in that case, 30 years."

The student said, "Well, how can you say that? I'm willing to do anything."

And the teacher said, "One who has one eye on the destination only has one eye left to see the way."

This is really true for our metta practice. If we have one eye on the destination, whether it's metta or concentration, we really only have one eye left to see the way, and we need two eyes to see the way.

This came home to me very strongly on my first metta retreat. I had been practicing for a few days, and I was getting quite concentrated, and it felt wonderful. I've never had a lot of concentration in my practice, so this was like going from broccoli to ice cream for me. And then something happened externally, and the concentration fell apart. Concentration has this slightly impermanent quality, unfortunately.

When it fell apart, I was bound and determined to get it back. I reached for those metaphors with all my energy and really tried hard, but nothing was happening. I was getting tighter and tighter.

I went to see my teacher, who at that time was Joseph, and I told him what was going on. Joseph just looked at me and said, "We're not doing this practice for ourselves. It's for the others."

All of a sudden, the light went on. Oh, right. I had been doing the practice just to get back my own happiness. I had been forgetting that the practice is about wishing others happiness as well.

As soon as he said that, I thought, "Okay." I went back out, let go of my disappointment, let go of that goal, and just reconnected with that simple wish: "Oh, may you be happy." The practice started to settle back down, the calmness came, and the concentration settled back in. It was a very interesting lesson.

It's like when you feel like being generous in order to get the fruits of generosity. I don't think that works either. We really need to learn how to be generous in order to be generous. And we need to learn how to do the metta practice in order to feel metta for other people and for ourselves.

But that little urge of happiness toward ourselves or others is the purity of intention that we have to keep coming back to. If we have that, everything else unfolds from there. If we lose that and just strive for the pleasant feeling or the concentration, we'll wrap ourselves up in knots. We'll just get ourselves more and more deeply bound.

When we really start to trust in that purity of intention and the practice flows, it can be beautiful.

Often we feel victimized by our own thoughts and feelings. If you look at what really causes us the most difficulty in our practice, sure, bodily pain is one thing, but honestly it's our own mental states and reactions and thoughts and hopes and fears that truly torment us. We could say that we're really victimized by our own mind stream—this flow of thoughts and images and emotions that makes up the content of our mind.

In the vipassana practice, we learn to relate to our mind stream in a very non-interfering way. That's the essence of the practice: to be with things as they are without disturbing them.

But when you think about what we're doing with the metta practice, it's actually quite audacious because we're starting to directly influence that mind stream. First of all, we're controlling the thoughts that go on by repeating the same phrases again and again. We're taking control of the thoughts in our mind stream. By holding the image of a friend or a benefactor, we're starting to take control of the image part of the mind stream. And when the metta starts to flow, we find that we're also able to influence the feeling or the emotional tone of the mind stream.

When all three of these pieces come together—the thoughts or the phrases, the image, and the feeling of metta—we have more or less composed that mind stream in a very wholesome way. This is a huge undertaking. It's revolutionary to think that we have a direct influence over our own mind stream, to which so often we are just the victim.

Because it's such a huge undertaking, you really need to be patient with its development. Sometimes only one piece will come together—only the phrases will be there, the image is weak, there's no feeling. Sometimes maybe two things will come together: the feeling and the phrases, or the image and the phrases. Sometimes maybe none of them will come together. So you really need to be patient.

If you can even sustain a thought for a short period of time, that's a huge stride over what we do in our daily life, where the mind is just buffeted from one random thought to the next, from one feeling to the next. So this is a great undertaking—be patient as you take these steps.

Once you start to get the flavor of the phrases, the image, and the feeling all coming together, it's enormously empowering. We learn in a limited way how to fashion our own mind stream, how to fashion it in a very wholesome way. And when it's in that wholesome state, it actually, again as love does, suppresses the unwholesome aspects of mind—what Sharon described last night as the hindrances of sense desire, of aversion, of dullness, of restlessness, and of doubt. Those qualities simply cannot arise when the mind stream is shaped in this particular way by the practice.

I want to talk a little bit, before I finish, about some of the factors that develop as concentration deepens. In the tradition, these are referred to as the jhanic factors. Jhanas are described in the Buddha's suttas as deep states of concentration where the mind is, as it were, absorbed within itself. There are certain qualities of mind that, when developed and maintained, lead to these absorptions called jhanas. I want to mention them tonight because some people have already reported in the interviews today experiencing some of these things. So I just want to let you know that you can start to tune into these as signs of developing concentration.

The first of the five factors is called vitaka in Pali, the old language of the Buddhist texts. It's usually translated as aiming or connecting, and it means that sense of connecting our attention to the object—in this case, primarily the phrases.

The second factor is called vichara, usually translated as sustaining. Where vitaka is that initial movement of mind that connects firmly with the phrase, vichara is that quality of mind that can sustain the attention on the phrase for some period of time.

The third factor is called piti, usually translated as rapture, also translated as delight or rapt attention. It's the joy that we find in our practice when we really feel wholeheartedly connected and we're enjoying doing this metta practice. There's a sense of rapture that comes with that. This is a mental quality, but sometimes it expresses itself through the body, through sensations. There may be a release of energy throughout the body. There may be a sense of a chill or a shiver—different ways that it can manifest.

The fourth factor is called sukha, usually translated as happiness. This is one of the qualities that develops with metta. Someone mentioned in an interview the other day that they like to practice with a smile on their face. Other people said that sometimes, just in the development of the metta, the smile came out naturally. That expression of the smile is that quality of sukha coming through. There's a happiness when we can feel in touch with the metta and feel in touch with our friends and benefactors.

The final factor is called ekaggata, translated as one-pointedness. It really means that collectedness of mind where we can bring all our attention to bear to be with the phrases, the image, and the feeling of the metta practice.

You might start to notice if these factors are present in your practice: the sense of connecting with the phrases, directing the attention and connecting; the sense of sustaining that attention; the delight or rapture in the connection with the practice; the happiness that comes; and the unified mind or one-pointedness that comes with the practice.

All these qualities come out of the sense of right effort. This right effort is, again, just very simply getting in touch with that purity of intention and expressing it through the phrases. That's really all we need to do. If we try to force the metta or force the concentration, that's when we tie ourselves in knots. It's really not possible. It's not workable. It doesn't happen like that.

One of the things that took me a long time to see—I came into the metta practice from doing a lot of vipassana and I thought, "Oh, this is a really active practice. I guess I have to stay busy all the time." You may have felt that. It is an active practice. It's a practice where we're making effort moment after moment after moment. Because I thought it was just an active practice, I bore down a little too hard. I put a little too much pressure into the phrases, into the image.

What I learned after a while is that there is an active side to metta, but there's also a side that's like prayer. In a lot of ways, these phrases are like prayers. And what do you do after you make a prayer? You surrender. You go into an utterly receptive frame of mind. So that's the other side of our metta practice—to feel this high degree of receptivity that acknowledges, "Yes, I have this purity of intention, I wish well for others or for myself," and then we really surrender because we don't know what will come from that. The surrendering part is just as important as the active part.

So there's a high degree of openness in our metta practice as well—finding that balance between the active part of our practice and the truly receptive part where we simply open to what is. And again, from these humble beginnings comes what the Buddha described as this immeasurable deliverance of mind.

I'd like to share his description of metta along these lines. The Buddha spoke of how a practitioner abides pervading one quarter of the world with a mind imbued with loving-kindness. Likewise the second quarter, likewise the third, likewise the fourth. So above, below, around, and everywhere, one abides—and to all as to oneself—pervading the all-encompassing world with a mind imbued with loving-kindness, abundant, exalted, immeasurable, without hostility and without ill will. This is called the immeasurable deliverance of mind.

This immeasurable deliverance of mind begins very simply with this quality of friendliness. Friendliness is the alchemy of the path. What a moment of friendliness does when it contacts suffering is transform that moment of suffering into a moment of goodness.

So we can begin to ask ourselves as we bring forth this friendly mind more and more: What in our life can we not open to with this friendly mind? What experiences do we encounter—like the hindrances—where that friendly mind goes away and instead we're stuck in resistance, in aversion? At that point what we need to do is find that fire of metta, steal that fire of metta, and open to that experience too.

Because in the Buddha's understanding, there's nothing in the world, no experience possible that blocks that mind of friendliness. And when we find that same degree of openness, then we too have become like the Buddha. We've become imperturbable. But it's an imperturbability that's not closed or shut off—it's very open and deeply connected.

I want to finish with a poem from Rumi. To understand this poem, you just need to know that the word Shams refers to his teacher, Shams of Tabriz, who was the first person to unlock for Rumi the door of the divine. He often uses the word Shams as synonymous with the divine.

Don't unstring the bow. I am your four feathered arrow that has not been used yet. I am sunlight slicing the dark. What is hidden in our chests? Laughter. What else? Compassion. What is love? Gratitude. Someone asks, how does love have hands and feet? Love is the sprouting bed for hands and feet. Your father and mother were playing love games. They came together and you appeared. Don't ask what love can make or do. Look at the colors of the world. The river water moving in all rivers at once. The truth that shines in the face of Shams.

Let's sit for just a minute in silence, holding these words: To all as to oneself, one abides pervading the all-encompassing world with a mind imbued with loving-kindness, abundant, exalted, immeasurable, without hostility and without ill will. This is called the immeasurable deliverance of mind.

CHAPTER 207

Faith (Saddhā)

Guy Armstrong · 50 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines faith (saddhā) as an essential element of Buddhist practice, beginning with the Buddha's teaching on purification of mind. Drawing from the Visuddhimagga (Path of Purification), he explores how the three root causes of suffering—greed (lobha), aversion (dosa), and delusion (moha)—manifest as the five hindrances in meditation practice. Armstrong demonstrates how mindfulness transforms our relationship to these unwholesome states, not by eliminating them but by bringing clear awareness to them.
> The talk delves into faith as "placing one's heart upon" something trustworthy, distinguishing it from blind belief. Through the story of Bāhiya and the Buddha's teaching on "just the seen, just the heard," Armstrong points toward a deeper understanding of non-self and the possibility of liberation through non-clinging. He explores how genuine faith emerges from direct experience and insight, ultimately leading to trust in awareness itself and the innate wisdom within. The teaching concludes with reflections on surrender, the unified mind, and living in accord with the Dharma.

I'd like to talk this evening on the subject of faith, and I'd like to introduce it by a particular angle, which is the purification of mind.

One of the Buddha's statements summed up his teachings in this way. He said: "Help others when you can. Don't harm living beings and purify the mind. This is the teaching of all the Buddhas." It's very simple, really.

One of the main commentarial texts in our tradition is a book called the Visuddhimagga. That title translated literally means "the path of purification." And so that is really what we're embarked on in the practice—the path of purification. We might ask, well, what is it that is supposed to be purified? What is it that needs to be refined?

There's a cartoon that I like that sort of points to our human dilemma. It shows a human being on the edge of a lake, and a series of creatures have evolved from the lake. There's a tadpole crawling right out of the lake on the sand, and the thought bubble in the tadpole's mind is: "eat, survive, reproduce." The next creature crawling up out of the lake is a lizard, and the thought bubble out of the lizard's mind is: "eat, survive, reproduce." The next creature is a bird with the same thought bubble. Then there's a monkey—"eat, survive, reproduce." Then there's a human being standing there, and the human being goes: "Hmm, I wonder what it's all about."

This may be our question when we come to sit. What are all these strong and seemingly primordial forces that are stirring within our being when we come to our meditation cushion or our walking space and just plan to be calm?

The Buddha talked about three fundamental forces in the mind that cause difficulty, that cause unhappiness. He said that these three root tendencies are really the cause of all the other unhappy states. These are our tendencies—the mind's tendency to greed, to wanting more than we need; to aversion, to the dislike of our experience; and to delusion or ignorance, the tendency not to see clearly the way things are.

We can take a look at our practice over these two days and we may, if we look closely, be able to see the traces of one or two of these tendencies of mind.

This inclination of wanting comes so often. Did you find yourself on your cushion today ever wanting to be somewhere else? Wanting to experience something else? Often a desire comes for something more pleasant, something more entertaining than just the breath or just the next step.

The force of aversion—what in our practice today did we resist? What experiences came that we didn't really want to have happening? What did we find in our moments of meditation that we couldn't really open to or accept? That's a movement of aversion at work, of wanting to push away what's unpleasant.

Or what have we not really seen clearly today? The third of these forces is less familiar to us—the force of ignorance or delusion. It's not seen clearly. Often we overlook what we find neutral. When there's an experience in our life, whether it's a person or a taste or an experience in the body, that isn't highly charged one way or another—it's not particularly pleasant, it's not particularly painful—we tend to gloss over it because it doesn't have enough charge for us.

Sometimes our relationship to the breath is founded on this factor of ignorance. How many times have you moved away from the breath because it wasn't very exciting? Actually, the breath is a beautiful meditation object. It's chosen as our beginning focus for awareness partly because of this neutral aspect. It doesn't stir us particularly one way or another. So we can see that tendency of mind that isn't fascinated by the neutral, that wants to slide away into something more gripping, something that delights or even something that disturbs. We find both much more entertaining.

So beginning to see in our practice the movement of these three forces: the wanting to hang on to what's pleasant or change to something that's pleasant, the pushing away of what's unpleasant, and this quality of ignoring what is neutral. These three inclinations of mind can keep us restlessly busy not only through our meditation practice but in our daily outside lives as well. We see those movements much more clearly when we slow down and can simply pay attention to the mind. But it doesn't mean that it's only in our meditation that these activities are going on, that these tendencies are expressing themselves. We see them clearly here because they're highlighted against a more spacious background.

In our daily life, these tendencies tend to drive our activities and drive our relationships. They can keep us in constant movement inwardly. There can be a constant sense of restlessness, of being pushed and pulled by these various forces in the mind. And when our life is like that, when our meditation is like that, we can't find any peace.

We can't find any rest. We can't find a resting point. Because the next wave of one of these forces comes along and destroys that potential peace or calm.

These three tendencies of mind not only keep us often in a state of turmoil or agitation, but the Buddha said that they're actually the root causes of our suffering. This is a direct quote from the Buddha: that one should make an end to suffering without making an end of greed, aversion, and ignorance—this is impossible. These three states, you could say, are virtually synonymous with our situation of suffering when we are in a state of suffering. You could also say that these three in different combinations are the roots, the combining qualities of all the unhappy states that we experience.

As human beings, we've all known the range of joyful states of mind—delight and friendliness and excitement and joy and so forth. We've also, as human beings, known the full range of the difficult or unhappy emotions: the states of fear or anger or depression or grief or sorrow. The Buddha said that these three tendencies of greed, aversion and delusion, when compounded, make up all the unhappy states of mind, all the suffering states of mind in different combinations.

There are five of these states in particular that it's helpful to tune into in our meditation practice. These are the states called the five hindrances. Those of you who have been to a few meditation retreats probably know these very well. They become real old friends in our practice. But for those of you who are new, I just want to mention them briefly because they're important forces in the mind to tune into.

The five are sense desire, which we've touched on briefly and Christopher talked about last night; aversion, which is this element of disliking or resisting; sleepiness or drowsiness, which those of you who've been at the sittings after lunch are well familiar with; the state of restlessness, of inner agitation; and the state of doubt. The state of doubt is usually announced by the arrival of the phrase, "What on earth am I doing here?" which we usually experience a few times in the first few days of a retreat.

Start to become familiar in your practice with the movement of desire, when there's a feeling of wanting some other experience or wanting to be somewhere else. Look at how that affects the mind. When there's a movement to disliking, to pushing away our current experience, see how the mind feels when that state is present. Feel the contraction that that kind of resistance brings. Notice the cloud of dullness or drowsiness, the agitation of restlessness.

Doubt in some ways is the most insidious of all the hindrances because when doubt is there and we're unaware of it, it really cripples our motivation. We stop our practice. We stop looking when doubt is strong. We don't have the courage or the faith or the interest to keep looking, to continue to be mindful. So it can actually pull the plug on all of our practice.

If we can be mindful of these forces in the mind, of the five hindrances, then there is a possibility of not being caught by them. The hindrances are such that they have a way of seducing us into their worldview and seducing us out of a mindful and balanced attention. If we can stay centered in the present and just see the arising of desire as desire, the arising of aversion, dullness, restlessness, or doubt, then we can actually sustain our meditation practice in the face of these difficult forces.

But if we get unconscious, if we become unmindful, the chances are that we're simply swept away with the force and we lose that ability to be present to the moment. As the mindfulness develops and we're able to maintain mindfulness in the face of these hindrances, they don't have to be problems. They can simply be another focus for our awareness, another thing to be conscious of as we practice. But they're difficult energies because by their very nature they tend to seduce us out of that mindfulness. So it's very important to pay attention. These are typically the forces that undermine our ability to be aware, to pay attention.

The process of purification of the practice is one that primarily involves bringing the light of awareness into these distracting forces, whether we consider them the root causes of greed, aversion, and ignorance, or these compounded forces of the five hindrances. Purification is not necessarily a process that takes place over a long period of time. Any mind moment when you can bring a clear attention to any of these difficult forces of mind—that is a moment of purification. That is a moment when you've actually transformed a moment of confusion or greed or even hatred into a moment of clear seeing. The purification is happening in that moment.

It's not that these states have to go away immediately. It's not that you have to get rid of these states for that purification to begin. Rather, the presence of that clear attention is itself the purifying factor that transforms that moment from being caught in the unwholesome to greeting the unwholesome from a very clear and understanding place of mind. So the transformation is not so much that we get rid of these states, but we transform our relationship to them. When we can be aware of them clearly, they don't have the same power to move us, to bother us, to motivate us as they did before.

The purification takes place in any moment when you can bring that clear attention and understanding to each of these difficult states of mind. Mindfulness then starts to take the power out of the unhappy states, out of the states that lead to suffering. As the forces of greed and aversion and delusion lose their power in the mind, correspondingly, just like the opposite side of a balance, the forces that are their opposites become more strong, become increased.

The opposite of greed the Buddha usually described actually as non-greed. The opposite of aversion, being very precise, he described as non-aversion. And the opposite of delusion, he described as non-delusion. The Buddha often talked in these terms. I think he was very skillful with words and didn't want to set up goals for us to generate more desire around.

But speaking in more familiar terms, we know that the opposite of greed, or trying to gain more, is generosity—feeling that we have enough to give. The opposite of aversion or disliking is the mind of friendliness, or metta, which means loving-kindness in English. The opposite of delusion is the state of wisdom, or the state of seeing clearly things as they are.

So as the purification takes place and the qualities of greed, aversion, and delusion are decreased, correspondingly there's more generosity in our experience. There's more love and there's more wisdom. This is all in the direct work of awareness in relating even to the difficult states of mind. It's a direct outcome.

But in reducing the power of the difficult emotions, there's not just a quantitative shift going on. It's not just that our emotions kind of get healthier and stronger and better. That's sort of the bodybuilding model of meditation, where we want those wash-board abs and well-defined pecs. That would be that approach to meditation—polishing our emotions more and more highly for the rest of our meditation career, the sort of fixing ourselves project that can go on and on.

But I think there's also a qualitative shift that happens. More than just a shift in quantity, there's a qualitative shift in our experience that starts to happen with the practice of awareness. I describe it primarily as a shift in identity—that we stop taking ourselves to be one thing and learn a new way of seeing who or what we actually are.

As we're involved and consumed by these forces like greed, aversion, and confusion, they're generally in relation to one person. And guess who that person tends to be? They all tend to revolve around the I—all the self-centered concerns that we express through our thoughts, speech, and actions, trying to gain more pleasure, trying to keep the pain away.

As we let go of these individual self-concerns, the work of the isolated ego, then naturally, on its own, awareness opens to something greater. We realize that there is a greater force at work in the universe than just our own self-interest. And I would say it's at this point that the issue of faith becomes important or becomes relevant. This is where faith can become significant in our practice.

Faith is one translation of the Pali word saddhā. The root meaning of that word in Pali, as it's been explained to me, means to place one's heart upon.

So in our tradition, faith doesn't necessarily have anything to do with a system of beliefs. In some religious traditions, faith is really "Do you believe A, B, C, and D, and sign your name at the bottom, and then you're a member of our community." That's really not the way it's viewed in dharmic terms.

A synonym for faith might be trust. Another synonym that people like is confidence. So this Pali word saddhā has all three of these connotations: faith, trust, confidence. The key thing is that it's an experiential pointer—a pointer to something from our own experience of an inward conviction that doesn't have to do with a set of beliefs or views or opinions about anything.

And it's also not particularly about blind faith, where some teacher or some supposedly learned person says something and we say, "Oh yeah, that must be so because so-and-so said it." It's not particularly about that blind faith either. It really grows out of our own experience, our experience of meditation, our wise understanding of life. So the faith that we talk about in the Dharma is really a faith that comes out of our own experience.

So the question is, what do we place our hearts upon? What do we trust in? What do we have confidence in? Because constantly through our lives, we're expressing that trust and confidence in various elements. But when we actually stop to reflect about it, it's a little mysterious what we actually trust in.

There was a Calvin and Hobbes cartoon that I liked that sort of expressed this dilemma. This came out around Christmas time, and Calvin was talking to Hobbes, saying, "This whole Santa Claus thing just doesn't make sense. Why all the secrecy? Why all the mystery? If the guy exists, why doesn't he ever show himself and prove it? And if he doesn't exist, what's the meaning of all this?"

And Hobbes says, "I don't know, isn't this a religious holiday?"

And Calvin replies, "Yeah, but actually I've got the same questions about God."

So this is sort of the situation we find ourselves in.

If there is such a thing, why doesn't it show itself and prove it? So what do we have faith in? Do we have faith in our own thoughts, our own beliefs, our own emotions, our friends, our family, our teachers? All these things are pretty changeable, pretty subject to impermanence.

Traditionally, there is an answer within the Buddhist lineage. If you went to a classically trained practitioner in Asia and asked them what the proper source of faith was, I would almost guarantee that you would get the answer: the triple gem, or the three refuges—the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha. These are the areas in which a devout Buddhist should have faith.

If you have a connection to the tradition and these ring true for you, that's terrific. The Buddha was an amazing individual. His teachings, the Dharma, were very inspired and still inspiring. And the community of practitioners is a refuge for all of us. So if these words ring true for you, that's beautiful. They can be very valid and genuine sources of faith.

But if you don't, then I think it's important to look within your own experience and find out experientially what that source of faith is for you. One of the things I'll suggest, and it's something I hope that you really learn in this retreat, is that mindfulness or awareness is a tremendous source of faith. Mindfulness or awareness can always be trusted. There's not a situation where that quality of awareness is not a helpful resource, not a helpful tool. Over the time together, as you go through all the ups and downs that the retreat life brings, if you continue to trust in the power of awareness, you'll see how it carries you through all the difficulties that the retreat brings and all the joys that the retreat brings to a place of deeper understanding, deeper wisdom, and deeper trust. So awareness really is our ally on this whole journey and can always be trusted.

Awareness is also an avenue to insight. And insights are also great sources of faith. I had a friend who had done a lot of meditation practice and had had some very deep insights that she felt transformed her relationship to life. She described her meditation practice this way: "I did meditation of an analytical style for years and years." What she meant by this was a kind of meditation practice where we look at the changing nature of our experience very closely. We look at the arising of the breath, the arising of thoughts, the arising of sounds, the arising of sensations, and also, for each of those, the dissolution in their turn of those same phenomena. Everything in our experience that has the nature to arise also has the nature to pass away.

From looking at all these different phenomena, all characterized by impermanence, she realized that she couldn't say that she was any of those things, because they were all coming and going. She'd looked into her experience so carefully and so closely, she couldn't take herself to be any of those things because she could see them all coming and going. So she said, "From those years of analytic meditation, I clearly understood what I was not"—was not any of these phenomena that she could point to.

Then she said, "I had a really deep insight from an opening that came. And from that opening, I found out what I was." It's that finding out of what we are more truly or more deeply that becomes the real ground of faith, that becomes the source of a lasting faith.

When you look at great spiritual teachers, one of the things that I notice about them is that they seem to have discovered something completely trustworthy in life, and that they have in some way or to some degree surrendered to that. They've surrendered this incessant movement of self-concern that's fueled by wanting and not wanting, by hope and fear. They've surrendered that and let go into something that's vaster and far more trustworthy.

Suzuki Roshi, a great Zen master, put it this way: "We need to have faith in something that has no form or color, but that is always ready to take on form and color." This is kind of enigmatic—something that has no form or color. What is this, I wonder? Because everything that we can point to in our experience, all these phenomena that I was just referring to, all in their own way have a form or a color. Certainly sights we associate with that. Sounds sort of have a shape. Emotions have a coloration. Thoughts even seem to take a form in our mind. Anything that we can point to or describe, we could say has some sort of form and color. So it's nothing that we can directly experience with our senses, with our six senses. And yet it's something that's always ready to take on form and color. Isn't that mysterious?

I pondered on this statement for years in my own practice, and at first I thought that he was talking about something in the material world. I thought he was talking about some kind of raw matter—bare neutrons and electrons and protons, or some raw stuff that came about from the Big Bang and then took on form and color. I thought of it like that for years, and now I don't see it that way. Now I don't think of it as something material or external.

I don't see it as being out there so much. I more think what he's referring to, if we have to pick sides on this dilemma, is more on this side of things—the side of what's looking. And I now take this to mean something in the nature of the mind itself.

Because consciousness has this ability to take on any form and color that greets it in quite an impartial way. Consciousness takes on the painful as well as the pleasant. It takes on the beautiful as well as the ugly. There's no discrimination.

There's a quotation from Nisargadatta Maharaj, who was a teacher in the tradition of Vedanta in India. Someone asked him how his spiritual path unfolded. He described it this way: "I saw that in the ocean of pure awareness, the numberless waves of the phenomenal worlds arise and subside beginninglessly and endlessly. There's a mysterious power that looks after them. That power is awareness, life, God, whatever name you care to give it. It is the foundation and ultimate support of all that is, as gold is the basis for all jewelry."

In the ocean of pure awareness, the numberless waves of the phenomenal worlds arise and subside. Another pointer to that inward dimension. When we start to get a sense of that inner dimension and can start to release into it, then we let go of the clinging to all those phenomenal waves. We don't have to hold on to any of the appearances of the mind or of the body.

And this requires an act of faith. This is an act of trust. And this act of non-clinging is what the Buddha pointed to again and again and again as the direct avenue to liberation. Direct path to liberation.

So how can we get a handle in our practice of that avenue? There's a story from the Buddha's time about a man who had journeyed over half of India to come and see him and hear about his teachings. He'd heard about the Buddha as a great teacher, made this long journey, and finally caught up with him one morning when he was on alms round. Being a mendicant, he went about early in the morning to a nearby village to beg for his food, for his meal for the day.

And this man, whose name was Bahiya, caught up with the Buddha on alms round, immediately approached him and said, "Venerable sir, I've come a long way. I'd really like to understand your teaching. Can you briefly tell me what it is?"

And the Buddha said, "Not right now, sir. I'm gathering my morning meal. Can you see me later?"

He said, "I've come a very long way. I'm very impatient to hear your teachings. Can you please just give me a brief summary?"

And the Buddha said, "I'm sorry. This is not a convenient time. Please see me later."

So Bahiya was not to be put off. He asked the Buddha a third time, "Please, can you tell me your teachings, briefly?" And as always happens in these stories, if you ask the Buddha the third time, he always says yes. So it's said that he did this time. But he gave a very condensed version. And in this discourse, we almost are hearing the pith instructions of the Buddha for meditators.

And so what the Buddha said was, "All right, Bahiya, this is how you should train. In the seeing, let there be just the seen. In the hearing, let there be just the heard. In the sensing, let there be just the sensed. In the knowing, let there be just the known. This is how you should train herein."

This is very interesting. In the seeing, let there be just the seen. What's missing? The seer is missing, isn't it? The experiencer, the hearer, the sensor, the cognizer. It's a very interesting pointing.

In our meditation practice, when we are fully with the experience of the breath, when the interest, the attention, the energy, the presence is so complete that we are entirely with that sense of the breath going in and the breath going out, is there an I even in that situation? When the full awareness is taken up with this swinging door in the abdomen or this fluttering wave of sensation in the nose or the rising in the chest, is there any separate observer present to comment?

Begin to note the times in your practice when the awareness is so full, so complete, that the sense of I doesn't really seem to be present. Use this as an avenue to understanding the Buddha's instructions to Bahiya. Explore that sense of the separate observer that we call the experiencer or the I. See if that really has to be there all the time, or if that's something else that arises and also passes.

A medieval Christian contemplative, Angelus Silesius, put it this way: "God is a pure no-thing, concealed in now and here. The less you reach for that, the more it will appear."

When we relax, when we are not striving, when we are not driven by these compelling forces of liking and disliking, of hope and fear, when there's a sense of relaxation and greater harmony, then the sense of a separate I is not so strong. Become familiar with what that feels like in practice, when the I is not so strong. And when the I is not so strong and incessant with its demands, what is the quality of that moment? What is the quality of our experience at those times? Let that be a pointer—not stopping there, but letting that be a pointer.

Krishnamurti described this way of seeing the world as the awakening of intelligence. He spoke of a wisdom, an understanding already within us that only needs to be woken up. This intrinsic wisdom—not something we have to fabricate or create—only needs to be awakened, and it starts to explain the seeming mysteries of this world to us.

This sense of inner intelligence is not just something vague, not merely a buzzword, but something we can discover in our practice. In the beginning we may just get a sense or intuition that this rings true—that there is an intrinsic wisdom we can touch, that we can awaken. We get that intuition and that becomes the source of our faith for some time, just a sense of trust in our own feeling about that. As time goes by and we trust in that sense more and more, it may reveal itself more and more clearly until we know directly for ourselves through our own realization what that means.

As one surrenders into this innate intelligence, then one can take the hands off the steering wheel that we often grip so tightly to control our way through life. We can trust that this innate intelligence will take us through life situations easily, spontaneously, effortlessly.

Again, from Nisargadatta Maharaj: "You may not be quite conscious of your physiological functions, but when it comes to thoughts and feelings, desires and fears, you become acutely self-conscious. To me, these too are largely unconscious. I find myself talking to people or doing things quite correctly and appropriately without being very much conscious of them. It looks as if I live my physical waking life automatically, reacting spontaneously and accurately."

This is a statement from someone who has really taken the hands off the steering wheel, who has surrendered this small sense of grasping and control to this innate intelligence, this vast intelligence.

When the mind is released in that way, released from the clinging to all phenomena, then it becomes unbound in a particular way—unbound from any clinging. The analogy that the Buddha often used in the suttas to describe this unbound state of mind was like a fire that has gone out. When you see a flame hovering around a log, you can see how the flame is clinging to the fuel of the log. When the fire goes out, it is no longer clinging to its fuel. The Buddha said that's exactly what the mind of a liberated being is like—it has gone out and is no longer clinging to this world of phenomena.

The Buddha said: "When those who know seek a bhikkhu who is liberated, they do not find anything of which they can say his or her consciousness is supported by this. Why is that? Because one thus gone is untraceable here and now." One who is liberated is untraceable here and now, because the consciousness is no longer clinging to any phenomena.

The Buddha often described this sense of liberation in negative terms. One is untraceable. The mind is unbound. It is unfindable. It is not supported. He was reluctant to describe the state in positive terms, I think because he didn't want to set up a goal.

But other teachers and traditions have not been so reluctant to describe this liberated or awakened state. In the Hindu tradition, they speak of three words: Sat, Chit, Ananda. Sat means being—the appearance of the world of form. Chit means consciousness. And Ananda means bliss or delight.

And they talk about these three as an inseparable unity. When we look at our experience, they say this is a description of our nature—that we are always in contact with the realm of being, with the realm of form. We are conscious throughout the process, and there's an underlying sense of delight in that experience.

Now, touching this sense of delight may be a little remote after a couple of days of a meditation retreat. It may seem like the hindrances are really the uppermost of experiences. But I like to tune into that sense of delight or the joy of existence sometimes by just reflecting on the play of light. Often I'll just stop in the middle of the day, and there's something about the way that light plays on objects that to me always reveals that radiance, an inner radiance of existence that bespeaks that joy.

Thomas Merton put it this way: "There is in all things an inexhaustible sweetness and purity, a silence that is a fount of action and joy. It rises up in wordless gentleness and flows out to me from the unseen roots of all created being." Again, it's that combination of awareness, of being, and of delight.

We spend a lot of time in retreats like this talking about some of the difficult aspects of existence. We talk about the fact that it's impermanent, that there's no lasting refuge, that there's an element of unsatisfactoriness if we're looking for our happiness in the world of the senses. So the challenge is: in the full awareness of impermanence and unsatisfactoriness, can we trust? Can we find that faith to open and to trust, to not cling?

There's a haiku from the Japanese that expresses this combination of factors. It says: "Simply trust. Do not the plum blossoms flutter down just like that?" It's a beautiful image of release, the plum blossom fluttering down.

I think that all of us know on some deep level that the universe is really trustworthy, that the universe does have a core of goodness, of basic goodness, that can be trusted. But we forget. Children know this very well. There was this beautiful story—I don't remember the author or the source—but there was a mother who was sitting on the rim of a reflecting pool in some shopping center or office building. Her three-year-old daughter was walking around the rim of the pool, which was raised about two feet off the ground. The mother was sitting on the other side and she was thinking, "I know she's going to fall in. I just know she's going to fall in. Should I go grab her now or should I let her grow up and fall in?" And she decided to just let her daughter be on the edge of the pool.

So the daughter was walking around, and sure enough, a few seconds later, the daughter fell in the pool. She screamed, and the mother went over and pulled her out of the pool. And when the daughter came out of the pool, she said, "I thought I'd be afraid, Mommy, but when I slipped, my little voice said, 'Have fun falling.'"

Have fun falling. So on some deep level, I think we know to trust, but we forget. We forget to trust. We forget to have faith. And sometimes we don't quite know how to step out of the way. That I is so insistent with its conditioned responses.

Someone asked Nisargadatta Maharaj about his degree of freedom. They said, "Does your spontaneity come as a result of realization or by training?" And Maharaj said—you know, it's an interesting question. Is it just one flash of insight that liberates, or does this path of gradual training that we're all embarked on play a role? It's an interesting question. Maharaj said both. "Devotion to your goal makes you live a clean and orderly life, given to the search for truth and to helping people. Realization makes virtue easy by removing for good the obstacles in the shape of desires and fears and wrong ideas. Both are necessary."

So in our practice, can we start to tune into this phenomenon of the self, the small self when it expresses itself—these sometimes incessant demands of wanting and not wanting, of hope and fear? Can we come to know that simply as the movement of the I, the movement of desire in its different forms?

And then can we also come to know those times when the urgency of the self is not so strong, not so compelling? Look at your experience in those times. What are those moments like? Is there a sense of peace when that small I isn't active? Is there a sense of calm? Is there a sense of greater harmony? Is there a sense in those times of an active intelligence? Is there a sense of being able to trust at those moments?

It's not to say that faith is only applicable in those moments when the mind is quiet. If that were the case, this would be a very limited possibility, because our minds are always going to be back and forth between movement and stillness, movement and stillness.

But rather, it's in those times of stillness that we can start to receive those inklings—those glimpses into a deeper nature that is ever-present, that exists in the times of movement as well as the times of stillness. Our trust in that nature can sustain us through all the changes the mind goes through.

Faith can actually be a path in itself. This is not much talked about in the Buddhist tradition. Faith as a path is more commonly associated with the Hindu bhaktis or the Christian path. Yet this is something that the Buddha said to a bhikkhu in his time, one of his students. The Buddha said, "Pingya"—that was the name of the bhikkhu—"other people have freed themselves by the power of faith. Vakali, Bhadra Buddha, and Alavi have all done this. You too should let that strength release you. You too will go to the further shore beyond the draw of death."

Another time that the Buddha spoke about faith, he discussed it in terms of what he called the five spiritual faculties—five qualities of mind that when developed and maintained lead directly to liberation. The five spiritual faculties are faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom. He said that when these five spiritual faculties are developed and maintained, they reach to the deathless, they end in the deathless, they merge in the deathless. Deathless is another word for the absolute or the unconditioned or nirvana in the Buddha's vocabulary.

So faith can be a tremendous path in itself. This is from a poet named Lalla, a mystical poet who lived in northern India in the fourteenth century. She wrote long lines like Kabir, and she said: "Meditate within eternity. Don't stay in the mind. Your thoughts are like a child fretting near its mother's breast, restless and afraid, who with a little guidance can find the path of courage."

This is another expression of the path of faith.

I'd like to close with a quotation from actually one of my favorite texts in the whole Buddhist tradition. It's a little text called the Xin Xin Ming, a Chinese text that translates as Verses on the Faith Mind. This is from the conclusion of that text:

"For the unified mind in accord with the way, all self-centered striving ceases. Doubts and irresolution vanish, and life in true faith is possible. To live in this faith is the road to non-duality, because the non-dual is one with the trusting mind."

Let's just sit for a minute or two together.

For the unified mind in accord with the way, all self-centered striving ceases. Doubts and irresolution vanish, and life in true faith is possible.

CHAPTER 208

The Five Hindrances

Guy Armstrong · 46 min

> Guy Armstrong begins with the archetypal story of the Buddha's awakening night, drawing parallels between Mara's attacks and the internal forces that obstruct our spiritual journey. He explores the five classical hindrances (nīvaraṇa) that arise in meditation: sense desire (kāmacchanda), aversion (byāpāda), sleepiness (thīnamiddha), restlessness (uddhaccakukkucca), and doubt (vicikicchā). Using vivid analogies of a clear pool of water being obscured by weeds, dye, cloudiness, waves, and mud, Armstrong shows how each hindrance colors our perception and blocks clear seeing.
> The talk offers practical guidance for working with each hindrance through recognition, direct experience, and skillful antidotes. For desire, he suggests reflecting on impermanence; for aversion, cultivating metta (loving-kindness); for sleepiness, arousing energy; for restlessness, developing calm; and for doubt, strengthening faith. Armstrong emphasizes that freedom comes not from eliminating these mental states but from understanding them completely and meeting them with friendly awareness.
> Drawing from his own practice experiences and concluding with Rumi's poem "The Guest House," Armstrong presents the hindrances as uninvited but valuable teachers. He shows how the alchemy of practice transforms moments of confusion into awakened clarity through accepting whatever arises with mindful awareness.

One night in northern India, about 2,540 years ago, a young man sat underneath a bodhi tree. He had left home six years earlier and for that time had pursued very single-pointedly and with great ardor the spiritual practices taught by the foremost teachers of his day. But in all those six years, he had not come upon an answer to the quest that he had set out on, which was to solve for himself the problem of human suffering.

So he took a seat under the tree, and he said to himself, "I'm going to find out the answer to the problem of human suffering while sitting under this tree, or I'm going to die trying." The next time that forty-five minute sit before tea seems kind of long, you might reflect on that—the incredible devotion from this young man.

As he took his seat with that firmness of resolve and intention, almost inevitably, as you might expect, the first part of the evening was not easy. He was besieged by what have been called in the descriptions the armies of Mara. Mara is the eternal antagonist in the Buddhist texts. He always brings forces that oppose the seekers of goodness and light and truth. In this evening, he sought to dissuade the young man from continuing his quest.

The first thing that he did was to cause to arise in front of the young man visions of armies of fierce warriors descending on him with spears pointed at him and arrows nocked in their bows ready to be fired at him. Through this, Mara hoped to scare the young man off his cushion and away from his quest. But the young man was unmoved. He'd already made the intention to die trying if need be. So fear didn't affect him. He sat unmoved, continued with his investigation.

Mara felt he was slightly foiled but not giving up, brought out his next weapon. He caused to appear before the young man images of three beautiful women, alluring and enticing, hoping to draw the young man off his quest by the force of wanting, by the force of desire. But the young man had experienced all the kinds of sensual pleasures when he was growing up, and he knew that they were limited in their own way, and so again he was unmoved.

Finally, Mara drew his final weapon. He said to the young man, "Hundreds of thousands of people through the ages have tried to solve this problem of human suffering. None of them have been able to. What makes you think you can? What makes you so arrogant that you can presume to solve this problem in one night?" Mara was trying to arouse the force of doubt.

At this point, the young man struck a pose which has been illustrated many times in statues depicting this night's struggle. You can see it in the statue behind us tonight. He reached down with his right hand and placed it on the earth in that pose that's been called the gesture of touching the earth. And he said, "I ask the earth to bear witness. I ask the earth to witness how many lifetimes and how many years I have worked toward this understanding. Through countless lifetimes of generosity and giving and selfless service and purity of intention, the earth bears witness to my right to ask this question."

At that, Mara was truly vanquished. He gave up and went away. It's said that as the night wore on, the young man's insight and understanding continued to deepen until just before dawn he reached that ultimate realization that brought him the understanding that completely liberated him from suffering and became in that moment known, as he has been ever since, as the Buddha, the awakened one, the one who has awakened to the truth.

The life story of the Buddha not only functions as a beautiful and inspiring story of one human being, but it's really an archetype for all of our spiritual practices. The stage that you are at right now is the same stage that the young man was in when he took the seat under that tree and resolved to understand, despite the forces that might oppose him.

The forces that opposed him are also archetypal in their nature. These forces of Mara will rise up to obstruct anyone who tries to solve this question, who tries to make a journey to pierce the veil of ignorance and reach our true center, the center of freedom and understanding. Mara can be seen in this archetype as just the personification of the forces in our own minds and hearts that oppose our journey, that oppose our destination of wisdom.

The difficulties that you are experiencing now are actually an integral part of your spiritual life, and they will be with you for a while to come. The Buddha actually talked very specifically about five particular kinds of forces that obstruct us as we deepen in our practice. These are five energies of the mind that can act as obstacles to our practice when we're not aware of them, when we don't know how to work with them. But when we know how to work with them, they can be transformed into subjects for our meditation themselves and become sources of deep learning and wisdom and opening.

So I'd like to talk tonight about these five particular forces or energies that the Buddha spoke of many times in his life. They're classically known as the five hindrances. This terminology stresses their obstructive power, but they can also be five grounds for wisdom and understanding. So we want to talk about both aspects tonight.

The five, put very simply, are the forces of sense desire, of aversion or disliking, of sleepiness, of restlessness, and of doubt. These are forces that, as we begin to pay closer and closer attention in our meditation, we see are arising again and again. They arise very often in the course of our meditation practice. As we start to tune into them, we can see them more clearly. We also learn how to relate to them more skillfully.

The art of relating with these forces that are called hindrances is one of the major pieces of the craft of meditation. It's a key area of learning. These hindrances are tricky. They're sneaky, much like Mara creeping up on the Buddha that night. These forces try to trick us too. They try to deceive us. They try to knock us off our seats of wisdom.

When the hindrances are present and we're not aware of them, they color the mind in a certain way. It's as if we have a colored filter in front of our eyes and can only see the world through that hindrance. We can't quite see it clearly.

In classical terms, the analogy is made that the mind—the wisdom mind, which we all naturally possess—is like a pool of clear water. When you peer into a pool of clear water, you can see right to the bottom, and everything is transparent, crystal clear. The hindrances are likened to forces that come in and obstruct this view.

Desire is said to be like a pool that's become tangled in weeds, choked in weeds, because the forces of desire become very intertwined and intricate, like a net. The force of aversion or disliking is like putting a certain dye or color in the water—perhaps the color red, often associated with anger. Sleepiness is said to be like water that's become very cloudy. It's there, but you can't quite see through it. There's a murkiness, an obstruction to your vision just from the cloudiness.

Restlessness is said to be water that's been stirred up by wind on the surface. It's not necessarily anything that goes very deep, but it whips the water into waves and breaks up the clarity. Doubt is said to be like a pond that has been stirred up from a muddy bottom so that it's in turmoil all the way through, blocking our view.

With each of these hindrances, our view has become clouded in some way or another. The cloudiness is not because of the hindrance itself—it's because we believe in its story. When we believe in the story of the hindrance and become identified with it, then we slip into ignorance. We actually lose our mindfulness and our wisdom and slip into the ignorance of the spell that the hindrance can cast if we're not aware.

You may have seen this happening a few times over the course of the retreat. You may be very mindful of your breathing, in the middle of a walking period, present with each step of each foot, and then all of a sudden some irritation comes up. How could that person do that to me in the food queue? How could they take so much when there was only a little bit left? And then we start running around on that.

Or you're in the middle of walking meditation and you immediately remember—as Christina mentioned this morning—how important it is to rearrange your socks at that particular time. And before you even have a chance to think about what's happening, you're on your way to your room, imagining the sock drawer being opened.

When we don't see these forces in operation, they slip underneath the radar of our mindfulness, and they take us over before we even know what's happening. We react out of irritation, out of annoyance, out of anger, out of wanting, without even knowing that we're doing it. In doing that, we've lost our mindfulness. We're no longer in touch with what's happening in the present moment. We've surrendered the mindfulness and given our energy to a kind of blind obedience to the hindrance, whatever it might be. And this happens again and again.

This enchanting spell that the hindrances cast is why they can be such difficult subjects for our meditation. The key, clearly, is to take the mindfulness and turn it directly on the hindrance itself. That's how we fundamentally work with these energies.

If we give ourselves over and follow the story of the hindrance, we're led away from the present moment to something usually in the past or the future—the person who did something unskillful, the messy sock drawer—and all our energy is pointing in that direction. We can return to the present moment by just noticing that force of wanting or disliking or sleepiness or restlessness or doubt. In that noticing, we're right back in the present moment again. Our mindfulness has been recovered, restored to us.

So the first step in dealing with any of these hindrances is just to recognize that the hindrance is at work. In that step, it's very helpful to actually name the hindrance. Know for yourself whether it's the force of wanting, the force of disliking, or any of the others.

The next step is to turn the spotlight of awareness, turn that light of mindfulness, onto the energy itself. Let yourself feel the feeling directly. Feel how wanting feels. Feel how aversion feels. Feel sleepiness and restlessness and doubt. Let yourself experience it all the way through in the body and in the mind. Give yourself over to feeling these things just as they are.

That's the basic approach with each hindrance, and now I'd like to talk about each of them in turn, because there are specific ways to work with each one.

Sense-desire is defined as wanting some pleasant experience in any of the senses. In Buddhism, there are considered to be six senses. There are the five physical senses of sights, sounds, smells, tastes, and touch. In addition, there's the sixth sense of the mind. The objects of the mind as a sense door are thoughts, moods and emotions, states of mind, and images. So the hindrance of sense desire is wanting pleasant experiences in any of these areas.

It comes up often in the retreat setting, just around the things of the retreat. What do we want on a retreat? We want to be comfortable. We come in wanting the body to feel good. Maybe we've had one good sitting—a sitting where the thoughts quieted down a little bit and we could really connect with the breath and have a taste of the calm that's possible through the practice. Then we can't wait to get back into the next sitting after the walking because we know that's going to happen again. We really want that meditation again.

Or we want people to think we're a good meditator. Doing our walking practice, I used to have this fantasy that sometime at the end of a retreat, somebody was going to come up and say, "You were such a great walker, I really enjoyed walking next to you." I waited for twenty years and it still hasn't happened. I had a friend who said that he was working with the noting practice in his walking. In the noting practice, you often notice the lifting, the moving forward, and the placing of the foot. He was feeling a little bit self-conscious, and the note transformed into "lifting, moving, looking good." Looking good.

So this force of wanting comes up in many subtle ways in the retreat. It's not that these things are so unreasonable—we want people to like us, we want people to appreciate us. The problem is if we hang on to those wants when they're not able to be satisfied. And pretty much, it's hard to find out in the middle of a retreat if anybody likes you or not. If we're hanging on to that, we'll suffer if it's not there.

There's this amazing image that appeared of the suffering of clinging. It came in the Bay Area newspapers. There was a man who owned a blimp and made his living by taking people up for rides in the blimp for commercial purposes or recreation. He came back down after a flight to the landing field and tethered the blimp, but it wasn't quite tethered. He turned his back on it and the blimp started to lift off again. He turned around and saw his whole livelihood vanishing up in the air. He didn't know what to do. He was panicked and grabbed for one of the tie ropes. And he couldn't let go. The force of attachment was such that he could not let go. The paper reported that he was then carried up into the air by the blimp. But after a certain time, he couldn't hold his grip anymore. He fell to his death. The really sad part of the story is a few hours later the blimp lost enough of its air and landed back on the ground safely. But the force of attachment was too strong in that moment and he could not let go.

This is kind of the essence of sense desire—not being able to let go.

How can we work with the force of wanting? How can we work with sense desire? We live in a culture that really glorifies desire. All the advertising messages on television basically tell us that if you have the right deodorant and you drink the right beer, then you'll also be able to play beach volleyball with all those really nice-looking people. Basically, that happiness comes from satisfying sense desires.

But it's very interesting to investigate that. The next time you want something really badly—whatever it is, whether it's a good sitting or a good walking or a relationship or a job or a car—let yourself feel that wanting energy and feel whether it's pleasant or unpleasant. That raw wanting energy, when it's not being satisfied, is not very pleasant.

The question is, does the unpleasantness come because we don't have the object? Or does it come just out of the nature of that wanting energy? Because you'll be sitting here in meditation and you may be very happy, very contented, connecting with your breath, peaceful and calm, and all of a sudden a desire will come up for something you don't have. "Oh, I want to see a friend. Oh, I want to take that vacation next month. Oh, I want to get that job that I've heard about."

And the next moment, turmoil, turmoil. So the moment before, you were peaceful. You didn't have the object then either, and you were still peaceful. The wanting comes in, peace is gone. The disruption is there. That kind of agitated feeling of wanting is there.

So take a look at that. Is it the absence of the object or is it the wanting energy that is the source of the pain?

Our desires deceive us. They deceive us into thinking that our satisfaction lies outside of ourselves. The teaching of the Buddha was to take it back home. The teaching of the Buddha is that happiness lies in letting go of the desire itself. Then peace is there. Contentment is there.

So we need to see the desire clearly just for what it is. It's an urge. It's a longing. It's a force that arises in the mind. It lasts for a while. And then what do you know? It passes away.

This is also a revelation. All the hindrances are impermanent. If we allow them to come, they'll flower, they'll exist for a while, and by their very nature, they'll decay. In this retreat, we really have a beautiful opportunity to witness this again and again, to become really convinced that these forces aren't problematic because they'll go away on their own. You don't have to make them go away. They will go away. All you have to do is feel them, experience them.

One of the classical antidotes for desire, actually, is to reflect on impermanence—similar reflection, but this time in relation to the object. Say you get that object that's going to make you happy. Does the happiness last forever?

It's a curious thing, isn't it? If you look closely at the nature of this wanting, there is some wish that the next thing is going to provide a lasting happiness. But have any of them ever? Not really.

So we can reflect on the fact that whatever we gain, eventually it will cease to satisfy us. Either it will pass or the satisfaction will pass.

Manindraji, one of the early teachers of both Joseph and Sharon in India, had a real sweet tooth. And he used to reflect a lot on his desires for sweets. And so he worked with it in meditation in this way. He'd be sitting and be wanting something sweet and he'd say, "Okay, the mind wants ice cream. Let the mind go get ice cream. The body's staying right here." You can work with that one.

One of the other forces of desire that comes up is around sexual imagery. And sometimes on retreat this can be quite powerful. One of the things that's really helpful with sensual or sexual imagery is to note the pleasant quality of the image itself. Notice what it is that the desire is around. Just note that pleasant feeling in the images that are coming, and that can kind of undercut the attachment or clinging to it.

The second of the hindrances is called aversion, classically, sometimes translated as negativity. It's a basic force of disliking. Desire is wanting pleasant experience. Aversion is wanting to push away the unpleasant in life.

There's this one root stem of disliking, but it's a stem that has many, many types of blooms. This flowers as straight disliking, as anger, as fear, as sadness, as grief, depression, shame, guilt, boredom. There are a whole lot of variations on this basic state of aversion. I won't talk about them all tonight.

But I'll just hit a few of the high points or low points, as the case may be.

The primary antidote classically to aversion is the force of loving kindness, or metta as it's known in Pali. Later this week we'll be doing some guided meditations on the theme of loving kindness. You'll have some experience with this kind of practice. It's basically developing a mind that is friendly and loving toward ourselves, toward others, and in doing that, toward all of life, toward all of our experience.

This friendly mind obstructs aversion. When that sense of friendliness or love is there, the sense of anger or disliking really can't arise. So it's a very powerful antidote. What was not acceptable before in the light of love becomes acceptable. We can open to things in life that we couldn't open to before.

That's a long-term strategy. It's a very powerful strategy, and I speak as an aversive type. This is where my temperament tends—toward aversion. When I began to do metta practice intensively a couple of years ago, I found it very transforming. It has made a real difference in my life. I had been doing vipassana practice for eighteen years, and the aversive quality was shifted significantly after just a couple of years of metta practice. So for my fellow aversive types out there, it's highly recommended.

In working with disliking—again, disliking comes in many different flavors: irritation and frustration, impatience and judgment. You can feel the irritating quality when we're in a state of disliking. It colors the whole world. We may have just gotten irritated or frustrated about one thing, but when we're in that state, everything takes on the color of not being very appealing.

In addition, we tend to think that we're suffering because of some outside condition. It was the word that someone said to me that's making me feel bad. It was the fact that I couldn't quite accept the food that was offered today that's making me feel bad, or whatever.

There's a story from the time of the Buddha. The Buddha was talking with some of his monks. As they were talking, standing out by a forest, they saw a jackal run out of the forest. The jackal stood for a minute and then ran into the underbrush. It stayed in the underbrush a minute. Then it ran out again and ran into the hollow of a tree. It stayed there only a minute. Then it ran out again and dashed into a cave. And then it ran out of the cave.

The Buddha observed that the jackal had mange, was suffering from mange in its coat. The Buddha said, "Monks, did you see that jackal? Standing, it suffered. Running, it suffered. Lying down, it suffered. Sitting still, it suffered. In the forest, underbrush, tree, or cave, it suffered. It blamed standing for its suffering. It blamed running for its suffering. It blamed sitting, lying down for its suffering. It blamed the forest, the underbrush, the tree, and the cave for its suffering. In fact, the problem was with none of those. The discomfort was with none of those. The problem was the jackal had mange."

This is our condition when we're in a state of aversion. We tend to blame the conditions outside ourselves, but the problem is we're in a state of disliking. The mind has gotten locked into this feeling of negativity. So feel how the mind feels when you're in a state of disliking. Feel that kind of contraction that happens, the tightness, the tension, the kind of burning quality of it.

Another aspect of disliking is sadness—some form of disliking of loss, of change, of things that we've lost in the past. Sometimes as the mind gets quiet, we start to feel the sadness creep in a little. It's as though for some, the activities of life are a way of moving away from some underlying sadness.

This fear that sadness might be limitless if we open to it is only a projection, only a future thought. Please let yourself open to that sadness if it's there—it is, after all, a part of life.

The Buddha once asked his monks: "Which do you think are greater, the tears that you have cried through all your lifetimes or the waters in all the oceans of the earth?" He answered that the tears we have cried through all our lifetimes are greater than the waters in all the oceans of the earth. This sadness is an integral part of life. So in our practice, we open to both the beauty and joy of life as well as its difficulties. As the heart becomes more available, as that tender heart starts to emerge, we can feel what has been sad in our lives. Let yourself feel that.

One of the other ways that negativity manifests in this culture—it seems almost epidemic—is that we don't have a very good way of liking ourselves in the West these days. There's a sense that we don't value ourselves very highly. For many people, there's an almost pervasive feeling of worthlessness.

A few years ago, some Western dharma teachers were meeting in India with the Dalai Lama. They raised this issue: how can we help people work with this feeling of not valuing themselves, of not feeling worthwhile? The Dalai Lama couldn't understand it. He could not grasp what they were talking about. He had no idea what this feeling was. Apparently, it's not very common in Tibetan culture because by and large, Tibetan children are truly valued. It's understood that they're all capable of great wisdom and liberation, and they're widely loved by their extended families.

So he went around to each of the Western teachers asking, "Do you know what this means? Have you had this feeling?" All the Western teachers said yes, they could relate to this feeling—they knew what it was to not value themselves very much.

I was practicing in my early years and went through a phase of having many self-judging thoughts. I happened to have an interview on one of these difficult days. When I went in to see the teacher, they asked how the retreat was going. I said, "Oh, well, I'm having a hard day today," hoping they'd leave it at that. But of course they didn't.

"Well, what's going on?"

"Oh, I'm just having some aversive thoughts," I said, certain they would leave it at that. I'd confessed it was a hindrance—I thought that should be enough.

"What kind of thoughts?"

"Well, I'm feeling like I don't like myself very well. Nobody likes me. I'm feeling really lonely and that nobody likes me."

The teacher said, "You're not seeing things the way they are. The problem is you don't accept yourself. You need to accept yourself."

So this theme of accepting myself—or valuing myself, put another way—became central in my practice for years after that. I had to struggle with this theme because what did it mean to accept myself? I thought in Buddhism there wasn't a self to accept or reject. What did that mean? Was I going to find some little guy inside and then wrap my arms around him and say, "You're okay after all"? That didn't sound right either.

What I came to understand as I worked with this theme over time was that accepting myself really meant accepting every moment of my life just the way it was—accepting what was beautiful, accepting what was difficult. When I could really do that, accept each moment as it was, then I could accept myself fully.

I'm still working in that direction. There are still things that stump me. But over the years, I've gathered in many more of the lost brothers and sisters that make up my personality, and it's gotten much easier.

That issue has gotten much more comfortable for me. So watch the stories that we tell ourselves about ourselves. You know, we tell ourselves these stories about we're not good enough or we're not well loved or this or that. And be aware that it's just a story. And the story is never as much as the storyteller. No story can ever define the storyteller. That's a hopeless pursuit.

One last aspect of aversion that I'll mention is fear. Fear is a sense of aversion about something that is a future thought, something that might happen to us in the future. Take a look when fear arises. What is usually your reaction to it? When you feel fear in your meditation, how do you feel about that fear? For most people, when fear arises, we usually become more afraid. And then because it's a bigger fear, we get more afraid, and more afraid.

Again, the key in working with fear is to open to it. If we can accept the feeling of fear itself, that raw emotion in its very bare quality, then there's no problem with fearful situations. We can go into a fearful situation. It may still bring up the emotion of fear. But if I can experience that fear and don't have a problem with that, the situation is no longer a barrier. The fear is not a barrier.

As we open to our fear, we actually start taking its power away. Fear holds its grip of power because we're afraid to confront it, because we won't let ourselves experience it. As we open more and more, feel how it is in the body, feel how it is in the mind, see the thoughts that arise about fear, it starts to lose its charge.

Those are a few of the aspects of aversion that I wanted to mention.

The third of the hindrances we've talked about a bit already on the retreat. It has to do with sleepiness. Classically, it's called in English sloth and torpor. I love this phrasing, sloth and torpor. When was the last time you told somebody you were feeling particularly slothful today? A lot of these Dharma terms got translated when Victoria was still Queen of England, and they have some of that era of terminology still. But I like this particular one.

There was an early maintenance crew around this center. I was on staff here in the early days. It's an early maintenance crew that were not exactly known for their work ethic—and totally unlike the current maintenance staff, I want to stress that. But in the old days, they acquired the nicknames of McSloth and McTorpor. I like this hindrance for its historical relevance.

With sloth or torpor, one is a physical manifestation, one's more a mental manifestation, and dullness and drowsiness manifest in both. The basic effect is the mind is cloudy, and you just can't see clearly. There's a lack of energy. You can't connect to the breath. You can't connect with the body. Everything's seen through a fog or through a haze.

And sometimes it's not very unpleasant. I mean, I've spent many a pleasant hour on the cushion, sort of lost in this fog, as I imagine some of you may have over the last couple of days, too. But while we're lost in that fog, we're not deepening the awareness. The meditation is not really developing because the mindfulness is not really present. It's not strong.

This is very common in the first days of retreat. Continue to work with it with the antidote of energy, as I think we've talked about a couple of times. When you're feeling this dullness of mind or body, do something to arouse energy. That's what counters it. So you can sit up straighter, you can open your eyes, you can stand up in a meditation. That's perfectly good etiquette in the meditation hall. Next walking period, go for a brisk walk, splash some water on your face, make sure you get enough sleep at night.

Whatever you can do to pick up the physical energy will help with this particular hindrance. Usually after the first three, maybe four days of a retreat, this really decreases for people. We've made the adjustment to the retreat setting, the energy starts to come in from another source, and there's not so much problem with this particular hindrance.

If, however, the dullness and drowsiness continue to be there a lot for you after the first three or four days, then I'd get curious. And I'd start to investigate. Because sometimes this dullness comes down as a kind of shield to keep you from feeling something.

So it's as though we'll be sitting in meditation, things are fairly clear, and out of the corner of our eye we get a little glimpse of something that we're not very comfortable with. Some memory, some emotion, some little glimmer starts to come through and then, boom, down comes the veil as a way of not experiencing it. So sleepiness sometimes manifests as a device to keep us from feeling. If it continues a lot after the first three or four days, get curious about that and start to see just before the sleepiness comes what was going on, what was your experience, what was happening.

With restlessness and agitation, it's just the opposite of sleepiness. There's too much energy. So you'll come into the hall and you'll feel like the body's just on fire with this energy. The thoughts are very active. They're racing. The emotions are in high gear. And you'll feel like you just can't sit still for another minute on your zafu or you'll go crazy. And yet somehow you manage to keep doing it.

Let yourself again just feel what this restlessness feels like. Give yourself to it. Let yourself just embrace that feeling of agitation or restlessness. As Jack Kornfield says, let yourself become the first meditator to die on your cushion from restlessness. See if it happens.

In working with restlessness, the antidote to restlessness is calm. So, for instance, at the start of the sitting where you're starting to feel restless, you might just take a few deep breaths, just deep in the sense of calm and relaxation. Often we think that if I'm restless, it's because I've lost concentration. I need to bring back a focus on the breath and we'll try to concentrate more. But that actually increases the energy and can just increase the restlessness.

So often with restlessness it's more helpful to give the mind a big, big box. Give that energy a big space to kind of roam around in. And one of the things I recommend if you're feeling restless is to meditate for a while on sounds. Let your awareness become very broad and take in all the sounds. And that gives the energy a big field to roam around in. It can also be helpful to ground the attention lower in the body. Because restless energy has a way of rising up into the head. Put the attention lower down and really have that sense of connecting with the earth.

Again, with restlessness, take a look. Is there something that the restlessness is masking? Was there some unpleasant feeling just before you became very restless, for instance, and wanted to leave the hall? Take a look.

Doubt is the last of the hindrances, and you know when doubt has arrived because you start hearing in your mind the words, "What on earth am I doing here?" Also very common in the first days of a retreat. It may be doubts about the practice. Does this mindfulness stuff really go anywhere? It might be doubts about the teachings. You know, what are those people talking about up front anyway? About the teachers, about the other people, about ourselves. You know, we may feel other people can do this. I open my eyes, they're all sitting like Buddhas or Buddhinis. But I can't do this. I can't do this practice.

There's a profound spiritual truth actually in that phrase—I can't do this—but we'll leave that for another talk.

The fact is this practice works by a law that is as unavoidable as the law of gravity. If you do mindfulness, it leads to freedom. There are no two ways about that. But doubt is a particularly insidious hindrance. Because when doubt is there, if we believe it, it saps our energy to practice. We stop looking.

As William Blake said about the sun, if the sun would doubt, it would immediately go out. And that's what happens to our practice when we doubt—our practice goes out.

So please, when you catch this factor of doubt, do something to work with it. The antidote to doubt is faith. Do something that re-strengthens your faith. Find that faith that you came in with. You all came in from your outside lives with this determination and conviction to give yourself to this process for nine days with the hope of finding peace or clarity, understanding and compassion. Remember what you came here for. Remember what motivated you. It was a good reason then and it's a good reason now.

Reflect on the Dharma. What could be more important than developing in wisdom and understanding and love and compassion? How could you possibly spend your time more fruitfully?

And then talk to one of us in a group interview or individual interview. Please bring out your doubt and please bring out your questions. It's not something to be ashamed of or want to hide away. Really, part of being a student is bringing out the deep questions that you have about the practice and opening those up for discussion and another perspective.

So just to summarize, there are a few steps in relating to the hindrances. The very first and most important one is to know that the hindrance is at work. And in that naming, it can be helpful. Know whether you're experiencing wanting or disliking or sleepiness or restlessness or doubt.

Then if you can, open to it and just let yourself feel it. Get familiar with it. We're not trying to make these states go away. Like the Aitken Roshi quote last night was pointing to, it's not that these forces will go away from our mind, but if we can understand them thoroughly, we can be free of them even as they arise. That's the direction of freedom. So open to them, let them come, experience them, get to know them.

But sometimes these hindrances can still overwhelm our mindfulness. We can try to be with them, but sometimes the storyline is just too strong. The story they're painting just sweeps us away into the fantasy, into the story. We lose our mindfulness. If your mindfulness is being overwhelmed, you can't stay with the direct experience, then apply an antidote. Not out of aversion, not because you want the hindrance to go away, but out of wisdom so that you restore mindfulness.

The basic antidotes, as I mentioned: for desire, you can reflect on the impermanence of gratification. For aversion, the classic antidote is metta. For sleepiness, it's energy. For restlessness, it's calm. And for doubt, it's faith. Let's see if you can just tap back into those energies.

And finally, if all else fails, don't think about letting it go. Just think about letting it be. Just let it be and surrender to it. And sometimes it'll just hang around for a while. That's okay, because the other thing is it'll also pass away. Let it come, let it be, and then let it go. It's this opening with real acceptance that really transforms us in our practice.

Freedom is not about getting rid of the states. It's about opening and accepting them. Then we take the conflict out of our life. Then we take this lack of self-acceptance out. If we can open to these states, we no longer have to fight them. And ultimately, when we understand them, they're not even disturbing.

And we find that we can more and more bring into these energies a kind of friendly attention. Even when they come, they may not have been the guests we invited to the party, but they're the guests that showed up. And if we can open to them with friendliness, we'll have a great party.

This is really the miracle of our practice, because originally these guests show up and we hate them. We're caught in that mind of hating. But if we can bring forth in that moment a heart of friendliness and clear seeing, then we've transformed that moment from a moment of hatred to a moment of friendliness and clarity. This is pure magic.

This is really the alchemy of our practice—that moment of transformation. There's no technique that can show you how to do this. Sometimes you have to dig deep into your hearts to be able to open to these energies. But that potential is there in each of us. It's the challenge of our practice. And as we do it more and more, it comes easier and easier. We get very good at it. And this is what really transforms our lives.

One of my Tibetan teachers, a young lama named Sogyal Rinpoche, put it this way: "The sacred point of our practice is the liberation of confusion." The liberation of confusion. And that's what you're doing in a moment when you open to one of these difficult energies. You're liberating the confusion and replacing it with a truly awakened energy and awakened nature.

I'd like to close with a quotation from Rumi—a poem called "The Guest House":

This being human is a guest house.
Every morning a new arrival.
A joy, a depression, a meanness.
Some momentary awareness comes as an unexpected visitor.
Welcome and entertain them all.
Even if they're a crowd of sorrows who violently sweep your house empty of its furniture, still, treat each guest honorably.
He may be clearing you out for some new delight.
The dark thought, the shame, the malice—meet them at the door laughing and invite them in.
Be grateful for whoever comes,
because each has been sent as a guide from beyond.

Let's sit for just a minute together.

CHAPTER 209

Dharma in the Workplace

Guy Armstrong · 2h03

In this pioneering daylong retreat at Spirit Rock, Guy Armstrong examines how to integrate Dharma practice into our working lives. Drawing from his diverse background in technology, education, and the Peace Corps, Armstrong frames workplace practice through the Buddha's Eightfold Path, organized into three areas: ethical conduct (sīla), meditation (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). He addresses right livelihood, exploring what constitutes appropriate work for practitioners and whether service work is necessary. The talk covers formal meditation practices that can be adapted for the workplace—from brief breathing breaks to metta practice during meetings and commutes—as well as informal mindfulness in relationships with difficult colleagues. Armstrong discusses the eight worldly concerns (pleasure/pain, gain/loss, praise/blame, fame/disgrace) and how attachment to these creates suffering in professional settings. He emphasizes that workplace relationships offer rich opportunities for spiritual development, often more challenging than our chosen personal relationships. The session includes practical guidance on maintaining right intention, dealing with ambition and competitiveness, and cultivating the bodhisattva spirit of service within organizational structures. Armstrong's honest sharing of his own struggles with ego and ambition during his Microsoft years provides authentic examples of how practice can transform our relationship to work, status, and material success.

Good morning. I'd like to welcome you all to this day at Spirit Rock exploring Dharma in the Workplace. This is the first time we've devoted an entire day to this theme, so from my perspective, the whole experience is quite experimental. We'll simply have to see how it unfolds. But I'm truly delighted to see you all here today.

I found myself filled with enthusiasm while preparing for this day, because it addresses a topic I care deeply about, yet I've never really had the opportunity to explore it with others. I believe this could serve as an interesting opening both for me and hopefully for all of you as well.

My name is Guy Armstrong, and I'm one of the teachers here at Spirit Rock. I've also worked in various other fields, many completely unconnected to Buddhism or Dharma practice, which I'll discuss shortly. What I particularly appreciate about today is how rarely these two domains—Dharma and our relationships at work—have the chance to come together. Sometimes I wonder if they're even meant to be integrated at all.

I was watching the televised proceedings on C-SPAN this week of the Senate Judiciary Committee conducting an investigation called "Competition in the Computer Industry." The proceedings were chaired by Senator Orrin Hatch, a Republican from Utah, and featured three prominent computer industry leaders: Bill Gates of Microsoft, Scott McNealy of Sun, and Jim Barksdale of Netscape—companies currently engaged in bitter rivalries.

Essentially, the entire hearing was designed to increase pressure on Microsoft, which was the real purpose behind the proceedings. There's a federal antitrust investigation occurring concurrently. This made me wonder whether concepts like right speech and truth-telling have any place at all in our public forums. The committee chairman, who is notably anti-Microsoft, declared with a perfectly straight face, "This proceeding today is not directed to be critical of any one company in particular." Right.

Then Bill Gates, called upon to defend Microsoft's business practices, replied with equal composure, "No, Microsoft does not have a monopoly in PC operating systems." Right.

There's often this sense in the world of work, and certainly in public discourse, of a constant parrying of words where truthfulness—and Dharma is fundamentally about truth—doesn't really have space to exist. This may make it challenging for us to bring these two worlds together.

I also recently read a Wall Street Journal story about entrepreneurs who had made hundreds of millions of dollars in various startup ventures, again in the computer industry, claiming that their interest in their work wasn't about money. Not about money. Yet they quoted a venture capitalist connected to one of these firms who explained, "The idea is, first we do an IPO so that the stock options of all employees become valuable and they get rich. Then the next step is we aim to get bought out by a larger company through merger and acquisition. They purchase us and our stock rises further, giving us a double pop." Meanwhile, the company heads maintain, "This isn't about money." Excuse me.

In my work life, apart from the Dharma teaching I began in 1984, I've worked as a computer programmer. I served as a teacher overseas in the Peace Corps for two years in Malaysia. I helped run a small alternative school in Palo Alto during the mid-seventies when such ventures were quite popular. What worked best about our school, I'm somewhat embarrassed to admit, was its name: the Renaissance School for Creative Unfoldment. We didn't quite live up to that potential, but it was certainly an impressive name.

My most recent position outside the Dharma world was five years with Microsoft, which I began in technical support because I enjoyed introducing people to computers. I then moved naturally into sales and eventually into sales management. That represents my most recent experience, and it happens to be with the company currently under federal scrutiny.

I still carry this bag from my Microsoft days—it serves as my economical briefcase. I was reflecting that much like the company itself, it's actually held up remarkably well. It's ten years old now, but it's beginning to show some wear. That's happening to Microsoft as well, so it seems quite fitting.

What I'd like us to explore today represents just one of many possible approaches to this subject. This is not a corporate workshop on practicing mindfulness in the workplace, though we'll certainly touch on that important aspect. I'm not a management consultant, so I won't attempt to advise on employee relations or enlightened HR policies. I don't have any David Whyte poems to share, so some of you may be disappointed and wish to leave immediately.

I am primarily a Dharma teacher, and what I want to discuss today is the life of work viewed through the lens of Dharma practice—specifically for people committed to following the Buddha's teachings via the Eightfold Path. I believe this represents a very rich field for inquiry and investigation. I think all of us, having been practitioners for some time, have much to share from our own struggles and efforts to integrate these two worlds.

Today will combine some instruction from the front—I do have several points I'd like to address—but I also want to provide ample time for discussion, both in our large group where we can all listen to one another, and in various small group formats. This will allow you to speak more personally with each other, hear one another's challenges, and express your own. Since all of you have developed different approaches and understandings in this field, we can learn from one another.

This is a day where I intend to learn a great deal from you, while hopefully sharing some of my own reflections as well.

I'd like to just get a feel for the group to begin with. I'm curious, because people can come into these questions from many different angles.

How many of you are currently involved in the world of business? How many earn your livelihoods there? Great. So it looks like somewhere between a third and a half of the group.

How many of you are in some form of administration that involves service or nonprofit? Good, thanks.

How many of you are doing direct service work, like teachers, therapists? Thank you.

How many of you work with your hands? Good. Please enlighten me if there are more, but I'm thinking of people like builders, carpenters, fine artists, craftspeople, cooks. Gardeners, body workers. I don't quite put typists or clerical workers in that category.

You all are a lucky group because you actually get to use your work as mindfulness practice. That's a rather rare category. The so-called information workers find it very hard to combine work with practice directly. If you're sitting in front of a computer screen all day or your main task is intense interactions with other people, it's difficult to make that strictly a mindfulness practice, although we'll talk about ways to bring that in. But for people who actually work with your hands, it lends itself very well to that.

Developing Dharma in the workplace is no different than developing Dharma in all of our life. We shouldn't compartmentalize or separate these two, and we shouldn't imagine that there's a magic bullet for bringing Dharma alive in work any more than there's a magic bullet for bringing Dharma alive in all of our lives. The Dharma practice of our life is a lifelong project. If you believe the teachings of the Buddha on rebirth, it may be a project of many lifetimes. At any rate, it's not a small-scale endeavor. And bringing Dharma alive in the workplace is no different.

I actually believe that our aspirations, our goals in the workplace should be no different than our goals in our whole life, which is that we would like to embody in our work our deepest human potential for awakening, for living with true wisdom and compassion. So these are the standards and the goals that I think we should be aiming to bring into our work as well. I really don't see any difference between the two. And I think as the day goes on and we talk about some of these issues in more detail, hopefully we can get a flavor of why that is.

Just as practice transforms our daily life, our everyday life, so practice also ought to transform our work. And if it doesn't, then it may not be working. The practice may not be working.

In my own life, I've experienced a tremendous change in my relationship to work. The first job I had when I got out of college was in 1969. The Vietnam War was going on, and I took a job with Shell Oil in Houston, Texas, as a computer programmer. I was doing Fortran programming on a large mainframe. I absolutely hated it. I hated the work.

I was stuck in a small office—a private office that didn't have any windows. Even the door didn't have a window. I was basically cooped up in that office for eight hours a day reading manuals and writing programs.

I didn't have a heart connection with anyone else who worked there. I was starting to get interested in Buddhism and the whole field of psychology, and at Shell Oil in 1969 Texas, I couldn't find anybody else who shared these interests. I felt very isolated, and I was miserable. That was the beginning of my work career.

Later, sort of midway in my career life, I was working at Hewlett Packard in California. There I felt a lot more connection with people. I felt a lot more openness from the company.

I was kind of in my hippie phase then, so I actually had very long hair and a beard. I'd come to work in jeans. That was fine with HP. One day on Halloween, we dressed up in costumes, so I wore a business suit. It was my Halloween costume that year. I felt like the bridges were starting to be made.

When I worked at Microsoft—oh, but one other thing I want to say about HP—I still felt overwhelmed and fearful in my work setting. I felt that the corporation was too large and too impersonal, and I was just lost within that. I felt very much exposed and at risk. I now look back and see that mostly as a function of my own psychology at the time.

In my latest job with Microsoft, I felt that I had grown up enough that I was actually able to play a constructive role in the office, helping other people who felt threatened or vulnerable or at risk. I could at least be a sympathetic ear, a sympathetic shoulder. So in my own personal trajectory, I can see my situation go from being isolated, from being fearful, from feeling overwhelmed, to feeling—I won't say in charge because it's too volatile a company—but feeling comfortable, feeling that I could provide some stability and provide an ear to other people in the organization.

This is just one way in which, as we mature as people, we have the opportunity to bring a different spirit to our work. And practice should aim at moving us along that kind of continuum.

I'd also suggest that the workplace may be the richest area in which we can test our Dharma understanding and apply our Dharma understanding. You know, in our family, in our personal life, we have a lot of choice about who we're with, who we spend our time with. Not so much with our children, granted, but usually there's a lot of love there to begin with. Certainly with our choice of partners, with the friends that we spend our time with. In some ways we can tailor that situation to suit our likes and dislikes a little better.

In the workplace, those choices are taken away from us, and we can end up spending quite a lot of time with people we might never have wanted to walk through the same door with, much less hang out with for eight hours a day.

The workplace, I feel, for most of us today, is our primary community. It's a little bit scary that the way our society has been structured through the Industrial Revolution is that our community, for most of us, is not where we live. When you think about the way humans have grown up on this earth for the last million years, our community has been the people near whom we live, who have worked together with us to survive, who become part of our extended family, and that we share our whole lives with, usually from birth to death.

With the Industrial Revolution, that has all changed. That kind of community has been killed away for most of us. But for most of us, the people that we spend more time with, the people that we hang out with, the people we interact with the most, are often the people at work.

So then the real test of our Dharma practice is, can we bring our understanding and our kindness and our compassion into those relationships? And it's difficult because we don't have the element of choice there.

The main thrust of our Dharma practice in our life or in our work is to take the self-centeredness out of our life. In brief summary, that's what Dharma practice is all about: taking out this self-centered attitude that thinks that my needs and wants should be the center of my universe. As we take that self-centeredness out in all of our life, we open up to more compassion and more kindness.

But the work setting is no different. It is entirely possible to approach our work without as much self-centered investment. And when we do that, we become a much cleaner vehicle for the Dharma. Those of you who are in direct service know this firsthand, that when we aren't present, something else can come through us that can really help people. But for anyone who's in a life of relationship, the opportunity for service is there by being more absent, by not being so self-oriented in our views.

This is a comment from Krishnamurti, which is talking about love, but I think it can also apply just as well to the relationships in work: "Love in relationship is a purifying process as it reveals the ways of the self. Without this revelation, relationship has little significance." I feel this is very true of our relationships at work. If we are not using our work situation to illuminate ourself—and another way to say that would be our clinging and grasping and identification—then work has little significance beyond survival.

It's very important to begin to inquire in the work setting: what is it revealing of the ways in which I'm holding, of the ways in which I'm bound?

The Buddha basically gave us the three main areas of the Eightfold Path in which to look at this question. So this is the way I'd like to structure the day today. The Buddha divided the Eightfold Path, this path to awakening, into the areas of ethical conduct, sometimes called virtue, of meditation, which involves the fields of effort, of concentration, and of mindfulness, and the third of the fields is wisdom or understanding.

So what I'd like to do is to really look at our relationship to work, look at our workplace environment in the light of ethical conduct, of meditation, formal meditation practice, and wisdom or understanding. I think that any approach to work that doesn't involve looking at all three of these areas is going to be incomplete. We really need to take a close look at all three of these as they impact our work.

So the way I've basically structured the day is that I want to give a short talk on each of these three topics—virtue, meditation, and wisdom—as it applies to our life of work. After the talk, I'd like there to be some time for discussion in the large group, but then I have specific questions or areas that I think it might be helpful to investigate through small groups. So typically after a talk, we'll break into smaller groups, maybe about five or six, seven, for you all to share your understandings in those areas. Then come back together and hear what's come out of the large group. Then we'll put some sitting time in throughout the day so that we can all come to a greater stillness, greater depth, and that will allow these issues to have a deeper resonance for us.

I wonder if there are any questions or comments about the day so far. We'll get into all these areas in more detail. So if it's a specific area on mindfulness, for example, I'd ask you to hold that.

But any questions about the basic themes?

"I have more of a comment. I haven't attended one of your sittings before, and I'm delighted to have an experience with someone that doesn't start from a psychology background and has come to the Dharma and has started from the technical world."

"Okay. So it's very interesting."

"Okay, thanks. Yeah, I feel a deep relationship between my love of science and my love of the Dharma, because I basically feel that what the Buddha put out was the science of happiness. He just laid out very clearly, if you want to be happy in a wise way, here are the steps to take to do it. It's empirically verifiable, and each of us is our own laboratory for doing that."

"Thanks."

Any other comments, questions?

Okay, then I'd like to begin the day actually with a period of sitting, hopefully to allow us all to settle in a bit. And this will be about a 30-minute period of sitting meditation. I'll give some brief instructions because the day is open to those who haven't had meditation background. Let me just ask, are there people here who haven't had meditation instruction at Spirit Rock before? Okay? That's great. So I will give meditation instruction through this period.

Another aspect of ethical conduct is right livelihood. This is another way that the Buddha framed it. Unfortunately, the teachings of the Buddha aren't a great amount of help in this area. The Buddha was largely teaching monks and nuns. They have a very different form of livelihood. It's called begging. Now, if any of you want to learn how to be good beggars, the Buddhist texts provide great instruction. But the Buddha didn't envisage job titles like multimedia graphics engineer or substance abuse counselor. So he didn't have many discourses on those kinds of livelihood.

Here's what he said about right livelihood, just to give you an idea. "And what, friends, is right livelihood? Here a disciple, having abandoned wrong livelihood, earns his living by right livelihood. This is called right livelihood." Okay? Have you got that?

Now, there are certain things that the Buddha defined as wrong livelihood, specifically trading in weapons, trading in living beings, trading in meat or fish, slaughtered animals, because the spirit of that goes against the first precept, which is not killing, trading in drugs and intoxicants—not pharmaceutical drugs, not medically alleviating drugs, but intoxicating drugs—and trading in poisons. Those are considered to be wrong forms of livelihood or any livelihood that transgresses the precepts.

So I think for ourselves in the modern world, there are other issues about right livelihood. I think one of the big ones is, is this the right work for me? Is this the job that lets me flower as a Dharma practitioner and as a person? Is it a job that contributes to my unfolding? It's a big question. Does it contribute to the well-being of myself and others? Or is it taking away? Is it a job that's injuring my well-being and injuring the well-being of others?

A question that comes in often for practitioners who are committed to the path of Dharma is, do I need to be involved in service work? Because a lot of jobs aren't directly in service work. When I was selling Microsoft software, I mean, for God's sake, what difference does it make if the customer ends up running Microsoft Word or WordPerfect, right? I'm not making anybody's life better. I'm carrying out the aims of a business whose aim is to make money.

So, is it important for a Dharma practitioner to be involved in a job that's directly service-oriented? And I think that's a big question. I think it's a question each person has to answer personally. So I don't think there's a blanket answer.

For myself, I found a service component in my life through going through different jobs. At one part of my life, I was doing part-time work as a computer consultant and part-time work as a Dharma teacher. Other times, I've been full-time in one or another, a service job or a computing job. And that was the way that I brought it into my life, and that was okay for me. But it's a question I think everybody needs to look at for themselves. And I would recommend that people find a way to serve, even if it's not through their livelihood.

But those are some of the things I thought we could discuss when we come back.

I don't think there's a blanket answer to the question of how to integrate service into our livelihood. For myself, I found a service component through going through different jobs. At one part of my life, I was doing part-time work as a computer consultant and part-time work as a Dharma teacher. Other times, I've been full-time in one or another—either a service job or a computing job. That was the way I brought it into my life, and that worked for me. But it's a question I think everybody needs to look at for themselves. I would recommend that people find a way to serve, even if it's not through their livelihood directly.

That's basically all I wanted to say about ethical conduct. Are there any questions or comments?

Well, I actually didn't know about the sexual component of that situation until months later. So mostly what I saw was a bad decision taking place. I also realized that if I had tried to do anything about that bad decision, nothing would have come of it. I would have created a lot of trouble for myself, and the outside situation wouldn't have changed at all.

My manager actually did sort of hurl himself at that wall and created a lot of enemies among the people who were supporting that decision. He ended up leaving the company under a cloud—and since I'm not mentioning any names, I'll tell you he left behind ten thousand options in Microsoft stock that today would be worth twenty-eight million dollars. I just did the calculation yesterday because I was curious. I'll tell him that next time I see him. Spirit Rock says don't worry about it.

When you were talking about how sometimes we don't intervene out of our own timidity, what I've noticed is that we have that anxiety, so we don't intervene. Later, when things escalate or continue, we're so enraged that when we do intervene, we do it with blame and charge. That's hard to remember when you're faced with the fear though.

Yes, that's a very good point. Often when the thing first comes up, it may look like a smaller thing at that point, and we think we can let this go by. But we accumulate a charge around it, and then when it does get to be a bigger thing—which most problems do if they're not dealt with—our charge is bigger and the whole stakes are bigger. That's really insightful. Thank you.

You talk about service and making that choice—with respect to being engaged Buddhists, isn't that a choice? I mean, one of the choices is to sit in a monastery meditating. The other is engaging and getting out in the streets, practicing business, participating, really showing that Buddhism and the Eightfold Path can be practiced in an environment of greed and everything else.

I definitely believe that. I think the work world, the business world particularly, needs more examples of spiritual business. So I think it does make a difference, and it can definitely be a service component of a business job. Finding that service component in a business job is an important thing for a practitioner to do.

Can't that be through the person's individual integrity and just having that quality, with people looking up to them knowing that they're doing that?

I definitely think it can. I also think that most businesses—certainly publicly owned businesses—have a bottom line commitment to making a profit for the shareholders. So you could say the overt or stated aim of the organization is not necessarily along service goals. As a person working within the organization and committed to it, one of our goals is certainly not an explicitly stated service goal—it's to help the company make more money. So I see there's a blend. I think it's important in that situation to respect the company's orientation, but also to find our own service meaning within that.

When I'm talking about the individual—the leader of the company being able to engage people day-to-day in business—doesn't that provide a great service?

Yes, I think it does. I think an individual at any level, whether it's a CEO or the person at the very bottom of the hierarchy, can manifest that integrity and commitment to ethics that makes a very strong statement in the world—and that's an important statement.

I think one has to be careful when you start talking about profit for shareholders or stakeholders, because that becomes kind of political economics rather than substance. There's nothing wrong with making a profit for shareholders, especially if it provides hundreds and thousands of people with right livelihood.

I don't feel bad about that at all. I don't feel opposed to the basic capitalistic direction of our society or companies making a profit. As you say, it provides many benefits to workers and their families and creates positive ripple effects. At one point, my division of Hewlett-Packard was moving up to Oregon.

I was invited to make the move up there. One of the statistics they shared at the time—I don't know if it's true—is that every job they brought to the town of Corvallis in Oregon would create five other jobs in that economy. So that's terrific.

One of the questions is that we tend to always look at service as being the externalization or the form of how we spend our time or what we actually do. At least for me, I found that in many years in business and attempting to find ways to have a spiritual practice in business, service actually comes from an internal process of how to address the conflicts and the paradoxes and how to come to some form of peace inside oneself and then transmute the patterns that are in the mass consciousness. That's actually where the service occurs, rather than looking like one is doing something that is of service, but maybe doing it in a relatively unconscious way.

It's certainly true. There are lots of people in so-called service jobs who may be doing more harm than good. I'm reminded of a book I just read called Angela's Ashes. I don't know if any of you have read that. I thought it was a fantastic book. This poor kid was growing up in a poor section of Ireland in the 1930s, and his teachers—teachers are supposed to be educating and bringing out the best in young people—were so harsh and so abusive and so dismissive that I'm surprised they didn't cripple his spirit entirely. So it's a very useful point.

"In practicing a number of these precepts, I find it very difficult to protect myself from the demands of the people around me that I just get on with it. If I'm in a place where I don't want to make a decision now because I need to sit with it or watch things evolve, there's a whole way of communicating that I need to do it in a certain way.

Without yet coming across as—and this is practice—there's a whole world of people who just want you to go, do, decide, be, get it over with, and get on to the next thing. I think that's, for me, one of the largest challenges: to say, not yet."

It's difficult, and this kind of comes down to the question of how do we influence other people around us and what kind of influence can we have? I think we have to be realistic that we may not always be able to change the outcome of the decision-making process—one of whose decisions is time frame of the decision. So we can certainly put in our voice of deliberation and call for more time for deliberation, and I think that's usually useful, while realizing that sometimes it's going to be a compromise and we may not be able to make that happen.

So not to think that we aren't having any influence if the decision doesn't always go our way, but just by putting out that request for more pace, a more leisurely deliberation, you may actually be influencing the process in ways that don't make it appear that there's an outright win, but it may be slowing it down somewhat. So it still seems like a good thing to keep doing. And in that way, you're kind of like a brake pad. The wheel's running like this. You're kind of like a brake pad. You might get worn down a little doing that over and over. But the brake pad is an important part of an organization.

"When you mentioned timidity, I was really quite struck by that. I work in a public library, and I'm a manager there, and it has nothing to do with the library, but the timidity factor is a very powerful and strong one, I think, because the risks are seen as so great. Because the risk area and the threat of risk is a significant problem, timidity just comes to play much too often. And courage doesn't blossom as you wish it could."

There's a lot of inertia also in the status quo. The one who begins to even pull interpersonal relationships into the light of awareness in a workplace is bringing in a threat for many people, because there's often an unspoken agreement not to talk about interpersonal dynamics in a business setting or a work setting. So that's a risky thing to do.

Thank you all for the comments. What I'd like to do right now is to take about a ten-minute break.

I'd like to talk now about the second part of the Eightfold Path, which is meditation. It consists of three components, which are right effort, right mindfulness, and right concentration. I don't want to get so detailed on the three aspects, but what I'd like to talk about is the issues of formal practice in the workplace and informal practice in the workplace, because I think they can both be helpful.

How many times have you heard meditation teachers say something like this? "In the middle of your work day, take three minutes, stop what you're doing, sit there and breathe." How many people have heard an instruction like that? How many people have done it? Almost as many. How many people make it a regular part of your work life? Two. Thank you.

I'd like to come back a little later and ask you all to comment on that. I think it can be a really important part of work life. And when we're looking at the work setting, one of the qualities we need to bring in more than we currently do is the quality of right effort.

When you look at the difference between—I'm sure a lot of you have done day longs of meditation or you've done certainly forty-five minute periods of meditation. A lot of you I know have done intensive retreats, silent retreats of seven days or longer of meditation. The element in there that's unique when we do the formal practice is the coming back to the present.

that we have the intention and we remember to do that again and again. It's that coming back that does the work. That's what starts the process of change.

What happens when we get involved in a work day is we forget to do that. So our work day is not meditation because we're not bringing in that moment after moment effort of coming back into the present moment. The best way to make your work day more of a meditation day is to do that more often—just to remind yourself in more moments to come back to the present and feel what's happening.

A real support for that can be just taking a three-minute break in the middle of a busy day, putting the phone down, not looking at the computer screen, closing your eyes, and just being with your breath for three minutes. Now why, among all these smart people who have heard this instruction so many times, are there only two people in this room who do that?

I'd like to suggest a couple of reasons. One, we forget. Number two, when we stop in the middle of a busy work day, the experience isn't always so pleasant. Because what we find when we stop is we run into that mind that has been cranked up. We feel the thoughts going through so rapidly. We feel the agitation in the body. And it's not a place we're comfortable hanging out. That's been my experience. We don't like to sit in that place of suffering, which is self-created. We have generated that suffering through our own rapid-fire thinking and acting and behavior.

So a couple of things to say. One is, how's that thinking ever going to unravel? How's that pressure ever going to release unless we stop and give it time to vent? If you take the time and actually sit through it, whether it's three minutes at your desk or half an hour when you come home from work, you may come home from work and that same thing's still going on and you think, "Geez, I've wasted this whole sitting period. I've done nothing but think for the whole thirty minutes." It's not a waste. The nice thing is that's the mind releasing its pressure. That's what it needs to do sometimes is just release. So the beautiful thing about taking that time when you come home from work is then you can go into the evening and some of the steam has been let out. Similarly in the workplace.

If you just take a few minutes and realize you're just going to be letting some of the steam off, you're not going to have that profound samadhi experience that you had on the sixth day of your last ten day at Yucca Valley, where the body dissolved and there was just light throughout your field of vision. That's probably not going to happen. But in stopping, you let some of the steam out, and that's useful.

The other thing that's important about that stopping is we actually feel what we're doing to ourselves with the pace of our work. The Buddha said, on a number of occasions, "There is one thing, my friends, that keeps you bound. That is the not seeing of suffering." When we don't see the extent to which we induce our own suffering in the workplace, we don't have any motivation to change it. If we're going to be serious about taking a more balanced approach, being kinder to ourselves, being a little bit slower in our pace, we have to see the suffering that comes from the push. And the best way to do that is to be right there in the middle of it.

So when you take that three-minute break—and now I know everybody's going to go incorporate it—when you take that three-minute break, don't have the idea that you're going to have three minutes of calm, but be willing to experience whatever is there. That's what's in the moment. If you have the idea you're going to go into three minutes of calm, forget it. You're just going to be really frustrated. But that's not what mindfulness is about. Mindfulness is not about having my three minutes of calm. Mindfulness is about feeling what's real. And what's real in this moment is this agitation that's a leftover of the pace. That's what we want to connect with. That's what connects us to the present moment. That is the truth of that moment. So just go ahead and experience that. That's okay. It's going on subconsciously anyway.

So I would encourage you to take those moments both as a break and as formal mindfulness practice. The other thing that you can do in the workplace is start to bring formal practice into periods that are not particularly productive. How much time do you spend in meetings just sort of wishing that that person would finish up their rambling harangue and get on with something useful? During that time, you could be doing something actually useful, which is you could be doing a metta practice. The practice of loving-kindness, of directing thoughts of well-wishing to yourself and those around you is terrific meeting practice. And believe me, you can do plenty of it and still hear every word that's going by. We've got that much bandwidth. And it really changes—it can change the flavor of your participation in that meeting.

Otherwise, it might just be totally dead time. You can practice when you're waiting in a queue—when you dash out at lunch to do errands and find yourself waiting at the ATM, the dry cleaners, or the supermarket. You can do standing meditation there, feeling your feet on the ground, connecting with your breath. You can practice metta in those moments.

For a long time, I had a lengthy commute when I was working at Microsoft—about an hour and fifteen minutes each way. When I was a sales rep, it wasn't such a bad deal because I'd be out with clients during the day. But when I became a manager and had to be in the office more, reporting to the same place every day, it was a long drive.

For a long time, I tried doing mindfulness practice while driving. I wasn't very good at it. For some reason, I couldn't really keep my attention on my arms or stay with my breath. But what I found I could do much better was metta practice—the loving-kindness practice of sending these wishes to people around me. In the Bay Area, there were always people around me, no matter where I went.

Ordinarily I'd be bugged by the guy in front of me going too slow, or the guy behind me wanting to go too fast. One thing I noticed is that in any driving situation, I was the only person who wanted to go the right speed. Everybody else was too fast or too slow. The right speed for me was about ten miles over the posted speed limit, but I was the only person at that speed. So everybody else was basically an irritant to me—they were either in my way or trying to get me out of theirs.

Doing the metta practice really changed my attitude. I highly recommend that practice to you.

When you have to walk—from your office down to the photocopier—you could take that as the one time a day you do walking meditation. Don't try to do walking meditation everywhere you go; you're not going to enjoy it enough to sustain that. But pick one path that you traverse over and over again and simply say to yourself, "When I do this path, I'm going to do walking meditation." That means you just experience the feeling in your feet and legs as you walk. That's going to be your project during that time.

Finding little ways to bring practice into the work situation brings in more reminders of the life of Dharma and adds that little bit more calm and attention to our experience.

But I feel by far the vaster field of practice at work—and probably the more important area—is in the realm of relationships: relationships to others and relationships within ourselves.

What normally happens in the workplace is that some communication—whether it's a phone call, a meeting with a colleague, something a client says—triggers reactions in us. These reactions are often difficult for us to be with. It might be a sense of fear, feeling belittled or embarrassed, anger, or desire. You walk down the hallway and somebody says, "God, I can't wait to tell you—the boss just came in and gave me a ten percent pay raise." You know your pay raise last period was six percent, and you're supposed to be happy for them. So desire might stimulate wanting a pay raise yourself.

These qualities are an equal part of our meditational work and probably the more profound part of our practice in the work setting. There are many teachings from all the different Vipassana teachers about how to relate with anger, desire, and fear. I'm not going to cover that basic ground today—it's very important ground, central ground, but you can get that from many other sources.

What I want to encourage you to do is to take that as part of your meditation practice. Really learn how to work with the experiences of these difficult emotions, which in the classical tradition we call the hindrances—the forces that oppose clarity. They're forces that come again and again in a work setting and in our outside life.

So the question becomes: Do we have the courage to be with these states of mind? It's difficult to be with the agitation of the fast pace, perhaps the restlessness of that. It's also difficult to be with these emotional states. And I want to encourage the development of what we might call courage—the willingness to feel them.

That's all it starts with—just the willingness to feel them. Or what Chögyam Trungpa, the Tibetan teacher, called fearlessness.

I'd like to read you something from Trungpa's book Shambhala: The Sacred Path of the Warrior, on relating with fear and fearlessness:

"Fear has to be acknowledged. We have to realize our fear and reconcile ourselves with fear. We should look at how we move, how we talk, how we conduct ourselves, how we chew our nails, how we sometimes put our hands in our pockets uselessly. Then we will find something about how fear is expressed in the form of restlessness. We must face the fact that fear is lurking in our lives, always, in everything we do.

On the other hand, acknowledging fear is not a cause for depression or discouragement. Because we possess such fear, we also are potentially entitled to experience fearlessness. True fearlessness is not the reduction of fear but going beyond fear. Unfortunately, in the English language, we don't have one word that means that. Fearlessness is the closest term, but by fearless we don't mean less fear, but beyond fear.

Going beyond fear begins when we examine our fear, our anxiety, our nervousness, concern, and restlessness. We must look into our fear and look beneath its veneer. Meditation is the tool for doing that."

The meditation we learn on our cushion that lets us contact those feelings as we're sitting is the same mind we then want to take into the workplace—to feel the fear when it arises and know it as fear, to feel the anger when it arises and know it as anger, and to let ourselves feel that as part of ourselves, not to disown it or say it shouldn't be happening.

Let me back up for a moment. When I first worked in the corporate world, I didn't have the support of meditation. I felt often overwhelmed. Of course, what I felt overwhelmed by were my own feelings—that's all that can really overwhelm us. Once I gained more stability of mind through meditation, I no longer felt overwhelmed in those settings. This was because one of the primary things meditation develops is the quality we call samadhi.

Samadhi is usually translated as concentration, which is a little misleading. In the West, when we say concentration, we mean focusing on one thing while ignoring everything else—there's an exclusive sense in how we use the word. But samadhi doesn't have that exclusive quality. Samadhi, as the Buddha spoke of it, means a mind that is whole. It means a mind that has become collected in its attention and energy. When the mind becomes collected, it has tremendous strength—firmness, steadiness, stability.

When you sit down and try to pay attention to your breath, sometimes you'll find you can connect with quite a few breaths in a row. Sometimes you'll find you're with one breath and then the mind wanders, then one breath and the mind wanders again. This quality of being able to keep attention where you want it is a sign of increasing samadhi. That's how you can tell when it's there. But the felt experience is that the mind feels very strong and stable.

It's that inner strength that lets us be in a difficult environment where our emotions are being stretched without feeling victimized or overwhelmed. In these three areas of ethical conduct, meditation, and wisdom, if the primary feeling in the workplace is vulnerability and fear of being overwhelmed, then the element that needs development is samadhi. That comes through the formal practice of meditation—that's what can give that kind of strength.

One aspect of samadhi, when it's well established and the mind becomes strong, is that this factor actually prevents difficult states of mind from arising, or from arising with any real strength. In classical terms, it's said that samadhi suppresses the hindrances. When that stability of mind is there, the upsets can't enter. Even if they do arise, they can't really take hold and dominate.

So that's one aspect—the formal practice. Through moments of mindfulness or metta, through the informal practice of being with the hindrances and difficult emotions in all their forms, we make the effort of coming back together.

There's another important area I want to discuss, which I heard about in several small groups—the whole question of simplicity. What is the balance in our life between work and practice? How much time do we give to one? How much to the other? Do we have the idea that we can enter into an eighty-hour or hundred-hour work week and come home well balanced? I question that.

For many, many years these teachings were preserved by monastics—nuns and monks who led very, very simple lives—and that was for a reason. I think there's a reason that perhaps the Dalai Lama doesn't have a wife, three kids, two cars, a big home in the suburbs, and the responsibility of heading a large corporation.

I think there's a reason for that.

That's not to say that as laypeople we can't work with these practices, but I think as laypeople it's really important that we take a look at the balance in our lives between work and practice.

In our terms, I would talk about this as simplicity, and it doesn't have anything to do with being poor. It has to do with having enough leisure time that your mind can actually settle. Whether it's settling through formal practice or whether it's settling through doing things that you enjoy, not so important. But finding some leisure time so the mind can settle a bit.

In the classical terms, this quality is talked about as renunciation. And the purpose of renunciation is not some moralistic ideal that being poor is better or having no relationships is better. It's a way of keeping the mind less cluttered. Because when the mind is less cluttered, it can penetrate more deeply into life, and it can grow wisdom more easily. So it's a question that every person needs to look at and discover for themselves. Different people have really different tolerances for complexity than other people.

This is some advice from the Dalai Lama. It's from a book called Awakening the Mind, Enlightening the Heart:

"Practicing the Dharma does not mean you have to give up your profession or do away with your possessions. There are various levels of practice according to individual ability and mental disposition. Everyone cannot renounce the world and meditate in the mountains. This is not practical. How long could we survive? We would soon starve. We need farmers to grow food, and we need as well the support of the business community. People in all trades and professions can work honestly and conscientiously without contradicting the Dharma. In this way, they serve the community and help the overall economy. I usually advise people to devote half their time to the affairs of life and half their time to the practice of the teachings. This, I think, is a balanced approach for most people."

Wow. I usually don't advise people like that because I'd probably be laughed off the podium, but this is advice from the Dalai Lama. It's not to say that each of us has to do that, but it just might be an encouragement to look at where we've drawn that balance line in our life and think about other ways to approach it. 50-50. What would that look like in your life? Could you even imagine that? That's a challenge.

So there's something of a question about how do you make the trade-offs in your life between practice, your spiritual life, and your work commitments. And then also, of course, in that same level of importance come the family commitments. How do you balance those three? It's a difficult question.

When I was working at Microsoft, I got two weeks of vacation a year. And the first time I got my first week of vacation, I went on an intensive retreat. I signed up for the old students' retreat at Santa Sabina. I was going to do a week and then come back all charged up. I got about three days into it, and I realized that after that pressured life I'd been living for about the past year, I didn't want a bunch of bells telling me what I had to do that day either. And just going through this very demanding schedule with all these people around and queuing up for food, that was not what I wanted. I put my retreat practice aside for five years.

And I'm a retreat junkie. I'm a big-time retreat junkie. I love life in retreat. I've spent probably three years of my life in retreat over different times. I put it aside for five years because it wasn't what I wanted in my two weeks of vacation a year.

So one of the ways we can make this balance is by doing work for a while, you know, really full on, and then doing Dharma for a while more full on, or moving into a less work, more Dharma kind of balance. So it's not that we have to establish this 50-50 balance today, but to give some thought to how in our life we can find ways to bring in the Dharma practice more, ways to bring that balance about.

I think that's all that I want to say right now about meditation as it relates to the work environment. Again, the important pieces are balance between spiritual life and work life, formal practice in the work setting and finding ways to do that, and the informal practice of relating to our own inner life, our own emotional life.

Questions or comments?

"I have a question. When the Dalai Lama is saying 50% work and 50% practice, by practice does he mean formal meditation?"

Well, the way he understands it, I think he said practicing the teachings. So I think for him, study is also a way of practicing the teachings. Meditation practice is another way.

Hearing the teachings is a way. So I think all of that would come into it for him.

"But not some kind of incorporation practices?"

He doesn't mean that necessarily. I think it's fine to separate the work life over here and the practice life over here as formal practice. Study comes under that also, or hearing the teachings.

"In the work life, is that where we include family?"

No. That's why—sometimes it is hard work, but that's why I added that on as a third one when I talked about establishing balance. "What about sleep?" That's an important one, too. But I think the balance, really, as we talk about it, comes between family life, work life, and practice. So there's even more. And that's why I say I don't think you should think of applying this as 50% of every day has to be practice.

"Yes, Nancy, I wanted to comment since you raised the issue of the daily stopping. It turns out Mary and I—because I started doing it during a period of great difficulty, and actually it was a dharma teacher who suggested I get a clock, you know, watch the sound of the hour, which you know is the bane of my existence, people who don't turn off their watches, their beeper watches. And what surprised me—you said that you find that you have to be with the uncomfortable feelings. But what I also found was often there weren't uncomfortable things. So I had this idea that my life was very..."

So I think what we're going to do is skip the small discussion groups on this topic of meditation, the formal meditation. I don't know how much there is to say about that anyway, and spend just a few more minutes on that topic in the large group.

One of the things that I wanted to say is for people who work with your hands, you can actually use virtually all of your work time as formal meditation practice. The way to do that is just keep your attention in touch with the sensations in your body as you're working. Stay in touch with your arms and the sensations in your hands, and let that be your primary focus of attention.

So if you're doing body work, for instance, on a client, if you're doing carpentry, if you're doing gardening—you need to give a little bit of attention, obviously, to the task, but there's quite a bit of free attention that you can put in a formal meditation direction. So that's highly encouraged, and it's something you can also use in meetings. Just keep the attention focused in the body.

What I thought might be interesting to talk about now in the group is to put together the first two things that we've covered—which is right speech and right action and ethics in general—with these difficult emotions that come up in the workplace, which is the field of meditation, and talk about a question that often comes up: How do we deal with a difficult person at work? Almost everybody that I talk to has got one somewhere, one of these difficult people.

For myself, I had a manager who I felt was being very restrictive with me. I had gotten an email from a friend at corporate asking about what kind of computers I thought the technical support people in the field sales offices needed. So I wrote back a long email that said, well, I don't think our current specs are entirely adequate, and this is what I think the spec should be for our computer systems. I sent that back to this person, and they sent it around to a few other people.

Somehow my manager got copied on that mail. The decisions on computers were made at a district level, but out of corporate recommendations. My manager thought that I was being insulting to their specification and support. So she called me into the office, read me the riot act, said, "Don't you ever send email to that person again. I don't want your comments on this office going out across this whole corporation."

I tried to explain to her I was simply answering a mail that someone had sent me. But she didn't see it that way at all. I got so angry. I held my temper, and I bit my tongue. But I said what I felt about it, which was that I thought that was unfair, that it was very important for us to communicate with other people and our peers, and she wouldn't have any of it.

So I left the meeting. I was very angry. I went to the basement in the parking garage, and I just stormed around up and down the aisles of the garage for a while, just really angry. When I calmed back down enough to come back in, I just picked up working again. But I had a very rocky relationship with that person for quite a long time from my side, mainly around this incident.

Looking back now, I think there was a trust issue there that I just didn't see at the time. I didn't see, oh, she doesn't trust me. And looking back, I could see some earlier incidents. Now I understand. But for a long time, I just did not have a good relationship with the person.

We all probably have stories like that.

So I'm wondering if anyone would be willing to share stories about difficulties with coworkers, managers, or customers, and how you found skillful ways to navigate those situations?

One participant shared: "I work for a woman who is verbally abusive. She never really targeted me directly, but she would frequently attack our shared secretary—being sarcastic, critical, using that harsh tone of voice. When I first started working there, I thought, 'Oh my goodness, what am I going to do about this? I can't just ignore it. I have to do something.' But I was also new and wasn't sure how to give that kind of feedback to my boss.

"What I decided to do—and it took a long time to figure out the right approach—was to support our secretary in strengthening her own response. When she would complain to me about the boss, I would encourage her: 'Have you thought about just saying, "Don't speak to me that way"?' I also decided to model this behavior myself. Any time this woman would start using that tone with me, I would stop it right there. It's been five years now, and it almost never happens anymore. I don't know whether I had anything to do with that change, but certainly everyone seems happier in that situation."

That's beautiful. You can imagine how the secretary would feel going home after a day of being verbally attacked—she could be devastated for days. That kind of skillful intervention really makes a difference in people's lives.

Another participant offered: "I was working for a man who was restrictive, punitive, dismissive, unresponsive, uncooperative, and unsupportive, among other things. It was incredibly difficult. I tried every skillful means I could think of, but nothing worked. I just wasn't at a level to deal with it, so I suffered.

"During this period, I was doing a lot of driving and listening to tapes by Caroline Myss. She had one tape where she discussed the function of Judas in Christianity. Her conclusion was that Judas was responsible, in a way, for creating the Savior, because Christ had to die to be resurrected. She said, 'If there's a really terrible person in your life, thank that person as your Savior.'

"That was the only thing I could think of doing. Every time he did something horrible, I didn't say it out loud, but I thanked him internally. It was incredibly transformative—it changed everything. That internal response helped me, and eventually it helped me find my way out of there. When I finally left, I felt complete. I had taken what I needed to take and gotten what I needed to get."

These two responses beautifully illustrate the two different avenues we can pursue when working with difficult people. One is direct outer communication; the other is inner transformation. Sometimes it may be helpful to do both. Sometimes only one avenue is available to us. There are some difficult people in work situations you simply cannot talk to directly.

That's been my experience. To try would only compound the problem. So when that avenue is closed, inner transformation becomes the only path available.

The kind of gratitude you're feeling is exactly how the Dalai Lama speaks of feeling toward the Chinese, who came in and killed hundreds of thousands of monks and nuns, tortured people, and reduced the Tibetan population from about seven million to six million during their occupation. The Dalai Lama says something like, "We need to be grateful to our enemy"—and he used that word, "enemy," which is a strong word—because they teach us patience. He said, "How else would I have learned patience if it hadn't been for the presence of my enemy?"

That's a very difficult kind of appreciation to come to, but if you can find that or develop it as a way of practice, it can be really powerful. Thank you.

There's another situation where you don't necessarily have to deal with it alone. I had a new manager at a time when I was very depleted, and she was the opposite of helpful because she didn't know anything. She was also extremely anxious, so instead of being supportive—at least emotionally—she was adding to the burden by micromanaging and saying things that were so ignorant they felt insulting.

Luckily I had one other person I could go to. I was in very bad shape emotionally, a combination of my work situation and that person, and I had somebody I could tell the truth to. I really felt psychologically that this was character stuff with this person, and I saw absolutely no chance for help.

But the good news is we had a healthy person I had talked to, and he did research among all the people working for this person and found that my feelings were universal. What's amazing is that I was dead wrong about this person's ability to change. She was tasked with talking with all of us about what our needs were, and I was pleased that I could tell her the truth compassionately.

This woman meets all my needs now. It's like a miracle to me. That doesn't mean I think she's perfect—she's human and could be better in some things—but as far as really being a support and strategic resource, she really is. It's amazing.

That's terrific. It sounds like a healthy organization, in some ways. So looking for allies, especially people with influence and willingness to use it. That's a beautiful story. Thank you.

Others? Yes, Nancy?

I have worked with someone for years, and he and I have had a pattern of conflict for years. For a long time he could do nothing right in my mind, and probably I the same. At one point I was doing an explicit practice of generosity every day, doing something generous. One of the things about him that bothered me is that he speaks at length—it takes him half an hour to say good morning.

So he started this one day, and I said, as my practice of generosity... I thought through my schedule and said, "I can stay here until he finishes." I listened. There had been a meeting I had heard about, and I had already heard the other side of the story. He had, in my mind, done his usual screw-up.

He started telling me about the meeting—the background of the meeting, the background of the background—and finally got to how hurt he was by all of this. Suddenly he was a human being. All these years I had kept him as a bad guy, and suddenly what I heard was different. I couldn't hold him at a distance anymore.

Then he did something I actually appreciated. I ran into him in the stairwell and without even thinking said, "I really appreciate what you did."

Well, we now talk. And he doesn't talk at great length. He was disrespectful of everyone, including me, or so I thought. He is now much more respectful. I think it was this mutual disrespect that was feeding one another.

One of the things that irritated me was that he would do things—I thought he had very bad judgment—and then I would have to kind of backpedal and resolve the problems he had created. The other day he called me and said, "I'm thinking about doing this. What do you think?"

That's fantastic. It brings up a few different thoughts. For me, there's this lovely saying by Lao Tzu in the Tao Te Ching where he says, "If you want to shrink something, you must first let it expand." That really seems true with people who have a compulsive need to talk. As you say, what I've noticed is a lot of those people feel very isolated. It's a way of making some kind of connection or putting their story out. If you do give it the space, it takes away some of the need for that to happen. That's beautiful.

The other thing that I really appreciate in your story is the connection to the humanity. A lot of you probably know that when we do the loving-kindness practice, we start with the people that we feel close to—ourselves, friends, loved ones—and then we move to people we don't know, and then we move to people that we have a difficult time with. We call them, classically, the enemy or the difficult person.

One of the things that the metta practice does as you develop it is help you see—you can't do the metta practice without seeing what's lovable in each person. That's basically the focus of the metta practice. You find out what's lovable in the person and therefore why you can feel friendly toward them. Even in doing a difficult person, we're almost forced to see what's likable in that person. How would this person's mother see them, for instance?

I think that's a very skillful thing to do with someone who's a difficult person at work: just keep in mind, where's their humanity? How would this person's mother see them? It can really change our relationship.

Any other difficult person stories? Well, those were all really terrific. They all illustrated something different, and the movement within each one was inspiring. How long did this take—the whole situation, until it started to change? It was over a period of months from when that first conversation where I really listened. That's cool.

I thought I would talk now about the third area of the Eightfold Path, which is wisdom in the work situation. Then we'll move into some group discussion and small discussion groups.

There are two aspects of wisdom in the Buddha's teachings. The first is right view, or sometimes called right understanding. The second is right intention, or motivation, or aspiration—the attitude underlying our actions. Why do we do the actions we do?

I think it would be appropriate to talk about right intention in relation to our work. It poses the basic question: why do we work? I think it's really important that this intention in us be understood clearly because it's the background for everything we do at work.

In the teachings of the Buddha, this quality of intention or motivation is so important because it is the seed of karma. When the intention is wholesome, then the action that comes from it is said to be wholesome, and the results of a wholesome action are wholesome in our lives. If we can set our intention straight in the beginning with an action, then it unfolds in a wholesome way, and the fruits of that action come back to us in a wholesome way. This really is the nub of it.

Tibetans have a saying that everything rests on the tip of motivation. This is true in work as well.

But before we answer that question, I want to step back once more and examine why we practice. This gives us a fundamental direction in our life of motivation.

There's a beautiful saying of the Buddha that you've probably all heard: "Not to harm others, to help others if you can, and to purify the mind—this is the teaching of all the Buddhas." These three aspects form what I consider the basic aspiration or direction of Dharma practice.

When I think about right intention as it applies to work, I connect these three areas to it: not to harm, to help if we can, and to use work to purify our own hearts.

Some of the motivations that come to mind that fit within this wise intention: first, to provide the requisites for ourselves and our families. That's part of helping ourselves and our families. The requisites in the Buddhist sense are clearly defined as food, clothing, shelter, and medicine—the four things the community of monks and nuns was always said to need access to. These are wholesome motivations.

The motivation might be simply because we enjoy the work—it lets us use our talents and we find joy in that. That's a wholesome motivation. It might be directly because we believe we can benefit others or benefit the world through our work, embodying this attitude of non-harming and helping.

This is one of the real benefits I see in the work arena. I've known many people, including myself, who have tried to avoid the work arena at times in their lives. Sometimes I see people avoiding the arena of work for many, many years because the conflicts they feel around it are too severe. But I feel what people miss out on when they do that is the chance to develop confidence and self-esteem.

I think the workplace is actually excellent ground for developing this trust in ourselves. Confidence is sometimes talked about in Buddhist terms with the words confidence, trust, or faith. I think all these qualities come into play from developing ourselves through work. It can be an area where we honestly develop a deeper faith in life and a deeper faith in ourselves. And faith is what really allows for surrender.

These are healthy reasons for being involved in work.

What are some of the unhealthy ones? Basically, when the project of self or the project of ego gets involved in our work situation, motivation can go astray. The reason becomes not some of the wholesome motivations we mentioned, but work is used to aggrandize our sense of self or aggrandize the ego in some way.

I'm sure you've seen this in people who take jobs as a way of defining themselves. As they grow in status or power, their ego just gets grander and grander, and they become more and more of a pain to people around them. That's the kind of unhealthy motivation of work.

Because those kinds of approaches—using status or power or wealth to build up or inflate our sense of ourselves—only create more separation. They don't let us see the interconnectedness; they build separateness.

Of course, Dharma practice can be used in the same way: "I'm a practitioner, or I'm a Buddhist, so therefore I'm better than the people who aren't practicing, or better than the non-Buddhists." But hopefully within our meditation practice are the tools to see through that kind of pride, to see through that kind of comparison. In the work world, usually those tools of questioning, of investigation, of paring away the unwholesome aren't built in. So we have to do that work ourselves.

The Buddha identified eight concerns that tend to move the mind in an unhealthy direction that he called the eight worldly concerns. These are distinguished from what you might call right intention or right motivation—these are ones that lead us astray.

The eight worldly concerns are in four pairs: concerns with pleasure and pain, with loss and gain, with praise and blame, and with fame and disrepute.

It's not that there's anything wrong with any of these items. We all experience the alternation of these qualities in our lives. It's not like you've got your life wrong if there's blame, if somebody's criticizing you, if there's pain in your life. These things fluctuate for all of us. But if we get attached to these as the primary direction of our life, our motivation goes astray.

These things come naturally in the process of living, in the process of developing a livelihood. Sometimes they manifest on a huge scale. Someone mentioned last week that Bill Gates was worth $45 billion at current Microsoft stock price levels—$45 billion! Yet he says it's not about the money.

So it's not that these worldly conditions are wrong in themselves, but rather our clinging to them, being driven by them, or becoming obsessed with these results that brings suffering. It's when we tie ourselves to these outcomes as proof of our worth or validation of ourselves that we suffer.

I find it helpful to keep the eight worldly concerns in mind and regularly check: How much am I being driven by praise or blame? Am I doing something because I want personal glory, or because I genuinely want the outcome? Am I investing in a job that lacks inner meaning but promises wealth? Or am I following what I honestly love, and if wealth comes, it comes?

If you set your life's direction as following the Buddha's teachings—not to harm, to help others, and to purify the mind—this orientation itself becomes a safeguard against being consumed by the eight worldly concerns. But frankly, without this kind of spiritual or at least humanistic bent, it's very difficult not to be consumed by them.

You can observe this dynamic in Silicon Valley. The enormous wealth generated by high-tech startups reveals telling patterns. One report I read noted that people who have gotten rich through entrepreneurship in our generation have contributed less to charity than most previous generations—perhaps because they're still young, but there seems to be wealth pursued for its own sake, for enormous houses, multiple cars, and private jets that go far beyond what's needed.

Having a Dharma orientation while living in the world means—and this phrase may sound trite—being in the world but not of it. The societal mainstream is essentially fabricated from these eight concerns. So to work and play in the world without being dominated by these concerns requires a different strategy.

Letting go of the eight worldly concerns is essentially letting go of clinging to ego. If our work is truly to reduce the element of self and self-concern in our lives and livelihood, then these concerns are what repeatedly draw us back into the constellation of ego in the work world. They serve as useful pointers for keeping our motivation pure and direct.

This is a lifetime practice, not something achieved overnight. Our motivation purifies just as all other aspects of the Eightfold Path purify through practice. Just as mindfulness, wisdom, and ethics purify, so too our motivation and intention purify as our Dharma practice develops.

There's another aspect of right view I wanted to mention—an attitude I tried to carry and heard expressed often today: in work settings, people are more important than organizational ends. People are the true means of an organization, and I believe they're more important than the ends.

When I was at Microsoft, I wasn't overtly Buddhist, but I tried to tune into everyone's well-being. I would go out of my way to visit people's desks and check in on their work lives, their concerns about managers, their home situations. I knew something about the home lives and relationships of those who worked for me. I felt this was an important part of being there—ensuring people felt there was always a sympathetic ear somewhere in that office.

Interestingly, while I was there, nobody showed much interest in meditation. I made good friendships at Microsoft, but at most got two people to attend one Monday night talk with Jack. However, I was deeply touched that after I left, three different couples, knowing what I was doing, asked me to perform their weddings. There was clearly a connection there.

Another wholesome intention you can bring to the workplace is what I call the bodhisattva spirit—being there to listen to people's difficulties, to draw out where they're struggling. This can become a powerful motivation for being present.

Great teachers are described as wish-fulfilling gems who bring to each person exactly what they need. Imagine the blessing of having such a presence in a workplace! When one person in an organization is truly loved by everyone, it exerts tremendous unifying force. This is one way to build genuine teams, why leaders can be so transformative. When everyone loves one person, it draws the whole group together—love has this unifying influence.

What qualities can we cultivate in our workplace relationships to bring out this loving presence? If it's there, it can truly transform the workplace, even if we're not the leader or manager.

So can we be bodhisattvas in our work? Can we be there to love others and listen to their difficulties?

The only thing that limits our capacity to be a bodhisattva in the workplace is our own development. If we're not able to love and listen to our colleagues, it simply means we haven't learned to love enough ourselves. And so that becomes our practice—to grow enough that we can love the people we work with.

I want to talk about some specifics around the eight worldly concerns, beginning with money, which has come up several times this morning. It's such a charged issue, and while this isn't unique to our culture, it may be more pronounced here because we have more material abundance.

First, let me clarify the Buddhist attitude toward money. There's the possibility of getting very different messages about money from the Buddhist tradition because nuns and monks are often held up as ideals of Buddhist practice, and they take vows of poverty. They take vows of poverty and celibacy. So somehow this might influence people to think that it's better to be a poor Buddhist. God forbid you should be a Buddhist with resources. Best of all would be if you had absolutely nothing.

The Buddha designed monastic life as a way to allow total focus on dharma practice. For some people, that's a beautiful lifestyle. For most of us in the West, at this point, it's not unfolding that way. Most of us who are teaching and practicing are laypeople.

The Buddha talked about money very differently with laypeople. Basically, he said that wealth is the result of generosity. There's a karmic connection between the generous acts we've made in the past and the abundance we experience today in our lives. He taught that there is great value in having wealth if it is used to enrich the dharma. When wealth is directed toward positive ends, it becomes a very positive force—another opportunity to be generous for both the giver and those receiving its benefits.

The relationship between monastics and laypeople in Buddhism was designed so that monastics depend on lay support. As a monastic in the Theravadan tradition in countries like Thailand, you can't keep food overnight. When I was a monk, if I wanted to practice somewhere far from villages and working people, I couldn't do it because I'd starve. The Buddha arranged it so that monks and nuns had to live near villages where they could collect their morning meal by begging from those communities. Therefore, monastic survival depends on the wealth and generosity of the surrounding community.

Spirit Rock exists only through the generosity of many people—some with little money, some with moderate means, some with great wealth. Spirit Rock is here because we've been blessed with generous gifts from wealthy people as well as those who don't have much.

The Buddha felt what mattered was keeping proper perspective on money. This is a paraphrase, as I don't have the exact source with me: "Of small concern for a practitioner is an increase in wealth. Of great concern is an increase in wisdom. Of small concern is a decrease in wealth. Of great concern is a decrease in wisdom." In the Buddhist tradition, wisdom is often spoken of as the wealth of a practitioner—the true wealth.

With money, so many questions arise in relation to work: How much is enough? How much do I need? Am I going to run out? Am I getting what I'm worth? Is someone else getting more than me? What do I do with the money I have? How much can I spend on myself and my own pleasures? How much should I direct to other causes, to helping people, to charitable uses? There are so many misconceptions and strong feelings around money that it's often hard to have clarity about it. But it is one of the eight worldly concerns that's important to monitor.

Another fascinating concern is around responsibility and fear of failure or blame. This comes up frequently in work because we're essentially paid to take responsibility. You don't hire someone unless you're giving them a chunk of work for which they are accountable. How does that feel? When you have responsibility for a major piece of work, how does that feel?

It can be a real burden, because if we mess up, many people will know about it. It's often quite obvious whether we succeed or not. Sometimes we don't want more responsibility simply because we don't want more visibility. I definitely felt this way at Microsoft. The road was open for me to go higher on the corporate ladder than I did, but I didn't want to. Because the higher up you go, the more visible you are.

And the more visible you are, the more praise and blame you receive. I was quite comfortable with my current level of praise and blame. I wasn't making a lifelong career out of it, and I essentially hid in the organization for a while because I didn't want to deal with any more praise and blame. This was probably a reflection of both my wisdom, to some extent, and also my fear. Perhaps I would have grown more in a more visible position—I don't know. But I think both qualities were present in me.

The way to be free in this area is something Krishna told his charioteer Arjuna in the Bhagavad Gita: "The way to freedom in this world is to act without attachment to the fruits of your action." This is a profound spiritual teaching. This is another way of saying that the eight worldly concerns shouldn't drive us. In a sense, this is the essence of right effort.

In our work and in our dharma practice, in our meditation practice, we want to pay attention, but then we don't know what will result. We have to pay attention and trust that mindfulness leads to wholesome states, but we can't force that. In our work as well, we make our right effort, but we really can't control the results.

When I was a sales representative, I used to get nervous before certain presentations because there was potentially a lot of money on the table. If the customer bought from us, it could mean millions of dollars in income, and much of it might be influenced by one or two presentations. If we lost it, it would be clear—I was the account rep, I lost the account. I felt that responsibility keenly.

But what I started to realize is that I couldn't control the outcome of the customer's decision. All I could do was deliver the best presentation I could. I really learned this lesson from sports. I play tennis, and it's clear that some days I can go out playing really well and still get beaten because my opponent is simply too good. So I go into a match realizing I can't control whether I win or lose. The only thing under my control is whether I play my best game.

This has been a really helpful reshaping of right effort for me—just to play my best game. If I win, that's great. If I lose, that's unfortunate, but I can't control that. What I can do is play my best game. And when I play without fearing the result, it goes better. I play better, I present better.

I think about this a lot at Spirit Rock. Deborah Urban is with us today—Deborah has just joined our staff as development director, and she has the lofty assignment of trying to fundraise the rest of the money we need to finish the meditation hall, which you probably saw on the hill at lunchtime. We have about another $1.3 million to go, hopefully by the end of this year.

Organizationally, Deborah has some responsibility for that. But if Deborah felt she had to control the outcome of securing that money, she'd probably go crazy. So I want to say publicly, Deborah, you don't have that responsibility. Deborah's responsibility is simply to identify the best means for us to try and raise the rest of that money and then implement a plan. But we can't control what happens with that plan. Maybe we'll get the money, maybe we won't. If we don't, we'll borrow it. It's okay—it just means people will pay a little more for retreats than they would have. But it really is okay.

If we can just have that attitude—that we do our best and we can't control the outcome—it's a way to be more comfortable with responsibility.

Another area where a lot of ego gets tied up is ambition in work, which is basically the ego investment in recognition and being rewarded with money and title and so forth.

When I went to work for Microsoft, I made a vow to myself. My vow was that I wasn't going to get my ego involved in my work. I was just going to go in and do the job, and I wasn't going to get caught up in the office politics, or whether I got a promotion, or whether I was getting paid enough. I knew it was enough money to keep me alive, and I wasn't going to get involved in praise, recognition, rewards, awards, and so forth.

I succeeded for about six months. And then my ego got totally involved. I could see myself really wanting to be recognized and wanting a good review. We had performance reviews every six months and they were numerical, so I knew exactly where I stood. I found myself wanting the highest percentage increase that would be based on that numerical rating each time and wanting awards at sales meetings. So it snuck in even though I was trying to be aware of it and didn't want it to happen—that level of ambition.

All I could do then was watch it with perspective. And that's okay too. If we can watch that stuff with perspective, we don't have to be ashamed of having an ego. In case you haven't noticed, the whole world does, except for maybe the Dalai Lama and a few other people. So it's not shameful to have an ego. How can you be in sales in that type of environment and not get caught up when they have the big board showing who sold what this month? That's a horrible job not to have that involvement. I couldn't do it. That's the simple answer. I couldn't. I'm sure the Buddha could have, but he probably wouldn't have bothered.

The more we understand that those things don't ultimately matter, the more freely we can play in that world. I knew people who were freer than I was about that stuff, and they hadn't even done meditation practice or psychotherapy. I respected that a lot.

This ambition is really always focused on my pursuits and interests and self-concern. And ultimately, that's suffering. That's why clinging is suffering. Shantideva, who was an eighth-century Indian teacher, said, "All happiness in this world comes from desiring others to be happy. All unhappiness in this world comes from wanting only myself to be happy." So this ambition stuff is usually only about myself. But when our interest is truly in the welfare of others too, that's when the potential for happiness really grows.

I mentioned the person I knew, my friend and manager who left Microsoft basically out of ambition. He had had ambition for promotion to the next level, and when it was thwarted, he got so upset he left, leaving behind what turned out to be $28 million.

Someone I know was married to a man who was very ambitious. He graduated from the Naval Academy and became a commercial airline pilot, then went to work as an executive for GE and started up General Electric China back in the late seventies. They moved to Hong Kong for a few years while he was heading up that operation. His wife didn't like traveling, didn't like being the corporate wife, didn't like that he was away all the time, didn't like having to move every few years so he could get another promotion. At one time she said, "God, if he'd only been a couple inches taller, he wouldn't have had to go through all this." It was just a quick quip, but it's a pointer to the fact that this kind of ambition often comes from personal insecurity.

It's often a lack of real fulfillment that makes us invest in things like title and status and power over other people, as though because we have the ability to tell other people what to do in the workspace or to allot them their percentage raise, it makes us a better or more important person. It's a fundamental illusion.

I think I'll stop there. I had a little topic on competitiveness, but we'll maybe let that come out in the discussion. I'd just like to close by reading a quotation from Chuang Tzu, who was a Taoist master of 500 B.C. Many of you have probably heard this before. It's called "The Empty Boat," and in many ways it's a beautiful model for living in the world.

"If a person is crossing a river and an empty boat collides with his boat, even though he is a bad-tempered man, he will not become very angry. But if he sees someone in the other boat, he will shout at him to steer clear. If the shout is not heard, he will shout again, and yet again, and begin cursing—and all because there is somebody in the boat."

Yet if the boat were empty, he would not be shouting, and he would not be angry. If you can empty your own boat crossing the river of this world, no one will oppose you and no one will seek to harm you.

So I thought we could open up to some discussion in the large group first. Then we'll probably take one more break and come back, and I think some small groups might be interesting to discuss some of the issues we've touched on—money, ambition, self-esteem, and so forth. So, comments please.

Question: Your comment about not controlling the outcome—I find that a wonderful thought, but it seems like in the workplace it's really difficult, because basically all evaluations, and even if you're in charge and other people are looking at you to see what you're doing, are pretty much based on outcomes. Spirit Rock sounds like a wonderful employer, but other places aren't. I'm just wondering how you think one can realize that in the context of what the work world tends to be like.

I think that outcomes go best when we're not attached to the result. It's the same in meditation practice. Meditation practice is such a deep teaching on this very topic, because if you approach your practice with a specific goal in mind, you're going to be frustrated again and again, because meditation unfolds according to the ripening of the individual process.

For instance, people come on a meditation retreat thinking they're supposed to come to greater peace, and after three days they find their mind is going crazy—and that's the good part. After four or five days, it's dredging up the most terrible memories of anything we've ever done or said to someone. After six days, it's unfolding deeply held grief or sadness that we've carried since we were ten years old that we didn't even know was hiding there. It feels anything but peaceful.

So if we come into that meditation experience thinking the outcome should be peace, we're going to be frustrated. If we surrender to the process and stay with it, with that good intention, then eventually there's this huge clearing out and a great deep level of peace that's accessed and touched and becomes really available to us. But we have no control over when that happens.

In the workplace, obviously we have much closer control and more immediate results, but we really can't strictly determine what somebody around us is going to do in response to what we do. All we can do is our best job. If we do our best job and the goals have been set reasonably, then the best results will come. So I think that element of surrender is really important for anyone in a work setting as a way of doing their best job. When you do your best job, you have the best chance of getting the best results.

We do take responsibility in our workplace for not having gotten results, and I think that's entirely appropriate. But we also have to understand with wisdom the interdependence that means we can't control outcomes entirely. For example, Kofi Annan goes to negotiate a truce with Saddam Hussein, and he does his best effort, but he can't control the outcome. He has the whole responsibility for the peace of Iraq riding on his shoulders, but he can't control the outcome. He just goes and does the best job he can. In this case, fortunately, the outcome came.

There has to be the sense of responsibility, but underneath it, we have to know with wisdom that we're not totally in control of anything—not even our own health.

Question: I'm just curious—what happened to the manager that left Microsoft?

Well, it was actually a sad story because he went to a few different companies that didn't seem quite the right fit. He's still in the high tech industry and still in sales. He was vice president of sales for a well-known software company for a while, but that ended up in difficulty. So he bounced around a bit. I think it was very unsettling to his confidence the way that story happened.

Question: Could you comment briefly on the distinction between right effort and right action?

In terms of the Eightfold Path, right effort is really defined in psychological terms. It's what we do to bring about more wholesome states within our own hearts and minds and what we do to decrease the unwholesome states within our hearts and minds. Right Effort is directly connected with meditation practice and mindfulness practice and awareness.

The link is that when we have purified the heart more and we can see more clearly, then our intention becomes purified, and it's through the link of right intention that our actions become pure. So right action is what we do in the world in relation to others, and it's purified by clear seeing and then traveling through this vehicle of wise intention.

Question: How do you come to terms with the difference between how much money somebody makes and what they do in terms of its value to society? You've got athletes who try to kill their coaches and they're worth millions, then you have Mother Teresa on the other end. And then people that seem to be money magnets who really are mean or abusive people that don't have a whole lot going for them, yet they always seem to have plenty of money. Then you have bright, articulate, attractive people that have a lot seemingly going for them, but they have trouble getting jobs or getting really well-paying jobs or seem to always be underpaid.

I mean, if money's energy, why is it not flowing toward what's righteous almost?

I wish I knew. I share your dilemma. There seems to be a lot of injustice in the world around this issue of money.

I'll tell you basically the answer that one of my Tibetan teachers gave to me. When a similar question like that was asked, he basically said, "This is samsara, and we don't expect things to work right in samsara." And it's not a cynical answer, but in the teachings of the Buddha, the world is deeply troubled. The world is not in good shape in the eyes of the teachings of the Buddha.

There is a tremendous amount of blindness going on in the world. As you can tell from the wars and the corruption and the fighting and the greed and so forth, there's a tremendous amount of blindness going on. That blindness expresses itself in human suffering. So there's also blindness in the consumer society. As long as the larger mainstream society is not driven by a deeper underlying motivation for the liberation of heart and mind and the welfare of all sentient beings, there are going to be huge injustices.

I think that the road to smoothing them out is twofold. I think it's interaction through people who are interested in transforming their own consciousness, and I think it's through outer action of social activists pointing out the failings of the society at large to do what's needed in areas that need to be attended to. But there's clearly no quick solution, and I think there's a lot of injustice in the world today.

"Isn't karma, doesn't that play a large role?"

Say some more.

"I believe that people come in with a particular dharma that's based on whatever karma they've had in previous lives. And some people are not here to make money right now. I mean, that's just not their dharma. They have other things they have to learn. Other people make enormous amounts of money, and they have things to learn from that. There's a balancing of the scales. I think we tend to look at things over such a short period of time. I mean, a lifetime is no time in the scheme of things."

Yes, this is definitely within the teachings of the Buddha. It's very clearly stated that people carry with them into each life the mental tendencies that have built up through their actions, based on their intention, in past lives. And so people come into this life with different propensities.

The Buddha said, I think I mentioned earlier, that one of the prerequisites for abundance was generosity. He said that people who are kind in their relationships to living beings are blessed with long life. And he made a number of comments around karma like that. So that's certainly one explanation. That's one possible explanation for all the discrepancies of talent, of welfare, of wealth, of health that you see around the world.

"And yet also we hear the stories so often of those good Samaritans who risk their life to help someone, and their life has got short. And we also hear the term, why did he or she have to go? He was such a good human being. It's a hard one to... And we never know. People like Martin Luther King being killed so young, John Kennedy, Princess Diana. We never know why. And it's one of those mysteries that we know we're exposed to also."

Nancy?

"Could you say something about being the bodhisattva of the workplace and balance? When we're already trying to balance work and not work and various aspects of work, and then in most workplaces there is so much need and so few people filling that role that if you step in, then it becomes a bottomless pit."

Good question. I think you have to bring a sense of balance to that as well. And it's clear that if you want to devote some time in your workday to listening to other people, there's going to be a price to pay either in the quality of your own work or spending more time on your own work. So I think it's just another of the things you have to balance.

I think you have to learn in the work setting when to say no to people. If somebody drops by for a chat, being able to set time limits on it. Being able to tell people that you'd love to talk to them but you can't today. Getting sort of time management rules, you might say, within your bodhisattva relationships. But I think you just have to manage that like all the other tasks. You know, I just kind of saw it as one other task on my to-do list and I had to prioritize it and give it time within my other tasks.

Yes?

"That makes me think about a workplace where there are a variety of competencies, a variety of energies, and a variety of willingnesses, so that some are there a whole lot more than others, and they're all expecting, or they're all perceived as the same or equal. And so that really does have a, I mean, something really does begin to erode..."

for those people who are contributing more while others contribute less. And the confidence in the whole workplace begins to get fuzzy.

Well, in the places I've worked—which have been both for-profit and non-profit operations—I actually found that the for-profit organizations had much better performance review systems than the non-profit places. I strongly endorse performance review systems, and I think numerical ratings are terrific.

The challenge in spiritual communities is that we often resist these kinds of clear evaluative structures, perhaps thinking they're somehow unspiritual or that they create hierarchy in unhelpful ways. But I've found that clarity about expectations and honest feedback about performance actually supports everyone's growth and the health of the community. When we avoid difficult conversations about unequal contribution, we often end up with the very erosion of confidence that you're describing.

In the end, whether we're talking about time management, setting boundaries, or creating fair systems of accountability, the dharma asks us to bring wisdom and compassion together. This means being kind but not being naive, being generous but also being realistic about our limitations and the limitations of others. The middle way applies here too—between being a doormat and being overly rigid, between endless accommodation and harsh judgment.

These are some of the most practical applications of our dharma practice, and they're often the most challenging because they require us to live our understanding in the messy complexity of human relationships and institutions.

Uncovering Ego: Renunciation and the Hindrances

Guy Armstrong · 53 min

In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong draws on his experience with renowned Burmese meditation master Mahāsi Sayādaw to explore the transformative power of renunciation in spiritual practice. He examines how the simplicity of retreat life strips away external distractions, revealing the raw nature of our inner experience—both the clarity of awareness and the obstacles that impede it.

Armstrong discusses renunciation (nekkhamma) as one of the ten pāramīs or perfections, sharing inspiring stories from traditional practitioners like the Tibetan yogin Shabkar and contemporary nun Ani Tenzin Palmo. He explains how retreat conditions naturally bring forth the five hindrances (pañca nīvaraṇa): sensual desire (kāmacchanda), ill-will (vyāpāda), sloth and torpor (thīna-middha), restlessness and worry (uddhacca-kukkucca), and doubt (vicikicchā).

The talk emphasizes that these hindrances are not obstacles to overcome but opportunities for deepening wisdom. Through mindful awareness, moments of difficulty can be transformed into awakened consciousness. Armstrong encourages practitioners to befriend these energies with acceptance rather than aversion, recognizing them as impersonal forces of nature rather than personal failings. This approach represents the "alchemy of practice"—the direct transformation of suffering into wisdom through present-moment awareness.

The talk tonight is on Uncovering Ego, Renunciation and the Hindrances.

I was on the staff of Insight Meditation Society in Barre, Massachusetts in the late seventies when we had a visit from one of the most renowned meditation masters of the world, Mahasi Sayadaw. He was quite old at that time, and I think it was his first trip to the West. But in the Theravadan countries of Southeast Asia, particularly Burma, Thailand, and Sri Lanka, he may have been the most influential monk of this century, because he revived a meditation technique founded in the Visuddhimagga, one of the ancient texts from the fifth century Christian era, and built a meditation technique around it that generated hundreds of centers throughout Southeast Asia.

This is the practice that we teach here of the continuity of awareness through sitting and walking and with the employment of the soft mental notes to label what our experience is. That was basically the contribution of Mahasi Sayadaw in this century, and it became enormously popular.

So it was his first visit to the West and I had actually, as a manager of the center, written the letter inviting him to come, and I was very excited about his arrival. We went down to the Boston airport to pick him up. We waited at the gate where his plane was coming in from Asia, and everybody else got off the plane. You can't miss bald men in orange robes, and we hadn't seen any of those yet. We thought the plane was empty and we were wondering if they'd missed the flight out of Thailand or something.

And then as we were standing there at the gate, out they came marching, out through the gate, slowly, mindfully—the senior Sayadaw, Mahasi Sayadaw, in front, and all five of them were carrying fans, brown cloth fans that were embroidered with the writing "Mahasi Sayadaw, 1979 World Tour." It may not have been the Rolling Stones, but it was just as exciting for us.

Actually, the fan is a very significant symbol in Asian Dharma because the monks often speak behind it. They will sometimes give whole Dharma talks holding a fan in front of them. And by the end of the evening, you may never have known who was speaking. This points to the important truth that the words of the Dharma are really what's important and not the personality of the speaker. We thought about doing that here, but we knew you'd recognize Sylvia, so we gave it up.

Mahasi Sayadaw came to our center and gave a two-week retreat that was open to the public, and I had the good fortune to sit it. It was very interesting. It was my first real exposure to a traditional Asian teacher, and I found out that they teach quite differently than my teachers at that time—Joseph and Jack and Sharon and Christopher—had been teaching. They don't tell Sufi stories. They don't quote Mary Oliver poems. And they don't give many descriptions of embarrassing things that happened to them in second grade. Basically what the monks did was to repeat the words of the Buddha.

I was young in my practice then, and I didn't fully appreciate what they had to offer, because they were repeating the words with a deep understanding from their own personal experience of the meaning and the profundity of that message. And I was looking for Mary Oliver poems. So it was sometimes a frustrating experience for me at that point in my development.

The visit was enlivened by a little bit of controversy. At one point, somebody in the hall asked Mahasi Sayadaw a question about sexuality. Going to an eighty-year-old celibate monk for questions about sexuality is like coming to me for financial advice. But he did answer, and his response was that sex is gross, base, and disgusting. So that caused a few ripples. It caused a few ripples until one of the staff members figured out the solution. They said, "Oh, actually what happened was the translator just misstated it. What he actually said is that it's engrossing, basic, and worth discussing." Then everybody felt better about the Sayadaw.

So there was a little collision of cultures in my early encounters with Asian Buddhism and the Asian traditions. Over the years, I feel I've bridged that a lot and feel very close in spirit now to those teachers that I spent time with in the early years.

But one of the things that struck me at the time was just the power of their being—the power of their presence. Mahasi Sayadaw came over with about four of his senior monks, including Usi Lananda, who's still living in the Bay Area and teaching on the peninsula, and Ujanaka, who now has his own center outside of Rangoon, where some of our friends have practiced.

I felt when I was around them that I was in the middle of a vibration that I had never experienced before with a Westerner. There was a degree of stillness in their being, a degree of composure, a power of innocence, and a power of purity that I hadn't found in the teachers that I'd been studying with. It really impressed me a lot.

As I reflected and heard the stories of their lives, most of them had ordained quite young as novices and then moved into the monkhood. I felt that what I was feeling in that transmission was the power of renunciation that was a thread that had run through their lives possibly before they were even teenagers. It's not uncommon in Asia for novices to ordain at age seven or eight, to be schooled in the monasteries, and then to make the transition to full monkhood when they're eighteen, twenty, twenty-one.

I felt the purity of that entire lifestyle in a system that cultivated mindfulness and concentration and virtue, in a system where their focus from so early on had just been single-pointed on the Dharma. I felt the power of their renunciation. There was an unshakability that came from that lifestyle because they weren't looking for anything from us. They had their air ticket home. That was really all they needed. And they could just be simply themselves in this really strong and unshakable way. It was a really great lesson.

Well, we too develop this same kind of strength in our retreat experience.

Coming into a silent retreat like this is a major act of renunciation for us. The renunciation that we carry out here works on many levels. We may never even know all the levels it's operating on until years afterwards.

One of the things that happens quite clearly is when we come into an environment this simple, the mind settles and calms. You may feel that already just in the first few days of being here. Another aspect of the silence that I've often appreciated is when we don't speak and we don't act very much, we really don't get in as much trouble. In classical terms, it's said that this really protects our virtue. It protects our karma, protects our sila.

There's also a great strength in self-sufficiency. We find that we can bear these conditions, even though they're difficult. They're difficult for all of us. I just did a period of retreat this fall at the center in Massachusetts, and I've done a lot of retreats over the years. I'm used to the experience. I had a fairly good experience in the retreat, nothing of major difficulty, and yet I still found it arduous to go through the routine of sitting and walking and staying in silence and not having human contact day after day.

I think that for all of us, there is a difficulty in dedicating ourselves, in giving ourselves to this kind of lifestyle. I want to honor and respect your work with that. I know it's not easy. And yet this kind of dedication and bearing these hardships really brings an inner strength that I don't know any other way to come by. I actually believe that we'll all face death a lot more comfortably because of the time that we've spent in situations like this. I have great faith in that.

So renunciation is a very powerful aspect of practice. It's one of the ten paramis. The Buddha made lots of lists, as you know, and he made lots of lists of the good things in life and the difficult things in life. The paramis are one of the lists of the good things. Actually, they're referred to as the beautiful factors of mind. This is a list of the qualities of mind that, when we develop them through action, have the power to liberate us.

These are the qualities that the bodhisattva over many lifetimes brought to fruition so that he could be born and come to fulfillment and liberation in that life as Siddhartha Gautama, who became the Buddha. It is really the cultivation of these ten qualities that ripen the mind, that fulfill the mind, and bring it to the possibility of liberation.

The beautiful thing about the paramis is that they are intentions that accompany actions. As such, we can develop them in daily life as well as in the retreat setting. They're not something we need to leave behind at the gate of the retreat center when we go home, but they're practices and cultivations that we can take with us always in all situations.

This aspect of renunciation is really at the core of spiritual practice in our Buddhist tradition. This is a quote from the Buddha himself who said: "There are these roots of trees, there are these empty huts. Meditate bhikkhus, do not delay or else you will regret it later. This is our instruction to you."

Fortunately, we have something a little better than an empty hut or the root of a tree. At Spirit Rock, we're practicing not exactly the austere form of asceticism, but we've given this its own name. We call it the Upper Middle Path. It seems to work also.

There are many beautiful stories in the tradition of renunciation. One autobiography that I like a lot is the autobiography of a Tibetan Lama named Shabkar. He was born in 1781, so it was the time that we were fighting for our independence and killing the native people of this country. He practiced to great fruition and wrote one of the most beautiful Dharma books that I know of called Flight of the Garuda, which is in the Dzogchen tradition.

When he was twenty-five, he entered his first three-year retreat on his own. He went to an island in a remote part of Tibet and stayed there through all the seasons, of course without any heat, and just carried on with the practices that his teacher had given him in solitude. In fact, there were a few other meditators on the island and they would come over to ask him for advice, and he thought that was interrupting his retreat too much. So one year he mudded up the front of his cave so that he couldn't get out and nobody else could get in, and he meditated that way for a year.

This is the account of one of his years and his food supply. He said: "Throughout the year, one of the local people occasionally brought me goat's milk and curd. In the summer, some vegetables were to be found. By the end of autumn, however, my supplies were exhausted, and for two months I was reduced to eating only a thin soup of tsampa"—which is roasted barley grain. Can you imagine two months eating a thin soup of tsampa? It makes you appreciate oatmeal, doesn't it? It never sounded so good.

This was one of his statements to his teacher when he went into retreat. He called his teacher Father: "Until I achieve unchanging stability of mind, I won't remain in busy worldly places, but will stay alone in isolated places of retreat."

Father, accept this offering made to please you. The length of my practice shall equal the length of my life.

Coming into a situation like this, we also make a great renunciation. We give up family and friends and home and pets, our choice of meals, our entertainments, our restaurants—so many things of our life. You know, I think if this was imposed in prisons, it would be outlawed as cruel and unusual punishment. And yet we take it up gladly.

This level of giving up can bring its own challenges. It can bring a sense of insecurity, of loneliness or isolation, of feeling disconnected. Sometimes it can bring up a sense of unworthiness because we're not getting the contact and the feedback that affirms us as we do in our daily life. Sometimes we might wonder, what have I gotten myself into and why did I do this?

I'm reminded of another story from my early days at the meditation center in Massachusetts. There was a fellow who used to come around quite often for retreats. He was very worldly. In fact, we heard that he had made a lot of money in the real estate market. In those years, people of my age did not have a lot of money, and so we all looked on him with some fascination. Wow, this guy really scored big in the real estate market.

He ended up taking robes and ordaining with Ajahn Sumedho, who by that time, a student of Ajahn Chah, had set up a monastery in England, an early monastery in England. We were all amazed because he seemed so worldly. In fact, he said to Ajahn Sumedho, "I have all this money. What shall I do with it?"

Ajahn Sumedho said, "Give it away. Stick with me and you aren't going to need a penny of it."

And he did that. He gave all his money away, and he said about a year later, "You know, I was just about to invest that money in oil stocks. If I had, it would be worth a million dollars today." This was 1980, so he gave away a lot.

Entering the life of the renunciate, the monk's life, is its own challenge. It is arduous. And for such a worldly person, it was difficult. We often said of him that we felt his past virtue had kind of dragged him kicking and screaming into Sumedho's arms. I often think that way about coming on retreat. If I can just let my virtue take me there, once I get there, I know I'll be okay. But sometimes it feels like I've been dragged kicking and screaming.

So what is the purpose of this kind of renunciation? Why do we put ourselves in these situations?

Part of the beauty, the real essence of renunciation, is that when we let go of so many outer activities and our life becomes stripped bare in a way, what really stands out are the inner workings of our hearts and minds. Just as these little weeping trees—I think they're willows in the courtyard—losing their leaves now, you see so clearly the structure of the branches. When those trees were full of leaves, it just looked like a big bush and you couldn't really tell what supported the leaves. Now that the leaves have fallen, the branches are really clearly revealed.

So when our outer activities fall away, we are just left with the inner workings of our heart and mind. That is really where we learn. That is where we go to school in this practice. We are really here to understand how our hearts and minds work. This is what wisdom is about.

Particularly, the wisdom that we want to understand is: what activities of heart and mind and body lead to happiness? What activities of heart and mind and body lead to sorrow? This is really what we take up as a central theme of our investigation. And in this situation, that's all so clearly revealed.

It's a little bit like Gil said this morning. When we focus very clearly on the breath for a period of time, it tends to highlight whatever is not of this simple awareness of the breath. The other thoughts and plans and hopes and fears and wants that come in are so apparent because we're used to seeing the breath in its bare simplicity.

Similarly with this situation. It's so simple that when other things come in, we see them, sometimes for the first time. Someone said in an interview today, "Boy, this is really challenging."

I'm seeing again and again and again all these judgments of other people, all my opinions, the full extent of my comparing mind. It's just leaping out at me.

And this is part of the result. Sometimes it seems like we're going backwards. This stuff seems like tough stuff to see, to handle. It's kind of like one teacher said—Ruth Dennison said that self-knowledge is never good news. So sometimes in this setting, we see a lot of stuff that doesn't look like good news, but it actually is because it's in the seeing of it that we can learn from it and become freer.

There's another story of renunciation that I wanted to pass on. There's a book that's just come out about an English woman named Ani Tenzin Palmo who was born in 1943 in London and took robes in the Tibetan tradition in 1964, at the age of 21, in India. She felt a strong longing to be in solitary retreat and went way up in a cave in the Himalayas, 13,000 feet up, and spent most of 12 years practicing on her own in that cave. She's now come out of the solitude, returned to the West, and is founding a center in Italy and beginning to teach.

She passed through Spirit Rock last year and gave some teachings and had lunch with some of us. I said to her, "I have so much admiration for what you did. I feel it's completely beyond my capacity to do something like that." She said—she was very humble and very simple—"I only did what I wanted to do. I just felt drawn to be there, and I just did what I wanted to do." So she's very humble, and very, very dedicated.

Someone asked her—actually it was a journalist who wrote this book, who didn't know a lot about the practice—"Don't you feel you're escaping when you go into retreat like that? Don't you feel you're escaping the real realities of this world and the things that people deal with day by day?"

And her reply was: "Not at all. To my mind, worldly life is an escape. When you have a problem, you can turn on the television, phone a friend, or go out for a coffee. In a cave, however, you have no one to turn to but yourself. When problems arise, you have no choice but to go through with them and come out the other side. In a cave, you face your own nature in the raw, and you have to find a way of dealing with it."

I think this really expresses well our situation here. We face our own being in the raw, and that's where our learning is. The inner life, when the externals drop away, becomes so vivid, becomes so alive, it stands out, really maybe for the first time.

Sometimes dreams get very vivid. People often report that the dream life has become very strong, very rich, seems very meaningful, and there's a strong temptation to pick up the dream and figure out what it means. Someone asked Joseph Goldstein a question about that in a retreat. He said, "I have these really important dreams. Jung said that if you don't analyze a dream, it's like receiving a letter that you don't open." And Joseph's reply was: "When you're in retreat, it's a good idea not to open your mail."

That's actually a good piece of advice. Enjoy the dreams while they're there and leave them there as you wake up.

Sometimes our emotional reactions become really strong. This is the phenomenon that's become known as "yogi mind," when small things in our daily life look like huge things here. When I entered retreat this fall in Massachusetts, we'd had a small board meeting the day before, and there were a lot of issues that we discussed that were going to impact Spirit Rock for a while. I got into retreat and about a week in I started thinking about all these issues and I felt I absolutely had to write a letter to our executive director because they were so important and my input on them was absolutely crucial to the future sustenance of Spirit Rock. Of course it wasn't, and I'm glad I never put pen to paper, but it seemed awfully big at the time.

This situation is really designed to bring forth the difficult mind states that are still lurking in us. What happens is when we simplify and we meditate, we turn our mind to our bare experience, we get one of two outcomes. One possibility is we connect with our bare experience directly. We're with the breath, we're with the body, we're with sounds. And the meditation deepens, the concentration and mindfulness go on a steady path of deepening.

The other alternative is that we get whatever is blocking our ability to be present. Then if there's a block to our ability to be present, that's where the learning comes from. What's beautiful about this process is that it really doesn't matter which way our experience is going. It really doesn't matter so much if we're with the chosen object directly—the breath or body—or if what we're meeting is the impediment or the obstacle to being with that chosen object, because either way is the perfect deepening of our practice.

The process of this unfolding, the process of our deepening, is so organic. It's so natural. It is just like how a rose knows which petal to unfold next so that the whole bud can come from this tightly coiled mass to the full flowering. Our practice is just the same way. In our thinking mind, we really don't have a clue which petal is to open next. Sometimes we might think we came on a retreat to work on one particular issue.

And as the retreat unfolds, it's something entirely different. Sometimes we think we came because we want to recapture a meditation experience that was profound and insightful and transformative from an earlier retreat. And sometimes that experience never presents itself again in our life.

But what you can trust in is that the experience that is presenting itself is the experience that you need to learn from. I think that's really the beauty of the simplicity of awareness or mindfulness—because mindfulness doesn't inject anything different into the situation, but only connects with what's already there. It allows the coming into life, the coming into flowering of what is already there without adding anything new.

So sometimes as we sit, we feel the deepening of mindfulness and concentration. Sometimes as we sit, what we feel is the releasing of accumulations—the inner holdings stored in body and mind from past experience that has never quite had the time or the wisdom to be digested. It's a bit like fasting. When we stop taking in food, then what comes out are the toxins that have been stored in the body. And by coming out, they can be released.

In our practice, the stored accumulations—the tensions of body and mind, the underlying knots—begin to come to the surface. And in that coming to the surface, there's difficulty, there's struggle, there's conflict, there's pain, but there's also the possibility of release, of freedom.

So much of the fruit of our practice is this unburdening process—the letting go of all the holdings from the past that have weighed on us unconsciously and now have the possibility of really being released by that bringing into awareness. Carl Jung said, "The process of enlightenment is not one of throwing circles of light around everywhere. It comes from making the darkness conscious. This latter process, however, is disagreeable and therefore unpopular." But this is what our work is. This is part of what we're engaged in.

So it's very important to trust in the miracle of this unfolding—that what is presenting itself is what we need to learn from. If we start to doubt that, we can really get in trouble because we think that what is presenting itself is because we've landed in this lousy situation where the room's too cold and it's raining all the time and nobody's friendly to me and people don't make eye contact when I go by. If we could just get out of this lousy situation, everything would be great again. But actually, of course, it's the same mind, whether we're here or at home, and the same underlying structure is being shown.

When I started this retreat in the fall, I went through a lot of resistance at different points—to the arduousness, to the weather, to periods of walking when I didn't feel like walking. And I'd go through these periods of real aversion and I'd start to blame it on the walking or the weather or the facility or something else. And I finally connected: Oh, there are times in my life when I really drag my heels too. I feel this resistance in my daily life, in many different situations that I just don't feel like doing at that point. And I came to see, this is just resistance. It's just non-acceptance.

When I could frame it like that, and I knew it wasn't the situation, then I could start to see the flimsiness of the resistance. And I asked myself the question: what would this moment be like if I met it with acceptance instead of resistance? And at times that veil just pulled away. And there was no more resistance to what before had been a solid mass of aversion.

So there are great joys in renunciation as well as the difficulties. The kind of clarity that we can see when we see an old pattern just evaporate before our eyes—there's a huge relief and a joy in that. The sense of stillness and peace that we touch, the heartfulness, the sensitivity to nature and each other.

In terms of the difficulties that get revealed, the Buddha talked about a number of ways of classifying them. One of the key lists is the list of the five hindrances. I know you all have heard about these many times before, and I'd like to talk about them briefly tonight. Another of the lists is what in Pali is called the kilesas—the three kilesas, often translated as defilements, but the real root is torments of mind. There's a lot of overlap between these two lists.

Before talking about the hindrances, I wanted to explain how I see the difference between the two. The way I understand the hindrances is that these are the forces in particular that greet the meditator. These are the forces that when a meditator sits down and makes the intention to be mindful and to pay direct attention to our experience, these are the particular forces that oppose that mindfulness.

So they're a little different from the list of the kilesas or torments of mind, which are much more universal. They are the roots of suffering in all beings, in all times, in all situations, which are considered to be greed, aversion, and delusion.

The hindrances the Buddha talked about were the forces of sense desire, of ill will or aversion, of sleepiness, of restlessness, and doubt. You'll notice that the first two really overlap with the kilesas, very similar to greed and aversion, and point to this central tendency of mind that is always trying to change our experience. It's really the movement toward pleasure and away from pain that keeps the mind moving all the time, that makes it difficult for us to experience peace. This is in a way the pivoting of the mind, always trying to gain pleasure and avoid the unpleasant.

So let's talk a little about the different forces that visit the mind. I'm sure you've seen many times already the wanting mind that comes in practice. It may be a wanting for something externally, missing some things from home that we've left through renunciation. It may be a wanting for something here—an experience of concentration or peace or stillness or a particular meditation experience.

One of the underlying assumptions with wanting is that there's going to be lasting happiness if we get what is wanted.

And this is one of the things that we have to question with every hindrance: the difference between the story of the hindrance and the feeling of the hindrance. If we're taken in by the story of the hindrance, we're taken away from this moment because the hindrance of desire is always pointing to something in the future. If we follow that arrow, we're taken away from our present experience and we're deceived.

This is the trick of the hindrances—we are deceived out of mindfulness. But we can actually take that energy, turn it around, and look directly at the hindrance itself. In that, we're reestablished in mindfulness. So instead of looking at the object that desire is pointing at, we become familiar with the feeling of desire itself—how that toppling forward feels in mind and body, that reaching out. And we question: is it really the lack of the object that leads to the suffering, or is it desire itself that is difficult to experience?

With aversion, the feeling is that the situation is just not good enough. There's something wrong with the situation—the food or the people or the temperature or the hall or the teachings or whatever. That's where the problem is.

The Buddha was meeting with a group of monks and nuns and he said, "Did you see that jackal that just ran out of the underbrush?" The jackal ran out of the underbrush and sat for a moment in the open, then didn't stay long and ran into the hollow of a tree. It sat down in the hollow of a tree for a moment, but it didn't stay long. It got up, ran away, and lay down in the forest. Then it got up from lying down and ran away somewhere else.

He said, "Everywhere it went, it blamed its situation. It wasn't comfortable in the undergrowth. It wasn't comfortable in the open. It wasn't comfortable in the hollow of the tree, and it wasn't comfortable in the forest. It blamed the undergrowth. It blamed the open. It blamed the hollow of the tree, and it blamed the forest." He said the problem was with none of these. The problem was the jackal had mange. Mange was the problem. Mange was the reason the jackal suffered, not the situation.

Aversion is like that. We feel like we're suffering because of the situation, but the actual source of the suffering is our own disliking of it. When we can drop the disliking, the situation can be just fine, can be accepted.

One of the most insidious ways that aversion turns, of course, is toward ourselves, where we feel that we're not worthwhile, or we can't accept ourselves, that we're not complete. The Dalai Lama came to the center in Massachusetts in 1979—at the time he wasn't as famous as he is now. There was a question from the audience about this feeling of not being worthy, not feeling worthwhile. The Dalai Lama just said very directly, "That is not true. You mustn't think that way. You are very, very worthwhile—as much as any being that is created, as much as any product of nature. Trust in that."

I had a friend who was also a monk in Thailand who had been there longer than I had. After I was ordained, my preceptor asked me to stop at his monastery on the way up to this practice wat near Chiang Mai that I was going to practice at. He was a Western monk, so I stopped to visit him in Chiang Mai. We hung out and got to know each other a bit, and he had this really strong metta vibe. Everybody loved this guy. He had been around quite a while, and in the mornings he would stay at his hut. He would practice. He would be quiet. In the afternoon he would receive visitors—both Thai people came to visit him because he spoke fluent Thai, and Westerners came to visit him. He'd give his afternoons to being with people and counseling them on their life or their meditation practice.

We went out for alms round the first morning I was there. He had the biggest alms bowl I had ever seen, and he had a waistline that sort of matched it. He was doing very well, as we say, in the monkhood. I mean, the bowl wasn't quite this big, but it wasn't far off. I was looking forward to going on alms round with him. So we started off, we set off. He went in front because he was the senior monk and I went behind.

And then these two novices were coming with us—younger boys around the monastery—and I was a little puzzled because normally the novices don't go on alms round.

So we set off and we'd just gone a couple of blocks when his bowl was full and my bowl was overflowing. I wasn't accepting any more. We ducked into an alley and he called the novices up. They opened their robes and I saw that each of them was carrying a plastic bag slung over their shoulder. He took all the food that he had collected from his bowl and put it in their plastic bags. They covered their robes back up again, his bowl was empty, and we walked on. We did that a couple more times.

Then we went back to the monastery and he shared his food around, feeding probably a dozen people from his morning alms round. Those same people lined up to give him food every morning because they knew he would walk that way and because they loved him so much. He had this great energy—he was always giving, and the people appreciated it.

In talking with him personally, he told me that he had spent the first nine years in robes working with his self-hatred. I was absolutely amazed because I didn't see a trace of it. What I saw was this wonderful, spacious quality of affection and kindness and compassion. Through his practice—primarily through his meditation practice—he had completely transformed that trait in himself.

The third hindrance of sleepiness I think we've talked about quite a bit already. Just one other suggestion: be really clear in your noting of sleepiness or dullness, and see if the noting itself serves to sharpen the attention and give a little break in the dullness. Also take a look and see if you're averse to the sleepiness, because sometimes the aversion can actually increase the dullness. See if you can open to it with real acceptance.

With restless attention, give it a very big space. Make the mind very wide, very soft. Sometimes when we get restless, we think, "Oh, I need to get concentrated again," so we try to shrink the focus down and make a narrow focus on the breath so we can get concentrated. But that tends to bottle the energy up and can make it more restless, more explosive. So let the mind be very wide, very soft. It can be helpful with restlessness to focus on some point low in the body—maybe the contact of the seat with the cushion, just that touch point. Very simple, very clear touch point to ground the attention.

Doubt is said to be the most insidious of the hindrances because when we believe in it, it cripples our practice. We stop paying attention, we stop deepening. As William Blake said, "If the sun would doubt, it would immediately go out." And that's what happens with our practice when we doubt.

So with doubt, it's important to reflect on your intention—which we've been discussing in the early days of the retreat—reflect on your motivation, reflect on earlier retreats and the benefits that you found in the practice. Then it's also helpful to look at what came before the doubt. Doubt usually doesn't come after you've just had that really crystal clear, still sitting where you felt absolutely peaceful for forty-five minutes. Somehow that's not usually when doubt arises. So see if, before the doubt came, there was a difficult experience.

This really came clear to me when I was doing a self-retreat a few years ago. I was staying in a small cabin in upstate New York, and I had chosen to go there for a two-month self-retreat in October and November. I was quite alone. Every few days a friend would come and bring me food that I'd requested, but otherwise I didn't see people at all.

I was a California guy at the time, and I thought, "October will be nice weather, and usually the first snows come about Thanksgiving, so I should be able to make it through October and November." I just went with my tennis shoes and my Birkenstocks—bad decision, because the first snow started coming in early November. There I was with my tennis shoes trying to do walking meditation, my feet getting very cold and very wet, and I was getting frustrated. So I took to tying plastic produce bags around my feet and then going out to do walking meditation in the snow. That was okay until the produce bag wore out and then I'd get cold feet again.

Then there was about a two-week period where I didn't see the sun. It was snowing and raining and gray and cold, and I felt very oppressed by the weather—feeling gloomy and disillusioned. The solitude was difficult for me and I just went into this funk. I thought, "I need to go back to California. I'm sure it's much more pleasant there now." Actually, it was about this time of year. I was starting to think about how I could go home.

Then I suddenly connected: "Oh, this is doubt." It took me about a day, but I realized, "Oh, this is doubt." And then it took me a little bit longer, but I realized: "Oh, just before I started doubting, I was feeling some kind of despair." All the things together had combined to bring up this despair in me that I wasn't comfortable with, that I hadn't felt before and just didn't like. That was really what was at the root of the doubt.

When I could see that, I was back in the despair. But that was a lot better than being in the doubt.

Because at least there was clarity. So with all these difficult energies, clarity is worth a lot.

With all these difficult energies of the hindrances that will inevitably arise as part of the situation, as part of the deepening of our practice, what we really need to think of is not that we want them to go away, but to discover that we have the potential to make friends with them. So not relating with them with a sense of aversion or wanting them to disappear, but opening to these experiences directly with a sense of real acceptance.

It may not happen the first time that we see a particular desire or a form of aversion, but it calls out a deeper strength from us than we maybe knew we had—that we can actually accept them and understand them. Because really, they're just forms of energy until we invest. They're quite impersonal. It's not my anger or your anger. It's just anger. So can we open and see them with a friendly kind of attention? And mindfulness has this quality of friendliness in it.

If we can do this, this is really a miracle of practice. Because what happens is, in a moment of difficulty—whether it's a moment of aversion or desire or fear—in that moment, if we can be aware and open, we're transforming that whole moment from a moment of difficulty, a moment of suffering, and a moment of the unwholesome, really into a moment of the awakened mind. We're giving birth right in the middle of the suffering. We're giving birth to the qualities of clarity, of friendliness, of compassion, of acceptance. And that's like magic.

There's no technique that can do this. But it's something that we learn from doing it again and again and again in our practice. And every time we're able to do it, it comes more easily the next time. This is really the alchemy of our practice. This is the transformation of our suffering directly, moment by moment, into the awakened mind.

One of my Tibetan teachers, a young Lama named Sukhne Rinpoche, said that the sacred point of our practice is the liberation of confusion. The sacred point of our practice is the liberation of confusion.

I'd just like to close with a quotation from another Tibetan. This is a teacher from the 12th century named Gampopa, who was a disciple of Milarepa. And he had a little poem that he called The Four Blessings, that are referred to as The Four Blessings of Gampopa. This is put in the form of a prayer or a supplication, and it doesn't matter so much whom the prayer is directed toward. It can be directed toward the teacher, could be directed to the Buddha, could be directed to the Dharma or to life itself.

These are the four blessings of Gampopa:

Grant your blessings so that my mind follows the Dharma.
Grant your blessings so that my Dharma practice becomes the path.
Grant your blessings so that the path clarifies confusion.
Grant your blessings so that confusion dawns as wisdom.

Let's sit for just a minute.

CHAPTER 211

The Five Aggregates - Part I

Guy Armstrong · 58 min

In this foundational dharma talk, Guy Armstrong introduces the five aggregates (pañca-khandha) as the Buddha's analytical framework for understanding human experience and the root of suffering. Drawing from the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta's teaching on the Four Noble Truths, Armstrong explores how ignorance—not seeing things as they truly are—underlies all suffering. He examines the first aggregate of rūpa (material form) in depth, using the metaphor of a magic show from the suttas to illustrate how we mistake appearances for solid reality. Through scientific analysis of perception and references to the Heart Sutra's teaching that "all five aggregates are empty," Armstrong demonstrates how recognizing the insubstantial, dreamlike nature of experience can lead to liberation. He introduces the mental aggregates of vedanā (feeling tone), saññā (perception), saṅkhāra (formations), and viññāṇa (consciousness), showing how they operate in every moment of experience. The talk emphasizes practical investigation of the three characteristics—anicca (impermanence), dukkha (unsatisfactoriness), and anattā (not-self)—within one's direct experience of the aggregates, offering a path toward the "ultimate ease" described by the Thai forest master Ajahn Mun.

Last night Gil talked about the Four Noble Truths and the Second Noble Truth, which points to the Buddhist teaching that the cause of our suffering—our optional suffering in this life—is craving or thirst or tanha, this incessant movement of mind that seeks new pleasure now here and now there, never being satisfied.

You could say that the Buddha delivered the discourse on the Four Noble Truths as his very first discourse, and the rest of his 45 years of teaching were really just a footnote to that teaching. Everything is contained within the Four Noble Truths, and everything that followed is a subplot of the Four Noble Truths.

But in other teachings, the Buddha drew an even more fundamental analysis of the cause of suffering and investigated why even craving was present in the mind. In tracing it back, he said that the root cause, the very most fundamental cause that anyone could discover or point to for our suffering, actually is ignorance.

Ignorance in the sense that the Buddha used the word doesn't mean a lack of facts or that we haven't been told enough. It means that we don't see properly. It means that we don't see things the way they are. And because of not seeing things the way they are, we suffer. We suffer because we live in illusion, because we misunderstand the world. As long as we misunderstand the world and ourselves, we're actually bound to suffering. This is what bondage means. We are bound as long as we are in ignorance.

The Buddha put this truth of ignorance very strongly. He was talking about ordinary beings and undeveloped practitioners like ourselves, and he said, "In whatever way they conceive, the fact is ever other than that." It's a pretty strong statement. Why do we bother? Might as well stop conceiving, and it'll all be a lot simpler.

One of my earlier teachers, Christopher Titmus, who's quite given to provocative statements, put it this way. He said to a group in a dharma talk one time, "Everything you think is wrong. Everything you think is wrong." Often as people get into the deeper meaning of dharma and the deeper truths within dharma, they talk about feeling turned inside out, and that all their ideas and views get turned upside down and stood on their head.

Everything we think is wrong. This is really hard to keep in mind. It's sort of hard to keep functioning in the world and keep this truth in mind because it really undercuts our self-confidence. It undercuts our belief in our views, and sometimes we feel that we need our views to operate in life. Gil actually talked last night that clinging to views is one of the primary sources of suffering. So it's really in clinging to the way that we see things wrongly that we set ourselves even further adrift.

I wonder if we can remember that we're actually at this moment, all of us, living in some degree of illusion, some degree of misperception, and to the extent that we live in misperception, not seeing truly. That's a very hard thing to remember. If we are willing just to keep that possibility in mind, it lends a real humility to our approach to life. We're willing to open to the possibility that we're not always right, unbelievable as that may sound.

The Buddha talked about different ways that this fundamental misunderstanding can be talked about. He said that it can be talked about as not seeing the Four Noble Truths. This is often the basic definition of wisdom or clear seeing—that one sees the Four Noble Truths and that is enough.

Another way the Buddha sometimes talked about this misperception was in terms of what are called the Three Characteristics—three aspects of everything that comes into existence, shared by all things that come into existence. They are the characteristics of impermanence, of unsatisfactoriness, and of selflessness. He often said that we suffer because we don't see the truth of these three, and instead we believe that things last, that from the objects of this world we can find a lasting happiness, which we try over and over to do with them, and that we believe that there's a self somewhere in this whole fabric of existence that then has to occupy itself with bringing in pleasure and keeping away pain. Because we perceive these three wrongly, we get caught in grasping. And because we get caught in grasping, we suffer.

There's one other way of formulating the misunderstanding that you find a few places in the teachings of the Buddha, and that is in the concept of emptiness. He pointed in a number of passages in the Pali text to the truth of the insubstantiality of everything that exists in this life. This insubstantiality is a way of saying that things are empty, that they're more empty than we imagine them to be. So another way we could understand this wrong take on life is that we see things as being solid and substantial when actually they're not.

I'd like to talk a little bit about how the Buddha actually saw the world, how he understood himself, and by extension, how we can understand ourselves, and out of that how we can see the world in a truer way. I'd like to approach it through one of the categories that the Buddha used again and again to teach what are called the five aggregates.

These are five component parts, you might say, of a human being. When we look at a human being, we see a person, and that seems self-evident. But when the Buddha looked at himself or another being, I believe, he saw the five aggregates, not a human being. That is a different take on life. It feels different to see in that way. And when one sees in that way, the truths of impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, selflessness, and emptiness become very clear.

So I'd like to talk about these truths tonight in relation to the five aggregates. But I have to put a couple of disclaimers up front. One is that I feel a little shy to talk about emptiness because it's quite a profound topic. And I feel very naive on this particular subject because it is profound.

There was a young Tibetan Lama who was here at Spirit Rock this summer and led a retreat in Santa Rosa. His name is Mingyur Rinpoche. I don't know if any of you had the chance to meet him. He's twenty-three years old. And at the age of twenty-three, he has already done two three-year retreats in India where he lives in a monastery. He's a monk. And he's now been the retreat master—that is the head teacher—for another three-year retreat. And he's done all this by the age of twenty-three. So he started when he was about thirteen or fourteen.

When you meet him, when I met him, I felt that I was meeting somebody who had the wisdom of a sixty-year-old seasoned teacher. And yet it's in this very young body. He's really quite an extraordinary being. He's so light that you almost feel you could pass your hand through him. He feels transparent in that way. And yet he conveys the deepest teachings and manifests them through his personality.

So I took a walk—actually Sally and I took a walk with Rinpoche and his translator because he doesn't speak English. It was his first visit to the West. And we asked him what he thought of the West. Truth be told, he actually didn't want to come here. He would much rather have stayed in his monastery in India and practiced or taught. But he was coerced by his older brother to come. And so he came.

We asked him what he thought of the West. And he said, "Well, it's very clean. And it's very square." And that was all he would say about it. I guess he didn't want to offend us.

So I tried to get a little more philosophical with him. And I asked him about some different schools in Tibetan teachings. There's a school who follows the teachings of Nagarjuna, who was a great philosopher in the second century AD, called the Madhyamakas. And there's another school that follows the teachings of the Nyingma lineage called the Dzogchen school.

So I said, "Rinpoche, what's the difference between the Madhyamaka view of things, of life, and the Dzogchen view of things?" And his eyes lit up, because that's the kind of stuff he loves to talk about. And so he went on about a ten-minute discourse about the difference. But he prefaced it by saying, "The first thing you have to understand is there are eighteen different kinds of emptiness—eighteen different kinds of emptiness. And they're all spelled out in the texts of his lineage."

I haven't a clue what the eighteen are, although I have read a list at one point. So I'm just going to talk about a little piece tonight of emptiness, maybe half a kind of emptiness tonight, no more. Really just in relation to the five aggregates, the five what are called in Pali khandas. And the Sanskrit term is skandhas.

This term skandhas has somewhat come into Buddhist vocabulary and is the term that most people use if they want to use a foreign term for this. And the term khandha is not in very wide use, the Pali term. So I might use one or the other.

But the original term skandha actually just meant heap or bundle. And when we translate it as aggregate, it sounds very technical. "The five aggregates." Wow, that sounds really scientific. That must be something really arcane that's being pointed to here. I've got to put on my thinking cap to get this one, the five aggregates. It's like some composite of mineral that they're going to use to pave the driveway.

But when you think that the original term meant heap or bundle, it makes it more understandable. And actually the translation I like best for aggregate is "kinds of stuff."

So I take it that our experience in the way of rupa, or form, includes everything that we see, the whole physical world. I also take it to mean that it includes the way that matter interacts. So when one hand hits another, the sound that comes is also an aspect of form. When something tasty touches the tongue, the taste that arises is also a manifestation of the material world. When we touch something in the world, the sensation of touch that comes is part of the material world. When we smell a delightful meal from the kitchen, that smell is part of the material world. So I take it as the visual world and all the senses, the world of the five physical senses, basically.

The Buddha said that we don't see this realm very clearly. We don't understand it quite rightly. One of the things we often hear about the world is that it's kind of magical, that there's an awesome property to the physical world. There's a great mystery and there's a sense of magic with it.

So I thought I would start with a little magic trick. I never learned very many magic tricks, but I learned one. In the way of discoursing on magic, I would start with a little magic trick.

We have this deck of cards. As you can see, it's just an ordinary deck of playing cards. I'm going to ask my friend and Dharma brother, James, to pick a card out of the deck and not show it to me, but to hold it up and show it to the rest of you.

"Pick a card, any card. You can show it now to the group. Careful I don't see the reflection in the window."

"Now that everybody's seen it, you can slip it back in the deck. Thank you."

I'll shuffle a few times. I don't have a clue what card it was. But we'll do it one more time. Maybe I'll get it this time.

"Pick another card, James. Any card."

So please show them.

I found my calling! Now, will you put it back in the deck? We'll shuffle the deck—a good shuffle. Let me see. Is that your card? Is that it?

It's magic, isn't it? Wow. I'm impressed.

You know, these magic tricks are really amazing. The first time I saw this, I wondered, how did he do that? Until you hear the explanation. And actually, I'll share the explanation with you.

It's a marked deck of cards—a trick deck. The cards are actually tapered. They're not exactly rectangular, but longer at one end than the other. So when the card gets pulled out and then gets turned around and stuck back in, there's only one card whose edge sticks out at one end. The reason it didn't work the first time is because James turned the card around and I turned the deck around. I didn't train my subject properly—that was my mistake. The second time, he turned the card around, but I knew not to turn the deck around. So when you run your hands across the deck, you simply pull out the card whose edge stands out.

Now that you know how it works, there's no more magic in it. It won't be a fun trick again. But when we don't know the secret, it looks pretty cool—pretty mysterious.

I actually saw something on television the other day that was like this. I don't know if you ever see pro wrestling when you're flipping through channels. Ever since that guy got elected governor of Minnesota, the stock of pro wrestling has gone way up in the world. It's actually an avenue into politics now, which isn't too surprising. Some of the politicians seem like they were dropped on their heads a few times.

What I saw while channel surfing was a demonstration of how they do the pile driver. One wrestler grabs another wrestler's head between his thighs and then appears to drive his head into the mat. It looks like the second wrestler's head is going to break or his neck is going to snap because he's being driven down head-first. They explained how it actually works: the wrestler braces his shoulders against the other wrestler's knees, and his shoulders absorb the whole blow. He doesn't actually land on his head. That's how they survive those moves. So the next time you're watching pro wrestling, now you'll know the secret.

The Buddha compared this life not to pro wrestling, but to a magic show. I want to read this passage from the suttas:

"Suppose that a magician or a magician's apprentice should hold a magic show at the four crossroads, and a keen-sighted person should see it, ponder over it, and reflect on it with wise attention. As he or she sees it, ponders over it, and reflects on it with wise attention, he would find it empty, he would find it hollow, he would find it void of essence. What essence, monks, could there be in a magic show?

"Even so, monks, whatever form, whatever feeling"—he goes through the rest of the five aggregates—"whatever of the five aggregates there are, a monk sees it, ponders over it, and reflects on it with wise attention. And as he ponders and reflects, he finds it empty. He finds it hollow. He finds it void of essence. What essence could there be in form and the other aggregates?"

The Buddha is comparing our experience of life to a magic show. When we can actually get behind the stage and see how the magic show is being put together, we see through it. We see how the display is created and we're no longer deceived by it. Not being deceived, it doesn't cast the kind of spell over us that it used to. It doesn't enchant us, as Gil mentioned the other day.

This seeing of the empty or unsubstantial nature of life is said to be a way to freedom. One of the most popular texts in all of Buddhism is the Heart Sutra. Near the beginning, it makes the statement: "The Bodhisattva Avalokiteshvara perceived that all five aggregates are empty and was saved from all suffering and distress."

So this seeing into the nature of the five aggregates is not a trivial thing. In this very key text in Buddhism, the statement is that the perception of the emptiness of the five aggregates relieves us of all suffering and distress. I think there was a question the other night about why emptiness is considered important, and this is why. It has the potential for liberation, for truly freeing us.

I got into reading quite a bit about emptiness last fall. Actually, I was reading this central text by Nagarjuna called The Fundamental Treatise on the Middle Way. It's in a new translation by Jay Garfield, and it's the most readable version I've found of this work. It's very good. I started to have dreams about emptiness during this period because the words were not just remaining as intellectual concepts, but they were really starting to penetrate my experience of the moment.

In one dream that came shortly before I woke up in the morning, I was standing in front of a full-length mirror, fully clothed in a normal outfit. The question that came into my mind as I stood before the mirror was: why is emptiness important? The answer actually came from the image in the mirror, and the answer was: because it means you don't exist.

It means you don't exist. The "I" that we take as separate and independent and not connected to the rest of being—that's the part that when we see emptiness, we see through its fiction. This separate sense of I gets dissolved. And because it gets dissolved, the self-concern that goes with it—the burden of supporting and feeding and caring for and providing pleasure for and avoiding pain for that separate self—gets dissolved also. This is the liberating potential of emptiness.

This statement that the Buddha made about the magician's show went on to include all five aggregates, which are form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. We'll explain the others later. And he added a poem that reads like this:

"Form is like a mass of foam and feeling but an airy bubble. Perception is like a mirage and formations a plantain tree. Consciousness is a magic show, a juggler's trick altogether. All these similes were made known by the kinsmen of the sun"—one of the names for the Buddha.

Form is like a mass of foam. Can you imagine that? A mass of foam floating down a river that's been stirred up by sediment or some pollution. You just see these bubbles drifting on the river's surface, and every once in a while a bubble pops and is no longer there. This entire physical world, the Buddha likens to a mass of foam. That's an incredible statement.

I think we are so conditioned by and large by the scientific worldview that it's hard for us to feel that in our bones. And I think there's a fundamental error in the scientific worldview that deceives us and has cast a spell over us in this century. There was a question this morning about whether Buddhism is a religion. In many ways, I feel that the religion of our culture in the twentieth century is science, because science has defined for most people alive today in America what's true and what's false. Science provides for most of us our most fundamental worldview.

And science has a fundamental error in its take on the world. I think that most of the time, conditioned by this worldview, we take the physical world as being the ultimate truth of things. We take this world as solid and what really exists—this is the most fundamentally true thing that exists. And of course, the scientific worldview is that our life and consciousness is just a kind of random byproduct of chemical interactions among molecules that have existed for a long time in this physical reality. So in the scientific worldview, consciousness is an accident and a byproduct of matter.

This communicates to us that—and I think most of us live our lives this way, and I live most of my life really believing that this physical world is what's most true and that we are born into this physical world, we are trapped in this physical world until the time that we die, and then we leave this physical world. This is the scientific worldview, but I think it ignores a really fundamental truth.

And that is the truth that this physical world only appears to us conjoined with human consciousness.

There is never a moment when we recognize the physical world without it being held within our human consciousness. So rather than viewing the physical world as giving birth to human consciousness, the Buddha turned this around completely. He taught that the physical world is perceived only through human consciousness, and perhaps human consciousness is more fundamental. Maybe mind actually came first.

We're not going to definitively answer that question—the Buddha didn't really answer it either. But maybe that's closer to the truth. This understanding casts an entirely different light on our experience. I would maintain that the Buddha's description of the world as consciousness conjoined with impressions of the physical world is more truthful, more accurate, and more fundamental than the materialist view. Most importantly, it offers the possibility of liberation, which the scientific worldview doesn't.

Through this kind of examination, we can begin to shift some of our fundamental assumptions about the world and how we perceive it. Sylvia talked early in this retreat about opening up to new ways of perceiving, opening up to a new way of understanding the world. This is one of those understandings that can shift.

So how can we come to see that this physical world is like a mass of foam? We come to stillness in our meditation and begin to see the impermanent nature of things. We notice that sounds are just flickering on and off. Tastes become fleeting. Smells arise and pass away similarly.

Then there are two physical senses that remain somewhat opaque to us in the beginning: the sense of the body and the sense of sight. But as our meditation deepens, as stillness and concentration develop, something remarkable happens. When we actually experience the body directly and inwardly—when our awareness becomes completely intimate with the body—we discover there's nothing solid there. The whole body, as felt from within through direct contact with awareness, reveals itself as pure flux, pure change. Its nature is pulsation, vibration, tingling, itching, pressure, lightness—all in constant movement.

From the very inside, we know experientially that there's really nothing solid here. We may refer back to our anatomy books from seventh-grade health class and believe that the body is full of bones, muscles, sinews, and tissues that appear solid. But when we actually turn to our direct experience of the bare physical nature, we see there's nothing solid there at all. It's simply pulsing on and off, moment after moment, with our awareness. Through this, we begin to see that the sense of touch reveals insubstantiality.

This leaves us with the sense of sight, which in some ways remains the most opaque. We look at the world and it appears completely solid. Change is hard to perceive. These walls have been here since we walked in, seemingly unchanged. So how can we see through the apparent substantiality of sight?

I'd suggest we return to our old friend science and deconstruct how vision actually takes place based on what we know scientifically. There's a source of light—currently the lamps in this room, or in daytime, the sun. Photons are scattering all over the objects in the room, being partially absorbed and partially reflected. The reflected light from all the different objects comes to our eye and lands on the retina. These photons carry energy that triggers cells in the retina, starting electrical impulses traveling through the optic nerve up to the brain, where they register.

Then comes the completely mysterious step that science has no explanation for: how that physical impulse gets translated into the actual experience of sight, into the consciousness of seeing. It's entirely mysterious. I don't know how that gap is bridged either, but we know that somehow it happens.

What we do know is that everything we see comes about only because millions of photons every second are impinging on the retina. Therefore, the image that we perceive is not a solid image at all—it's being formed microsecond after microsecond from these impulses to the brain. When we truly reflect on this, we recognize that the image we see "out there" is not a solid thing. The image I have of you is not solid—it's flickering on and off, microsecond after microsecond.

What does this understanding do to the seeming solidity of sight? It reveals sight as a magic show. These visual appearances arise as a magical display, as the texts sometimes describe it.

So we can feel the insubstantiality in sight, but we can take it a little farther. One of the things I like to ask is a question like, where is red? This sweater is red. In your experience, where is red? Does red really abide in this sweater? Is it in the nature of the sweater? Or is it only in your consciousness?

In actual fact, if you know from your seventh grade science about how light reflection works, red light reflects off the sweater into your eye because this sweater has absorbed all the colors of the spectrum except for red. So the actual color of this thing is not red. That's how red is arising in your consciousness right now. So where is red? It's not in this, is it? It's only a display in consciousness. Only a display.

There's another way we can see some more insubstantiality in this situation. Sometimes it's described by people who know the teachings of the Buddha that our awareness is unbounded—virtually infinite, and extends as far as the farthest star. That this room, this land, the earth, and all the galaxies are actually included within our consciousness. And we have the idea that the awareness expands outwardly, physically, to reach the farthest star.

So let's think about that for a minute. We can go out under the night sky tonight, and it's not totally cloudy. We can look up and we can see stars. But let's think for a minute about how that seeing happens. Those photons also have been traveling a long way. The nearest star is five light years away. At light traveling 186,000 miles a second, that's a long way away. It takes five years to get here. So that light has been traveling for five years, and that impacts our retina. And here and now, that gives rise to the image of a star.

But that sight of star isn't five light years away. That light landed here, and that image is being generated now. That seeing of star is here and now. And you can bring it closer still. Everyone in this room is the same way. My image of Sandra is not actually over there. My image of Sandra is also here. Everything we see is actually here and now.

In the scientific or materialist worldview, we assume that awareness resides within space. But in the actual truth of things, as we see from the perspective of our human experience, space is only an aspect or something that we construct through consciousness, through awareness. So awareness doesn't reside within space. Space is an outcome of awareness. So again, I might say that awareness seems to be more fundamental than physical space.

So it's not that awareness is embedded in the physical world. Rather, the physical world is an appearance within awareness. So everything that we see is only an appearance. We assume that it's solid. We assume that it's substantial. But actually, there's no evidence for that belief. There is no evidence for that assumption.

So in our relationship to this world, if we want to learn from the point of view of emptiness, we can shift our vocabulary a little bit and not talk about the world as being made up of objects, but as containing appearances. So you might just play with that change in vocabulary as you relate to sights over the next few days—not taking the sight to indicate an object, but taking it to indicate an appearance.

That leads into the sense of magical display. That leads into the sense of the magic show that the Buddha talked about. It bears very strong resemblance to a dream. Just in this moment, in your experience of this moment, is there any real difference between your experience right now and your experience in a dream?

We can say dreams don't have the kind of continuity that daily life does. Dreams don't have the kind of karmic repercussions that daily life does. Thank goodness.

But in our just-felt experience of it, is there any difference?

So that's why the Chinese philosopher Chuang Tzu could write, "I just woke from a dream in which I was a butterfly. Or am I a butterfly now dreaming to be a man?" These two worlds are not really so different.

One of my Tibetan teachers—actually Mingyur Rinpoche's brother—is a thirty-three-year-old lama named Sokny Rinpoche, also very wise, very young, very playful. And he said something rather devastating at one of the early retreats that I was on with him. He said, "In fact, everything that appears has no real existence whatsoever. Everything that appears has no real existence whatsoever." Real in the sense of its being solid or substantial. The way we take the physical world to be, it's only an appearance.

We were talking about this in a group of senior students at Spirit Rock a couple of weeks ago. And one of the meditators had been working with this vocabulary shift—objects versus appearances—for about a week and reported in the next class how her experimentation had gone. And what she said about it was, "It's spooky. It's spooky, but I found it fascinating. I would look at everything, like this Japanese lamp that I love, and I'd see that it's only an appearance. Where that took me is that we're all just appearances."

When you go from an object to say that that's an appearance, then to a person and say that this is just an appearance, it can really make your hair stand on end. But I believe it. It's true. And it makes you both more compassionate and more vulnerable. When I look at my friend Mary, I see that she's changing all the time. When you start thinking like this, you have to be more compassionate because we're all in the same boat and we're all so fragile.

So this intuiting of the emptiness is not just a philosophical or intellectual speculation, but when it starts to penetrate our bones, when we start to get the feeling of what it means, it does evoke this sense of compassion. It's not a cold or philosophical inquiry, but it's an inquiry that really transforms the heart.

So let me talk just briefly about the mental components of the aggregates. There are four mental components in addition to the physical component.

The first of them is called feeling. But it doesn't mean emotion the way we usually think of feeling. The better translation probably is feeling tone. The Pali word is vedanā. And it refers to the tone of feeling that every experience has of being pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral.

This feeling tone is a root issue in Dharma practice because it's on the basis of the pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral experience that we act out our tendencies to greed, aversion, or delusion. We tend to be greedy or to hold on to those things that have a pleasant feeling tone. We tend to push away or withdraw from those things that have an unpleasant feeling tone. And the things that have a neutral feeling tone, we tend to ignore. We tend to go blank. We tend to space out on.

These influences of greed, aversion, and delusion are what keep the mind in turmoil and what keep us from finding peace. They're all based on feeling tone. So it's the element in our experience that drives our craziness, you might say, that drives our turmoil, that drives our disturbance.

The fact is we can't stop life from showing its changing face of being pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. Most of the time, we think that our happiness is bound with that change. When our experience is pleasant, we're happy. When it's unpleasant, we're unhappy. And when it's neutral, we're kind of blah. We tend to be bored.

If we live our lives that way, we're always bound to an alternation of happiness and sorrow, sorrowing when the happiness goes, when the unpleasant comes. So it's very important to find a freedom that is not bound to the feeling tone. And that's the freedom that mindfulness offers, an awareness that can be with the pleasant and the unpleasant and not be moved by them, not be tied to them.

The second element in the mental factors is called perception. In Pali, the word is saññā. And here, perception means the factor of recognition or memory, that when I look out into the room tonight, I'm able to see men and women and chairs and pillows and walls and lamps and shawls. Perception is the element that operates from memory and organizes our visual sphere into things that we know and are comfortable with and familiar with.

We might think that this is just a spontaneous part of existence, but it's not. Oliver Sacks was reporting on a patient that he saw who had had his sight restored at age forty-five.

He had sight as a very small child and then had become blind, and at age 45 had an operation to restore it. That's miraculous. So everybody was waiting around the patient's bed. The man's name was Virgil. They took the bandages off, and the surgeon was there, his family was there, and Sacks was there. Everybody expected him to cry out, "I can see, I can see," because the operation was a success.

But here's Sacks' report of what happened. Virgil seemed to be staring blankly, bewildered, without focusing at the surgeon, who stood before him still holding the bandages. Only when the surgeon spoke, saying "Well?" did a look of recognition cross Virgil's face. Virgil told me later that in this first moment he had no idea what he was seeing. There was light, there was movement, there was color, all mixed up, meaningless, a blur. Then out of the blur came a voice that said, "Well?" Then and only then, he said, did he finally realize that this chaos of light and shadow was a face—and indeed the face of his surgeon.

We take perception for granted, and it's a necessary tool for living, but it's not intrinsic. It's something that we learn.

The fourth of the mental components is called formations. The Pali term is sankharas, and it means the formations of mind—primarily thoughts, emotions, and images. But it also refers to those as they affect actions of speech and body. Sometimes it's called karmic formations. These are going on all the time within us. We feel them clearly in our meditation. They make up a substantial part of our experience. They're called formations because they're not intrinsic. They're rather thrown up in a kind of fabricated way, moment after moment, by the mind. It's part of this projective quality of mind, this producing that goes on in the mind moment after moment.

The fifth and final factor of the aggregates is consciousness. Consciousness in the sense the Buddha used it in the five aggregates is used in a very particular way, and it means the knowing quality within every moment of experience. So for example, when you hear a sound, there are actually two components to that hearing. One is the sound itself, just that tone that's emitted by the bell. We could characterize it as an A or a C or a D or whatever. That tone has its nature. But there's also an element in you that's knowing that experience—not in a conceptual way, a totally pre-verbal way—but there's a quality of its registering in your mind. There's a knowing quality where your mind is meeting the sound.

Now these two actually come up together. The sound and the knowing of the sound arise simultaneously. It's a little hard to tease them apart in our experience, but there are actually two separate things going on in that moment of hearing. The way that you know there's a mental thing happening is because if I asked you ten minutes from now what was that sound like, you'd have a memory of it. The memory is only there because the mind knew it and stored it.

So these are the five aggregates: form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. They're all present in every moment of experience. For instance, again in striking the bell, hearing the sound is the form aggregate. That sound will have a quality for you that you either like or don't like, or it's neutral. That's the feeling tone. Actually, that bell has quite a pretty sound. So for most of us, the feeling tone of that is a pleasant one.

There's the element of perception because you recognize, "Oh, that's the bell that ends the sitting." That's the recognition. It's very helpful when you've been sitting an hour and you hear that sound and you know that's the bell that ends the sitting, because then you can use that knowledge to get up and walk. And finally, there are the thoughts around the bell: Didn't the bell get rung a little bit early? When's it going to ring next? When's it going to ring for the end of this talk?

Is the sitting over now? And so forth. All these thoughts that come are the formations. There might be a resentment: "Oh, I think that bell should have rung ten minutes ago. The person up front has lost track of the time."

And finally, through all these experiences, there's consciousness. There's the mind that is registering all the different events—the sound, the feeling of the sound, the perception or recognition, and all the thoughts that are arising. Consciousness is what's revealing each of the other four aggregates. In every moment of our experience, all five aggregates are present.

So the Buddha asked about these aggregates: Is form permanent or impermanent? The physical world—permanent or impermanent? It's impermanent, isn't it? Sooner or later it will all pass. Then he said: Is what is impermanent possibly a source of lasting happiness? Is it possible that the impermanent can give us lasting happiness? No, it can't.

So then he said: Is what is impermanent and ultimately unsatisfactory fit to be regarded as "I" or "mine"? He said no, it's not. Only something that would give lasting happiness is what we should regard as "I" or "mine."

In his teaching, he most often stressed how the aggregates reveal the three characteristics of impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and selflessness.

This is the way I would encourage you to work with the aggregates in your practice: to look within your experience closely with the steady eye of samadhi, with the steady eye of your meditation, and ask yourself: Is this impermanent? Is there anything within the aggregates that is lasting? And if there is not, is there anything here that can give me lasting happiness? And if there is not, is there any ground for believing in an ongoing and independent self? Is there any steady, stable "I" to be found within this field of human experience that we call the aggregates?

That is to be investigated and discovered. Is there a self?

I'll close with this quotation from Ajahn Mun. Ajahn Mun was one of the greatest monks of this century in Thailand. He was the teacher of Ajahn Chah and of Ajahn Mahabua, and a number of other great Thai masters. He was a wandering monk, a forest monk. He wandered in the forests of northern Thailand into Laos, into Burma for thirty years or more, teaching when he would be near a village, very dedicated to practice. This was taken from a poem that he wrote after his liberation, called "The Ballad of Liberation from the Five Skandhas":

"So in brief, there's suffering and there's the Dharma. Dharma here is the truth of freedom, the truth of our intrinsic freedom. Always with the mind. Contemplate this until you see the truth and the mind will be completely cool. However great the pleasure and pain, they'll cause you no fear. No longer drunk with the cause of suffering, the mind's well released. Knowing just this much is enough to soothe your fevers. The heart, knowing the Dharma of ultimate ease, sees for sure that the skandhas are unsatisfactory. The Dharma stays as the Dharma. The skandhas stay as the skandhas. That's all."

Let's sit for a minute.

CHAPTER 212

The Five Aggregates - Part 2

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong continues his exploration of the five khandhas (aggregates), focusing on their relationship to the three characteristics of existence and the conventional nature of selfhood. Drawing on the story of the bhikkhuni Vajirā's encounter with Māra and the classical chariot analogy from the Questions of King Milinda, Armstrong examines how what we call a 'human being' is merely a conventional designation for the coming together of the five aggregates.
>
> The talk explores each aggregate in detail: how we identify with form (rūpa) as 'mine' or 'I am the body,' leading to fear of death; how perception (saññā) colors our fundamental experience of reality; how mental formations (saṅkhāras) provide familiar patterns we mistake for selfhood; and how consciousness (viññāṇa) appears both conditioned and unconditioned. Armstrong demonstrates how the sense of 'I' arises moment by moment through identification with these aggregates, citing the Buddha's teaching of twenty ways belief in self comes to be.
> Through practical examples and personal anecdotes, including experiences from his time as a monk in Thailand, Armstrong shows how seeing through the conventional self leads to profound freedom and compassion. He concludes by pointing toward the unconditioned awareness that accommodates all arising and passing phenomena—our deepest Buddha nature that is 'deathless' and beyond the three characteristics.

A few nights ago, I talked about the five aggregates, particularly in relation to the emptiness of the material world, or what's called form. I spoke about how the Buddha said that form was like a mass of foam, empty and insubstantial. This refers to the whole physical world that we inhabit. Our use of language can reflect this understanding if we talk about appearances rather than objects—we get in touch with that insubstantiality.

Tonight I wanted to talk a little more about the five aggregates, particularly in relation to what Sylvia spoke about last night: the three characteristics. These are the qualities of everything that arises—being impermanent, being unsatisfactory or incapable of giving lasting happiness, and being without a self.

The fundamental question in practice, the fundamental thing we're trying to solve or see into, is the question of what am I? Who am I? What is a human being? What is this thing that we experience that we call life? This question has obviously preoccupied people from the time of the Buddha and before.

There are these lovely stories—Gil read one about the nuns who were practicing and the accounts of their deliverance, the accounts of their struggles. I wanted to read one other nun story tonight.

If you remember from the one he read in a talk early in the retreat, the nun was visited by Mara. In Buddhist mythology, Mara personifies the difficult forces of the mind—the hindrances. But actually, the way you hear Mara described in the old texts, it seems that people truly regarded Mara as a being—a being on some other level that would come and visit people. You can understand this being of Mara in two ways: one is just a kind of mythological archetype; the other is an actual being. I don't know which is true, but it's a really interesting figure in all the Buddhist texts.

So the nun Vajira, a nun of some understanding, as will be apparent from the dialogue, had taken her alms bowl and entered Savatthi, a town in northern India, for alms and came back to the grove where she was staying. After her meal, she sat down at the foot of a tree and began to meditate.

Then it said that Mara approached the bhikkhuni and desired to cause her fear and consternation, to make her hair stand on end and cause her to fall away from concentration of mind. Have you had any visits from Mara like that so far? That sounds kind of familiar.

So Mara came to the bhikkhuni Vajira and put to her this question that was intended to unsettle her: "Who put this living being together? Where is the maker? Where does this being come from, and where will it end?"

Vajira, being a pretty together meditator, replied immediately, "What's this 'being' you go on about? That's your delusion. We are nothing but the aggregates. There's no being to be found here. It's like this: A certain combination of parts is called by the name 'chariot.' So with the aggregates, the elements of mind and body, it's just common usage to say 'a being.' It's suffering that exists, suffering that endures, suffering that disappears. Nothing but suffering exists. Nothing but suffering comes to an end."

Then Mara, the evil one, thought, "Vajira knows me." And sad and dejected, he slunk away.

This is a very interesting reply from Vajira when she says, "There is no being here. That's only a concept. What's really here are the aggregates." This response takes us into a level that in the Buddhist texts is talked of as the level of ultimate truth and conventional truth. Gil talked about the level of thusness and concepts—this is another way to express that.

In the teachings, there are said to be ultimate constituents of experience that have a reality, a limited reality. The aggregates are among these things that have a true reality, that have a way of being. Others of the constituents that are said to be real in this sense are the four elements of earth, water, fire, and air, which really refer to qualities of body sensations. At first I thought the Buddha was being a really primitive chemist and saying that this is what makes up matter. But these are the qualities that we feel in our body. The sense bases and their objects are considered true and real, and nibbana, the unconditioned, is considered to be a reality.

But the term "human being" is just a conventional description of these things taken together. There is no thing that is a human being.

The term human being doesn't point to anything that really exists. And Vajira mentions this analogy of the chariot. This is a classical analogy in the texts that's explored in an ancient work called The Questions of King Melinda.

There's quite an interesting story behind this. There was considerable interchange between ancient Greece and ancient India, and these Buddha images that we see today didn't exist at the time of the Buddha. Though we think of them as products of Indian art and culture, they weren't created until much later. There was no statuary 500 years before the birth of Christ. The symbols that were used at the time of the Buddha to represent him and the teachings were a footprint, a dharma wheel—an eight-spoked wheel representing the Eightfold Path—or sometimes a footprint with a dharma wheel between the toes.

It was only when Indian culture had contact with Greek culture that the Roman-Greek style of sculpture was introduced, and we began to see figures like this. This is actually a very European artistic tradition, even though now it appears quintessentially Asian.

One of these Greek kings was named Menander, who conquered part of India and lived there sometime after the death of the Buddha. King Menander was visited by an enlightened monk named Nagasena, and they engaged in a series of dialogues that were recorded. The name was slightly altered over the years, so the book is called The Questions of King Melinda, though his actual name was apparently Menander, and he was indeed Greek.

So Menander was dialoguing with Nagasena, the Arahant, and asked, "Who is Nagasena? I see you before me, I hear your voice, but who are you really?" He said to Nagasena, "Are you your form?" And Nagasena replied, "No." "Are you your feelings?" "No." "Are you your perceptions?" "No." "Are you your mental formations?" "No." "Are you your consciousness?" "No." Because all of these are only fragments.

So the king said, "Well, maybe Nagasena doesn't really exist."

Nagasena's reply was brilliant: "King, you're a wealthy man. How did you come here? Did you come on foot or by chariot?"

The king said, "I came by chariot."

So Nagasena asked, "What is this thing you call a chariot? Is it the wheels?"

The king said, "No."

"Is it the axles?"

"No."

"Is it the pole that attaches to the horse?"

"No."

"Is it the sum of all of these?"

The king said, "Not really."

Nagasena concluded, "It's just this way with a human being. We can't really be said to be any of these components."

This is quite mysterious. We can see why we're not the individual aggregates, but why aren't we all of them put together? What we see in the description of the chariot is that a chariot is really just these individual pieces—the box, the wheels, the axle, the pole—that are assembled together in a certain way. If we disassemble them, we no longer have a chariot.

Consider a simple example: a pen. We look at this and say, "That's a pen." But if we start to take it apart, we have the individual pieces—the barrel, the refill, the cap, and so forth. Is this collection of parts a pen? Not really, is it?

If we put the pieces back together, then again we have something that we recognize as a pen.

So what we call a human being is only these aggregates that are assembled in a certain way and interact in a certain way that give the appearance of one thing—a unity, an organism. But if you were asked to find the one part of you that "human being" refers to, there isn't anything like that, is there? So "human being" is just a concept. And in practice, we want to keep coming back to seeing the reality of our actual experience, which we can describe as the aggregates. That's what's real or true.

So in a way, this is seeing a level of emptiness in the human being. Another way that it's sometimes described is selflessness. And I know there are lots of feelings about getting into this concept of selflessness. So if this is really uncomfortable, this might be the time for the earplugs or the tuning out. But I wanted to explain a little about the relationship of selflessness to the aggregates.

And so what I want to do to get into it is to ask the question: what do we mean by this word "I" or "self"? Because the Buddha wasn't denying that there are beings, but rather that there's a certain way we use the word "I" or "self" that is being negated. So we really need to understand what that is first.

The sense I think we have of "I" is that there's something to which it refers that was there when we were born, has been there all throughout our life, is here in this moment, will be with us the rest of the life until we die—at least, if not longer. That there's some kind of abiding or ongoing independent part of ourselves that continues through time. It's like we feel that there's something at the core of us that is lasting. That in some ways, I'm the same person who sat in that second grade classroom and learned the fundamentals of arithmetic as the person I am in this moment. There's some sense of the continuing nature of an "I" that's gone through all those experiences.

And we also kind of employ it in this moment. We identify it as the one that's watching the breath, as though there's some entity that's separate from the breath that's observing it. Sometimes we talk about it as the owner of the body—as though there's a car registration made out to Guy Armstrong that this body is registered to. It's the one who hears sounds. There's a hearer of sounds in it.

This is the piece that the Buddha was negating. That there's some kind of unchanging core at the center of us that is the owner, that is the observer, that is the onlooker, that's separate from our experience. He wasn't denying our individuality. It's really clear that on a certain level of understanding there are individual beings, that we all feel different things, we perceive differently, we act differently, we obviously take up different space with our body. So that level of individuality isn't being denied or discounted.

One way of thinking about that is that each of us is a complete mind stream—a stream of mind and body. And that stream, you might say, has a continuity over time, but the individual components of body and mind stream are changing. And that this stream of body and mind is a little different than that stream, or that stream, or that stream of body and mind.

One way to understand this is: when the Buddha got enlightened, it solved his problem, but it didn't solve ours. So sometimes you hear this view in spirituality that "all is one." But if all is one, I would expect the Buddha's enlightenment would have taken care of this mind stream also. So there's a level of individuality that's true that we don't really question. But within that individual stream, the Buddha questioned whether there's any kind of solid core that's unchanging.

So the question then is: given this stream, the experience of the aggregates, how is it that we build a sense of self? How does it come into being? One of the core ways that we do it is that we take the body to be self. We take the body to be "I," or we take the body to be "mine."

I don't know if you remember, but when the Buddha attained his understanding under the Bodhi tree near the town of Gaya, he almost didn't teach. It's said that he just abided in the bliss of freedom for seven weeks after his awakening. And he thought about not teaching. He said, "Nobody's going to get it. What I have discovered is too subtle, too hard to understand. No one will get it if I go out and proclaim it." So he almost didn't teach. Then he kind of looked over the world and surveyed the world and he said, "Well, there are some beings that don't have a lot of dust in their eyes, so I'll go offer this."

But this concern evidently came up for him at a later point too, because he was talking to Sariputta, who was one of his chief disciples. And he said, "You know, Sariputta, whether I teach the Dharma briefly or in detail, those who understand it are hard to find." So you get this sense of a little bit of unfulfillment in his sense of teaching, that it wasn't going quite as easily as maybe he thought it might. And Sariputta replied, "Oh, blessed one, now is the time for it."

Teach the Dharma briefly or at length and there will be those who understand. Because at least Sariputta understood. He was considered to be the Buddha's equivalent in wisdom. So the Buddha said, "Well then, Sariputta, this is how the training should be done. Concerning this body with its consciousness, let there be no self-centered imaginings of I and mine and no such bias. We shall then abide in the attainment of the heart's liberation and the liberation by wisdom."

This is a pretty powerful statement. Basically, as long as we believe that we are the body, we're subject to the fear of death. Because we know that the body comes to an end. And if our identity is tied with it, then there's the fear: oh, I also come to an end.

Ajahn Buddhadasa was a great Thai meditation master, one of the greatest Thai monks of the last half century. He died a few years ago. He lived very simply out in nature. Most of his life was spent in a forest monastery in the south of Thailand that had been given to him when he was a young monk. It still exists today. It's called Wat Suan Mok. For those of you who visit Thailand, it's a wonderful place to visit because you get the flavor of what living simply in the woods as a practitioner is like in Asia. It has a wonderful feeling, and it has a lot of his spirit there.

He was a very radical teacher for a traditional Buddhist country. He wouldn't allow any images of the Buddha on the property. People always kept wanting to donate these things, these statues of the Buddha, and he wouldn't have it. He didn't want people to get involved in the kind of ritual and devotion that statues sometimes lead to. When we were monks, we would sit there in a big semicircle for the morning meal. And in the center of the semicircle, there were three big rocks piled one on top of another, decreasing in size. Those were as close as you could get to the image of a Buddha at Wat Suan Mok. He was very radical. He was very much on the wisdom side of things.

Living in nature, he felt that you could just abide in a quiet life and the qualities of nature would sink into your bones, sink into your marrow as you led a simple meditative life. You could learn a great deal from the trees, from the forest, from the creatures, from the weather, from the clouds.

What he said about this learning was that you came to understand that this body came from nature. It just came from the joining together of the seeds from our parents, the sperm and the egg, just a physical joining. Then the body was nourished by nutriments over the course of our life—food and water and air—and grew up. It still belongs to nature. It doesn't actually belong to us. It's never belonged to us. The body belongs to nature. It came from nature. Give it back to nature. And when we do, there's a tremendous relief in that.

This is a matter for insight, for seeing that the body has never departed from nature. We don't have to feel the burden of ownership.

So this is the self in relation to form. In relation to feeling, I think we talked about that in the meditation instructions. I won't spend more time on that.

In relation to perception, I'd like to talk a little bit about the arising of self in relation to perception. It's very interesting. Perception is one of the most powerful and most underrated faculties in our being. It is the faculty of insight, essentially. The deepest insights come not from seeing different things, but from seeing the same things differently.

Some of you this week have been reporting on seeing clearly the arising and passing—that is the insight into impermanence. We all sit down and can tell that body sensations are coming and going, and thoughts are coming and going, moods are coming and going, sounds, breath, everything's coming and going. But sometimes there's the very clear perception of that coming and going, of that arising and passing. It's not that we see anything differently, but we see that same constellation in a different way. And we know, really in our gut: all the facets of my experience are simply arising and passing. That's the power of perception.

Perception colors our fundamental take on the moment. It arises again and again in daily life and in retreat.

I heard this story this summer. John Kabat-Zinn, who began the mindfulness-based stress reduction program at UMass Worcester, has started to offer the practice in the military. They'd heard about the successes in coping with pain and increased clarity. Those instructions are going out into the military right now. I happened to mention this to Christopher Titmus, who is a very devoted member of the Green Party and very active politically. His first question was, "Are they being taught the precepts?" Which is a very interesting point, because one could simply use the practice to become more efficient warriors.

One of the stories John Kabat-Zinn came back with was about a military officer who was living on a base and shopping at the PX, the grocery store on base. He was standing in line where a woman cashier was checking people out. An older woman came through the line holding a baby and reached the cashier. The cashier rang up the purchase, but then the woman with the baby started talking to the cashier, handed the baby over so the cashier could hold it and admire it and coo over it. They talked back and forth for some time.

The officer was getting impatient—tapping his feet, thinking "What's going on? I don't have all day." He grew frustrated and resentful. Finally, the cashier handed the baby back to the older woman, who left and went on her way.

But he had heard some training about watching your mind, not jumping to the first reaction that comes. So he was trying to be a little bit aware of his resentment and reactivity. When he got to the cashier himself, he struck up a conversation and said, "Nice baby."

The cashier said, "It's my baby. My husband was an Air Force officer killed in a training mission just a few months ago. I've had to find a job to support my children. I took this job. The woman who was here is my mother. She looks after my baby during the day and comes in a few times just so that I can have these few moments of contact with my baby."

The man's whole relationship to the situation changed—from reactivity to concern and compassion—all based on that shift in perception from seeing strangers to seeing a mother and a child.

We often perceive ourselves as unlovable or unlovely. That's really a deluded misperception. That's a flaw. Because we are all worthy of love. Every human being is worthy of love. But we forget that.

There's this beautiful poem by Galway Kinnell that expresses this. I think one of the functions of art is to shift our perception of the world and show us where we're mistaken or what we've forgotten. This is called "St. Francis and the Sow."

"The bud stands for all things, even for those things that don't flower, for everything flowers from within of self-blessing, though sometimes it is necessary to reteach a thing its loveliness, to put a hand on the brow of the flower and retell it in words and in touch, it is lovely, it is lovely, until it flowers again from within of self-blessing, as St. Francis put his hand on the creased forehead of the sow and told her in words and in touch blessings of the earth on the sow. And the sow began remembering all down her thick length, from the earthen snout all the way through the fodder and slops to the spiritual curl of the tail, from the hard spininess spiked out from the spine down through the great broken heart to the sheer blue milk and dreaminess spurting and shuddering from the fourteen teats into the fourteen mouths, sucking and blowing beneath them, the long, perfect loveliness of sow."

Perceptions can change in a moment. When I was on retreat this fall in Massachusetts, the chipmunks were really active. It was the start of fall season. The leaves were turning colors and falling, and the chipmunks were scurrying around all over the place, storing up food for winter. Then the maples started to reach their maturity and let down those little propellers with the maple seed in the middle. The chipmunks really seemed to love those. They'd go scrambling around everywhere.

We saw lots of chipmunks, and they're very cute—much cuter than squirrels, actually. They can hop so quickly and so high. They look like cartoon characters. So I got very fond of the chipmunks. Being on retreat, you get kind of mushy.

And I grew quite mushy about these chipmunks. Sometimes in the evening, when sunflower seeds or peanuts were offered alongside tea, I would sneak a little handful and scatter them outside for the chipmunks to discover the next day.

One day, while doing a mindful walk along the road, I came upon a dead chipmunk. It hadn't been run over, so its form was still intact. Seeing it there dead really touched me, moved me deeply. I began wondering what family it had been trying to return to when it died on that road. What were its connections? What beings missed it, noticed its absence? How did it feel in that moment of dying? It was very tender.

What really struck me was the size of its ear—so tiny, only about a quarter of an inch long, a delicate grayish pink. In seeing that ear, I realized the chipmunk had possessed all the same senses we do. It was so small, yet within that body of only six inches were all the same aggregates that we have. It had experienced its own life of pleasure and pain, fear and love of life, just as we do. It was a very moving perception.

A few days later, walking along a gravel path, I spotted a small crumpled form on the ground fifteen feet ahead. "Oh no," I thought, "not another dead chipmunk." Looking closer, I wondered: is that a dead chipmunk or just a pile of leaves? I couldn't tell from where I stood.

So I remained there, observing. When I saw it as a dead chipmunk, my heart would sink into sadness. When I saw it as merely leaves, everything felt neutral. The same sense data, yet I could perceive it two completely different ways, and my emotional response shifted entirely. Walking closer, I discovered it was indeed just a pile of dead leaves—much easier to bear.

We can experience these perceptual shifts in a single moment. Do you remember that old song "Silhouettes on the Shade"? A man walks around his girlfriend's block, approaching her door to knock. There's a light on in the living room, and two people are kissing passionately in front of it, their shadows cast on the window shade. He becomes despondent—his girlfriend is in love with another man. But then he realizes it's the wrong house. It's not his girlfriend at all. He goes to the right house and kisses his own girlfriend.

That shift in perception can feel like the difference between heaven and hell. In our practice, sometimes we see the glass half empty, sometimes half full. We can look at a moment of experience in meditation and declare, "This is a bad moment. I can't accept this. This is painful." Or in a millisecond, we can shift perspective: "Oh, this is okay. There's some discomfort here, a little pain in my body, but my mind isn't too unbalanced. Lunchtime isn't far off. I think I can make it through this." Suddenly it becomes acceptable.

The Buddha taught that a good practitioner can see the beautiful in a moment of unbeauty.

if he or she wishes, or the practitioner can see the unbeautiful in a moment of beauty, if he or she wishes. The reason for seeing them different ways is this: if we're caught in desire, then it's more skillful to see what's not so beautiful, to cut through the wanting. Or if we're caught in aversion, it's more skillful to see the beautiful, so we're not caught in hatred.

The fourth of the aggregates are the sankharas, the formations—the mental formations, sometimes called the karmic formations. These are the expressions of thought and emotion and image that usually express something with a sense of will. The reason that we don't feel peace all the time is that urges come in of wanting or not wanting that keep the mind in motion. We're kind of bombarded by thoughts that express our likes and dislikes and our hopes and fears. The mind doesn't feel peace often because of the impingement of these thoughts. This is what keeps us stirred up.

Well, these are also a way in which we really feel comfortable in the sense of ourselves being there. I get very used to my own particular patterns. I'm a fear type, as personality types go, so I'm very used to a thread of anxiety being present. And some complaining. When that's going on, I sort of think, "Oh, I'm really here now." It gets kind of reassuring. Sometimes when that isn't there and I feel like I'm not here, I sort of wonder where I am or what is going on.

So there are a few things to see with this. One is that we can hold on to a sense of self just through familiarity with these things. But the truth is that if we watch closely, these things also pass.

Suzuki Roshi had this beautiful line which explains why mindfulness is so potent for dealing with the afflictive emotions. He said, "Those who know the state of emptiness will always be able to dissolve their problems through constancy." If you know the state of emptiness, you can always dissolve your problems. Because you simply are patient and stay in the present until that particular mood or fear or anger or wanting or sense of hopelessness or despair or self-judgment passes away, which it will in time. And then you return to this state of balance and openness where nothing is really dominating.

That's true because the sankharas are basically these formations that occur temporarily and unexpectedly—as Silvia said in the talk last night, two useful words. If you forget all the rest of your dharma, you can remember these very useful words.

This is actually what brought me into practice. When I did my first meditation retreat in 1976 at Lama Foundation with Joseph Goldstein and Jack Kornfield and Sharon Salzberg, I became totally hooked after that ten-day experience. When I look back on what hooked me into the practice, it was feeling this sense of emptiness and feeling that it had the potency to uproot my suffering.

The particular suffering I was caught in right at that time in my life was a kind of fear and confusion. I'd sort of emerged out of the sixties as one of the walking wounded, with too much of everything that the sixties was famous for. When I found meditation, I felt that it was the one place where I could see that emptiness, and I could see the potential for anything being uprooted through the power of that openness.

This is one of the real healing properties of awareness—that it has the ability to unstick anywhere we feel stuck, anything at all, to reach back to that state of openness. So on the level of the emotions included within the sankharas, they're also temporary. They're passing and transient. And yet they provide a comfortable sense of who we are. If we look closely, we can see that that passes too.

But one of the last refuges of the self—one of the ego's last stand—is in the realm of thought. Even as we get really still in our meditation, and we may be connecting well with the breath, connecting well with sounds, with sensations, very firmly present in the moment, there can be this ongoing line of subconscious chatter: "Oh, I see what's happening now. Now I'm going to stay with the breath for a while. Oh, I got a few of those and then I spaced out for a while. Okay, that wasn't very good, but I'm going to come back. Now what I'm going to pay attention to is sounds because I feel I was too tight and I need some spaciousness."

We can keep this running commentary up even as we're connecting clearly to the focus of the meditation. And in this running commentary, we reestablish the sense of the separate observer. We create, as it were, this sense of observer by these thoughts that haven't been clearly looked into.

So this is one reason that we offer the awareness of thought as an important part of the practice. When we become aware of the thoughts coming and going, then we undercut one more place where the sense of self tends to take a stand, even in very subtle and good periods of meditation. So it's useful to be clear that the thoughts are also coming and going.

One place you can get in touch with that is to start observing the nature of your experience in between thoughts. The time when one thought has ended and before the next thought has arisen—what's the quality of that moment like?

That's a moment that's a little bit freer of this grip of self.

Finally, the last of the aggregates is consciousness. This is more complicated. For now, I'm just going to stick with the definition the Buddha used of consciousness, which is that it was the knowing that arose in relation to a sense experience—to a sound, to a touch, a smell, a taste, a thought, or whatever. When that sense experience went, the consciousness passed with it. So in that sense, consciousness is also arising and passing.

Yet what many people come and report in interviews is that at times when the meditation is steady, when there's a sense of stillness and spaciousness, they feel there's a kind of presence there that's stable and ongoing. They feel that there's a quality to the awareness that isn't characterized by this coming and going. Is that consciousness or is that something else? There's a sense that all the mental components, all the physical components are coming and going, except this awareness seems kind of steady. So what's that about?

That's another talk. I want to mostly avoid that tonight because it's a big question. I'm going to come back and touch on it briefly at the end. For right now, I'll just say that consciousness has a little bit of a dual nature, a dual character. We can see the ways in which it's just conditioned and subject to arising and passing. We can also, from another angle, see that it has a quality of ongoingness. And we'll come back to that before we finish.

So we see that all these components of the aggregates are just arising and passing, moment after moment. In each moment, they come and they go.

So how does the sense of self get generated? Well, it gets generated out of a certain speed of these things happening. The five aggregates can all arise so quickly. A knee pain comes in. You're sitting, you're clearly with the breath. What we call knee pain comes in. By the way, that's a concept because knee is a concept. But you notice that there's this physical sensation arising about here.

You might notice the first thing is this sharp sensation. So that's the manifestation of the form aggregate and also the consciousness aggregate that knows that experience. Form and consciousness are there right in that moment. Then you might note there's an unpleasant feeling with it. You might note "painful." That's the feeling tone, the second aggregate. Then there may well be a perception of pain or stabbing. That's the third aggregate. And then you might start to feel, "Oh, my knee hurts." That thought might arise: "My knee hurts." That's sankara. That's the fourth aggregate.

Well, it's in that leap—"my knee hurts"—that the self is getting formed again. There's the ownership of that experience. Now, if we simply left it with "stabbing, stabbing," then the self is not being brought into creation again. But when we call it "my knee," all of a sudden, out of those bare aggregates, the I has come into being. So that's actually the moment of birth. The I has taken a birth at that moment. You are the owner of a bad knee. Congratulations.

Fortunately, birth also leads to passing away. At the end of the sitting, you get up, and that owner of the bad knee has gone away. Great. You can walk. It's comfortable again. Phew. That death was a relief.

Some deaths are not so nice. You're sitting in this really lovely, quiet space.

I'm having a great sitting. So you take birth as a good meditator. And with that, there's a feeling of satisfaction, of fulfillment, of accomplishment, of contentment. You get up and walk out. Maybe the walking meditation isn't so settled. Maybe the next sitting isn't so settled. Oh, that self dies—the good meditator dies. And that's sad. That's hard. It's hard to let go of that.

So in this constantly taking birth and passing away, there's joy and there's sorrow bound up in this process. The formation of I happens again and again in relation to the aggregates.

An interesting question to ask is: does the I ever arise without being tied to one of the aggregates? Does the sense of I ever come into being purely on its own? Can it stand alone? Can the I stand alone? Or is it only defined in relation to an experience among the aggregates? It's an interesting thing to investigate, so I'll leave that with you to take up.

You can see how over and over we form these conclusions, simple conclusions. I see a chair. I feel happy. I am a bad person. I am lovable. I'm feeling excited. All the different ways that we put the label of I on our experience.

The Buddha was asked once, "How does belief in a self come to be? How does this happen over and over that we form this view of the self?" And he explained it in terms of the aggregates and said that an untaught ordinary person—it's basically us—an untaught ordinary person regards form as self, primarily this body. So that's the sense "I am the body." Or self as possessing form: "This is my body." Or form as in self: that is, the body is a part of me. I'm bigger than the body, but the body is a piece of it. Or self as in form: I dwell within the body.

So these are the four options: form as self, self as owning form, form as in self, or self as in form. Then he goes through the same four formulations with regard to the other four aggregates, the mental aggregates. So he spells out twenty ways that the sense of self gets created. It's an interesting thing to reflect on. I think it pretty well covers the territory.

The name we can give to this whole process is identification. Identification is the labeling of I or mine on an aspect of our experience. What the Buddha said is that that I and mine is not intrinsic to the experience, but we give the label, and in giving the label, when we believe in it, we create that sense of self, moment after moment.

So the self is not an ongoing thing in any way, shape, or form, but it's something that we ourselves generate moment after moment after moment. That's why in Buddhism sometimes the goal is stated as the destroying of the ego, but that's completely false. As Wei Wu Wei pointed out, that's all well and good: catch the ego and cook its goose, but first you have to find it. And that's the problem, because there isn't really one. It's just this transient sense that comes and goes.

Nor are the aggregates altogether a self either. And that's something that's difficult to grasp. It's just a conventional term that we give to the joining. The way that all the pieces are put together, we give the term human beings, but that term human being doesn't actually point to anything that has its own existence. Just like pen is nothing more than a collection of the pieces of the pen. This sounds theoretical.

But what I want to say is that when we actually see in this way, it transforms our whole relationship to the world. I don't see this way all the time, but I see this way some of the time. And when I see this way, it's tremendously freeing. When I see that there's no separate core to this life process, that this life process is one of constant flux, there's a tremendous sense of freedom and ease that comes in.

Something else happens that's really interesting, that shocked me the first few times I saw it: when I see myself that way, I also see other people that way. Most of the time I walk about and I see personalities, especially with people that I know. I look at James and I know, oh, that's my friend James. I know many things about him. He has a great heart. I have a lot of affection for him. I sort of crystallize him into something that I take for granted. But when I can see on the level of clearer seeing, I just see this impersonal process going on for all of us, all beings that I turn my attention to.

There's a very deep sense of freedom in that. And also what gets strengthened is our sense of connectedness. Connectedness doesn't even say it right. It's dropping down to the level where we actually are the same being. Or you could even say we're different limbs of the same being. We're connected somewhere down here, but we poke up as different fingers. We're joined at the base.

What I find so inspiring about that is that the whole purpose of practice then becomes not just eliminating the obscurations to seeing in this mind and body stream. The whole game becomes to eliminate the obscurations to awareness wherever awareness is found. It becomes the same game. This really opens our practice out to take in all of life, so that our practice just spontaneously starts to include practicing for the liberation of all beings everywhere—not as a theoretical thing, but as a felt sense, because we see that we are all the same.

Another aspect of seeing on this level is expressed in an ancient text, a classical text called the Visuddhimagga, where it says, "There is no doer of a deed. There is no one who reaps the fruit of a deed. Empty phenomena roll on. This view alone is right and true." There is suffering, but there is no one who suffers. There is freedom, but there is no one who is freed.

Seeing in this way—there is suffering, but there is no one who suffers; there is freedom, but there is no one to be freed. In many of the Mahayana texts, you actually read statements such as, "There are no such things as beings, as separate individual beings." Somehow this sounds cold and off-putting, but the actual felt sense of it is one of great compassion. Because we see that we suffer because we all take up the belief in a personality or the belief in a self. Because of it, we have to protect it and defend it and nurture it. And in that, there's a struggle that doesn't need to be there. We've added something on top of our experience that doesn't need to be there.

I had a clear pointing out of this when I was a monk. In the Satipatthana Sutta, there's a whole section that deals with contemplations in cemeteries and charnel grounds—contemplations of dead and decaying bodies. The idea is that the meditator looks at what's happening to other bodies and then imagines what will happen to her or his own body.

In most of the world today, you can't find a charnel ground. It's considered unhygienic. So the modern equivalent in Thailand is the autopsy rooms. As monks or nuns in Thailand, we're able to go and view autopsies. So I did that a couple of times and stayed in the room for a couple of hours each time.

I was about thirty-four years old. I'd never been next to a dead body in my life. So that was a complete shock for me. Not only did I get to stand next to corpses, but I got to watch them being taken apart. I got to watch the bodies being dissected. And they do quite a thorough job. I'm only going to do the PG-rated version of the talk tonight, but there is an R-rated version that is quite unsettling. I won't do that tonight.

So watching the bodies being taken apart for a couple of hours—and I'd been sitting quite a bit—

I was in a monastery in the city, waiting for my visa to come through. I'd been doing probably six hours of practice a day, and I walked out of there feeling quite sensitive. I felt that the experience had made a very strong impact on me.

I walked out into the street. The hospital was near the parade ground, the Sanam Luang in Bangkok, which is a very busy part of town, the central part of downtown. Lots of people lined up waiting for buses, kids playing in the park, couples holding hands and walking down the street, young people, old people, middle-aged people.

As I came out and looked at people, all I could see were walking corpses. That's all that I saw. And I was fascinated. I just kept watching. And it stayed with me for half an hour, an hour, something like that.

Then I reflected later: what did I mean by seeing walking corpses? What was that insight? The felt sense of it was that there were bodies which were no different than the bodies I had just seen taken apart on the autopsy table. But these bodies were different. These bodies were animated, and out from the eyes shone this brightness. These bodies had a brightness that the other bodies hadn't.

And this brightness was something to do with consciousness. So the consciousness was still there. And that consciousness, I realized, was not anything to do with time. This brightness was just purely in the present moment. It abided only in the present moment. It had nothing to do with past or future. It was just here and now.

It had the capacity to receive sense impressions through the doors, the five doors of the physical senses and through the mind. Through that capacity to receive impressions and this peculiar quality of memory, the brightness constructed a history. And it projected that history into the future. And out of those dual constructions, it created the sense of a self, a personality that was ongoing over time.

When in truth, there was only this extraordinary brightness purely in the present moment. Until we see through that construction of past and future out of the present moment materials, we're bound in the delusion that something continues over time. We're bound in the delusion of an ongoing personality.

What we are more fundamentally is the space in which everything arises and passes. This is the way of freedom. If there were only the aggregates, then we'd be bound on this wheel of arising and passing, of taking birth in new forms and dying. But the Buddha pointed to a liberation just basically through the qualities of wisdom and awareness. This is the way forward, the way to freedom.

From Ajahn Mahabua: "Although all phenomena without exception fall under the laws of the three characteristics—impermanence, suffering, and not-self—the true nature of the mind doesn't fall under these laws. The natural power of the mind itself is that it knows and does not die. This deathlessness is something that lies beyond disintegration."

We could say that this is a substratum of awareness that's a dimension of our being that illuminates everything that arises but is itself empty. Because of this empty awareness, everything in the universe is accommodated. Everything has allowed its being of arising and passing. And yet this empty awareness abides with the quality of knowing.

What we are most fundamentally is this empty space, which has the knowing property. This is our deepest nature. This is what's sometimes referred to as our Buddha nature. It is lasting, it is not subject to arising and passing, but it's ungraspable. We can't identify it as a separate thing because it's the context within which everything takes existence. So it itself is beyond existence and non-existence.

This nature is, but it doesn't exist. It doesn't partake of time. So one way of saying is that it has always been, it is now, and it will always be.

But it itself is beyond change. It's beyond coming and going, and it's beyond birth and death. The Buddha taught that when we take our being in that dimension, then we are beyond the draw of death. Then we abide in the deathless, and this is the end of suffering.

To recognize and rest in this deathless nature is the ultimate fruit of the dharma path. It is not something we need to create or achieve, for it is already our deepest reality. Rather, it is something we uncover by releasing our grip on all that is impermanent, all that comes and goes, all that we have mistakenly taken to be our true self.

In this recognition, we find the peace that surpasses understanding—not because the world has changed, but because we have remembered what we truly are. We discover that what we have always been seeking was never absent, never lost, never threatened by the constant flux of experience.

This is the gift of dharma practice: to awaken to what has always been present, to rest in what cannot be disturbed, and to find in that resting the end of our long search for home.

Renunciation

Guy Armstrong · 52 min

> Guy Armstrong examines renunciation (nekkhamma) as one of the ten pāramīs, exploring both its outer manifestation in the simplicity of retreat life and its deeper meaning as letting go of preferences and attachments. Drawing from the Buddha's own renunciation story and examples of dedicated practitioners like Mahāsī Sayādaw and Tibetan masters, Armstrong illustrates how simplifying external conditions allows us to see the workings of mind and heart more clearly.
>
> The talk addresses the challenges and benefits of retreat life - giving up entertainment, relationships, choice of food, and familiar schedules - as supportive conditions for practice. Armstrong shares stories from his time as a monk in Thai forest monasteries and encounters with Asian teachers to demonstrate how renunciation develops inner strength and unshakeability. He explains how difficulties that arise in retreat aren't obstacles but necessary material for understanding the roots of suffering.
>
> The deeper aspect of renunciation involves letting go of our need for experience to be a particular way, finding a center of peace independent of changing conditions. This leads toward the Buddha's own realization of the "unborn, unaging, unailing, deathless, sorrowless supreme security from bondage" - the ultimate goal of our practice and the reason for undertaking the path of renunciation.

I'd like to talk tonight on the quality of renunciation.

When we look at the form, the outer form of our life here in retreat, one of the most obvious and striking features is the extreme simplicity of what we do day by day. We really pare our life down to the simplest human activities of sitting and breathing, of walking and paying attention, and of eating. We let go of so many of the mundane daily activities that may end up being distractions from our central aim in life. We let go of many entertainments and diversions. This is a really important and very supportive aspect of what we do, this simplifying of life on retreat. It's also one of the most arduous things about being here.

So I want to acknowledge the courage and the commitment that you all are showing in undertaking this kind of simplicity for three weeks or for six weeks. It's really a great testament to your dedication.

Renunciation is a frequent theme in the Buddhist tradition, and the Buddha was the first archetype of this quality. When he was young and still living in the palace, you may know the story, he had three palaces, one for every season of the year. He had whole groups of minstrels to serenade him—in his own words, none of whom were male. The gardeners were trained to pick off dead flowers before he could see them so that he wouldn't have to look at anything ugly and decaying.

Somehow in his youth, he happened upon what are called the heavenly messengers: seeing a person who was ill, a person who was old, and a corpse. Then he saw the fourth messenger, which was one who had gone forth from the home life into homelessness, a renunciate. At that point the Bodhisattva understood that he too was subject to illness, to aging, to death. He said he saw the potential suffering inherent in human life subject to these forces, and that was really what inspired his departing from home.

So he left home at age 29, leaving behind a young wife and a young son whom he knew would be well taken care of because his family was royal, was wealthy. He described it himself in this way: "While still young, a black-haired young man endowed with the blessing of youth, in the prime of life, I shaved off my hair and beard, though my mother and father wished otherwise and grieved with tearful faces. And I put on the yellow robe and went forth from the home life into homelessness."

The Bodhisattva gave up all personal comfort in order to find an end to suffering, to find freedom. There's a very moving image of the Bodhisattva at one stage in his practice, which lasted for six years altogether—the image of the emaciated Buddha. You've probably seen this image in Buddhist iconography and art. It shows him extremely thin with sunken cheeks. He's very gaunt because he's gone without eating for some time. The theory being in India at that time that if one starved the body, the soul would become liberated. So the Bodhisattva undertook these extremely austere practices.

Again, in his own words, he says of that stage in his practice, "My vertebrae stood out on my spine like beads on a cord. My ribs jutted out as gaunt as the crazy rafters of an old roofless barn. When I touched my belly skin, I could feel my backbone. And when I touched my back skin, I could feel my belly."

This degree of renunciation, fortunately, isn't necessary for us. That's one of the things the Buddha found in teaching the middle path. We don't have to go that far. But I love this image because it really stands for the difficulties that we are all willing to face coming upon an extended retreat like this one. The courage and the determination that are required.

One of my first encounters with renunciates came in 1979. I was working on staff at Insight Meditation Society in Massachusetts. I'd been on staff for about a year and a half, and we had a visit from an old Asian monk, an old Burmese monk named Mahasi Sayadaw, who was about 80 at that time. You may know that Mahasi Sayadaw was really more or less the creator of the style of Vipassana meditation that we do here and that we normally teach. The paying attention to the different sense doors, being with changing objects, and using the mental noting are all techniques that he imparted to thousands of practitioners. He has left as his legacy hundreds of meditation centers throughout Burma and Thailand and Sri Lanka that carry on this particular practice which he called the Satipatthana technique of Vipassana.

So he was really one of the greatest meditation masters of the century, and when he came to IMS we were really excited because he was in a way the father of our teachers' teachers. He was very senior and revered.

I was on staff and so we got to go down to the Boston airport to meet him when he came. He arrived with four other monks. They like to travel in force. We got to the gate and we were waiting for him to come off the plane, and everybody else got off the plane and there was no Mahasi Sayadaw. You don't really overlook old men in orange robes and shaved heads in the Boston airport. So we were pretty sure we hadn't missed him. We started wondering, did his flight get canceled out of Thailand? Did they miss the connection or what happened?

We waited, and pretty shortly, out from the door of the gate came walking very slowly, very mindfully, sort of lifting, moving, placing—Mahasi Sayadaw as the first one, and then the four other monks who were all junior to him in single file behind him. Just bringing that meditative consciousness right into the middle of the Boston airport.

And each of them carried in front of his chest a fan. The fan is a teaching device in Asian countries, in Buddhist countries, where the monk will often hold a fan up in front of his face while delivering a dharma talk so that the people may not even know who's speaking. It's a technique designed to emphasize egolessness so that the star quality doesn't get perpetuated and sustained.

So they were all carrying these fans. And when we looked closely, there was English embroidery on each fan that said, "Mahasi Sayadaw, World Tour 1979." Below, the same thing was written in Burmese. So they all came forward with their fans, and then we took them back to the center where they led a two-week retreat.

At that time I was somewhat young in my practice and had been mostly influenced by Western teachers. I found their teaching style a little dry because it wasn't full of Rumi poems or Sufi stories or recounting embarrassing incidents that had happened to them in second grade. I thought the flavor of the teachings was a little dry at times.

Now I have much more appreciation for what they did, because basically what those men did was repeat the words of the Buddha that were not mere words to them. They were words that they had proved for themselves through decades of practice and investigation and meditation. So looking back, I really appreciate the power of what they offered.

At the time, there was a little controversy about their visit. They were all celibate, and many of them had been celibate since very early on, had never known sexuality at all. I remember one of the monks said one day in the meditation hall, in response to a question, "Well, yes, because sex is gross, base, and disgusting."

You can imagine that touched off a little bit of controversy, which was only resolved a few days later when one of the women on staff figured out what had gone wrong. She said, "Oh right, the translator actually missed it. What he actually said was sex is basic and grossing and worth discussing." Then we all felt a little better about it all.

But one of the things that I felt really strongly in those five monks, even from early on in my contact with them, was tremendous power in their presence. There was a great sense of purity about them, almost an innocence, as though they had never lost some of their childlike wonder and purity of heart.

When I reflected on it at that time, about twenty years ago, I really felt that it had come from their renunciation. They had lived lives that were so simple, so uncluttered, so clean and pure that their beings had just flowered in this really lovely way—a way that was almost untouched by a lot of the effects of the world.

In their relation to us, they were really unshakable. It's a quality I've come to appreciate about Asian teachers. Some Asian teachers will talk on for an hour, hour and a half, two hours, because they're not afraid of offending anybody, they're not afraid of boring people, and they're not afraid of being disliked. There was this great unshakability that they all had. I believe that unshakability also comes from renunciation.

As we abide in this retreat setting and find our stability and contentment in a life of such great simplicity, we drop a lot of our attachment to the supports we may have thought were needed in our life outside. We find that actually consciousness can stand on its own, does stand on its own, unsupported, without foundation, without attachment. And it's very freeing. For me, it's been one of the great freeing experiences of the retreat life.

The Buddha talked about renunciation as one of the ten paramis. The paramis are qualities that he himself developed, it's said, over many lifetimes, once he made the vow to become a Buddha. He said the way he went about it was to develop these ten qualities, which are the paramis. They're qualities that we'll be speaking about a lot over the course of the retreat—qualities like generosity, virtue, metta, equanimity, truthfulness, determination, patience, wisdom, and renunciation as one of the ten.

They're qualities that when we cultivate them provide the force that actually liberates the mind. The mind really doesn't get liberated accidentally, but it gets liberated when we have accumulated enough wholesome force in the mind to free it. The Buddha said it's by the cultivation of the paramis that we generate that power, that force.

The paramis are intentions. They're mental factors that accompany action. Because of that, they're qualities that we can develop in daily life as well as in retreat. That's why for me as a layperson they're a really beautiful and inspiring list—because the practice of the paramis can go on throughout our life. It is not just a retreat practice.

In describing renunciation more fully as a parami, it's said in the tradition that the proximate cause for renunciation is a sense of spiritual urgency. It is that deep questioning and wanting to understand that leads us to renounce, that leads us to be in retreat, that leads us to give up some of the comforts. It's really at the core of a lot of the Buddhist tradition.

The Buddha was fond of saying to the practitioners, "There are these roots of trees, there are these empty huts—practice with diligence before it's too late." This comes in again and again in the suttas.

I wanted to share with you a little bit about this man who was a teacher in the Tibetan tradition. His name is Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche. He was one of the most respected Tibetan teachers of our time. In practice terms, he was on a par with the great heads of the school, such as the Karmapa and Dudjom Rinpoche, and in practice terms, even the Dalai Lama.

I'd like to read a letter that he wrote to his parents. This was written when he was thirteen years old:

"My dearest parents, you gave me birth with all the freedoms and advantages of human life and you have cared for me with love from my infancy till now."

Since you introduced me to an authentic teacher, it is thanks to your kindness that I have encountered the path of liberation. After hearing, thinking about, and meditating on the life of my perfect teacher, I have resolved to slip quietly away from all this life's concerns and roam through empty, uninhabited valleys.

Father and mother, stay in your handsome, lofty house. I, your young son, long instead for empty caves. Thank you for the fine, soft clothes you gave me, yet I don't need them. I would rather dress in plain white felt. I've cast aside this luxury and wealth with no regrets. A handbook of profound advice is all I wish to collect.

I leave this garden full of splendid flowers and head for the wilderness of overhanging cliffs alone. I need no attendants who just fuel anger and attachment. Birds and wild animals are the only company I long for. Although for now your son will hide away in mountain glens, your smiling faces will be with me always. Nor shall I forget your loving care. And if I reach the citadel of experience and realization, I shall repay your kindness. Of that you can be sure.

That was written when he was 13. When he was 15, he entered a cave and spent the next seven years in retreat, three years not speaking to anyone. When he left that cave, he went to a hut out in the wilderness. I have a photograph of the view—this is the site. I'll put this up on the bulletin board so you can see it later. You can see how this kind of retreat would help to develop a spacious mind. Just the sky and the mountains, the view from his retreat hut. He spent four more years in that retreat hut. In all, he spent 22 years in retreat. He became one of the softest, most gentle, and most loving teachers in the tradition that I know of. John had the good fortune to meet with him many times in Nepal during his life.

Now in our retreat situation, it's not a seven-year stint in a cave, thank goodness, but we give up a lot. We give up our partners, our friends, our children. We give up speaking. We give up our choice of food. We give up books and music and movies and television. We give up our roles in the world. When we come here, in our day-by-day actions, we're no longer mothers and fathers and wives and husbands and friends. We just come into the simplicity of our direct experience. It's a big giving up of this identity that we carry.

We give up our choice of food, although with meals like lunch today, I don't think that's much of a sacrifice. We say that the Buddha taught the middle path, but at Spirit Rock we've developed what we call the upper middle path. Welcome to practice in Marin County. Renunciate life takes on a different flavor with radiant heating and air conditioning. We have a very well-appointed cave to practice in. But there's still a lot of renunciation.

One of the beautiful spirits in the renunciate life, one of the great expressions of it, is this sense of taking and accepting what's given. I was a monk in Thailand for about a year, and that flavor pervades the whole of the monk's life. When you go out for your morning alms round, begging for food, you just take whatever anybody wants to put into your bowl. Sometimes it's things that you really like and look forward to. Sometimes it's things like three-year-old goose eggs that you wouldn't normally choose to eat if you had a choice. You simply take and eat what's offered. That's part of the practice.

A lot of my practice was at forest monasteries where the people around, the villagers, were quite poor. What they had to offer was not the finest. Sometimes the monastery would supplement it with their own food, and I think that was intentionally a little bit on the Spartan side because they didn't want people staying at that wat, at that monastery, unless they really wanted to be there to practice. That's what we figured out later. We thought, why is the food so bad here? Well, they're trying to put off people who might just be coming looking for a cushy place to hang out.

So it was one of the things we needed to live with. At the forest monasteries I stayed at, I only received one meal a day, served around eight o'clock in the morning. I could save a few things from that meal and eat until noon, but after noon there was no more eating for monks in those countries. Then there would be no food until eight o'clock the following morning. What you received at eight o'clock the next morning on an empty stomach sometimes wasn't that exciting. If you've never eaten red fish curry at eight in the morning on an empty stomach, you really haven't lived.

So it was a good practice. In Zen, they have a saying that the mouth of a renunciate should be like a furnace that can burn the finest sandalwood or dried cow dung with equal ease. Now, I don't think you'll be served the latter here, so don't worry about that. But developing this spirit of accepting what is given is a beautiful way to approach retreat life. Sometimes the food from the kitchen will be absolutely what you would have ordered in a restaurant—better than most. Sometimes it may not be exactly to your liking, but the spirit really is to accept what's offered in that spirit of simplicity.

I have to say, I got so hungry at night while living in these monasteries that I was reduced to a point of shamelessness I'd never experienced before. Do you know sweetened condensed milk? Those little tins of sweetened condensed milk? They were permitted to be added to tea after noon, but I never imagined I would find myself eating it spoon by spoon. Yet I did, because I was so hungry. It's part of the lifestyle.

Our accommodations weren't great either when we were monks. I would live for months at a time in these little huts up on stilts, about six feet by ten feet—just wide enough to sleep in, with space for my sitting cushion in the other part of the hut. But periodically we would be invaded by the creatures of the forest. Sometimes there would be attacks of ants that would start running up the pillars, swarming all over the cottage in a matter of ten minutes. If you've never seen an Asian ant attack in a tropical forest—there's nothing like it here. We'd go to work trying to sweep them off and keep them out of the house.

One evening, I got up in the middle of the night to go outside. I walked down my stairs, put my hand on the banister in the darkness, and got bitten by a scorpion. Another evening, just as I was preparing to sleep—I'd stretched out, turned off my light, it was about ten o'clock—I was covered by a mosquito net, so I thought I was safe. But underneath the mosquito net had crawled a poisonous centipede, which bit my foot. It was actually the most painful sensation I've ever felt, as though they had injected venom that caused the muscles to cramp incredibly. It didn't go away until the next morning.

Sometimes at night, around nine o'clock, I would hear the sound of my neighbor banging on his roof with a wooden pole. I couldn't see another hut from where I stayed, but there were huts scattered throughout the eighty acres of forest. I would hear this rhythmic banging: bang, bang, bang, bang, bang. After a while I realized what was happening. A poisonous snake had dropped from an overhanging tree onto his roof, and he was sitting in meditation when he heard it land. He was pounding his roof to try to get the snake off, because otherwise it would come over the eaves, crawl in underneath, and try to make a home in his hut.

This was some of the life we lived as monks there. Even though some of the rooms here are doubles, they don't look so bad to me in comparison. And the bathrooms are a lot cleaner too. But still, it's a renunciation.

Another big area of renunciation is around the schedule. This is a very interesting area, and I hope you'll all explore this with great consciousness during your time here. Each of us in the course of being here for three or six weeks will find our own personal relationship to the schedule. For some people, it's basically an outline of when the three meals are served, and the rest doesn't matter too much. For others, we approach the schedule with the kind of religious fervor we might bring to the words of the Buddha and follow it very closely.

And honestly, what works well for one person with the schedule might not work so well for someone else. So you really need to find your own way in relation to it.

But I'd like to put in a plug here for trying out, at least, surrendering to the schedule. It is a very powerful way to approach the retreat. If one simply surrenders and says, "When I hear a bell, if it's inside, I'm gonna walk. And if I hear a bell and it's outside, I'm gonna come sit," those are the only decision points, really, of the day. If you hear a bell, you know what to do next.

What's nice about that approach to the schedule is it keeps life really simple and it keeps the mind from getting involved in a lot of thinking. Because once you start making choices like, "Well, maybe I'll skip this walking period and have a cup of tea. And then would this be a good time to wash my socks, or the sweater that I want to wear in two days time?" Once those sorts of thoughts start creeping in, the whole day can kind of get filled up planning what we're going to do next, and it can get really complicated.

So I just encourage you to play with this. Try maybe just for a day—maybe when you're a little further into it—try and surrender to the schedule and see how it feels. Talk with your teacher about your relationship to it and see how it goes for you. It really can greatly simplify the thought process.

So why do we do this? What's the purpose of this kind of simplicity, this kind of renunciation? Well, first of all, we become unburdened. I think that's really at the heart of it. We become unburdened, and yet have you noticed how the days can seem really full, even though you're unburdened? I mean, there have been days in retreat I've been hard pressed to find twenty minutes to take a shower. I don't know if you've experienced that, but sometimes it seems like it's really busy here.

But when you look at it, apart from the work meditation, you only have one job all day long, and that is to be with your experience. That's really the only occupation that you have here. So looked at in that way, it gets really simple.

That sense of unburdening then really lets us focus on what's important. I came upon this from an Audubon magazine. This is written by a backpacker about his experience coming home from a backpacking trip:

"One moment I can lay everything I need on the corner of a poncho. The next moment, it seems, I couldn't fit all my furniture into a warehouse. Coming home, I can see that there are too many appliances in my cupboards, too many clothes in my closet, too many strings of duty jerking me in too many directions. The opposite of simplicity as I understand it is not complexity but clutter. Returning from a backcountry trip, I vow to purchase nothing that I don't really need, give away everything that is excess, refuse all chores that don't arise from central concerns. The simplicity I seek is not the enforced austerity of the poor. I seek instead the richness of a gathered and deliberate life, which comes from letting one's belongings and commitments be few in number and high in quality."

I think this is a lovely way to think about what we're doing here. Our commitments are few in number, but they're really high in quality. The Buddha said that this quality of present moment awareness, of paying full attention to our experience in each moment, is the single greatest gift we can give to ourselves, the single greatest source of virtue. So this unburdenedness is an important part of it.

There's another level though to renunciation that goes a little deeper. When the outer activities fall away, what really stands out are the workings of the mind and heart. And it's in the workings of the mind and heart that we understand the fact of suffering, the origin of suffering, and the end of suffering. So this is the deeper relevance of renunciation.

Somebody said in an interview, "Gosh, with all this quiet, what I really see clearly are all my own opinions and views and judgments," and they become really loud, don't they? When everything else is so quiet and there's nothing else to take our attention away, this internal chatter comes right into the foreground. That's what we need to see. We need to see where the mind is hanging on, where it's attached, and therefore where it can be free.

There's another book that's come out recently that I like a lot. It's called Cave in the Snow. It's about a woman named Ani Tenzin Palmo who is a Tibetan—well, she's a Westerner in robes as a Tibetan nun. She actually ordained in India with a Tibetan teacher when she was twenty-one years old in 1964, so a long time ago, and she's been ordained ever since then. She asked for years and years to get the teachings and to be able to go off and practice alone, but they weren't used to Western nuns at that time and nobody would allow her to do it.

Her teacher wouldn't give her the teachings and they wouldn't provide a place for her to go practice. She begged and pleaded and begged and pleaded, and finally she was given this space of a cave up at 13,000 feet in the Himalayas in India. She moved into the cave and stayed there for twelve years, summer and winter.

In the cave, she had one little wood stove, which she would only light at lunchtime to cook her noontime meal. You can imagine the snow outside. Sometimes the snow was so high that it went over the top of her cave. One time she actually had to tunnel out through the snow to get air. She had a front on the cave, so it wasn't just back in the cliff. Her lay supporters mudded up the front of it, so she was somewhat protected from the elements, but not completely.

She was in the middle of one three-year retreat—in the Tibetan tradition you're supposed to do three years, three months, and three days so that you really get three good years of practice. She was about three years in, hadn't spoken to anybody or seen anybody for three years, and an Indian policeman barged in her front door and told her that her visa had run out and she'd have to leave. How do you keep your equanimity in the middle of that?

She persuaded him to let her stay a little longer, but that's what eventually made her leave her cave. Now she's settled in the West, setting up a center in Assisi, Italy. She passed through Spirit Rock about a year ago, and I had a chance to meet her and have lunch with her. I told her how much I admired what she'd done, because I have a great respect for people who really live this renunciation—I know how difficult it is. She just said, very simply, "You know, it was just what I wanted to do. It was nothing special. It was just what I wanted to do."

There are many people who would hear that you are doing a three-week retreat or a six-week retreat and probably think to you, even if they don't say it, "My, you're so brave. How can you possibly imagine doing that? I could never do something like that. I have so much respect for what you're doing." For you, it probably feels like a stretch, but it probably also feels like just what you want to do. And that's beautiful.

The reporter who wrote this book on her life, obviously not a heavy-duty practitioner herself, said to Tenzin Palmo, "Well, wasn't it just an escape from life? You're going to this cave. Aren't you just avoiding the trials of real life?"

You know the answer to that one, don't you?

Tenzin Palmo replied, "Not at all. To my mind, worldly life is an escape. When you have a problem in daily life, you can turn on the television, phone a friend, or go out for a coffee. In a cave, however, you have no one to turn to but yourself. When problems arise and things get tough, you have no choice but to go through with them and come out the other side. In a cave, you face your own nature in the raw, and you have to find a way to work with it and deal with it."

I think this is really a great truth and one of the great strengthening aspects of a retreat, especially a long retreat. We gain so much self-confidence by being willing to come up against these difficult areas in ourselves and find that we have the strength to go into them, go through them, and come out the other side. We do this again and again in a long retreat.

Sometimes as we confront these difficult parts of ourselves—and the beautiful parts of ourselves too—the inner life becomes very vivid. You may notice this quite early on, that you start to get sensitive to nature, that things touch you really deeply. You may start to have really vivid dreams, and there can be a tendency to really want to go into the dreams because they seem so rich and meaningful.

Someone asked Joseph Goldstein this question on a retreat. She said, "You know, in this retreat, my dreams take on so much life and vitality. I really think I should analyze them because, as Carl Jung said, a dream unanalyzed is like a letter unopened."

Joseph replied, "Well, you know, when you're on retreat, it's a good idea not to open your mail."

So by and large, the dream life may get very vivid. It's probably most helpful to kind of leave it there. Leave it in the dream world. Once you wake up, just come back into the practice of this present moment.

Sometimes our emotional reactions get quite strong, even over little things. This is a phenomenon we call "yogi mind." I'm sure you've seen many times how we can make mountains out of molehills. Sometimes we lose a little touch with reality. One meditator in a retreat in Southern California asked the manager if they could please call the airlines and have them reroute the planes because they were flying over the retreat center and it was a little too noisy. Usually not possible.

When I went on retreat last fall for a six-week retreat at IMS in Massachusetts, there were a whole lot of issues related to Spirit Rock and the board that came up for me again and again in the early days of the retreat.

I spent many sitting periods writing letters to Arlene, our executive director, telling her what I thought should happen while I was in retreat. Fortunately, I refrained from ever putting them on paper, and Arlene, fortunately, never had to receive them. But I sure wrote a lot of letters in my mind about things that it seemed like my advice was just indispensable.

So when these impulses come, give them a little space. Don't act on them too quickly.

Sometimes we may get irritated with someone else who's on the retreat with us. It may be somebody who comes in late to a sitting or somebody who's sitting near us who's a very heavy breather. I was sitting next to someone at a retreat once whose breath was so loud I had to make a choice—I either followed his breath or mine. It was a hard choice.

Or somebody comes in and they keep wearing a really crinkly jacket and they're sitting near you and every time they shuffle it's rattle, rattle, rattle. And the temptation to write notes to one another gets really strong at this point of the retreat. It seems so important that you stop that person doing what they're doing. And so you write this note that says something like, "Dear fellow meditator, please leave that crinkly jacket out in the hall next time. Don't come in and do that again." And of course, they're always signed metta, right? I always sign metta, but the person who gets it of course reads it and feels the passion of the anger that really went into the note. And it can be really upsetting for people.

Getting a note in the middle of a silent retreat can be such a shock. You all know how sensitive you get in this setting. It can upset people's equilibrium for days. Really.

So one of the things I would really like to reinforce—Lynn mentioned it the other night—is to ask you please not to write notes to one another. I know you'll be thinking that you're doing it with all the loving kindness in your heart, and it's good for all sentient beings in the hall, and it really advances the cause of the Dharma. But please, if you're upset about a fellow meditator's behavior, please write the angry note to us and let us interact with them. It'll be much more helpful for everybody involved. In fact, if you'd like to write them to Eugene, that would be best. He's really good at dealing with that stuff.

All of this is really just part and parcel of the retreat experience. You could say in a way that this situation is kind of designed to bring the difficult stuff up into consciousness. If there's any material left in our minds, this setting will bring it forth. And that's actually a very good thing. Sometimes it may not feel like such a good thing, but it's actually a very good thing because what's held deep within us, we can never become free from. We can never find liberation in relation to what's deeply held. Only when it actually comes into our actual experience can we begin to understand it and release it through awareness.

So as we sit and we do this practice, basically taking up the meditation, we get one of two outcomes. Either we get the direct connection with the meditation focus—the breath or the body or sounds—and in that direct contact, the qualities of mindfulness and concentration deepen, deepen, deepen in a very steady way. So that's one possible outcome.

Another possible outcome is that we get the unresolved issues or accumulations that are the material of the mind, that are expressions of our holding of difficulties we haven't yet come fully to understand. And if that's the case, then these are the things that are hindering the deepening of awareness and of concentration, and it's in the understanding of these that the meditation actually deepens to the next level.

So in fact, both outcomes take place throughout the retreat for both of us. It's really not an either-or situation. Sometimes the mindfulness and concentration are developing very steadily because we can connect with the chosen focus. Sometimes we get the obstructions or what are sometimes called the hindrances, which Marie will talk about in a few nights. And then the meditation deepens by our understanding those processes and those forces.

Either way, whatever your experience is in that moment, what is happening is just what needs to happen for you. This is sometimes a really hard thing to trust in, but if you can trust in this, it will really help the unfolding of your process.

This unfolding is so organic and it's so individual. It's not something we can think out ahead of time. It's not something we can direct with our thoughts or beliefs. We have to surrender to the process of awareness and let it show us where we need to open and how we need to open.

If you look at a rose where it's in the form of a bud and all the petals are very closely overlapped and tightly tied around that bud, if you tried to open it with your mind and say, "Well first this petal needs to go and then this petal needs to go and then this," it would just become ripped apart. But in the unfolding of the bud, it knows exactly which petal needs to open next. And just one by one, the full beauty and richness of that rose becomes open to the world.

Our practice unfolds in precisely the same way. If you can trust in the rightness of both the mindfulness and concentration that arise, as well as the difficulties that emerge, this will provide tremendous support for your practice and confidence during the retreat.

When we don't trust in this natural process, we begin to believe that our aversion stems from external circumstances. We think we're actually suffering because lunch was five minutes late, or because the person next to us coughs during sitting meditation, or because the door rattles when someone arrives late to the hall. We may genuinely believe our suffering comes from these outer conditions.

But we fail to see that the force of aversion itself is what we need to understand, because that is the root of suffering—not the outer situation, but this reactive force within our mind that objects to what's happening.

The difficulties we experience here aren't actually peculiar to this retreat setting. Though the degree of renunciation can make it seem otherwise, making us feel we're suffering because we miss friends and family, because we can't go out, because we lack opportunities for intimate conversation, or because noises disturb us. But if we simply trust in this process, we'll begin to understand our minds more deeply.

During that six-week retreat, I found myself reacting strongly to various situations. Sometimes I disliked the weather—it was fall in New England, often rainy and cold, and I couldn't walk outside for days. Sometimes I disliked the food. I found myself deeply averse to walking meditation practice. For a while, I blamed each of these circumstances.

Then I began to notice something interesting: the same reaction kept arising again and again. It was the force of disliking, the force of negativity. I realized this was where freedom could emerge. When I thought the external situation should change, I could never transform my own mind. But when I recognized that the root of suffering lay in my own mind, ah—there was the possibility of freedom.

So I began looking directly at the aversion itself. I discovered it was transparent. Then I could be with the rain, and it was perfectly fine. I could be with the food—fine. I could be with the walking meditation—fine. The aversion would fade in and out, and I could see how it wasn't solid, but simply another layer of mind that could be seen through and released. There was tremendous freedom in this recognition.

Ultimately, the deeper sense of renunciation is an inner letting go. Through renunciation, we release our preferences, our need for experience to be one particular way or another. We could say we're letting go of our hopes and fears, our likes and dislikes, so that clear awareness can simply abide in the truth of the moment. That is the true place of freedom.

As we allow awareness to rest more and more in the truth of each moment, a greater sense of trust and peace becomes established within us. We discover a way of relating to life's changing conditions that isn't bound to the conditions themselves. We find a place of rest that is, in some way, independent of changing circumstances.

Having taken birth, we're all subject to the fluctuations of pleasure and pain—this is inescapable. But through practice, we begin to find another center of gravity: a state or dimension of peace, an absence of conflict that doesn't depend on changing conditions.

I'd like to close by reading a passage where the Buddha spoke about the quest he undertook in leaving home, and the fulfillment of that quest through his liberation:

"Then, friends, being myself subject to birth, having understood the danger in what is subject to birth, I attained the unborn supreme security from bondage, Nibbana. Being myself subject to aging, having understood the danger in what is subject to aging, I attained the unaging supreme security from bondage, Nibbana. Being myself subject to sickness, having understood the danger in what is subject to sickness, I attained the unailing supreme security from bondage, Nibbana. Being myself subject to death, having understood the danger in what is subject to death, I attained the deathless supreme security from bondage, Nibbana. Being myself subject to sorrow, having understood the danger in what is subject to sorrow, I attained the sorrowless supreme security from bondage, Nibbana. The knowledge and vision arose in me. My deliverance is unshakable. This is the last birth. There is no more renewal of becoming."

This is truly why we practice. This is the purpose of our renunciation: to simplify enough that we can discover that dimension of peace present even amidst all the changing conditions of birth and death.

Let's sit together for just a moment.

CHAPTER 214

Purification of the Heart

Guy Armstrong · 59 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the Buddha's summary of all spiritual teachings: "Do good, don't harm others, and purify the heart." He explores the Pali term citta, which encompasses both mind and heart, and how our attempts to control experience through the strategies of greed (lobha), aversion (dosa), and delusion (moha) create suffering. Drawing from the Visuddhimagga and stories of great teachers like Dīpa Mā, Armstrong explains how meditation naturally allows stored emotions and accumulations to surface and release. He describes the cyclical nature of practice—periods of calm followed by upheaval—and emphasizes that liberation comes not from eliminating difficult experiences but from meeting all states with warm, clear awareness. This open-hearted attention, he teaches, is the very functioning of our Buddha nature, transforming every moment of difficulty into an opportunity for awakening. The talk beautifully illustrates how mindfulness dissolves conditioning and purifies the heart, leading to the arising of generosity, loving-kindness, and wisdom.

I'd like to talk tonight about the purification of the heart.

There's a cartoon that was posted in the office at Spirit Rock. It's a cartoon on evolution that shows a fish rising up out of the sea next to a beach with a thought bubble coming from the fish's head saying, "eat, survive, reproduce." Then you see the next stage in evolution—a lizard-like amphibious creature—with the same thought bubble: "eat, survive, reproduce." The chain of evolution continues with a land-like reptile, then a chimpanzee clamoring about on the beach, each with the identical thought bubble: "eat, survive, reproduce."

And the culminating stage, of course, is the human being standing beyond all of them on the beach. This man is standing there with a very quizzical look on his face, stroking his chin and going, "Hmm, I wonder what life's all about."

It wouldn't be too hard, even if you were a serious observer of the world, to look around and see that we're so ruled as a race, as a species, by our fears and our desires, our wanting for food and sex and our fear about being able to survive or not. We could be forgiven for thinking that this really is where evolution has led us, that this is what we really are—unless we had some kind of other perspective on the situation, hopefully a more spiritual perspective.

The Buddha once summed up his teaching, and in fact all teachings, this way: "Do good, don't harm others, and purify the heart. This is the teaching of all the Buddhas, all the awakened ones."

It sounds simple put that way, doesn't it? What we are primarily about in our meditation, in being here, is this work of purifying the heart.

When the Buddha made this statement, of course, he didn't use the word "heart" because he wasn't speaking in English. He used the word citta, which is a word in both Pali and Sanskrit that sometimes we translate as "heart" and sometimes we translate as "mind." It has dual meanings—both the meaning of the emotional life that we normally refer to as the heart, and also the meaning of the world of thought or intellect that we refer to as mind.

If you ask an Asian where her mind is, she'll typically point to her chest. If you ask a Westerner where we feel our minds are, we normally point to our heads. So this word citta really refers to this unity of emotion and intellect. But because the emotional life is so predominant in the work of purification, I want to talk tonight about this as a process of purifying the heart.

As we look closely at our experience, we run into the basic problem that I think all humans are subject to: we try to control our experience. That effort to control our experience involves us in some degree of struggle because we want things to be one way and we don't want them to be another.

We want to come in and sit down and have the body be comfortable, not have a pain in the knee or a knot in the upper back or a clenched fist in place of the heart. We want all our meditations to be like Sylvia's description last night of the seven factors of awakening—mindful and investigative and energetic and rapture-filled, full of tranquility, concentration, and equanimity. We really want those experiences in our meditation, and we'd really rather they not be filled with what Marie talked about a few nights ago: the five hindrances.

We have these preferences on every level of our being, and so we tend to relate to all of our experience through three basic strategies that we've learned to kind of cope with the way things are. These are the strategies that the Buddha called greed, aversion, and delusion. He thought that these were so linked to our difficulties that he called them torments of mind. He called them the kilesas in Pali, often translated as defilements, but "torments of mind" is more accurate. We can see these strategies in the way we approach our life and our meditation both.

Acting out of the strategy of greed, what we try to do is keep pleasant experiences coming in. If we can surround ourselves with a never-ending stream of pleasurable experiences, there will be a kind of security in that. We'll always be able to be safe and protected. So this is a strategy of greed.

With aversion, what we try to do is keep anything that's painful or unpleasant at some distance from us, with the thought that if we can keep it away, then we'll protect this area that we call myself, and that will not be subject to the unpleasant in life.

The strategy of delusion is that we sort of create this veil between ourselves and our experience so that we don't have to feel it very clearly. We can use a fog or we can use a little bit of stepping back, a little bit of unclarity or confusion so that the world doesn't impinge on us quite so dramatically.

These are three ways that we have of basically avoiding the hot and cold, raw nature of life as it is, to soften the blows of the pleasant and the unpleasant that we're all subject to.

It's said in the Buddhist texts that each of us has a preponderance of one or the other of these strategies—that there are some people who are more conditioned by greed, some more by aversion, and some more by delusion. In Buddhist psychology, these are said to be the three main personality types that people get categorized into, if you're into that kind of thing.

I'd like to read you a little bit from an ancient text. This is from a book called the Visuddhimagga, which means "the path of purification." This idea is so central that one of the main commentaries is titled that. This book was written about fifteen hundred years ago in Sri Lanka by a monk named Buddhaghosa who tried to compile all the primary practices of his day.

It was very encyclopedic, very detailed. It gets a little dry in places—I don't recommend it as bedtime reading. It's about that thick.

So I'd like to just read you a little description in case you're wondering which of these three you are. This might help. He starts by describing the walking meditation of the three types:

"When one of greedy temperament is walking in his usual manner, he walks carefully, puts his foot down slowly, puts it down evenly, lifts it up evenly, and his step is springy. One of aversive temperament walks as though he were digging with the points of his feet, puts his foot down quickly, lifts it up quickly, and his step is dragged along. One of deluded temperament walks with a perplexed gait, puts his foot down hesitantly, lifts it up hesitantly, and his step is pressed down suddenly."

Now you might also want to know what the sleeping situation is like, so he goes into that:

"In sleeping, one of greedy temperament spreads his bed unhurriedly, lies down slowly, composing his limbs, and sleeps in a confident manner. When woken, instead of getting up quickly, he gives his answer slowly as though doubtful. One of aversive temperament spreads his bed hastily any which way. With his body flung down, he sleeps with a scowl. When woken, he gets up quickly and answers as though annoyed."

Recognize your roommate?

"One of deluded temperament spreads his bed all awry and sleeps mostly face downwards with his body sprawling. When woken, he gets up slowly saying, 'Huh?'"

This is the wisdom of the ages being revealed to you in these secret teachings. You might have a little reaction to this, like the person who was skeptical about channeling, who said, "Just because they're dead doesn't mean that they're smart." But enough for cynicism tonight.

So these forces of greed, aversion, and delusion are very prevalent in our moment-to-moment experience, in our daily life, in our retreat experience. The Buddha actually said that they are the roots of suffering. They are more or less synonymous with our human dilemma that leads us into suffering. In fact, he said to make an end of suffering without ending greed, aversion, and delusion—this is impossible, can't be done. They're really one and the same.

So we could say that the purification of the heart must mean to come to some degree of freedom around these tendencies of mind. This is the way out of bondage. Bondage is bondage to greed, aversion, and delusion. Freedom is freedom from these forces.

I was a little surprised that some of our politicians are learning to speak the language of bondage—hopefully with freedom also. This was a comment from a presidential hopeful. I'm sure you'll recognize the name: J. Danforth Quayle, who said that Republicans best understand the importance of bondage between mother and child. I never knew he had that much depth.

So we approach our experience with this intention of controlling, wanting things to be a certain way, and we act that out mentally, moment after moment after moment. But the problem is that our experience is basically ungovernable. Our experience is the unfolding of many, many conditions, most of which are outside our control. Not all, but many of which are outside our control.

And so we don't really have a way of controlling. Nobody has a handle on controlling what arises moment after moment. And if we're living from a strategy that wants to shape it a certain way, we will always be vulnerable. We really can't arrange the world to always be pleasant. That's the bad news.

The good news is that it is possible to become more and more free in relation to these forces of greed, aversion, and delusion. What we need to trust in, in approaching life as Dharma practice, in bringing a Dharmic understanding moment by moment, is that our freedom doesn't rest on making life painless. It doesn't rest on removing all the difficult experiences from living. It rather rests on being free in our response to life from these reactive tendencies of greed, aversion, and confusion.

So the possibility of the end of suffering isn't dependent on the outside world. It's really dependent on our inner awakening. That's really good news. Because as they say in the Tibetan tradition, we really have two approaches to ending the painfulness of life. One approach is that we could cover the whole world in shoe leather. The other approach is that we could put shoe leather on our two feet.

So which is more practical? We will never succeed in covering the world with shoe leather and removing those spikes and thorns and bumpy rocks. But we may succeed in covering our own two feet with shoe leather and being able to walk softly.

This unpredictability of life reveals itself in the most unexpected moments. I want to share a story from my last visit to Vancouver that illustrates this beautifully. I was teaching a weekend retreat on loving-kindness practice, and on Sunday afternoon, I created space for individual conversations since the large group format hadn't allowed for personal meetings during the weekend. Four or five people came forward for these brief one-on-one exchanges.

One woman approached and sat beside me, tears flowing from the moment she began speaking. In those few precious minutes, she shared her story, and I understood completely why she wept. The previous evening, after our Saturday practice had ended around five o'clock, she had gone out for a walk with a friend—a woman who had actually introduced her to the Dharma, a fellow meditator who had awakened her to practice.

They were walking together, heading to dinner, when her friend, who was about forty years old, suddenly collapsed from cardiac arrest and died that very evening. Despite this tremendous shock, this woman had returned to the retreat the next day because she felt it was the most healing place to be, and she continued with her practice. But the jolt to her system was enormous—and perhaps also a profound teaching on the unpredictability and uncontrollability of our experience. One moment you're walking with a friend, and a few hours later, she's simply no longer there.

This is the reality for all of us. Even the Buddha couldn't avoid such changes. When Sariputta, one of his chief disciples, died before him, the Buddha said it was as if the sun and moon had gone out of the sky with his passing.

Through our moment-to-moment relationship developed in meditation, we begin to recognize the uncontrollable nature of life. We see how our attempts to relate to experience through greed and aversion, through likes and dislikes, actually fill us with tension. These very efforts to control become a source of suffering. We start to see the limitations of our strategy and may begin to discover that peace comes when we're able to relax the controlling, even for brief periods.

In the beginning, there may not be whole hours or days that are primarily peaceful, but even these moments when the effort of greed and aversion subsides—when you feel restful and peaceful and calm, simply abiding within the moment—offer profound guidance. This really points to the third noble truth that Sylvia spoke about a few nights ago: the ending of struggle, the cessation of craving, of trying to shape things according to our preferences. It's a powerful indication of where happiness truly lies—in this purified heart that has not taken up the struggle, that in this moment is not engaging with the battle of likes and dislikes.

Some of you may have heard stories about Dipa Ma, a great Indian teacher born in Calcutta who suffered tremendous grief when she was quite young. She had four children and a husband, and in a very short period, her husband and several of her children died. This pitched her into despair—a bottomless well of grief she didn't know how to navigate. She said she essentially retired to her room and went under the covers for a year or more, so paralyzing was her grief.

Then someone suggested she try meditation—Vipassana in the same style we're practicing. She enrolled in a retreat with an Indian teacher named Munindra, and it turned out she had extraordinary aptitude for meditation. She once described how, when she first began walking meditation, she focused intently on the sensations in her feet—just lifting, moving, placing. Then she began to feel some friction around her foot, an unfamiliar sensation she hadn't expected. She continued walking, and the sensation persisted. When she finally looked down to see what it was, she discovered a dog that had bitten and fastened onto her ankle. But her attention was so concentrated, so unwavering, that this barely registered on her consciousness.

She continued developing her meditation, progressing very deep very quickly, moving through many levels of insight as well as concentration. She became one of the most developed people I've ever encountered. I was fortunate to spend about a month with her when she made her first trip to America—I had the privilege of looking after her and cooking for her.

She brought with her surviving daughter, Dipa, and her four-year-old grandson named Rishi. "Rishi" means seer or wise person, but I can assure you this boy was not particularly wise in the conventional sense. He was pure energy—quite wild, as four-year-olds can be, whether in the house or out shopping in the malls. Rishi was everywhere at once.

This situation became the perfect demonstration of Dipa Ma's equanimity. I never saw her flicker into even a moment of irritation with him. She remained completely balanced, completely peaceful, completely loving throughout. When someone once asked her what occupied her mind, she replied simply: "There are three things in my mind—peace, concentration, and loving-kindness."

She didn't even consider herself fully liberated. She thought she was still just on the path like the rest of us, a little further down the path perhaps, but she remained a practitioner. She still considered that she was developing. And yet she had this tremendous purity that I never saw waver. As Ryokan said, "When your heart is pure, all things in this world are pure."

This purification of the heart really transforms our relationship to life. One of the things we purify in practice is our intention. As we begin the practice, we may think that we want to shape our experience, to mold it to be a certain way. As our intention evolves, we become more and more accepting of a relation to experience that's not trying to shape it, but that is eager to learn from it.

So that's the shift that happens—we start to open up and become available to learn from our experience, not demanding that it be a certain way. We listen to our hearts, we listen to our bodies, we listen to our thoughts so that we can understand. And when we understand, then things are easier.

Sylvia told me about a lovely phrase from the Jewish prayer service that says something like, "May we purify our hearts so that we may truly serve." I think this is a beautiful inclination. When we become pure within ourselves, we're better able to help others. The Dalai Lama himself said that altruism by itself is a noble thing, but by itself it's not very powerful. It really needs to be joined with wisdom. And with wisdom and understanding comes the freedom from conflict. And then when that freedom is there, we're really better able to touch others, to help them.

As the factors of greed and aversion decrease, it's like two pans on a scale. As these decrease, the opposite qualities are increasing. So the opposite quality of greed, of this grasping nature, is said to be either generosity—this open-handed giving—or renunciation, relinquishment, simplicity. These are the transmutations of greed.

The quality of aversion goes in two different directions, related but a little dissimilar. One is loving-kindness. It's a basic shift. Instead of having an antagonistic relation to the world, the relationship becomes friendly. Or compassion, caring about others' suffering. Delusion clarifies into wisdom itself—it becomes clarity or seeing things as they are.

So these qualities of generosity, of love, and of wisdom are the fruits of the purification of heart. You could talk about it in terms of the decrease of the unwholesome or the increase of the wholesome. Either way, it's the same thing.

Sometimes it may seem like we focus a little too much on the negative here, and so I like one of the answers on the interview sheets. You know the question that says, "Have you ever had prolonged depression?" One of the meditators answered by saying, "No, but I've had prolonged happiness."

As we slow down through our practice and listen, our experience starts to unfold in a new way, as though it wants to talk with us, as though it wants to share things with us. Basically, one of the things that happens is some of the accumulations start to unfold themselves.

What do we mean by this accumulation? Throughout life, we've had experiences that have maybe been difficult to handle—something has happened either outside or inwardly, some emotion comes, some physical energy that's difficult to accept. A sadness or fear or rage, a sense of humiliation or shame, and we haven't been able to allow that experience to go through us. We've been scared by it, basically. In response, we've used various techniques to shut it off, to close to it, to keep from experiencing it.

When we stop that process partway through with some kind of contraction, what we do is we lock in that emotion that we were frightened of. It gets locked in often on a bodily level. It gets locked into the heart as well. So after going through twenty, thirty, forty, fifty years of life, we all usually have some storage of these feelings, these stored, suppressed feelings.

In the silence and with awareness, these energies that wanted to express themselves now have the space to do that. And so they start to come into consciousness. They start to be experienced. It may be in the beginning we just feel a little tightness in the body, maybe in the heart or the back, or contraction in the belly. And as we just stay with that with a gentle attention, it may open into some feeling of sadness or fear or anger. Sometimes that feeling will come just by itself. Sometimes it will come with a release of physical energy.

Sometimes there may even be memories—very clear memories of a situation or an event in our lives that come with the feeling.

We see that this leads to a natural cycle in practice: the deepening of mindfulness and concentration creates steadiness of attention and stillness, which invites the emergence of stored energy. This stored energy can be quite strong, and its release often feels chaotic. So this is a really common cycle in practice—to have deepening stillness followed by a period of upheaval, often one right after another.

It may feel like, "Gosh, I'm just starting to understand this practice. Things are finally calming down. I can stay with the breath, being with it consistently. It feels peaceful. I'm starting to get the hang of what they were talking about. Now I understand those instructions John was giving the other day—just stay with the body sensations. It's all coming clear now. I've got the hang of this meditation. The rest of these six weeks is just going to be a cruise."

Then that deeper connection with ourselves allows the release of some deeper material, and that experience is normally quite tumultuous. It feels like upheaval. Suddenly it's very difficult to connect with the breath. There are lots of emotions, lots of thoughts, lots of physical energy—just racing, racing, racing.

We think, "What did I do wrong? I had it just yesterday, or just the last sitting. I shouldn't have let myself have that daydream about the vacation I'm going to take in the summer. I shouldn't have allowed myself to linger over tea at lunchtime. I did something wrong that's making all this happen."

But it's really not like that. Actually, your steadiness is what gave the space for the stored material to emerge. So it's a really natural part of the practice.

During that time of upheaval, it may feel like the practice is just blown to the four winds. Concentration? Never knew it a day in my life. More than a breath at a time? Can't get to it. Just not happening. This is a time when it's easy to feel discouraged.

But if you just maintain your steadiness—and it may simply be being willing to sit and walk through the disturbance—what you'll find is that after a little time passes, the connection with the breath comes back. Calmness returns. You feel that steadiness again. The practice more or less puts itself back together.

So often when we're going through an intensive retreat, we experience these cycles where the practice really comes together and feels the best it's ever felt. It feels so easy, so effortless during these times. This is when you start thinking about signing up for the three-month retreat in Massachusetts in the fall, or going over to Burma to ordain as a nun the next time you have some time off.

Immediately following that can be what seems like the worst period of practice you've ever had. These cycles may keep repeating. And of course, in those really difficult times: "Is my car still running? Am I going to be able to get a getaway vehicle together to get out of this place? Do I need to call my house sitter to tell him to vacate because I'm coming back tonight?" All plans to leave start flooding in.

This is such a good training ground because both phases present real challenges. In the periods where practice seems easy and flowing and effortless, we really get to discover what the sweetness of meditation can be like. We taste some of the fruits of the sustained attention we've cultivated. We know that potential of real peace and real clarity—being able to see things as they truly are, so rich and satisfying.

But we also have to be aware that sometimes the biggest obstacle to mindfulness is pleasure. I don't know if you've noticed this. When I sit down at lunch and take the first bite of a really good meal—

I space out like no time else in the day. As soon as I get a really pleasant taste, I forget to taste anymore. It's like, "Oh, this is so great," and I'm off somewhere in some pleasant thought escapade.

The same thing happens with sitting. When the calm and the peace and the concentration and connection to the breath arrive as these unexpected visitors, we might think, "This is what meditation is supposed to be like. Now I don't have to work so hard at being with the breath. I can just settle in and enjoy this because it's happening naturally and it feels so good."

It's really important, even in times that feel good, to sustain the mindfulness moment by moment—still to put in that effort of connecting with the breath, with the sensations.

When you get into the tumult, then it feels like nothing can connect. It feels like the meditation has dissolved. What's the point? Why should I try? At those times, it's still helpful to keep coming back and connecting with the present, but you may not be able to do it in a very precise way. Connecting with one breath may not be possible. Seeing one thought may not be possible because they're going by like a waterfall—too fast, too furious.

So at times like that, that's okay. Connect with a more panoramic understanding of the situation and just feel it as restlessness. Feel it as confusion. Just make space in the mind for this experience of tumult, of the waterfall, and then you're connected with your experience just as it is. Don't worry about being precise. Trust that if you just keep staying present, the calmness and balance will return.

And really what you gain from all those cycles, again and again, is a greater and greater sense of equanimity—seeing the pleasure and the pain, the easy times and the hard times as just two halves of what meditation has to offer. You start to trust that every time you get lost, you know you'll get found again. And every time you get found, you can be pretty sure you're going to get lost again—and it's okay. Both halves of that cycle are all right.

So don't feel that you have to hold on really tightly to one or that you have to be afraid of the other. Start to recognize that these are the two faces of retreat practice, of meditation as it unfolds in its depths. We gradually, over time, just get more and more trust that that process is a good one—that it strengthens us, that it heals us, that it opens us, that it purifies us.

This is from Rumi: "This being human is a guest house. Every morning a new arrival. A joy, a depression, a meanness. Some momentary awareness comes as an unexpected visitor. Welcome and entertain them all. Even if they're a crowd of sorrows who violently sweep your house empty of its furniture, still treat each guest honorably. He may be clearing you out for some new delight. The dark thought, the shame, the malice—meet them at the door laughing and invite them in. Be grateful for whoever comes, because each has been sent as a guide from beyond."

This is so true. Each can be seen as a guide from beyond because they are our opening. When we turn our attention to the breath or sensations, to the present moment, we get one of two outcomes. We either get the connection to the present moment with clarity, or we get an obstruction to that present moment awareness. Either one is just where we need to learn. It's just perfect in that moment. So being open to both is really, really helpful.

Now some of these accumulations come in a way that we struggle with them. Mostly they come in a way that we struggle. And sometimes we struggle in a way that we actually draw the noose tighter. This is when we're in a situation that's described as a knot. A knot is basically created when there's a kind of energy coming up in us that we can't open to, but we meet with the same kind of response.

A good example is fear. If fear comes into your practice and you're afraid of it, what happens? The fear builds into a kind of crescendo. It's created this knot of fear that we don't see a way out of.

I was doing a long period of metta practice last fall. Doing the metta practice intensively over a period of some weeks is basically a concentration practice. Insights come also, but because you're returning to the phrases and the metta again and again, it's largely strengthening the factor of concentration. I talked to a lot of friends who'd done the practice—I'd done it myself—and some of my friends, their concentration just seemed to keep deepening in a very steady and gradual way. My experience had always been that my concentration deepened for a while, and then I'd go through this period of upheaval.

And then it would settle down, just the cycle that I've been describing. I started to notice that what happened was because I wasn't so comfortable or familiar with the metta practice, when I got into the upheaval period, I couldn't trust that it was okay for that to happen. So when I got agitated, I got worried that I was getting agitated. And of course, that just made me more agitated. I really struggled with it.

Over time, I started to trust: oh, that agitation will pass. It's okay. Just let it come and let it go. But as long as I was getting worried about it, I was just prolonging it.

So in working with these uprushes of energy from accumulations or from knots, the skillful thing is just to be with them in a very open and accepting way. Sounds easy. I know it's not.

If we can be there with a clear attention that's not moving toward it—why would we move toward it? Because we can make of this untying a project. We can actually see our meditation as being primarily about the loosening of these accumulations. Then we might get invested in the uprushes of energy. We might get invested in the knots even, and think that if I'm having the opening of the accumulations, my practice is unfolding as it should. That can become our central purpose.

Actually, the unfolding of the accumulations is just a byproduct in meditation. It's just a byproduct of awareness. It's not the central path to liberation. So as long as we're involved in that as our main project in meditation, then we might miss out on the deeper pointings to freedom, to the essence of liberation.

Also not moving away. Of course we tend to move away because these are difficult energies—the energies of anger or fear or sadness or shame. So we want to find that middle path that's not moving toward out of making an agenda, that's not moving away out of resistance or fear, but an awareness that can clearly be there with these difficult states of mind and body and just allow them to express themselves.

Someone came in today to an interview and was talking about a real shift in relationship to these energies. The person said, "You know, I struggled with these upheavals for a long time and I finally got it that I could just be with it in a really spacious way." He said, "Now it's like the lights are on, but nobody's home. There's just the energy unfolding itself." And when that happens, you can trust in the Dharma to unfold it in the most skillful way possible.

The lights are on but nobody's home. If these difficulties arise and we don't make a big deal out of them, we don't hold on to them, we don't cling, we could say that they self-liberate. They arise and like everything that arises, they pass away.

This self-liberation is described in one tradition as like a snake that's coiled up and just uncoils itself. It's also described as like writing on water—it just passes without a trace. No big deal, really easy. But if we get involved in grasping, either because we're resisting or because we want to fix things and help the project along, then we get tangled. That's how the tangle gets created.

Well, basically in relation to these states, to be there with full awareness—a keen awareness and interest is crucial—but then to kind of take the hands off the steering wheel and surrender. This movement of surrender is a movement that we can do in any moment of practice.

Krishnamurti had this beautiful phrase. He said, "The first step is the everlasting step." And I think you could say that this movement to surrender is an everlasting step in our practice. Because when we get out of the way, then we put our whole trust in the hands of the Dharma. And the Dharma knows what to do. The Dharma knows how to unfold the situation.

So in our practice, can we start to know when we're reacting to what is with trying to control through greed, aversion, or delusion? Can we also know the states of non-greed, of non-aversion, of non-delusion? Be aware of how they feel. Be aware of their impact.

There are really simple teachings around these states of mind. I was visiting some friends over Christmas, and my friend who's a meditator called her daughter and then spoke to her granddaughter. The granddaughter came on the phone and said, "Oh, Nana, I got a lot of really good presents this Christmas. You should see it, Nana. A lot of presents under the tree."

And her grandmother said, "Well, now that you have all those, does that make you happy? Or do you feel like you want more?"

The little girl said, "Oh, Nana, I'd like to have more."

And he said this went on for about 20 minutes. Then I realized this turtle was teaching me something. When I was just sitting peacefully with both the calm states and the painful memories, both were fine—I could be present with either. But when I reached for the peaceful states, when I tried to grasp them or hold onto them, they disappeared, just like the turtle withdrawing into his shell.

This is such a beautiful teaching about non-attachment. When we try to grasp the pleasant experiences, even the most wonderful meditative states, they slip away from us. When we try to push away the difficult experiences, we create more suffering for ourselves. The practice is really about developing this quality of awareness that can be present with whatever arises—the turtle coming out of his shell or the turtle withdrawing, the moments of peace or the moments of pain.

This is what we call equanimity—not a bland indifference, but this wise and compassionate balance that recognizes both pleasure and pain as part of the human experience. In the Pali teachings, this quality is called upekkha, this beautiful balance of heart and mind that neither grasps after what we want nor pushes away what we don't want.

So in your own practice, notice this tendency to reach for the pleasant states. Notice how when you try to manufacture calm or create bliss, those very states become elusive. And notice too how when you resist the difficult emotions or thoughts, they tend to become more solid and persistent. The practice invites us into this middle way—being fully present with whatever is arising in this moment, whether it's the turtle's head emerging from the shell or retreating back into safety.

This doesn't mean we become passive or that we don't take appropriate action when needed. But there's a difference between wise action that comes from understanding and reactive grasping that comes from wanting our experience to be different than it is. The turtle taught my friend about the difference between these two ways of engaging with life.

He said, "At that moment, I got it. Opening and closing are just part of life. The turtle is showing me that being open isn't always the right way to be. Sometimes being closed happens or is appropriate. And I saw that with my own heart. I need to be allowing of these cycles where my heart opens and my heart closes, and it's all just a part of the natural flow."

So he shifted into that more allowing kind of panoramic relationship to the openings and closings, and he said that it brought him a much deeper sense of freedom in relationship to them.

Remember that life is relationship. There's our present moment experience and then how we're relating to it. And these two factors keep interplaying with one another. They condition one another. In tuning into our present moment experience, we may find sometimes it's nice, sometimes it's not so nice. Look at then how we relate. That's the more important piece.

I was sitting, again, extended period of retreat, one of my teachers was Sharon Salzberg, and Sharon said something in the Dharma hall one day that I'd probably heard a dozen times before, I'd probably said a dozen times before, but she said it and it really struck me. She said, "It doesn't matter in this practice what you're experiencing. What matters is how you relate to it."

That's a really radical statement. And that is the view of this meditation. It doesn't matter what our experience is, whether it's joyful, delightful, happy, open, or if we're experiencing some fear, some anger, some sadness and terror. The important thing as relates to the practice is: how are we relating to that moment?

If we can bring into that moment this warm and clear attention—because that's really what mindfulness is. Mindfulness truly is free of greed, aversion, and delusion, and therefore has this basic warmth, has this heart quality to it. That's the transforming factor. That's the liberating factor.

It actually doesn't matter so much whether your practice of mindfulness is developing on difficulty or developing on ease. The Buddha said there are four different types of meditators. There are ones who go swiftly with pleasure. There are those who go swiftly with pain. There are those who go slowly with pleasure. And there are those who go slowly with pain. I will tell you right now, I'm in the fourth category.

It really doesn't matter because the liberating factor is this open-hearted attention that we bring to whatever our experience is.

Why is it liberating? This is a question that really grabbed me after a while. Why is this open-hearted attention fundamentally liberating? The clearest way I know to say it is that it is the functioning of our Buddha nature. We've talked a few times about this deep dimension of ourselves, which is timeless, as John was saying this morning, which is unstained and unsullied, which is fundamentally pure—pure beyond any possibility of impurity.

The activity of this Buddha nature is mindfulness. As we become mindful moment after moment, what we are doing is basically giving birth to our own awakened nature. We are bringing forth the awakened mind moment after moment after moment.

When we shine it on an area of difficulty, we transform that moment. Even though the experience in the moment may be of sadness or hurt or anger or fear, when we meet it with this warm, clear attention, we're bringing the wholesome alive in that moment. So you cannot say that a meditator who's working with mindfulness is only in an unwholesome state. The awareness itself is a powerful, wholesome element in that moment and transforms over time those feelings.

As we bring forth more and more this open and spacious, essential nature, all the accumulations, all the knots, all the karmic conditioning basically dissolves in it. The Buddha said that the fetters, the difficulties, rot in mindfulness, the same way that the ropes and sails of a seagoing vessel rot in the sea air, the salt water, the wind, and the sun. They simply decay because this nature is so fundamental that nothing can stand up to it. It has the possibility of absorbing and dissolving every structure that it's presented with.

This is the alchemy of our practice. In meeting these difficult emotions, difficult states of mind, bringing this wholesome and warm attention to them, we transform that difficult moment into a moment of activating the awakened nature. This is pure magic. How can we bring forth enlightenment in the middle of difficulty? Just by paying clear and warm attention, moment after moment.

So we find our freedom not in getting rid of the difficult emotions, but in bringing out this deeper dimension of ourselves, which is open, accepting, spacious, and friendly, until there are no more corners of the mind that we can't meet with that kind of openness and that kind of acceptance. In the mind of the Buddha, there are no more rough edges that can't be opened to.

For us, every rough edge is another opportunity to open and move one step closer to Buddhahood.

As one of my Tibetan teachers said, the sacred point of our practice is the liberation of confusion.

I'll close with a quote from Gampopa, who was a disciple of Milarepa. This is a prayer, and it doesn't so much matter who it's directed to. It could be directed to the teacher, to the Buddha, to the Dharma, or anywhere you feel appropriate. These are called the Four Blessings of Gampopa:

Grant your blessings so that my mind follows the Dharma.
Grant your blessings so that my Dharma practice becomes the path.
Grant your blessings so that the path clarifies confusion.
Grant your blessings so that confusion dawns as wisdom.

Let's sit for just a moment in the beauty of this teaching.

CHAPTER 215

The Three Characteristics

Guy Armstrong · 57 min

In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the Buddha's core teaching on tilakkhana—the three characteristics that define all conditioned existence. Drawing from personal experiences and retreat observations, he explores anicca (impermanence), showing how everything from relationships to mental states constantly changes. He discusses dukkha (unsatisfactoriness), explaining why seeking security in impermanent phenomena inevitably leads to suffering. Finally, he investigates anattā (not-self), questioning our conventional sense of an ongoing, continuous self.

Armstrong references the Satipatthana Sutta (MN 10) and shares teachings from Thai master Ajahn Buddhadāsa on the eighteen āyatanas (sense bases). He illustrates these profound teachings through accessible examples—from retreat experiences to nature's cycles of life and death. The talk emphasizes how understanding these three characteristics points toward non-clinging awareness, where genuine peace may be found. Rather than bitter truths to accept, Armstrong presents these insights as liberating wisdom that frees us from futile attempts to find lasting security in the changing world.

I often ask people at the start of interviews, as a warm conversational gambit, "How's the retreat going?" Most people respond by telling me how the retreat's going. But every once in a while, the question just strikes someone dumb. They simply say, "Ah," because when you think about it, it's really a hard question to answer.

Usually it's been four days since I've seen somebody, and in those four days the retreat has gone every which way for people. It's difficult to edit your experience of four days down to one or two sentences to offer to a teacher. Of course, this problem gets compounded many times when you leave the retreat, whether it's three or six weeks later, and you go home. All the people who have missed you ask, "Gosh, how was your retreat?" How do you edit down three or six weeks of some of the most intense experience of your life into a conversational gambit?

So I want to give you a tip—this is the secret teaching. What I usually do is just say, "It was great." That's usually all they want to hear, so the conversation wraps up and we move on to the basketball scores or something like that.

The quickness of change in retreat is really one of its most striking features. Mental states come and go. The body feels good, then it feels bad. Energy is up one day, then we're sleepy the next—always in flux. This is sometimes frustrating, but the Buddha talked about it as one of the most important areas of learning in our whole lives.

When he described the way things are in this life—the nature of things—he talked about three characteristics of everything that exists, everything that comes into being. These three characteristics he described as impermanence, the quality of unsatisfactoriness or suffering, and the quality of selflessness or not-self that pertain to all things that arise. I think of these three as the facts of life for grownups. So given that we're all adults, this is a good topic for us to look into.

In Pali, these three are called anicca for impermanence, dukkha for unsatisfactoriness, and anatta for selflessness. These are the three qualities of things I'd like to look into tonight.

Regarding impermanence, the Buddha said, "Foremost among footprints is the elephant's. Foremost among reflections is that on impermanence." He considered it one of the highest areas to learn about in the whole realm of Dharma. So no matter what our experience is, if we tune into this simple truth, we can remind ourselves: whatever I'm experiencing, this too shall pass. The Buddha commented that there's great wisdom in that knowledge, in that reflection.

When we look at the world and what we as humans get up to in the world, it seems like we spend a lot of our time and energy trying to find some security. It's as though we recognize our vulnerability and look for some form of security, something lasting that we can rest upon in life. One of the main areas we look to is personal relationships. Often the sense is that if we get this part of our life together, it will solve a lot of problems.

This reminds me of a number of years ago when I went on an extended meditation retreat—a two-month period. I had a partner at that time who decided not to go on the retreat but chose instead to stay home and get involved with a spiritual scene near our home. There was this teacher operating very much in a guru style who demanded a lot of devotion and surrender.

I started the retreat, which was very much like this one—a silent retreat of sitting and walking. I entered with a great deal of confidence, thinking, "This relationship is really the bedrock of my life. This is the most solid thing in my life. I'm really grateful for it." I should have recognized there was a little red flag going up in my consciousness, but I didn't.

I completed the retreat, practicing quite intensively as you all are here. You're beginning to get a sense that you become a little sensitive in these settings. Little things that might just be a pebble dropping in the pond in outer life have huge ripples when your mind gets quieted down.

So like you, I came out of my two-month retreat very open, very vulnerable. I called my partner as I got out and asked, "How are you doing?" I found that she had become very involved in this other scene and had gone through a big surrender to this guru. When I heard that, my stomach started tying up in knots. I felt a huge wave of anxiety come over me because I had seen many couples get involved in this scene, and every time—whether one or both of them were really into it—the relationship had fallen apart. I've observed that scene over many years now, and that's still the case with that particular scene.

So as I started to realize what was going on, I felt like the bottom had fallen out of my life. Where there used to be a stomach, there was just a yawning abyss. I felt a huge amount of insecurity arise because this foundation of my life was being shaken. I didn't know if the relationship was going to survive this hurdle.

Looking at that scene, if you don't mind my being a little catty, I really believe there was an expectation from this guru that anyone in relationship with him would have no other love but him. I honestly believe that's why he forced people to cut away their relationships. I could see this in our future, could see us heading that way. And I felt very anxious for quite a while.

It was still some time before I was due to return home, and over that whole period, I just felt ungrounded, insecure, fearful, nervous. When I finally got home, we went through a lot of conversation, as you can imagine. I did a little bit of deprogramming, and my partner at the time decided to move away from the guru and basically reenter the Vipassana fold, which as you know is warm and friendly and completely non-threatening, very supportive of relationships. So we carried forward for some time longer.

But it was a really clear teaching to me of the impermanent nature of things—even something in which I had put a lot of faith and store. And also a real teaching about the attachment I had formed and how upsetting it was to have it questioned. It hadn't even gone away; it had just been questioned, and I felt like the bottom had fallen out.

So we look in many areas of our life to find some way to avoid feeling this kind of anxiety, to find security through relationship, through family, through our jobs, through friendships, through possessions, through having a nice home. In one way or another, we often spend enormous time trying to make sure those stay in some kind of order.

There's even a project that emerged in the 80s and 90s called "Getting My Life Together." It's become a new project because we have so many pieces we want to weave together—relationship, practice, being away for long periods of time hoping your partner's there when you get home, being away from work for long periods hoping there are still people who want to hire you when you return, family, children, and so on.

We're always hoping to put all these pieces together in some configuration where they'll snap into place and stay that way forever. I'll report from my own experience: it hasn't happened yet. There are many beautiful things happening in my life, and there's always something that seems a little out of balance.

A simple example: I started teaching in 1984 in England, moved to the States in 1988, and put teaching aside for five years while I worked in the corporate world. I worked for Microsoft—before they got hit with antitrust charges. I know there are many Apple lovers in the dharma community. It was after I left that it all went downhill.

I came back into teaching in 1994, about five years ago. Being a new teacher in the States, I felt incumbent to go to places the established teachers weren't so crazy about going, like North Dakota in the middle of February. I was accepting all invitations, and I found I was traveling too much, away from home too much, away from my relationship. It was exhausting.

Just in the last couple years, I've started cutting down on travel. Since Spirit Rock is now here, I'm looking forward to spending more time at home. Well, just as I'm becoming more of a homebody, my wife Sally is getting into the teacher training program with Jack Kornfield, and now she's going to be the one going to North Dakota in February and being away. Eugene is spiriting her off to St. Louis to teach with him in a couple of months.

So just as one part comes into balance, often another slips out. Putting it all together may never happen—another feature of impermanence. We have to learn to flow with these changing conditions all the time. And what better place than a retreat where conditions change as quickly as the weather? It's such a perfect metaphor for this retreat—one day rain, one day sun. One day rain, one day sun. It's really a great reminder.

One of the changing conditions that we all live with is the body and the aging that the body goes through. One of my friends started to go quite bald in his twenties, and it was a blow to his vanity. But he said actually the most difficult thing about it was that when he washed his face and got to his forehead, he didn't know where to stop.

For myself, balding hasn't been my problem, but the coloring has been my problem. This coloring started to go when I was about thirty-five, and I thought I was still quite a young man. I was at a gathering somewhere, and I got up and walked away, and the guy who was sitting next to us, who we didn't know, turned and asked my friend, "Oh, who was that man?" And she said, "What man?" And he said, "That middle-aged man who was sitting next to you."

I just couldn't believe it. Middle-aged at thirty-five. So I've been dealing with that one ever since, and now it sort of fits. It's okay. Dealing with the changes in the body.

And of course, we all know where those changes are heading. The Buddha talked about it often. Aging leads to illness, and illness leads to death. So in the Buddhist tradition, this reflecting on aging and death is really an integral part of the practice. In the Satipatthana Sutta, which is the cornerstone of our meditation practice, the Buddha gives a number of reflections that he offers to practitioners as an integral part of the practice—to reflect on their own body after death, to reflect on our own corpse in various stages of decomposition and decay. This awareness of our own mortality is really integral to the practice.

And you know, it's something that I think we need a little bit of encouragement to reflect on. You may have heard about this poll. They polled people in America and asked them what was the scariest thing in their lives or in their thoughts. Fear of death came in number four. Number one was speaking in public.

Now that could be a statement of great courage on the part of the American people. But I somehow suspect that it's more a function of deep denial—that we just aren't comfortable holding this thought of our own death. It's frightening. It's sad. It's something that as a culture we spend a lot of time avoiding.

I was doing a long personal retreat a couple of years ago, and this reflection came up really strongly for me. One of the things that I realized in thinking about this is that my own death seems accommodatable. It seems manageable. It seems holdable. But what really touched me was the reflection that at some point in the future, I will probably witness Sally's death, or Sally will be there witnessing my death. And that for me carried even more sadness than just the idea of my own dying.

The Buddha said that in many ways, death is like this great mountain that's rolling over the landscape toward us and obliterating everything in its wake. And he asked the question: what can one do in the face of this kind of situation, the oncoming inevitability of death? And his response was the only thing to do is to practice the Dharma, to live with as much calm as we can, and to do good. This is really the crux of life in the face of our death. Fortunately, you're in just the right place for this instruction.

The Tibetans say that impermanence has four ends: The end of birth is death. The end of coming together is separation. The end of accumulation is dispersal, and the end of all building is destruction. We get so involved with all the things of this world and of our lives that sometimes we forget this.

This is from an ancient Indian sutra: Some children were playing beside the ocean. They made castles of sand, and each child defended his castle and said, "This one is mine." They kept their castles separate and would not allow any mistakes about which was whose. When the castles were all finished, one child kicked over someone else's castle and completely destroyed it. The owner flew into a rage, pulled the other child's hair, struck him with his fist, and bawled out, "He has spoiled my castle. Come along, all of you, and help me to punish him as he deserves." The others all came to his help.

They beat the child with a stick and then stamped on him as he lay on the ground. Then they went on playing in their sandcastles, each saying, "This is mine. No one else may have it. Keep away. Don't touch my castle."

But evening came. It was getting dark, and they all thought they ought to be going home. No one now cared what became of his castle. One child stamped on his. Another pushed his over with both hands. They turned away and went back, each to his home. And that night, the tide obliterated all traces.

So we look at the outer situation, seeing this fact of change and mortality, and realize that there isn't anything lasting to hold onto. And perhaps from that understanding, we come to meditation practice.

There's a terrific promise in meditation practice—the promise of release, of freedom. It's an interesting promise because our understanding of the end of meditation practice, which the Buddha called right understanding, one of the factors in the Eightfold Path, evolves as we practice. All the path factors develop as we practice the path. Right understanding evolves likewise.

When we come into meditation practice, we may think that the Third Noble Truth, which the Buddha expressed as the end of suffering lying in the end of craving, actually says that lasting happiness is found in the end of craving. When I came into practice, as Eugene said, confessing my delusions, I came looking for the security through meditation that I wasn't able to find through outer circumstances—thinking that I would find some way, some state of mind that I could put together through meditation that would last and keep me in a permanent state of happiness and well-being.

Actually, what the Third Noble Truth is pointing to is something a little more subtle. It's pointing to the end of suffering, but it doesn't say what form that takes. As time has gone on, I've come to feel that the Third Noble Truth is not pointing to a static mental state of unending happiness seen as a particular way of being, but rather to an equilibrium and a peacefulness that can be present in any form of experience.

So when I came in, I was definitely looking for a fixed kind of security through meditation. As I've practiced, my understanding of that has changed a bit.

Someone actually asked the Buddha, "For someone who is completely enlightened, do they dwell in a perpetual state of well-being?" The Buddha said, "Of one who has become fully awakened, there is nothing by which they can be measured. There is no static state by which such a person can be defined."

In retreat, as we begin to explore, we see that we're really involved in a microcosm of life here. Just as our outer life has changed, the inner life here has also changed. Sounds, breath, thoughts, all coming and going. Emotions and states of mind rapidly changing.

One of the most interesting areas to open up, and several of you have talked about this in interviews, is looking closely at the experience of the body at this point in the retreat. Normally we take the body as something really solid. If there's anything that's going to be dependable and lasting and that we can count on, here it is—the body. We remember from our third grade health textbooks peeling off one layer to find the bones, peeling another layer to find the arteries and the internal organs, and it all seems very complete, very fixed.

But a curious thing happens when we actually explore with our awareness in the deepest intimacy that we can have with this body—we get a different picture. We start to touch the bare actuality of our physical nature and see that there is nothing solid in the experience, but rather just pulsing, changing vibrations, sensations, flux throughout this whole field.

This is a very liberating insight. We take the leg as something solid, but when we look closely, we see that all the sensations are just rapidly blinking on and off. There's nothing fixed here, but a whole field of change. Some people actually experience the body seeming to dissolve in a sitting, just held in the space of awareness.

Impermanence can also show itself in a project of trying to get our practice together or keep our practice together. I did this a lot in the early years when I was doing retreats. I would think that I couldn't really start to meditate until my body was free of pain, until it was clear of tension or knots or holding. So if I'd find an area that was tight in my body, I'd direct my attention there. Over time, I got somewhat skilled with some concentration, some mindfulness in bringing change into that sensation. If I could stay with it long enough, I could open it up. I could sort of tap into the vibratory nature. I'd work on that one and get it a little bit open. Then maybe there'd be another holding over here. So I'd go work on that for a while.

And after, you know, half a day or so, I'd actually experience some ease and flow and openness in the body. And then I could settle down and meditate. That would last about one sitting. The next sitting I'd come back and it would all have gone scrunch. It would all have contracted again. Why? Because the mind that caused contraction had never been really looked at. As long as the mind is going to contract around greed or aversion, the body will follow. I was trying to untangle the body without looking at the source, which is the mind. It was a very fleeting and temporary fix. I spent a lot of time doing it and I would have been a lot better advised to just live with some degree of tension and instead relax into the experience. It would have been a much smarter thing to do. It took me years to learn it, so I'm offering it to you as a shortcut.

The body keeps changing, goes from comfortable to uncomfortable. Nature is a great teacher about impermanence. The lovely thing about being in this setting is that you can spend a lot of time outdoors and let that truth of nature's change come into your bones. The Buddha really encouraged the nuns and monks to live simply in nature, to live close to nature, because then the teachings of change just come into our marrow. We see in nature how the clouds are always coming and going, the planets are shifting, the phases of the moon we stay in touch with when we're on a retreat like this. Whereas in city life, we might go weeks and not even know what phase the moon is in. We see life and death living close to nature.

We were practicing here in November, the old students retreat. And one evening during the dharma talk, there was this heart-wrenching scream from outside. We didn't know what it was, but when we went to look later, there was a dead deer. It had apparently been attacked by a dog or a pair of dogs that had gotten onto the land. It was a small deer, and by the time we reached it, it was already dead. Probably its neck had been broken. It was a young deer. So a number of us gathered around and sent it metta for a while. After doing that, a lot of people came by and looked at the deer and reflected on its passing, sent metta. Then it was moved out of the retreat area.

Actually, the Humane Society was supposed to come pick it up. The caretakers moved it so they could come pick it up, and they never came. So over the next days, you could actually observe what was happening to the deer's body, and it disappeared in fairly short order. There are a lot of vultures here, as you may have noticed. The birds with the really big wingspans that you see around a lot, circling and gliding—they look like hawks from a distance, but in fact almost all of them are turkey vultures. They're eaters of dead flesh, carrion eaters. The way you can tell a turkey vulture is that its wings go up in kind of a V, whereas hawks' wings are much more horizontal when they fly or glide. So most of the big birds you see circling here are actually vultures.

So the vultures had done their work at picking apart the flesh of the deer, and we also have coyotes near here, and they were visiting and eating parts of the deer. So in a relatively short period of time, that deer's body was just gone. It was one of the teachings of nature that everything that comes into existence really does pass away. It's not the case that that deer is hanging out somewhere in what we call the past. That deer was here and now she's really gone.

One of my Tibetan teachers told me that a sign in your meditation that you're seeing clearly is that you're in touch with this facet of change. This is something you can actually tune into in a period of sitting. As you're with the breath, as you're with sounds, as you're with sensations, as you're with thoughts, are you sensing the nature of change, the arising and passing in that moment? Or have you concretized something? Have you made a fixation, a solid viewpoint or perspective out of a fantasy, a memory, a plan for the future, some fixation of concept? Look closely and see which you're in touch with.

If we're in touch with the changing nature of things, we're in touch with things as they are, at least to some very important degree. When we get fixated in concepts, past and future, we lose touch with that quality of change. When we look closely in our practice, we see that all our experience is just arising and passing moment after moment after moment. This is really one of the key insights in meditation. This is one of the reasons that we really

In the tradition of Buddhist practice, this teaching suggests that you develop a stability of attention so that you can open to this perception of change in a very clear way. We can see change in our daily life—it's almost an intellectual perception. But in meditation, when we can really still the mind and see this moment-by-moment arising and passing, it hits us in a much deeper way.

This is why we stress some precision in paying attention to changing objects. It's not just breath watching, it's not just body watching, but it's in order to see the nature of things—to see the true nature of all the appearances.

When I was practicing in Thailand, I spent quite a bit of time at Ajahn Buddhadasa's monastery in the south of Thailand. Ajahn Buddhadasa was really one of the great masters of the last fifty years in Thailand. He died a few years ago. He was a meditator, he was a scholar, he was an iconoclast. He didn't do things in the traditional way.

Typically in Thailand, the style of Buddhism is very devotional—a lot of statues, a lot of candles, a lot of incense, a lot of bowing, a lot of prayer, a lot of chanting. Ajahn Buddhadasa wasn't interested in that side of the Dharma. He was really only interested in wisdom. His teaching and his whole monastery was set up just for wisdom.

Rich donors would come along and say, "I'd like to give you a big gold Buddha statue. Where could we put it?" He'd say, "We don't take statues here, I'm sorry." He did not have a single statue of the Buddha in the whole monastery. The only thing he had was a semicircle where the monks would gather to eat their morning meal—it was a one-meal-a-day kind of place. In the center of that semicircle there were three stones piled on top of each other that sort of suggested a pyramid. That was the closest approximation to a Buddha image that he would allow.

I appreciated his teaching greatly, and during the time we were there, there were about half a dozen of us Westerners. He spoke pretty good English, and we got to meet with him once a week for teachings that he would give to us in English. It was really wonderful to hang out with him. He had a great deal of spaciousness, a great deal of kindness.

We had been with him for some weeks, and this was the last week of our teachings. This is what he told us to do. He said there are these bases for sense contact. There are the six senses—the five senses of the body: sight, sound, smell, taste, and touch, and the sense door of the mind, which in Buddhism is considered the sixth sense.

For sight, for example, for a sight to arise, you have to have an eye that's working—you have to have a sense organ. You have to have a form, something out there that can be seen, and you have to have consciousness. You have to have the vitality of a living body to have eye consciousness. When these three come together—the consciousness, the form, and the working eye sense organ—then a sight can arise.

These are the three bases related to sight: the organ, the object, and the consciousness. These three bases are also there in each of the other five senses. So we have six senses, three bases in each. That makes eighteen of these sense bases, which are called the ayatanas—it just means sense bases.

He said, "Every time you experience something in any one of the six senses, I want you to look at the three ayatanas, the three sense bases for that experience. And I want you to understand the origin—what conditions caused that. Nothing comes out of nothing. Everything arises because of prior conditions. So take a look so that you start to understand these things came out of prior conditions. Notice the moment of arising. Notice its persistence. Notice its passing away."

So we had eighteen sense bases and we had four things to notice in relation to each one. When you go through your experience in that level of detail, everything that can come into your consciousness can be examined in that way. You become very clear. Everything we experience is of the nature to arise and to pass away. You really know there's nothing fixed, nothing fixed that we can apprehend with our senses anywhere.

When the truth of this degree of impermanence starts to dawn, it can be a little bit unsettling.

You may feel that this is a terrible tragedy, or you may feel this is wonderful. Many of you know Wes Nisker, who teaches here—one of our teachers and also an author and former radio personality. Wes has a lovely daughter who is now about twenty or twenty-one years old. She grew up in a dharma household where both parents were deeply involved in the practice.

When she was fourteen—very precocious—she asked her mother about a word she'd been hearing around the house. "Mom, this word 'duality' you guys are always talking about—is duality good or bad?" We could ask the same question about impermanence: Is it good or bad?

Well, it's not really either. It's simply the way things are—the truth of the way things are.

In relation to the hindrances, impermanence is actually something quite wonderful. When the hindrances arise, you never really have to do anything with them except pay attention. In time, every one of them will pass away. This offers tremendous freedom because you realize you can feel anything. You can open yourself to experience any of the difficulties—wanting, aversion, dullness, restlessness, or doubt—and you don't even have to do anything. Of themselves, they will pass away.

This understanding gives great freedom. You don't have to hold yourself back.

I'd like to read a poem from Rainer Maria Rilke. He wrote a book of poems with a deeply religious orientation when he was in his early twenties. This particular poem imagines God shaping the human being and offering advice before the human being leaves the field of creation and journeys into life:

*God speaks to each of us as he makes us, then walks with us silently out of the night.

These are the words we dimly hear:

You, sent out beyond your memory,
go to the limits of your longing.
Embody me.

Flare up like flame and make big shadows I can move in.

Let everything happen to you: beauty and terror.
Just keep going. No feeling is final.
Don't let yourself lose me.

Nearby is the country they call life.
You will know it by its seriousness.

Give me your hand.*

"Let everything happen to you. Just keep going. No feeling is final." This captures the essence of our practice. You can keep going with your awareness without worrying that you'll get caught or stuck anywhere, because the feelings will continue to change.

We see that throughout the entire field of our experience—mental, physical, internal, external—there's nothing really to hold onto. Everything arises and passes away very quickly.

Ananda, who was the Buddha's cousin and attendant for many years, once asked the Buddha, "You speak of this thing called 'the world.' What do you mean by world?" In Pali, the term for world is loka, sometimes translated as realm—this realm we're living in, this earth we inhabit.

The Buddha responded with a pun on the word loka. He said, "It disintegrates"—and the Pali word for disintegrates is paloka—"therefore it is called the world." This is the nature of what we're living in: a realm that is constantly disintegrating, constantly dissolving. This is why there's no fixed security.

The Buddha offered an analogy: Our situation is like a man being swept away by a river, caught in the current, flowing swiftly downstream. As he's carried along, he keeps reaching up to the bank, trying to grab hold of a clump of grass. But because the current is so strong and the grass so weak, the grass simply pulls out in his hand and he's swept further downstream. Then he grabs another piece of grass, but it too pulls out, and he continues being swept away.

This is our situation when we're clinging, when we're trying to hold onto changing phenomena for security.

Joseph Goldstein once said this point in practice is like jumping out of an airplane and realizing you don't have a parachute. It can be deeply unsettling.

So if we continue looking for happiness in things to hold onto, we're bound to suffer. You can see this very simply in the microcosm of sitting practice. If we come in and sit and have a difficult sitting, the suffering is immediate. The pain is immediate. We want something pleasant to happen, but something painful is occurring. There's disappointment. If you have a good sitting and go out wanting it to happen again, there will probably be disappointment when the quality of the next sitting changes. So if we have direct pain, it's suffering. If we have pleasure and want to repeat it, eventually it becomes suffering as well.

Ajahn Chah said it's like grabbing a snake, this quality of clinging. If you grab onto the head of the snake and it bites you, that's pain. If you grab onto the tail of the snake and hold on, in a very short time the head swings around and bites you—that's pain too.

The Pali word for this quality is dukkha, usually translated as suffering, sometimes as unsatisfactoriness, sometimes as unreliability. The world is unreliable because it cannot give us the security we're seeking. This is really our dilemma as human beings—we all have a deep yearning for security, for safety, for a happiness that isn't temporary or transient. Yet the world isn't capable of giving us that. The objects of this world cannot provide that.

This recognition can actually bring up a lot of compassion, because it's our shared situation. It's the predicament each one of us faces. In meditation practice, we start to see that there's no state of mind we can construct that will last in this way.

But something very interesting emerges: in any moment when we let go of clinging in its forms of greed, aversion, and confusion, in that very moment of letting go, we find there's a peace available. That kind of peace may not be temporary. Perhaps that peace is like a foundation for all our experience, available anytime we're not disturbing it. And if so, perhaps that peace is not subject to arising and passing.

Let's set that aside for a moment and talk about the last of the three characteristics of existence: not-self, or anatta. Basically, the Buddha said the root question in spiritual practice is finding the answer to: What am I? Who am I?

To look at this question freshly, we probably need to examine what we commonly mean by the word "I." It's a word we use every day. When you stop to think about it, don't you have a sense that there's some way you've been constant from when you were very young until today? That there's a way the same person went to kindergarten on that opening day when you had to leave your mother for the first time, right up to now as you sit in this hall?

This word "I," if you look into it a little, comes with a sense of continuity—an ongoing sameness to who we are. Even though our bodies have changed, our thoughts have changed, our moods have changed, we have some sense of an ongoing center through all those changes. That's the self the Buddha said needs questioning—this ongoing center. Is there such a thing? This is something that really needs investigation in each of our meditation practices.

One way the Buddha described this inquiry: Does the sense of "I" ever arise by itself, or does it only arise in relation to other things? In other words, pain comes in this thing we call a knee. Then arises: "I have pain in my knee," or "my knee hurts," or "I'm in pain." A thought comes about what we want to do after the retreat, and the "I" gets formed: "I want to go there. I want to do that. I want to see that person." A mood of sadness or happiness comes: "I'm sad. I'm happy."

So an interesting area to investigate: when these experiences come—knee pain, sadness, thoughts about the future—can there just be the pain? Can there just be the sadness? Can there just be the thought without someone who owns it? Experience for yourself in practice the difference between simply noting pain and noting when you call it "my pain." When you think "future thought" versus "my future thought." When you think "anger" or "happiness" versus "my anger" and "my happiness." The "my," the Buddha said, is actually something extra. It's not intrinsic to the experience.

It's something we generate out of our own thoughts. What's the experience like if there's just the anger? Just the knee pain, just the feeling. This is clear seeing. The sense of identification of joining it with an "I" is something extra. The clear seeing is just to see the thing itself as it is.

When we see in that way, we start to get a sense there's actually no one at the center of all this. There's no ongoing entity in here, or behind the eyes to whom this is all happening. What we are is just the changing process of our six senses, all the facets arising and passing moment after moment. There's no solid ongoing center that it's all happening to.

After a talk on impermanence at a retreat in the desert, one of the meditators asked the next day, "Is this just a bitter pill that we're supposed to swallow? Why do you tell us all this stuff? This is not very good news."

Actually, there are two levels of the answer to that. The first answer is no, it's not just a bitter pill. It's actually very freeing to see impermanence. The Buddha said that if you see impermanence over and over again, it leads to the end of craving, it leads to the end of ignorance, and it leads to the end of the conceit "I am," or the belief that I am something or other. The point in talking about all these three is really to encourage us, to inspire us not to cling. Clinging is more to the heart of things. These are all pointers or ways of looking at the mind that doesn't cling.

In fact, this mind that doesn't cling is very closely related to that peace that I mentioned a few minutes earlier—that peace that may not be subject to arising and passing, that peace that may be a kind of baseline or foundation or ground for our experience. When the mind is not involved in clinging, see what your experience is. See if it has this quality of peacefulness to it.

When there's no clinging to the breath, nor to the sensations in the body, nor to the mood or state of mind, and yet there's a fullness of presence—there's a fullness of awareness that's not of past and future—in that very moment, is there any suffering? Is there any conflict? Is there any problem?

This opening into the realm of non-clinging is really what's being pointed to by these three characteristics. The three characteristics themselves are not an ultimate truth. It's so precise the way the Buddha phrased it. These are the characteristics or the qualities of existence—that means that which comes into existence. But any kind of ultimate truth has to encompass existence as well as non-existence. Just as in this room, nothing would be possible if it weren't for the space that's between us all. The space is every bit as important as the appearances or those things that exist at this moment in the room. So impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and not-self are really pointers to this dimension of non-clinging in which something more ultimate can be discovered.

I did a session once with a great Zen master named Sasaki Roshi. And one of the koans he posed during that retreat is, "How do you catch the wind?" I don't think he was a big Donovan fan, but it was a great koan. How do you catch the wind?

I never actually got a chance to give him my answer to this koan, but my first inclination was something like this: grasping empty air. But you know, that's what we're doing all the time. We're grasping empty passing appearances. I realized he would have just shooed me out of the room and rung his bell and dismissed me.

And when I thought about it later, the gesture that came to me was this: the way that a sail catches the wind by being fully open, by being fully outstretched, by having an awareness that embraces the arisings as well as the space that contains all the arisings. That space of non-clinging is a space that can't be harmed because nothing has contracted into a small self that can be threatened. This is the sense of emptiness: an open awareness fully present that embraces all the appearances. And in this, it's as though we've jumped out of the plane. We realize we don't have a parachute, but we also know there's no ground to fall into.

This is from the Diamond Sutra: "Thus shall you think of all this fleeting world, like a star at dawn, a bubble in a stream, a flickering lamp, a flash of lightning in a summer cloud, an echo, a mirage, a dream."

When we can hold this dreamlike nature of the world with full awareness and full presence, there's a terrific freedom in that experience. The Buddha put it this way: our experience is empty and insubstantial to one who sees it wisely.

So should this body and mind be looked upon by a practitioner with strong energy, continually aware, clearly aware and mindful. Let them leave behind all bondage, make a refuge for herself, and, as though her head was on fire, act to gain the deathless Nibbana.

This is the invitation before us—to practice with the urgency and dedication as if our very life depended upon it, because in the deepest sense, it does. Not the preservation of this temporary form, but the awakening to what is truly deathless within us.

The Buddha speaks of acting "as though her head was on fire"—this is the quality of energy and commitment that spiritual awakening requires. It's not a casual interest or a hobby we pursue when convenient. It's recognizing the precious nature of this human birth, the rarity of encountering the dharma, and the fleeting nature of the opportunity before us.

When we truly understand the dreamlike nature of all phenomena, when we see through the illusion of solid, permanent existence, we don't become passive or disconnected. Quite the opposite—we become more present, more engaged, more fully alive. We act with the wisdom that nothing is permanent, and therefore every moment matters infinitely.

This is the paradox of the spiritual path: the more clearly we see the insubstantial nature of all things, the more precious and vivid life becomes. Like lucid dreamers who, knowing they are dreaming, can move through the dream with complete freedom and joy.

Let's sit for just a minute in the silence that holds all of this—the emptiness that is not vacant but vibrantly alive, the awareness that needs no ground to stand on because it is itself the very space in which all experience unfolds.

CHAPTER 216

Karma

Guy Armstrong · 54 min

In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong explores the Buddha's teaching on karma, emphasizing that karma means 'action' accompanied by volition or intention, not merely the results of action (vipāka). Drawing on the Dalai Lama's advice that understanding karma is more crucial for Westerners than studying emptiness, Armstrong explains how wholesome intentions rooted in non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion lead to happiness, while unwholesome roots of greed, hatred, and delusion create suffering.

The talk examines karma operating through body, speech, and mind, with bodily actions having the strongest karmic impact. Armstrong discusses the ten unwholesome actions outlined by the Buddha and shares practical examples from retreat centers and juvenile detention work. He addresses the relationship between karma and the five precepts, rebirth teachings, and the cosmology of 31 realms of existence, while acknowledging that belief in rebirth is optional for sincere practitioners.

The dharma concludes by connecting karma to the Eightfold Path and the pāramīs, explaining how the accumulation of merit supports wisdom in the journey toward liberation. Armstrong emphasizes that liberation involves transcending individual karma entirely, allowing spontaneous compassionate action to flow naturally from wisdom and freedom.

A group of Western teachers were meeting with the Dalai Lama a few years ago and asking his direction on what Dharma should be communicated in the West. He said there are these vast teachings of the Buddha on emptiness and the whole tradition, and then there are the more relative teachings on cause and effect and karma. What do you think is really most important for Westerners to learn about?

The Dalai Lama said that in his opinion it was far more valuable that Westerners learn about karma than that we learn about emptiness. So tonight I'd like to take the Dalai Lama's advice to heart and talk a little bit about this mystery of karma.

The word has become popularized in our culture now but in a slightly misleading way. John Lennon had his song "Instant Karma" and you hear it bandied about. What the Buddha actually meant by karma was related to the word at the time in his language where karma just meant action. That's all it meant was action.

But in explaining how he understood it, the Buddha said, "By action, I mean volition because it's from volition that action comes." So a synonym for volition really is intention. You can think of it as intention or will or desire or volition. They're all pointing to the same thing. There's an urge that arises in the mind, and from this urge spring forth various actions—actions of body, of speech, and of mind.

So the term karma doesn't actually mean the results of the action. It means the action itself when it's accompanied with a volition or an intention. There's another term that means the results of the action, and that term is vipaka. When people talk about karma vipaka, it's the results of actions.

The results of actions can be wholesome or unwholesome, basically according to the intention or the volition in the action. Volition is a mental factor that's said to accompany every waking moment. There's some kind of intention or volition present. And the volitions can be categorized as either wholesome—those which lead to happiness—or unwholesome—those that lead to more suffering.

So the karma or the action takes on a wholesome or an unwholesome quality depending on the wholesome or unwholesome nature of the volition or intention that guides the action.

When we look into the roots of karma, the wholesome roots are said to be our old friends: non-greed or generosity, non-hatred or kindness, and non-delusion or wisdom. So the unwholesome roots then are our old buddies: greed, aversion, and confusion.

In the way the Buddha saw things, an act itself isn't wholesome or unwholesome in itself. It's the intention that accompanies it. For example, the same act could have either very wholesome or unwholesome intentions. A robber might stab somebody in the belly with a knife in order to steal their belongings, but a surgeon might cut the same person with a knife in order to perform an act of healing. So the act itself isn't the source of the karma—it's the wholesome or unwholesome intention.

It's also said that karma is acting out in three fields: body, speech, and mind. Each of these three fields has different levels of impact, different degrees of strength. The actions of body are said to be the strongest, the actions of speech the second strongest, and the actions just of thought the weakest.

Someone mentioned the other day they were a little worried about getting into thoughts of anger in their meditation. Just to reassure you, when you're just thinking about the anger and not actually acting on it, the karma of that is relatively weak. When we carry it into speech, it gets stronger, and when we carry it into bodily action, stronger still.

You can look at this really directly in your own experience. I was having a discussion with someone a couple of weeks ago about practice. We were talking about whether a certain teaching was going to inspire people to do practice or not—formal meditation practice. This person who's also a meditator said, "Well, it doesn't really matter because that's not the point. It's not the point whether people do the formal practice or not. The point is, does it change their daily life?"

I found myself getting a little reactive because I feel very strongly that there is some value to doing the formal practice, and that not to honor that was overlooking a really important aspect of the Eightfold Path. As the person talked more and more, I found myself getting more and more reactive and more and more annoyed. I was holding myself back from saying something until finally I couldn't hold any longer and it just blurted out of me: "Oh, I must have missed something then. I must have missed something in the Buddha's teaching in that case." It's just a very sarcastic thing to say.

As soon as I said it, I could feel the amount of reactivity in me, the amount of irritation take a quantum jump up. Before, it had sort of been manageable, and as soon as I said it, it was like putting my foot right in a big pile of something. Automatically, there was just a lot more energy.

I've also noticed times when I'll be in the middle of an argument—and these levels of intensity usually happen with my devoted wife, who is the only one who hangs in there with me through them. We might be having just some exchange of words. Then at some point, if I get really angry, I'll stomp off and slam a door. I notice that when I move from the speaking to the taking bodily action, like stomping out of the room and then slamming a door, again, the energy level goes up another notch.

So just to start to tune into that in your own life. The power of thinking a friendly thought towards someone is good.

That's really what the metta practice is based on. The power of saying something kind to someone is stronger. And if you've noticed what power there is in giving someone a gift—if you've really carefully thought about what would make them happy and you actually give them something as a bodily action—that can be even stronger still.

Now, of course, this isn't the time and place for the saying of kind things and the giving of kind gifts. But again, back in your daily life, notice these different strengths connected with action.

The Buddha felt so strongly about this he said that karma makes the world go round. You might have thought it was a 20th century lyricist who said something like, "love makes the world go round." The Buddha said, "karma makes the world go round. Living beings are bound by karma like the chariot wheel by the pin."

So the basic teaching is that when we act out of wholesome intentions, it leads to happiness for others, and it leads to happiness for ourselves. When we act out of unwholesome intentions, it leads to unhappiness for others, and it leads to unhappiness for ourselves.

The Tibetans have this very beautiful phrasing of the metta and compassion phrases. They actually have a set of phrases for all four of the Brahmaviharas—for mudita or joy, and also for equanimity. But I love their phrasing for metta and compassion. The metta phrase is in a chant that they call the four immeasurables, and the phrase is: "May you have happiness and the cause of happiness, which is virtue." And their compassion phrase is: "May you be free from sorrow and the cause of sorrow, which is non-virtue."

To me, this is a beautiful reflection because it really points to the root of human happiness and unhappiness. The Buddha expressed it really clearly in the second verse of the Dhammapada when he said, "Mind is the forerunner of all things. Mind is chief. Speak and act with an impure mind and trouble will follow you like the wheel of the cart follows the oxen. Mind is the forerunner of all things. Mind is chief. Speak and act with a pure mind and happiness will follow you like your shadow, unshakable."

So the teaching is that actions have consequences. I find it interesting that this idea is really filtering into the mainstream of our culture today. Very different situation than 20 or 30 years ago.

A couple of years ago, James Baraz and I were giving some teachings on meditation at a juvenile hall—a juvenile hall in San Mateo. For those of you who don't know about the justice system in this country, juvenile hall is where teenagers are detained before they go to trial. So these are kids generally between about 13 and up to the age of 18 when they become adults in the eyes of the law. It's a holding facility before they go on trial for things like armed robbery, assault, murder, grand larceny, and so on.

One of the people who was working at this facility in San Mateo is a meditator and thought it would be great if the people who were staying there could get some exposure to the Dharma. So she asked James and me to lead a class, and we did. We did a five-week series, and we didn't call it meditation because we figured that would turn everybody off. We called it "mind power." That's a better marketing term in that environment. At the end of the class, we gave them a little graduation certificate that showed they had completed their course in mind power. And one of them asked me, "Could I show this to the judge?" I said, "Sure, you can try."

So we'd been teaching them for about four classes. We went down every week, and we'd been teaching them for about four weeks on the basics of mindfulness and paying attention to the breath. And mostly what we tried to teach about was how to work with their fear and their anger. Because you can imagine that they're cooped up in these cells all day long, they're just kids, and in a few weeks their life is going to be on the line when they're brought to trial. And they don't know whether they're going to end up in jail for the next 10 or 20 years, whether the judge will decide to try them as an adult when they could be put away for life, or what might happen to them.

So they're in a great state of insecurity. They have no way to deal with the emotions. We gave them very basic body and emotion techniques for paying attention to their feelings. And several of them said that they found it very helpful. So they kept coming to the class. We weren't sure that they would, but they kept coming.

So the last class was coming up and I said to James, "You know what? I'd really like to teach on the precepts." And he sort of looked at me like, "Are you crazy with these guys?" Because we were dealing with the guys who were in maximum security, which means they were in for some of the offenses that I mentioned earlier.

And I said, "Yeah, you know, it might be the last time that they ever hear these teachings. I'd like to try it."

So I approached it through the Buddha's understanding of what brings happiness and what brings unhappiness. I told them, "This guy, the Buddha, sort of figured out the science of what makes people happy and what makes them unhappy." I said, "Have you ever noticed that when you do things out of a kind heart, kindness comes back to you? And when you do things out of an angry heart, anger tends to come back to you? Have you ever had that sense?"

One of the young guys put up his hand and said, "Do you mean like what goes around comes around?"

And I said, "Yeah."

He said, "Yeah, I get that."

So it was a language that they could really grasp instinctively. There were many beautiful moments in that class. One thing that touched me deeply was a young African-American man with a very soft, sweet presence in the group. We'd ring the bell at the end of sitting, then ask them to share about their experience. He said, "When I heard that bell, I just followed it on up to the window in the roof." We were in a room with a skylight. "I just went right out the window with the sound of that bell." Very beautiful.

The teaching is that actions have consequences. We can think about this and see that we can relate to it directly in our lives. Actions have really immediate consequences in the moment. When we act out of kindness, when we act out of giving, it feels good in the here and now. When we act out of contraction, out of fear, or out of cruelty, it doesn't feel very good. You can actually feel the pain of the contraction when that is happening. As Sylvia said the other day in a talk, anyone who's causing a lot of pain is himself in a great deal of pain.

We also find the results of our actions in the memories of them. Often in metta practice, we encourage you to reflect on things you've done for yourself or for others that have been really helpful—to reflect on your own good deeds. This is not to generate pride, but so you can actually take joy and delight in the memory of your goodness, to have real conviction of your own goodness, to feel it directly.

Also in meditation, as we get still, we may often find memories coming of times when we haven't been so kind, of times when we've been unthoughtful to people.

The teaching on karma is also that these actions have consequences in the future in really mysterious ways, in ways we cannot fully understand, in ways we can't directly see for ourselves. The Buddha talked about this clearly, and it's a part of the teaching that, for the most part, we can't really verify.

Most of the Buddha's teaching is wonderful because it's so pragmatic, so empirical—we can check it out. If you pay attention to the breath, you become peaceful. Check it out. See if it's true. You can find that out for yourself. If the mind is contracted with fear, it brings pain. Check it out. We can look and see.

But this level of the teaching on karma we're not really able to verify. So in talking to you about it tonight, I really want to just put it out as part of the Buddha's teaching, as something he felt was important, and then kind of leave it with you. It's not something that anybody else can convince you of. It's not something that I want to try to convince you of. But I do want to let you know what the Buddha said about it so that you can hang out with it and reflect on it and see if it resonates for you. See if it feels true.

Over many years of practice and observation, I've developed great faith in it. To what extent it's blind faith and to what extent it's verified faith, I can't really say. But I have very deep trust myself in this teaching.

One of the ways that karma really makes sense is in the field of ethical conduct. When we opened the retreat, we talked about all of us taking the five precepts together. Those precepts are really expressions of the wholesome intention of non-harming. They have immediate benefits in that we don't cause suffering to others. They have long-term benefits in that we don't cause suffering to ourselves. The precepts are really great protections for each of us.

The Buddha actually outlined a list of ten unwholesome actions that he said were expressions of unwholesome karma. Three of them are expressions of body, four of them are expressions of speech, and three of them are expressions of mind. So he gave us very clear and concrete guidelines for working in this area of wholesome and unwholesome action.

Basically he said that in actions of the body, killing, stealing, and sexual misconduct are unwholesome and lead to further suffering. In actions of speech, the actions of lying, speaking harshly or abusively to someone, speaking maliciously about someone, and gossiping are unwholesome actions of speech. And in thought, he said the unwholesome actions of thought are covetousness, ill will, and this last one is really curious—wrong view. That is, having an understanding of the world that doesn't align with the truth.

The Buddha said a lot of suffering arises from misunderstandings. He identified one of the most pernicious forms of wrong view as believing that actions don't have consequences. You can see this in the world today. There's a level of nihilism or lack of faith that leads to things like a callous disregard for other people, that leads to stealing or killing or infidelity—not being aware of the pain that sexual misconduct causes others. There's harshness of speech that isn't moderated or restrained. I think you can see in the world that society at large doesn't have this understanding that actions have consequences. It's a great gift for us as meditators that we have this appreciation of the precepts.

Sometimes this getting stuck in nihilism actually comes because people get too attached to the teaching on emptiness. When people think that seeing the wisdom side of emptiness is all that matters, they start to believe that actions aren't important. There's a really beautiful quotation from Padmasambhava, the Indian saint who brought Buddhism to Tibet, that states the truth about this. He said, "Though my view is as spacious as the sky"—meaning his understanding is vast and his equanimity is equally vast—"my actions as regards cause and effect are as refined as grains of barley flour." This is that combination of a vast degree of freedom and real impeccability in action.

At retreat centers, you get many great opportunities to look at this skillful means in terms of not taking what's not given and not killing. There was a dilemma at the Minneapolis Zen Center, which was led by Katagiri Roshi, a Dharma brother of Suzuki Roshi and Japanese Zen master. They were finding at that time that there was a problem with cockroaches in the Dharma hall. People would come in for sitting, come in to hear the Dharma, and there'd be the scurrying of little feet that you'd hear in the silence. Some people were really bothered by that. They didn't want to sit with cockroaches, and the attendance started declining.

This put the students in a real dilemma. What do we do? If we kill the cockroaches, we break the first precept. If we don't kill the cockroaches, nobody comes to the zendo. They really didn't know what to do. So they went to Katagiri Roshi and put the problem to him and said, "Roshi, what shall we do?" He took it in and said, "I'm not going to tell you." And he didn't. He put the problem right back on the students.

They decided in the end to have the hall fumigated. So the cockroaches were killed, and then people started showing up for meditations again. Even though this is the precept not to kill, even though they were aware that it was an unwholesome action, there was also the understanding that sometimes it may be the appropriate thing to do, even in a dharma context. Similar questions arise for really sincere practitioners around issues like euthanasia—maybe where pets are concerned—and abortion. There's real deep struggle around these questions, but sometimes the action that the precept is stating not to take may actually be the right action in that situation.

It was also interesting to be on staff at a retreat center because in being on staff for long retreats, the meditators would get really comfortable in the place and start to feel that the kitchen was their home as much as any other part of the facility. One staff member came into the kitchen one night about two in the morning and found about four meditators in there frying eggs and making toast. It was a little disconcerting because from the point of view of the cooks, not taking what isn't given means taking what the cooks put out and drawing the line there. That's the way it's meant to be understood.

Another time, a staff person walked into the walk-in fridge, and one of the meditators was in there with his hand in a box of dates, lifting a date to his mouth. The staff person said, being a friendly, compassionate staff person, "Can I help you?" And the meditator said, "Oh, I was just looking for the caretaker's office." Which they were then happy to show him to.

I know one time I got a really early teaching on karma when I had just graduated from college and taken my first job. I was twenty-one years old and very nervous about going out into the world and not having enough money, leaving the protected life of university and moving into the work world full time. I didn't have a great deal of resources, and my car, which was a VW Beetle that was about ten years old, broke down. I took it in for repair, and they said, "Well, to repair this, it's going to cost you about $600." I said, "No, I can't do that."

So I sold the car, and I sold it to somebody without telling them how bad the damage was, even though I knew. I didn't actually tell a lie, but I also wasn't truthful. I knew I was hiding something from them. My conscience tormented me about it afterwards, but I still kept the money. I went out and bought a little sports car. After I'd gotten a couple of paychecks, I bought a Triumph TR4.

It was really representative of British auto engineering in the 1960s, which meant it broke down all the time. I owned it for two years and had two valve jobs on it, which is a really major expense. And I started to realize, oh, maybe this is happening because I sold somebody a bad car and somebody just sold me a bad car. Since then I've done a little more truth and disclosure in advertising and I haven't had those problems. It was an instant lesson.

So paying attention to the areas of right conduct in body and speech and mind really can lead to a lot of clarity and a lot of happiness.

In fact, the phrase of the equanimity meditation, also in the Brahma-Vihara family, points to this truth as well. The basic phrase in the equanimity meditation is a little hard for Westerners to accept when we first hear it. It says something like, "All beings are the heirs of their actions. Their happiness and unhappiness depend on their own past actions more than on my wishes for them." This is a very sobering reflection.

In doing the equanimity practice, you basically repeat this phrase over and over again all day long, holding the different individuals as you have in the loving-kindness—yourself, a benefactor, a friend, a neutral person, and so on—with the reflection that each person's happiness and unhappiness comes from our own past actions. It was a very powerful practice.

One year, in an intensive retreat of about six weeks, I did each of the Brahma-Vihara practices for ten days in an intensive fashion. And for me, after the metta practice, which has been the strongest for me, the equanimity practice was the most powerful of the other three Brahma-Viharas.

The Buddha went on to say that if you want to see someone's past actions, take a look at their present circumstances. If you want to see someone's future circumstances, take a look at their present actions.

Now I want to throw in a caution around this area, and that is that it's really impossible to know the details. We can get really inclined to figure out, "Oh my gosh, I got this terrible illness. It's a life-threatening illness. What did I do wrong in the past that has caused this?" You can really dwell on a question like that. Or something really unfortunate happened—"I got in a car accident this week. What did I do that was responsible for that?" This isn't productive thinking.

It's really impossible for us to know the workings of karma to that level of detail. The Buddha actually said that the workings of karma are one of the four imponderables. And if you think about them, he said, it will drive you mad and cause you vexation. He didn't say which of those was stronger, but you'll go mad and experience vexation.

The other three imponderables, just in case you're curious so you don't have to think about them either: the range of mind of the Buddha, the power of a concentrated mind, and the beginning of the universe. So just to take a load off your mind, don't worry about those.

So I take this teaching on karma in very broad brush terms. People's general level of happiness and unhappiness are related in some mysterious way to past actions. And that's really as refined or as detailed as I feel I can be about it for myself.

One of the other teachings that comes in around the teaching on karma is the teaching on rebirth. And I want to talk about this a little bit too because the Buddha talked about it quite frequently.

Basically, the Buddha taught that if we're not fully free at the time of death, the unfree parts of ourselves—the degree to which greed, aversion, and confusion are still active in us—has a propelling tendency of forward momentum that will lead to another being arising linked in some way to the continuation of our habits of mind. These tendencies, the forces of greed and aversion and delusion, until completely uprooted, result in future becoming. And something about the tendencies passes on to the new being.

Moreover, he said, the life situation that we take birth in is a reflection of the wholesomeness of our actions from the past. So if we have acted in a very wholesome way in this life, chances are that we can take birth in a situation that is basically pleasant. And people who have acted in very unskillful ways and caused a lot of harm to others in this life find themselves reborn in situations that are intrinsically painful.

The Buddha actually described different realms or planes of existence that beings take birth in that are categorized by these qualities of pleasantness or unpleasantness. This is all part of a grand cosmology that is unfolded in his teachings.

Again, whether you believe in this or not is completely up to you. It's possible to be a very dedicated practitioner and not have any sort of faith or belief in this at all. But for some people, this is an inspiring view of practice because it means that the unfolding of our path takes place over a vast, vast period of time, and it can give an inspiring and awesome view of the project that we're embarked on—this great and total purification of the heart.

So I'll just say a few more things about the cosmology. There are thirty-one realms of existence in all, and they're sort of graded from the most suffering to the most pleasant. Beginning at the lowest, the most suffering realm, the Buddha also referred to realms of hellishness—very intense suffering. And then working upwards through realms that are ruled strongly by desire, which are called the realm of hungry ghosts. Realms that are ruled by ignorance, which is the realm of the animals. Realms of demons, of conflict and aggression. And on top of those four comes the human realm.

It's said that in the human realm, a particular capacity of our mind is that we have the ability to experience the mental states of the beings of all thirty-one realms.

From the human realm, ascending in happiness, there are said to be six heavenly realms called the deva realms—realms of intense pleasure filled with great sense enjoyments. Beings in these realms experience no suffering at all until they die, and their greatest suffering at the time of death comes from being ignored by the other beings of that realm.

Above these are even higher realms called the Brahma realms, essentially godly realms of existence. Among these divine figures are considered to be creator beings who may have actually shaped this world and other worlds in which beings take birth.

However, whether one takes birth in a realm of intense suffering or intense pleasure, one's lifetime in that realm is limited. There is no such thing in Buddhist cosmology as eternal birth. The sequence generally unfolds as beings experiencing pleasure for a time based on past wholesome actions, but unless they have renewed the wholesomeness of their actions, it becomes possible that past unwholesome actions will lead to rebirth in a less happy realm.

The picture emerges of beings moving from one realm to another, experiencing happiness in one lifetime and pain in another over countless eons. The Buddha said that if you gathered together the skeletons from all your lifetimes, they would form a vast mountain.

I offer this simply as a glimpse into the potential vastness of the view of life that the Buddha himself claimed to see. In the teachings and ancient texts, this is presented not as speculation, but as something the Buddha said he could actually perceive through his own developed psychic powers. Again, whether you believe in this or not is completely up to you.

Manindraji, who was Joseph's first teacher, used to teach about this material, always prefacing it by saying, "You don't have to believe in this. It's true, but you don't need to believe in it." If you feel completely disbelieving of it, you're in good company. Ajahn Buddhadasa, one of my teachers in Thailand and a deeply respected monk, considered this entire teaching on rebirth completely irrelevant. He didn't teach it, didn't believe in it, and didn't think it held any particular value for his practice. And he was a very good Buddhist—a wise and enlightened practitioner.

Stephen Batchelor, whom I consider one of the most creative writers on Buddhism today, is also an agnostic when it comes to rebirth. He essentially says, "I don't know from my own experience. I'm not going to say it is or isn't. I'm going to stay with this position of not knowing because for me, that's the truth." This too is a deeply respected position within the tradition.

All the teachings on rebirth that we encounter can be understood in terms of these thirty-one planes that the Buddha described. We can also understand them in terms of moment-to-moment birth, because we actually take a new birth every moment we identify with an aspect of our experience. A new "I" gets formed.

If you come into a sitting and experience great calm and concentration, and there's any clinging to that, any identification with it, then you take birth as "the good meditator." This is quite a happy birth, as births go in this human realm. You can enjoy that identity for a while, carrying it out to the walking period, feeling pleased with your sitting and this sense of yourself. It's a genuinely happy birth—until you die, until you return to the hall expecting that same concentration and calm to be there as before. When it's not like that, there's suffering in that death.

Or you might become filled with hunger. Perhaps you're sitting here in the 11:45 session and suddenly find yourself very hungry. You think about that wonderful meal you had a couple of days ago and imagine you can smell roasting onions drifting up from the kitchen. Then you're born as "the hungry meditator"—a bit like the hungry ghost realm. There's unsatisfactoriness in that birth, which may continue until you walk down the hill, get your plate, and take a few bites as the hunger fades.

We're constantly being born into situations that are pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral in this setting. You can completely understand rebirth on this level, and all the Buddha's teachings on rebirth fit perfectly within this framework.

One question that often arises about rebirth is: if there's no self, what is it that gets reborn? I don't want to go into great detail, but I'll share what Chögyam Trungpa, that great Tibetan teacher, said about this. He explained, "Basically what gets reborn are our bad habits." We'll leave it at that.

So one level of understanding karma is that when we act wholesomely, wholesome results and happiness come into our lives. When we act unwholesomely, unwholesome results and unhappiness follow. There's a further understanding of this message of karma that I think is crucial for us as meditators: the entire Eightfold Path is founded on karma. The whole journey to liberation rests on the belief and trust that the actions we take in alignment with the path deliver us to freedom.

Karma thus has both this mundane aspect—that good actions bring happiness—and this transcendent dimension, pointing toward the truth that by following the path to liberation, we act in a way that truly frees the mind completely. The Tibetans express this beautifully when they say:

They say that liberation rests on two accumulations: the accumulation of wisdom or insight and the accumulation of merit.

I love this teaching. I think it's a really profound pointing because what it says is that even if we open our mind and the mind gets strong and can see into the deepest truth of things in a moment that's enlightening and awakening and very, very profound, such a moment on its own may not be enough. For most of us, we have to support moments like that with the accumulation of merit—that is, with the accumulated power of our past wholesome actions.

Many, many, many eons ago, it is said, there was an ascetic named Sumedha who came in contact with the Buddha of his time, whose name was Dipankara. And the ascetic Sumedha was developed to such a degree in mind training that if he had had one word of teaching from the Buddha Dipankara, he would have become fully liberated. But he was so inspired by his first glimpse of this Buddha in an earlier time that he didn't want to become liberated. He decided he would rather be a Buddha.

So he made the aspiration at that moment: "May I myself develop all the wholesome qualities that would be needed to awaken by myself at a time when the teachings of the Dharma have faded away from the face of the earth." And it is said that that Buddha Dipankara saw this wish of Sumedha's, saw it with his psychic vision, and told him, "I hear your wish and your wish will be granted. You have the potential to become a future Buddha."

So Sumedho took that blessing and went off back to his retreat hut and reflected on what were the things that he would need to do in order to develop the strength of mind and the wholesomeness to become a Buddha himself. And the answer that he came up with was the list that's called the Ten Paramis, which we've talked about a lot—qualities like Sylvia talked about the other night: patience and determination, truthfulness, loving kindness, wisdom, renunciation, and so on. The paramis are the list that really detail how the wholesome forces of the mind, when cultivated in meditation practice and in daily life, have that cumulative power that liberates the mind.

So there's the need for insight, deep understanding. There's also the need for this accumulation of wholesome activities. The Dalai Lama in one book said that the Tibetan word for inspiration actually literally means "force of transformation," meaning that the virtuous qualities of what we're inspired by actually have the power to transform the nature of your mind.

There's a name for this quality among the paramis, this particular pointing. A few years ago, I visited a great Tibetan teacher named Tulku Ergen Rinpoche. He was living at a monastery outside of Kathmandu, and we spent about two weeks going and visiting with him and getting teachings. And at the end of the two weeks, we asked if we could take refuge in his tradition. Of course, we'd taken refuge in the Theravadan tradition, and a number of us had been monks and nuns, but we wanted to take refuge in his teachings as well.

And so he did it, and he gave each of us names. That's one of the things you do in a refuge ceremony typically—you get a new name. To symbolize renunciation, we went up to him, and he pulled our hair up a little bit and cut a little lock off to symbolize the Buddha's shaving of his head when he left the household life, as nuns and monks do today. And he gave us a new name. He gave us the names of paramis, some of us, and my name was Ergen, which was his name, Tsondrul. Ergen Tsondrul. Let me introduce myself.

Tsondrul is the parami that in Sanskrit is called virya. Virya is normally translated as energy or effort. But in Tibetan, they understand it as taking delight in what is wholesome. And I really was glad to get that name because in my practice, I've needed a lot of virya. I've had to have a lot of virya. I started practice with a lot of unhappiness. I had a lot of fear, a lot of bodily tension, a lot of mental unease in the early years of my practice. And I really needed to have a strong determination and a lot of energy to work through that.

So I feel in myself a tremendous appreciation for what is wholesome in this practice. And I feel that if you don't really have that deep love of what's wholesome from Dharma practice, you can't sustain your path because it's a hard path. It's arduous—sitting here hour after hour and walking and being quiet and not having contact. It's a very arduous path. And if you don't love the fruits of it, I don't think you'll sustain your journey. If you don't love the stillness and the wisdom, the clarity and the heartfulness of it. But if you love that, then that will really sustain you on your journey.

So in every moment, really, we make this choice of being with the wholesome or being with the unwholesome. And time and time again, of course, we get dragged away by the unwholesome. I was doing a six-week period of metta practice in the fall and going through all the ups and downs of retreat practice. And there was one situation in my outside life that would come up from time to time that I feel angry about. I'd be doing my metta practice—"may all beings be happy, may all beings be peaceful"—and then, "Boy, I'm so angry at this person" would come in too. And it would sort of come in and be dominant for a while.

And one sitting, after I'd been carried away a number of times, this image came up spontaneously of the direction of anger.

And the image that came spontaneously to mind was being on this deserted road at night. It was dark, and by a tree that was dead and bare, there was a wind howling across the road, and it was very lonely. I was all on my own. That was the image that came to me of where the anger was taking me—a place of real desolation and unhappiness and fear. I thought, do I want to go down that road again?

Just as I was contemplating this, without generating any effort, another image arose on the other side of my field of vision. I simply noticed this vision appearing. When I turned my mind toward it, there was a circle of light filled with yellow radiance. In the middle of the circle, a Buddha was suspended in the air, surrounded by rainbows and circles of light. On the ground below were bodhisattvas and practitioners, and flying through the air were Thai-style devas—those celestial beings you may have seen in paintings, gliding gracefully with their legs tucked beneath them.

I sat there and thought, "Where should I go?" It was such a graphic representation of the wholesome fruits of the path and the unwholesome direction of my anger that it completely sobered me in that moment. I turned my mind back to the metta practice, which became a great support.

In every moment, we're all making that choice: coming back to the present moment, connecting with the breath, with sounds, with sensations, establishing mindfulness and presence with an accepting heart, with this flavor of metta. These moments of wholesomeness are very powerful. We may not feel transformed by one moment, but little by little, they accumulate.

The Buddha expressed this beautifully: "Don't disregard the accumulation of wholesomeness, saying this will come to nothing. By the gradual falling of raindrops, a jar is filled." This is where our mindfulness practice is leading. No moment that you're awake is ever wasted, because each one helps fill this jar. When that jar overflows, that's what liberates the mind—the overflowing into real freedom.

So there's the karma of wholesome and unwholesome actions, and there's the karma of the path that leads to liberation. The Buddha said something remarkable about the end of the path: for one who is fully liberated, there is no more karma. For one who is completely awake, there is no more individual will, no more desire, no more motivation. There is only presence.

Sometimes we can touch into this in our meditation practice—those moments when we feel freest. There's a sense that in that freedom, there's no compulsion in any particular direction. Yet as life's situations present themselves, we can respond spontaneously with wisdom where needed, with compassion where needed, with metta where needed. The actions of the free heart arise without premeditation; the appropriate response emerges naturally.

Rumi expressed this beautifully: "Drink the wine that moves you as a camel moves when he's been untied and is just ambling about."

The Buddha taught that the karma which leads to the ending of all karma is the Noble Eightfold Path—the path of wisdom, ethical conduct, and meditation. We engage in techniques and practices to bring the mind to stillness, so the movements of volition aren't so impactful or powerful, allowing us to feel that natural calm. Once we rest in that calmness, we can simply abide in the stillness—not needing to do anymore, but being with that freedom, that peace, and letting whatever wants to emerge from that moment unfold as it will.

I'll close with another poem from Rilke's Book of Hours:

*I believe in all that has never yet been spoken.
I want to free what waits within me so that what no one has dared to wish for may for once spring clear without my contriving.

If this is arrogant, God, forgive me,
but this is what I need to say.
May what I do flow from me like a river, no forcing and no holding back—
the way it is with children.*

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 217

The Practice of Loving Kindness

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

Guy Armstrong presents a comprehensive exploration of mettā (loving-kindness) practice as one of the two essential wings of Buddhist practice, alongside wisdom. Drawing from the Theravāda tradition, he explains how mettā serves as the foundation of the four brahmaviharas - loving-kindness, compassion (karuṇā), joy (muditā), and equanimity (upekkhā). Armstrong discusses the traditional teaching where the Buddha instructed monks to use mettā practice for protection from fear, and shares contemporary examples including stories of the Dalai Lama embodying boundless love.

The talk provides practical guidance for integrating mettā with vipassanā practice during retreat, addressing when to shift between practices and how loving-kindness can soften difficult emotional states. Armstrong explains the traditional sequence of extending mettā from oneself to benefactors, friends, neutral persons, difficult people, and finally all beings everywhere, referencing the beautiful metaphor of cascading pools from classical texts. He emphasizes that mettā is not about fabricating feelings but uncovering our natural capacity for love, quoting the Buddha's teaching that "this mind is naturally radiant and brightly shining, but it's colored by visiting impurities." The session concludes with an extended question-and-answer period exploring the relationship between acceptance and transformation in practice.

The Practice of Loving Kindness

Tonight I'd like to talk about the practice of loving-kindness. I know John spoke about this some last night as well, and I think it's a great theme for the midpoint of the retreat. Your qualities of loving-kindness and compassion get a lot of testing in these days, so hopefully this offers a little more support.

It's said in the Buddhist tradition that just as a bird really needs two wings to fly, our practice needs two wings in order to soar, in order to come to its full ripening and maturity. These are said to be the wings of wisdom and, in one tradition, compassion. In our tradition, we could say love or loving-kindness.

The wing of wisdom is that which sees the way to freedom, what sees the Four Noble Truths. It's what sees how we get caught and how we find freedom in every moment. Only wisdom has this capacity. Wisdom is really the heart of our path. Vipassana is our primary practice because it is the wisdom practice in our tradition, and its essence is the unfolding of this truth of freedom, of liberation.

But just as important is the side of heartfulness of the human being—you could call it love, you could call it compassion. Where this isn't developed, there's not a sweetness, there's not a beauty, there's not a delight in life. That kind of delight, I feel, is what really has the potential to reach out and transform others, to inspire them, to encourage them, to make them feel safe and comforted and reassured in whatever line of work we find ourselves. Where that heart quality is there, it's such a great gift to the whole world, such a beautiful thing to share.

To some extent, the Vipassana practice by itself encourages this opening of heart. It really asks for this opening of heart. In every moment, the practice challenges us to open with real acceptance and non-conflict to our present moment experience—not to hang on when it's pleasant and not to resist when it's unpleasant. That takes a great deal of heartfulness, a great deal of giving of ourselves moment after moment.

For some people, that opening may be enough. My personal observation is that some people walking the path of Vipassana practice find that their hearts naturally and spontaneously open to a great degree, to a lovely degree, just through this one central practice. But also in my observation, there are people for whom that doesn't happen so easily or so spontaneously, and I count myself in the second group.

Where people's nature tends to be quite emotional, I think the opening of the heart proceeds rather spontaneously with the wisdom practice. But in my case, I felt that my opening of the heart, because I tend to be fairly cerebral, was really accelerated and really supported by the undertaking of specific heart practices, the metta practice being the primary one.

So I'd really like to encourage all of you to explore the metta practice to as great a degree as you feel drawn to it, both in the context of this Vipassana retreat and also to consider specific intensive metta retreats. I think it's a beautiful way to open.

In our tradition, which comes out of the Theravadan Buddhism of Thailand, Burma, and Sri Lanka, metta is considered the primary of the noble emotions. In other Buddhist traditions, it's probably compassion. But for us, it's considered to be this quality of loving-kindness, of friendliness, of warmth.

It's so extraordinary when we meet someone who has touched that in a really deep way. Some teachers have that deep heart quality and transmit that force of inspiration. I love to tell stories about the Dalai Lama, partly because I just like to hear them again, but also because he always manifests that in his being, in his presence.

He was at a peace conference in San Francisco a couple of summers ago. You know how in Asia, when people greet one another, they put their hands at their chest, and in the West, when we greet one another, we tend to put our hand out to shake the other person's hand. So the Dalai Lama, because he's such a beautiful bridge between cultures, was going through the whole conference representing both worlds in this kind of way—one hand at the chest, one hand extended and shaking, always out to greet people.

There was a lot of security at the conference, so there were guards at every door because he's a head of state as well as head of religion. Every time he went in and out through the doors to the outside, he would stop and acknowledge the security guards. He'd say a few words and he'd thank them for their work. Somebody said that at the end of the conference, the security guards were all in love with him. You could just imagine how many celebrities have gone in and out of those doors and never acknowledged that there was a person there. The Dalai Lama just took the time to make that personal connection, to feel their heart, to touch them.

The noble qualities of mind are talked about in this list called the Brahma-Viharas.

Brahma is heavenly. Vihara is abode or home. You can think of these as the divine abidings. I like to think of them as where consciousness hangs out when it's in a really heavenly state. They're the qualities of metta or loving-kindness, compassion or karuna, of joy or mudita, and equanimity or upekkha.

You're probably very familiar with them from watching the signs on the buildings every day. We thought it was a nice way to name the buildings so you could be staying in a state of joy or equanimity without having to sound schmaltzy about it. We also thought the Four Noble Truths might be kind of good, but we didn't want you staying in suffering, craving, cessation and path, so the Brahma-viharas were a little more appealing.

In our tradition, we really hold loving-kindness as the foundation of all the Brahma-viharas. It's the heart quality that develops an openness and a receptivity and a friendliness to everything we encounter. When that openness has been generated, has been established, the other qualities come about spontaneously.

When that open heart looks upon a state of suffering, whether it's in ourselves or in someone else, the natural response of that heart is compassion. Compassion is said to be the quivering of the open heart in response to suffering.

When that open heart meets happiness, ours or another's, the natural response is to resonate with that happiness with a sympathetic kind of joy, a resonant joy or an appreciative joy. This is the joy of mudita, of being able to take delight in others' happiness.

And when that open heart simply rests in its own experience, it can hold all the joys and sorrows of life in this beautiful balance that is equanimity. So the state of equanimity is not about having feelings go away, but it's rather about a balance and a spaciousness of mind that can hold them all—the times of suffering and difficulty, the times of joy and delight—and not be so deeply swayed by either side of our experience. This is the power of equanimity.

This quality of love, of course, is something we've all known very deeply, certainly as children and many times in our adult life. And I feel that for a lot of us, the whole pull of spiritual life is to uncover this quality that we know is within us, that we know is intrinsic, and be able to abide there.

This really was, when I look back, my main motivation in coming into Dharma practice. I had, as I mentioned before, come out of the 60s with a lot of confusion and a state of unhappiness and a lot of fear, and I just wasn't willing to live a life where love wasn't accessible, where it wasn't available to me day by day. For myself, I think it was the main reason that I took up practice. This call has always been so strong.

Rumi put it this way. He uses the word "you" to mean the beloved, the quality of the divine that evokes this feeling of love in us. He said, "I have three things to say. First, when I was apart from you, this world did not exist, nor any other. Second, whatever I was looking for was always you. Third, why did I ever learn to count to three?" This is the heart of the spiritual path.

In doing our metta practice, sometimes it might feel like we're contriving something. People come into interviews and they say, "Well, I like the idea of the metta, but these phrases just seem so phony, seem so contrived. Can't I just kind of hang out with that feeling of love in my heart?" And of course you can, if it's always there. More happiness to you.

The phrases are beautiful because they have a way of actually developing that quality of love. To me, it's an amazing gift that such a practice exists on this earth, a practice to evoke the quality of love from our hearts. But ultimately, it's not something we have to fabricate. It's part of our own nature.

I'm reminded of that because one of the most loving people I've ever met in my life was my grandmother. She was born in the countryside in North Carolina around 1890, was poor all her life, lived with one of the most cantankerous and ornery men that I've ever known, who was my grandfather. And through it all maintained this really sweet, unfailingly sweet disposition. She gave so much love to all of us as kids when we would come to visit them.

My most striking memory of her is every time we'd come into her house for a visit, she would give us a big hug and she would put her lips in the hollow of our neck and sort of grope around and sort of nuzzle us down there and say that she was trying to steal our sugar. She said, "I know it's here somewhere. I'm going to steal your sugar." That was just what she did to every kid who came in her house.

And she hadn't done any Buddhist practice at all. She hadn't even been in psychotherapy. So it's not that we actually have to drum up something that's not there. It's more a question of taking away the obscurations, taking away what's concealing or hiding the love.

The Buddha said, "This mind is naturally radiant and brightly shining, but it's colored by visiting impurities." So we need to be reminded from time to time that that's at our center, that love is really at our heart. Again, it's something that the Dalai Lama is so good at reminding us of.

He was at a conference last fall in Charlottesville, Virginia. It was a conference for Nobel Peace Prize winners.

So there were a lot of heavyweights there—the Dalai Lama, Bishop Desmond Tutu, and the other living Nobel Peace Prize laureates. It was a very august and solemn gathering, and they were going outside to have their pictures taken all together.

Desmond Tutu was standing in front of the Dalai Lama, and as they were posing for the camera, the Dalai Lama reached down and playfully ripped off Desmond Tutu's hat. The Bishop grabbed it back onto his head, and there's actually a photograph that recorded the incident—I'll put it on the bulletin board so you can see. The Dalai Lama is just breaking up in one of his big belly laughs after pulling this good joke on old Desmond Tutu. Such beautiful spontaneity.

One of the benefits of metta practice I feel most strongly is that it brings us happiness. It's kind of a paradox because we start off doing the practice thinking a lot about other people—wishing for their happiness, safety, and wellbeing. Maybe it helps them, and I hope it does. Actually, I believe that it does.

You've probably heard about the study done on patients in a hospital in San Francisco, where people recovering from operations and illness had their names divided into two groups. Half the names were sent to a Christian prayer group, and prayers were said for them. The other half was a control group with nothing done for them. The study showed that the fifty percent who were prayed for had statistically significant higher rates of recovery than those who weren't prayed for.

I believe in this kind of power of metta, although I can't prove it. We may never know whether our loving kindness for someone else helps them or not, but what we can definitely know is that it really affects us. It really helps us, really touches us.

Sylvia talked a few nights ago about the eleven benefits of loving kindness: you sleep easily, you wake easily, and you have pleasant dreams. People love you, devas love you, animals love you, and devas protect you. The mind is joyful, the face is serene, and you die peacefully. Sounds pretty good.

One of the people who comes to Spirit Rock every year is a Thai teacher named Ajahn Jomnian. He's one of the happiest people I've ever met. He sits up on the stage, and while his verbal teaching goes through spells of being really interesting and spells of being a little dry—he can talk for eight hours a day and never exhaust his lore of stories and dharma teachings—what I can always tune into is just his happiness level. He sits at the front of the room radiating these waves of wellbeing and joy.

Sometimes Jack or someone will ask him, "What would you like to do today?" and he'll say, "Well, are there people who want to hear the dharma? I'd like to go talk dharma to them." Usually there are, so we take him to the hall and he speaks dharma.

Other days we'll say, "Ajahn Jomnian, what would you like to do today? Would you like to see the Golden Gate Bridge? Go into San Francisco? Go out to Point Reyes?"

"Are there people who'd like to hear the dharma?" he asks. "But anything you want to do will make me happy. If you want to take me to San Francisco, I'd be happy with that. If you want to take me out in nature, I'll be happy with that. And if there are people who'd like to hear dharma, I'm happy there too."

He's always happy. He actually said on one of his visits that he hasn't had any anger for twenty-five years, and I believed it from his energy, from his vibration of joy.

One of the ways I feel that loving-kindness practice brings happiness is that it opens our practice to all of life.

It connects us with all living things in a really natural way, in a way that becomes an integral part of our dharma practice.

With vipassana practice, we can do it in a way that gets a little self-centered. It's not meant to be that way—that's not the way it's supposed to happen—but we can take it that way so that our vipassana practice becomes revolving around my pain, my difficulties, my neuroses, my progress, my happiness, my path, my liberation. It can become a little self-enclosed.

But with the loving-kindness practice, we stay with ourselves some, and then it opens us up to our benefactors, our friends, people we don't know very well, people we have difficulty with, and then all beings everywhere.

Shantideva, who was the ninth century Indian sage, put it this way: "Whatever joy there is in this world, all comes from wanting others to be happy. And whatever suffering there is in this world, all comes from wanting only myself to be happy." This is a really beautiful expression.

Part of what happens as we engage the practice of loving-kindness is that we break down some of the barriers that we hold between ourselves and the rest of the world. And it can remove the sense of loneliness that our own concepts have created—the self-created isolation of the view of an individual self.

This is from Sharon Salzberg's book, Loving Kindness: "The concepts of separateness that have dominated our lives have produced tremendous suffering. What we have taken to be real is in fact a hallucination. The division between self and other is the degradation of our highest human potential, the liberation of the mind that is love. The critical moment of the path which breaks open the loving heart is the realization that we have never existed as separate, isolated beings. When wisdom recognizes our oneness and sees the interconnectedness of all beings, it fills us with a degree of happiness that transforms our lives."

This practice was originally taught by the Buddha as a way to be protected from fear. He had instructed a group of monks to go off and meditate in the woods at night. They went out and sat down in a grove in the dark, and they came running back in a few minutes and said, "We can't meditate there. That place is full of spirits. We sat down and they started making sounds in all the trees and they were casting lights on us and they made these terrible smells. We can't stay in that grove. It's haunted."

The Buddha said, "Well, I'll give you the only protection you'll need." He taught them the metta practice and sent them back into the grove. They came back the next day and he asked them how it was. They said, "It changed everything. We started sending out thoughts of loving-kindness and well-wishing to all the spirits around us and they turned completely friendly. They said that they wanted to take care of us." So it transformed the world around and it transformed them.

Someone mentioned in an interview the other day that they had had to go out in the world in the middle of the retreat. They had decided to take up the loving-kindness practice while they were in the middle of a big public place. Making a quick transition from this environment to a crowd out there can be a little challenging. So they were feeling a little shaky, a little nervous in that setting. They started doing the metta practice and it immediately filled them with that sense of connectedness and took away the sense of fear and unease. It's really a great practice to do out in the world.

For a lot of years while I was commuting to work at Microsoft, I tried to do mindfulness while I was driving. It's difficult because the mind gets pulled out so often. So I switched to loving-kindness practice after a while. It was great because there was always somebody nearby. You notice that on Bay Area freeways? There's always somebody nearby. So there was always somebody to direct loving-kindness to. Even the people who cut in front of us really quickly. Oh, may you be happy too.

It's also a great antidote for aversion and ill will. It's said that anger really can't stick in a mind that's loving, in a mind that's friendly, because the mind has become so spacious and so open, the anger just can't find a foothold. The analogy is that it's like throwing paint through space and it can't adhere to the space because there's nothing there to stick on.

As you do the practice of metta, you don't need to have too grandiose an idea about what you're supposed to be feeling. Sometimes we talk about metta as boundless, unconditional love, and it seems really remote. Maybe the Buddha could touch it or Jesus, but for us, it doesn't seem very approachable.

Think about metta just as friendliness, just as a spark of connectedness. It has qualities like acceptance of ourselves and others. It has the quality of patience, the quality just of friendship, the quality of connection. Really the gist of it is to see another, see ourself, and just have the sincere thought, "Oh, I hope you're well." To look in the eyes of another human being or to hold them in our mind's eye and just to feel, "I hope things are good for you. I hope life is going well." That intent, that feeling is really the gist of the metta practice.

If you want to experiment with doing this practice as a real art, then before each phrase, have that feeling of connection and well-wishing in your heart, and then say the phrase so that the words flow naturally out of this feeling. "Oh, I hope you're well." That's really the heart of it. That's the seed. And if that feeling is there, the phrases will start to do their magic. They will start to unfold the love that's in us.

So you really don't need to force any particular feeling as you do the metta practice. You don't even have to try to feel any particular way as you say the phrases. Just let yourself feel that connection, the intention of wishing well, and then trust that the phrases will evoke that feeling in a stronger and stronger way. And don't worry if it feels dry or mechanical or rote, or that nothing's happening. Just trust that what you're doing is planting seeds—the seed of your good intention—and then watering it with the phrases. After that, you don't have to do anything else. Nature will take care of the rest. Nature will take care of bringing all those feelings forward.

It's a little bit like starting a fire by rubbing two sticks together. It really takes a lot of effort at first. You rub and rub and you get blisters on your fingers and you think nothing's ever going to happen. And then finally, after rubbing for a long time, this little wisp of smoke comes up. And then that wisp turns into a little flame. You give it some more shavings. It turns into a bigger flame and a bigger flame and so on. So there's this little bit of contriving at first in the metta practice. The rubbing of the stick is the saying of the phrases. But then once it gets going, it takes on its own life. It takes on its own warmth and heat. You can just trust in that.

I want to talk a little about how to integrate the metta practice with vipassana. So far, we've been giving some guided loving kindness once a day for about fifteen minutes, and you can also bring it into the start or the end of each sitting for five or ten minutes if you'd like to do that, if you connect with it, if you find it helpful.

You can also use the metta practice when you feel like you've gotten into a difficult place in the vipassana practice. If some particular mood or state of mind is coming up strongly—could be anger or fear or sadness—and you start to feel kind of overwhelmed by it, you can switch to doing the metta practice for a little while and see if that brings in a little different flavor. See if it brings in a little different quality in the mind, a little more softness, a little more acceptance that can just soften the mind around the difficulty. So you can use it if you feel overwhelmed.

You can use it if you feel a little stuck, like you've been relating to a difficult experience for some time and the mind is getting stuck in that groove. Bring in a little metta practice to just see if it'll transform the moment. Or if you just find yourself getting contracted and tense and a little hard in the vipassana practice, you can use the metta just to soften a bit.

Sometimes if we're connecting with really difficult experiences of fear or anger or sadness, it can seem like this wish for happiness is too theoretical. "Me? Happy? No way. Not possible." If it feels like the metta just is too idealistic or too remote, you can also try at that point the compassion practice.

Compassion is like loving kindness, but there's only one phrase. It's something like, "May I be free from this pain and sorrow?" And you can adjust the wording to more directly touch what you're actually experiencing. "May I be free from this fear" or "May I be free from this grief?" So you're relating directly with the feeling, but it starts to bring out a different quality of the heart.

There was a workshop today down in the lower meditation hall. I don't know if you had any sort of strays wandering up here. It's actually a benefit for Spirit Rock, put on by a fellow named Byron Brown, who's a teacher in the Diamond Heart approach. He's written a book called Soul Without Shame that teaches all about how to deal with the inner critic or the judging part of our nature—the same thing that Eugene explored through the image of Mara. In his benefit today, the workshop was along the same theme. He said that the single most useful thing in working with the judging mind is to bring compassion to ourselves.

So also anytime you feel that there's too much criticism, not enough self-acceptance, you can use the compassion phrase: "May I be free from this pain and sorrow."

You might also sort of keep in mind the metta and the compassion for the people who are arriving tomorrow evening as a way to make space, as a way to accept. And also, you know, they're going to be going through all the adjustments of the start of a retreat. You remember how that felt?

Not easy.

I want to talk a little about the different beings that the practice opens us up to. The image from the text is that metta is like a river that runs downhill in a stream and fills a pool that it runs into. And then as it fills that pool, that pool overflows and runs down the hill into the next pool. And then that pool gets filled and it overflows and runs down the hill into the next pool.

This is the image of developing the loving-kindness first with the people who are easy for us—with ourselves, with a benefactor, or with a friend. The idea is that when the metta for each of those people is overflowing, we let it run down the hill to the next person. Then let that build up and overflow. And then it runs down the hill to someone we don't know very well, a neutral person. Then it fills up and runs down the hill to someone that we may have difficulty with. And then it fills up and overflows to all beings everywhere.

There's a story about why we start with ourselves. It's said that at the time of the Buddha, one of his supporters was the king of Kosala named Pasenadi, who had a wife named Mallika and many consorts. One day the king asked Mallika, who was his queen, "Who do you love the most?" Being the king, he thought he knew what the answer should be to that question. She was also a follower of the Buddhist teachings, and she immediately said back to him, "Why, myself, of course."

He was shocked and took umbrage, and said, "Well, what do you mean?" She said, "Well, yes, I do. I look, and honestly, I love myself the most." So they thought they'd better go straighten this out. They went to the best marriage counselor that they knew, who was the Buddha, explained the situation to him and asked who was right.

And the Buddha said, "Why, the queen is right, of course." Then he said, "When I was still an unenlightened bodhisattva, I visited all the quarters of the universe with my mind and found no one dearer to me than myself. So likewise does every person hold himself or herself most dear. And who loves oneself can never harm another."

This is why we start with ourselves as really the foundation of the loving-kindness practice.

So as we develop the phrases as they relate to ourselves, let them be universal also. Let them be phrases that can apply to anyone, so that when you take up all the other people, the same phrases more or less can work. You can let them evolve, but you don't want to get too specific with anyone.

There was a woman at a metta retreat in Vancouver, and she was using the phrase, "May I live with ease." Then she was doing her son as a friend, and her son was about twenty years old and in college. She said, "When I got to this phrase, 'May you live with ease,' my mind rebelled. I thought he's living with too much ease already. He's staying at home and lying around in bed all day and I'm paying his bills and his tuition and his books. I don't want him to live with any more ease."

The phrase she wanted to use was "May you develop some backbone." And I said, "Well, I'm not sure that's really metta. It sounds like you're trying to fix him."

So with the metta phrases, we want to have the quality of acceptance—acceptance of people as they are—and not a phrase that tries to fix somebody.

As you play with the phrases, hopefully you'll find a good rhythm with them. Once the phrases become rhythmic for you, then one leads to the next, to the next, to the next. I started off working with long phrases, and over time they've evolved to be quite short. And now the short ones have that same rhythm.

But when I was working with the long phrases and getting them into a rhythm, they actually transmuted at one point into a country and western song, which I won't inflict on you because it might stay around for a while. But Sylvia actually said—and she said it publicly so I'm sure she won't mind my sharing it—that she often, in fact most of the time, sings her metta phrases. And that's a way to really keep them rhythmic, and that rhythmicness keeps them present, keeps them going.

So then working with a benefactor or a friend—this is lovely because in the metta practice, the practice really is to gladden the mind. That's the whole point of it, to make the mind joyful. So we get to hang out with these people that we love, like our benefactors and our friends.

The idea in the metta practice is that you go where the metta is easiest. Isn't this a great invitation? Go where it's easiest. If it's easiest with your benefactor, go there. If it's easiest with yourself, spend most of your time there. If it's easiest with a friend, go there.

It's really different for different people. One meditator said that they had to be with themselves for three years before they could open up to somebody else, before they could include anybody else in their loving kindness. Other people have to be with a benefactor or a friend for a long time before they can bring any of that love home for themselves. One meditator said the only being that she could feel any sort of loving kindness for, for months and months, was a stuffed animal. So that's fine too.

Really, whatever works—whether it's a child or a pet or a friend—wherever the metta flows, that's the place to start. And then trust that it can just flow down in those cascading pools to all the other beings that you want to turn to, so that eventually it becomes boundless. As it says in the Metta Sutta, "Even as a mother protects with her life, her child, her only child, so with a boundless heart should one cherish all living beings, radiating kindness over the entire world." This is said to be the supreme abiding.

I think that's probably a good place to stop for now with the talk. I'll just read one more quotation about the benefits of loving kindness, where the Buddha said, "Friends, whatever kinds of worldly merit there are from qualities like generosity and giving and sila—whatever kinds of worldly merit there are—all are not worth one sixteenth part of the heart deliverance of loving kindness in its shining and beaming and radiance. The heart deliverance of loving kindness far excels them all. Just as whatever light there is of stars, all is not worth one sixteenth part of the radiance of the moon."

So we have some time left, so we can open up for comments about your metta practice, if there's anything you'd like to share, if you have questions about metta practice.

[Question from practitioner about confusion between Vipassana instruction to see things as they are versus metta practice feeling like trying to change something]

It's a good question. This aspect of Vipassana practice—that it is only to see things exactly as they are and not to transform them—has a beautiful elegance to it. There's a simplicity and a cleanness. It's easy to get behind a practice like that. And it can also become a ground for a little bit of intellectual favoritism, you might say. Some people actually look down on the metta practice because it's not intellectually as clean or elegant as Vipassana or mindfulness practice.

But actually, mindfulness practice is also primarily a skillful means. We use mindfulness practice in order to purify the heart of greed, aversion, and delusion. It's a factor of the path. And when it has done its work of purification of greed, aversion and delusion, it's not needed anymore. As the Buddha said, when you reach the other shore, you can toss the raft away. So mindfulness, similarly, although it has this beautiful elegance and cleanliness about it, is just another skillful means that's really designed for purification.

So I would look on the metta practice also in the light of skillful means. If it can be brought to bear on a moment where there's suffering and it can transform that moment of suffering into a moment of ease or happiness or relaxation, that's a great path factor also. Basically, the way the Buddha defined right effort was that it's to develop wholesome states of mind and abandon unwholesome states of mind. So whatever tools we can find that are consistent with our practice to do that, I think are really wonderful.

And the metta practice isn't really about making ourselves happy by our will in that moment. The only effort of will in the metta practice is this sort of wishing ourselves well. It's just looking on ourselves and saying, "I hope you're happy." That's the right amount of effort. That's the right effort in metta. It's not to try and put ourselves in a happy place or make ourselves happy, but just connecting with that sincere wish. "Oh, I really hope for my own happiness, or I really hope for your happiness." That's all.

[Another practitioner shares about being recommended metta when wanting to do Vipassana, becoming angry about being recommended loving kindness practice, then becoming disappointed in themselves for the whole cycle]

There must be a poetic justice in there somewhere.

There must be some poetic justice in there somewhere, indeed. I guess it builds humility, if nothing else.

Someone shared a profound observation about the convergence of metta and wisdom—how these two paths ultimately meet at the same destination. This mirrors what we find in Hindu traditions as well, where both the bhakti path of devotion and the jnana path of knowledge lead to the same realization.

She described working with a deep, tender wound—something so raw that any direct approach felt too aggressive. The only way forward was to surround it with compassion, returning again and again to gentleness when everything else proved too much. In that space of infinite tenderness, a phrase arose: "I'm not there." And in that recognition came the wisdom that it's the "I" that creates the suffering.

This beautifully illustrates how wisdom and love are inseparably joined in our deepest nature. We might say that our most fundamental essence is emptiness, but as soon as something appears in that vastness, love is there—love and wisdom together. They're the most essential aspects of who we are.

Developing wisdom naturally supports love; developing love naturally supports wisdom. It's actually quite difficult to remain truly loving without wisdom guiding us. And here we discover one of the great mysteries: when we can simply be with suffering without adding anything to it, the suffering transforms itself. When we step out of the way of our own knots, they unravel on their own.

In working with both vipassana and metta practice around emotional difficulties, I've found that the traditional compassion phrase "May I be free from this pain and sorrow" can sometimes feel too intrusive—almost aversive in its undertone of wanting the pain to leave. I've softened this for myself, often using the phrase "I care about this pain" or "I care about this sorrow." This gentler approach allows for a less active way of being present with difficulty.

Someone asked about practicing metta aloud. While I haven't explored this extensively myself, I've heard others do it beautifully. There's wisdom in this approach—speech actions are said to be more karmically potent than mental actions, so speaking metta might indeed be more powerful. Speaking aloud also helps prevent the mind from wandering, making it harder to drift into other thoughts while actively voicing the practice.

A question arose about the relationship between metta and bodhicitta in the Tibetan tradition, where it's taught that full Buddhahood cannot be achieved without bodhicitta because it takes us beyond ourselves. While we don't make that exact claim in this tradition, there's profound wisdom in the bodhicitta teachings.

Bodhicitta—literally meaning "awakened mind" but perhaps better translated as "awakening heart"—recognizes that our inner transformation naturally changes our impact on the world. This understanding can become a source of motivation: we practice not only for our own liberation but because we see how deepening our understanding benefits others.

This might seem like a stretch early in practice, but the more we meditate, the more clearly we see the ripples extending outward. In a gathering like this, I imagine many of you have already witnessed how your meditation practice has transformed your work life—whether you're teaching, doing social work, parenting, or perhaps bringing mindfulness into stress reduction programs. The degree to which you've transformed yourself is already impacting the world around you.

Bodhicitta invites us to take this reflection and weave it back into our motivation, saying: "Yes, this is why I want to practice."

I want to practice in order that I can be of most help in the world. Because if I don't purify within, there's a limit to how useful I can be in helping others to come out of suffering.

So there's a very deep connection between bodhicitta and metta, or between bodhicitta and compassion. It's really taking that caring for other people and bringing it back into the very motivation that sustains our practice. I think they're very closely linked and they really support each other. I'll probably talk a little more about bodhicitta in a few nights.

A student asked about metta in daily life, wondering when to choose different focuses for loving-kindness practice. She also shared how she turns to metta when feeling sorrow for loved ones going through difficult times - aging parents and a friend facing cancer for the third time. She questioned whether using metta to quiet her mind in these situations might be avoidance.

Let me address the second question first because it's simpler. If the situation externally is such that you really can't do anything to benefit them, then metta can be a way of yourself coming to more peace with that reality. In that case, I think it's skillful. If there is in fact something you could be doing, but you might use metta in order not to feel the pain of wanting to act, that could be avoidance. But if there's really nothing you can do, then the most important thing is to be at peace within yourself about that reality. Whether it's sending metta to yourself or to them, that may be the most skillful thing you can do in that setting. So I don't think it's avoidance.

In terms of metta in daily life, it's really up to you who you feel drawn to use as your focus for loving-kindness. It's absolutely fine to take yourself for long periods of time. What I usually do in my daily metta practice is focus on myself a little bit and either a benefactor or a friend for a little bit - a little of me and a little of somebody else. But there are times when I might really feel like doing all beings for a long time, or focusing on a particular friend. The nice thing about going through all the categories is that you learn metta can work with anybody. That's the core teaching. It can work with people we like, with people we dislike, with people we don't know. Once you understand that, then you can start to activate metta in any relationship in your life.

Let me share something from my own experience this past year. I had a difficult relationship with someone, and it was coming into my metta practice a lot. I'd be doing metta, trying to generate these caring thoughts, and then I'd find this situation arising and I'd start getting really angry about it.

I started to look at the anger more closely because in most Buddhist texts, the word used for the second hindrance - in the list of the five hindrances - is not anger. The word most often used is "ill will," a translation of the Pali vyāpāda. I started to let that resonate in my mind, and it really changed my understanding of what metta is.

I saw that what was happening when I was angry at someone is that I wanted them to feel bad. In anger, as it says in the texts, it's like picking up a hot coal and getting ready to throw it at somebody else. But before it can reach them, it burns me. The other analogy used is that it's like picking up excrement and wanting to soil somebody else. But before it soils them, it soils me.

I started to realize that I was really wishing this other person to feel bad. That was really what was going on in my anger. And that's really what ill will is - we want someone else to feel bad. I thought, I don't need to do that. So I started doing metta for them, and it was just a little shift to see, "Oh, I actually can wish that they feel okay." I could sincerely wish that they feel okay. Even though I was upset with them, that was not a very big step. It didn't make me like them any better, but I no longer wished them ill. And I found it very easy after that.

Anytime the anger would start to come up, I'd just make that little step from ill will to good will, and I'd start practicing metta for them. And it was very accessible. It didn't mean that I fell in love with them. It just meant I stopped wishing them bad. So I found it very, very helpful with people outside.

Okay, one more question. Chris.

You used as an example that story about the control group and the people who were praying, being prayed for, and the people who weren't. And I'm wondering if you think it would be fair to say that metta is supposed to include a form of prayer.

I think of it that way myself. I do think of it as the form of prayer in our practice. And you know, there are two ways to look at prayer. One is we pray in order to get the results, but honestly, that's just attachment. The other way to look at it is that we pray because it purifies our heart.

And I think that's the truth of the benefit of prayer. When we pray, we open our heart to all the possibilities of the universe. We state our wish, which is, I really wish that all beings are happy and healthy and safe. We state it even as we know that's not always true. So we kind of let go of the result even as we say the wish. But the wish can really be true. The wish is really wholesome. And that opens us up in that really receptive way that kind of takes the individual will out of the situation. So I think it's a lot like prayer in that way.

Thank you.

Okay, let's close here. It's just about 8:15 and in a minute it will be time for walking. But before we close and before you leave, this is Marie's last night up on the podium with us. And she wanted to say a farewell.

CHAPTER 218

Motivation In Practice

Guy Armstrong · 59 min

In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the vital role of motivation in Buddhist practice, emphasizing that intention (cetanā) is the seed of all spiritual action. Drawing from the Therīgāthā (Verses of the Elder Nuns), he shares the powerful stories of early practitioners like Sīhā and Paṭācārā, whose extraordinary perseverance through suffering led to liberation. Armstrong discusses how motivation naturally evolves through different phases of practice - from initial comfort-seeking to deeper acceptance, and ultimately toward the bodhicitta aspiration for universal liberation. He addresses common challenges like doubt (vicikicchā) when facing difficult experiences, the tendency to seek special states, and periods of apparent stagnation. The talk includes practical guidance on recognizing when motivation drops due to resistance to unwanted experiences, and offers the Buddha's teaching on not stopping short of the 'heartwood' - complete and unshakable deliverance of mind. Armstrong encourages practitioners to hold their deepest spiritual goals with maturity, trusting that consistent mindfulness naturally unfolds toward liberation while honoring each person's unique healing journey and practice intensity.

I wanted to talk tonight about motivation in our practice. The first thing I want to say is that sometimes when you hear someone is going to talk about motivation, you might wonder if something is wrong with yours. Are they telling me this because there's a problem here? I want to say up front that this is not a remedial talk.

I'm very touched every day by the people that I meet and the extraordinary amount of motivation that everyone is bringing to their practice. This is not in any way an attempt to fix anything anyone is doing, but rather to share some reflections from my own practice and observations that I hope might speak to you or touch some points that we share together. I'd especially like to dedicate this talk to those of you in the room who were the best yogi today—because I know you all had really fine motivation.

In the interview groups today, some of us looked into the question of what we're doing here. In my group, I asked the people I was meeting with to look and see what their deepest intention was in undertaking this retreat. Being here for three weeks is a long time—it's essentially infinite once you get into it. You'll feel that it's a long time.

There were a lot of really beautiful answers to that question. You could tell that everyone in the group had done quite a bit of practice before. There were answers like healing—healing of the body or healing of the heart—opening of the heart, wanting to look into the arising of the sense of self. Where does this mysterious thing called "I" come from? A greater ability to rest in our true nature, trusting that at the center we're all pure in the sense of wisdom and compassion, and being able to rest more in that. Becoming less reactive from our conditioned or habitual reactions. Learning to listen more deeply within ourselves. Being able to connect again and again with a deep sense of peacefulness and calm.

These are all really beautiful intentions, and they're intentions that can sustain you over a long period of retreat.

We ask this question for two reasons. One, it helps us to know what you're here for, because then we understand better your process and can better guide where you might want to go. But also because there's this age-old truth that what somebody else tells us we don't remember very well, but what we tell somebody else we remember really well. The hope is that by speaking your intentions aloud, you would remember them, and when the time comes in the retreat when you start to wonder what on earth you're doing here, these ideas might come back to you and help you find your way, find your direction.

I love the way that Sylvia put it last night. If I remembered correctly, what we're doing here is discovering and cultivating our natural capacity for wise discernment and compassionate response. I really like this statement because when you look at it closely, it actually includes the whole of the Eightfold Path. There's the compassionate response, which is the area of conduct. There is the cultivation of a natural capacity, which is the whole area of mental training or meditation. And there's the development of wise discernment, which is the area of wisdom. So conduct, meditation, and wisdom—this really is the Eightfold Path all in one sentence. It's a good little formula to remember. It says a lot.

But this quality of intention is itself a very root quality. We touched on it last week, for those of you who were here, when we talked about karma and how the whole unfolding of our journey—the spiritual journey—takes place according to the laws of cause and effect. That cause and effect concatenation or unfolding begins from intention. Intention is the seed that forms the heart of our actions.

In Tibetan, they say it this way: everything rests on the tip of motivation. If our motivation is pure and wholesome, our whole unfolding will be beautiful and pure. If our motivation and intention are in the direction of liberation and spiritual deepening, then that's the way our life will unfold.

There's a tremendous power when we incline the mind in a spiritual direction. This force of intention is tremendous in a very mysterious kind of way. I can't even begin to understand all the workings of it. But I know that the mind contains everything within it—contains all potentials. When we urge it and feed it and nourish it in a given direction, it has the elasticity, it has the pliability, and it definitely has the talent to grow that way. So all the intentions that were mentioned earlier in my group will all help unfold your being in a very beautiful way, in a way that leads to a lot of blessings.

You know, this term "attachment" is kind of a dirty word in Buddhist thought, but the Buddha himself didn't always view it that way. He was giving instructions to the monks one day, and he uttered this verse: "Let not a person revive the past, or on the future build their hopes. For the past has been left behind and the future has not been reached. Instead, with insight, let them see each presently arisen state. Let them know that and be sure of it, invincibly, unshakably."

One who dwells thus ardently by day and by night—it is he or she who has one fortunate attachment. If we're a little attached to our intentions, that's perfectly fine. That's a fortunate kind of attachment. This abiding in the present and being able to see each presently arisen state, dwelling ardently, is a fortunate attachment.

So all these intentions lead in the direction of the beautiful. They all lead in the direction of happiness. And yet each intention has its own flavoring, its own character or personality. The intention of healing, for example, has a different flavor in our life, in our heart, than the intention of seeing the nature of the self—the personal I, the small self that arises. It has a different flavor than the interest in simply abiding in peacefulness.

Because of these different flavors, different people, as you practice here, will have different outer forms. I think of it a little like a recipe book. If you want to bake a soufflé, you have to be delicate with it. You can't go stomping around the kitchen, and you don't crank up the heat to the highest level. You may have to turn it up for a while and back down to get the browning just right on top.

In healing also, there's a delicate balance of the heat or intensity of practice that's needed. So someone who is here primarily to do healing of body or heart might have an outward form where the temperature isn't so high—the intensity of their retreat is not as high.

Someone who is here to really look into the structure of the self—maybe that's more like baking a pizza. You can't do much to hurt a pizza. And so you can crank the temperature up and really go for the sittings late at night and early in the morning. Be really meticulous with your noting, slow down and be very precise, very present, put in maximum effort. That's the way you'll see how the self is put together.

As you start to get a sense of each other over these days, please have an understanding that different people are practicing with different intentions. They're all wonderful. And as you practice with different intentions, the outer form might look different. So please have respect. If you're one of the more speeded up ones, try not to knock over the people who are going at what we call "snail's pace vipassana" in the lunch line, in the walking room. Just be sensitive to those who are really slowed down. If you're really slowed down, also try to be spacious and loving toward people who are going a little faster. We're all doing just the work that we need to do.

An interesting thing about motivation is that it itself is a factor of the path. I'll talk later about how it fits into how the Buddha discussed it, but it itself is a factor of our awakening. And as such, it develops as our practice develops. The motivation isn't a static thing that we take up in the beginning of practice and remains the same until the end. It's a living thing. It's something that grows when it's supported by understanding, when it's supported by loving-kindness, when it's supported by balance of mind.

Particularly when we come into retreat, those of you who are starting a retreat now, the motivation will feel very different today than it might a few days later. I know when I start a retreat, I usually get preoccupied in the first couple of days with one goal: I just want to make myself more comfortable. Peace, freedom, liberation, healing—forget it. I just want to sit for an hour without my back aching. I just want to find out when I can take my shower and not have to scramble in the bathroom. I want to know that I'll be able to eat the food, that I'll be able to sleep at night.

So I find in the early days of retreat, my mind is turning around a lot of little issues. If you've seen the mind turning that way today, that's fine. That's normal. That's just part of the settling-in process. And with it, there may be a little struggle with not being at home in the body yet because it's kind of achy, or not being at home with the mind because you've told it to stay on the breath, but it's really all over the place—past and future. You may find yourself wishing you were somewhere else altogether.

This kind of struggle is really natural in the early days. It's just an indication of the settling in. And then somehow after a couple of days, something just seems to click—usually for me and I know for a lot of people—and suddenly a factor of acceptance comes in. A deep factor of acceptance. And the mind that was struggling with the body pain can now be still in the middle of it. The mind that was struggling with wandering and being away from the breath can now accept it in a non-judging way. It's okay that the mind goes off. That's what minds do. So then the motivation becomes a little more pure.

Instead of trying to make ourselves comfortable, we realize, oh, I'm comfortable enough. And the motivation becomes, ah, I don't need to change my experience now. What can I learn from it? This is a really wonderful shift because we become open to our experience, to our life in a much deeper way, a much more authentic way. We don't need it to be a certain way. Rather, we can just be a student and say, how is life, and what can I learn from it just the way it is?

When our motivation is strong, everything in the practice seems workable. It's such a key influence. When we're interested, when we're excited, when we're enthusiastic, when we're passionate, when we're dwelling ardent, as the Buddha said, everything else seems workable. The ups and downs of the heart, the aches and pains of the body, the restless mind—it's all okay. But then from time to time the motivation seems to go somewhere south, and we really wonder, what am I doing here?

So I want to look a little bit at the cycles of motivation in practice and also talk about some enduring kinds of motivation for us.

I was on a self-retreat a few years ago. I had just decided that I wanted to spend some time not in a group and not having an external schedule. Some friends have a cabin in upstate New York that they offered. So I went to stay there for two months—actually the months of October and November. It's out on about 500 acres of farmland, and from the cabin I couldn't see another house. I was really quite alone, quite secluded in a beautiful natural setting.

My friends lived a few miles away and once a week one of them would come over and ask me what food I needed, then she'd go out shopping for me and bring me the groceries. Then I might not see her again for a week. So I spent those two months really very much on my own.

Well, I was a California kind of guy, and I thought October and November, pretty good weather, snow usually doesn't fall until about Thanksgiving. So I just showed up in my Birkenstocks and my sneakers. Big mistake.

This year in upstate New York, the snow started to fall about the 1st of November. And all of November was really snowy. So from about the 1st of November till the 15th, every day it was snowing or it was raining or it was cloudy and I didn't see the sun. Because I only had sneakers and Birkenstocks, it was getting really difficult to do my walking practice outside. My feet were getting cold and wet and my shoes were soaked, so I was getting discouraged about that.

What I did finally was take some plastic produce bags that my friend had bought groceries in and tie a plastic produce bag around each foot. So that was my makeshift boots. Then with my plastic produce bags I could go do my walking meditation out in the snow. I'd clear a walking path and go walking in the snow and then I was fine. The produce bags would last about a day and they'd rip through and I'd have to put new ones on.

The days went by and the sun didn't come out and the snow kept falling, the wind kept blowing, and I was all alone on this mountaintop. I started to really get discouraged. I just started to feel, what am I doing here? You've probably heard that phrase once or twice in retreat yourself. And I thought I should really go back to California. It'd be much better. I know there'll be some sunshine still in the Bay Area. It'll be a little warmer. I'll at least be able to walk outside.

But unfortunately, I'd sublet my house. So I really had nowhere to come home to.

Then one day I came down from a sitting and I looked out the window and it was snowing again. And I just felt, I just want to get out of here. I just didn't want to stay. And of course, we have a name for this in our practice. We call it doubt. When you don't feel like being here, we recognize it as a hindrance, and it's called doubt.

So I got sort of curious. I thought, well, I teach about this. I ought to know something about it. So I started looking at it, and what I saw is that that urge to get away was coming up right after I had a really uneasy feeling. The weather and the grayness and the isolation, the solitude were bringing out in me some kind of despair. It was like touching some part of myself that I really wasn't comfortable with.

I wasn't used to feeling that despair, that loneliness. I didn't like it. And the doubt wasn't really because I didn't like the weather or because it was cold outside. It was because I didn't like this feeling in my heart.

When I saw that, I could say, "Oh, so I just need to open to that despair." And when I could accommodate it, then it was okay again.

It was a really good lesson. My motivation had gone away because I was experiencing something I didn't like. It was really, really simple. This often happens when motivation drops. Do you notice your motivation doesn't usually go away after your best sitting of the retreat? You know, you come in and you have forty-five minutes where you're really settled and really with the breath, and after that you start thinking, "Oh, maybe I'll sign up for two months next year, or maybe I'll go sit the three-month course in Barre."

But when doubt comes in is when there's been something difficult. So this is a really good pointer. When the motivation drops, take a look and see: what was it that was difficult? What in your experience did you have trouble opening to? What did you have trouble accepting in yourself?

Sometimes we get discouraged in practice because we want something special. There was one retreat I was on where I had heard about this particular insight into impermanence, and I really wanted it. Everybody was talking about it. Books were talking about it. Teachers were talking about it. I thought, "I should have it." And I tied myself up into knots looking for this one particular experience about impermanence. When it didn't come, I got very frustrated, I got very judgmental, and I felt basically like quitting. Didn't get it that whole retreat.

A few years later, I got it. Not such a big deal—hardly worth worrying about. But sometimes the discouragement comes because we're expecting something special. So look at that too. Is there a special result you're seeking?

Sometimes starting a new retreat, we want to repeat a really favorite experience from our last retreat. But the funny thing is that favorite experience often happened eight days in, or ten days in, or longer. But we want it back the first day. "Oh, that should be happening by now." So look and see if there's an expectation about some particular experience.

Sometimes in retreats we want some special experience because it validates us. It validates us as a good meditator. It validates our experience. And we can get disappointed if it's not happening.

Sometimes in practice we hit these periods that are a little bit like a plateau where things are going along smoothly, but it's not very dramatic, and we think, "Oh, nothing's happening now." Actually, those plateau periods often have a lot going on under the surface—a lot of integration, or a lot of gathering of energies, preparing for another deepening—but it may seem like nothing special's happening. At times like that, Joseph Goldstein, one of my teachers, used to say that he would just tell himself, "Look, your job is just to sit and walk. The Dharma takes care of all the rest." So we can remind ourselves of that. All we have to do is sit, walk, and be present. Everything else is up to the Dharma, not our responsibility.

Sometimes in times of low motivation I really take a lot of inspiration from other meditators. I was sitting in the fall in Massachusetts for six weeks, and there was a woman who was sitting with me named Anne Creamer. She's someone I've known over the last several years, and I've come to have a really deep affection and appreciation for her.

Anne is seventy-seven years old. I know she wouldn't mind my sharing that because she tells everybody who'll listen. She lives in Santa Fe with her sister Rita, who is eighty-one.

Then my mind became free.

I saw clearly the difficulty of this world, this samsara. My heart came to rest. As I stood there, I saw the immense suffering inherent in existence. My meditation deepened, my mindfulness strengthened, and my bondage was torn apart. Only then did I sit down at the foot of the tree, profoundly happy and peaceful.

I had reached the end of suffering. All my fetters were severed. That was a nun's commitment—and fortitude.

There's another story that I find equally inspiring about a woman named Vasitthi. She had an especially difficult life by any standard. She was a courtesan, and had been abandoned by her lover. She had a child who died, and then she herself became quite ill. She was poor and had to resort to begging for survival. When she heard the Buddha teach, she also ordained as a nun.

After her ordination, she practiced with tremendous dedication. But even after years of meditation, she still had not reached awakening. She was getting quite old, and began to worry that she would die without having achieved realization. Then one day, she was doing walking meditation, and she tripped. As she was falling, in that moment of completely letting go, her mind opened and she awakened.

She left this beautiful poem: "I was a courtesan, elaborately dressed, my mind was intoxicated with my own beauty. I looked down on other women. Then old age came upon me, destroying my beauty. My body became weak and shaky. I've lived in the forest, lived in a hut, meditated at the foot of trees. I have reached the state of no-desires. I have done what the Buddha taught."

These women inspire me so deeply. They faced tremendous difficulties—physical hardship, emotional turmoil, years of unrewarded practice—and yet they persevered. Their faith in the Dharma carried them through periods when they might have reasonably given up.

Just then my heart was set free.

We may presume that she untied the noose, returned to the community, and left us this amazing poem. Sometimes in the depths of discouragement, liberation breaks through when we least expect it. Sometimes when we're pushed to an edge we didn't know we could tolerate, some of our greatest openings come—unexpectedly, completely as a surprise.

That's one story I cherish from the early women practitioners, but there's another that moves me even more deeply. This is the story of a nun named Patachara. I'd like to tell you something about her life before she encountered the teachings, because I think it's profoundly moving.

She was brought up in northern India in a fairly well-to-do family. Her father was a banker. The family was stable—the mother was at home, and she also had a brother. It was a family of four, and she was well looked after. As she came into puberty, her family arranged a marriage for her with a suitable young man in the same village. It would be a match of equals, and she could have expected a very comfortable middle-class lifestyle from this arranged marriage.

However, Patachara, for better or for worse, had fallen in love. The person she was in love with was a servant in the village—not somebody who in that rigid caste system was considered her match or equal for marriage and child-rearing. Her parents forbade her to be with her lover and insisted that she carry out the arranged marriage with the other young man.

Patachara wouldn't do it. She ran away from home with her lover. They settled in another part of India and made their living through simple trades, but got by. She became pregnant, and she felt that having this child far away from her family was dangerous. So she said to her husband, "I know I haven't spoken to my family for a long time, but I want to go back and have my child in my parents' home, because I feel I'll be well looked after there."

Her husband agreed, but he kept procrastinating. Finally she saw he wasn't going to do anything, so she took off by herself. He realized she'd gone and made haste to catch up with her. They reached her parents' home, she had the child safely, reconciled with her parents, and then returned to where she and her husband had been living with their newborn baby.

She raised the child, a few years passed, and she became pregnant again. Again she said to her husband, "I'd like to go back to my parents' home to have our second child." He agreed but kept procrastinating. So again, she took off by herself with the eldest child.

They were on the way to her parents' home when a great storm broke out. The husband realized they had left and made haste to catch up with them, arriving just as the storm was breaking. Great rains were falling, the wind was blowing, it was cold. The husband set off with a machete to chop down trees and branches to make a shelter for the night. While he was in the forest gathering materials, he was bitten by a poisonous snake and died on the spot.

When he didn't return, Patachara went looking for him and found him dead. Just at that time, she began to give birth to her second child. In the middle of this intense storm, as rain fell and winds howled and night was falling, she gave birth alone. All night long she tried to cover both children with her own body, having no shelter. She let the rains fall on herself while trying to keep her children dry. They survived the night.

In the morning she picked up the newborn baby, led the older child who could walk, and made her way grief-stricken toward her parents' home. They came to a river mightily swollen by all the rain. It was too dangerous for the youngest child to cross alone, so Patachara carried her baby across and set it down on the other side. As she was recrossing to get her oldest child, a hawk swooped down from the sky, picked up the newborn baby, and carried it away.

The mother screamed at the hawk to let go, but it didn't. The newborn was gone. But the older child thought her screams were calling him to come, and he plunged into the river and was swept away by the flood.

Within twelve hours, Patachara had lost her husband and both children. Totally devastated, she continued alone to her parents' village. When she arrived, she saw a villager on the outskirts.

And they recognized each other. She asked him to share news of her family, but he replied, "Ask me anything but that." When she insisted, he reluctantly told her that during the previous night's storm, her parents' house had collapsed, killing her mother, father, and brother.

Having lost everything in the world, Patachara went mad with grief. It was completely devastating, completely overwhelming, and she descended into insanity. In her state of grief, shock, and madness, she could no longer care for herself. It is said that she wandered throughout that part of India, her clothing wearing through and falling away. Much of the time she wandered naked, and when people occasionally gave her rags to wear, these too would wear through and fall off.

This is where her name originates—Patachara means "cloak wearer." When she approached villages, people would drive her away, saying, "Here comes the mad woman. Drive her away."

Finally, during one of her wanderings, she encountered the Buddha. In her state of incomprehension, unable to understand what was happening around her, and wearing no clothes, she approached him. The Buddha said simply, "Sister, please recover your mind."

With that simple statement, he brought her out of her insanity and she recovered her senses. Seeing that she stood naked among a group of people, she accepted a robe someone offered and covered herself.

Then she had this interchange with the Buddha. "Help me," she said, and told him her terrible story.

He replied, "Patachara, don't think you have come to someone who can help you."

What an incredible statement—don't think you have come to someone who can help you. He continued, "In your many lives, you have shed more tears for the dead than there is water in the four oceans."

This made her grief less heavy. He went on to explain that when she herself went to another world, no kin could help her, and that even in this world, no kin can truly help. Then he taught her about the Buddhist path.

When he had finished, she asked to be ordained. The message was that he could not help her because she had to come to understanding herself. She had to find the motivation and interest to look deeply and closely into life for herself.

Patachara, ordained as a bhikkhuni, received the teachings and then practiced. She was not one who heard and understood immediately—she too had to practice. This is the poem she left:

When they plow their fields and sow seeds in the earth, when they care for their wives and children, young Brahmins find riches. But I've done everything right. I followed the rule of my teacher. I'm not lazy or proud. Why haven't I found peace?

We can do everything right in our practice, and still the karmic accumulations, the habitual conditions of mind, are so strong that it can take time to release them, to break through them. "I've done everything right—why haven't I found peace?"

Bathing my feet one day, I watched the bathwater spill down the slope.

To me, those lines have such a sense of clear seeing—not a great intrusion of "I" or "mine" or owning or confusion, just bathing the feet and watching the bathwater run down the slope.

I concentrated my mind the way you train a good horse. Then I took a lamp and went into my cell, checked the bed and sat down on it. I took a needle and pushed the wick down. When the lamp went out, my mind was freed.

And then she herself became a great teacher, said to have brought awakening to a number of other nuns, a number of other bhikkhunis.

This story really touches me deeply because it's hard to imagine a greater need for healing than Patachara's. It's hard to imagine a heart more wounded than hers. And yet even through this difficult work of healing from madness of the most extreme kind, and practicing for years—you know that she felt the residue of that difficult period all through her being—just with the steadiness of attention and that opening of clear seeing, the freedom came, the freedom dawned.

This kind of story points me to certain turning points in motivation that I wanted to mention. First is when we first come into the practice and we see the potential for some easing of our suffering, some possibility of greater peace. I still remember how powerful my first retreat was for me—touching a depth of peace I had never known before and how sweet it was, how satisfying that peace was. It really gives us faith that the third noble truth is for us. This possibility of the end of suffering is for us. It's not just people in old stories that find this kind of peace, but it's you and I, here, today, now, who can find this peace.

And from that faith then comes effort. Actually the Buddha drew this link in a teaching called The Chain of Dependent Arising in the Transcendental Sense—that suffering led to faith and faith led to effort, and effort basically led to happiness and release. So we undertake the practice and we find that we can discover more peace, we can discover more happiness. A greater degree of contentment comes in.

But this itself can be a turning point in motivation because if originally we practiced in order to heal, in order to overcome suffering, when the contentment comes, then what are we here for? What are we here for if the suffering isn't weighing so much?

I was in a three-month retreat one time and I had an insight that I thought was kind of special. It brought me a lot of really kind of amazing sense of freedom. So I went to tell my teachers about it, and I thought they should think it was kind of special too. And they didn't seem to think it was very special at all. They didn't seem to make a big deal about it.

I'd actually been sitting in my room for a couple of days after I had this insight, just reflecting on what a special insight this was. And then they said, "Nah, no big deal." One of my teachers actually said to me—she'll remain nameless—"You're not very deep. I can tell by the way you walk in the room, you're not very deep. So-and-so"—and then they named a good friend of mine who was also sitting—"so-and-so is much deeper than you are."

We promise not to say that to any of you.

And I got a little discouraged, because I still thought it was a pretty cool insight. And far from being appreciated, I felt like it was not appreciated at all. So I became very discouraged at this point. For the rest of the retreat, I felt like I was just kind of wandering and struggling to keep up with the schedule. It was actually many years later before I met a teacher who could put that insight into some kind of perspective for me so that I actually came to feel that it was as special as I had come to feel it was.

If you don't get the answer you want from one of us, try another. That's why you have two teachers for your interviews.

It actually took my motivation a while to recover from that, because two things had happened. One is in touching this place of greater freedom, some of the reason I had for practicing went away. I'd actually reached one of the things I was looking for, was understanding freedom in a really deep way. And then the other thing that was discouraging was that it wasn't validated. So I was left with this not knowing or this level of confusion.

Sometimes when you reach that kind of next rung of contentment, don't be surprised if the motivation sort of falls off for a while. Don't beat yourself up or think you're doing something wrong. I think it's really natural, and I think it's a sign that maybe it's time to enjoy the fruits of your practice for a while. Enjoy the happiness and the spaciousness and the peacefulness that you've opened to. Really bask. Take some time to bask in the blessings that the practice has opened for you.

And then after a while of basking, after the confusion died down, I started to see, "Oh, you know what? There's a lot more contentment now. There's a lot more happiness and there's a lot more peacefulness and there's still suffering."

It didn't finish the job. So over time, even though that suffering was more subtle, I was more sensitive. And so it felt like it was chafing also, the new, more subtle kinds of unhappiness. And then that motivated me to go back and practice more.

Someone in the interview group today in talking about intention said something that really excited me. She said in the last retreat that she had been at, she had some real opening in the course of the retreat and went to her teacher and said, "I want to be free." Stated it really strongly for herself and out loud for her teacher: "I want to be free."

This can be another really beautiful turning point in motivation—when we realize that it's not really enough just to come out of some of our suffering, but we really want to find the way out of suffering altogether and not to stop until we find that limitless freedom that the Buddha talked about over and over again. This is a beautiful motivation because it's a very long, enduring one. It's one that can be with you for the rest of your life, the rest of your practice.

There's another shift in motivation that happens. You know, we talk a lot about this factor of selflessness or anatta, coming to see that there's no separate self, no abiding center within this mind-body process. At first it sounds kind of intellectual. It doesn't sound like it really means very much. But as we start to connect with it, it affects everything in our life and in our practice.

And one of the things that it starts to do is to take away the sense that I am different than you. If there's no abiding center here that's unique and there's no abiding center there that's unique, then what are we both? You and I are both this vast awareness that holds the body sensations and all the qualities of the human heart and all our thoughts as they go by and knows them all in a very deep way.

I was on a retreat actually where we were practicing this reflection about the liberation of all beings everywhere. And I came to see that that was really the logical outcome of seeing through the separate self. So my interest in practice made this little shift from just wanting to liberate the nature here, the Buddha nature here, to wanting to liberate the Buddha nature wherever it was being obscured.

So as we really sense that there's no separation between me and you, between each other, our sense of practice can become much, much wider. In the tradition, this is talked about as the broadening out of the great highway of practice, sometimes called the great vehicle of practice. And it becomes great because our scope of practice becomes limitless. Wherever there's obscuration to this Buddha nature, that's where the opportunity for practice and for liberation is.

As we take this as an actual interest of ours, we can begin to practice with it in a practice that's called bodhicitta. Bodhi means enlightened, citta means mind or heart. So literally this might mean enlightened heart, enlightened mind. But the way that I actually like to read it is the awakening heart. It's the motivation of the awakening heart that sees through all distinctions and sees through all separation to bring liberation everywhere for all beings.

If this touches you, if this speaks to you, even a little bit, you can start to bring this into your daily practice. The Dalai Lama has a very simple formulation of this wish for bodhicitta, this aspiration, in two lines. He says, "By the force of generosity and other virtues, may I achieve awakening to benefit all sentient beings."

By the force of generosity and other virtues—this is actually a code phrase for the paramis. It's considered that the paramis are the wholesome qualities within our heart that have the power to liberate the mind. Generosity is the first of the paramis. Other qualities are compassionate conduct, loving-kindness, equanimity, truthfulness, renunciation, determination, wisdom. So by the force of all these beautiful qualities, by developing them over our practice, may I achieve awakening to benefit all sentient beings. Because if we can awaken ourselves and come to that place of steadiness and unbounded compassion and unshakable fearlessness, that's really how we can best help others.

So for myself, when I sit, when I sit down, I do the three refuges. I take refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha. And then I just recite this short verse on bodhicitta, on the awakening heart, which sets my intention for the rest of the sitting. And I've been practicing that way for a number of years now. And I find what it does is that it always keeps my practice linking me to the rest of the world so that my practice doesn't become kind of self-enclosing and limiting.

You know, in making a statement like "I want to be free," it's a very brave thing to do. Often I feel in the West today in our practice, we've gotten a little afraid of stating clearly, "This is what I want from my practice. This is my goal. This is my aim, this is my destination, and I'm not going to stop until I reach it." I feel we've gotten a little shy about just saying that in a really straightforward way, probably because enough of us have been burned by taking up a goal and kind of striving after it without a great deal of wisdom. And so we've tended maybe to toss the goal out of our practice. But I feel that may be throwing the baby out with the bathwater.

Because a goal can be a really beautiful and inspiring thing in practice. And I think what we need is the way to hold the goal in a mature way.

For me, it's a little bit like when I was a child and we were going on a long trip. We used to drive to my grandmother's in North Carolina. And I'd get in the car, and my father would be driving the car and we'd be about twenty miles down the road and I'd say, "Dad, are we there yet?" You know, and every couple hours I'd repeat the question. "Are we there yet? Are we there yet?" As a child, I couldn't hold that goal in an easy way. The goal itself kind of grated on me because I couldn't wait for it.

But for my father, holding the goal wasn't a problem. He knew what lay at the end of the road. And he knew that if he just drove this next mile, sooner or later we'd be there.

So as practitioners, can we hold our goal, our deepest intention, our deepest longing, with that kind of maturity? To recognize that it is the end of our path, and yet we don't have to rub it against our present moment experience and downgrade the moment by comparison. We can simply trust that, as Sylvia said, we don't need to go from here to there. All we need to go is from here to more and more fully here. And we understand the way that mindfulness works is that that coming home is what unfolds us toward that liberation, what unfolds us toward that goal.

And holding that goal somewhere in the back of our mind, we know that we don't stop our efforts. We don't let our motivation down until we've reached it.

The Buddha used an analogy. He said that one goes forth into the spiritual life and develops gain and honor and renown, becomes known and respected in the community for the depths of one's practice. And then one can become intoxicated and satisfied with that result and says that such a person can become negligent and then falls into suffering and stops short of the goal.

He said, "It's like someone who goes into the forest looking for the heartwood of a tree, wanting to build a solid house, and finds a great tree that has heartwood, but instead of taking the heartwood, just pulls off the twigs and the leaves of the tree, goes away and is satisfied."

He said, "But there's another kind of practitioner who isn't satisfied with the leaves and the twigs, isn't satisfied with honor and renown, instead develops virtue. But it's possible to stop short at virtue and become negligent and to fall into suffering." And then such a person, the Buddha said, is like one who has gone to the great tree and taken just the outer bark, thinking it was the heartwood.

But another person doesn't stop at the outer bark and instead develops the quality of concentration, of unification of mind, which brings not only happiness but great insight. And if one stops at the virtue of concentration, then the Buddha said it's like stopping at the inner bark of the tree, taking away the inner bark, thinking that it's the heartwood.

But other practitioners go beyond the inner bark and develop the quality of knowledge and vision of seeing things as they actually are. But then a person can stop short there. And then the Buddha said it's like taking the sapwood of that great tree.

But the last practitioner is not satisfied with the sapwood, continues and attains what the Buddha called perpetual liberation. And the Buddha said, "From this it is impossible to fall away."

And he concluded by saying that this holy life, friends, does not have gain, honor and renown for its benefit, or the attainment of virtue for its benefit, or the attainment of concentration for its benefit, or knowledge and vision for its benefit. But it is this unshakable deliverance of mind that is the goal of the holy life, its heartwood and its end.

Let's sit for a minute together.

CHAPTER 219

Faith and Awareness

Guy Armstrong · 56 min

> In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong explores two fundamental aspects of Buddhist practice: faith (saddhā) and awareness, and how they lead us to discover the unconditioned refuge beyond impermanence. Drawing from the Thai Forest tradition and teachers like Ajahn Chah, Ajahn Buddhadāsa, and Ajahn Mahāboowa, Armstrong examines how the direct insight into impermanence (anicca) can initially create fear and uncertainty, but ultimately points us toward what lies beyond change.
>
> The talk investigates the Buddha's 33 synonyms for Nibbāna found in the Saṃyutta Nikāya - including the unconditioned, the deathless, and the refuge - and explores how we might discover this ultimate dimension in our practice. Armstrong presents Ajahn Buddhadāsa's radical teaching that "at any moment our minds are void of I and mine, that is Nibbāna," making the unconditioned accessible in present-moment awareness rather than a distant goal.
> Through personal stories and teachings from various masters, the talk reveals how true refuge is found in the pure awareness that illuminates all experience - empty yet knowing, timeless yet present. This awareness, described as our Buddha nature or innate wakefulness, is what catches us when we fall in practice and what we can learn to trust and rest in as our path to freedom.

Sylvia talked last night on the theme of impermanence, the fact that in our outside life among the people we know, everything is subject to loss, to change, to decay. People have been reporting on this also in the interviews. A number of people have come and said that when their awareness is clear and they turn their attention to a thought, it dissolves. Or when they become aware of a pain in the body, they see the transitory nature, they see the unsolid nature of that sensation. And even turning our minds to different emotional states, when the awareness is clear, sometimes those states dissolve upon looking at them.

Ananda, who was the Buddha's cousin and his attendant for many years, once asked the Buddha, "What do you mean by the world?" The word in Pali for world is loka. It means realm also. And the Buddha replied with a pun. He replied, "It disintegrates." And the word for disintegrates in Pali is paloka. It disintegrates, therefore it is called the world, or loka.

This really refers to all our sense experience, which we can see when we look closely in retreat: the nature of arising and passing, the moment-to-moment level at every sense door that we investigate. When we start to see that momentary nature of all our experience, it can be quite unsettling. As Sylvia said last night, it can lead us into fear, upset. In one particular system of practice, it's said that following this direct insight into impermanence is a period of practice that's marked by fear and dread. And it rather provokes a crisis in the spiritual journey out of which arises a tremendous urge for freedom and that then leads in that very direction.

So this can be very deeply felt in our practice, the immediacy of impermanence and how it takes away the solid ground that we thought we knew, that we thought we rested upon. And out of that can come an urgency to find: is there somewhere in our experience, is there a dimension that isn't touched by disintegration, by transiency, by change? Maybe there is.

After all, impermanence is not what philosophically we could call an ultimate truth. The Buddha, ever precise in his language, said that it was only a characteristic of existence. Impermanence is a descriptor of that which exists. So a really ultimate kind of truth should point to something that's beyond existing and not existing. So impermanence isn't that kind of truth.

In fact, the Buddha pointed in his practice and his teaching for our practice, pointed us to discover some more ultimate meaning or ultimate truth in life that can form a true refuge or true security in our life. And this true refuge and true security he talked of as Nirvana or in the Pali, Nibbana.

The Buddha was loath to be very precise in his descriptions of this state or this dimension, but in one passage in the Samyutta Nikaya, one part of the Pali texts, he gives 33 synonyms for Nibbana, among which are these: the unconditioned, the truth, the other shore, the everlasting, peace, the deathless, safety, freedom, the shelter, the harbor, the refuge, and the beyond. This is about as detailed as he got to speaking about nirvana, but all these words point to a release, a state of freedom, of safety, of refuge beyond change.

So I wonder in our practice, where might we look to discover or come upon that refuge that is really beyond change? And that's really what I'd like to explore in the talk tonight. The talk really has two themes: the themes of faith and of awareness.

I have to give a little bit of disclaimer at the start of the talk. When the Buddha came upon his enlightenment, you may know the story, he almost didn't teach. He spent 49 days after his awakening sitting in the same spot where he had awakened, just enjoying the bliss of deliverance, the bliss of liberation, and reflecting on the implications of what he'd found. And he thought in that time, "Should I teach or shouldn't I?" And at first he thought, "No, I'm not going to." He said, "There won't be many people who will understand."

And then he reflected and he thought, "Oh, my first teacher – he would understand if I told him about this." And then he, with his psychic vision, turned his eye toward that teacher and found out that he had died a week ago. He said, "Shucks, he's not here to understand. But my second teacher was also very clear and wise. He would understand." And he turned with his psychic vision to his second teacher and found that person had just died that day.

So who was he going to teach? And he said at this point, "This Dhamma that I have discovered is profound, subtle, and hard to understand." Fortunately, as we all know, he went ahead and taught anyway. But I mention this phrase because I won't claim that this talk is either profound or subtle, but it may be extremely hard to understand.

So I ask your forgiveness in advance for that and I really urge you to approach it with a light touch. I'll try to give it with a light touch and I urge you to receive it with a light touch that lets you take in what makes sense to you and leave behind what doesn't. It's not intended to spur a lot of conceptualization, but rather just if parts of it touch on your own practice, open and use that and let go of all the concepts.

The other caveat I have to make about this talk is we're talking about what doesn't have any form, and so there's no right view on this point. Nobody can be definitive in speaking about what doesn't have form, like nirvana.

These different perspectives are simply metaphors or poems pointing the mind in a certain direction. As such, nobody holds final authority—at least nobody I've encountered.

This view of the unconditioned comes primarily from the Thai forest tradition, and it may differ significantly from what you'd hear in the Burmese tradition. I'll be quoting some of the elders from the Thai forest tradition—teachers you've likely heard before like Ajahn Buddhadasa, and the group of practitioners that included Ajahn Chah and Ajahn Maha Boowa. But realize that not even all Buddhists in our lineage would necessarily agree with this perspective. That's perfectly fine. You can hold it simply as one person's opinion.

My wife's sisters visited us last year from Australia—their first trip to the United States. For one sister, it was actually her first journey more than about 300 miles from home. So we took them to Yosemite, which is wonderful for foreign visitors because there's nothing quite like it anywhere else in the world.

Of course, they loved it. They delighted in seeing the wildlife—coyotes, deer, smaller animals. We didn't actually see a bear, unfortunately, but we saw their marks every morning. We were staying in tent cabins in Curry Village, where there's a large parking lot with about a hundred cars. Every morning we'd emerge to find that about five cars had been ripped open by bears. Every single morning.

The rangers are quite clear in their instructions: don't leave food in your car, don't leave anything that resembles food, don't leave picnic coolers because the bears know what those are, don't leave hand lotion or scented products. Yet every morning we'd discover four or five damaged vehicles. The bears particularly favored minivans—they'd pop out the back window and crawl inside. I suppose they'd learned that minivans usually contain children, and children often have candy.

So while we saw bear tracks in the morning, we never encountered the bears themselves. It's delightful to visit Yosemite to observe the wildlife, and almost equally entertaining to watch the people. Yosemite attracts everyone. The big tour buses arrive at Yosemite Falls, and out pour visitors who seem to share a universal uniform from around the world: Bermuda shorts and video cameras hanging from their shoulders, filming anything that moves.

Backpackers straggle into the backpacking campground after a week in the backcountry, unshaven and unwashed—quite an appealing sight. Then there are the climbers preparing to ascend El Capitan. It's always fascinating to observe climber culture, which strikes me as a cross between the Grateful Dead and the US Marines. Quite a group indeed, with all these different energies.

I noticed a new group that day, one I hadn't seen in Yosemite before—a diverse collection of young people who looked like they might be on a YMCA training camp. Boys and girls from various racial and ethnic backgrounds had joined hands in a circle, placing one person in the center. That person would fall backwards, trusting the others to catch them. You probably know this exercise—basic sensitivity training, the kind used in team-building to develop group trust. Someone simply closes their eyes, falls back, and gets caught. It's quite revelatory when you experience it firsthand, discovering you can actually trust others to that extent, and that they do indeed catch you.

Watching this reminded me of our practice, because we're constantly falling down in one way or another. Things go well, then we stumble and fall apart.

But the curious thing is that every time we fall down, something catches us. Something holds us in this mysterious way.

As we go through the days and weeks in retreat, I think one of the things we really start to have faith in is that it's okay to fall down in practice. It's okay to stumble. It's okay to lose the thread of mindfulness. It's okay to get lost in the chaos of restless energy, the strong bodily waves that come, the emotional currents that run through us. It's fine to get lost in all of that, because if our intention is to come back, eventually it all settles out and we're there—clear and present again.

So we just trust more and more in this practice that it's really safe, that we can let ourselves go, and we develop more of this quality of just falling back or surrendering.

This sense of trust in the basic safety of our experience is what in Pali is known as saddhā. Saddhā is usually translated as faith, but it also means trust or confidence—just a basic sense that the universe is a safe place to be. Literally, the root of the word saddhā means "to place one's heart upon."

I love this because it goes right to our core. What in our lives do we really place our hearts upon? All of us have different things. Traditionally, it's said that the Triple Gem is the right place to place your heart upon: the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha. These are our refuges. If these connect for you, that's beautiful. They are refuges. They are safety. They can be trusted.

But early in practice, these particular words may not have that deep, heartfelt connection for us. And then we have to tune in for ourselves. Where is that gut sense of trust for us? Can we connect with that really deep sense of trusting in the universe?

I had a lovely teaching on this quality from Fred Wahpepah, whom many of you know. He's a Native American elder who teaches at Spirit Rock, often with John Travis, who was here for the first half. Fred leads sweat lodges, which are purification ceremonies in his tradition. The first time I did a sweat lodge with him, just down in the meadow below the dining hall, we all got in. The fires had been in there, the stones had been in there for a while, and it was quite hot. He was explaining to us the spirit with which one enters a sweat lodge, talking about this quality of trust.

He said, "In the Indian language, there's no word for hope. No word for hope. Just not part of the vocabulary." He said, "That's because we know that everything is already all right. So we don't have to think about hope. Everything is already all right."

I thought that was an incredible statement coming from a man whose culture has been more or less destroyed over the last 150 years: "Everything is already all right." It's a strong expression of that faith and that trust.

So the two questions I'd like us to look at tonight in our practice: What does it mean for us to fall, or we could say, to let go? And when we do that, what holds us? What do we let go into? What is it that we can really trust in?

This quality of letting go—we're really invited to make it moment after moment after moment, because that's what mindfulness is about.

What happens when we're not mindful? What's your experience? Reflect on your experience when mindfulness isn't present. It's usually made up of a lot of thoughts, isn't it? When there's not this clear tuning into the present moment, we're usually wandering back and forth between past and future. Those wanderings are driven—they're not random—but they're usually driven by forces of liking or disliking, of wanting or not wanting.

In a very short way, we could say they're driven by the forces of greed, aversion, and delusion. We could call this shorthand for what the mind does when we're not mindful. As we talked about in the first half of this retreat, greed, aversion, and delusion are our basic strategies of relating with life when we don't have the quality of trusting in the moment. We use these forces of trying to mold our experience so that life will be a certain way, to try to control it.

To give up our hopes and fears is really to give up control. This is the challenge we're invited to in every moment of mindfulness. We're invited to let go of trying to shape our experience and instead open to it just as it is—to be with it without changing it, to accept it, to allow it.

Another way of saying it is that when we stop trying to control the world, we actually give up our individual will. Or you might say more accurately, we refine our will just to be present, to be with what is. We give up that will of trying to shape it, control it.

So in that way, we stop making I and mine. When we stop making I and mine, there's a lot of peace. There's a lot of peace.

Ajahn Chah has this beautiful line: "If you let go a little, there's a little peace. If you let go a lot, there's a lot of peace. And if you let go completely, there's complete peace." This is the letting go of our hope and fear, letting go of control, letting go of I and mine.

Ajahn Buddhadasa, who was one of my teachers in Thailand, explained it a different way. He related this letting go of I and mine directly to the meaning of nibbana, the meaning of the unconditioned. The meaning of the word nibbana is clearly defined as freedom from suffering and as freedom from the mental defilements, which are the causes of suffering. That is freedom from greed, aversion, and delusion.

At any moment that our minds are void of I and mine, that is nibbana.

This is quite a radical statement. Most of the time in the teachings, nibbana is posited as something really far away, some really remote goal that comes at the end of a long, long period of very intensive practice. Six weeks is just kind of the foot in the door. But Ajahn Buddhadasa is making it much more accessible.

"At any moment that our minds are void of I and mine, that is nibbana. For example, at this moment, as you sit reading or listening, you probably have a mind void of the feelings of I and mine because there is nothing engendering those feelings. There are just the words you are hearing for the sake of abandoning I and mine. If there is some voidness—and I merely use the word 'some,' it's not completely or unchangeably void—then you are dwelling within the sphere of nibbana. Even though it may not be absolute or perfect nibbana, it is nibbana, just the same."

I really like this as an entry point. To me, it provides a really accessible way for each of us in our practice to feel the touch of nibbana. You might say the outskirts of the unconditioned. And by getting kind of the whiff of that, we can follow its trail back to the source.

So this letting go of I and mine, letting go of control, takes a lot of trust. It's one of the things that we grow into. Coming fully into the moment is a huge act of trust. I don't know if you've felt this at times, but when you come into this moment very fully, you're sort of naked. You've really dropped your defenses. You've dropped the escape into conceptualization. You've dropped your images of yourself and how you'd like to be or how you usually are. You're just open. Your heart is open to feel what is. That's a very naked place.

When you meet some great beings, you get the feeling of this quality very much from them—that they've kind of released into something greater. It's not just that they've worked on their positive qualities, kind of like building muscles, you know, the body-building school of mental development, but they've actually let go into something.

The Dalai Lama, for me, has this flavor a lot in his playfulness and his spontaneity. He was at a conference about a year ago at Gethsemane Abbey, which is where Thomas Merton lived when he was a Trappist monk. It was a cross-congregational meeting of Buddhists and Christians, all contemplatives, all people who had spent a lot of time in solitude. He was there with all these other heavyweights from both sides, the Buddhist side and the Christian side. And it was such a kind of heavyweight gathering that PBS was filming it to show on television.

The Dalai Lama was the keynote speaker. So the klieg lights were on and the video cameras were rolling and it was going to be broadcast to forty or fifty million people later that day. The Dalai Lama is up there telling about his time at the Abbey. He said, "You know, the way the monks here support themselves is they make cheese and they make fruitcake. Yes, I learned this today. They took me on a tour of the Abbey, and they told me this. And every place they would take me, they would say, 'You know, we support ourselves. We make cheese and we make fruitcake. Would you like to try some cheese?'" And he said, "But all I wanted was the fruitcake." And then he just giggled. "Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha." He said, "They'd take me somewhere else, and they'd say, 'Would you like to try some cheese?' And I'd think, 'No, I just want the fruitcake!'"

And then he'd giggle again - right there in front of his hosts at the Abbey, in front of national television and all these other dignitaries, just playing with his own desire force, just like a kid, so innocent.

I think there's something there that we can release into and then live out of and trust - something that has this quality of spontaneous playfulness.

There's another teacher I enjoy a lot who comes to Marin fairly regularly named Byron Katie. Some of you may have run into her. She didn't come out of any particular tradition. She awakened, she said, by herself about ten or twelve years ago, quite spontaneously, and has now been teaching her understanding. She's someone who I feel has a lot of wisdom and a lot of love. I like her a lot.

She was telling a story about her husband, who is a recreational vehicle salesman in Barstow, California. As you might imagine, there's not a huge sangha in Barstow, California. In fact, her husband doesn't relate to any of this stuff. It's not his bag of tricks. But because his wife has gotten so into spirituality over the years, he's had to sort of learn to accommodate somewhat.

So this is one story that she told about their marriage. She said they were in a supermarket, just doing their grocery shopping, and she had the idea that she had never in her memory been wheeled through the supermarket in a shopping cart. She thought that was something she would like to experience, and she couldn't think of any reason why she shouldn't. So she said to her husband, "I'd like to get in the shopping cart and have you wheel me through the supermarket. Would you be willing to do that?"

And he said, as she says he often does, "Oh, Jesus Christ, Katie." He really didn't want to do it. But she said that he agreed to do it because he knew that if he hadn't, she would have asked someone else to - and then he would have been even more embarrassed.

So she jumped in the shopping cart and he wheeled her around the supermarket, and she said the most interesting thing was that no one would meet her eye. Nobody would make eye contact with her, as though everybody was used to seeing a middle-aged woman being wheeled through the supermarket every day of the year. Of course.

So Byron Katie, I think, has released into something also. Very trusting. Very trusting.

This other thing that we sometimes talk about that we fall into or release into is sometimes called our true nature. Sometimes it's called our Buddha nature. It's what we share with the awakened ones. It's said that it's in us in every moment already. It's not something that we only attain or only acquire when we reach awakening, but it's said to be with us here and now in every moment. It's only the fact of waking up to its presence that constitutes real discovery.

Ajahn Mahabua gave a pointer to this. Ajahn Mahabua was a kind of dharma brother of Ajahn Chah. They both practiced under the same teacher whose name was Ajahn Mun. Ajahn Mun was a very fierce teacher in the Thai forest tradition. He wandered throughout the forests of Thailand and Laos for about thirty or forty years. Only very late in life did he ever set up anything like a monastery. Everybody would always want him to stay and teach and be resident, but his whole practice was just wandering through the forests and teaching as he went. A number of the great teachers of the last fifty years practiced and trained under him, including Ajahn Chah and Ajahn Mahabua, who is still alive and still teaching in the northeast of Thailand.

This is from Ajahn Mahabua: "Although all phenomena without exception fall under the laws of the three characteristics - impermanence, suffering, and not-self - the true nature of the mind doesn't fall under these laws. The natural power of the mind itself is that it knows and does not die. This deathlessness is something that lies beyond disintegration."

I find this really beautiful. His pointing is that the very nature of our mind is undying, that it holds within it all the phenomena that are coming and going, that are subject to impermanence and suffering and selflessness, but that the nature of the mind itself is not subject to this passing. This nature you could also call our basic goodness. It is what we can trust in. It is what holds us.

So let's look a little deeper into what this really is and how we can come to it through our practice. And again, I'll turn to one of Howie's favorite gurus and also one of mine - Calvin and Hobbes.

This is a strip that came out around December of one year. Calvin's talking to Hobbes and saying, "You know, this whole Santa Claus thing just doesn't make sense. Why all the secrecy?"

Why all the mystery? If the guy exists, why doesn't he ever show himself and prove it? And if he doesn't exist, what's the meaning of all this? And Hobbes says, "I don't know. Isn't this a religious holiday?" Calvin says, "Yeah, but actually I've got the same questions about God."

That's curious, isn't it? We may have a really deep gut sense of what is trustworthy in the universe—whether we call it the Dharma or Buddha nature or God or whatever, the unconditioned—but do we really know what that is?

It's so delicate because basically this thing can't be seen. It can't be heard. It can't be touched. It can't be grasped. Why is that? It can't be touched because if we could reach out and touch it as an object, then it would be something that had come into existence. And if it had come into existence and we could just grab it as an object of our senses, it would also have the nature of passing out of existence. And then it wouldn't be ultimate. It wouldn't be beyond arising and passing.

So whatever it is that we're looking for of this ultimate nature, it can't be seen, it can't be touched, it can't be heard. It has to be invisible. It has to be intangible. It has to be silent.

This is from a medieval Christian mystic named Angelus Silesius: "God is a pure nothing, concealed in now and here. The less you reach for that, the more it will appear."

I like this formulation because it brings out a couple of great points. One is that the touching of that is founded upon trust. And trust comes from relaxing. That's why we often say at the beginning of a sitting, "Begin from a place of ease. Relax your body and mind. Don't strain. Don't strive." If we can bring in that quality of relaxation along with the alertness, then we're close to this presence.

The other thing I like about it is that it really points that the ultimate is found in the here and now. We shouldn't conceive of the ultimate as some separate destination apart from what's naturally arising here and now. It's found right in the midst of the here and now.

Suzuki Roshi had this quotation about it. He said, "It's necessary to trust in something that has no form or color, but that is always ready to take on form and color."

This really perplexed me for a lot of years in my practice. Something that has no form or color, but is always ready to take on form and color.

In the Buddhist jargon, form and color are sort of buzzwords. They basically refer to the world of sight. Everything within the world of sight can be described as having a shape and a particular color, like this zafu. What we actually see when we look around the world are not objects. We only learn over time to recognize them as woman or cushion or chair or man. What we really see are just patches of form and color. So form and color is a jargon way of saying the world of created appearances, the world of phenomena.

So it's necessary to trust in something that is not of that world of appearances, but it's always ready to take on form and color.

Now, I come from a scientific background myself, and when I first heard this quotation, I thought Roshi was pointing to something like raw matter—something like electrons, protons, neutrons, quarks, before they got formed into atoms, molecules, wood, leaves, grass, earth, and so on. But when I thought about it more, I thought that can't be right because even protons and electrons have some form and some shape and some qualities of appearing. So I decided that wasn't what he was talking about.

I decided he wasn't talking about anything on that side—the side of matter—but instead he was more talking about something from this side, the side that sees, the inner experience. That he was pointing to something in the nature of our consciousness itself. Because that's an interesting thing about consciousness. It doesn't actually have form or color, but it's always ready to take on form and color.

And gradually, we become familiar with the consciousness of sights. We can also take on sounds, smells, tastes, thoughts, emotions, sensations. Consciousness takes on all those qualities.

So I think Suzuki Roshi was pointing to something on the side of consciousness. But in the Buddha's teachings, consciousness has a really particular meaning. It's one of the five aggregates. The aggregates are considered to be the elements of the human being, including body; feeling tone, which we've covered in the instructions—that quality being pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral; perceptions, that recognition that knows something is a bell or a man or a bench; mental formations, basically thoughts and images; and consciousness is the fifth.

Consciousness, as the Buddha described it, is this quality that knows all of our experience. It's a quality that's on the receptive side of every facet of experience. It's preverbal, but it's that which holds the bare sense data. And you can, as a synonym, think of knowing before any words have come in. So it's just knowing the raw sense data of our experience.

Well, the Buddha said that all our consciousness is also characterized by coming and going. So for instance, when you hear the bell, there's a knowing of that sound, but the knowing passes when the sound passes. Consciousness as the Buddha defined it arises with sense experience and passes away as that sense experience passes.

But maybe the unchanging is somehow related to this. It's interesting if we look at the instructions—we start in the meditation instructions with sounds and then we turn to breath and then body sensations and then emotions and thoughts and experience in walking, sights and tastes, until everything eventually is included. All the changing appearances are included, but what's the one thing that doesn't change in the instructions? What's the thread that weaves all the instructions together?

It's mindfulness, isn't it? Whatever the changing objects or appearances, there's always mindfulness at work or at play. So I wonder if the deathless is somehow related to this quality of mindfulness, of awareness.

This is from an Indian teacher named Maharaj: "I met my guru when I was 34 and I realized by 37—maybe that's a practice we should be doing—pleasure and pain lost their sway over me. I was free from desire and fear. I found myself full, needing nothing. I saw that in the ocean of pure awareness, the numberless waves of the phenomenal worlds arise and subside, beginninglessly and endlessly. There's a mysterious power that looks after them. That power is awareness, life, God, whatever name you give it. It is the foundation and ultimate support of all that is, as gold is the basis for all jewelry."

So it's not just human beings that have this quality, that have this Buddha nature. It's said that all sentient beings have this. All animals, all creatures that are conscious have this.

This is from an old Zen master named Huang Po: "Buddhas and bodhisattvas together with all wriggling things possessed of life share in this great nirvanic nature." We share this with all the wriggling things that are possessed of life. This is our connection, our deepest connection to everything that lives—us and the earthworms.

Ajahn Jumnian, who was here last year, gave a talk to the staff and teachers about this unconditioned nature of mindfulness, and he put it this way. He said, "The best way to develop great awareness"—actually the word he used was mahasati, great mindfulness—"is to rest your attention within that knowing space of consciousness, in the pure space of knowing. If you understand and can rest in this pure knowing, that's the place of the deathless. From this pure awareness that's unmoved by what arises, then you see the phenomena of the world, which all have the nature to arise and pass away. Phenomena show their dharmas of impermanence, and this other is the dharma of the deathless."

This again is from Ajahn Mahabua: "There's no escaping this truth. Whatever arises has to vanish. But whatever is true, whatever is a natural principle in and of itself won't vanish. In other words, the pure mind won't vanish. This vanishes, that vanishes, but that which knows they're vanishing doesn't vanish. This is what's called the pure mind."

So how can we start to get a sense of this in our practice? How can we start to get a flavor for this pure mind?

As Ajahn Buddhadasa pointed to, it's at times in the practice when the sense of I and mine is not so strong, when the sense of self with its demands and its needs and its wishes and its dislikes and its hopes and its fears aren't so insistent. That's the time that the mind has a degree of purity, has a degree of freedom in it. So you can begin to investigate—what's the feeling of those times when the demands of the I are not so strong? Really wake up at that point in time, bring your clear seeing into it.

This true nature emerges as a harmonious union of mindfulness's brightness and alertness with the calm and tranquility that arises when the defilements subside. Both dimensions are essential—the bright, alert energy of mindfulness and the deep tranquility and peacefulness. You can trust in this union as possessing qualities of clarity, fullness, and deathlessness.

This awareness illuminates everything. Sometimes when you sit with eyes closed, listening to sounds, you can feel how it pervades the entire universe. This quality of awareness encompasses the farthest stars and galaxies, all the sounds arising and passing away. Not only does it contain them, but it reveals them, illuminates them.

This awareness itself is empty—it must be empty to hold what is. Yet it's not a vacant emptiness. It's an emptiness pervaded with the quality of knowing, sometimes called luminosity, that illuminates all arisings. What we are most fundamentally is not the comings and goings, those transitory changes. What we are most fundamentally—that which continues—is this empty space in which all appearances arise and pass away and are known.

It possesses two essential qualities: emptiness and knowing. You could say this truly is the nature of mind or the nature of awareness. It's sometimes called our innate wakefulness. We can observe it and see that it's always like this, but we can't grasp it because it's not a thing. We only know it by relaxing into it and feeling its functioning. Through this we come to trust more and more that it is there.

This nature has always been, is now, and will always be, because it's beyond change—beyond coming and going, beyond birth and death. Being beyond change, it's beyond time. In itself, it's timeless. This is another quality of the ultimate.

It functions like a mirror, reflecting anything that appears before it completely and impartially. It reflects the beautiful and the ugly, the painful and the pleasant. It reflects movement as well as stillness, reflecting the defilements as well as the Brahma-Viharas, but it remains untouched by any of these. It's not harmed by the appearances. Fundamentally, it cannot be stained or corrupted. It's not made brighter by happiness, nor darkened by suffering. In itself, it has none of the characteristics of greed, aversion, and delusion, so it's free from the very beginning. It is that dimension in us which is already free.

So the question arises: do you take yourself to be free here and now, or do you take yourself to be bound? If you identify with the transitory, there will be bondage in that. That will be subject to birth and death, and what's subject to birth and death is subject to suffering. If you take yourself to be this limitless and pure, empty knowing, then in that there's already freedom. Freedom doesn't need to be created—it only needs to be seen and trusted.

Once you gain an intuitive sense of this quality of mind, you can simply relax into it. You can start to rest in it.

This comes from Ajahn Buddhadasa again: "When you hear a phrase like 'Nibbana for everyone,' you may shake your head in disbelief and understand that someone has tried to dye a cat just for sale." Perhaps you don't get the image—it's like painting up a cat. Maybe the cat is partly orange and partly gray, but you spray paint it all black so you can sell it and get a higher price. If you're a teacher, you'd dye a cat for sale if you wanted to appeal to your students. So he's saying that you might think I'm just trying to dye a cat for sale. You might not have any interest in the subject, but nibbana is a natural condition. It's the cool state of mind when the defilements are absent.

When can we tune into that in our practice? When does the mind feel really cooled out? When does it not feel churned up by the forces of liking and disliking, the forces of greed and aversion? We can trust in that. That can become its own path. It's enough simply to rest in that and trust that in resting there, we are actually tuning ourselves to the unconditioned. We're tuning to Nibbana, and we can trust that this will carry us to freedom.

In the Satipatthana Sutta, the Buddha advises us to reflect again and again on our own death and what will happen to our body after death. In traditional Buddhist countries, practitioners are encouraged actually to go to cemeteries and charnel grounds to observe corpses that are decaying in various stages of dissolution. We can't do that anymore today because of cemetery regulations and health codes. So the modern day equivalent for practitioners in Thailand are autopsies. As a monk or a nun, you're permitted to go to hospitals and observe autopsies being done.

I took advantage of this a couple of times when I was a monk in Bangkok and went down to a hospital, Siriraj Hospital, near the parade grounds in downtown Bangkok. I was thirty-two years old at the time and had never been next to a dead body. Now I was next to several dead bodies. I could walk right up to them and touch them. When the coroner came, we took seats in the operating theater, and he put one of these dead bodies on the stainless steel table and began to take it apart.

Coming from not even having seen a dead body to watching it being taken apart was completely shocking for me. I felt like I was getting blown away by observing that. But it was also fascinating. I couldn't take my eyes off the process. So I watched as the coroner dissected one body, which took about twenty minutes and involved removing all the internal organs, including the brain, and weighing them. He sewed the body back up, then went to the next body. I observed this for several bodies in a row.

Then we went out to catch a bus back to the monastery. We were waiting at the parade ground, which is a really busy part of downtown Bangkok. I was watching all kinds of people go by—young people and students and couples walking hand in hand and older people who had come down to the marketplace to do their shopping, dogs running across the grounds. I had just come out of seeing these bodies taken apart, and the phrase that came to my mind as I was looking around at everybody walking by was: all I could see was walking corpses. I could only see walking corpses.

I thought to myself later, what did I mean by that phrase? That's such a strange phrase, a walking corpse. What did it mean to me? When I looked at everybody, I could see that the body was no different than those bodies that I had just seen on the autopsy table. No difference at all in the physical form. But these bodies at the parade ground—there was still a brightness that was shining out through the eyes. I was really struck and in touch with that brightness, that vitality of the life force and of consciousness that was still shining, that I could see in their eyes.

As I got in touch with the characteristics of that brightness, I realized that brightness was completely of this moment, of this present moment. It didn't have any past and it didn't have any future. And that most fundamentally, that is what we are. We are this body that is alert with this present moment brightness, completely of the present moment.

But this brightness has a capacity to receive sense impressions. And because of that capacity and another peculiar capacity of storing them up, which we call memory, we're able to construct a past. And out of the construction of the past, we're able to project a future. So these things aren't intrinsic to that brightness, but they're sort of built out of the components of it.

This brightness is that resting place. This brightness is that pure awareness that is beyond time, beyond birth and death. And when we rest there, that has the quality to hold us, to be our safety, and to carry us through this whole journey to freedom.

The Buddha was talking to a monk in his day about this quality of trust or faith. The monk's name was Pingiya. This is what he said about it:

"Pingiya, other people have freed themselves by the power of faith. Vakkali, Bhadravudha, and Alavi have all done this. You too should let that strength release you. You too will go to the further shore beyond the draw of death."

Let's just sit for a minute together.

CHAPTER 220

The Five Aggregates (Pañcakhandha)

Guy Armstrong · 59 min

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the Buddha's fundamental teaching on the five aggregates (pañcakhandha) - the constituents that make up what we conventionally call a 'person.' Drawing from the Pheṇapiṇḍūpama Sutta (SN 22.95), Armstrong explains how the Buddha described these aggregates as empty of inherent existence: form like foam, feeling like bubbles, perception like a mirage, mental formations like a banana tree, and consciousness like a magic trick. Through vivid analogies including an actual magic demonstration, he illustrates how our usual perception of solid, permanent selfhood is actually a collection of constantly changing processes. Armstrong connects this understanding to the three characteristics of existence (tilakkhana) - impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā) - showing how seeing through the illusion of a fixed self leads to freedom from suffering. The talk weaves together scientific insights about perception with traditional Buddhist analysis, demonstrating how mindful investigation of our moment-to-moment experience reveals the 'magical display' nature of existence. Armstrong emphasizes that this understanding of emptiness (suññatā) naturally gives rise to compassion, as we recognize that 'there is suffering, but no one who suffers' - a realization that both liberates us from the burden of defending a non-existent self and opens the heart to care for all beings caught in the same fundamental delusion.

I think Howie talked last night about the three characteristics of existence—qualities that a number of us have pointed to over this retreat of impermanence, of unsatisfactoriness, of selflessness. In a way, you could say that these three characteristics really point to the key understanding that the Buddha wanted to communicate. Throughout his years of teachings, he kept coming back and pointing to these three things again and again. I think the reason he was pointing so often is because they're linked to the source of our suffering.

He was really saying that we suffer because we don't see the world the way that it really is. The way that it really is is described by the three characteristics, but we find ourselves living in some degree of illusion. You might say that we suffer because we're all deluded. Rather than being an insult, this is actually just the typical human condition.

The Buddha talked another way about the fundamental root of our suffering being ignorance. Ignorance isn't so much that we don't have all the facts. You can go to a book of teachings from any religion and you can read the facts, the information, but ignorance is that we don't see things the way they are. We're blinded in some way. We live deluded.

The Buddha was talking about this issue of self as being such a central one. He said that in whatever way people conceive of self, the truth is ever other than that. You can't say it much more clearly. However we conceive of self, we're wrong.

One of my teachers put it a little more dramatically. This is Christopher Titmus, who many of you know has a great habit for speaking controversially and directly. Christopher's statement was to us: "Everything you think is wrong." That's a good one to wake a meditator up. This really has a beautiful truth about it, and it's really hard to keep it in mind.

We keep telling ourselves all the time the way the world is, the way that we are, the way that other people are. We know it so thoroughly. Because of this storytelling, we really believe that we know what's so. It's really hard to remember that we are living from illusion. Every one of us who has not completely let go of the concept of "I" is living in illusion.

It takes a lot of humility to recognize this. It's hard to keep that humility with us, to doubt the views that we hold to so often, and also to trust in our deepening wisdom. This is sort of the balancing act of spiritual practice—to trust in our wisdom and not to believe in our opinions. Not an easy balance.

So one of the ways that we get confused, one of the ways that we see wrongly, is when we look at ourselves or we look at each other, we think we see a person. This is really commonplace, right? There are lots of people in this room here tonight, but I don't think that's the way the Buddha saw.

When the Buddha looked at a human being and described what he saw, he usually described it in one of two ways. One was that he saw six types of consciousness and six types of sense objects. These are really the foundation of our practice throughout our time together, whether you've been here for two weeks or for five weeks. We keep coming back to the sense doors—the sensations, the sights, the sounds, the tastes, the smells, and the objects of mind, the thoughts and moods and images. So six types of sense doors, six types of consciousness, six types of appearances. This is one of the ways that he described the human being.

But actually the way that he employed more often in his teaching when he wanted to teach understanding was a teaching device called the five aggregates. This is what I'd like to talk about tonight—this model of the human being called the five aggregates.

The word aggregate is a translation from the Pali word khanda. In Sanskrit, it's called skanda, and the Sanskrit is actually in much more common usage in the Buddhist world. So if I use a foreign word, I'll use the word skanda for the most part.

This word skanda, although aggregate sounds very technical, actually didn't have a technical meaning in India at the time of the Buddha. Skanda just means heap or bundle. That's all it means. You could look at a heap of sticks that are lying on the ground and you could call that a skanda of sticks.

So I think that the word that best translates skanda is not aggregate because it's so technical we think there's something really deep or complicated being pointed at. I think the best translation is the five kinds of stuff. That's the way I think of it. The aggregates or the skandhas are the five kinds of stuff that make us up, that make up what we call a human being.

They're usually divided into two groups. One group points to the things of the material world and the other group points to the things of the mind.

So another synonym for the five kinds of stuff is nama-rupa. Nama literally means name, while rupa literally means form. This is sometimes translated as "name and form," but a better translation for us is "mentality and materiality." Nama literally means name, and so it points to the fact that so much of the activity of mind is around naming and designation and terminology—the use of language. Then the world of materiality is the world of form. Rupa just means form.

So in the five kinds of stuff, we have on the one hand the materiality, and that is all included in this one aggregate, the one skanda called form or rupa. Then when the Buddha looked at mind, he broke it down into four different pieces for the purposes of this list. And those are feeling tone, perception, mental formations, and consciousness. And he said, outside of these five things, there isn't anything. Everything that falls within our human experience can be classified into one of these five areas.

So I'd like to talk a little bit about how these things function and then go into detail about each of them. I'll give a simple example. In the world of materiality, if I strike the bell, you hear a sound. As you attend to that sound, the sound itself is of the material world. So it's an evidence, an instance of rupa. As that sound hits your ear, you hear the sound. The sound is form.

You have a feeling tone associated with it. It may be a pleasant sound, maybe an unpleasant sound. Because it's usually struck at the end of sittings, it's usually a pretty pleasant sound. It's kind of like the key that opens the prison door for us, so we tend to like that sound. So the feeling is usually pleasant.

And then sometimes when you hear it, you might just say to yourself, "Oh, that's the bell." That quality of naming it as a bell is perception—the act of recognition or memory, perceiving a specific object as the bell.

And then there might be thoughts about the bell. The thoughts might be, "I'm so glad the sitting's over." The thought might be, "That's a really nice bell." I often think—I don't know how many of you know this—this bell was donated to Spirit Rock by San Francisco Zen Center. And there was a day last fall when we had a teacher meeting here and Norman Fischer, who's one of the abbots of the Zen Center family, brought it around and taught us how to strike it. And it was a really touching moment because I felt like there was this transmission.

It came from Japan. It was cast in Japan. And he told us that they had some people who knew how to get really good deals in Japan. I don't know. He may have just said that to make us feel better because it's quite a nice bell. And he taught us how to strike it, and I'll show you the way that he taught us to strike it. He said you hold the striker at an angle and you just let it fall against the bell.

As I listened to him ring the bell for the first time, one of my perceptions was of Japanese culture. I kind of felt like what this gift was, was the gift of an ancient culture that had long studied and lived with the beauty of silence and the mystery of silence coming into the West, where we're just starting to appreciate that quality and all the richness of the sound of a bell. So that was one of my thoughts and one of the things I often think about with this bell is the transmission from that ancient culture.

And then also with the sound of the bell often comes a feeling of great ease. You often notice that at the end of a sitting, the bell goes and you think, "I could sit here forever," all of a sudden. So the thoughts about the bell, the feeling of ease, fall in the realm of mental formations. These are things that come out of the world of mind.

And then with each piece of this—with the sound, with its feeling tone, with the perception of it, with the thought and mood—comes consciousness. Consciousness is there at every step of the way. It's the quality in the mind that receives all that activity, that holds the activity and knows it.

And what's interesting about this way of looking at the human being in terms of form, feeling, perception, mental formations, and consciousness is that all five of these are there in every moment of experience. They're arising at different sense doors, but all five of them are always present. There are some altered states where some of these go away, but for the most part in our ordinary experience, all five of them are there. So it's a very comprehensive view. If we take the six sense doors, not all the six sense doors may be there in every moment, but all the five aggregates are. So it's a really good pointer to our moment-to-moment experience.

I'd like to talk a little about the aggregate of form.

When James put his card back, he turned it around so it went in the opposite direction. Now that card is thicker where all the other cards are thin. So I can feel for the thick card among all the thin cards, and that's his card.

So the mystery is gone once you know how it works. The trick depends on you not knowing how it's constructed.

And the Buddha said the five aggregates are like a magic show because they give the appearance of being a self, a solid, continuous, separate self. But when you understand how they work—how they're put together—the magic disappears. The illusion of self falls away.

Let's look at how this magic show works, starting with the aggregate of form. When you watch the world of sights, there's this feeling that you are here and the world is out there. There's a sense of separation, of inside and outside. But when you look more carefully at the experience of seeing, what's actually happening?

Light bounces off objects and hits the eye. The eye receives these light patterns, and somewhere in this process, the brain constructs what we call "seeing." But where exactly is the boundary between you and the world? Is the seeing happening in the eye? In the brain? In the object being seen? The experience of seeing seems to happen everywhere and nowhere at once.

This body that we think of as so solid and permanent—it's constantly changing. Every cell is replacing itself. The atoms that make up this form are mostly empty space. And yet there's this persistent sense of "my body," as if it were a fixed, separate thing.

The aggregate of form includes not just this body, but all material phenomena—the chair you're sitting on, the walls around us, the air between us. When you really examine it, where does "your" body end and the rest of the world begin? The air you breathe becomes part of your body. The food you eat becomes your flesh. The heat from your body warms the space around you.

The magic trick of the self depends on not looking too closely at how these aggregates actually function. It depends on the assumption that there's someone in here having experiences, someone separate from what's being experienced. But when mindfulness reveals how each aggregate actually operates, this assumption begins to dissolve.

And while he was showing you the card, I turned the deck around so that when he put it back in, the thick end was at one end of the deck and I can find it by just running my finger up the deck and it comes out. So now you know the secret and now I will never impress you again. That's okay, it's all worth it. It's worth it for the insight.

So now I'd like to read you this comparison that the Buddha made of our existence—the human body and mind—to a magic show. The Buddha put it this way:

"Suppose, friends, that a magician should hold a magic show at the four crossroads, and a keen-sighted person should see it, ponder over it, and reflect on it with wise attention. Even as she sees it, ponders over it, and reflects on it with wise attention, she would find it empty. She would find it hollow. She would find it void of essence. What essence, friends, could there be in a magic show?

"Even so, friends, whatever form, feeling, perception, mental formations, consciousness a practitioner sees—when she sees it, ponders over it, and reflects on it with wise attention—she would find it empty. She would find it hollow. She would find it void of essence. What essence could there be in form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness?"

The Buddha closes the passage with a little poem, which he composed spontaneously as he often did:

"Form is like a mass of foam and feeling but an airy bubble. Perception is like a mirage and mental formations a plantain tree. Consciousness is a magic show, a juggler's trick and tire. All these similes were made known by the kinsmen of the sun"—another epithet for the Buddha.

I should mention this analogy to the plantain tree. I didn't understand it at first. The plantain is a kind of banana. If you know the way the banana tree works, as soon as it grows and sprouts a clump of bananas, it dies because its essence is hollow. A banana tree does not keep producing generation after generation the way most fruit trees do. It comes up once, it produces, and then it's gone. The mental formations are like a banana tree.

What the Buddha is pointing to in this passage is the sheer emptiness of this whole experience that we call a human being.

I want to talk a little bit about this teaching on emptiness because it comes in so often in the Buddhist tradition. The Heart Sutra, which is one of the summations of the wisdom teachings of the Buddha, has very near the start of it the line: "While practicing deeply the paramita of wisdom, the Bodhisattva Avalokiteshvara—who's the Bodhisattva of compassion—perceived that all five aggregates are empty and was saved from all suffering and distress." That's a powerful perception. The very seeing of the emptiness of the aggregates, it's said in this ancient sutra, was enough to save Avalokiteshvara from all suffering and distress.

Last fall I was doing a retreat at home while reading quite a bit of an author named Nagarjuna. Nagarjuna is the author par excellence of emptiness in the whole Buddhist tradition. He wrote in about the second century in India. Through twenty-eight chapters, Nagarjuna just takes apart the substantiality of not only our experience, but then the whole Buddhist path, so that what you had thought you might stand on instead of our usual experience also gets cut out from under you.

I was reading this while doing a lot of retreat practice, and as I was reading it, I started to have dreams about emptiness. In one of my dreams, I was standing in front of a mirror, and I obviously had the same question that probably many of you have. Standing in front of the mirror and seeing my image, this thought came up in my mind in the dream: Why is emptiness important? Because on the face of it, it just can seem like a philosophical idea. Does it really impact our lives?

So the question came in the dream: Why is emptiness important? And the being in the mirror spoke back to me and said, "Because it means that you don't exist. It means that you don't exist."

Now obviously it doesn't mean that I don't exist as a body or as mind states or as intentions and so forth. But what if this world didn't contain you as a problem? What if this world didn't contain you as a center of fear that had to be maintained and defended and protected? What if that kind of identity was taken away? Imagine the freedom and the spaciousness and the ease of life. That's the potential of the insight into emptiness.

In talking about emptiness, I want to go into it a little bit. I met last summer a really impressive teacher—one of the most impressive teachers I've met in my life—a Tibetan teacher named Mingyur Rinpoche, who's twenty-three years old and teaches as though he were a sixty-five-year-old enlightened master. At the age of twenty, he had completed two three-year retreats and led another group of people as the retreat master of a three-year retreat, all by the time he was twenty.

This is a fairly special being. It was his first trip to the West. I got to go around with him for an afternoon, and we asked him what he thought of the West, because it was his first time here. His answer was, "It's square and it's clean." That was kind of interesting. Coming from Kathmandu, or India, I could see why he meant that. But he was obviously not fascinated with the West at all. That's all he had to say about it.

I said, "Do you think Westerners are as happy as Tibetans?" He said no. He really didn't think so from the Westerners that he'd met. And he didn't have a lot of interest in talking about things on that level.

So we were going for a walk. We were actually walking around the top of Mount Tam. You probably know there's a nice circular walk that takes about twenty minutes. And I asked him, "What's the difference between the kind of emptiness in the Dzogchen school and the kind of emptiness they talk about in Nagarjuna's school of Buddhism?"

And then his eyes lit up. He got so excited. He sat down right on the spot, right on the path. We sat down with him, because he obviously wasn't going anywhere, and he started to talk to me about that answer. I received it through a translator. But the first thing he said in that answer was, "What you need to understand is there are eighteen different kinds of emptiness in our tradition. Eighteen different kinds of emptiness." And then he went on to answer my question at quite some length. It was very interesting.

So of the eighteen kinds of emptiness, we're not going very far tonight. We're just touching on a little bit of it.

Let's just take a look at this line that form is like a mass of foam. That means this body and everything else we see out there. How can this be like a mass of foam?

To take a look at that question, I'd like us to reflect for a minute on our usual view of the world. You know, growing up in the latter half of the twentieth century, we've all been conditioned by a very scientific view of the world. Unfortunately, the kind of science that we've picked up, the kind we were taught when we were young and formative, was mostly nineteenth-century science because the insights of quantum physics and later physics haven't really permeated people's being yet.

The nineteenth-century view of science is that this world is the true reality. If you think about the Newtonian view of the way things are, this world is really seen as something solid. It's seen in a way—and this is what I'd like to point to—as an ultimate truth.

I believe that in the culture in which you and I have grown up, the assumption is that this physical world is the ultimate truth. We enter this physical world when we are born. We are trapped in it, completely trapped in it and embedded in it during our lifetime. And when we die, we go out of it. I think the assumption is that this is the ultimate substratum of things.

Now, when the Buddha looked at the world, he put in a different piece, a piece that I think is really important. And that is that everything we experience of this world, we only experience through the human senses and with human consciousness.

So in the view of the Buddha, we may never know. We probably can never know exactly what that physical world is or is like because we're always holding it with human consciousness.

This human consciousness is a really important piece because maybe—just maybe—that is more fundamental than this. And if that's true, it stands our worldview on its head. Maybe consciousness is more fundamental than this physical reality. Maybe instead of consciousness being embedded in the physical reality, maybe the physical reality is just an appearance in consciousness, just an appearance.

When we come to meditation, some of this sense of transparency starts to come through. We've always assumed that the body was solid, but as we practice and develop mindfulness and concentration, we start to see that the body is just the location of changing sensations that are arising and pulsing and throbbing and vibrating and then passing out of existence, one after another.

Despite the fact that our third-grade health book looked like there were solid things in here, when we look with awareness, it's all in flux. It's just change. Its nature is nothing but change. So we start to feel the insubstantiality of the body. We tune in very strongly to the insubstantiality of sounds, of thoughts, the cloud-like nature of our emotions, of tastes and smells, how they're all just passing and drifting through.

This breaking up of solidity is one of the most notable features of a retreat, especially a long retreat. And I know that all of you have tasted it in some degree or another.

But there's one sense door that's really hard to penetrate with this sense of fluidity, and that is the sense door of sight. We look around these eight walls and they look so solid. The floor looks so solid. Even people look quite solid. How can we penetrate that seeming solidity of sight?

Here we can call on science to support our inquiry. Remember from your seventh grade science text how vision gets created. There are photons streaming out of the lights that are all around the room. These photons are bouncing off of every surface in the room and coming to the eye where they enter through the pupil and fall on the retina. That stimulates a nerve transmission that goes up to the brain and in reaching the brain, somehow mysteriously, consciousness is created. Consciousness of sight, seeing happens.

When you think about that, you realize that the appearance of these walls is only coming because photons are continuously striking the retina. And that means that sight is not at all solid, but it's just a flickering on and off of consciousness that's created by millions of photons impinging every microsecond, giving rise through transient nerve impulses to the brain, to some kind of vision, some kind of sight.

We can take it one step further. If you look at the sweater that I have on, and I asked you what color it was, everybody would probably say it's red. It seems really clear. But when you think about what that actually means, you're not saying anything about my sweater being red. It's actually the red light that's bouncing off the sweater into your eyes to create the impression of red. So actually my sweater is every color in the spectrum but red. And the red is what's bouncing off to you.

So when I ask you the question, where is red? What's the answer? Red's really not in this sweater, is it? Red's just an appearance in your consciousness. It's just a blossoming for a short period of time in your sphere of sight. There's nothing solid in this appearance red, just the trickling of photons and the striking of nerve impulses. This whole appearance that seems like a solid world is just a flickering in sight consciousness, nothing more.

We can take it a step further. I think I said in a talk a while ago that our consciousness extends out to the farthest stars. But when you think about it, that's actually a metaphor. What's actually happening is that light has traveled across five million years or so to strike our retina. And then our consciousness projects it as a small light that looks like it's out there. But that light is here and now. It's five million years old. We're actually not seeing the star. We're just seeing some photons that came from it a long, long, long time ago.

So we're actually not seeing the star. We're just seeing light from the star and that light is here and now. That flowering into consciousness is just here and now. Everything is just here and now.

One of the ways that you can work with this in your practice is to speak not so much about objects in our experience, but appearances, and not so much about objects of meditation as subjects of meditation. You can play with this terminology as you go throughout the day. Everything that arises for you is only an appearance.

If you see the world as an appearance rather than as objects, then the world takes on this quality that Kent mentioned this morning talking with Howie about a magical display. Everything that appears to our senses is just this magical display. How did it get here? We don't know. How does it keep functioning? We don't really know. How is consciousness generating our experience? We don't know that either. We just know that everywhere we turn, there are these magical appearances in consciousness.

You know, it's really like a dream. It's very hard to say in a moment of our experience how it is any different than a dream.

One of my teachers put it very directly in a way that was kind of shocking when he said, "Everything that appears has no real existence whatsoever. No real existence whatsoever." In the way that we usually take things to exist, we usually take things to exist solidly. And then we start to realize that that feeling of solidity is just sense data transmitted through touch of hardness—that's all it is.

We were talking about this in a group of old students last fall, and one of the people in the class was Jean Lafond, who practices here at Spirit Rock a lot. I asked her, "What difference did you feel when you started looking at things as appearances rather than objects?" And this was her response:

"It's spooky, but I found it fascinating. I would look at everything—like this Japanese lamp that I love—and I'd see that it's just an appearance. Where that took me is that we're all appearances. When you go from an object to say it's an appearance, and then to a person and say they're an appearance, it made my hair stand on end. But I believe it. It's true. And it makes you both more compassionate and more vulnerable. When I look at my friend Mary, I see she's changing all the time. When you start thinking like this, you have to be more compassionate because we're all in the same boat and we're all so fragile."

This is the felt sense of emptiness, this lack of solid substance within any of us anywhere in the world. And it brings more compassion and more wisdom.

The second of the aggregates is the quality of feeling tone, or vedana. We've talked about this a lot in the instructions—this quality of every moment of our experience being pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. So I'm not going to spend a lot more time with vedana. I think we've investigated that extensively.

The third is the quality of perception. Perception here means to recognize. It has the sense of memory acting so that we have had to learn to recognize these patches of form and color as constituting walls, lamps, women, benches, chairs, men, and so on. It's not intrinsic.

Oliver Sacks has this beautiful story where he was witnessing an operation where a surgeon had restored sight to a man who had lost it very, very young. This man was now in middle age and had learned to function very well as a blind person. When the bandages were removed from the individual at the end of the operation, everybody expected that if the operation was a success, the bandages would be peeled off and the patient would cry, "Wow, now I can see!"

It didn't happen like that. The bandages were taken off, but no cry of "I can see" burst from Virgil's lips. He seemed to be staring blankly, bewildered, without focusing, right at the surgeon who stood before him still holding the bandages. Only when the surgeon spoke, saying "Well?" did a look of recognition cross Virgil's face.

Virgil told Sacks later that in this first moment he had no idea what he was seeing. There was light, there was movement, there was color. It was all mixed up, all meaningless, a blur. Then out of the blur came this voice that said, "Well?" Then and only then, he said, did he finally realize that this chaos of light and shadow was a face, and indeed the face of his surgeon.

Sacks goes on to say that Virgil never actually learned all that well to put the visual world together again, because these tracks in the brain seem to form best when we're really young. So this act of perception—he could never quite get right again.

As we see the world, so we relate to it. There's a story that Jon Kabat-Zinn tells. He's been teaching mindfulness-based stress reduction in the military at quite extensive levels from what I've heard. He was giving one training and heard this story from an officer who was in the training group.

The officer said that he was at the supermarket one day buying some groceries. He was standing in line and the cashier was taking quite a bit of time chatting to an older woman who had brought a child in with her. The cashier had rung up the woman's groceries and still kept on chatting. He was getting really impatient. "Why doesn't this woman move through? Why is the cashier spending so much time with this customer? I'm ready to pay for my groceries."

Why doesn't she get out of my way?

He was getting quite irritated, but with mindfulness-based stress reduction, he was starting to learn to be aware of his feelings, to label his impatience, to try and relax into the present moment, feel his body—all those good skills you've been learning.

He got to the cashier and he just thought he'd check it out. He said, "Well, you certainly seemed to have a nice chat with the customer in front of me."

And the cashier said, "Oh yes, that was my mother. You see, my husband died in an aircraft training exercise only a few months ago, and I have two small children. I've had to go to work now because his life insurance policy didn't leave us enough to live on, and that was my baby. So my mother babysits for me while I come to work here, and she brings my baby in a couple of times a day so that I can see it and check how it's doing."

In that moment, of course, his whole relationship to the situation changed. Instead of the impatience, he just felt this great humility and compassion in the face of what the woman had suffered, the loss that she'd suffered, the difficulty of having two children without a father that she was still working with.

The basic shift that happened was a shift of perception—from perceiving her as an idle, careless, thoughtless worker, to seeing her as somebody who had a human life to live with a great deal of difficulty and complexity. Just in the space of a few moments, that shift of perception happened. His whole relationship to her was different.

Perception is a really powerful faculty. One Tibetan teacher said to a friend of mine that there are two kinds of insights that come in practice. One is when we have special experiences. Another is when we have just ordinary experiences, but we see them differently. We see them differently because there's been a shift in perception. He said the shifts of perception are actually more powerful than the experiences.

This has been interesting for me to reflect on. In the last few days, people have been coming in and reporting some really powerful meditation experiences, really moving and beautiful experiences. Someone mentioned that they were in touch with a stillness that was so profound that as it deepened, the very sense of an observer of the stillness—the observer went away because it got folded into the depth of the stillness as the stillness deepened.

A couple of people have come in and talked about very difficult memories and emotions connected with childhood hurt and abuse, and then coming through the practice and a great deal of work over a number of years to periods of happiness, contentment and acceptance. That's extremely moving. To be able to find that depth of contentment after a really difficult past is really nothing short of a miracle.

Someone else came in and talked about spending time in nature recently, spending three hours with a very full sense of being in the present moment, being one with nature without any sense of desiring anything. What a powerful experience—just to be completely here and without the confusion, the unsatisfying nature of desire.

So all these experiences are extremely significant and extremely important. And as you also are seeing, they all also change. They decay, they move on, something else happens. And we're often left with this question: what was the meaning of this experience that I had that touched me so deeply?

And what I think is important with these special experiences is to take a look at the fact that the experience leaves, but what really can transform is insight. And in those special times, how were you seeing the world differently? What did you learn from that altered state of being? How does the world look different to you from that vantage point, than from the ordinary vantage point of being caught in confusion or disappointment or upheaval? If you can get in touch with what you're learning from the experience, that will stay.

So one of the things we often recommend, if you can recall how the experience was for you bodily—how did you feel in your body when you were in that special place? That can be a doorway back to connecting with the experience a little bit, not to grasp or to try to recreate or out of greed, but so that you can let it unfold a little more and find: what did I learn from that? What did it show me that's new? How do I see things differently?

And then other people were reporting that their experience was going more and more to the ordinary. Instead of all the striving and strain and effort and working that was in the early part of the retreat, they found that they were just dropping into an effortless kind of mindfulness that felt quite unpressured, quite unforced, very natural, and they wondered if that had any value.

This is another really beautiful turning point. The real ordinariness of experience, but with just a sense of contentment and settledness and ease. You can really trust in that place. It is special. It may not feel very special. It may feel like you're just kind of in a very ordinary frame of mind, but you can trust with that effortless unfolding that it will deepen on its own.

The fourth of the aggregates is mental formations, sometimes called karmic formations. It means that there's some urge that's bringing them forward. Mostly these are thoughts, emotions, moods, and images. To a large extent, these are what we identify as personality. You know, our consistent mood—that's a happy person, that's a kind person, that's a sad person, that's a fearful person. And the kind of thought patterns that go with those things kind of define the personality to a large extent.

There's a conditioned quality to this patterning. Sometimes it's precisely what motivates us to come to practice—it certainly was for me. The first time I did a retreat, I was emerging from a period of profound confusion and fear. What I touched in meditation practice was a depth of openness where nothing was there from the beginning. I had that sense really clearly early on: nothing was there from the beginning. Everything was simply coming and going.

Suzuki Roshi expressed this beautifully: "Those who know the state of emptiness will always be able to dissolve their problems through constancy." This is the profound healing quality of meditation. As Sylvia spoke about the other night, there's that opening of the heart that comes when there's no longer outer pressure upon it. The heart becomes able to offer up and truly release patterns it may have been holding for years upon years. When the heart can let go of that burden of the past, it can enter this moment with such heartfulness, presence, and ease. We begin to feel what is pointed to by the natural peace and ease of the unburdened heart.

The last of the aggregates is consciousness—the knowing quality in each moment, the receptive quality that holds the sense data. It also holds feeling, perception, and mental formations; consciousness holds all of our experience. In every moment, there's the sense data and the knowing of it arising together. You can't really take them apart. The sense data may be physical, but there's always a mental component—our consciousness. Without this mental component, experience couldn't enter memory; we couldn't recall it later. Yet we can—if I ask you to remember the sound of the bell, you can, because there was a mental receiving and storing of that sound.

This is a fascinating investigation for meditation: getting in touch with that knowing quality of mind that meets sense data. You can turn your attention to the knowing side rather than the object side. You can work with this through the breath, through sounds.

This leads into the big mind meditation that Howie led this morning—turning attention to consciousness itself. This brings through the sense of insubstantiality to our experience, the consciousness side.

These are the five aggregates—our mental and physical components of form, feeling, perception, mental formations, and consciousness.

I'd like to share a story from a nun practicing at the time of the Buddha. Her name was Vajira, one of the nuns visited by Mara. As Eugene discussed in the retreat's first part, many Mara stories appear in the ancient texts. Mara—the embodiment of temptation, confusion, or evil—often visited practitioners, particularly nuns. Here, Mara comes to distract a nun deep in meditation, hoping to draw her from her practice.

Mara approaches and says, "Who put this living being together? Where is the maker? Where does this being come from and where will it end?"

But Vajira was no beginning meditator. She responded: "What's this 'being' you go on about? That's just your delusion. We are nothing but the skandhas. There's no being to be found here. It's like this: a certain combination of parts is called by the name 'chariot.' So with the skandhas, the elements of mind and body, it's only common usage to call it a 'being.' It is suffering that exists, suffering that endures, and suffering that disappears. Nothing but suffering exists. Nothing but suffering comes to an end."

What Vajira was pointing to is that when we take up the concept of self or being, we bind ourselves to suffering. There's really no difference between grasping onto a self and suffering. When we begin to see this clearly, we also see the way out of our suffering. If we don't take ourselves to be the body, if we don't take ourselves to be the owner of the body, then where's the problem?

Ajahn Buddhadasa put it this way:

He said, "This body came from nature. It's never departed from nature and it belongs to nature. So give back to nature what belongs to nature." It's a great relief.

We call it a being, but as we look closely, investigating its component parts, we only find form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. We don't find any solid center that we could call an "I." We create an "I" where there really is no evidence for one, and by holding on to it, we suffer.

One meditator described suffering simply as rope burn—holding on to what's slipping away. That's why it's said in the Visuddhimagga, one of the ancient texts: "There is suffering, but there is no one who suffers. There is suffering, but there is no one who suffers. Empty phenomena roll on. This view alone is right and true."

Empty phenomena rolling on. This is you and me. There's no one inside of this. Essentially there's the body, there's the consciousness, and there are our thoughts and feelings. That's it. There's no owner.

And yet, as Jean pointed out in the quote I read earlier, this kind of seeing actually brings out compassion, because we see how each of us has been caught, how each of us is stuck in this "I" view. And then we start to connect with this beautiful image of Kuan Yin, the other image on the altar.

Kuan Yin is the bodhisattva, the awakened being who embodies compassion. She's often depicted with many heads, many eyes, a thousand arms and a thousand hands. It's said that she can hear all the cries of pain and sorrow from every being throughout the whole world and has a thousand arms and a thousand hands to bring them relief, to bring us relief. She is the very embodiment of compassion.

But Kuan Yin is also a bodhisattva, and bodhisattvas are also not deluded about the nature of beings. Bodhisattvas understand clearly that there is suffering, but there is no one who suffers. And so while she cares deeply about the pain that each of us feels, she also knows that there's no one at the center of this who is suffering.

This is the beautiful balance of wisdom and compassion that grows out of this understanding of emptiness. And that's why she's left us this beautiful pointing of freedom in an utterance of hers, a phrase that I like a lot, and I'll close with:

"The winds of circumstance blow across emptiness. Whom can they harm?"

The winds of circumstance blow across emptiness. Whom can they harm?

So let's just sit for a minute.

CHAPTER 221

Renunciation

In this opening dharma talk for a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong examines renunciation (nekkhamma) as one of the ten pāramīs—the perfections leading to liberation. Drawing from the Buddha's own renunciation story and examples of great contemplatives like Mahāsī Sayādaw, Dingo Khyentse Rinpoche, and Ani Tenzin Palmo, Armstrong illustrates how outer simplicity creates space for inner transformation. He explains how retreat conditions—giving up speaking, reading, special foods, and social contact—mirror the Buddha's departure from household life into homelessness. The talk addresses practical aspects of retreat living while emphasizing that true renunciation involves releasing inner grasping rather than mere external austerity. Armstrong explores the relationship between discipline (sīla) and freedom, showing how restraint leads to gladness of mind rather than deprivation. He discusses the challenges that arise when external distractions fall away, revealing the mind's fundamental patterns of attachment and aversion. Through stories from forest monasteries and mountain retreats, the talk demonstrates how renunciation cultivates the 'open hand' of letting go versus the 'closed fist' of grasping, ultimately supporting the practitioner's journey toward the 'unshakable deliverance' the Buddha described.

For those of you who weren't here last night, I'd really like to welcome you to the beginning of this year's three-month retreat, which, as we remarked last night, is the 25th since the beginning in 1975. It seems quite historic to me.

I can't help but notice tonight that this half of the hall is a little more densely populated than that half. There are only three rows of zabutons for the men while there are four rows for the women, and the women are still denser. What does that say about the spiritual center of gravity for our culture these days? I don't know, but hats off to the women.

After the opening last night, the teachers went back to the staff room and were talking about how inspired we all felt by the opening. It was really your commitment—seeing that so many of you have come together to dedicate this much of your life to deepening your dharma practice is very touching and very moving for us.

For myself, I've been on your side quite a lot in these retreats. I've been at about eight of these retreats in the past, mostly as a yogi, sometimes on staff. This is the first time I get to be on this side of the equation, and I feel really honored to be here.

What's great in teaching a long retreat is being able to watch how much change, how much growth, and how much opening you all go through. It's very touching for us on the teaching side, and for me, it really strengthens my faith. I just see again and again—this stuff works. This stuff really has the power to transform lives and uproot suffering. So it's really a privilege to be here with you, and I'm looking forward to getting to know a lot of you and seeing the rest of you over the course of these six weeks.

It's really a time of rejoicing, and I hope you feel that also. Sometimes we go into a long retreat and we go into our room after the opening dharma talk and we close the door and the silence is really palpable. Sometimes there's that little gulp of "what have I gotten myself into here?" There's understandably a little apprehension at the start of a long retreat. But I also hope you'll feel and really tune into and let yourself appreciate the joyfulness of this beginning.

I actually can't think of any other activity, any other form of life that is such a great support for strengthening the wholesome qualities of mind and heart. So we all have a lot to be thankful for in being here. The outcome from our work together will really do a lot for each other, for ourselves, and ultimately for the world. So I really want to appreciate you for taking the time to dedicate yourself to this work.

This period of withdrawal from a busy life—time to slow down, time to be quiet, just time to contemplate—is a way of life that is praised by every culture that is grounded in spiritual values. It's something that's even more needed today, I feel.

This is a quote from a Tibetan teacher in Ladakh named Drukchen Rinpoche, whom Andrew Harvey met when he was traveling in Ladakh some years ago and wrote about in a book called Journey to Ladakh. It's a young Tibetan lama who's been exposed to Western ways.

Drukchen Rinpoche said, "I was given a Western education for which I am grateful in many ways, but I lost something. I lost the peace of mind that I might have had in another generation. Everyone in our generation lives in a fragmented, complex, and disturbing time in which it is hard to keep one's spiritual balance, hard to find the time to build the balance in the first place. I feel increasingly that I must go into retreat more, must meditate more, must discipline myself more. Otherwise, I shall be of no use to my people."

I really like this passage because not only does it remind us what we're doing here and the importance of it in bringing that balance into our own lives, but it also reminds us of what I hope is a motivation that we all share. We're doing this work not just for ourselves alone, but we really have the understanding right from the beginning that the work we do will benefit those that we come in contact with, and those circles will spread out in ways we may never understand. So we say that we do our practice in order to benefit all sentient beings everywhere. We never know if our actual practice has or not, but this is our understanding. This is the way that we practice.

I'd like to talk tonight about one of the aspects of the retreat that is a great support for our practice and a great support for our awakening, and that is the aspect of renunciation. Obviously, one of the biggest differences between what we do here and what we do in our daily life outside is around this aspect of simplicity of lifestyle, of having put aside a lot of the occupations and, in many cases, distractions that we live with day by day.

The archetype, of course, for this kind of practice was the Buddha, who as a young man, just twenty-nine years old, was visited by the heavenly messengers in the form of a sick person, an aging person, a corpse, and then a renunciate. After being visited by those, he saw the vulnerability that we're all exposed to—of illness, aging, and death—and the possibility of a way out. The bodhisattva understood that within this bodily form, we're all subject to suffering. From that understanding, he dedicated his life to finding the way out.

So he left home at twenty-nine. I'm sure you know the story, so I'll just read this short passage from the Middle Length Discourses: "While still young, a black-haired young man endowed with the blessings of youth, in the prime of life, I shaved off my hair and beard, though my mother and father wished otherwise and grieved with tearful faces."

I put on the yellow robe and went forth from the home life into homelessness.

This is really the same journey that each of you has made in coming here. In leaving behind family, in leaving behind friends, perhaps in leaving behind children or parents, you have all made that step of renunciation, of leaving the home life. And for the time that you're here, whether it's six weeks or three months, you're really in a homeless kind of lifestyle. It's a floating monastery that we create for the time that you're here.

In this homeless life, you've had to give up. You've had to renounce a lot of comfort. The Buddha gave up all his comforts, as you probably know. The idea at the time was that if he mortified the flesh, the spirit would be liberated. So he began to consciously starve the body. He was eating one spoon of rice a day, and then one spoon of rice a week, and then one grain of rice a day. This is the time in the bodhisattva's career when he became extremely thin, what's called the emaciated Buddha.

He says of his life at that time, "My vertebrae stood out on my spine like beads on a cord. My ribs jutted out as gaunt as the crazy rafters of an old roofless barn. When I touched my belly skin, I could feel my backbone."

Fortunately, this is not required practice here at IMS. The Buddha came to understand that the mortification of the flesh didn't work and turned back to the middle path of taking enough food to be healthy and to keep the body fit and strong, but not indulging in luxury.

I'm reminded of the power of this quality of renunciation. Michelle mentioned that she and I were on staff together in the late 70s. In fact, the last thing that I remember doing on staff was giving the manager's talk for a retreat. It was a special retreat for us at the time. In the spring of 1979, we were visited by somebody I'd been hearing about for years, somebody who's one of the greatest meditation masters of this century—Mahasi Sayadaw.

It was really his meditation technique that we teach and practice during this retreat. He was responsible for founding hundreds, if not thousands, of meditation centers in his lifetime. You could almost say he revived the widespread practice of meditation in Burma. Mahasi Sayadaw was the teacher of Joseph's teacher, Munindra, and also the teacher of one of Jack's teachers, Ajahn Asaba, whom Jack practiced with in Thailand. So we were very excited to have him come visit. He was the grandfather of our whole sangha.

As a staff person, I got to go to the airport to meet him. A few of us drove there and went into Logan and waited at the gate where his flight pulled in. We were standing at the gate, watching all the people walk off. No monks. A lot of people kept coming out, but no monks were appearing. It's hard to overlook bald men in brown curtains. We were pretty sure we hadn't missed him. Everybody filed off the plane, still no monks. We were getting a little worried. Did they miss their connection in Bangkok? Did we get the wrong day?

So we were standing there, still intently watching the exit gate, and then very slowly, very mindfully, one step at a time, came Mahasi Sayadaw and four other monks who were traveling with him. Each of them was carrying a fan. If you see any photos from that retreat—and there are some around in the archives of IMS—you'll see these brown fans that they all carried. They had orange embroidered lettering that said something like, "Venerable Mahasi Sayadaw, 1979 World Tour." So the rock star lineage of the tour was in effect.

It was really a very powerful assembly. Mahasi Sayadaw himself, of course, was very renowned. And he brought with him two monks who have continued to teach Westerners, who I know some of you have practiced with. One was Sayadaw U Janaka, who still teaches Westerners in Burma. Another was Sayadaw U Silananda, who lives and teaches in the Bay Area now, and two other monks as well.

At the time, I was still fairly young in my practice. I'd been practicing for a couple of years at that point. Looking back, I feel I didn't appreciate their teachings as much as I would today. There was a simplicity and an unadorned quality to their teachings that at the time I wasn't quite mature enough to receive. I enjoyed being with them in certain qualities of their being.

I really was struck by many qualities, but the teachings at the time I found a little bit dry. I wish now I'd had a chance to go back and listen again, because basically what these men were about was repeating the words of the Buddha—not just in a blind way, but repeating the words of the Buddha as they had proved them and experienced them through their own lives and practice.

Individually they had a great deal of power. There was a purity and nobility and great presence in every one of these monks. I could tell right away that they didn't need anything from me—I was just a staff person here. Joseph and Sharon and Jack and Jacqueline were the teachers, but they didn't need anything from them either. They had their air tickets home and were so self-reliant in a way that felt like a great testament to their renunciation. They were complete within themselves, and because of that, they had an unshakability. They weren't looking to be liked. They weren't looking to impress us. They were just there.

Renunciation is actually one of the ten paramis—these qualities of heart and mind that when developed fully bring the mind to liberation. Renunciation in the Theravadan list is the third of these qualities. Some synonyms for renunciation that give you a sense of its power are relinquishment and letting go, both of which point to the undoing of grasping. If grasping is symbolized by a closed fist, renunciation is symbolized by the open hand, much like generosity. As you probably know, grasping and the undoing of grasping is the heart of the Buddha's teaching. Renunciation goes right to that heart.

From the Dhammapada: "If by renouncing a lesser happiness one attains to a happiness which is greater, then the wise pursue that happiness which is greater."

In the list of the paramis, it's said that the proximate cause of renunciation—what really triggers it—is a sense of spiritual urgency. I imagine that most of you can relate to that. Having committed this much of your time to Dharma practice, I have a feeling that there's a little fire going on in all of you, that fire of ardor and urgency.

I want to tell a few stories about renunciation in the Buddhist tradition. One of the great Tibetan masters of the century is a teacher named Dingo Khentse Rinpoche. He was one of the leaders of the Rimé school, a school that tried to unify the different Tibetan sects. He was very accomplished in the Nyingma and Kagyu methods of meditation, and a very loving and compassionate man. Khentse Rinpoche spent about twenty-two years in retreat over the course of his life.

I thought I would read to you one passage from a letter he wrote to his parents when he was first embarking on the renunciate life. This was written when he was thirteen years old:

"My dearest parents, you gave me birth with all the freedoms and advantages of human life, and you have cared for me with love from my infancy till now. Since you introduced me to an authentic teacher, it is thanks to your kindness that I have encountered the path of liberation. After hearing, thinking about, and meditating on the life of my perfect teacher, I have resolved to slip quietly away from all this life's concerns and roam through empty and uninhabited valleys.

Father and mother, stay in your handsome lofty house. I, your young son, long instead for empty caves. Thank you for the fine soft clothes you gave me, yet I don't need them. I would rather dress in plain white felt. I leave my valuable belongings behind. A begging bowl, a staff, and Dharma robes are all I need.

Although for now your son will hide away in mountain glens, your smiling faces will be with me always. Nor shall I forget your loving care. And if I reach the citadel of experience and realization, I shall repay your kindness. Of that you can be sure."

This was written when Rinpoche was thirteen. When he was fifteen, he left his teacher to enter a cave where he spent seven years, from fifteen to twenty-two. Three of those years, he actually didn't speak.

Sometime after that period of cave practice, continuing on in his spiritual journey, he spent four years at a spot in Tibet called White Grove, a very isolated place. I have a photograph that some of you can see—his hut perched on top of a hill, looking down into an isolated valley, and then across to broad, deep mountains in the background. When he was in his early to mid-twenties, he spent four years in this place. In total, he dedicated twenty-two years to retreat practice.

Another Tibetan lama who intrigues me greatly is named Lama Shabkar. Born in 1781, he began a three-year retreat on a remote island in Tibet when he was twenty-five. That would place the date in the early 1800s—about the time on this continent that we were making the Louisiana Purchase, taking away more land from the native people, and preparing to fight the War of 1812 with the British. Just to give you a sense of the enlightened nature of life in America at that time.

Lama Shabkar wrote one of the greatest meditation manuals I've ever encountered, called Flight of the Garuda in the Nyingma School of Meditation. It's a truly beautiful work, translated by Keith Dowman, and he wrote it while on this remote island. As you know, Tibet gets quite cold in winter, and he was staying in this cave without heat. There were just a few other people on this remote island, but they would come asking him meditation questions. He was already renowned, even though young, as a great meditator.

Lama Shabkar found that these interruptions were disrupting his meditation practice somewhat. So for one particular winter on the island, he mudded himself into his cave. He took in some supplies of butter and tsampa and water, and completely sealed himself off from human contact for the entire winter.

For the rest of the year, he wrote: "Throughout the year, my teacher's attendant occasionally brought me goat's milk and curd. In the summer, some vegetables were to be found. By the end of autumn, however, my supplies were exhausted, and for two months I was reduced to eating only a thin soup of tsampa"—roasted barley, a staple in the Tibetan diet.

This is not an austerity we will inflict on you during this retreat—you will have truly wonderful food, as you know. But this exemplifies the kind of dedication and courage that practitioners have embodied over the centuries.

Here was another statement of his commitment: "Until I achieve unchanging stability of mind, I won't remain in busy worldly places, but will stay alone in isolated places of retreat. Teacher, please accept this offering made to please you. The length of my practice shall equal the length of my life."

That is a beautiful vow.

Coming into this retreat situation, you all sacrifice a great deal. You give up contact with your loved ones, families, and friends. You surrender the opportunity to speak. You release special foods, reading, writing, music, television. You even give up your email—quite a sacrifice indeed.

To keep pace with technology at Spirit Rock, part of the manager's talk now includes asking people to turn off their cell phones during retreat. It happens. I suspect that in another year or two, we'll need to ask people to disable wireless internet access as well. It's all coming, making things increasingly complex.

There's nothing inherently wrong with these things we enjoy in daily life, these sources of pleasure. The issue is that most of us lean on them. We've grown accustomed to depending on them. When they're removed, we feel unhappy, lonely, or deprived. This signals that there's an aspect of the Dharma we haven't quite grasped—because consciousness itself is self-sustaining, self-supporting.

When our consciousness becomes wrapped around an object, another appearance, or bound to that object, our being becomes slightly distorted. We become off-center. Coming into a situation like this retreat, we truly have the opportunity to let the mind return to its natural strength and steadiness.

Because consciousness is self-supporting and self-sustaining, we don't actually need those other things. We don't need to rest on them or rely on them. They serve as wonderful grounds—relationships are magnificent grounds for understanding, for developing compassion and love—but we need not depend on them.

In this situation, we get to rediscover our inherent strength, which is our own true nature and our birthright. The essential spirit of the renunciate life is something that truly applies here.

It's the spirit of taking what's given—taking that which is freely offered and not demanding more and not taking more.

If you've practiced in Asia, you probably know this spirit really well. When I was a monk in Thailand, our whole training was we took what was placed in our bowl. We might like it or we might not—that wasn't really so important. It took some acculturation to get to appreciate some of the things we were offered. Goose eggs, for instance, that have been pickled—if you haven't had them, it's kind of a wake-up call to the taste buds.

Most of the places I practiced were forest monasteries, and we tend to eat one meal a day there. It was usually served at 8 in the morning, and then there wasn't anything until the next morning at 8 o'clock. So when we gathered the food for our morning meal, we were usually really hungry. And sometimes it was great food, and sometimes, I have to say, it was pretty disappointing, especially when you're that hungry. If you haven't, for instance, eaten a red fish curry on an empty stomach at 8 in the morning, you haven't really lived.

The place I spent most of my time was Wat Suan Mok, which was Ajahn Buddhadasa's monastery in the south of Thailand. Ajahn Buddhadasa had a very, very spacious mind in practice. He incorporated many different elements in his teaching—Mahayana elements, Zen elements, Tibetan art—very broad-minded man. There weren't many demands placed on us at his monastery. He just wanted to set us loose in the forest and let our minds calm and let us develop meditation.

The food at his monastery was the worst of anywhere I practiced in Thailand. It was absolutely the worst food. I actually think he intended it that way, so that people wouldn't just come and hang out because it was a comfortable place to be. You really had to want to practice in order to stay there. So it was a good filter, actually. It was a great spirit in that monastery.

In the Zen tradition, they say that the mouth of a renunciate should be like a furnace—it can burn the finest sandalwood or dried cow dung with equal ease. So you won't be served that either, but please keep that in mind as you accept the meals that the kitchen prepares. Sometimes they'll be to your liking and sometimes they may not. Most of the time they probably will be.

There's a saying up on the notice board in the kitchen at Spirit Rock. It says that when we serve you delicious food, that's our practice. This is the cook speaking to the yogis. When we serve you delicious food, that's our practice. When we serve you undelicious food, that's your practice.

Please try to work with it in that way. Know that the cooks really are putting their hearts and souls into the food that they prepare for you. And then try to work with your own likes and dislikes really as an important part of practice. It's another way to release grasping and to release fixed views, really to open to the reality of what is.

In the monastery, sometimes our accommodations weren't so ideal. Again, at Suan Mok, we were living in little huts out in the forest, and there were all the tropical forest creatures who would come to visit us. I could tell sometimes that one had come to visit because I could hear in the next cabin over a thump, thump, thump—actually, it was more like a bang, bang, bang on the tin roof from inside. And I knew what that meant. It meant my friend was hitting a stick against the roof of his house from inside because a snake had fallen off onto the roof from a tree and he wanted to scare it off. Because if he didn't scare it off, what it would do is slither down to the edge of the roof and then come in under the overhang and make a nice, cozy place for itself in the rafters of his cabin. And because half of the snakes were poisonous, he really didn't want that to happen.

So I'd hear that thump, thump, thump, and I'd know that a snake was on the roof.

One night in the middle of the night, I got up from my kuti, my hut, to go out and pee in the forest, and I was walking back up the stairs, put my hand on the handrail, right on top of a scorpion. Boom. That was a sting. That was a painful moment.

Another night, I was just going to bed. I just sort of tucked my mosquito net in around my little mat, and I felt another bite in my foot that actually became the most painful sensation I think I've ever experienced. It was a poisonous centipede.

These are really scary-looking creatures. They're sort of orange-colored, about eight inches long, and their pinchers look like they make up about half of the body. They're really wicked-looking pinchers at the top. And they inject this venom. It felt like what it did was inflict about an eight-hour cramp into my muscle. It wasn't until the next morning that it relaxed enough that my foot felt normal again.

So again, you don't have to deal with that kind of stuff here. Of course, you have other things to deal with. We really wish everybody could be in single rooms. The long-term plan is for the retreat center to be transformed so that everyone on retreat can be in single rooms, but unfortunately we're not there yet.

Some of you may have really wanted a single room and it just wasn't possible to offer you one. Some of you may have accepted being in a double room and then discover uncertainties about your roommate. Others of you may be in a room and wish you were on a different side of the building. Why can't I be in a south-facing room? Why does my room have to be above the laundry?

These are the things that we need to accommodate and really work with as practice. To look at the force of wanting or aversion that comes in the mind and to take our stand of mindfulness right there. Not to make a demand on the staff that it be different—because in most cases it's just not possible—but to really work with it as part of our own renunciation, our own letting go inwardly. And that's where we can really expand our freedom, our internal freedom.

One of the other big renunciations that you make here is around communicating. As Michelle talked about last night, part of the silence obviously is not speaking to one another, not writing letters or receiving letters or cards. We give up phone calls. We give up reading and writing. These are big changes. So we really ask for your support in that.

This is an area where the impact on the community is especially strong. When we have the motivation that we're practicing to benefit all beings, the beings we can most immediately benefit are those right around us. So please remember that your guarding of the silence, your attention to the silence, will not only help your own practice, but will really also help everyone who's practicing around you.

When we give up all these outer things, it definitely has an impact on the inner life. We become less burdened. Our hearts become open in a way. Because we drop off a lot of unnecessary activities, the channels are really clear for the Dharma to come in.

One of my Tibetan teachers was just talking about this phenomenon. You know how you go into the toilet on an airplane and you lock the door and then it says "occupied"? So it's kind of like when we busy ourselves with all the other activities, there's a sign on our hearts that says "occupied." And then the Dharma can't come in. So when we drop those things, then the heart is really open to receive. It's open to receive the teachings of life, and life is teaching us all the time when our eyes and ears and hearts are open. This is a beautiful aspect of the simplicity of retreat.

This is from a writer named Scott Sanders from Audubon Magazine who had just come back into his home after being away on a backpacking trip and was totally shocked by all the stuff in his house. He said: "One moment I can lay everything I need on the corner of a poncho. The next moment it seems I couldn't fit all my furniture into a warehouse. So I vow to purchase nothing that I don't really need, to give away everything that is excess, and to refuse all chores that don't arise from central concerns. The simplicity I seek is not the enforced austerity of the poor, but the richness of a gathered and deliberate life in which your belongings and commitments are few in number and high in quality."

This is really a great description of what you all are doing here.

When the outer activities drop away, sometimes what we see isn't always so easy to see. Michelle likes to use the expression of being here through the autumn. As we watch the leaves fall off the trees, what gets exposed are the bare branches—you might say the framework of the trees, the more fundamental framework.

In a similar way, when we drop our outer concerns, what gets exposed for us as meditators are the inner structures of the mind. So we start to see the fundamental patterns of our minds that don't have so much to do with the externals. These forces of liking and not liking, of wanting and fearing, of preferring one thing and not another—the whole complex of grasping gets laid out clearly before us.

Sometimes that's not so easy to take. At this level of renunciation, often some of our deepest fears and emotions get triggered.

In the early days of retreat, I often notice myself experiencing what feels like grief—a mourning for all that I've left behind. My wife, my activities, commitments, friends. This letting go can bring up waves of insecurity, loneliness, or feelings of unworthiness. All of these emotions are part of seeing that inner structure clearly, witnessing the bareness of our hearts and minds just as they are. This becomes a place of profound learning.

I think of Ani Tenzin Palmo, a remarkable Western Tibetan nun who was among the first Westerners to take robes. She ordained in India in 1964 with Kamtrul Rinpoche at just twenty-one years old, having been born in London. After spending years convincing her teacher to grant permission for solitary practice, she retreated to a cave high in the Himalayas—twelve thousand feet up in a bitterly cold, utterly isolated location—where she practiced for twelve years.

Toward the end of her time there, she undertook a three-year retreat in complete silence, speaking to no one. Her supporters would bring food, but she maintained her vow of silence throughout. Imagine her surprise when, near the retreat's conclusion but not yet ready to emerge, she heard an unexpected knock at her door. Opening it, she found an enraged Indian policeman declaring that her visa was invalid and she must leave the country immediately.

Talk about integration challenges! After three years without speaking to anyone, how would you like that for a transition back into the world?

She asked for just one day to prepare, then went down to speak with him. As they talked, the policeman's heart softened—he too had a love for spiritual life. He allowed her to complete her retreat, though she did have to leave afterward. She now lives near Assisi in Italy.

When she visited Spirit Rock for a public talk, I had the chance to meet her. She struck me as remarkably grounded, down-to-earth, and clear. I told her how much I appreciated her commitment to such extended practice, acknowledging that twelve years in a cave was beyond what I could imagine for myself. Her response was wonderfully matter-of-fact: "You know, it really wasn't such a big deal. It was just what I wanted to do."

I suspect many of you would receive similar reactions if you told friends and family exactly what you're doing on this retreat. "How can you possibly sit in silence for six weeks or three months without talking to anyone?" Yet for you, there's likely that same knowing: this is simply what I want to do. And it is also, undeniably, a big deal that you're doing it.

When a journalist writing her biography—the wonderful book Cave in the Snow—asked if going on retreat wasn't a form of escape, Tenzin Palmo's reply was illuminating: "Not at all. To my mind, worldly life is an escape. When you have a problem, you can turn on the television, phone a friend, go out for a coffee. In a cave, however, you have no one to turn to but yourself. When problems arise, you have no choice but to go through with them and come out the other side. In a cave, you face your own nature in the raw, and you have to find a way of dealing with it."

This is precisely our situation as well. In retreat, the inner life becomes extraordinarily vivid.

Cutting off the outer entanglements really wakes up the inner. Just like when you're listening to a symphony with your eyes open and suddenly you close your eyes and go more within—how much more alive the music becomes. It's the same way in our setting. As we drop off our connection to the outer, the inner life becomes extraordinarily alive and awake in all its beauty, and in all its glory, and in all its difficulty too. This is part and parcel of the package.

Sometimes our emotional reactions become quite strong on retreat—this phenomenon that I'm sure you all know called yogi mind. I've witnessed many great examples of yogi mind over the years. My favorite is the one where a retreat manager at Yucca Valley in California received a note asking if he could please contact the airline so they could change the flight patterns so the planes didn't have to fly over the retreat area. This was a serious request. Sometimes perspective gets a little lost in the middle of yogi mind.

Often this lack of perspective really shows up around our relationships with one another. In the middle of retreat, I'm sure you know, we can get on each other's nerves. Things that we do will annoy or frustrate one another: the person who always comes into the sitting late, the person who almost knocks you over in the lunch line, the person who won't wait their turn for dishes or by the tea urn, someone who wears a crinkly nylon jacket in the middle of all the meditations and just happens to be sitting right next to you.

In one retreat, quite a long retreat, I was sitting next to someone who breathed really loudly. I had to make a choice really early on: Was I going to follow my breath or was I going to follow his? I had two easy objects to choose from.

So one of those typical notes might read something like: "Dear fellow meditator, we've been asked many times not to wear nylon in the hall. In case you haven't noticed, this is actually a mindfulness practice. Please don't ever wear that nylon jacket in here again." And of course you know how the notes are always signed—Metta. Always signed Metta.

What's so striking is that when we're in the middle of one of those attacks of yogi mind and we're about to write a note like that, we might not even know that we're angry. This is actually the way the hindrances work. The hindrances sort of swoop in below our radar, and they're in full display before they've quite crossed our screen yet. We don't know quite what's on the map. So we think this is all very reasonable: "Well, of course, anybody would write this person such a note at this time. I'm doing it for the benefit of all sentient beings, right?"

But if you've ever been on the receiving end of one of those notes, you know that they can be really devastating. As we go through the days and weeks here, we all become extraordinarily sensitive. Part of the opening up process—the Indian teacher Goenkaji describes this as open heart surgery without the anesthetic—is that you become very vulnerable. Everything that touches you touches you quite deeply and immediately. When you feel a burst of anger from somebody else in this sanctuary, in this safe place, it can have an extraordinarily disturbing impact. It can honestly take days or even a week for someone to recover from a note like that.

So please, please don't write each other notes. If there's any communication you feel needs to happen with a fellow meditator, please do it through one of us or through the course manager. Please don't contact each other directly. It can be so disturbing—it can ruin days of someone's practice. So please be very careful in that area.

If you feel you really need to write an angry note, better to write it to one of the teachers. Joseph is actually a good person to write to if you're really upset—Joseph is so spacious that he would be a good choice. So much better than writing to one another.

On retreat, we simply take these turmoils of our own mind as part and parcel of the experience. We try not to share them with the rest of the retreatants who have their own turmoils, probably quite enough to deal with.

This facet of outer renunciation is so important because it clears the decks for the inner work. And then inwardly, it's really important also to have a heart that's free from a lot of grasping. There's this inner attitude of renunciation where we don't hold so tightly to our own hopes and fears and likes and dislikes and wants and not-wants. What that does is create a lot of space within—a great deal of openness where we can start to really accommodate our own movements of heart and mind.

So this is the dance of our practice during our time together. Outwardly, in the realm of discipline and our behavior with one another, we follow the form with great care. We are truly mindful in our actions with each other. And then inwardly, we remain very open—very light, very informal. This is a beautiful combination and a wonderful direction for practice.

I just returned from a retreat at Spirit Rock where I was sitting, led by a Tibetan teacher named Sogyal Rinpoche and Ajahn Amaro, a Theravadan Buddhist monk who has taught here many times and whom I'm sure many of you know. It was the first time I had ever witnessed a Theravadan monk and a Tibetan teacher leading a retreat together. It was truly beautiful to see how well they harmonized. By the end of the retreat, it was clear they had developed genuine affection and deep respect for one another.

Sogyal Rinpoche said something very touching about Ajahn Amaro at the retreat's conclusion. He said, "You know, this bhikkhu—I never met anybody like him before. He has very strict vinaya. In his discipline, he is impeccable. But inwardly, his heart is very open. I never met anyone like that before. Usually the ones with strict vinaya are very tight inside. This one has very good discipline and is very open within."

This offers us a wonderful model for our own practice—to keep finding that joy and ease within ourselves as we remain truly careful about our interactions with one another. It is the best way to practice.

This is again from Drukpa Kunley Rinpoche: "We must be still within ourselves, still and calm, and yet we must also, at the same time, be moving forward towards each other and towards the world. What is not useful for this endless transformation must be abandoned. Anything that prevents a finer flowering of our spirit must be left behind. The clearest and wisest person becomes awake, becomes the world. She enters without fear and without hope into the full presence of reality."

The Buddha himself taught that discipline is simply the first step of a sequence that leads to freedom. He explained that discipline is for the sake of restraint, and restraint is for the sake of freedom from remorse. Freedom from remorse is for the sake of gladness of mind. Remember that this is truly the spirit behind renunciation, behind restraint—it is for our own gladness of heart and mind.

I would like to close with words from the Buddha, where he spoke in a sutta about his own liberation, his own enlightenment. We remember that the spur to his practice was the encounter with the four heavenly messengers in the beginning. This, then, is the summation of his practice, also in relation to those heavenly messengers:

"Then, friends, being myself subject to birth, having understood the danger in what is subject to birth, I attained the unborn, supreme security from bondage, nibbana. Being subject to aging, having understood the danger in what is subject to aging, I attained the unaging supreme security from bondage, nibbana. Being subject to sickness, I attained the unailing security from bondage, nibbana. Being subject to death, I attained the deathless security from bondage, nibbana. And being subject to sorrow, having understood the danger in what is subject to sorrow, I attained the sorrowless supreme security from bondage, nibbana. The knowledge and vision arose in me. My deliverance is unshakable. There is no more renewal of becoming."

Let's just sit together for a moment.

Mettā: Effort and Fruits

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong addresses the doubts that often arise when Vipassana practitioners begin mettā (loving-kindness) meditation, particularly around the use of phrases and the apparent busyness of the practice. Drawing from his own experience of feeling like a complete beginner after 18 years of Vipassana practice, Armstrong explains the mechanics of mettā meditation and how it cultivates what he calls the 'juice' in spiritual practice—qualities like love, compassion, devotion, and warmth that can make the dharma path more alive and connected.

Armstrong offers practical guidance on working skillfully with the traditional mettā phrases, suggesting techniques like resting attention in the heart center, visualizing the recipient, and allowing phrases to emerge from genuine caring rather than forcing them. He discusses how mettā practice develops both loving-kindness and samādhi (concentration), creating a unified mind that naturally suspends the hindrances. The talk explores different categories of recipients—benefactor, friend, neutral person, and difficult person—and how each reveals different aspects of mind and heart.

Drawing on stories from Thai teacher Ajahn Jomnian and encounters with the Dalai Lama, Armstrong illustrates the fruits of sustained mettā practice. He emphasizes that authentic practice must arise from genuine care for others' welfare rather than self-centered desires for pleasant states, quoting Śāntideva: 'Whatever joy there is in this world, all comes from wanting others to be happy.' The talk concludes with reflections on surrender and the paradox that by giving without expectation, the heart naturally opens to its inherent goodness and liberating qualities.

It's always interesting to come into the hall after being in here for sittings. You come in for a talk and it's like a bomb has dropped in the middle of the room or a big boulder, and everybody has splashed out to the sides. I hope it hasn't been too much of an explosion.

I wanted to talk tonight about right effort and the fruits of our practice of loving-kindness. I thought I'd take up a little bit where Sally left off last night in her talk on the hindrances, particularly in relation to the last hindrance of doubt.

What I've heard often over these days of interviews and the questions in the hall is that for people who have done even a lot of vipassana practice in the past—and maybe especially for people who have done a lot of vipassana practice—when you come into mettā practice, a lot of doubt tends to come up about what this practice is for and why we're doing it this way and why all this emphasis on the phrases. It sounds so busy and forceful.

It was actually just the same for me when I took up the mettā practice. I'd been doing vipassana practice for probably eighteen years. I did my first intensive mettā retreat and felt like a complete beginner. It reminded me of how I'd felt when I started vipassana. I came in not really knowing the techniques and practices. I didn't know where it would lead. I didn't know how to work with my wandering mind and the different hindrances that came up. I felt really adrift. It threw me back into beginner's mind in a way that really shook me up. It didn't feel comfortable at all. I didn't know what to do in my practice. I didn't know if it would work for me. That was my particular form of doubt—I didn't know if I could do it or if it would happen for me.

All these questions that come in the early days of a mettā retreat I can really relate to personally. This factor of doubt, as Sally said, is such an important one because if we stop there, it keeps us from making the effort that deepens our practice.

A couple of weeks ago, I was sitting a retreat in Santa Rosa with a young Tibetan Lama teacher who has been one of my primary teachers for the last seven years, a teacher named Sogyal Rinpoche. Some of you have met him. Toward the end of the retreat, we were having a discussion on doubt, this quality of the doubting mind, and one of the students told a story that I thought was quite revealing.

He said he was a high school math teacher offering a number of courses one semester. A student came up to him at the start of the semester and said, "Well, I'm thinking about signing up for your course on calculus, but I don't know if it will really help me. I don't know if it will do what I want it to do."

He got all enthused. Here's a bright young mind—I can turn her on to math! There aren't so many bright young minds into math these days, probably. So he gave her this glowing pitch. He said, "Look, I've got seven kinds of problems right here in my mind that calculus can solve that nothing else can. Let me tell you about one of them." He went into detail. "This is a really helpful problem for aerodynamic engineers and for people who are designing bridges. There's no way you can solve it except through calculus."

She said, "Well, that's very nice, but how can I know that if I take this course, I'll learn how to solve that problem?"

He was stumped. He'd never heard a question like that before. He said, "Well, you have to trust me."

She said, "But before I can take the course, I have to know that for myself. I can't just take your word for it."

They discussed back and forth a little bit, and she dropped the course. She couldn't be convinced. She couldn't get past that initial doubt to give it a try.

The Tibetan teacher's comment on this exchange was, "That's a good story, but it's a bad ending. It's kind of like a European movie." He's getting pretty tuned into Western culture, as you can tell. So hopefully in this movie, because it's in California, close enough to Hollywood, the ending is going to be different. We'll give it a try.

What I'd like to talk about tonight is how this practice works—something about the mechanics of the practice, what we're doing with all these phrases and all this activity and where it leads.

One way of talking about why we do this practice is to bring into our spiritual life what my Tibetan teacher and I would call the juice in our practice. There are all these wonderful, sweet, juicy qualities of the heart within us—qualities like love and compassion and devotion and warmth and dedication and sincerity and friendliness, humor and kindness. These qualities are latent within every one of us. They're all part of our human nature.

The question is: in our spiritual life, how do we activate them? How do we bring them so that they're a living force in our lives? Because if we don't, if we ignore that side of our being, the spiritual path can become quite dry.

quite arid, quite intellectually satisfying, but rather sterile and without that real heart quality of openness and connection, love.

So I would say that we do the metta practice because in our tradition, it's the way to the juice in our life. It's the way to juice up our spiritual practice. It is the avenue for all those sweet qualities, like devotion and compassion and love and warmth. This is the doorway in.

For some people, as I've observed, just doing the Vipassana practice can be enough. People who come from a very emotional temperament—maybe those who were in Italy in their last lifetime or Tibet—seem to open up in that way just through the Vipassana practice alone, and that sweetness and the juice start to come through.

But for myself, I came from a background where my major in college was physics and my minor was math, where my head had been trained much more thoroughly than my heart ever had. When I came into meditation practice, that emphasis or imbalance in me sort of continued. For me, the metta practice has been a really important part of my whole unfolding.

Just to authenticate this, several people who are teachers here have actually told me they think I've softened over the years since I've been doing metta practice. So I figure that's a pretty good sign, because I can be pretty feisty in meetings, and they've seen that.

In our tradition, the Theravada tradition, we talk about two kinds of practitioners of Vipassana. We talk about the wet and the dry practitioners. The dry practitioners are people who have completed their training in Vipassana without undertaking the concentration practices, of which metta, as you know, is one. The wets in this lingo are those who have done Vipassana in complement with a concentration practice, because traditionally the concentration practices have been the ones that have unlocked in the early deepening of concentration such qualities as happiness and rapture and bliss. So concentration has always been a path within our tradition for touching off some of those sweet qualities.

This Tibetan teacher, Sogyal Rinpoche, was giving us heart advice at the end—the advice that a teacher gives before they send you off in the world, knowing that they won't see you for another year or so. His parting words went something like this: He always tells us, "Please be normal. Don't let your meditation practice make you more strange, because then if you go out in the world and you're really strange and people ask you what you're involved with and you say Buddhist meditation, they're going to think, 'Oh, I'm going to stay away from that stuff.' So please be normal." His final words were: "Be a normal, wise, juicy person."

I think this is beautiful advice. I'm sort of working on it myself. The wisdom part you could say is our Vipassana practice—just seeing things as they are, seeing the impermanent, empty nature of things. The juicy part is our metta practice, that unfolding of the heart. The normality I think might be our psychological training.

There was a conference here about a month ago of the three main traditions of Buddhism in the West. The Theravada tradition, Zen, and Vajrayana was held in this room. There were 220 teachers here for about five days. I was really touched by many of the people in the conference—they were very strong, dedicated practitioners from all three traditions. But what I came to feel about the Vipassana group in general is that we have a beautiful normality. We're kind of very down-to-earth and practical, and I really appreciate that in our tradition. We're also not afraid of hard work.

If you really want to see the effect of this juiciness of heart, I'd encourage you to hang out with some people who've done it for a long time. Every May, this Thai teacher comes to Spirit Rock named Ajahn Jumnian. Ajahn Jumnian started doing the metta practice when he was quite young and became a master of it, teaching it all through his life. He's now in his mid-sixties, and he is one of the happiest people I have ever seen.

We bring him into the meditation hall, and whether there are ten people there or one hundred people there, he's just happy to talk Dharma all day long with whoever shows up. The only way we get him out of the hall is to serve him lunch, and then he goes in the meadow. He's got so much energy and so much joy. I've never seen anything like it.

We'll sometimes say, "Well, Ajahn Jumnian, would you like to go out today? Would you like to see the Golden Gate Bridge or the ocean or Point Reyes?" And he'll say, "Are there people who'd like to hear the Dharma?" His face kind of lights up. "Then I'll talk to them about the Dharma." He said, "If there's no one who wants to hear the Dharma, I'm happy to just sit there. But if you want to take me somewhere, that's okay too."

I'll be happy whatever you want me to do." And he really shows it. He just beams. He actually said that he hasn't had any anger in twenty-five years, and I tend to believe it. He has that kind of nature, that kind of vibe.

So the juice is what we're all aiming for in the long term, and probably why we were drawn to metta practice in the first place. But when we come to a retreat like this, that juice isn't so apparent upfront. It just seems like a lot of hard slogging, tough work—saying the phrases again and again, bringing up the benefactor, the friend, the neutral person.

It reminded me of when I was in Boy Scouts and had to earn a merit badge in camping and outdoor life. One of the requirements was to start a fire without matches. I thought, well, I know people used to be able to do that, but didn't that die off with the Native Americans? I didn't think European Americans knew how to do that anymore.

But I read the book and my father helped me. You take a dry piece of wood and make a little hole in it, just about the roundness of a finger. Then you take a slim stick—you can use a dry tree branch—and cut off all the knots. If you can, file it down at one end so the inner wood is exposed, underneath the bark. Then you cut some wood shavings and put them in that little round hole you've made in the dry wood. You set the stick into the wood shavings and twirl it back and forth quickly.

What happens is that the heat from the friction of the stick against those wood shavings eventually makes a little puff of smoke. Then you get really excited because you didn't think it was going to happen. Your hands were getting sore, you didn't think anything would happen. But you keep twirling faster and faster, and then you see a tiny flame pop up. A little faster, and the flame spreads around. When all the wood shavings are on fire, you can add more wood shavings or little twigs, then bigger twigs. And then you have a fire.

I was delighted to discover that this skill hadn't been lost from our civilization—it really restored my faith. But it took a while. While I was rubbing the stick, my hands were getting sore. I thought my hands were going to catch on fire before the wood did. My hands were sore, it wasn't feeling very good, it was a lot of work, and I wasn't sure anything would happen. But in time, that curl of smoke came up and the fire started.

This is very much like our metta practice. We just keep going and going and going. The phrases are like twirling the stick, and it doesn't seem like anything's happening. A few people have mentioned this in interviews—"I'm really diligent with the phrases, but nothing's happening." It may not seem like anything's happening for a while, but it took that early twirling to make enough heat for the fire to start. The same with our metta practice. Eventually that flame, that warmth starts, and then it can sustain itself. The practice generates its own momentum.

Although it's very hard in the beginning and starts with a lot of hard work, some people have said that the phrases actually seem to get in the way of the loving kindness. A number of people have come and said, "I can really call forth that feeling of metta, but when I put the phrases in, it seems to obstruct it. It gets too involved with thinking and I lose touch with the feeling."

So I want to talk about how to work with the phrases in a way that supports the feeling, so you don't feel like you're dampening that initial warmth.

One way is to get in touch with the silence before you say the phrase. Be aware that the phrase is coming out of a deep silence that holds your feeling of loving kindness. This silence is actually an aspect of emptiness—the emptiness at the ear door. If you're in touch with that emptiness, then the words are just a tiny drop of thinking in the vastness of that silence. They don't occupy the whole stage. This has been helpful for me.

There's another way I'd like to describe that I consider a really artful way to do the practice. I talked about this a little in the interview groups today.

I think it's a beautiful way to do the practice and it requires a certain steadiness of attention. So I'll just describe it and then you can see if it fits for you.

When I'm able to, what I will do at the start of a set of phrases is rest the attention in the center of my chest, in the heart center, and get in touch with that physical sensation. Then that will be the doorway where I'll feel any emotions like metta or anything else that comes through. I'll let myself feel them in the heart center. So that's the first focus.

Then I bring up an image of the subject—could be myself or another person—and I see that image as clearly as I can. If I can, I'll make it so it's like the person is in front of me. Now I didn't start off being able to visualize. I was weak in that field. So it took me a while. It was hard work to bring up these images. But I found when I could bring the image there, it really made the person much more alive for me. More alive than saying their name and far more alive than just saying the phrases without the image. So I would have an image of the person just in front of me.

And then this is kind of the key moment. I would let myself feel that I cared about them and that caring took some kind of intention—just as simple as "I hope you're happy. I hope you're well. I hope life is really going good for you." But it wasn't verbal. It was just a momentary feeling of caring about their welfare. Just a flicker of that intention. That little flicker where the mind is just leaning toward and interested in their wellbeing—that actually is metta.

It may not feel like very much. It can just start off as a little spark. It's kind of like that little curl of smoke from the wood shavings, but that actually is loving kindness. So if that flicker of caring is there, that's really what we're offering to the person in our metta practice. And that little flicker of caring is the germ or the seed that the whole practice then grows around. So you don't need to try to force anything more than that. You don't need to try and be deeply in love with them.

Actually, you don't even need to like the person. This came as a revelation to me when I was doing the difficult person one year. You don't actually even have to like the person. All you have to have is enough interest to care about their welfare. The whole practice will grow from that. Upandita Sayadaw used to say something like, "Just incline the mind to metta. Don't try to force anything. Just let the mind incline in that direction and that will be enough."

Then once you can touch just that little flicker, let the phrase carry the intention. So the phrase actually comes out of the intention of metta toward them. It comes out of your caring. So you're not trying to put the phrase on top of the metta, but you're letting the metta kind of give birth to the phrase. And then you offer the phrase to the other person like a gift. It's a real gift to care about somebody and to express it with those words. So with each phrase, you can feel that it's just riding on your intention so that the phrase and the metta feeling go together toward the person.

If you don't actually get in touch with that intention, that's okay too. Just let the phrase go and also you can trust that in time the phrases will evoke the feeling. These phrases have been tested for 2,500 years and they are really appropriate for this particular brahmavihara. As you'll see when we move to compassion and sympathetic joy and equanimity, the different phrases will evoke those feelings. These phrases evoke the metta feeling.

So it's almost like I'm just going to pretend. Even though I don't feel it exactly, I'll just pretend and I'll say the phrase. And this reminds me of an old saying from the Tibetans. The Kadampa masters, who were an ancient lineage in Tibet, had this saying that if you don't have teeth, just chew with your gums. I think about this often when I'm sort of fabricating the phrases and I can't marry them with the metta intention. I don't have teeth at that point, but I can still chew with my gums.

Then after you've offered this phrase as a gift to the other person, take a moment and let yourself feel its resonance. Again, if you rest your attention in the heart center, you can let the phrase reverberate for just a couple of seconds in your heart and feel how that feels—the safety, the happiness, the health, the ease of life. It feels good.

Let that bell ring for a moment.

If your mind is steady enough—if your attention is steady enough to try it this way—I'd encourage you to practice with this approach and see if it's supportive for you.

You'll notice there are actually four places your attention goes in this style of practice. The first is resting the attention in the heart center. The second is the image of the subject. The third is the metta intention or flavor. And the fourth is the phrase.

This is a lot of balls to keep in the air. If you're doing that, you're a juggler who's got four balls up at once. This takes considerable concentration, but because it's a stretch, it builds concentration. So the more of these elements you can actually include, the more it shows that you're developing concentration and strengthening that quality. It's like working out at the gym and upping the weight from ten pounds to twenty pounds on the pull-down machine. You'll build your concentration in that way.

But don't expect that you'll always be able to keep all four balls going. When you're first learning to juggle, two is a lot. If you can add a third, you're well along the way. And if you can do four, that's really excellent juggling.

The same applies here. If you just connect with one of those elements, that's great—you're into the practice. If you can do two or three or four, all the better. But realize that this condition of being able to keep all four balls connected is something like a peak experience in meditation. It won't always be there. So just let the concentration come and go. See where you are at any given time. Any combination is fine.

The first fruit of the practice is the feeling or deepening of loving-kindness, of metta. It develops in a gradual way. It's hard to see any shift over one or two or three days. Someone in a discussion group this morning shared that she'd done a month-long period of loving-kindness practice, and it had made a big and lasting shift in her life and her practice.

This is something that builds gradually, but you all know that's also how mindfulness develops in vipassana. The first few times you meditate, it doesn't feel like anything's happening. Remember that feeling? "Why should I be with the breath? Nothing's coming." But little by little, that builds.

As the Buddha said in the Dhammapada: "Don't disregard the accumulation of wholesomeness, saying this will come to nothing. By the gradual falling of raindrops, the jar is filled."

Just as mindfulness works in vipassana practice, metta works in this practice. It's a beautiful quality that develops little by little by little. Eventually we want to be able to access that feeling of metta wherever we are and whatever our experience is. Just as in mindfulness, we want to be able to be with whatever's happening for us.

Essentially we want to be able to find this heart of metta, of loving-kindness, independent of the circumstances of our life. This is a powerful quality if we can cultivate it. One of the things it suggests to me is that the Buddha encouraged us to rest our hearts in loving-kindness, regardless of the outside situation.

This means if somebody is being friendly to us, we can respond from loving-kindness. If somebody's being indifferent, we can respond from loving-kindness. If somebody's being aggressive, we can respond from loving-kindness. We're not just driven by the external situation, but we find an inner freedom and an inner friendliness that's independent of circumstances.

When we start our vipassana practice, we begin with the breath in our teaching tradition. We open to sounds and body and emotions and thoughts and all our experience—the vast spaciousness of consciousness. We develop the practice based on the subjects we find most useful. Most of us spend considerable time with breath and body and space.

At first we think these choices we're making are really important ones, that they're the key to the practice. When I was a beginner, I thought vipassana meditation was about being with the breath. I thought that defined it—that's what it was. It took me a while before I realized that the thing we're with isn't so important. What's important is the mindfulness.

And we just pick these different focuses as skillful means to develop the quality of mindfulness, because it's the mindfulness that frees us. It's mindfulness that liberates—not the breath, not sounds, not the body.

Similarly with our metta practice, we work with different individuals to generate the metta. In the beginning it seems like the people are really important, and they certainly have their own role to play. Each one brings a different flavor. But the key again is the quality of metta more than the specific individual.

What we're really looking to do is to stabilize our heart in the experience of loving kindness so that becomes the place we live from more and more of the time. As we do that, we find the heart becoming more responsive, more sensitive, more open, more juicy.

Then we can start to see where the tracks of vipassana and metta come together. They seem like different tracks right now. The practices are really different and sometimes appear to be going in dissimilar directions. But over time, we want to converge the two practices so that from vipassana, we bring this full presence in each moment that's in touch with our experience. From the metta side, we bring this openness of heart, this friendly relation to life.

You could say they come together in this quality of warm attention—a mindfulness that is colored or flavored with the quality of loving kindness or friendliness.

Different individuals do have distinct roles to play in the opening, and it's important to understand that too. For example, the relationship to the benefactor can be enormously inspiring. When I was doing my benefactor practice the first time I did metta practice, I stayed with the benefactor for three weeks. It became very powerful for me. I felt that I was doing a kind of—you ever watch Star Trek? Remember how Spock could do this Vulcan mind meld with people where he would just put his head next to theirs and their minds would mingle? I felt that was happening with my benefactor. As I carried the person in my heart over those three weeks, I really felt like all their good qualities were starting to come out of my heart. I felt like I had united with my benefactor in that relationship.

This seems a little alien to our tradition, but actually in the Pali texts, you can find talk of this kind of relationship. The Buddha himself said that those who have sufficient faith in and love for the Tathagata—which is another name for himself—are liberated by faith. Those who have sufficient faith in and love for the Tathagata are liberated by faith. So this devotional quality goes back a long way in our tradition.

My teacher, Sogyal Rinpoche, was a student of a real master of the Tibetan practices named Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche, who died just last summer. The last time my teacher was seeing Khenpo, the older teacher gave him some tender advice as he was leaving. It was very simple and very direct advice. He said to him, "Love me." Those were his parting words: "Love me."

That was a really beautiful statement to me of the kind of quality that can be there in the teacher-student relationship. Love me—not because he needed any kind of adulation, because he wasn't interested in that at all, but because it was a way for my teacher to continue opening his heart and developing the juice in his own practice.

There's this beautiful book I just read this past week called Sorrow Mountain, written by a Sangha member named Dede Donnelly, who lives in the East Bay. She met a Tibetan nun named Anipachen, who's now sixty-seven years old, living in Dharamsala. Anipachen grew up as the daughter of a warrior chieftain living in the rugged country of eastern Tibet, living out in Kham. Her father was a very fierce man and the chief of a large group, but also a devoted practitioner. So she grew up with great devotion to the Buddha Dharma.

When the Chinese invaded Tibet in 1949, after a few years they came and took over her region of the country. She and a few other people escaped to the hills and undertook guerrilla warfare against the Chinese for a number of years. They were actually aided by the CIA. They were getting food drops and drops of guns and ammunition for some time. But eventually the Chinese covered the whole territory, even those remote wilds, and she was captured. Because she was known to have been the daughter of a chieftain and to be leading the forces, she was imprisoned and tortured quite routinely on the pretext of trying to get information about the guerrilla war. She spent years in prison undergoing steady beatings and torture.

For one nine-month period, because she had been flippant in her response to a guard, she was thrown into solitary confinement in a room that no light entered. For nine months, she was in this completely dark enclosure. She did not see another person except the guard's hand slipping watery gruel to her a couple of times a day, and didn't see any light for nine months.

Her devotion to the Dharma was unwavering through that time. While she was in her cell for nine months, she decided she would take that time to undertake her hundred thousand prostrations, which is one of the preliminary practices in Tibetan Buddhism. She actually, at the end, started to pray that she wouldn't be released from that confinement until she completed her prostrations.

After twenty-one years in prison, she was released and started to demonstrate against the Chinese authorities in Lhasa. But as you may recall, in the late eighties, there was quite a crackdown on the demonstrators. Monks were killed and beaten. As one of the leaders, she was being pursued by the authorities, so she escaped to India.

When she finally arrived in India, she got to meet His Holiness the Dalai Lama. In their meeting, she shared her entire story with him—the flight from her village, the guerrilla war, her capture, the beatings and torture, and her years in prison. She said that as she recounted these experiences, both she and the Dalai Lama would often break down in tears. Yet all her trials had only seemed to strengthen her devotion and commitment to the Dharma.

Years later, someone asked her what had kept her alive, what had sustained her through all those difficult years. She replied, "I wanted to live to be able to see His Holiness in person." The figure of the Dalai Lama had been that meaningful for her. And she finally did.

Let me share another story from this Teacher's Conference. As many of you know, the Dalai Lama was here about a month ago, sitting in this very room speaking to the Teacher's Conference. He was seated right up there in the center. For me, it was truly the high point of our time together—such a privilege to be able to spend time with him and simply experience his being.

I want to relate one conversation that emerged, just to give you a flavor of his character. The conference was organized around different topics, with various teachers presenting their perspective from a Western viewpoint, after which the Dalai Lama would sometimes respond—or if he had nothing to add, he would remain silent.

Lama Surya Das, a Westerner teaching in the Tibetan lineage, was speaking to the group and to His Holiness about how Buddhism is entering the mainstream in the West. He discussed how it's becoming widespread enough that it's even getting somewhat fashionable—Hollywood is starting to embrace Buddhism, and when that happens, we should all take notice.

Surya Das explained that there are dangers in becoming too popular, as the teachings might get misrepresented or lose their depth. He then turned to the Dalai Lama and said, "Your Holiness, you're the biggest popularizer of them all. What advice do you have for us in the West?"

The Dalai Lama thought for a moment and replied, "People call me many different things. Some people say I'm a living Buddha." He laughed gently. "No, I'm not. I'm not. Some people call me God King. No, I'm not that either. I'm just a simple Buddhist monk—a simple Buddhist monk."

He continued, "Other people see me very differently. They call me a counter-revolutionary. They call me a wolf in monk's clothing. So you see, I have to check back to my own intention. What is my own intention? If my intention is to help beings come out of suffering, then that's what is important to me. How others see me is up to them, and I don't care. I don't care." He said this very strongly. "I just don't care."

For me, this was a profoundly powerful moment. I could feel both sides of his experience—being called a living Buddha or being labeled a counter-revolutionary. I sensed the enormous responsibility he carries as ambassador for the Tibetan people, as perhaps the only person who can make a long-term difference in their situation. I felt the burden of that responsibility on his shoulders and the maturing effect it has had on him. And then, to be able to emerge from all that weight of responsibility and say, "But inwardly, I don't care. I'm free." I experienced both simultaneously—the tremendous burden he bears and the vast inner freedom from which he operates. It was a very moving moment.

One of the most perceptive comments about him came from Caroline Kornfield, Jack's daughter. She was in the room helping to video the conference as an assistant. At fifteen years old, she has grown up around the Dharma—practically nurtured on Yucca Valley retreats. About the Dalai Lama, she observed, "He's born anew in every moment." I found this to be a remarkably insightful and beautiful comment.

The benefactor can reveal much to us about our own depth, because all the qualities present in the Dalai Lama, all the qualities in your teachers and our teachers, exist within each one of us as well. It's simply a matter of bringing them forth, allowing them to manifest.

And then also with the other individuals, we learn about different aspects of our mind. From our friends, we might learn about the inclination to hold on, to grasp or to attach—the near enemy of loving kindness. This is really a pointer to the force in our minds of grasping or greed, of clinging. From the neutral person, which we practiced with today, we might learn about the force of ignorance. Because mostly what we do in our life, if somebody doesn't hold a charge for us one way or another, we don't take them very seriously. We don't think they're important. "Oh, that's somebody I don't have to bother with. I can ignore them." When we meditate on the neutral person, we can find that those people actually are full human beings in their own right. Every being is full in his or her own right and they're worthy of our attention too. So it cuts through the tendency to ignorance in us.

And the difficult person who we'll begin to work with tomorrow can help us to find a caring even in the midst of aversion. Even if we don't particularly like someone, we find that we can get in touch with that metta anyway. So all these qualities—the desire, the ignorance, and the aversion—these are the three root kilesas, what the Buddha called defilements or distortions in our mind. And the loving kindness practice helps us to purify all three of them through these different individuals.

The other key fruit of the practice is the quality of concentration, which is the translation of the Pali word samadhi. Samadhi refers to a state of mind that has become whole, that has become unified or collected, that's been gathered together. A state of mind like that becomes strong, becomes firm, becomes less wavery, more unshakable. And we develop it by bringing our whole attention to whatever we do. This sense, as well as metta, bring with them a great sense of well-being and contentment. With the feeling of metta, there's a richness, there's a sweetness, and with the quality of samadhi, there's a steadiness, an unshakability.

And with these two together, there's a sense of really it being enough. There's a sense of deep satisfaction. My Tibetan teacher happens to be Sogyal Rinpoche III, which meant that he had two previous incarnations. The first incarnation, who is known for his great effort, had a poem that had a line I particularly liked. It said, "There is nothing else to search for, rest in your natural face." This is somewhat the flavor when the loving kindness and the samadhi come together. There's a feeling that we're just held by that combination, that that is enough.

When both of those factors are strong, the hindrances that Sally talked about last night get suspended. They can't arise in a mind that is held in that container of sufficient samadhi, especially with the metta. And then when the hindrances aren't disturbing our minds, we can see things more clearly. We can see the vastness of the love. These are really special moments in the practice when it comes together in this way, when you can connect with a few of these qualities at the same time and the mind isn't so disturbed.

It's rare. And sometimes we think, "Oh, this isn't that important because it's just a passing meditation state." But actually what these moments are revealing to us are the depth of our true nature. This is the feeling, it's kind of a preview of the deepening of our spiritual life. These kinds of feelings, these experiences come more and more. They become more our resting place, more our home in practice. So not to take them lightly. They may be rare. They are usually rare in retreat, but they're very important. They're real pointers on the path.

Metta and samadhi support one another. Metta through the force of love tends to bring the mind together. Love brings about a union. The samadhi brings about a steadiness. So the metta encourages the samadhi and the samadhi intensifies the metta. When the mind becomes concentrated, the feelings go deeper. The experiences are more deeply felt. So these two really help each other. And that's why this practice is such a potent way to develop a practice of samatha, of tranquility.

So the metta practice can bring us these beautiful fruits of both loving kindness and concentration, but one key is our motivation, what the spirit is that we approach the practice with. I was practicing at IMS in my first extended period of loving kindness, and in the first ten days of the retreat, the practice was going fairly well, and I thought, "Wow, this is just gonna keep getting better and better. I'm glad I signed up for this because all my friends had told me about, you know, it's really different from vipassana practice. It can get really sweet."

When I approached my teacher Joseph Goldstein with my frustration, I explained how well the practice had been going just days before and how desperately I wanted to reclaim that state. Joseph, having undoubtedly navigated similar waters in his own metta practice, cut straight to the heart of the matter with profound simplicity. "Guy," he said, "we don't do this practice for ourselves—it's for the other." That single insight unlocked my mind.

I suddenly saw with stark clarity that I had been doing loving kindness practice essentially to make myself feel good inside. In this self-centered approach, I had completely lost touch with the other person. I had stopped caring about what was happening for them because what truly mattered to me was what was occurring within my own mind and body. I had lost the entire spirit of what the practice is about.

This awakening transformed everything. I returned to my cushion, loosened my grip, and began thinking about the other person for a change instead of focusing solely on myself. Within half a day, the practice began to settle back down. This became a powerful teaching for me about the quality of right effort.

This experience brought me deeply into connection with a stanza I cherish from Shantideva, a Buddhist practitioner in ninth-century India who wrote The Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life:

"Whatever joy there is in this world, all comes from wanting others to be happy. And whatever sorrow there is in this world, all comes from wanting only myself to be happy."

This verse pointed directly to a profound truth—the same truth embedded in the teachings on generosity and sila. When we open and genuinely care about another, beautiful things arise within our own hearts and minds. But if we give only to receive that blessing, it doesn't work. If we practice metta for another only to achieve calm, it doesn't unfold that way. We must sincerely want to give to the other. We must sincerely want the other to be happy.

The practice truly requires this approach of non-clinging. This is partly why teachers emphasize that metta is not merely a samatha practice—profound wisdom emerges through it as well. Deep understanding flows through this practice: understanding about the nature of the open heart, about what creates harmony between beings, about the profound level on which we are connected, and about the fundamental level on which we are essentially the same being.

Whatever our outward appearance—our gender, race, color, social class, age, background, or education—underneath all these surface differences, these qualities of heart and mind are identical in all of us. Our bodies are simply minor variations on the same theme. Fundamentally, we are the same organism. The metta practice provides a direct path to perceive this unity.

As we offer the phrases "May you be happy, may you be safe, may you be healthy," we must extend them to the person without grasping or control.

In a way we offer it and then we surrender because it's out of our hands. It's like making a gift. We make the gift and then we don't know how it will be received. We don't know how the other person will take it. When we say the phrases, we don't know if the other person will be affected or not. We don't know if it will bring health or happiness or safety, but what we do know is that if our wish is sincere, if our intention is sincere, and if it is rooted in that caring for the other, then the practice will truly unfold in us.

This is what I love—it's the paradox of spiritual life, whether in vipassana or metta: we have to make this very full effort, give it everything we've got, put all our heart and soul and mind and body into it, and we don't know that we're going to get anything back. And in metta it goes one step further. We put everything into it and then we give a little more away without expecting anything back.

But that is exactly the place from which all the beautiful qualities, all the juicy qualities start to come through our hearts. It's in that total giving and the total surrender that the heart can really start to open because it's no longer under pressure. It's no longer being squeezed by the force of grasping and self-interest.

This is from Rumi: "The way of love is not a subtle argument. The door there is devastation. Birds make great sky circles of their freedom. How do they learn it? They fall. And falling, they're given great wings."

This is like our vipassana practice and our metta practice both. We have to open in that very surrendering kind of way. Open ourselves to the fall and then see what comes. And the beauty of our innate nature, our basic goodness, is that those are the conditions for it to flower and to manifest—to respond with these beautiful qualities of loving-kindness, of compassion, of devotion, of faith and friendliness and humor.

This is from Rilke, Rainer Maria Rilke: "I believe in all that has never yet been spoken. I want to free what waits within me so that what no one has dared to wish for may for once spring clear without my contriving. If this is arrogant, God, forgive me, but this is what I need to say. May what I do flow from me like a river. No forcing and no holding back the way it is with children."

This is the flavor of surrender in our metta practice. It's an active practice, but there's also a very receptive side to it where we just open ourselves and wait to see what comes. That openness is really, really important.

At the same time, the active side of it is doing something very powerful. I don't know if you've reflected on this yet, but when you do the loving-kindness practice with the image, as I described earlier, you're creating an image in the mind. You're bringing forth the flavor of the emotion of metta. And the thoughts in your mind are wholesome phrases: may you be safe, may you be happy, may you be healthy, may you live with ease.

So at the time when the metta practice has come together in that way, you have planted in the mind the image, the metta quality, and the thought phrase. I don't know if it's struck you what an incredible accomplishment that is, but basically at that time you have shaped the mind stream. Our mind stream is made up of images, thoughts, and emotions. And when the practice is flowing, you have filled all three of those areas with the wholesome qualities of loving-kindness.

That kind of mind is removed from suffering. It's removed from disturbance. It's removed from wavering. That kind of mind is very beautifully protected and secluded.

So this is a big deal. Don't be disappointed if it takes a while for all these pieces to come into place, because it's actually a really audacious thing that we're doing. Who would have thought that we could find a way to fashion our whole mind stream toward a wholesome end? This is a very big deal. So be patient with yourself if it doesn't all come together at once. It can take a while.

This is very empowering and it gives a real sense of freedom when you start to tune into this quality of heart and mind. And this is why the Buddha called loving-kindness an immeasurable deliverance of mind, an immeasurable deliverance of heart. And he said of it that this deliverance of heart is more than sixteen times greater than any worldly blessings—blessings related to worldly activities such as generosity.

The heart's deliverance of loving kindness is more than sixteen times greater than these worldly activities. As these beautiful, juicy qualities of the heart unfold, they actually can become a path of their own.

And the Buddha pointed to this also, faith being a primary one among them—faith being this willingness to surrender and to open through that trust in our basic goodness, in the beautiful qualities of our true nature.

The Buddha spoke to a monk named Pingya. "Pingya," he said, "other people have freed themselves by the power of faith. Vakali, Bhadravuda, and Alavi have all done this. You too should let that strength release you. You too will go to the further shore beyond the draw of death."

And this is just one of the promises that's opened by the development of the heart through our metta practice. This is a channel that opens to touch our basic goodness and release these liberating qualities that are there within us.

So let's just sit for a minute, please.

Other people have freed themselves by the power of faith. You too should let that strength release you. You too will go to the furthest shore beyond the draw of death.

So we have about thirty minutes now for walking meditation. Then we'll have the last sitting of the day with the chanting.

CHAPTER 223

Paṭiccasamuppāda: Dependent Origination

Guy Armstrong · 1h02

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines paṭiccasamuppāda (dependent origination), which the Buddha considered his most profound insight. Drawing from the Paṭiccasamuppāda Vibhaṅga Sutta from the Saṃyutta Nikāya, Armstrong guides listeners through the twelve links that explain both the cycle of saṃsāra and the path to liberation. He uses the traditional Tibetan Wheel of Life (Bhava Chakra) to illustrate how beings cycle through different realms of existence based on the three root poisons of greed, hatred, and delusion. The teaching traces the sequence from avijjā (ignorance) through saṅkhāra (formations), viññāṇa (consciousness), nāmarūpa (name-and-form), and the six sense bases, leading to contact, vedanā (feeling), taṇhā (craving), upādāna (clinging), bhava (becoming), jāti (birth), and jarāmaraṇa (aging and death). Armstrong emphasizes that freedom comes through breaking the chain between feeling and craving - learning to rest in awareness without reactive formations of greed or aversion. This is where mindfulness practice becomes transformative, allowing practitioners to see clearly and act with wisdom rather than from ignorance. The talk demonstrates how dependent origination encompasses both cosmic and psychological dimensions, showing how we create and recreate the sense of self moment by moment, and how wisdom can interrupt this cycle to reveal our inherent freedom.

The subject of this evening's talk is dependent origination. This is a technical topic in the Buddhist teachings, and I hope it won't be too technical for this group. If it is, I encourage you to remember the advice that Ajahn Chah gave Jack Kornfield when he came to meditate there. Ajahn Chah told him, "I hope you're not afraid to suffer, because there are two kinds of suffering: one that leads to more suffering and one that leads to the end of suffering." Even just listening to this topic leads to the end of suffering, so you'll be okay.

Before the Buddha was awakened, he started to reflect on where this human problem of suffering came from. He asked, "Why do we have this condition of illness, aging, and death?" He said, "Well, it's here because we got born." Then he asked, "Where did we get born from? Why did that happen?" He traced this sequence back through twelve different links that established the whole foundation of our vulnerability to suffering. He traced it all the way back as far as it could be traced, to the factor of ignorance or avijjā, a quality in the mind of not understanding.

After his awakening, he taught this sequence of links again and again to many groups at many times to show where suffering comes from. It also shows the way out of suffering. You could say that what dependent origination is really about is taking the second and third Noble Truths—the cause of suffering and the end of suffering—and explaining them in incredibly minute detail to show us clearly the way out. It not only shows where we're caught, it also shows the way to freedom.

In Pali, this sequence is called Paṭiccasamuppāda. The sutta I'm going to base this talk on is from the Saṃyutta Nikāya, the Connected Discourses, and it's called the Paṭiccasamuppāda-vibhaṅga Sutta—the Analysis of Dependent Origination. I chose this sutta because it's quite a straightforward reading of the links with the explanation of the factors together.

The Buddha actually regarded this as his most profound insight, and he said that one who sees dependent origination sees the Dharma, and one who sees the Dharma sees dependent origination—that these are more or less identical. His good friend and attendant for many years, Ānanda, once came up to the Buddha and in his light-hearted and friendly way said, "Oh, Venerable Sir, this teaching on dependent origination is so wonderful. It is profound, but it seems just as clear as clear can be to me. It seems easy and clear." And the Buddha said, "Say not so, Ānanda, because this teaching appears profound and it is profound." He's always just slightly adjusting Ānanda's understanding.

For me, this teaching is awesome. It's my favorite teaching of the Buddha's. It encompasses a range from the vastness of cosmology and a whole view of how we came to be born—a very global, high-level perspective of why there's birth and why we find ourselves in this situation. But at the same time, it also provides a very minute and detailed look, moment by moment in our meditation practice, of how we get caught and how we get free. It really spans the whole range of our experience from the lofty philosophy down to the very pragmatic principles of Dharma practice.

It takes in the law of karma leading to our birth. It takes in the second and third Noble Truths. It takes in this mysterious union of mind and body through the activity of our consciousness and how they come together. And how from a completely unobstructed and primordially open space of awareness, we construct the limitation of this fiction of a separate self. All of this is within the twelve links of dependent arising.

One of my early introductions to this teaching was at Wat Suan Mok. I was a monk and I'd been involved in Dharma practice for a few years and had studied this and practiced it a little bit. But Wat Suan Mok is a very special place. It was the monastery created by Ajahn Buddhadāsa in Thailand. Ajahn Buddhadāsa was an iconoclast who read well outside the Theravāda tradition. He read in the Mahāyāna tradition, the Zen tradition, the Tibetan tradition, and had a very original view of Dharma.

He has a building in the monastery called the Spiritual Theater where he has reproductions of famous spiritual works of art. On the wall of this building is a very large painting of a beautiful Chinese Zen work of art depicting a Zen master sitting by the side of a stream enjoying the freedom of his awakening. He has several Theravāda works and a wall-high painting of a Tibetan image known as the Wheel of Life. In Sanskrit, it's called the Bhavacakra—Wheel of Existence, Wheel of Becoming, or the Wheel of Life. It's a very striking image.

When Sally and I heard some teachings from the Dalai Lama in England in the 1980s, he gave us a reproduction of this maṇḍala. After the talk, I'll put it up on the board so that you can take a look at it. In color and the height of a wall, it's a little more impressive. But I want to use this picture tonight to explain what dependent arising is all about.

I'll describe it a little bit as I speak, and then you can take a closer look later.

You may be able to see that the center of it is a circle—this is the wheel of life. This circle is held by a rather fearsome monster who has fangs instead of teeth, claws for hands that grasp this wheel, and a quite ferocious appearance. As decoration through his hair, he wears a band of human skulls. The wheel of life takes place within his grasp.

In the very inner circle of this wheel—it's several concentric circles—in the very innermost circle is a picture of three animals: a pig, a snake, and a rooster. These symbolize the forces in our mind of greed, hatred, and delusion. The pig represents greed—he'll eat anything, spending all day eating. The snake represents hatred because of its attacking quality. And the rooster represents delusion or stupidity. If you've ever owned chickens, you'll know exactly what this means. They're absolutely untrainable creatures.

In the next circle, there's the evolution of the human being from a rather contorted and twisted lower form through many births to the evolution as an enlightened being, an awakened one or a Buddha.

The next outermost circle shows the realms of existence that beings are born into. Traditionally in Buddhist cosmology, in the Theravadan tradition, there are thirty-three different realms that beings are born into. The human realm is the fifth from the bottom, so we can't be totally conceited about our position in the scheme of things, but we do have the advantage—as Sylvia was talking about yesterday—that we have the capacity to understand and become free. In this image they've been simplified from thirty-three down to six.

The highest realm is considered the realm of the devas and brahmas, the realm of the gods. It's a life where everything is easy and pleasant. It's said that one spontaneously appears in those worlds with no going through a birth canal. One dwells as a being of light and everything is provided. One doesn't have to work hard to maintain oneself. The only suffering in that life is said to be that when a deva or a Brahma dies, the others don't really want to hear about it because it's kind of the only stain in this beautiful existence. So the deva has to go off to a corner and pass away in solitude. That's the only suffering.

Coming down a level from the Devas are called the Asuras, often translated as the jealous gods or the angry gods. These are people who have a lot of power, but maybe not so much wisdom. I usually think of them as like the Titans of industry—if you put Bill Gates and Larry Ellison in the same room, this is kind of the clash you'd get from the jealous gods, these great competitors in the software world.

Then is our human realm. The characteristic of our human realm is that we're able to experience the mind states, the kind of life of all the other realms, from the highest to the lowest. The human realm is uniquely positioned sort of in the middle of the happy realms and the unhappy realms, and we're open to all of the universal experience.

A step below the human realm in the traditional cosmology is the realm of the animals. Because we share the planet with these creatures, we know firsthand that there is at least one other type of being that is similar to human beings but not exactly the same. Sylvia also drew on in her talk yesterday that creatures don't really have the ability to develop their hearts and minds and to come to awakening the way that humans do. As much as we love our cats and dogs, we can't really train them in mindfulness. Of course, they may be pretty well developed in loving kindness, but mindfulness doesn't seem to be up their street exactly.

One down from the animal realm is the realm of hungry ghosts. These are pictured in this chart and in the mythology as beings who have very, very big bellies and very narrow necks. The idea is that as much as they try to eat, they can never fill their enormous belly because their neck is too narrow. Where the animal realm is characterized by delusion and inability to understand deeply, the hungry ghost realm is characterized by desire, the force of desire and never being able to get enough.

The very bottom realm is said to be the hell realm. It's a realm characterized by very intense kinds of suffering—both hot realms, cold realms, realms of being stabbed and pricked, realms from which there is really no release at any point in one's existence in that terrain.

Now whether you choose to view this circle as actual beings existing in actual different places or not is not so important. The key about this teaching is that we all visit these places in our life and in our practice. I hope you can relate to this.

This came home to me when Sally and I were traveling to the retreat in Italy this summer. We'd flown on this overnight flight from San Francisco to Milan. To get up to near where the retreat was, we had to go through Milan Central train station. It was a rainy day, totally gray, cold for Italy in the summer, and quite dreary. We pull up to this train station and walk up these huge stairs to this cavernous open space that has rain falling outside. Quite grimy, actually.

It's an old station and not particularly clean, filled with smoke—because as you may know, in Europe there are still quite a few more people smoking than in the States. We'd been traveling all night, so we were tired. Our mind state was not the greatest. The food all looked like train station food, kind of greasy and unappetizing. There were no benches or chairs to sit down on, so it seemed like everybody was wandering around, toting these huge suitcases, trying to find someplace to rest.

We finally did find a bench by a public toilet, of which the aroma was quite strong. Our train wasn't due to leave for about two hours. After hanging out in this space for a while, I realized where I was: I was in the place of the hungry ghosts. Everybody was walking around with this kind of restless wanting energy—When's my train going to go? When can I get something good to eat? Where am I going to find a place to sit down?—all in the middle of this gray and quite gloomy setting. So we can tune in to the energetic quality.

The heaven realm is when our practice is really going smoothly. We have this sitting and a walking and another sitting that's just effortless. It's peaceful, we're present, and we're connected. We think this is the way it should always be. We don't realize we've temporarily been born in a heaven realm. But after being born in a heaven realm, we die from that realm and are reborn somewhere else.

Sometimes it's the hell realms—the state where the body is on fire, where the mind can't settle, where we're tormented by suffering mental states of fear or anger or restlessness. We know we're just in a place of great suffering, and struggle as we might, we can't find our way out. That's the feeling of being in the hell realm. But if we just persist, we also die out of that realm and take birth in one of the other realms.

So our practice—and in fact our human life—is a cycling through these different ways of being, through these different states of mind and body.

Then the outermost circle is the subject of the main part of our talk this evening: the twelve links of dependent origination, each one expressed as a particular image. When you look at this outside, you'll see twelve little images around the outside going from one o'clock up to twelve o'clock. Those are the links in order from one to twelve. So that's what I'd really like to talk about tonight—those twelve links and how they describe our situation.

The first link is ignorance. In Pali it's avijja, and it means not seeing things the way they really are. In the artwork, the image for avijja, for ignorance, is a blind person walking forward leaning on a cane—the state of not seeing.

When the Buddha was asked to be more detailed, in the suttas he describes what we are not seeing. He said we're ignorant of the noble truth of suffering, the noble truth of the origin of suffering, of the cessation of suffering, and the way leading to the cessation of suffering. So fundamentally, you could say ignorance is of the Four Noble Truths—not seeing clearly how we get caught and how we get free.

That sometimes seems a little abstract, so you can also think of it in another way. Another way it's sometimes explained is we don't see the three characteristics of impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and not-self. We tend to see permanence in things that will fade away. We tend to see lasting happiness where we're subject to suffering. And we tend to see a self, an I, where in fact there is not a separate self or I.

A fundamental way you can always remember this quality of ignorance is a belief in a self—believing that there really is an I within this set of mind-body circumstances that we're in. And the Buddha said this is as fundamental a source for suffering as can be found. There is no possibility of tracing things any further back than ignorance.

When we think about the fall from grace as represented by Adam and Eve in Christian or Judaic terms, the Buddha said you can't trace a beginning point that was initially pure. Rather, ignorance is as far back as you can go. He said, "No beginning can be found for ignorance, such as before this point there was no ignorance, but then it arose." So I take that to mean that as long as there have been beings, we have been clouded by ignorance.

The second link is called formations, and the Pali word is sankharas. What this really means in this sense is volitional formations—when we urge ourselves to do something out of a motive. Volitional formations happen through thoughts, through speech, and through body. Actions through body have stronger consequences than those of speech.

Actions of speech are considered stronger than those of thought. But this entire realm represents karma. Karma means action with intention or volition, so we could equally call these things karmic formations.

The image in the traditional art depicts a potter making clay pots, sitting with the wheel and throwing vessels. The pots represent the formations—creations from our own mind that we act out. When we act from motive, from volition or intention, we're usually expressing some will connected to self-centeredness. So we often act from some kind of desire or aversion. Or we can act in wholesome ways, from motives of generosity or kindness.

The basic teaching is that our action is wholesome if the intention is wholesome. The karma or action is unwholesome if the intention is unwholesome—such as greed or aversion. When we act wholesomely, it brings consequences that create happy results in our life. When we act unwholesomely, it brings consequences that return suffering to our life. This is the fundamental teaching.

The Buddha connects these first two links by saying that ignorance conditions volitional formations. In Pali, these all have a beautiful ring: pachaya is the word for conditions. Avijja pachaya sankhara—ignorance conditions formations. This is such a profound concept.

Ajahn Sumedho says he likes to translate it as "ignorance complicates everything." When we don't see clearly what's happening, we don't act very skillfully. When we're burdened by fear, we often act in ways that manifest that uncertainty, that hesitation, that unclarity. When we're motivated by greed, we often act in ways offensive to other people. And delusion is an accompanying factor where we don't see the greed that's present. We don't see the aversion that's present. If we did, we wouldn't act from them. So delusion accompanies these unskillful actions.

Basically, when we're burdened with the sense of self, we act in the world unskillfully. We try to protect and defend our territory. We try to garner more things for this self, whether emotional things like love and praise, or material things like wealth, house, car, and so forth. This involves us in a lifelong struggle.

I thought this "ignorance complicates things" was really highlighted by the story of a bank robber who went into a bank and handed the teller a stick-up note saying he had a gun, demanding all the cash, and instructing them not to tell anybody. The tellers are trained to follow such instructions, so the teller complied and handed over the cash. The robber got it and left the bank, immediately going home. When he arrived, he found police waiting for him. He was arrested with all the cash from the bank.

He asked, "How did you track me down?" The police replied, "You wrote your stick-up note on the back of your deposit slip. We just read your name and address and came to your house." So ignorance certainly complicated his life.

When we're not aware of what's moving us, we act unskillfully. Sylvia Boorstein has a line I appreciate: "When we see clearly, we act impeccably." When we see clearly and ignorance is not at work, then we act impeccably with wholesome karma.

The third link in the chain is called consciousness. The Pali is vijnana. This is the knowing faculty, the faculty in our mind that receives all our experience. It receives our sense impressions, mental events, our own bodily events, external events. It's the receptive faculty of mind that knows the world.

The image in the art is of a monkey swinging from branch to branch. It illustrates how our consciousness lights first on a physical experience, next on a sound, next on a thought, then on an emotion, then on another sight, always leaping from one thing to another. This doesn't necessarily mean we have restless or unmindful attention. This is simply what consciousness does—it's always flitting from sense door to sense door like a monkey.

When we say that formations condition consciousness, the classical interpretation—and I think this is what the Buddha meant—is that as long as karma is being generated from a sense of self, we end up being reborn. So the consciousness being discussed here, according to the suttas, is called rebirth consciousness. It explains why each of us finds ourselves in this particular form, in this particular life.

According to the teachings, you don't have to believe it. As my teacher Munindra used to say, "You don't have to believe in rebirth. It's true." You don't have to believe it.

At the end of the prior life, if there is still some form of individual will, some form of a belief in a self, there will continue to be urges in the psyche, latent in the psyche. And those latent urges at the moment of death will continue in the form of a consciousness that passes from one life and then becomes the seed of the next birth. The Buddha actually says that this consciousness comes into the mother's womb at the time of conception. And if there is no consciousness there, there cannot be a being even from the union of a man and a woman. So this is the way that rebirth is described in the suttas.

The Buddha said, "If consciousness were not to come into the mother's womb, the new mind and body could not develop there." But when consciousness meets with the union of the father and mother and the egg and the sperm, then this combination of mind and body come together and this is the next link in the chain.

In Pali it's called namarupa. Literally it means name and form, the form being the body, name being a word that's given to the cognitive part of the mind. Technically, it includes factors like feeling, perception, volition, contact, and attention. But you can just think of it as the cognitive part of our own individual mind.

When these two come together, a new being is formed in the mother's womb. The image in the art is of two people in a rowboat or a canoe rowing across a lake. This refers to the union of mind and body that is what we are as beings. We have these two aspects to our nature, the physical aspect and the mental aspect. It begins at the moment of conception and it grows up through childhood, adulthood, and then to death, the ending of that particular form.

Because we are a mind that is embodied, because we are this union of mind and body, the body provides what are called the six sense bases. That is, the organs through which we connect with the world, through which we have contact. Because we have a body, we see sights, we hear sounds, we taste tastes, we smell odors, we touch things, and we have mental events like thoughts, images, and emotions. So these are called the six sense bases that are connected with our taking birth into a body. And what they do for us is they give us the ability to access the world.

I remember being on my first three-month retreat when another yogi came up to Joseph Goldstein. There'd been some teachings on dependent origination, and this yogi said to Joseph, "Joseph, why am I here?" And Joseph said, "Do you mean at this retreat?" And she said, "No, no, no. I mean, why am I here as a human being? Why am I alive?" And he said, "It's because you wanted to see and hear and smell and taste and touch and think." And in a word, that's why we take birth—so we can have more contact, so that we can experience more.

From the six sense bases, then, we get this contact with the world. And this is the next link. In Pali, it's called phassa. The image in the art is of a house with six windows, the six windows representing the six sense doors. The house basically represents the body. Sometimes in that image, in some versions of this wheel, you'll see the monkey inside, which is consciousness peering out through the six windows, experiencing the world.

From the six sense bases, we experience contact of the six types: sights, sounds, smells, tastes, touch, and mind events. In the art, the image for contact is a man and a woman lying down in an embrace. What this symbolizes is our embrace with the world. We actually live in this intimate relationship with the world of form. We are experiencing it as our reality moment after moment after moment.

Sometimes—I don't know if you've felt this—in the quiet places in meditation, there can be an intense yearning to shut off this stream of experiencing because it comes to be felt as too much, too restless. But it's not possible to shut it off by willing it or wishing it. Because we're alive, we're in this intimate contact with everything else that's created in our realm.

Because of contact, we have feeling. Feeling—as Sylvia mentioned this morning in the instructions—the Pali term vedana, means that every kind of contact we have can be either pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. Through all these six sense doors, there are pleasant sights and unpleasant sights and neutral ones. There are pleasant thoughts, unpleasant thoughts, and neutral ones. So in all our contacts, we're constantly subject to this feeling tone, this quality of vedana. It can be pleasant, it can be neutral, but it can also be unpleasant, which means that having taken birth, we are subject to unpleasant experiences as well as pleasant experiences. That's our fate.

That's our ticket for this trip. Even the Buddha was not immune from that. He had back pains. He ate poisoned food that caused him to die and experience suffering, physical pain on his way to his dying. This is part of the package.

So the last few links that we've been looking at—the links of consciousness, of name and form, mind-body, of the six sense bases, of contact and feeling—are not things we have any choice about. Once we get propelled into a new birth, these things happen as karmic results. We are just in line for some package of these things due to having taken birth.

Now the plot shifts. The plot thickens a little bit.

Oh, the image for contact, by the way, is of a person with an arrow in his eye. It's a little bit gruesome. It kind of gives you shivers even to think about. But that's the image for contact, and it points basically to our vulnerability. Because of contact, we're subject to things like the pain of illness, the pain of injury, the pain of accident, and so forth.

Now, in relation to feeling, we can respond. We usually do respond to the pleasant things in our life and the unpleasant things in our life. The next link in the chain is craving. This is our old friend from the Second Noble Truth—tanha. And it makes us relate to the pleasant with the force of greed, to the unpleasant with the force of aversion or pushing away, and to the neutral with the force of blindness or not really seeing. Because the neutral doesn't really satisfy anything in us. So these are the reactions that we talked about the other day of greed, aversion, and delusion being really synonymous with craving.

The image in the art is of a wealthy man counting his golden treasures. You can sort of think of it as a miser who has this great lust and desire for the accumulated treasure that he's hoarded.

So craving is the place where now we start to want to look really closely in our practice, to look at these manifestations of pulling toward or pushing away or ignoring. This is where our own choices come back into play. This is where we can establish our practice.

And it's such an important place because we can't control our experience. Life will continue to present experience to us. According to the teachings of the Buddha, it's mostly in the form of karmic results. We can't control that. When you come in for a sitting period, you really can't control whether it's going to be pleasant or unpleasant, whether you're going to be mindful and concentrated and present, or whether you're going to be spacing out, whether the body's going to be at ease or contracted. The basic uprising of our experience is out of our control. But we can have a choice, an increasing choice, in how we respond.

So this is where we establish our practice. How do I respond to the experience that I'm given?

Now with craving, what happens is that we single out one little bit of our experience. We take one instance of contact, we single it out from all the rest of the field, we focus our attention on it, and we react to it with liking or disliking.

Let's take a simple example. You're sitting in meditation and things are fairly neutral, fairly calm, but suddenly a strong pain comes in the back. Okay, this is contact that's born of the sense of touch. In having a body, we will have physical sensations born of the touch sense. They can be pleasant or unpleasant. In this case, for the sake of argument, let's say it's a painful sensation. So the contact is through the touch sense door. The vedana or feeling tone is painful.

Now, how do we relate to that when it comes into our experience of meditation? Typically, for any of us, the first thing that will happen is the mind will be strongly drawn, the attention will be strongly drawn to that experience. And we will incline toward it with our attention in some kind of way. The primitive or unreflective reaction is one of aversion. We don't like that painful experience. And either we want to push it away or more likely we sort of withdraw from it. We kind of create a distance between the I, standing back as an observer, and this unpleasant experience.

This is where craving is coming in. The force of craving has come into work.

It's wanting that pain not to be there, wanting ourselves not to have to experience it. And so we react to it by drawing away. This kind of bending away in the sense of the unpleasant, or if it's a pleasant sensation, it might be bending toward to take hold of. This is the distortion.

We basically have been given this mirror-like awareness, which purely reveals phenomena exactly as they are. Mindfulness is the discovery and strengthening of this capacity, this natural awareness that just illuminates all the sense contacts just as they are. Everything is held in that panoramic awareness where all the senses are functioning and alive.

But in this instance we've narrowed down our focus to just the pain in our back. We forget about the sounds. We forget about the fact that the knees feel okay. We forget about the fact that the mind was basically calm. And we focus the mind, we incline the mind away from that unpleasant situation.

This is the fundamental movement of craving, away from or toward. We also usually don't see that we're doing it. And that's the concomitant factor of delusion. We're blind to our habitual reactions, and that's how we get caught. This is really the start of the slippery slope. You may have noticed we're on our way to suffering. This is where it begins.

From craving, the next link in the chain is called clinging. In Pali, the term is upadana. Clinging is where we go beyond inclining the mind in that direction and we actually take hold of that facet of our experience. Again, we've just singled out one particular sense contact out of all the ones that are going on, but we grab hold of that one. In this case, to push it away with the pain in the back. That means we really focus our attention on it. We take firm hold of it as a meditation object or just something to react to. And we have, in the Buddha's terms, grabbed hold of that particular experience.

The image here is of a monkey who's climbed up a tree and is taking hold of a piece of fruit, something shiny and attractive. He's grabbing hold of it. This term is also sometimes translated grasping. Clinging or grasping, more or less synonymous. Clinging refers a little bit to the past holding that's carried on. Grasping is kind of the present moment taking hold of. But another term that expresses it well is fixation.

When we get fixated on some part of our experience, then we've narrowed the lens down. We're just grabbing hold of that with an emotional investment, with the investment of greed or aversion. Essentially what we're doing with fixation is we're trying to freeze the flow of impermanence.

Impermanence keeps bringing us pleasant experience, unpleasant experience, pleasant experience, unpleasant experience. If we could just let that happen, there would be no problem. There would be no suffering. There would be ease. Sometimes it would be pleasant, sometimes it would be unpleasant. But we wouldn't be in conflict.

But because we don't know how to do that, we've had, the Buddha would say, lifetimes of conditioning. We try to freeze the flow and we say, stop this unpleasantness. I don't want it. I'll pull away. Or stop this pleasantness from changing. I want it to last. On and on and on.

One way to see if you're clinging in a moment of practice is to see if you're really aware of impermanence at all the sense doors. Or is there one where there's a sense of being stuck, where there's a sense of freezing or fixating on something in that moment? That's something you can use as a meditation instruction.

The Buddha said that we cling to sense pleasures, we cling to views and opinions, we cling to religious rules and vows, and we cling to the idea of a self. These are the forms of our holding. So in this instance, we hang on to back pain as something fearsome. We establish ourselves by maintaining a distance.

What clinging actually does is it gives a sense of solidness to an experience that is fundamentally not solid at all. Fixation tries to solidify what is impermanent, what is ephemeral, what is passing, what is very light and insubstantial. But when we make a holding out of it, we turn it into a thing. We reify it by saying, "Oh, that's a pain in my back," and we make something solid out of a very light sensation.

Clinging then matures into the next link, which is called becoming or bhava. Becoming starts to fix the self into a new identity, and I think of this state of becoming as identity seeking—finding a new identity. The image in the art is of a pregnant woman about to give birth. The sense of ourselves starts to get crystallized in relationship to what we've singled out and taken hold of.

For example, the back pain gets crystallized as a problem and starts to extend into the past—it's been here for a minute—and we begin projecting it into the future: it's going to be here a while longer. So we start to build an idea of ourselves as a person with a problem. Actually, this sense of self is misleading because it's only temporary.

Let me ask you this: can the sense of "I" ever come up without being related to some particular sense experience? Think about this for a minute. Often a pain in the back comes in and we say, "My back hurts." Or we feel happy and we recognize, "I am happy." Even if we're looking at a tree, we might say, "I know that tree, I see that tree." Or if we're really with the breath for quite a while, we might say, "I'm really clear. I'm a good meditator."

Is the sense of "I" ever established independently of one of these sense experiences? We'll leave that an open question. Take a look in your own practice and see. But we can tell that the sense of "I" is arising again and again based on these experiences, based on these changing sense objects. So in your practice, you can actually start to tune into the emergence of this sense of "I."

Part of the craving for becoming I often think of as a search for identity. A lot of fantasies have this quality. Fantasies sometimes attract us—of a job or a relationship or a vacation—because we're going to be someone new in that setting.

A few years ago, I became a big fan of tennis, and in particular, I really liked Pete Sampras. I think he's a fantastic player. Sally gave me, as a Christmas present, a pair of tennis shorts that was the Pete Sampras model for that year—a pair of Nike shorts that Pete happened to wear when he won the US Open. So I was really happy to get them. I'd put them on and go out to the tennis court and actually felt like I was channeling Pete Sampras. I'd look down and see those shorts on my legs and think, "Pete Sampras"—and then I'd step up and occasionally even serve an ace after that. It was an identity thing.

Back in 1988, Sally and I were living in England and were just moving back to the States. I was wondering what to do with my career here, having been a computer consultant part-time and a part-time dharma teacher in England. For some reason this image just came up as we were coming back: I want to wear a coat and tie and carry a briefcase. I have no idea why or where that came from. But when we returned to the States, I got a job where I could wear a coat and tie and carry a briefcase. I did that for a few years until I could leave and come back into the dharma world. It seemed to satisfy some karmic aspiration I had. Fortunately, it burned out that karma and I happily put my coats and ties in the back closet. But it's really interesting to see this kind of identity formation come up.

One of the ways it comes up in retreat is through these golden chains of identity, which are dharma chains. We might imagine ourselves going back to our friends or family and giving them the most uplifting dharma talk they've ever heard in their lives. It will convert them and they'll immediately come totally into practice. That's another kind of identity connection.

So from the sense of becoming, the next link in the chain is birth. In Pali it's jati, and this is the full-blown formation of a new self. Classically, the interpretation is actually the birth in the next life.

So the first part of the links was about how we got born into this life. The very last links in the chain are considered to be what happens when we die at the end of this life. If this urge for becoming, for further existence, is still active in us, then it's said that will lead to another birth. We will be born in a new situation. The image in the art is of a pregnant woman actually giving birth - the baby is born. So this is the solidification of the sense of self from clinging to becoming to birth. The self is just getting a little more solid all along the way.

We can look at this sense of self as it exists through the last couple of days. When you were listening to Sylvia's Dharma talk, when you came down to the dining room for Thanksgiving lunch, what kind of self was being born then? Do you remember?

I don't know what your experience was, but as I was listening to Silvia's Dharma talk, I felt very much a part of this unity of us as a Dharma family. I felt in that time, "I'm part of this Dharma family. These are my Dharma sisters and brothers." As we went down for the Thanksgiving dinner, I continued to feel that really strongly. Then at the end of the meal, when we all went our different ways, that sense sort of broke up and went away from me. That was a form of a self that lasted for a while.

Then a little later, it was the self that loves pumpkin pie. And that lasted a while. There was the self who didn't particularly want to get up this morning, who didn't want to come to the sitting. There was a self who had a good sitting this morning. There was a self judging other people. Maybe there was a self who was good at the work meditation this morning - vegetable chopping or toilet scrubbing or whatever. A self who got afraid of the pain in the knees or in the heart. All these selves come, they last for a while, and then they go away.

Where are those selves now? They've died, haven't they? They've passed out of existence and another self is being born - one listening to a talk, maybe one whose back is getting a little tired again. How many selves are we in one day? We actually are a new self anytime we identify with, cling to, a new aspect of our experience. Then we live as that person for a while and that self invariably breaks up.

Sometimes in the passing there's relief. Sometimes in that passing there's real sadness. There was a kind of sadness when we came to the end, for me, of Thanksgiving lunch yesterday. And it was the passing of a really beautiful couple of hours, starting with the Dharma talk and the metta and the blessing. So sometimes the passing away is happy, sometimes it's sad, but there's always a sense of turmoil about it. There's a sense of movement and activity.

This is the last of the links - it's called aging and death. The image in the painting is of an old person walking along with great difficulty, bent over, unable to straighten up fully, infirm in body, painful in their movements. This term aging and death is shorthand actually in the Buddhist teachings for the truth of suffering and all the different forms of suffering. As soon as we're born, we're subject to illness, aging, and death. As soon as we're born, we're subject to sorrow and grief and wanting and fear and anger and aggression and all of it. So aging and death typify that.

These are the twelve links. And then when we get to aging and death, or we could say suffering, the circle starts again because we still haven't let go of ignorance. Because ignorance is still in place and we don't understand the cycle fully, the circle starts all over again, moving again through new kinds of contact, new feeling, new craving, new clinging, a new becoming, a new self.

This cycle goes up through all the heavenly realms of being, through all the most pleasurable parts of life, and then it goes down for each of us into difficult places - into places of loss, of physical pain, of embarrassment, of unhappiness, of suffering. We don't really have much control over it. We're sort of riding the waves of life and riding the waves of our own karma through all these different realms.

Whether you understand this as repeated rebirths in actually different levels of existence per the cosmology, or whether you want to understand it as the different ways we go up and down through one life, the meaning is the same. This cycle, which is unending as long as we're in ignorance, is called the cycle of samsara. It is the cycle of bondage which always exposes us to future suffering until it's understood. The meaning is that we recreate the sense of I and mine over and over and over. And through that recreation, through clinging, we expose ourselves to suffering.

Is this the end of our fate? Is this all there is for us, this unbroken round of bondage and samsara? Fortunately not. And that's why this cycle is also used to explain liberation. It's not deterministic. It's not that one link causes the next, rather they condition it.

Where can we find freedom? The Buddha said that the place to find freedom is the link between feeling and craving. If it's pleasant, we don't have to react with holding on. If it's unpleasant, we don't have to react with pushing away. If we can simply rest with the pleasant and the unpleasant and not get involved in these reactive formations, we have interrupted the chain. We have seen with wisdom and we have understood clearly. And then no further suffering is generated. We have stopped the cycle of future suffering.

The key elements are these two factors of clear seeing, so that we don't react out of habitual greed and aversion, and of acceptance. Again, as with the Third Noble Truth, this factor of acceptance is of profound importance—the ability to be open to the unpleasant experiences as well as the pleasant in our life and not to hold to either.

This is the way the Buddha expressed it: "On seeing a form with the eye, one does not lust after it if it is pleasing, one does not dislike it if it is unpleasing. One abides with mindfulness established and one understands as it actually is the freedom of mind wherein those unwholesome states of craving cease without remainder. Having thus abandoned favoring and opposing, whatever feeling one feels—painful, pleasant or neutral—one does not delight in that feeling or remain holding to it. As one does not do so, delight in feelings ceases. With the cessation of delight comes cessation of clinging. With the cessation of clinging, cessation of becoming. Such is the cessation of this entire mass of suffering."

This is exactly where we establish our practice. In any form of sense contact, in every moment of our experience, if we can be fully with that moment without the reactions of greed or aversion, if we can see it clearly, we're free. Not only are we free in that moment, but then we're not creating the future cycle of bondage that will lead to more suffering. This is wisdom. This is clear seeing. This is also the place of nibbana. This is where the formations, the karmic formations, the volitional formations come to a stop. This is one of the ways that the Buddha often described nibbana: the cessation of volitional formations.

We're also at that point interrupting ignorance, because we're clearly seeing the arising of feeling and yet the not sliding into craving. So as we bring more wisdom in at this point throughout the chain, wherever we can see clearly this chain happening, we start to weaken the whole chain.

Joseph Goldstein had a wonderful image. He said you may have a strong steel chain of many links and you pick one link and you start to bang on it. You may bang on that chain ninety-nine times and nothing seems to happen—still a solid link in the chain. You hit it the hundredth time and it breaks.

This is the impact of wisdom on this cycle of dependent origination. The first time we hit it, the ignorance doesn't go away. The second time, it doesn't go away. But we just keep applying that mindfulness and clear seeing again and again and again. And with each moment of mindfulness, ignorance is being undercut, is being weakened, and eventually it can be uprooted.

The good news is that wisdom can uproot ignorance, but ignorance can't uproot wisdom. So the purity of our being, the innate purity, is actually stronger than all these visiting obscurations. That's the good news of the Dharma. It's never too late. It's never impossible to be free.

And then the Buddha says, "With the cessation of ignorance comes the cessation of formations. With the cessation of formations, the cessation of consciousness." And all through all the other links in the chain, including the end of craving, the end of clinging, the end of becoming, the end of birth. And that is the final freedom when all those have become completely ended. We become still inwardly through trust.

One Tibetan teacher, a professor at Naropa, said, "The entire Tibetan Buddhist path consists in nothing more nor less than learning to rest in the gap between feeling and craving ever more deeply and subtly."

So this really is the heart of the Buddha's practice, the heart of the Dharma.

When we rest in that gap, we are resting in Nibbana. We are resting in the unconditioned freedom that is truly our original nature. As long as we can trust in that, as long as we have faith, and don't mess with it, we're free. We're free.

So let's just sit for a minute and let this teaching settle.

The entire path consists in nothing more nor less than learning to rest in the gap between feeling and craving ever more deeply and subtly. This is where liberation awaits us, in each moment of choice, in each breath of awareness, in each opportunity to simply be present with what is without needing to grasp or push away.

May this understanding support your practice. May you find that gap, rest in it, and discover the freedom that has always been your birthright.

CHAPTER 224

Transcendent Dependent Origination

Guy Armstrong · 59 min

> In this inspiring dharma talk, Guy Armstrong presents the Buddha's teaching on transcendent dependent origination from the Upanisā Sutta (SN 12.23), which describes the positive process of liberation. Unlike the traditional twelve links of paṭiccasamuppāda that show the arising of suffering, this teaching traces how suffering itself becomes the proximate cause for faith, which then leads through joy, rapture, tranquility, happiness, concentration, right knowledge and vision, disenchantment, dispassion, liberation, and finally the knowledge of the destruction of the āsavas (mental taints).
> Armstrong illustrates these teachings with personal stories and examples, including his own journey from the difficulties of the 1960s counterculture to finding vipassanā meditation, Ajahn Chah's powerful encounter with fear at a charnel ground, and work with young people in juvenile detention. He emphasizes how our deepest challenges can become doorways to awakening when we learn to face them with awareness and the support of dharma teachings. The talk beautifully balances the recognition of dukkha with the cultivation of joy and the positive mental factors that naturally arise in practice, showing how both difficult and pleasant experiences serve the path to liberation.

Something else emerges from this general law that the Buddha detailed in the teaching of dependent origination with its twelve links. Those twelve links represent only one application of this fundamental teaching. Tonight I want to explore another application of this general law of cause and effect—this time showing the process of liberation.

The original chain also revealed the process of liberation, but it did so in negative terms: ending this, ending this, ending this, ending suffering. Now the Buddha describes the process of liberation in positive terms, which I find deeply inspiring and motivating. This is what I want to share with you.

This teaching is based on a sutta from the Samyutta Nikaya called the Upanishad Sutta. Upanishad means something like proximate cause or supporting condition. It's not strictly a causal relationship, but rather something that must be present for the next factor to arise.

The Upanishad Sutta begins by addressing what the Buddha calls the knowledge of the destruction of the taints. The taints represent the impurities within our heart and mind. When they are said to be destroyed, this is equivalent to saying that one has fully awakened—one is completely enlightened.

The Buddha declares: "I say, bhikkhus, that the knowledge of the destruction of the taints has a proximate cause. It does not lack a proximate cause. And what is the proximate cause for the knowledge of the destruction of the taints? It should be said: liberation." That is, after liberation one knows that the taints have been destroyed. Liberation is freedom itself.

He continues: "I say, bhikkhus, that liberation too has a proximate cause. It does not lack a proximate cause. And what is the proximate cause for liberation? It should be said: dispassion."

This reveals something profound: liberation itself has a precondition, a cause. Liberation in the Buddha's teaching is not something that happens randomly—it occurs according to prior conditions. This means that if we establish the proper conditions, liberation will naturally arise.

The Buddha then traces back this sequence of links from dispassion through a series of positive factors to the quality of faith. He continues: "I say, bhikkhus, that faith too has a proximate cause. It does not lack a proximate cause. And what is the proximate cause of faith? It should be said: suffering."

This statement appears almost as a non-sequitur—how did suffering become the cause of faith? The sutta then continues by showing that suffering also has a cause, tracing it back exactly like dependent origination: through birth, becoming, clinging, craving, feeling, contact, and so forth, all the way back to ignorance.

What emerges is a complete teaching: the entire chain of dependent origination from ignorance to suffering, followed by a new chain leading from suffering to faith and ultimately to liberation and the knowledge of liberation.

This new chain has been given various names by different teachers. Ajahn Buddhadasa, one of my teachers in Thailand who specialized in dependent origination and wrote an extensive work on the subject, called this positive part of the cycle the Radiant Wheel, in contrast to the Wheel of Existence or the Wheel of Becoming. It has also been called the Wheel of Awakening.

Bhikkhu Bodhi, the American monk living in Sri Lanka who translated this volume and the Majjhima Nikaya, wrote a detailed exploration of this teaching and called it transcendental dependent arising. He noted that the commentaries named it transcendental or transcendent because it transcends suffering—it is the wheel that carries us beyond the possibility of suffering.

This sequence of transcendental dependent origination is what I wish to explore tonight.

So to transcend the need for Novocaine tonight, I'll go through the list of the factors that I want to explore in the talk.

It starts with this very surprising linkage of suffering with faith and then continues that faith leads to joy. Joy leads to rapture, to tranquility, to happiness, to concentration, to knowing and seeing things as they are, to disenchantment, to dispassion, to liberation, to knowledge of the extinction of the taints. So these are the twelve links that I want to explore tonight.

Suffering is the proximate cause of faith. This is a little hard to understand because we look around the world and there is lots of suffering and there is not so much liberation. So somewhere in the samsaric conditions of things, suffering is not leading to faith and the rest of the wheel for most people. So what is it that makes the difference? What is it that puts the wheel in a positive spin?

In the commentaries they say there are two conditions for suffering turning into faith. One is an awareness of suffering so that we stop denying it, we stop trying to avoid it, we stop trying to believe that it shouldn't exist, but we acknowledge it as part of our human experience. The second is that we hear the teachings. We hear the teachings and we find a way to transform suffering.

When I looked at this in my own life, I found there was actually a lot of truth in this, of suffering leading to faith. Because I grew up in a fairly ordinary, middle-class household. I grew up in the Midwest and had just a normal amount of human neurosis, which was certainly enough to make my adolescence hell. But I started to get a little more together in my early twenties, and then I discovered the drug culture and the hippie years and the counterculture and all of that.

And I came out of the sixties with a lot of confusion, having had an excess of everything that the sixties were about. And came out quite unhappy, quite confused, a lot of improprieties in my conduct, a lot of wrong understanding. And at that point I really was forced to grapple with my situation, my psychological state, seriously for the first time. I found myself living in California, and so I tried all the things that people living in California in the early seventies were supposed to try, like rolfing and encounter groups and EST and the EST follow-ups and many, many different kinds of techniques, and none of them touched my fundamental situation very much.

And then I happened to wander into and encounter the vipassana practice. And when I did, I really felt I had found something that had the depth to touch my suffering, to really transform it. Without having come into that kind of deep pain, I don't know that I would have had the motivation to find meditation and to follow it. But suffering for me was kind of the sand that rubbed the oyster the wrong way and through its friction produced the pearl.

When we're suffering we become very open to looking at things in a new way, to really throwing out all our assumptions because maybe we become a little bit desperate. And in my case, I was very desperate. I would have given anything to find my way through that mess. So this quality of being taken to an edge with suffering can actually make us really open to something new.

And I'm reminded of the time a few years ago when James and I got together and went down to teach a class at Juvenile Hall in San Mateo. We were thinking about wanting to start a service project out of Spirit Rock at that time. The board later told us they weren't ready. There were too many buildings to build, too many other things to do, so we shelved it. But as part of our exploration, we were invited by a friend of James who's a practitioner and worked there to conduct a series of classes.

I wasn't familiar with the justice system for juveniles in this country until I went, but what happens is that while young people under the age of eighteen are awaiting trial, they get put into juvenile hall. We were working with young men who were living in the high security unit, which meant that they'd done something pretty serious. People were in there for armed robbery, for assault, for attempted murder, and for murder.

And as you can imagine, like with most of the criminal justice system, the emphasis is not really on compassion and healing. So these young kids were kind of tossed into basically a holding tank with quite strong security guards to sort of keep them in place. And often they wouldn't know how long they would be in there until their case would come to trial. So you had sixteen and seventeen year old kids whose lives were now on hold, who knew that for their offense, they could be locked away in jail for years and years and years. And they were basically just bouncing around the walls of this holding tank hour after hour, day after day, with other young people who were in a similar situation.

So you can imagine that the levels of fear, anxiety, despair, and aggression were running very high for those young guys. And of course they didn't have the tools to deal with that stuff. So James and I thought we would go in and try and keep it really practical. And we didn't know if they'd be interested in meditation at all, so James had a brainstorm. He said, we won't call it meditation. I mean, forget about calling it Buddhism. We weren't going to be that stupid. But even calling it meditation sounded kind of namby-pamby. You know, that's got to be for sissies. So James had the brainstorm that we would call it mind power. And that's what we did.

So we invited them to come to our weekly classes on mind power. With the support of one of the security guards, a bunch of them did come. We would have about ten young guys at every class.

I hadn't worked with young people in that situation before, and James hadn't either. So we went in not knowing what we were doing, not knowing if it was going to connect or not. These were pretty heavy-duty guys. We sat down and gave some instructions, trying to make it practical.

We found that the things they really responded to were the teachings on how to work with difficult emotions like fear and anger. We'd give them the breath as kind of a warm-up exercise, but then we'd say something like, "Imagine a time you were afraid. Imagine a time you were angry. Now go into your body and feel that. Where do you feel it? What are the sensations? Keep your attention there. Tell us what you're feeling." Then we would invite them as homework to continue to do the practice.

Some of them really took to it like ducks to water. They had a lot of free time and they had plenty of material to work with. They were some of the most motivated students I've ever encountered. Some of the shifts we saw were very moving. I don't know how many of them lasted—our class only lasted about six weeks. But some of them came in and told me that they were able to get relief from their fear for the first time. They were able to start to manage some of their feelings of anger.

One time after loving-kindness meditation, they were talking about loving-kindness to other gangs that they'd had fights with. One guy said, "I'm not going to practice loving-kindness to those other guys. They're trying to kill me." Another guy who happened to be a gang leader said, "Oh, but you know, those people have mothers and sisters also who really care about them." So there were some beautiful shifts taking place, and it came out of the extreme state of suffering that they found themselves in.

When we are challenged and suffering challenges us, we can reach deeply inside and open up in a way that we may not have any other time. We hear this every day in the interviews. I wish sometimes that we could pipe the interviews into the meditation hall—sort of like on Monday night, when if the room's full, Jack gets piped into the book room, the disembodied voice comes in. I sometimes wish we could do that here, because it's very inspirational.

The first couple of days, we sort of feel like we're giving the Dharma talks. But after the first few days, when your practice starts cooking, we just sit in there and receive the Dharma talks. You come in and tell us the truth of the practice, especially at this stage in the retreat.

Just thinking back about the interviews today, people come in and say things like, "I'm learning so much about what it means to accept the pain in my life, so much about opening to it and not being in conflict with it." Or "I'm opening to fear in a new way and finding out that it doesn't have to control me, doesn't have to take me over, dictate to me." Or "I didn't even know that there was a gap between feeling and craving. I didn't know there could be a gap. I thought it was all run together all the time. And now I'm finding out I can rest there sometimes."

In all these situations, people are working directly with their difficulties, with their suffering, and finding a way to find some freedom. Finding, in fact, that our suffering is workable. That's really what we're hearing day after day. You're finding your own strength and your own faith coming out of looking closely at your own difficulty. Difficulty often is the greatest teacher in our retreat practice and in our daily life.

When I did my first meditation retreat, which was in 1976, I worked up to it through a couple of years of daily life practice and then took the plunge. It was at Lama Foundation with Joseph and Jack and Sharon. I had a very, very difficult time. I had a lot of pain in my body. I had a lot of wandering mind. There are people for whom the path progresses quickly and easily. I was not one of them. But in the middle of it, I started to see there might really be the possibility of an end to confusion and pain.

And that was so inspiring for me. It was so touching. Because before, my suffering had just been this thick mass that I didn't really see any way into. And with the precision of the practice, I could actually see its arising, and I could see the possibility of its disappearing. It gave me tremendous inspiration. I've cried, actually, with gratitude that this message has come to me—that there is suffering, it has a cause, and because it has a cause, it has an end.

So this is part of the origin of faith. I want to share a couple of other stories that illustrate this fact: when we get taken to an extremity of suffering, sometimes the greatest openings and the greatest breakthroughs come to us.

Ajahn Chah was, as most of you know, Jack Kornfield's first teacher. He was probably one of the greatest half-dozen Thai meditation masters of the last fifty years. As a young monk practicing in the northeast of Thailand near the Lao border, he decided that he would confront his deepest fear.

Culturally in Thailand, one of the scariest things for anybody at any level of society is the idea of ghosts or spirits. We kind of make fun of it on Halloween, but in Asia these things are felt to be very alive, very present, and of a possibly mischievous to malevolent temperament. So Ajahn Chah had a fear of ghosts, a fear of spirits that he'd never fully explored.

He decided as a young monk that he would take himself and sit in a charnel ground. These are the grounds where in Thai communities the dead bodies are brought and burned, then simply left there. If the fire goes out, there are parts of the body left. And of course the spirit is considered to stay close to the body after death.

He went there the first night and set himself up in meditation. As it happened, a child had just been burned at the charnel ground that day. He sat down to meditate, and he was really afraid. But he decided what he needed to do was to face his fear, so he sat all night. All night long, he said, he was shaking. He was trembling. He was very, very afraid.

But then he made it through the night. He was okay. He thought, "Oh, there's nothing to this. I've got this mastered. Charnel grounds aren't going to scare me anymore." The sun came up. He enjoyed the warm day. He kept sitting and walking. And he decided to stay another night.

Near sunset of the second night, people from the village came carrying another corpse. But this was of a grown man. They put the corpse on a pile of wood and lit it, and it burned. The lay people stayed with it for a while and then they went away, and the fire kept burning, the corpse kept burning.

Night was falling and Ajahn Chah realized he had to take his seat again near the burning corpse to face his fear again. So he sat down to meditate and he said, because it was a grown person, this time he was much more afraid. The fear was even stronger. He sat and he could hear the flames flickering away, licking on the wood, licking on the body. He could smell the pungent smell of the burning flesh as he sat with his back to the corpse. He was full of fear. Night fell, but he kept sitting.

As he sat, he started to hear a noise over by the pyre. His ears pricked up. What is that? Is it a dog who's come to sniff around the corpse and take some of the flesh? And then he heard very near the pyre the sound like footsteps on leaves. The steps started coming toward him. He kept his eyes shut. He just kept sitting. It was pitch black. He couldn't see a thing. He didn't even turn around to look. The footsteps came right up toward him, walked around, and stopped right in front of him.

And he imagined that this spirit, half disembodied, maybe half with the burned flesh, was staring at him as he sat with these really intense eyes. And he said then his whole body just filled with fear. He said he'd never felt anything like it in his life. He said he became so afraid he didn't know what else to do. He was practicing saying "Buddho, Dhammo, Sangho" as a way to focus his mind. He couldn't even get a hold of his meditation object. He was just filled with fear.

And he said it was like when you pour a pitcher of water into a jar—every little bit of the jar gets filled with the water. He said his whole body was just pervaded with the fear and he was paralyzed with it. And he said he sat there filled with this fear and then this thought came to him: what's the worst thing that could happen? And the thought came: I could die. And then the thought came: well, everybody has to die. Suppose I meet my death now. That's the worst thing that could happen.

And he said when he came to that understanding, the fear in a moment transformed. And that energy that was filling his body became very, very blissful. Full of blissful, radiant energy. And then the footsteps went away. They walked away. And he sat through the night with this great joy that he said really marked a turning point in his practice. Having opened to the fear, opened to the fear, and it transformed.

So he tells this story in a book called Food for the Heart. If you're interested in reading, it's very moving. And then he goes on and talks about the insights that he took from it and the strength that that gave his mind to face the fear of death and then continue through it. So out of this really close encounter with our suffering, with our pain, we come away with a strength and a certain degree of faith.

So the second link in the chain is this quality of faith, or in Pali the term is saddhā. Saddhā in Pali means to place one's heart upon—where we place our heart for rest, for ease. So faith in the Buddhist sense doesn't mean what you believe in. It doesn't mean an intellectual, conceptual thing. It's really a gut check. What's your level of trust in the world? Or what's your level of confidence in yourself? It's really a pointer to this inner experience that we have.

Traditionally, faith is based on hearing the teachings, hearing the truth, hearing the Dhamma, and checking it with our own experience and coming to believe in it. And then it's said that faith becomes like a gem, that as we rest with the quality, the purity of the gem, it clears the hindrances from our being. The Buddha said: "Endowed with faith, one receives the gladness associated with the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Sangha."

So traditionally, faith is talked about as faith in the three gems—the Buddha, Dhamma, Sangha. But I really think it's important that we each come to our own connection to what our own faith lies in. It may be the three gems, it may be something different. It may be a trust in nature, or the basic goodness of the universe, or God, or something else. So to look within and find out where that faith is for us.

But in very practical terms, as faith grows, we start to realize that, yeah, I can check out these teachings. They are verified in my own experience and therefore I have the confidence that I can walk the path, that I can walk the path to greater freedom based on the teachings. So out of that confidence then we take up effort. We apply ourselves through the practice, the formal practice of mindfulness and the rest of the Eightfold Path.

And then going into the practice, we find that even though it's difficult at times, there are moments, there are times of great joy. And this is the next factor. The Pali is pāmojja and it's often translated as joy or gladness. It's really, really important that in our practice, in addition to looking at the quality of suffering, we also look at these beautiful factors along the path. The factors in this sutta talk about qualities like joy, rapture, serenity, happiness, liberation.

It's easy to get focused on what's difficult in our life and in our practice. And if we become too focused on that, we kind of turn our mind that way and we overlook the moments of joy. So can we hold ourselves in kind of a middle position where we're open to a moment of joy or a moment of difficulty without a built-in bias. Some people come from an ecstatic tradition of spiritual practice or psychological view of the world that everything should be happy.

They come to a practice like this and think, "No, too much focus on suffering. Suffering is not really that real." And they miss the First Noble Truth. They miss the deep significance of that truth.

Other people may immerse themselves too much in the First and Second Noble Truths and miss the moments of joy, the times when wholesome qualities are actually coming into their practice all the time. So can we keep our minds in the middle, where we're ready to go to happiness or joy, or we're ready to go to suffering? Either one is within our range.

One teacher said that another word for mindfulness is readiness. Can we sit in that moment ready for anything that's going to present itself, ready for anything that's going to come without preconception?

So in retreat, this can mean tuning into the really simple pleasures of the day—like coming in cold for lunch and having that steaming bowl of chili to eat. Finding that the council house has a fireplace and that somebody's lit the fire on this raw, wintry day, and just being able to sit in front of the fire and feel its warmth and its light. Being able to lie down in our bed at night and feel the body relax and the mind relax. Getting up in the morning and feeling refreshed, feeling rested. Having a warm shower at the start of another chilly day.

Because we're so sensitive through this practice, these pleasures can become really heightened. I've had cups of tea and apples on retreat that have been more delicious than expensive meals in restaurants. Sometimes it can seem we're living like queens and kings even when we're eating very simple things and enjoying very simple activities.

The Buddha pointed to this too. He said, "Bhikkhus, your robes, alms food, hut, and straw seat will seem rich and luxurious to one who is renounced." And this is a beautiful thing to discover—that as we simplify our lives, the things we do enjoy can become even richer.

There's the joy of nature. Even on a day like today, appreciating the quality of the fog, appreciating the way the trees look shrouded in that mist, appreciating the swirling patterns that the fog makes. And even that chilly breeze—the air is so fresh, so clean in this kind of weather.

Nature has sustained me a lot through my practice. I think back to the time I was newly ordained as a monk in Thailand and went up to practice in a little monastery up north near Chiang Mai. It was a monastery set at the bottom of a deep river gorge, with high hills on both sides lined with trees. There were caves up in one of the hills. The river was meandering through the valley, and the monks' huts were on one side of the river, the nuns' huts on the other.

Because I was a Westerner and kind of a rare animal up there, I was actually given the best hut in the whole monastery—the most remote hut that was furthest up the gorge. It was apart from all the others, sitting right next to the river. It was a really beautiful place to practice. I was completely alone.

I did a three-month period of practice there, an intensive retreat just like we're doing here, and didn't have dharma talks in the evenings or interviews because the Ajahn, the teacher, didn't speak English. But he was a very sweet man, and he'd come up to check on me from time to time. I'd look up from my sitting and he'd be peering in through my window. He'd catch my eye and say, "Oh, dee, dee"—that means good. "Oh, good, good." He was really happy I was practicing.

Occasionally he would come up when I was doing walking meditation, and the one instruction he always would give me was to take off my sandals. He'd point to my feet and I got it—he wanted me to walk barefoot. I can't remember why I was always walking with sandals, but I always seemed to be. And he'd go, "Dee, dee, dee maak"—very good. He was really happy that I was practicing.

But I never really got to talk with him. Looking back on that time, I was very motivated in my practice. I was very glad to be there and have this ideal practice setting. We only got one meal a day at eight in the morning, but the food was vegetarian and suited me really well. I had a very rewarding period of practice there. It wasn't easy, but looking back on that time, I see that the thing that really sustained me was the contact with nature.

because I was quite isolated. I actually had a friend at the monastery who was a nun, but I couldn't speak with her because monks and nuns weren't allowed to mingle. They were quite strict about that. So I wasn't supposed to cross that bridge over to the nun side of the monastery. I really didn't have much of a conversation with anybody for that three-month period.

But the river was so wonderful, the hills were so beautiful, the trees way at the top of the hill, the sun as it struck the trees in the morning when it was rising. There was a mango tree just down the path from me and it was mango season, so the aromas of the mangoes were coming in and we'd get those for breakfast in the morning. So even though I look back and see it was quite isolating and a difficult period in that way, the contact with nature really sustained me. And it's one of the things we can always touch on here, one of the beauties we have.

There's the joy of increasing peace. Almost everybody has talked in interviews about touching some deeper place of peace in your practice over the course of the retreat. If you can think back to the start, which seems so long ago, you remember how uncomfortable the body was? Remember how scattered the mind was and how refined you are now by comparison? You've really all come a long way.

So in touching those moments of peace, sometimes it's such a delight, it's such a relief—there's a joy in that. When I think about my own practice, the course of it, somehow I think touching deeper and deeper experiences of peace were a lot of what kept me coming back. I kind of wanted to see where all this peace would lead. What was the potential for the depth of peace that I could find in meditation? Where was that going toward? What was the possibility?

There's the joy of being with the truth. Even when it's difficult to touch something that's really true and deeply true in our lives, it does have a joyful quality. We may not feel it at the time because it may be painful. But if we start to tune into it, if we start to look, there is a very deep kind of satisfaction in touching that.

Somebody was talking in interviews today about an insight of seeing into a very subtle way that the notion of self was being fabricated, was being created and sustained. It had to do with subtle mind states that created a kind of familiar mood that created the sense of self. These subtle mind states probably weren't all that pleasant. But in being able to see them, there was a great delight in the release of bondage, of thinking that they constituted an enduring sense of I, an enduring self.

So when your insights come, take a look. One yogi in a retreat last year said, "One of the most joyful things here is being able to be with the pain and open to it." Especially when we feel it's kind of a core part of our being, a core issue that we've worked with outside, that we've struggled with. It might be fear, it might be anger, it might be our self-judgment. Being able to touch it really directly gives us the possibility of release, of freedom.

This joy is never very far away. It's always just there if we want to tune into it.

You probably remember a Hindu teacher named Swami Satchidananda. He was quite famous in the early seventies, well throughout the seventies. And there was this great poster of him—I'm sure it was an amalgam, but a picture of him on a surfboard with the ocean waves breaking under him. And the caption was, "You can't stop the waves, but you can learn to surf." And of course, Swami Satchidananda is an older man dressed up in a white robe with long gray hair and long gray flowing beard. The picture of him on a surfboard itself brings a lot of humor.

But his name is actually a teaching. In the Hindu tradition, it's a key pointer to the reality of things. Sat, chit, ananda. Sat means being—you can see it in the Pali word satta. Bodhisattva is an enlightenment being. Sat is being. Chit means mind or consciousness, like our Pali word citta. And ananda means bliss.

Satchitananda then means being, consciousness, bliss. This is the kind of inseparable trinity in Hindu teaching. These things go together to make up every moment. Or you could say these three qualities are present in every moment—being, awareness, and bliss. So at any moment you can tune into that bliss, the joy of creation, the divine play.

And the way I often do it is I look at the quality of light. For me, the quality of light—even just now reflecting off this book cover, the glimmer of it, the radiance of it—reminds me of that delight, that play, that divine quality. So when the mind is relaxed, the amount of joy in just a really ordinary moment can be huge.

This is from Thomas Merton: "There is in all things an inexhaustible sweetness and purity, a silence that is a fountain of action and joy. It rises up in wordless gentleness and flows out to me from the unseen roots of all created being." From all created being, this joy radiates. It's really the same pointing.

Joy then intensifies as we become more and more accustomed to it in our practice. It intensifies into the next factor, which is rapture. Rapture is sort of defined as a rapt attention in what we're experiencing, in what we're paying attention to. So rapture really has this quality of wholehearted and full connection with what our experience is. It's very much associated with meditation, very much associated with the practice of mindfulness and also of concentration. The wholeheartedness of attention on our chosen focus is the quality of rapture.

The Pali term is pīti. This is one of the jhanic factors that is associated with strong concentration. Rapture is a mental factor, an aspect of the mind. But it often expresses itself in bodily energy. So you'll often hear people talk about a trembling, an uprising of energy, a lifting of energy as being manifestations of rapture. So though it's a mental factor, it's one that's often felt in the body. And it often has, even as it gets strong, a very turbulent quality in the body. It can feel almost overwhelming or a lot to handle as it becomes intensified, as it becomes strong. But it is actually the growth of joy or gladness.

Then rapture, as it gets accommodated, mellows out into the next factor, which is called tranquility. The Pali term is passaddhi. And this calms down the turbulence of rapture—sometimes translated as relaxation, calm, ease, or serenity. So this allows the waves of turbulence to settle down into some kind of quietude within our being. And as that bodily settling happens, the mind is also settling.

And that leads to the next factor, which is happiness. The Pali term here is sukha. I really like this word sukha. It reminds me of the root of sugar or sucrose. It has that same ring and maybe they're connected, I don't know. But sukha really first refers to a sweet quality of mind, a pleasant quality of mind. It's another of the jhanic factors that lead to deepening concentration.

Sukha, of course, is really connected with our practice because you could frame the Third Noble Truth in other terms. You know, if the Buddha was growing up in California today, I'm convinced that the First Noble Truth would not be the truth of suffering. I think the First Noble Truth would be something like: "Bhikkhus, I say to you, there are many opportunities for growth in our human existence." So if this is the California First Noble Truth, then I think the Third Noble Truth would not talk about the end of suffering, but the possibility of real happiness.

The Third Noble Truth really is a pointer to happiness. When suffering ends, obviously that is immense joy. I can't even imagine the kind of joy that would be—great happiness. That's really the pointing of the whole practice.

And happiness is considered to be a deeper flowering than joy is. It's been refined and stabilized by intensifying into rapture and then pacifying through tranquility. So it's kind of taking the joy and suffusing it through our being in a relaxed and harmonious way. Joy has a sense of depending on conditions, being a momentary appreciation of the beautiful. Happiness has a sense of being independent of conditions and something that's pervading the mind and the being. It has more of a sense, a flavor of contentment, acceptance, and peacefulness.

In some ways I think the way that the practice leads is not so much to an ecstatic, exuberant happiness, but a kind of happiness of settledness, of coming home. Trungpa Rinpoche used to talk about finding through practice our basic sanity. And when that returns, that is so sweet. It's so dear. You know, those moments when you just feel like: I'm totally back in the present moment. I'm unburdened from the past. I'm just here. I'm fully inhabiting my body.

Life is okay. If we could live from that place of basic sanity, we could accept anything. We could work with anything. It's the clouds of disturbing thoughts and emotions, the fantasies, the unreality of the thoughts and emotions that make life so difficult. So there's a great happiness in this process of coming home.

Sometimes we distort it or we misunderstand it by trying to make it permanent. And then we tie ourselves up in knots. But happiness can only be found in the moment. The problem is we try to assure it for the rest of our life. And that is impossible. So we feel frustrated. "Oh, well, I could be happy now, but I can't guarantee I'm going to be happy the rest of my life, so I can't be happy now." Nobody can guarantee that happiness for the rest of their lives except a fully awakened one, maybe. So if we lower our aim and just say, "Can I be happy in this moment?" Just take care of this moment and you take care of all time. Much more doable aim.

But it's interesting that practice doesn't stop here. The chain doesn't stop with happiness. In most Western teachings, I think this would be considered to be the end of the road. When you reach happiness, phew, done with the path. But in the Buddhist teaching, we're still walking. There's further to go.

The Buddha actually said two things I never lost track of in all my own years of practice: never to quit my effort and never to settle merely for wholesome states of mind. I find this tremendously inspiring. There have been so many times in my own practice that I would have given everything I had to settle for wholesome states of mind. I would have rolled up the mat, I would have called it the end of the path, I would have been glad to be home. But the Buddha said there's further to go. Not just hanging out with the wholesome, but to continue, to continue toward liberation.

The next factor is the factor of concentration. And it's very interesting that in this sutta the Buddha says that concentration has a proximate cause. And the proximate cause of concentration is happiness. This is fantastic. Because I always assumed the proximate cause of concentration was intense striving. And if I hadn't gotten it yet, I just had to strive more and harder after that breath. And if I could stay really on top of it every moment, then I'd get concentrated. So this is really radical. The proximate cause of concentration is happiness.

When that peacefulness and easy feeling pervades our being, then we can give up the struggle. Then there's the sense that in a really, really deep way we can let go. And in that letting go, the mind can just settle into itself. That's how the unification happens, the mind settling within itself instead of trying to reach outward in this divided way to past and future.

The image that came to me was—I don't know if you remember the old Prell commercials from the 1950s, when the pearl was just gliding down this thick, viscous, green fluid coming to the bottom of the bottle. Just that slow, peaceful glide. That is the mind settling in concentration through happiness. It's great. If you think of it as green, that's okay. But it has about it that kind of effortless quality. You just let gravity take it. You don't have to do anything at that point. In fact, the less you do at that point, the better. Because the mind knows its own way home. It knows its own way to rest. So you just let it go there.

Then from that place of great settledness and peace and contentment comes the next link, which is knowing and seeing things as they truly are—knowing and seeing things as they truly are. And this essentially means seeing the three characteristics of existence, seeing the truth of impermanence, of dukkha, and of anatta. We see clearly that the world is unstable, that the phenomena of the world can't give us that lasting happiness that we crave. We see that more and more clearly. Whatever is born also dies.

Continue beautifying this talk (part 10/11). Maintain the same tone and style as previous parts.

Whatever comes together falls apart. The Buddha said the world is disintegrating. Everywhere we turn our attention, we see it.

This true understanding leads to the next phase, which is called disenchantment. I like this term because it's actually not a negative term. It means the spell of enchantment is being cut. This promise that the world seems to offer—that its beautiful things are going to give us lasting happiness—is the spell. It's the spell of illusion. It's not quite true.

So at this stage, we cut that spell, we break the spell, we wake up to things as they really are, and we see that we're not going to find it out there. We're also not going to find it within the process of change of our own mind and body. We're not going to find it in changing phenomena.

This is not to depress us. The purpose of the seeing is not to get discouraged. It's to encourage us to let go, to stop grasping at anything, anywhere. And in that letting go, there's the settling into even deeper peace, which is the next link in the chain called dispassion.

The Pali term is virāga, and the literal meaning is "without lust," without craving. So this sense of dispassion is not that we lose our warmth or our caring or our commitment to life or to the path, but it means that we give up the craving that seeks to find its happiness in what can't give it.

There are actually many, many terms in the Dharma that refer to the wholesome qualities that in the West we might call passion. People often hear this term dispassion and say, "Do you mean I'm supposed to become really cold and aloof and all my feelings cut off and no more warmth? Am I supposed to become as glossy as a Buddha statue?" Not at all.

There are many, many terms that talk about this quality of warmth. In the Buddhist jargon, passion is usually used to refer to this force of greed, desire, lust that's unhelpful. So that's just kind of a vocabulary adjustment that I hope you can make as you listen to this term dispassion.

But there is the emphasis on ardor. Sāriputta said one cannot attain enlightenment without ardor, this inner fire. In the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, the meditator practices ardently to be aware. There's the quality of zeal, which is one of the bases of power. There's the quality of vīrya, which is often translated as courage, energy or effort—delighting in what's wholesome.

So virāga is actually the quality of abandonment of greed, aversion and delusion. And as such, it's synonymous with nibbāna. It means the real letting go of the distorting passions of mind, the things that lead us astray. So it stands for coming in touch with nibbāna, with the deathless, with the ultimate.

And out of that comes the next link, which is liberation—vimutti—often described as the unshakable deliverance of mind. For one who has attained to this level, the mind is no longer capable of being shaken by any occurrence.

And that is what leads to the final link: knowing the destruction of the taints. One realizes at this stage of full liberation that all the underlying tendencies to suffering, to ignorance, to desire have been ended. So after that moment of liberation, one realizes, "Lived is the spiritual life, done is what had to be done. The taints are destroyed."

So this is the process of transcendental dependent origination.

When I first heard this whole scheme, I went to my teacher and said, "How long is it going to take? When's it going to happen for me?" And my teacher, of course, said, "You know, there's no way to tell. You just keep walking. And if you keep walking, you have to get there. There's no alternative. If you keep on this path, it only leads in one direction. There's no other way. But we don't know how long it will take. It develops according to our own individual natures."

This is from Ajahn Chah: "As a result of his experience, the Buddha taught that the practice has to develop naturally, according to conditions. You allow things to develop according to your accumulated wholesome kamma and pāramīs. That doesn't mean you stop putting effort into the practice, but that you continue with the understanding that whether you progress swiftly or slowly, it's not something you can force."

It's like planting a tree. It knows by itself the appropriate pace to grow at. If you crave to get quick results, see that as delusion. Even if you want it to grow slowly, see that as delusion. It knows its own pace.

I'll close with this dialogue from the Buddha. Continuing this image that Silvia used in last night's talk of crossing the stream as a symbol for coming to freedom, somebody once asked the Buddha, "How did you cross the flood?" Which is basically another way of saying, "How did you become liberated?"

The Buddha replied, "I crossed the flood by not tarrying and not hurrying. When I hurried, I sank. And when I tarried, I was swept away. I crossed the flood by not tarrying and not hurrying."

This perfectly captures the middle way of practice—neither forcing nor being passive, neither rushing ahead nor holding back. The path unfolds naturally when we engage with it skillfully, with patience and persistence balanced in perfect harmony.

Let's sit for a minute in the silence of this teaching.

CHAPTER 225

Purification of the Heart

Guy Armstrong · 50 min

> In this New Year's Eve dharma talk from Spirit Rock, Guy Armstrong explores the Buddha's profound teaching that "this mind is naturally radiant and brightly shining, but it is colored by the defilements that visit it." Drawing from the Dhammapada's core teaching to "help others if you can, don't harm living beings, and purify the heart," Armstrong focuses on the emotional dimensions of purification work.
>
> The talk addresses how to work skillfully with what he calls the "meditator's big five" difficult emotions: desire, anger, self-judgment, sadness, and fear. Rather than trying to eliminate these states, Armstrong teaches that healing comes through understanding them fully - recognizing their bodily sensations, mental coloring, and storylines. He emphasizes that strong emotions aren't problems unless we make them so, drawing parallels to how children naturally move through the full spectrum of feelings.
> Using the Buddha's teaching on the five hindrances and stories from retreat life, Armstrong demonstrates how mindfulness creates spaciousness around difficult states, allowing us to relate to them with wisdom rather than being overwhelmed. The talk concludes with Gampopa's Four Blessings, emphasizing how confusion itself can dawn as wisdom when met with the awakened heart of acceptance and understanding.

The talk tonight is on the theme of the purification of the heart. I feel very privileged to be sharing this evening with you. This is the last night of the second millennium in Western countries. There was all the hoopla a year ago about the millennium, but as you know, that was the false dawn. This is the real thing, so it's a great way to start the third millennium in a dharma setting.

I couldn't help but reflect, though. I have a Buddhist calendar upstairs in my room, and the year on the calendar—it's from a group based in Thailand—is 2,544. That's the number of years since the Buddha was on the Earth. So if the millennium means anything, I reckon it means that the Thai people are about 544 years ahead of us in their wisdom and metta. We still have some ways to go yet. That's why the theme of the purification of heart seemed appropriate for tonight.

There was a cartoon from a magazine called Natural History, a science magazine. It showed a beach with a little fish with legs struggling out of the ocean, just coming up on the beach. There was a thought bubble above its head that said, "eat, survive, reproduce." A little further up on the beach was a full-fledged lizard that looked like a miniature dinosaur, walking quite happily on land. It had made the transition, and above its head was the thought bubble: "eat, survive, reproduce." A little further up was a monkey scampering along the beach quite happily on its four legs, and above its head, the same thought bubble: "eat, survive, reproduce."

Then there was a man standing on the beach dressed in 20th century garb. He had a very puzzled expression on his face, stroking his chin and looking very quizzical. The thought bubble above his head was: "Hmm, I wonder what life's all about. Eat, survive, reproduce."

If you look back over the history of human beings on this planet, or even the history of our own life, you could be forgiven for thinking that these are the primary urges and forces in the human psyche—the forces concerned with survival and all the fights for limited resources, for the conquest of land that can provide food, and all the energy that we've put as a species into sexuality and conquest in that direction too. This is not a very optimistic view of human nature, but from the history of humans on the planet, there's some reality to it.

The good news is that from the Buddhist perspective, our deepest nature is good. When we look most deeply inside each one of us, we find something that is pure from the beginning, pure now, and pure into the eternal future. Something that is basically uncorruptible. That is the center of each one of us.

The Buddha put it like this: "This mind is naturally radiant and brightly shining, but it is colored by the defilements that visit it. This the untaught person does not understand, and so for them there is no cultivation of the mind."

This natural goodness that's within us has been covered by these other forces—these self-centered forces basically of desire and fear. The point the Buddha is making is that the radiance, the natural radiance of the mind and heart is intrinsic, is always there. But the things that cover it are only visitors. They're only temporary, so they're not intrinsic. Sometimes it's hard to connect with this innate goodness because the forces that cover it—hope and fear—are so strong.

Then the Buddha goes on: "This mind is naturally radiant and brightly shining, but it is free from the attachments that visit it. This the noble follower of the way understands as it really is. So for them, there is cultivation of this mind."

When we can perceive that intrinsic goodness free from the defilements, we realize that that's our human potential. Then we become inspired to live more and more from that center. The cultivation is the work of gaining access to that intrinsic goodness again and again and again so that it becomes a more stable place from which we can live our lives.

The purpose of meditation then can be seen as the thinning of these veils that cover that goodness within each of us—the lifting of the visitors that keep us from seeing that innate purity.

It's from the Dhammapada. He said, "Help others if you can. Don't harm living beings and purify the heart. This is the teaching of all the Buddhas."

Of course, he didn't say "heart." He was speaking in the Pali language, and the word he used was citta, which can be translated either as heart or mind. It's a word that in Pali and Sanskrit includes our whole emotional life as well as our rational mental life. So the purification of citta really means two levels: purification on the emotional level—what we call the heart level or feeling level—and purification of how we understand the world, the purification of view, or purification by wisdom.

Tonight I'd like to talk more about the emotional side of that purification work and focus on the purification of the heart. In the purification of the heart, which is really what brought me to meditation practice, our work is about healing. It's about healing our emotional life and the struggles and conflicts and difficulties that we encounter by not quite understanding how to work with the painful emotions we face in living.

If you look at a child, children go through every emotion on the map. They go into them totally, experience them totally, express them totally—much to their parents' and teachers' concern often. But then they'll come right out of that emotion into the next one. So whether it's happiness or terror or anger or joy, the child is into each one fully, and when they leave it, it's gone. It's just over.

But somehow for us, we've lost that ability to go into an emotion fully with great trust and faith and then leave it fully when it's passed. So the healing work is really about restoring that childlike innocence and openness to the whole range of our human emotional life.

The foundation of this work is the trust, the faith that we don't have to get rid of any of these emotions. In order to heal, in order to find a harmony within ourselves, we don't have to get rid of the emotions. Now in the Buddhist path, in the long run, these obscurations, these difficult emotions are said to lift completely. In the mind of the Buddha it's said that greed and hatred and all their forms were no longer operative, were no longer even dormant. That's a beautiful possibility, an inspiring possibility.

But in order to heal, to find that emotional balance and harmony, that level of understanding is not needed. We can come to a great sense of well-being and joy and happiness in life without going that far. So for the work of healing, the purification of the heart in terms of the emotional life, there's no need to get rid of any of the emotions that we experience. The need is to understand them better. Seeing with wisdom the way they really are is all that's needed to purify them. And then we can have that ability that the child has to go into the emotion fully, trust it, and when it goes, to come out.

We recognize in starting this emotional work that we're all human and we all share the same package of emotions. In many ways we're the same organism, each one of us. We've been put together just the same and there are just these minor variations—how far our eyes are apart and what color our hair is and what color our skin is. But basically within each of us we know joy, we know happiness, we know enthusiasm, we know excitement, we know friendship, we know delight. We also know the difficult side. We know fear and sorrow and grief, despair and loneliness. We all have all these within us, and in our meditation practice they will all come to be experienced. The whole range of our human possibilities will visit us in our practice. And it's really just a question of coming to know each one of the visitors, coming to understand it, not about getting rid of any of them.

Robert Aitken put this in a rather dramatic fashion. One time he was leading a retreat—he's a great Zen teacher, a Western Zen teacher who lives on Oahu. He's mostly retired, but in my view he's one of the greatest Western Dharma teachers alive. He came in for a Dharma talk at his Zen retreat and he sat down and said, "The difficulties you're experiencing now..."

Then he went into a long pause. He had everybody's attention. This was the phrase that rang home for people in the middle of a Zen retreat like ours. And after the pause he continued, "...will be with you for a very long time."

Whoa. Is this man bringing good news or what?

So it sounds discouraging when he says it like that, but the actual meaning is very liberating when you think about it. It means we don't have to change anything about the way we are. We don't have to change ourselves in this practice. It's more a question of opening with full acceptance to what we are here and now, not getting rid of or changing any part of ourselves.

Strong emotions really aren't a problem unless we make them one. The life of a child, the emotional life of the child, really illustrates this. If we can let emotions come, express themselves, and go, where's the problem? But the problem comes when part of our emotional life isn't comfortable for us. If we don't feel it's acceptable, if we don't feel it's okay, if we don't feel we can allow it to be in us, then when it comes, we want to close down around it. We constrict, we contract with fear and non-acceptance. Then it gets bottled up.

The emotion gets repressed, and when we repress an experience or emotion in the psyche, it goes deep and doesn't get released. This is basically what's happened to most of us somewhere along our growing up—somewhere in adolescence, probably. We started finding feelings we couldn't move through easily. The outside culture, teen culture, told us we weren't cool if we felt that way. Or our parents told us we shouldn't be feeling that way. Or we were just too apprehensive. So we closed down around some of our emotional life.

It's actually beautiful in the retreat setting, in meditation practice, when some of the richness of that emotional life starts to come back for us. Not always so easy, but it's a very enlivening and opening part of the process.

The first step in purification is to know what we're feeling when we're feeling it. This is much harder than it sounds. It sounds straightforward, but it's not.

I think about a time I walked out of this meditation hall, sitting a retreat here, and I was going to my walking spot. I tended to walk down on the grass below the parking lot. I was heading out for my usual walking spot, being quite mindful—lifting, moving, placing. Slowed down. I'd been in retreat for a while. Lifting, moving, placing. I was very, very present.

I looked up toward my walking path, and there was somebody in it. Somebody was walking in my path. Lifting, moving, placing. Very mindful again. What's that person doing in my path? I've been walking there for a week already. Don't they know I'm there? Lifting, moving, placing. What kind of person would do something like that? They must not be very developed. Lifting, moving, placing.

So I walked down and got another place on the grass. It was actually just as good, but that didn't really matter. Lifting, moving, placing, and I was still annoyed. I'd still think about what was wrong with that person. Lifting, moving, placing.

About halfway through my walking period, I realized: I'm annoyed. I thought I was being so mindful, and all this time I was annoyed and I didn't even see it. So then I went, "Oh, annoyed, annoyed. Irritation, irritation." I'd been feeling it for about half an hour and hadn't even known it.

That's the sneaky thing about these states of mind—they kind of zip in under our radar. We've got the mindfulness radar set up. We're catching breaths, we're catching sensations, we're catching sounds. And then zoom, these mind states come in.

It eludes all our radar and takes us over. While we're in the grip of it, we're really caught by it, bound by it. There's no space. We're so identified—in my case, I was so identified with being annoyed, I couldn't see anything else.

When that annoyance is in place, or the other states, they act like a color, like a screen over our eyes. We see everything in the world through that kind of color. Everything that happens when you're feeling annoyed isn't quite satisfying, isn't quite right.

The first thing—the most important thing and about half the battle—is to be able to name the feeling. Just to be able to say, "Oh, I'm feeling angry," or "I'm feeling afraid," or "I'm feeling hurt," or "I'm feeling anxious," or "I'm feeling desire." Whatever the thing is, if you can name it, that's half the battle.

What the naming does—and I actually encourage you to use the note at that point, just that soft note: "anger, anger," "wanting, wanting"—that soft note seems to create a kind of spaciousness around the feeling. It lets us know we're not just anger. We're not just desire. We're not just fear. We're also mindfulness. We're also awareness.

When we recognize that that awareness is there, it gives us a lot of choice in relation to the feeling. We don't feel like we're just under its power or that it's taken us over. What we do at that point is start to create a relationship with it, a relationship that's based on understanding, observation, mindfulness, and wisdom.

It's really the setting up of that relationship that alters the power these states have over us. It gives us a new place to come from in relation to them. Even though the state may still be there—I may still be feeling annoyed or fearful or wanting—we have a new degree of choice in the situation. We're not quite as controlled by it. That means a little bit of the power has gone out of this state, this strong emotion.

The next step is just let yourself feel that state directly. Give yourself over to feeling the emotion once you've named it. There's really nothing else that you need to do with it. You don't have to wonder about where it came from. Was it related to your childhood upbringing? Is this here because of something your father said to you thirty-five years ago? You don't have to figure out the source, because this practice is all about here and now.

All you have to do is bring that here-and-now attention to the experience of that feeling. That's where the freedom will come in.

Emotions generally have three areas where they really impact us. The first—I think Sharda mentioned this this morning—is in the body. Any strong emotion will have a resonance, an impact somewhere in the body. If you tune into the sensations where you feel the emotion impacting you, that's a good way to stay grounded and in touch with the feeling.

The second is the mental tone itself, the coloring in the mind of that mood. Every emotion has its own flavor, its own color in the mind. That's a mental attribute, not particularly of the body. So tune into that—the flavor of anger, the flavor of fear, the flavor of wanting.

The third is that each emotion has its own storyline. It's strongly connected with thought. Thoughts can bring up these emotions, and when we're in the emotion we tend to think a certain pattern of thought. Those kinds of thoughts we call the storyline, and I'll talk about those in a little more detail.

If you are aware of the impact in the body, the mental color of the emotion, and the kind of thoughts that go with it, then you have the whole constellation of that emotion. Mindfulness of emotions is about letting yourself feel all three of these aspects.

When the Buddha talked about the difficulties that come for meditators, he talked about a list called the five hindrances. Many of you are familiar with this list, have heard it lots of times.

Usually when we announce the five hindrances, half the room goes to sleep. You could probably give this talk as well as any of us, so I'm not going to give that talk tonight. But just to remind the veterans here, the five hindrances are sense desire, aversion or negativity, sleepiness, restlessness, and doubt.

I'm going to do a little bit different list tonight—what I see as the meditator's big five. These are five hits that tend to play over and over for myself and a lot of the people that I meet. In no particular order, the big five that I see are desire, anger, self-judgment, sadness, and fear. These are five that it's very helpful to get some experience working with in practice.

Actually, if they visit you during the retreat, you're very fortunate. Because in the retreat you don't have anything else to do but learn about these. If you're in the outside world, you're going to get distracted. "Oh, I can't pay attention to my sadness right now. I've got to go do my job. I've got to do my work. I've got to take care of my children. I've got to relate with my partner. Got to drive to the store." We rarely get that opportunity to just come into intimate touch with these forces that are so strong and so central in our lives.

In a retreat we don't have anything else to do but give ourselves totally to that relationship. We can get to know them really, really closely. This is very healing—this kind of intimate knowledge. Very healing in the emotional life because as we understand our emotions we take the unknown quality out. We take that scary quality out of them.

So we'll see how far we get with the big five. We'll probably only do two or three tonight. But they're very typical. Once you've learned how to work with one, the ways to work with the others become easier.

I'll first talk a little about desire. Very central in the Buddha's teaching, obviously. The second noble truth was the truth that the cause of suffering is craving. So this force of desire is really central in the connection to unhappiness in life. It's this basic movement of mind that wants a pleasant experience. And it can be very strong and captivating in the middle of a retreat because our retreat experience is often devoid of pleasant experiences. So the austerity highlights pleasure by contrast.

I was teaching a retreat in Italy this summer, and a fellow came in for an interview on about the second or third day. He said, "Well, I'm having a little trouble settling down into the retreat." I said, "Oh really, why is that?" He said, "Well, I'm on my vacation. And I had two choices. A few of my friends were going on a vacation in the Caribbean and they invited me to go along. And my other choice was to come here." I said, "Well, it's great you came here. What made you choose that?" He said, "I couldn't get a ticket to the Caribbean."

So of course, that really made me feel wanted! But I understood why he was having a hard time settling down. He hadn't given up the Caribbean trip yet. So I said, "Look, just hang out with it for a few more days. Keep coming back to the present. Remember what it was that you valued about your meditation practice. Give yourself some encouragement and see if you land on earth soon."

And he did. Next couple of days I saw him, he'd kind of gotten over it and his practice unfolded really beautifully after that. But take a look at the storyline—the thoughts around that experience for him. The storyline was basically if he'd been in the Caribbean, he would have been happy. There may have been some truth to that.

But of course, as we all know, it's just a very limited and inferior kind of happiness. We really wouldn't wish that on a good friend. But when the mind becomes convinced that "if I had that, I would be happy," then the storyline catches us up in a state of unfulfillment. Because along with that goes the corollary: "I can't be happy now. I can't be happy until I have that. So I'm unhappy now." And that's what he was suffering with—he was actually miserable at the time.

This is the way that desire tends to work. We see an object, a thing, a person, a place, and we project that as something that we want. The storyline, the underlying assumption is: "If I had it, I would be happy." Now to some extent that can be true—these external pleasures do bring a kind of happiness for a while. There's no denying that.

But what the projection into the future doesn't ever take into account is that vacation being over, that dish of ice cream being eaten, that relationship finishing the honeymoon phase and going into—what was it Jack said—"the laundry after the ecstasy" phase of relationship. Somehow the desire storyline never looks at the ending of the pleasurable experience. It never looks beyond the limited satisfaction.

Once we look beyond that into impermanence, we see we're just going to be back in the same place we were before. And so what have we really gained by that temporary satisfaction? Ultimately, nothing. But desire doesn't want to see that. It just wants to see the temporary satisfaction.
